Viuat & Viuat Princeps CAROLVS, et Orbi
Imperet, innumeris decorans sua sæcla Triumphis.
Flourish graue Prince, out Shine thy Glorious Name, Triumphant Laurels ever Crowne thy Fame.

To the High and Mighty Prince CHARLES,

Prince of Wales, and Duke of Cornewall:

Eldest Sonne to our Soveraigne Lord, CHARLES, King of Great Britaine, France, and IRELAND.

SIR,

THE Dedication of Chronicles hath in all times been thought worthy of the greatest Princes: Gulielmus Gemiticensis writ a Chronicle of the Dukes of Normandy, and Dedicated it to William the Conquerour. Thomas Walsingham writ a Chronicle of the Kings of England, and Dedicated it to King Henry the sixth: And of late time, Sir Francis Bacon, Viscount Saint Albans, and Lord Chancellour of England, writ a History of the Reigne of King Henry the seventh, and Dedicated it to Your Royall Grand-Father of blessed memory, King James: For indeed, as nothing makes Princes more Illustrious then Learning; So no Learning makes them more Judicious then History; Other Learning may fill their mindes with knowledge; This onely with Judgement: And seeing it is Judgement that must sit as President over all their Actions, it is fit that History should sit as President over all their Studies. History gives an Antedate to Time; and brings Experience without gray haires: Other Knowledges make You but see Quod ante pedes est; History is the true perspective Glasse, that will make You see things afarre off: And though it make not men to become Prophets, yet it makes their conjectures to be little leſſe then Oracles. But moſt Illuſtrious Prince, there accrues to your Highneſſe, by this Chronicle, a greater benefit then all this; For if it were an Excitation of great force to vertue, to have it ſaid, Et Pater Æneas & Avunculus excitet Hector; of how great Force muſt it needes be, when You ſhall reade the Noble Acts of ſo many your worthy Progenitors; Some Eternized for their valourous Atchievements in Warre: Some for their prudent government in Peace: Some Renowned for Mercy, ſome for Juſtice: And although the Example of your Royall Father be not amongſt them, yet it may be ſufficient that while you have the Acts of others upon Record, you have his under View, by which he ſeemes to ſay unto you, Diſce Puer virtutem ex me, verumque laborem; Fortunam ex aliis. And if in any of your Progenitors, there appeare, as it were Maculæ in Orbe Lunæ, will it not invite you to a higher Orbe, that Your Actions may ſhine with the clearer Beames? and then how happy will the eyes be, that ſhall ſee you ſitting in your Throne? For my ſelfe, I ſhould account it happineſſe enough, that I have lived to ſee the dayes of your Illuſtrious Father; if it were not a great unhappines to ſee them overcaſt with clouds; & yet when theſe clouds ſhal be diſpel'd, will it not make him ſhine with the greater Splendor? And this as old as I am, I doubt not to live my ſelfe to ſee, and having once ſeene it, ſhal then willingly ſay my Nunc Dimittis, and leave the joy of your glorious times for another Age: In the meane time proſtrating my ſelf humbly at your feet; and wiſhing to your Highneſſe, as Diphobus did to Æneas;—I Decus, I Noſtrum, Melioribus utere Fatis.

Your moſt humble and moſt devoted Servant,

RICHARD BAKER.

An Epiſtle to the READER.

THis Booke, I ſuppoſe will no ſooner come abroad; but the queſtion will be asked, why any man would take ſo ſuperfluous a Labour, to write that which hath beene written by ſo many; by ſome ſo copiouſly, by ſome ſo elegantly, that nothing can be added: To which Objection, I confeſſe my ſelfe unable to make a better Anſwer then by Preſident: For when many excellent men had written the Story of the Roman Emperours, both accurately and eloquently; yet Suetonius Tranquillus comming after them, wanted not his part of Commendation. For though he added nothing in the matter or ſubſtance, yet he altered much in the forme and diſpoſition, diſtinguiſhing that into Claſſes and Chapters, which the former had delivered in one continued Narration: as being both leſſe tedious to the Reader, like a way marked out by Miles; and more plainly Informing, where Diſtinction tooke away confuſion. Beſides, many have Written the Reignes of our Engliſh Kings, copiouſly indeed, but ſo ſuperfluouſly, that much may juſtly be pared away; Some againe Elegantly indeed, but ſo ſuccinctly, that much as juſtly may be added: And this, if I have endevoured to doe, I cannot be blamed; If done it, I deſerve acceptance. Againe, where many have written the Reignes of ſome of our Kings, excellently as in the way of Hiſtory, yet I may ſay they have not done it ſo well in the way of Chronicle; For whilſt they inſiſt wholly upon matters of State, they wholly omit meaner Accidents, which yet are Materials as proper for a Chronicle, as the other. For my ſelfe, if in ſome places I be found to ſet downe whole paſſages, as they are already ſet downe by others, and may ſeeme rather to tranſcribe then to write; yet this I ſuppoſe may be excuſed, as being all of one common ſtocke; and no matter from whence the Water comes, ſo it come cleane to the Readers uſe. Laſtly, for the Worke it ſelfe; I dare be bold to ſay, that it hath beene Collected out of Authours both Ancient and Moderne, with ſo great care and diligence, that if all other Chronicles ſhould be loſt, yet this onely would be ſufficient to informe Poſterity of all paſſages memorable or worthy to be knowne; which of any other generall Chronicle, cannot perhaps be ſaid.

RICHARD BAKER.

A CHRONICLE OF THE KINGS OF ENGLAND

from the time of the Romans Government, unto the Raigne of King CHARLES.

Of the first knowne times of this Iſland.

ALthough we begin the Æra of our Computation from William called the Conquerour, as though he were the firſt King of our Engliſh Nation: Yet before him, were many other excellent Kings; and their Acts perhaps as worthy to bee knowne, if they could be knowne. But ſeeing after ages can know nothing of former times but what is Recorded by writing: It hath followed that as the firſt Writers were Poets: So the firſt writings have been Fictions; and nothing is delivered to Poſterity of the moſt ancient times, but very Fables: Such as is the ſtory of Albina (of whom they ſay, this Iſland was called Albion: though others ſay, ab albis rupibus, of the white cliffes) that ſhee ſhould be the eldeſt of the two and thirty daughters of Dioclesian King of Syria, (ſuch as never was) who being marryed to two and thirty Kings, in one night killed all their husbands: for which fact, they were put in a ſhippe, themſelves alone without any Pylot, ſo to try their adventure, and by chance arrived in this Iſland, of whom Gyants were begotten. And if you like not of this; then have you the ſtory of Albion the ſonne of Neptune, of whom the Iſland tooke its name. But when theſe are exploded; there followes another with great Atteſtation, and yet as very a Fable as theſe; namely the ſtory of the Trojan Brute, (of whom the Iſland they ſay, was called Britaine: though many other cauſes are given of the name:) as likewiſe the ſtory of Brutes coſin Corinæus, (of whom they ſay, the Country of Cornwall hadits name, to whom it was given, for overcomming the Giant Gogmagog:) and that Brute having three ſonnes, Lecrine, Albanact, and Cãmber; he gave at his death to his eldeſt ſonne Locrine, all the land on this ſide Humber, and called it Logria; to his ſecond ſonne Albanact, all the land beyond Humber, of whom it was called Albania, (now Scotland:) and to his youngeſt ſonne Camber, all the land beyond the river of Severne, of whom it was called Cambria, (now Wales:) with other ſuch ſtuffe, which may pleaſe children, but not riper Judgements; and were firſt broached by Geffry Archdeacon of Monmouth: for which all the Writers of his time cryed ſhame upon him, and yet can ſcarce keepe many at this day, from giving credit to his Fictions.

And when we are once gotten out of Fables, and come to ſome truth; yet that truth is delivered in ſuch ſlender draughts, and ſuch broken pieces, that very ſmall benefit can be gotten by the knowing it, and was not till the time of Julius Cæſar, a thouſand yeares after the Fable of Brute: at which time, the Iſland was yet but in manner of a Village, being without Walls, as having no ſhipping, (which are indeed the true Wals of an Iſland) but onely certaine ſmall veſſels, made of boards and wicker. And as they had no ſhips, for defence without: So neither had they any Forts, for defence within: ſcarce any houſes but ſuch as were made of ſtakes and boughes of trees faſtned together; Neither was it yet come to be a Kingdome, but was Governed by a number of petty Rulers: So as Kent onely had in it (as Cæſar calleth them) foure Kings; Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax: which diviſion, as it made the Britaines the more eaſie to be conquered, ſo it made the Romans the longer in conquering. For if they had beene one united body, one or two battailes might have made a conqueſt of the whole, where being thus divided, there was need to be as many battailes as there were diviſions; So as it was many yeares, before the Romanes could conquer the whole Iſland; even from the time of Julius Cæſar, to the time of the Emperour Domitian; not much leſſe then two hundred yeares. It is true, after Cæſars firſt comming, the Iſland grew ſenſible of this defect of their diviſion, and thereupon by conſent of a great part, made choyce of Caſſibelan, King of the Trinovants, who had his ſeate at Verulam, to be Generall of their warres; which made indeed ſome little ſtoppe to the Romanes proceedings, but after the loſſe of a battaile or two, they fell againe into a relapſe of their former defect, and thought it better to ſecure every one his owne, by his owne meanes, then by a generall power, to hazard all at once; whereby it came afterward to be true: Dum ſinguli pugnant, univerſi vincuntur. Yet before the Country could bee wholly Conquered; at firſt by reaſon of the Nations valour, ſeeking to keepe themſelves free, and afterward by reaſon of the inſolency of the garriſon ſouldiers, that ſought to make them ſlaves, many great oppoſitions were made, amongſt which the moſt memorable was that of Voadicia, a certaine Queene of the Country, who having beene by the Romane ſouldiers herſelfe abuſed, and her daughters raviſhed, uſed meanes to levy an Army of ſix ſcore thouſand men, whom ſhe led herſelfe into the field, and ſet upon the Romanes in their chiefe townes, which were London, Verulam, and Camalodunum (now Malden in Eſſex;) of whom ſhe ſlew above ſeventy thouſand: but then in a ſecond battaile, had foureſcore thouſand of her owne Army ſlaine, after which defeate, for avoyding of ſlavery, ſhe poyſoned herſelfe.

This Iſland for a long time, was ſo much eſteemed of the Romanes, that their Emperors ſometimes came hither in perſon; as firſt the Emperor Adrian, in the yeare 124. who made a great wall of earth betweene England and Scotland, and having ſet the Country in order, returned. After him ſometime, Severus the Emperor in the yeare 212. came over into Britaine to repreſſe the Incurſions of the Picts and Scots, by whom in a battaile neere Yorke, he was wounded and thereof dyed, or as others ſay, he dyed of age and ſickneſſe. Afterward in the yeare 305. Conſtantius the Emperor came into Britaine, and ended his life at Yorke, making that City famous for the death and buriall of two great Emperors; and yet more famous for the honor done to Conſtantine the Great, ſonne of Conſtantius, who in that City was firſt ſaluted Emperor. But notwithſtanding the great eſtimation the Romanes a long time made of this Iſland, yet at laſt, after five hundred yeares they had kept it in ſubjection, they voluntarily left it: the charge of keeping it, being greater, then the benefit; for to keepe it in ſubjection, they maintained no fewer than foureſcore thouſand ſouldiers in pay, and when warres grew amongſt themſelves at home, they could no longer ſpare ſo many abroad, but recalled them home: but then, though they left Britaine, yet they left not the Britaines, but carried them, at leaſt, a great part of them away with them, of whom the moſt were ſlaine in their ſervice, and the reſt planted in that part of France, which of them was afterward, and is to this day day called Britaine. And now one would thinke, the Iſland ſhould be in good caſe, being freed from them that kept them in ſubjection, but it proved to bee in worſe caſe being at liberty, then it was before in ſervitude, for being deprived of their ableſt men, and at the ſame time, their King Lucius happening to dye without iſſue, they were left as a few looſe ſticks without the bond of a Governour: which the Picts and Scots obſerving, thought now was the time to make the Country their owne, and thereupon made invaſions upon it with all their Forces. Whereupon the Britaines having none left of their Native Kings to ſucceed; and knowing they could ill manage the Body of an Army without a Head: they make choyce of Vortigerne Earle of Cornwall, one extracted from the Britiſh Line; and he, whether ſo adviſed by his Cabinet Counſellor, the Propheticall Merlin, or as finding his owne ſtrength too weake to make reſiſtance; implores firſt ayde of the Romanes, and they making anſwer, they had buſineſſe enough to do of their owne, and leaving them to themſelves, he then fled to the Saxons for ayde, a warlike people of Germany, and who had greater ſwarmes then their hives would well hold.

And here we may plainly ſee how dangerous a thing it is for a Nation, to call in ſtrangers to their ayd, and eſpecially in any great number; for though they come at firſt but mercenaries, yet once admitted, and finding their owne ſtrength, they ſoone grow Maſters, as here it proved with the Saxons.

But before we ſpeake further of the comming in of the Saxons, who were at that time Infidels, and brought with them their two Idols, Woden and Fryg, (whereof two of our weeke dayes, Wedneſday and Friday, take their names; it will be fit to ſay ſomething of the ſtate of the Chriſtian Church in this Iſland. Firſt then, it is recorded, that in the yeare 63. what time Arviragus raigned here, Joſeph of Arimathea (who buried the body of Chriſt) came into this Iſland, and laid the foundation of the Chriſtian Faith in the Weſterne parts, at a place called then Hvalon; now Glaſtenbury; and that there came with him, Mary Magdalen, Lazarus, and Martha: and more then this, that Simon Zelotes one of the Apoſtles ſuffered martyrdome here in Britaine: and more then this, that both St. Peter and St. Paul came into this Iſland and Preached the Goſpell; all which and more to this purpoſe, is Recorded by Authors of good Account: though it be hard believing, That perſons, and ſpecially women of ſo great age, as theſe muſt needes be at this time, ſhould take ſo long a journey. But howſoever it was, certaine it is, that the doctrine of Chriſtianity was about this time planted in this Iſland, though it made afterwards but ſmall progreſſe, and that with ſome perſecution: as in which time, St. Alban ſuffered martyrdome at Verulam; and at Liechfield ſhortly after, no fewer then a thouſand. After this, in the yeare 180 what time Lucius was King of this Iſland, Eleutherius then Biſhop of Rome, ſent Faganus and Damianus to him: upon whoſe preaching, the Temples of the Heatheniſh Flamins and Arch-flamins (one and thirty in number) were converted to ſo many Biſhops Sees; whereof London, Yorke, and Caerleyn (now St. Davids) were made the Metropolitans of the Province. And there is a Table remaining at this day, in the Pariſh Church of St. Peter on Cornhill London, which recordeth, that the Foundation thereof was laid by this King Lucius, and that this Church was the Cathedral to that Archbiſhops See. In the yeare 359. a Councel was holden at Ariminum in Italie, where foure hundred Weſterne Biſhops were Aſſembled, whereof three went out of Britaine, and gave their voyces againſt the Arian Hereſie. After this, about the yeare 420. roſe up in this Iſland, one Pelagius a Monke, brought up in the Monaſtery of Bangor in Wales, who ſpread the poyſon of his Hereſie, firſt in this his Native Countrey, and afterward all the world over. And theſe had beene the chiefe paſſages in matters Eccleſiaſticall within this Iſland, when the Saxons were called in, about the yeare 450.

And now under the Conduct of two brothers, Hengiſt and Horſa, came over nine thouſand Saxons with their wives and children, to aſſiſt the Britaines againſt the Scots, and were appointed the Iſle of Thanet to Inhabit. With which aſſiſtance the Britaines give their enemies battaile, and overcome them: So as they accounted the Saxons as Angels ſent from heaven, and then allowed them Kent alſo for their

Inhabiting. Not long after Hengist obtained of King Vortigern the property of so much ground, as he could enclose with a Buls Hide: which cutting into thongs, hee there built the Castle, Facti de nomine, called Thong Castle. And now having built it he invites Vortigern to a Feast, where falling in love with Rowena, the beautifull daughter of Hengist, and marrying her, it put Hengist into such a height of boldnesse, that he began to aspire, sending for greater Forces to come over to him; as meaning to transplant himselfe hither, and to make this Iland his Inheritance: which the British Lords perceiving, and not able to weane their King from his new wife, and her father Hengist, they Depose him; and in his place set up his sonne Vortimer, a true lover of his Country: who presently in a pitcht battaile neere unto Aylesford in Kent, set upon the Saxons; where Catigern the brother of Vortimer, and Horsa, of Hengist, in single fight hand to hand slew each other. In which place Catigern was buried, and a Monument in memory of him Erected, the stones whereof at this day are standing in a great Plaine in the Parish of Aylesford; which instead of Catigern, is corruptly called Kits-Colyhouse. Another the like Monument was erected for Horsa, though now defaced; remembred onely by the Towne where it stood; called Horstead. Three other battailes after this were fought betweene the Britaines and the Saxons: one at Crayford; another at Weppeds-fleete; the third upon Colmore: in which last, the Britaines got so great a victory, that the Saxons were cleane driven out of Kent, and in Thanet also not suffered also to rest; so as shortly after, Hengist with his Saxons departed the Kingdome, as being now out of hope to make his Fortune in this Iland. But while Vortimer was thus intentive for his Countries liberty; Rowena the formet Kings wife, being daughter to Hengist, was as intentive to bring it into servitude; which knowing she could not do as long as Vortimer lived, she used meanes by poyson, to take away his life, after he had beene King the space of foure yeeres, and then by the witchcraft of faire words, so enchanted the British Nobility, that her husband Vortigern was againe established in the Kingdome; which was no sooner done, but Hengist, (relying upon his sonne Vortigerns love) with a mighty Army attempts to returne againe into the Iland; when being resisted, he makes a shew, as if hee desired nothing but to fetch away his daughter Rowena, and to have a friendly conference for continuance of amity: which motion seeming reasonable, a place and time of conference was appointed: the time upon the first of May; the place upon the Plaine of Ambrii, now called Salisbury; whither the plaine meaning Britaines came unarmed, according to agreement; but the fraudulent Saxons under their long Cassocks had short skeynes hidden, with which, upon a watch-word given, they set upon the Britaines, and of their unarmed Nobility slew three, some say five hundred, & took the King himselfe prisoner, whom they would not release, till they were put in possession of these foure Counties, Kent, Sussex, Suffolke, and Norfolke. Whereupon Vortigern, whether fearing a second Deposing, or whether so advised by his Cabinet Counsailour the Prophetical Merlin, betooke him into Wales, and there built him a strong Castle for his safeguard; while the Saxons comming daily in great swarmes into the Land, had at this time overrunne all; if Aurelius Ambrosius a Romane borne, but affected to the British Nation, had not landed at Totnes in Devonshire, to whom resorted great troopes of Britaines. His first expedition was against Vortigern, (as the first cause of the Britaines misery) whose Castle he besieged; and whether by wilde-fire, or by fire from Heaven, both he and his Castle, and all that were in it were burnt to ashes. To this Ambrosius is ascribed the admirable Monument in Wiltshire, now called Stonehenge, in the place where the Britaines had beene treacherously slaughtered and interred; and of whom the Towne of Ambersbury beares its name. After this he set upon the Saxons, and in many battailes discomfited them; till at last falling sicke in the City of Winchester, a Saxon, in shew a Britain, and in habit a Physitian, was sent unto him, who instead of Physick, ministred poyson, whereof he died, in the yeare 497. after he had raigned two and thirty yeares.

After Ambrosius, succeeded Uter, (some say his brother, others, a Britaine) called Pendragon, of his Royall Banner borne ever before him; wherein was portrayed a Dra-

Dragon with a golden Head, as in our English Camps, it is at this day borne for the Imperiall standard. And he also in many battailes discomfited the Saxons, till after eighteene yeares Raigne he came to his end by treachery; dying by poyson put into a Well, whereof he usually dranke, in the yeare 515.

After him succeeded his sonne Arthur, begotten of the faire Lady Igren, wife of the Duke of Cornwall, to whose bed the Art of Merlin brought him in the likenesse of her husband; and hee in twelve set battailes discomfited the Saxons; but in one most memorable, in which girding himselfe with his sword called Callibourne, he flew upon his Enemies, and with his owne hand slew eight hundred of them; which is but one of his wonderfull deedes, whereof there are so many reported, that hee might well be reckoned amongst the Fabulous, if there were not now true to give them credit. Amongst other his Acts, he Instituted the Order of Knights of the Round Table, to the end there might be no question about Precedence, and to teach Heroicall minds, not to stand upon place, but Merit. But this great Prince, for all his great valour, was at last in a battaile wounded, whereof he died, in the yeare 542. after he had raigned six and twenty yeares.

After King Arthur succeeded his cosin Constantine, & after his three yeares raigne, Aurelius Conanus the Nephew of King Arthur; whose Raigne is so uncertaine, that some say, he raigned onely two, some, three yeares, some againe thirty, and some three and thirty. After Conanus succeeded Vortiporus, who after many victories against the Saxons, and foure yeares Raigne, died. After whom succeeded Malgo Conanus, and Raigned six yeares. After him Careticus, who setting upon the Saxons and beaten, fled into the Towne of Chichester, whereupon the Saxons catching certaine Sparrowes and fastning fire to their feete, let them fly into the Towne, where lighting upon straw, and other matter apt to take fire, the whole City in short space was burnt; and thereupon Careticus flying, secured himselfe amongst the Mountaines of Wales, where he dyed, after he had unprosperously Raigned three yeares: and from that time forth, the Britaines lost their whole Kingdome in the East part of the Iland, and were confined in the West by the rivers Severne and Dee. After Careticus succeeded Cadwan, who Raigned two and twenty yeares. After him his sonne Cadwallo, who Raigned eight and forty yeares, and then died; whose body was buried in St. Martins Church neere Ludgate, and his Image of brasse placed upon the same gate, for a terrour to the Saxons. In his time, the doctrine of Mahomet began to spread it selfe all the Easterne world over. After Cadwallo succeeded his sonne Cadwalladar; in whose time so great a Famine, and afterward Mortality hapned, continuing eleven yeares, that the Land became in a manner desolate: in so much, that the King and many of his Lords were driven to forsake their native Country, and Cadwalladar himselfe went to his cousin Alan King of little Britaine in France. At which time the Saxons taking advantage of his absence, came over in swarmes, and dispossessed the forlorne Britaines of all they had, and divided the Land amongst themselves. Whereupon Cadwalladar, obtaining assistance of his cousin Alan, was comming over to restraine their insolencies; when making prayers to God for good successe, an Angell appeared to him, or at least to his seeming hee heard a voyce, that forbad him the enterprise, declaring that it was not Gods will, the Britaines should rule this Land any longer, and therefore bade him hie him to Rome, and receive of Pope Sergius the habit of Religion, wherein he should die and rest in peace. Which accordingly he did: and in him ended the blood of the British Kings; in the yeare 689. So as Britaine now, was no longer Britaine; but a Colony of the Saxons.

And now is time to speake of the Heptarchy of the Saxons; so much spoken of, by all Writers; and to shew by what degrees the Britaines lost, and the Saxons got the whole possession of this Iland: for this Heptarchie or division of this Iland into seven Kingdomes, came not in all at once, nor yet in an equall partition, but some good distance of time, one after another, and as the Invadour had strength to expell the Natives.

The

The first Kingdome being of Kent.

THe first Kingdome of the Saxons began by Hengist, in the yeare 455. containing all Kent, and continued 372. yeares, during the raignes of seventeene Kings, of whom as many as performed any memorable Act, shall be remembred, and for the rest, it will be no losse to passe them over in silence. Of these seventeene Kings, Ethelbert being the fifth, was the first Saxon Christian King of this Island, converted by Austin the Monke, whom Pope Gregory sent hither to that purpose, with forty others, in the yeare 555. to whom King Ethelbert gave his chiefe City of Canterbury, and his owne Royall Palace there, made firee the Cathedrall of that See; withdrawing himselfe to Reculver in the Isle of Thunet, where he erected a Palace for himselfe and his successors. He gave him also an old Temple, standing without the East wall of the City, which he honoured with the name of St. Pancras, and then added a Monastery to it, and Dedicated it to St. Peter and Paul, appointing it to be the place for the Kentish Kings Sepulchers. But in regard of Austin the procurer, both Pancras, Peter, and Paul were soone forgotten, and it was, and is to this day, called St. Austines: which Abbey St. Austin enriched with divers Reliques which he brought with him from Rome; amongst which was a part of Christs seamelesse Coate, and of Aarons Rodde. This King after his owne conversion, converted also Sebert King of the East Angles, and assisted him in the building of the Cathedrall Church of St. Paul London, as also the Church of St. Peter, on the West of London, then called Thorny: and himselfe at Rochester built the Cathedrall Church there, which he Dedicated to the Apostle St. Andrew; and dying, when he had Raigned six and fifty yeares, was buried at Canterbury. And thus by this first Saxon Kingdome, was all Kent lopped off from the Britaines Dominion; and this was their first impairing, and this happened in the Raigne of Ambrosius before spoken of. The sixth King of Kent was Ethelbald, who at first an Apostata, was afterwards converted, and built a Chappell within the Monastery of St. Peter and Paul at Canterbury. The seventh King was Ercombert, a vertuous and religious Prince, who first commanded the observing of Lent; and in his daies, the Archbishop Honorius divided Kent into Parishes. The eighth King was Egbert, who obtained the kingdome by murthering his Nephews: whose sister the Lady Dompnena, founded the Abbey of Minster in Kent. The eleventh King was Withred, who founded the Priory of St. Merton at Dover. The last was Baldred, who overcome by Egbert King of the West Saxons, left Kent a Province to that Kingdome, in the yeare 827.

The second Kingdome being of the South Saxons.

THe second Kingdome of the Heptarchie, was of the South Saxons, and began by Ella, in the yeare 488. containing Sussex and Surrey, and continued 113 yeares, during the raigne of five Kings onely, of whom Cissa being the second founded the City of Chichester, and raigned as some say threescore and sixteene yeares. And then Berthan being the last King, was overcome by Ine King of the West Saxons, and his Country became a Province to that Kingdome, in the yeare 601. and thus as Kent before, so now Sussex and Surrey were lopped off from the Britaines Dominion: and this was a second impairing, which also happened in the Raigne of the British King Ambrosius.

The

The third Kingdome being of the West Saxons.

THe third Kingdome of the Heptarchie, was of the West Saxons, and began by Cerdic, in the yeare 519. containing Cornwall, Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Hampshire, and Barkeshire, and continued 561. yeares, during the Raignes of nineteene Kings, of whom this Cerdic was the first: in whose time, Porth a Saxon landed in the West, at a place from him called afterward Portesmouth, and ayded Cerdic in his conquest. And this happened in the Raigne of King Arthur: and as Kent, Sussex, and Surrey before, so now these seven other shires were lopped off from the Britaines Dominion: and this was a third impairing. The sixth King of the West Saxons was Kingills, who was the first Christian King of this kingdome, converted by Berynus an Italian Divine, to whom hee gave the City of Dorchester, neere to Oxford, who therein erected his Episcopall See. The seventh King was Kenwald, who at first an Apostata was afterward converted, and founded the Cathedrall of Winchester, and the Abbey of Mamesbery; whose wife Segburg also built a house of devotion in the Isle of Sheppey, wherein herselfe became a Nunne, and was afterward elected Abbesse of Ely. The eleventh King was Ine, who ordained many good lawes, which are yet extant in the Saxon tongue, and are translated into Latin, by the learned Master William Lambert. This King built a Colledge at Wells bearing the name of St. Andrews, which afterward King Kenulph made an Episcopall See. He also in most stately manner new built the Abbey of Glastenbery; and out of his devotion to the See of Rome, he injoyned every one of his Subjects, that possessed in his house of any one kinde of goods to the value of nineteene pence, to pay yearely upon Lammas day, one penny to the Pope; which at first was contributed under the name of the Kings Almes, but afterward was paid by the name of Peter pence. At last hee went to Rome, and there tooke upon him the habit of Religion, and therein died. His wife also became a veyled Nunne, and afterward was made Abbesse of Barking neere London. The thirteenth King was Cuthred, who first permitted the bodies of the dead to be buried within the walls of their Cities, which before were used to bee buried in the fields. The foureteenth was Sigebert, who for his cruelty and exactions, was by his subjects forced to fly into the woods to hide himselfe, where by a swinherd hee was slaine. The fifteenth was Kenwolph, who founded the Cathedrall Church of St. Andrews at Wells, and was afterward slaine by Kynoard, whom he had banished. The sixteenth King was Brithrick, whose Queene Ethelburg, having prepared a poyson for another, the King chanced to tast it, and thereof died. In feare of which chance the Queene fled into France, where Charles the then King for her excellent beauty, offered her the choyce of himselfe or his sonne in marriage: but she out of her lustfull humour choosing the son, was thereupon debard of both, and thrust into a Monastery, where committing adultery, she was driven from thence, and ended her life in great misery. For her sake the West Saxons ordained a Law, that no Kings wife should hereafter have the Title or Majesty of a Queene, which for many yeares after was severely executed.

The fourth Kingdome being of the East Saxons.

THe fourth Kingdom of the Heptarchy was of the East Saxons, & began by Erchenwyn, in the yeare 527. containing Essex and Middlesex, and continued 281 years, during the Raignes of foureteene Kings; of whom the third was Sebert, who first built the Cathedrall of St. Paul London, which had formerly beene the Temple of Diana: He likewise Founded the Church of St. Peter in the West of London, at a place called Thorny, where some time stood the Temple of Apollo, which being overthrowne by an Earthquake, King Lucius new built for the service of God; & that againe being decayed, this King restored to a greater beauty, & with his his Queene Athelgarda was there buried. The ninth King was Sebba, who after thirty yeares peaceable Raigne relinquished the Crowne, & tooke upon him a Religious habit, in the Monastery of St. Paul London, where dying, his body was Intumbed in a Coffin of gray Marble, the cover coaped, and as yet standeth in the North wall of the Chancell of the same Church. The twelveth was Offa, famous for the beauty of his countenance, who both enlarged with buildings, and enriched with lands the Church of Westminster, and after eight yeares Raigne went to Rome, and was there shorne a Monke, and in that habit died. The fourteenth was Suthred, whom Egbert King of the West Saxons subdued, and made his Kingdome a Province to his owne. And thus besides the former Shires, these two also were lopped off from the Britaines Dominion, and this was a fourth impairing.

The fifth Kingdome being of Northumberland.

THe fifth Kingdome was of Northumberland, and began by Ella and Ida, in the yeare 547. Containing Yorkeshire, Durham, Lancashire, Westmerland, Cumberland, and Northumberland, and continued 379. yeares, during the Raignes of three and twenty Kings, of whom nothing is recorded of these two first, but that they builded the Castle of Bamburg. The seventh King was Ethelfryd, who at Caerlegion (now Westchester) made a slaughter of twelve hundred Christian Monkes, and was himselfe afterward slaine, by Redwald King of the East Angles. The thirteenth King was Osred, whose wife Cutburga, out of a loathing wearinesse of wedlocke, sued out a divorce from her husband, and built a Nunnery at Winburne in Dorsetshire, where in a Religious habit she ended her life. The sixteenth King was Cednulph, who after eight yeares Raigne, left his Royall robes, and put on the habit of a Monke, in the Ile of Lindesfern or Holy Island. Unto this King the Venerable Bede, a Saxon and a Priest in the Monastery of Peter and Paul at Werimouth neere to Durham, Dedicateu his worke of the English Historie, which hee continued from the first entrance of the Saxons into this Island, to the yeare 731. containing after his owne account 285. yeares. The seventeenth King was Egbert, who after twenty yeares Raigne forsooke the world also, and shore himselfe a Monke; whose brother being Archbishop of Yorke, erected a notable Library there, and stored it with an infinite number of learned bookes. The last King was Oswald, after whom this Kingdome yeelded to the protection of Egbert King of the West Saxons, who was now in the yeare 926. become absolute Monarch of the whole Island. And thus by the erection of this fifth Kingdome, were the six Northerne shires lopped off from the Britaines Dominion, and this was a fifth impairing.

The sixth Kingdome being of Mercia.

THe sixth Kingdome was of Mercia, and began in Crida, in the yeare 522. containing Huntington, Rutland, Lincolne, Nottingham, Warwickshire, Leycester, Northampton, Derbyshire, Oxfordshire, Cheshire, Shropshire, Glostershire, Staffordshire, Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, and Hartfordshire, and continued 202. yeares, during the Raignes of twenty Kings; eight of whom in a continued succession kept the Imperiall Crowne of the Heptarchie: for though other Raigned as Kings in their owne Territories, yet among them ever one was the supreme head of the rest, and was called King of Engle-lond, till Egbert the West Saxon brought them all into one. The fifth of these Kings of Mercia was Penda, who was the first Christian King of the Mercians, and laid the Foundation of a faire Church at Medeshamstead, now called Peterborough. The seventh King was Ethelred, who Raigned thirty yeares, and then gave over the Crowne, and became a Monke in the Monastery of Bradney in Lincolnshire, where in the yeare 716. he died. The eighth King was Kenred, red, who after foure yeares raigne went to Rome, where he tooke upon him the habit of a Monke, and after other foure yeares dyed. The tenth King was Ethelbald, who at first was given to much lasciviousnesse of life, but being reprehended for it by Boniface Archbishop of Ments, was so farre converted that he Founded the Monastery of Crowland, driving in mighty piles of Oake into that Marish ground, where he laid a great and goodly building of stone, and after two and forty years Raigne was slaine in a battaile by Cuthred King of the West Saxons. The eleventh King was Offa, who greatly enlarged his Dominions, raigned nine and thirty yeares, and Founded the Monastery of St. Albans. The thirteenth King was Kenwolph, who raigned two and twenty yeares, and Founded the Monastery of Winchcombe in the County of Glocester, where his body was interred. The eighteenth King was Withlafe, who overcome by Egbert King of the West Saxons, held his Country afterward as his substitute and Tributary, acknowledging Egbert as now the sole Monarch of this Island. And by erection of this Mercian Kingdome, were seventeene shires more lopped off from the Britaines Dominion, and was a sixth and a great impairing, so as now they were driven into a narrow roome.

The seventh Kingdome being of the East Angles.

THe seventh Kingdome was of the East Angles, and began by Uffa, in the yeare 575. containing Suffolke, Norfolke, Cambridgeshire, and the Isle of Ely, and continued 353. yeares, during the raigne of fifteene Kings, of whom the fifth was Sigebert, who first brought the light of the Gospell into his Dominions, and built a Schoole for education of youth, but whether at Oxford or Cambridge, is left a Quære; and after three yeares Raigne shore himselfe a Monke in the Abbey of Cumbreburg, which himselfe had built: but being afterward violently drawne from thence by his Subjects the East Angles, to resist the Mercian King Penda, and refusing to use any other weapon but onely a white wand, was in a battaile by him slaine. The seventh King was Anna, who after thirteene yeares raigne, was also slaine by Penda the Mercian King. This King Anna was memorable chiefly for the holinesse of his children, of whom his sonne Erkenwald was Bishop of London, and built the Abbey of Barking neere London. His eldest daughter Etheldrid was twice married, and yet continued a Virgin still, and at last became a Nunne, and is remembred to posterity by the name of St. Audrie. His second daughter named Sexburg, his third named Ethelburg, his fourth (a Naturall daughter) named Withburg: all entred into Monasteries, and are Canonized all for Saints. The foureteenth King was Ethelbert, a learned and religious Prince, who being invited by Offa the Mercian King to marry Elfrid his daughter, came for that purpose to Offa's Court, then seated at Sutton Walleys in the County of Hereford, and there by him was cruelly murthered. In whose memoriall notwithstanding, hee afterward built a faire Church at Hereford, the Cathedrall of that See, as though he could expiate a murther of the living, by a Monument to the dead, and were not rather a Monument of his owne impiety. The fifteenth King was Edmund, who assaulted by the Danes for his possessions, was more assaulted for his profession: for continuing constant in his Christian Faith, those Pagans first beat him with bats, then scourged him with whippes, and lastly bound him to a stake, and with their arrowes shot him to death; whose body was buried at the Towne where Sigebert the East Anglian King, one of his Predecessors, had built a Church, and where afterward (in honour of him) was built another most spatious, of a wonderfull frame of Timber, and the name of the Towne upon the occasion of his buriall there, called to this day St. Edmunds bury. This Church and place, Suenus the Danish King burnt to ashes: but when his sonne Canutus had gotten possession of the English Crowne, terrified with a Vision of the seeming St. Edmund, in a religious devotion to expiate his Fathers sacriledge, hee built it anew most sumptuously, and offered his owne Crowne upon the Martyrs Tombe. After the death of this Edmund, the East Angles Country was possest by the Danes, and so con-continued the ſpace of fifty yeares, untill that Edmund ſurnamed the Elder, expelled thoſe Danes, and made that Kingdome a Province to the Weſt Saxons.

By that which hath beene ſaid, it plainely appeares, by what degrees the Britaines loſt, and the Saxons got the whole poſſeſſion of this Iſland. For after that Vortigern in the yeare 455. had called in the Saxons, every Britaine King that ſucceeded him, loſt ſome part or other of it to the Saxons, till at laſt in the yeare 689. Cadwallader the laſt Britaine King loſt all; and then the Saxon Kings ſtriving amongſt themſelves for ſoveraignty, they ſtill gained one upon another, till at laſt in the yeare 818 Egbert King of the Weſt Saxons reduced them all under his ſubjection, and then cauſed all the South of the Iſland to bee called England, according to the Angles of whom himſelfe came; after whom they were no longer properly called Saxon Kings, but Kings of England, and ſo continued till the Danes, in the yeare 1017. made an interruption; of whoſe ſucceſſion now comes the time to ſpeake.

Of the Saxons that Raigned ſole Kings of this Iſland, and may properly be called Engliſh Kings.

EGbert the eighteenth King of the Weſt Saxons, is now become the firſt of the Kings of England, in whoſe time the Danes began firſt to infeſt the Land; as thinking they might do as much againſt the Saxons, as the Saxons had done againſt the Britaines; but though they made divers Invaſions, and did great ſpoyle, yet they were ſtill repelled. This King raigned ſix and thirty yeares, and dying in the yeare 836. was buried at Wincheſter. Of his iſſue, his daughter Edith was made Governeſſe of a Monaſtery of Ladies, by her planted in a place which the King her brother had given her, called Polleſworth, ſituate in Arden, in the North part of the County of Warwicke, where ſhee died and was buried, and the place in memory of her called St Edyths of Polleſworth.

To Egbert ſucceeded his ſonne Ethelwolph, who in his youth was ſo addicted to a Religious life, that he was firſt made Deacon, and after Biſhop of Wincheſter; but his father dying, he was intreated by his people to take upon him the Crowne, and by Pope Gregory the fourth, was to that end abſolved of his Vow. His raigne was infeſted with many and great Invaſions of the Danes, to whom notwithſtanding hee gave incredible overthrowes. In the time of his Raigne, remembring his former Religious profeſſion, he ordained that riches and lands due to holy Church, ſhould be free from all Tribute or Regall ſervices, and in great devotion went himſelfe to Rome, where he lived a yeare, confirmed the grant of Peter pence, and agreed beſide to pay yearely to Rome three hundred Markes. Returning home through France, and being a Widower, he there marryed Judith, the beautifull daughter of Charles the Bald then Emperor, in honour of whom, in his owne Court, hee ever placed her in a chaire of Eſtate, with all other Majeſticall complements of a Queene, contrary to the Law of the Weſt Saxons formerly made, which ſo much diſpleaſed his Lords, that for it they were ready to Depoſe him; but howſoever hee lived not long after, having Raigned one and twenty yeares. His yongeſt ſonne Neoto, was much addicted to learning, and was one of the firſt Divinity Readers in the Univerſity of Oxford, and Founded a Monaſtery in Cornwall, which of him was called Neoteſtock, and being dead his body was Interred in the County of Huntington, at a place then called Arnulphsbury, and afterward, in regard of his Interment, St. Neotes, and now St. Needes. This King was famous, for having foure ſons, who all of them were Kings of this Land ſucceſſively.

Firſt after him Raigned his eldeſt ſonne Ethelbald, in the yeare 857. who to his eternall ſhame, tooke to wife Judith his fathers widdow, Raigned but two yeares and dying, was buried at Shirborn in Dorſetſhire, at that time the Epiſcopal See. From this Judith, married afterward to the Earle of Flanders, after divers deſcents, came Maude the wife of William the Conqueror, from whom are deſcended all our Kings ever ſince.

Next

Next to the eldeſt Raigned the ſecond ſonne Ethelbert, all whoſe Raigne, which was onely five yeares, was perpetually diſquieted with Invaſions of the Danes, which yet were at laſt repelled. He died in the yeare 866. and was buried at Shirborne in Dorſetſhire.

Next to the ſecond Raigned his third ſonne Ethelred, whoſe Raigne was more diſquieted with the Danes then any others before: for they Invading the Land, under the leading of Hungar, and Hubba, ſpoyled all the Country as they went, not ſparing Religious places; amongſt other, the goodly Monaſteries of Bradney, Crowland, Peterborough, Ely, and Huntington, they laid levell with the ground: the Monkes and Nunnes they murthered or raviſhed; at which time a rare example of Chaſtity and Fortitude was ſeene in the Nunnes of Coldingham. For to avoyd the barbarous pollutions of theſe Pagans, they deformed themſelves by cutting off their upper lips and noſes. Nine battailes in one yeare this King fought with the Danes, in moſt of them victorious; but at laſt received a wound whereof he died, and was buried in the Church at Winborne in Dorſetſhire.

Next to the third Raigned his fourth ſon Alfred, in whoſe time came over greater ſwarmes of Danes then ever before, and had now got footing in the North, the Weſt, & South parts of this Iſland, leaving this King nothing of all his great Monarchy, but only Somerſet, Hampton, and Wiltſhire, and not theſe neither altogether free, ſo as he was forced ſometimes to flie into the Fennes and Mariſh grounds to ſecure himſelfe, where he lived by Fiſhing and Fowling, and hunting of wilde beaſts, till at laſt learning policy from adverſity, and gathering courage from miſery, hee ventured in the habit of a common Minſtrell, to enter the Danes Campe; where having viewed the manner of their Encamping, and obſerved their ſecurity, he returned backe, ſhewing his Lords in what condition he found them: whereupon ſetting upon them at unawares, he not onely made of them a great ſlaughter, but brought upon them a greater terrour: for preſently upon this the Danes ſue for Peace, and deliver Hoſtages for performance of theſe Conditions; that their King ſhould receive Baptiſme, and their great Army depart quietly out of the Land. But though upon this agreement they departed for the preſent into France, yet the yeare following they returned with greater Forces, forraging all parts of the Countrey in moſt cruell manner, though ſtill encountred by this Valorous Prince, till hee ended his life in the yeare 901. after he had Raigned nine and twenty yeares. The vertues of this King, if they were not incredible, they were at leaſt admirable, whereof theſe may be inſtances. The day and night containing foure and twenty houres, he deſigned equally to three ſpeciall uſes, obſerving them by the burning of a Taper ſet in his Chappell; (there being at that time, no other way of diſtinguiſhing them) Eight houres he ſpent in Contemplation, Reading and Prayers: Eight in proviſion for himſelfe, his Health and Recreation: and the other eight in the Affaires of the Common-wealth and State. His Kingdome likewiſe he divided into Shires, Hundreds and Tythings; ordaining that no man might remove out of his Hundred without ſecurity: by which courſe he ſo ſuppreſſed Theeves and Robbers, which had formerly encreaſed by the long warres, that it is ſaid a boy or girle might openly carry a bag of gold or ſilver, and carry it ſafely all the Country over. Beſides his great Piety, he was alſo learned; and as farre as it may be a commendation in a Prince, a skilfull Muſitian and an excellent Poet. All former Lawes hee cauſed to be ſurvayed, and made choyce of the beſt, which hee tranſlated into the Engliſh tongue; as alſo the Paſtorall of St. Gregorie, the Hiſtory of Bede, and Boetius his conſolation of Philoſophie; the Pſalmes of David likewiſe he began to tranſlate, but died before he could finiſh it. And ſo great a love he had to learning, that he made a Law, that all Freemen of the Kingdome, poſſeſſing two Hides of land, ſhould bring up their ſonnes in learning, till they were fifteene yeares of age at leaſt, that ſo they might be trained to know God, to be men of underſtanding, and to live happily. His buildings were many, both for Gods ſervice and for other publike uſe: as at Edlingſey a Monaſtery, at Wincheſter a new Minſter, and at Shaftesbury a houſe of Nunnes; whereof he made his daughter Ethelgeda the Abbeſſe; but his

Foundation of the Univerſity of Oxford, exceeded all the reſt: which he began in the yeare 895. and to furniſh it with able Scholars, drew thither out of France, Grimbaldus and Scotus, and out of Wales, Aſſer, (who wrote his life) whoſe Lectures he honoured often with his owne preſence. And for a ſtocke of Frugality, he made a Survey of the Kingdome; and had all the particulars of his Eſtate, regiſtred in a Booke; which he kept in his Treaſury at Wincheſter. He Raigned ſeven and twenty yeares, and dying was buryed in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Peter at Wincheſter, though removed afterward, into the Church of the new Monaſtery, without the North-gate of the City called Hyde. His Wife Elſewith, Founded a Monaſtery of Nunnes at Wincheſter, and was there buryed. Their ſecond daughter Ethelgeda, tooke upon her the Vow of Virginity; and by her Fathers appointment was made a Nunne of Shaftesbery, in the County of Dorſet, in the Monaſtery founded there by him, who is alſo accounted the Founder of the Towne it ſelfe.

King Alfred being deceaſed, his ſonne Edward (called Edward the Elder) ſucceeded: not ſo learned as his Father; but in Valour his Equall, and Superiour in Fortune. For, firſt, he overcame his Couſin Ethelwald, who aſpired to the Crowne; then the Danes, whoſe chiefe leader he ſlew in battaile; laſtly the Welſh, but theſe laſt, more by humility ſhewed to their Prince Leolyn, then by force of Armes. But yet he muſt not have all the glory of his time; ſome muſt be imparted to his ſiſter Elſtede; who being marryed to Ethelred Earle of Mercia, had by him a daughter, but with ſo grievous paines in her travaile, that ever after ſhe refuſed the nuptiall bed of her Husband, ſaying, it was a fooliſh pleaſure, that brought with it ſo exceſſive paines. And thereupon after her husbands death, made choyce to follow the warres; aſſiſting her brother both againſt the Welſh, and againſt the Danes, whom ſhe brought to be at her diſpoſing. Dying ſhe was buryed at Gloceſter, in the Monaſtery of Saint Peter, which her Husband and her ſelfe had built. King Edward himſelfe, after foure and twenty yeares Raigne, deceaſed at Faringdon in Barkſhire, in the yeare 924. and was buryed in the new Monaſtery of Wincheſter, which his Father began, and himſelfe wholly finiſhed: having had by his three Wives, ſix Sonnes and nine Daughters, of whom his eldeſt ſonne Athelſtan ſucceeded him in the kingdome, whom his Grandfather King Alfred had with his owne hands Knighted, in an extraordinary manner; putting upon him a purple Robe, and girding him with a girdle wrought with Pearle. His ſecond ſonne Elfred, he ſo loved, that he cauſed him to be Crowned King with himſelfe, which yet he enjoyed but a ſhort time, being taken away by death. His third ſonne Elfward, preſently upon his Fathers death, dyed himſelfe alſo. His fourth ſon Edmyn, was by his brother Athelſtan, out of jealouſie of ſtate, put into a little Pinnace, without either Tackle or Oares, accompanyed onely with one Page; with griefe whereof, the young Prince leaped into the Sea and drowned himſelfe. His fifth, and ſixth ſonnes, Edmund, and Edred, came in ſucceſſion to be Kings of England. Of his Daughters, the eldeſt Edytha, was marryed to Sthricke the Daniſh King of Northumberland, and he deceaſing, ſhe entred into a Monaſtery, which ſhe began at Tamworth in Warwickſhire, and there dyed. His ſecond daughter Elſtede, tooke upon her the vow of Virginity, in the Monaſtery of Ramſey, in the County of Southhampton, where ſhe dyed and was interred. His third daughter Eguina, was firſt marryed to Charles the Simple, King of France, and after his deceaſe, to Herbert, Earle of Vermandois. His fourth daughter Ethelhild, became a Nunne in the Monaſtery of Wilton, which was ſometime the head Towne, giving name to the whole County of Wiltſhire, and anciently called Ellandon. That we may ſee in thoſe firſt times of Religion, when there was leaſt knowledge, there was moſt devotion. His fifth daughter Edhold, was marryed to Hugh, ſurnamed the Great, Earle of Paris, and Conſtable of France. And Edgith his ſixth daughter, to Otho, the Emperour of the Weſt, ſurnamed the Great. His ſeventh daughter Elgina, was marryed to a Duke of Italy. His ninth Edgina, to Lewis Prince of Aquitaine in France.

After

After the death of King Edward, his eldeſt ſonne Athelſtan ſucceeded, and was Crowned at Kingſtone upon Thames, in the County of Surrey, by Athelmus Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the yeare 924. The beginning of whoſe Raigne, was moleſted with the Treaſon of one Elfrid a Nobleman, who being apprehended and ſent to Rome to purge himſelfe, and there denying the Act upon his Oath, fell ſuddenly downe, and withſin three dayes dyed, to the eternall terrour of all perjured perſons. Preſently upon this, another dyſaſter befell King Athelſtan, for having cauſed his brother Edwyns death, (as before is ſhewed) chiefly procured by his Cupbearers ſuggeſtions: It hapned not long after, that his Cupbearer, in his ſervice at a Feſtivall, ſtumbling with one foote, and recovering himſelfe with the other, and ſaying merrily, See how one brother helpes another; His words put the King in remembrance of his Brother, whoſe death he had cauſed, and with remorſe thereof, not onely cauſed his Cup-bearer to be put to death, but did alſo ſeven yeares penance: and built the two Monaſteries of Middleton, and Michelneſſe, in the County of Dorſet, in expiation of his offence. This King ordained many good Lawes; and thoſe to binde as well the Clergy, as the Laity; amongſt which, one was the Attachment of Felons, that ſtole above twelve pence, and were above twelve yeares old. Of this King, there is one Act related, that may ſeeme ridiculous; another that may ſeeme miraculous; For what more ridiculous, then that, going to viſit the Tombe of Saint John of Beverley, and having nothing elſe of worth to offer, he offered his knife in devotion to the Saint? Yet the miraculous is more apparent: For going to encounter the Danes, and praying to God for good ſucceſſe, he prayed withall, that God would ſhew ſome ſigne of his rightfull cauſe, and thereupon ſtriking with his ſword, he ſtrucke it an ell deepe into a hard ſtone, which ſtood ſo cloven a long time after. But whether this be true or no, this certainly is true, that he obtained many great victories againſt the Danes, againſt the Scots, againſt the Iriſh, and againſt the Welſh, whoſe Princes he brought to be his Tributaries, entring Covenant at Hereford, to pay him yearely twenty pound weight of gold, three hundred of ſilver, and five and twenty hundred head of Cattell, beſides a certaine number of Hawkes and Hounds. Laſtly, he joyned Northumberland to the reſt of his Monarchy, and enlarged his Dominions beyond any of his Predeceſſours, which made all Neighbouring Princes to ſeeke his friendſhip, and to gratify him with rare preſents, as Hugh King of France ſent him the ſword of Conſtantine the Great, in the hilt whereof, was one of the nayles that faſtned Chriſt to his Croſſe; He ſent him alſo the ſpeare of Charles the Great, reputed to be the ſame that pierced Chriſts ſide; as alſo part of the Croſſe whereon Chriſt ſuffered, and a piece of the Thorny Crowne put upon his head. Likewiſe Otho the Emperour, who had marryed his ſiſter, ſent him a veſſell of pretious ſtones, artificially made, wherein were ſeene Landskips with Vines, Corne, and Men, all of them ſeeming ſo artificially to move, as if they were growing, and alive. Likewiſe the King of Norway ſent him a goodly Ship, with a gilt Steirne, purple ſayles, and the decke garniſhed all with gold. Of theſe accounted Holy Reliques, King Athelſtan gave part to the Abbey of Saint Swithin in Wincheſter, and the reſt to the Monaſtery of Mameſbury, whereof Adelm was the Founder, and his Tutelar Saint. He new built the Monaſteries of Wilton, Michelneſſe, and Middleton; Founded Saint Germans in Cornwall, Saint Petrocus at Bodmyn, and the Priory of Pilton; new walled and beautifyed the City of Exceter, and enriched either with Jewels or Lands, every ſpeciall Abbey of the Land. But the chiefeſt of his workes for the ſervice of God, and good of his Subjects, was the Tranſlation of the Bible into the Saxon Tongue, which was then the Mother tongue of the Land. He Raigned fifteene yeares, Dyed at Gloceſter, and was buryed at Mameſbery, in the yeare 940. having never beene marryed.

After the death of Athelſtan, his brother Edmund, the fifth ſonne of his Father ſucceeded; and was Crowned at Kingſtone upon Thames; but no ſooner was the Crowne ſet upon his head, but the Danes were upon his backe; and in Northumberland made Inſurrections, whom yet he not onely repreſſed in that part; but tooke from them the Townes of Lincolne, Leyceſter, Darby, Stafford and Nottingham; compelling them withall to receive Baptiſme, and to become his Subjects, ſo as the Country was wholly his as farre as Humber. Cumberland alſo, which had beene an entire Kingdome of it ſelfe, and was now ayded by Leolyn King of South-wales, he utterly waſted, and gave it to Malcolme King of Scots, to hold of him by Fealty. After his returning home, he ſet himſelfe to ordaine Lawes for the good of his People; which Maſter Lambert hath ſince tranſlated into Latine. But after all his noble Acts both in Warre and Peace, he came at laſt to a lamentable end; for at his Manour of Pucklekerks, in the County of Gloceſter, interpoſing himſelfe to part a fray betweene two of his ſervants, he was thruſt through the body, and ſo wounded that he dyed, and was buryed at Glaſtenbury, after he had Raigned five yeares and ſeven moneths, leaving behinde him two young Sonnes, Edwyn, and Edgar.

King Edmund dying, his brother Edred, in the minority of his Nephewes, was Crowned at Kingſtone upon Thames, by Otho Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, in the yeare 946. Not as Protector; (It ſeemes that kinde of Authority was not yet come in uſe) but as King himſelfe, though with purpoſe to reſigne, when the right Heire ſhould come of age, which at this time needed not, for while the right Heire was ſcarce yet fourteene yeares old, he reſigned to him the Kingdome, by reſigning his life to Nature, after he had twice repreſſed the rebelling Northumbrians, and twice forgiven their rebelling, which yet was not a ſimple Rebellion; for they had ſent for Anlafe the Dane out of Ireland, and made him their King; which place for foure yeares he held; and then weary of his government, they thruſt him out and take one Hericus to be their King, whom not long after they put downe alſo; and then partly allured by the lenity of King Edred; and partly forced by his Armes; they ſubmit themſelves to him, and aske forgiveneſſe; to whom he, as a mercifull Prince, grants an Act of Oblivion, and received them againe into protection. This Prince was ſo devout and humble, that he ſubmitted his body to be chaſtiſed at the will of Dunſtan Abbot of Glaſtenbury, and committed all his Treaſure and Jewels to his cuſtody. The ſtately Abbey of Mich at Abington neare Oxford, built by King Inas, but deſtroyed by the Danes, he newly re-edified, endowing it with revenues and Lands, the Charters whereof he confirmed with ſeales of Gold. He ordained Saint Germans in Cornwall, to be a Biſhops See, which there continued, till by Canutus it was annexed to the Epiſcopall See of Kyrton in Devonſhire; Both which Sees were afterward by King Edward the Confeſſor, tranſlated to the City of Exeeter. He left behinde him two Sonnes, Elfred, and Bertfred, and was buryed in the old Minſter, without the City of Wincheſter; whoſe bones with other Kings, are to this day preſerved in a gilt Coffer, fixed upon the wall, in the South ſide of the Quire.

After Edred, not any of his ſonnes, but his Nephew Edwyn, the eldeſt ſonne of King Edmund ſucceeded, and was annoynted and Crowned at Kingſton upon Thames, by Otho Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, in the yeare 955. This Prince, though ſcarce fourteene yeares old, and in age but a childe, yet was able to commit ſinne as a man; For upon the very day of his Coronation, and in ſight of his Lords, as they ſate in Counſell, he ſhamefully abuſed a Lady of great Eſtate, and his neare kinſwoman, and to mend the matter, ſhortly after ſlew her Husband, the more freely to injoy his inceſtuous pleaſure. And whether for this infamous fact, or for thruſting the Monkes out of the Monaſteries of Mamesbury, and Glaſtenbury, and placing married Prieſts in their roomes, as alſo for baniſhing Dunſtan the holy Abbot of Glaſtenbury out of the Realme, a great part of his Subjects hearts was ſo turned againſt him, that the Mercians and Northumbrians revolted, and ſwore Fealty to his younger brother Edgar, with griefe whereof, after foure yeares Raigne, he ended his life, and was buryed in the Church of the New Abbey of Hyde, at Wincheſter.

After Edwyn, ſucceeded his younger brother Edgar, at the age of ſixteene yeares; but his Coronation, when, and where, and by whom, ſo uncertaine, that ſome ſay he

he was Crowned at Kingſton upon Thames, by Otho Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, in the firſt yeare of his Raigne, others ſay, not till the twelfth, and William of Mameſbery, not till the thirteeth: Another Chronicle ſaith, in his eleventh yeare; and that in the City of Bathe, by the hands of Dunſtan Arch-biſhop of Canterbury. This King, by reaſon of the tranquillity of his Raigne, was ſurnamed the Peaceable; for as he was ſomething inclined to the Danes, ſo the Danes never offered to ſtirre in all his time; and as for the Saxons, they acknowledged him their ſole Soveraigne, without diviſion of Provinces or Titles. His Acts were, ſome Vertuous, ſome Politick, ſome Juſt, ſome Pious, and yet all theſe not without ſome mixture of vice. To repreſſe dunkenneſſe, which the Danes had brought in; he made a Law, Ordaining a ſize, by certaine pinnes in the pot, with penalty to any, that ſhould preſume to drinke deeper then the marke. It was a Politicke device which he uſed for the deſtruction of Wolves, that in his dayes did great annoyance to the Land. For, the tribute impoſed on the Princes of Wales, by King Athelſtan, he wholly remitted, appointing in lieu thereof a certaine number of Wolves yearely to be paid; whereof the Prince of North-wales, for his part was to pay three hundred; which continued for three yeares ſpace: and in the fourth yeare, there was not a Wolfe to be found; and ſo the tribute ceaſed. He had in his Navy Royall, three thouſand and ſixe hundred ſhips, which he divided into three parts, appointing every one of them to a ſeverall Quarter, to ſcowre the Seas, and to ſecure the Coaſts from Pirats: and leſt his Officers might be careleſſe, or corrupted; he would himſelfe in perſon ſaile about all the Coaſts of his Kingdome every Summer. It was a notable Act of Juſtice, that in his Circuits, and Progreſſes through the Country, he would take ſpeciall account of the demeanour of his Lords; and ſpecially of his Judges; whom he ſeverely puniſhed, if he fonnd them Delinquents. Warres he had none in all his Raigne, onely towards his end, the Welſhmen moved ſome rebellion; againſt whom he went with a mighty Army, and chaſtiſed the Authours; but when his Souldiers had gotten great ſpoyles, and made prey upon the innocent Countrey people; he commanded them to reſtore it all backe againe; which, if it made ſome few Engliſh angry, it made the whole Country of the Welſh well pleaſed, and ſound forth his praiſes. His Pious Acts were, that he built and prepared ſeven and forty Monaſteries, and meant to have made them up fifty, but was prevented by death. But now his mixture of Vice marred all; eſpecially being a Vice oppoſite to all thoſe Vertues, which was Laſciviouſneſſe. For firſt, he deflowred a ſacred Nunne, called Wolfchild; on whom yet he begot a Saint, the chaſt Edyth. After her, another Virgin, called Ethelfiede, for her excellent beauty ſurnamed the White, on whom he begot his eldeſt Sonne Edward; for which Fact he did ſeven yeares penance, enjoyned him by the Arch-biſhop Dunſtan. After this he chanced to heare of a Virgin, Daughter to a Weſterne Duke, exceedingly prayſed for her beauty, and comming to Andover, commanded her to his Bed. But the Mother, tender of her Daughters honour, brought in the darke her mayd to him; who in the morning, making haſt to riſe, and the King not ſuffering her to depart, ſhe told him what great worke ſhe had to doe; and how ſhe ſhould incurre her Ladies diſpleaſure, if it were not done; by which words, the King perceiving the deceit, turned it to a jeſt, but ſo well liked her company, that he kept himſelfe true to her ever after, till he marryed. But now his marriage it ſelfe happened by a greater vice then any of theſe; For hearing of the admirable beauty of Elfrida, the onely daughter of Ordganus Duke of Devonſhire, Founder of Taveſtocke Abbey in that Country, he ſent his great Favorite Earle Ethelwold, (who could well judge of beauty) to try the truth thereof; with Commiſſion, that if he found her ſuch as Fame reported, he ſhould ſeiſe her for him, and he would make her his Queene. The young Earle, upon ſight of the Lady, was ſo ſurprized with her love, that he began to wooe her for himſelfe, and got her Fathers good will, ſo as the King would give his conſent. Hereupon the Earle poſted to the King, relating to him, that the Mayd was faire indeed, but nothing anſwerable to the Fame that went of her: yet deſired the King that he might marry her, her, as being her Fathers heire, thereby to raiſe his Fortunes. The King conſented, and the marriage was ſolemnized. Soone after, the fame of her beauty began to ſpread more then before, ſo as the King much doubting that he had beene abuſed, meant to try the truth himſelfe, and thereupon taking occaſion of hunting in the Dukes Parke, came to his houſe: whoſe comming Ethelwold ſuſpecting, acquainted his wife with the wrong he had done both her, and the King, and therefore to prevent the Kings diſpleaſure, intreated her by all the perſwaſions he could uſe, to cloathe her ſelfe in ſuch attire, as might be leaſt fit to ſet her forth; but ſhe conſidering that now was the time, to make the moſt of her beauty, and longing to be a Queene; would not be acceſſary to her owne wrong, but decked her ſelfe in her richeſt Ornaments; which ſo improved her beauty, that the King at her firſt ſight was ſtrucke with admiration, and meant to be revenged of his perfidious Favourite; yet diſſembling his paſſion, till he could take him at advantage, he then with a Javelin ran him through, and having thereby made the faire Elfrid a Widow, tooke her to be his Wife. This King founded the Monaſtery of Ramſey in Hamſhire, Raigned ſixteene yeares, Lived ſeven and thirty, and with great Funerall pompe was buryed in the Abbey of Glaſtenbury. He had children by his firſt wife Ethelfleda, one ſonne named Edward, and by his ſecond wife Elfrid, two ſons, one named Edmund, who dyed young, the other Ethelred. He had alſo one naturall Daughter, named Edgyth, by a Lady named Wolfchild, the daughter of Wolholme, the ſonne of Birding, the ſonne of Neſting; which two latter beare in their names, the memory of their Fortunes; the laſt of them being found in an Eagles neſt, by King Alfred as he was a hunting. This Edgyth built the Monaſtery and Church of Saint Dennis at Wilton, and was there buryed.

After the death of King Edgar, ſucceeded his ſonne Edward, but not without ſome oppoſition, for Queene Elfrid combined with divers of the Lords, to make her Sonne Ethelred King, ſaying that Prince Edward was illegitimate; on the other ſide, the Arch-biſhop Dunſtan, and the Monkes ſtood for Edward, abetting his Title as being lawfully borne; but while the Counſell was aſſembled to argue their Rights, the Arch-biſhop came in with his Banner and Croſſe, and not ſtaying for debating De Jure, De Facto preſented Prince Edward for their lawfull King, and the Aſſembly conſiſting moſt of Clergy men, drew the approbation of the reſt; and thereupon Prince Edward was admitted, being but twelve yeares of age, and was Crowned King at Kingſtone upon Thames, by Arch-biſhop Dunſtan, in the yeare 975. In the beginning of his Raigne, it fell into debate whether marryed Prieſts were to be allowed to live in Monaſteries upon the revenues of the Church. The Mercian Duke Alferus, favouring the cauſe of the marryed Prieſts, deſtroyed the Monaſteries in his Province, caſt out the Monkes, and reſtored againe the ancient revenues to the Prieſts and their wives. On the other ſide, Edelwyn Duke of the Eaſt Angles, and Brithnoth Earle of Eſſex, who ſtood for the Monkes, caſt marryed Prieſts out of their Provinces. The matter being debated in a Councell at Weſtminſter, the Monkes cauſe was like to have the foyle, till it was referred to the Rood, placed on the Refectory wall, where the Counſell ſate. For to this great Oracle, Saint Dunſtan deſired them devoutly to pray, and to give diligent eare for an Anſwer; when ſuddenly a voyce was heard to ſay, God forbid it ſhould be ſo, God forbid it ſhould be ſo. This was thought authority ſufficient, to ſuppreſſe the Prieſts, till they perſwading the people, that this was but a cunning practiſe of the Monkes, in placing behind the wall, a man of their owne, who through a Trunke uttered theſe words in the mouth of the Rood, whereupon another Aſſembly was appointed at Cleve in Wiltſhire, whither repaired the Prelates, with moſt of all the Lords and Gentlemen of the Kingdome. The Synod being ſet, and the matter at the heighth of diſcuſſing, it happened that the Joyſts of the roome, where the Synod was held, ſuddenly brake, and the floore with all the people thereon, fell downe, whereof many were hurt, and ſome ſlaine. Onely the Arch-biſhop Dunſtan then Preſident, and mouth for the Monkes, remained unhurt; which whether it were done by practiſe, or were miraculous, it ſerved the Monkes turne for for juſtifying their cauſe; and marryed Prieſts were thereupon diſcarded. It were infinite and indeed ridiculous, to ſpeake of all the Miracles, reported to be done by this Saint Dunſtan, which may be fit for a Legend, but not for a Chronicle.

But now a moſt lamentable dyſaſter, comes to be remembred: For King Edward, hunting one time in the Iſland of Purbacke: not farre from Corfe Caſtle; where his mother in Law Queene Elfrid, with his brother Prince Ethelred, were then reſiding, he out of his love to both, would needs himſelfe alone goe viſit them; where the cruell woman, out of ambition to bring her owne Sonne to the Crowne, cauſed one to runne him into the backe with a knife, as he was drinking a cup of Wine on horſe backe at his departing, who feeling himſelfe hurt, ſet ſpurres to his horſe, thinking thereby to get to his company, but the wound being mortall, and he fainting thorow loſſe of much blood, fell from his Horſe, but one foote being intangled in the ſtirrup, he was thereby rufully dragged up and downe, through Woods, and Lands: And laſtly left dead at Corfes gate, for which untimely death, he was ever after called by the name of Edward the Martyr. He Raigned onely three yeares and ſix moneths, and was Buryed firſt at Wincheſter, without all Funerall pompe; but after three yeares, by Duke Alferus removed, and with great ſolemnity interred in the Minſter of Shaftsbury. Queene Elfrid, to expiate this her bloody fact, built the two Monaſteries of Almesbery, and Worwell, in the Counties of Wiltſhire, and Southampton, in which latter, with great repentance, ſhe lived till her death.

After the death of Edward the Martyr, dying at the age of ſixteene yeares, his halfe brother Ethelred, at the age of twelve yeares, in the yeare 979. was Crowned King at Kingſton upon Thames, by Dunſtan Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, though much againſt his will; which King, by reaſon of his backwardneſſe in Action, was commonly called the Unready. Before whoſe time, for two and twenty yeares paſt; the Danes had lived as quiet Inmates with the Engliſh, but whether weary of ſo long doing nothing, or finding now opportunity of doing ſomething, in the ſecond yeare of this King, they begin to ſtirre, and inviting from home more forces, who in ſeven Ships arrived upon the Coaſt of Kent, they ſpoyled all the Country, ſpecially the Iſle of Thanet, and continued this courſe of forraging the Kingdome, ſometimes in one part, and ſometimes in another, for eleven yeares together: till at laſt in the yeare 991. the King, by advice of his Lords, of whom Siricius, the now Arch-biſhop of Canterbury was chiefe, was contented to pay them ten thouſand pounds, upon condition they ſhould quietly depart the Realme. This ſerved the turne for the preſent, but was ſo farre from ſatisfying them, that it did but give them the greater appetite: for the yeare following they came againe, and that with a greater Fleet then before, againſt whom the King prepared a competent Navy, and committed it to Elfricke, Earle of Mercia, but he proving treacherous (as indeed all other for the moſt part did, whom the King imployed againſt the Danes, as with whom they were allyanced in blood) the Danes ſo prevailed, that for the next Compoſition, they had ſixteene thouſand pounds given them, and a yeare after, twenty thouſand; and ſo every yeare more and more, till it came at laſt to forty thouſand: by which meanes, the Land was emptyed of all Coyne, and the Engliſh were brought ſo low, that they were faine to Till, and Eare the Ground, whileſt the Danes ſate idle, and ate the fruite of their labours; abuſing the Wives and Daughters of their Hoſts where they lay, and yet in every place, for very feare, were called Lord-Danes; (which afterward became a word of deriſion, when one would ſignifie a lazy Lubber.) In this diſtreſſed ſtate, the King at laſt bethought himſelfe of a courſe: He ſent forth a ſecret Commiſſion, into every City within his Dominions, that at an appointed time, they ſhould maſſacre all the Danes that were amongſt them; The day was the thirteenth of November, being the Feſtivall of Saint Bricius, in the yeare 1002. His command was accordingly performed, and with ſuch rigour, that in Oxford the Danes for refuge tooke into the Church of Saint Frideſwyde, as into a Sanctuary, when the Engliſh, neither regarding Place nor Perſon, ſet the Church on fire, wherein many of the Danes were burnt, and the Library thereof utterly defaced. And who would not now thinke, but that England by this Fact had cleane ſhaken off the Daniſh yoke for ever? yet it proved cleane otherwiſe: For the newes of this maſſacre, adding a new edge of revenge, to the old edge of ambition: made the Danes ſharper ſet againſt the Engliſh, then ever they had beene before; ſo as the yeare following, their King Sweyne, with a mighty Navy, entred the Country, razed, and levelled with the ground the City of Exceter, all along from the Eaſt Gate to the Weſt; againſt whom the King levyed an Army, and made Generall over it, the Earle Edricke, his great Favourite; whom he had created Duke of Mercia; and given him his Daughter Edgyth in marriage; yet all this great favour could not keepe him from being treacherous, for being ſent Embaſſadour to the Danes, to mediate for Peace, he revealed to them the weakneſſe of the Land, and treacherouſly diſſwaded them from conſenting to any Truce. Upon this King Ethelred gave order, that every three hundred and ten Hydes of Land ſhould build a Ship, and every eight Hydes, finde a compleat Armour furniſhed, yet all this great preparation came to nothing, but onely to make a ſhew. After this, the King ſeeing no end of their invaſions, nor promiſe kept upon any compoſition; (for three Daniſh Princes, with a great Fleet, were now newly arrived) He intended to adventure once for all, and to commit his cauſe to God, by the fortune of a Battaile. To which end he ſecretly gathered a mightily Power, and comming unlooked for, when the Enemy was unprepared, he had certainely given an end to the Quarrell, if the wicked Edricke had not diſſwaded him from fighting, and put him into a cauſeleſſe feare, by forged tales. After this, the Danes forraged many Countryes; burnt Oxford, Thetford, and Cambridge: and laſtly entred Wiltſhire, which was the ſeventh ſhire in number, they had laid waſte like a Wildernesſe. The yeare after, they make a new Expedition, and beſiege Canterbury; which by treaſon of a Church-man they wonne, tooke Alphegus the Arch-biſhop, and ſlew nine hundred Monkes, and men of Religion, beſides many Citizens, without all mercy; for they Tythed the people, ſlaying all by nines, and reſerving onely the tenth to live; ſo that of all the Monkes in the Towne, there were but foure ſaved, and of the Lay people, foure thouſand eight hundred, by which account Maſter Lambert collecteth, that there dyed in this Maſſacre, three and forty thouſand, and two hundred perſons. The Arch-biſhop Alphegus, for that he refuſed to charge his Tenants with three thouſand pounds to pay for his ranſome, they moſt cruelly ſtoned to death at Greenewich. Turkillus the leader of theſe murtherers, tooke into his poſſeſſion all Norfolke and Suffolke, over whom he tyrannized in moſt ſavage manner; the reſt compounding with the Engliſh for eight thouſand pounds, quietly for a while ſojourned among them. The yeare following came King Sweyne againe, and with a great Navy arrived in the mouth of Humber, and landed at Gainſborough, to whom the Northumbrians, and the people of Lindſey, yeelded themſelves; So that now over all the North from Watlingſtreete, he Raigned ſole King, and exacted pledges of them for their further obedience. From the North he paſſed into the South, ſubduing all before him, till he came to London, where he was ſo valiantly encountred by the Londoners, that he was glad to retire, in which retyring notwithſtanding he entred Bathe; where Ethelmore Earle of Devonſhire, with his Weſterne people, ſubmitted himſelfe to him. Yet after this, betweene him and the Engliſh was ſtrucke a fierce battaile, which had beene with good ſucceſſe, if the treachery of ſome in turning to the Danes, had not hindered it. After this the Danes proceeded on victoriouſly, and had gotten moſt part of the Land, and even London alſo by ſubmiſſion: whereupon the unfortunate King Ethelred ſending his Wife Emma, with her two ſonnes, Edward and Alfred, to her Brother, Duke of Normandy, himſelfe alſo the Winter following paſſed thither, leaving the Danes Lording it in his Realme. Sweyne now as an abſolute King, extorted from the Engliſh both Victuals, and Pay for his Souldiers; and demanding ſuch a Compoſition for preſerving of Saint Edmunds Monaſtery in Suffolke, as the Inhabitants were not able, and therefore refuſed to pay; he thereupon threatned ſpoyle, both to the Place, and to the Martyrs bones there interred, when ſuddenly, in the middeſt of his

his jollity (ſaith Hoveden) he cryed out, that he was ſtrucke by Saint Edmund with a ſword, being then in the midſt of his Lords: and no man ſeeing from whoſe hand it came, and ſo with great horrour and torment, three dayes after, upon the third of February, he ended his life at Thetford, or (as others ſay) at Gainsborough. And now who would not thinke, but this was a faire opportunity offered to the Engliſh, to free themſelves wholly from the Daniſh yoke? but when all was done, either croſſed by treachery, or fruſtrated by misfortune, nothing proſpered. It is true, upon this occaſion of Sweynes death, King Ethelred returned out of Normandy, but at his comming, Canutus the ſonne of Sweyne, had gotten the people of Lindſey to be at his devotion, and to find him both Horſe and Men againſt their owne King; ſo as Ethelred was now to encounter as well his owne Subjects, as the Danes, which he did ſo valiantly, that he made Canutus glad to returne into Denmarke, as utterly hopeleſſe of any good to be done in England. And now one would certainely thinke the Danes had beene removed, Roote and Branch, out of England, and never like to trouble the Land any more; and indeed there was all the appearance of probability for it that could be. But it is a true ſaying, That which will be, ſhall be; let all be done that can be. For now Turkill the Dane, who had before revolted to King Ethelred, growing ſenſible of his fault, which was this, or no way to be redeemed; and tender of his Countrymens caſe, which was now or never to be helpt; with nine of his Ships ſailed into Denmarke, and firſt excuſing himſelfe to Canutus for his former defection, as though he had done it of purpoſe, to learne all advantages againſt the Engliſh, which now he could diſcover to him, he ſo prevailed with Canutus once againe to try his fortune, that with a Navy of two hundred Ships he ſet ſaile for England, and landed at Sandwich, where he gave the Engliſh a great overthrow, and paſſed victoriouſly through the Counties of Dorſet, Somerſet, and Wilts. When (Ethelred lying dangerouſly ſicke at Coſſam) the managing of the Warre was committed to Prince Edmund his ſonne, who preparing to give the Danes battaile, had ſuddenly notice given him, that his Brother in Law Edricke, meant to betray him into his Enemies hands, which made him ſuſpend his proceeding; and Edricke perceiving his deſigne to be diſcovered, caſt off the maſque, and with forty of the Kings ſhips fled openly to the Enemy; and thereupon, all the Weſt Countries ſubmitted themſelves unto Canutus. By this time King Ethelred having recovered his ſickneſſe, prepared to goe on with the Battaile, which his ſonne Edmund had intended, but his Forces being aſſembled, he likewiſe had ſuddenly notice given him, that his Subjects meant to betray him to the Danes. Hereupon he withdrew himſelfe to London, as the place in which he moſt confided; where falling into a relapſe of his former ſicknes, he ended his unfortunate dayes, in the yeare 1016. when he had Raigned 37. yeares; and was buried in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, whoſe bones as yet remaine in the North wall of the Chancell, in a cheſt of gray Marble; adjoyning to that of Sebba King of the Eaſt Saxons. He had by his two Wives, eight Sonnes, and foure Daughters; of whom, his youngeſt named Goda, was marryed to one Walter de Maigne, a Nobleman of Normandy; by whom ſhe had a ſonne named Rodolph, which Rodolph had a ſonne named Harold, created afterward by King William the Conquerour, Baron of Sudeley, in the County of Glocester, and Anceſtor to the Barons of that place ſucceeding, and of the Lord Chandowes of Sudeley now being.

Ethelred being dead, his third ſonne Edmund called Ironſide (of his ability in enduring labour) but the eldeſt living at his fathers death, ſucceeded, and was Crowned at Kingſton upon Thames, by Levingus Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the yeare 1016. A great part of the Engliſh both feared and favoured, and indeed out of feare favoured Canutus, eſpecially the Clergy, who at Southampton ordained him their King, and ſware Fealty to him: but the Londoners ſtood firme to Prince Edmund, and were the principall authors of his Election. Canutus before the death of King Ethelred, had beſieged the City, and now with a large Trench encompaſſed it: but the new King Edmund comming on, raiſed the ſiege, and made Canutus flie to the Iſle of Sheppey, where having ſtayed the winter, the Spring following, he aſſayled the Weſt of England, and at Penham in Darſetſhire, a battaile was fought, and the Danes diſcomfited. After this, in Worceſterſhire at a place called Sheroſtan, another battaile was fought, where the Danes were like againe to be diſcomfited, but the traiterous Edrick perceiving it, he cut off the head of a ſouldier like unto King Edmund both in haire and countenance, and ſhaking his bloody ſword, with the gaſping head, cried to the Army of the Engliſh, Fly ye wretches flie, & get away, for your King is ſlain: behold, here is his head: but King Edmund having notice of this treacherous ſtratagem, haſted to ſhew himſelf where he might beſt be ſeen: whoſe ſight ſo encouraged his men, that they had gotten that day a finall Victory, if night had not prevented them. Duke Edrick excuſed his fact, as being miſtaken in the countenance of the man, and deſirous to ſave the blood of the Engliſh; upon which falſe colour hee was received into favour againe. After this, Canutus ſecretly in the night brake up his Campe, and marched towards London, which in a ſort was ſtill beſieged by the Daniſh ſhips: but King Edmund hearing of his departure, followed him, and with ſmall adoe removed the ſiege, and in Triumphant manner entred the City. After this, neere unto Otford in Kent, was another great battaile fought, in which Canutus loſt foure thouſand five hundred men, and King Edmund onely ſix hundred; the reſt of the Danes ſaving themſelves by flight, whom if King Edmund had purſued, it is thought that day had ended the warres betweene theſe two Nations for ever. But the ever traiterous Edrick, kept King Edmund from purſuing them, by telling him of Ambuſhes and other dangers: So as Canutus had leiſure to paſſe over into Eſſex, but thither alſo King Edmund followed him; where at Aſſhdone three miles from Saffron Walden, another battaile was fought, in which the Danes being at the point to be overthrowne, the traiterous Edrick with all his Forces revoulted to their ſide, by which treachery the Engliſh loſt the day. There died of King Edmunds Nobility, Duke Alfred, Duke Goodwyn, Duke Athelward, Duke Athelwyn, Earle Urchill, Codnoth Biſhop of Lincolne, Wooliey Abbot of Ramſey, with many other. The remembrance of which battaile is retained to this day, by certaine ſmall hils there remaining, whence have beene digged the bones of men, Armour, and horſebridles. After this, at Dercherſt neere to the river Severne, another battaile was ready to be fought; when ſuddenly a certaine Captaine ſteps forth, and for ſaving of blood uſed great perſwaſions, that either they ſhould try the matter by ſingle Combat, or elſe divide the Kingdome betwixt them. Upon this the Combat is agreed on, and the two Princes entering into a ſmall Iſland called Alney, adjoyning to the City of Glocester, in compleat Armour aſſayled each other, at firſt on horſebacke, and after on foote: when Canutus having received a dangerous wound, and finding himſelfe overmatched in ſtrength, deſired a Compromiſe, and with a loud voyce uſed theſe words. What neceſſity ſhould move us moſt Valiant Princes, for obtaining of a Title to endanger our lives? were it not better to lay malice aſide, and condeſcend to a loving agreement? let us therefore become ſworne brothers, and divide the Kingdome betweene us. This motion was by King Edmund accepted, and thus was the Kingdome divided betweene theſe two Princes; Edmund enjoying that part which lies upon the coaſt of France, and Canutus the reſt. But now Duke Edrick hath his laſt and greateſt Act of treachery to play: for King Edmund being retired to a place for natures neceſſity, he thurſt from under the draught a ſharpe ſpeare into his body, and then cutting off his head, preſented it to Canutus, with theſe fawning words, All hayle, thou ſole Monarch now of England, for here behold the head of thy Copartner, which for thy ſake I have adventured to cut off. Canutus though ambitious enough of ſoveraignty, yet abaſhed at ſo diſloyall a fact, replyed and vowed, that in reward of that ſervice his own head ſhould bee advanced above all the Peeres of his Kingdom, which ſoone after he performed; for by his command the falſe Edricks head was cut off, and placed upon the higheſt gate in London. The death of this King, in this manner, ſome ſay was acted at Oxford; other, that he died of naturall ſickneſſe in London, but howſoever he came to his death, his Raigne was but onely ſeven months, & his body was buried at Glaſtenbury, neere to his Grandfather King Edgar. This King Edmund had by his wife Algyth, two ſonnes; the eldeſt named Edward, ſurnamed the the Outlaw, becauſe he lived out of England in Hungary as a baniſhed man, for feare of King Canutus: but when his Uncle King Edward the Confeſſor, had obtained the Crowne, he was recalled, and honourably entertained till he died. He married Agatha, ſiſter to Queene Sophia, wife to Salomon King of Hungarie, and daughter to the Emperour Henry the ſecond; by whom he had Edgar ſurnamed Atheling, the right Heire of the Engliſh Crowne, though he never enjoyed it. King Edmund had alſo two daughters, Margaret and Chriſtian, of whom the younger became a Veyled Nunne at Ramſey in Hampſhire, the elder Margaret, after ſole Heire to the Saxon Monarchie, married Malcolme the third King of Scotland, from which Princely bed in a lineall Deſcent, our High and Mighty Monarch King James the firſt, doth in his moſt Royall perſon, unite the Britaines, Saxons, Normans, and Scotiſh Imperiall Crownes in one.

Of the firſt Daniſh King in England.

Canutus being poſſeſt of halfe the Kingdome by compoſition with King Edmund, now after his death ſeiſed upon the whole, and to prevent all further queſtion, he called a Councell of the Engliſh Nobility, wherein it was propounded, whether in the agreement betwixt Edmund and him, any claime of Title to the Crowne had beene reſerved for King Edmunds brethren or ſonnes: to which (not daring to ſay otherwiſe) they abſolutely anſwered no, and thereupon tooke all of them the Oath of Allegeance to Canutus. Being thus cleered of all Oppoſites he prepared with great ſolemnity for his Coronation, which was performed at London, by the hands of Levingus ſurnamed Elſtane, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the yeare 1017. being the firſt Dane that Raigned Monarch of England. But Canutus not thinking himſelfe ſufficiently ſafe, as long as any that might pretend, were in the peoples eye, cauſed firſt Edwyn the ſonne of King Ethelred, and brother of Edmund, to abjure the Realme, who was yet afterward recalled, and treacherouſly murthered by his owne men, and his body buried at Taveſtock in Devonſhire. Next were the two ſonnes of Edmund Ironſide, Edward and Edmund, whom to the end the people might not ſee him ſhed the blood of Innocents, he ſent to his halfe brother King of Sweden to be made away. Then remained Edward and Alfred, the ſonnes of King Ethelred, and them their mother Queene Emma had ſent away before to her brother the Duke of Normandie, there to be in ſafety: ſo as none of the Royall blood was now left in the land, to give Canutus any feare of competition. After this, he tooke to wife the vertuous Lady Emma, the Relict of King Ethelred, by which match he procured to himſelfe three great benefits: one that hee wonne the love of the people by marrying a Lady whom they ſo entirely loved; another, that he got the Alliance of the Duke of Normandie, a neighbouring Prince of great power; the third, that by marrying the mother, hee ſecured himſelfe againſt the ſons: as likewiſe Queene Emma was not unwillingly perſwaded to the match, upon agreement to make her iſſue, if he had any by her, to inherit the Crowne of England. And to winne the love of the people more, hee cauſed great numbers of his Danes, who peſtered the Country, to return home, beſtowing amongſt them for their ſatisfaction foure ſcore and two thouſand pounds. And to winne the love of the people yet more, he now ſet himſelfe to the making of good lawes, in a Parliament at Oxford; whereof, for a Patterne of thoſe times, ſome that concerne Religion, may not unfitly be here related. Firſt, for the celebration of divine Service, it was ordained, that all Ceremonies tending to the encreaſe of reverence & devotion ſhould bee uſed as need required. Secondly, that upon the Sabbath day, all publike Faires, Markets, Synods, Huntings, and all ſecular actions ſhould be forborne, unleſſe ſome urgent neceſſity ſhould require it. Thirdly, that every Chriſtian ſhould thrice in the yeare receive the bleſſed Sacrament of the Lords Supper. Fourthly, that if a Miniſter of the Altar killed a man, or committed any notorious crime, he ſhould bee deprived both of his Order and Dignity. Fifthly, that a married woman convict of

of adultery, ſhould have her noſe and eares cut off. Sixthly, That a widow marrying within a twelvemonth after her husbands deceaſe, ſhould loſe her Joynture. Theſe and many other good lawes were made, whereby the kingdome remained during all his time, in a moſt peaceable ſtate and government. In the third yeare of his Raign, he heard how the Vandales taking advantage of his abſence, had entred Denmarke, and annoyed his ſubjects; whereupon with a great Army of Engliſh hee paſſed over the Seas, and gave them battaile, but with ill ſucceſſe the firſt day; when preparing for the next dayes battaile, the Earle Goodwyn who was Generall of the Engliſh, ſecretly in the dead of the night, ſet upon the Vandals Campe, & with a great ſlaughter of their ſouldiers, made their two Princes Ulfus and Anlave, to flie the field. In the morning it was told Canutus, that the Engliſh were fled, for that their ſtation was left, and not a man of them to be found, which did not a little trouble his patience: but he going in perſon to ſee the truth, found the great overthrow the Engliſh had given, for which ſervice ever after, hee held the Engliſh, and eſpecially the Earle Goodwyn in great eſtimation. After this, returning home hee made a proſperous Expedition againſt Malcolme King of Scots; and at laſt, in the fifteenth yeare of his Raigne, wearied with the honourable troubles of the world, and out of devotion, he tooke a Journey to Rome, to viſit the Sepulchre of St. Peter and Paul, from whence he writ to the Biſhops and Nobility of England, that they ſhould carefully adminiſter Juſtice, and never ſeeke to advance his profit by any undue wayes, or with the detriment of any man. At his returne frō Rome, he built in Eſſex the Church of Aſhdone, where he got the victory againſt King Edmund; in Norfolke, the Abbey of St. Benets, which Saint he greatly reverenced; and in Suffolke the Monaſtery of St. Edmund, which Saint he deadly feared. To the Church of Wincheſter hee gave many rich Jewels, whereof one was a Croſſe, valued to be worth as much as the whole Revenue of England amounted to in one yeare. To Coventry he gave the arme of the great St. Auſtin, which he bought at Pavia in his returne from Rome, for which he payd an hundred Talents of ſilver and one of gold. One ſtrange Act is recorded, which he did for convincing his fawning flatterers, who uſed to tell him that his power were more then humane. For being one time at Southampton, he commanded that his chaire of State ſhould be ſet on the ſhoare when the Sea began to flow, and then ſitting downe there in the preſence of his many attendants, he ſpake thus to that Element: I charge thee that thou preſume not to enter my Land, nor wet theſe Robes of thy Lord that are about me. But the Sea giving no heede to his command, but keeping on his uſuall courſe of Tyde, firſt wet his skirts, and after his thighes, whereupon ſuddenly riſing, he thus ſpake in the hearing of them all. Let all the worlds Inhabitants know, that vaine and weake is the power of their Kings, and that none is worthy of the name of King, but he that keepes both heaven and earth and ſea in obedience. After which time he would never ſuffer the Crowne to be ſet upon his head, but preſently Crowned therewith the Picture of Chriſt on the Croſſe at Wincheſter: from which example aroſe perhaps the cuſtome, to hang up the Armour of Worthy men in Churches, as Offerings conſecrated to him who is the Lord of battaile. When he had Raigned nineteene yeares, he deceaſed at Shaftesbery in the County of Dorſet, the twelfth of November, in the yeare 1035. and was buried in the Church of the old Monaſtery at Wincheſter, which being after new built, his bones with many other Engliſh Saxon Kings, were taken up, and are preſerved in gilt Coffers, fixed upon the wals of the Quire in that Cathedrall Church. He had by his two wives, three ſonnes, Sweyne, and Harold by his firſt wife Alfgive; and Hardicnute by his ſecond wife Queene Emma, and two daughters, of whom the eldeſt, called Guinhilda, was married to the Romane Emperour Henry the third, who being accuſed of adultery, and none found to defend her cauſe, at laſt an Engliſh Page adventured to maintaine her Innocency againſt a mighty Gyantlike-Combatant; who in fight, at one blow cutting the ſinewes of his adverſaries legge, with another he felled him to the ground, and then with his ſword taking his head from his ſhoulders, redeemed both the Empreſſes life and honour. But the Empreſſe after this hard uſage forſooke her husbands bed, and tooke upon her the Veyle

Veyle of a Nun, in the Towne of Burges in Flanders, where ſhe devoutly ſpent the reſt of her life.

Of the ſecond Daniſh King in England.

KIng Canutus dying left his Kingdome of Norway, to his eldeſt Son Sweyne, and his Kingdome of England, to his youngeſt Sonne Hardiknute, whom he had by his wife Emma, but he being at the time of his Fathers death in Denmarke, Harold his elder Brother, by a former wife, taking advantage of his abſence, layes claime to the Crowne. For determining of which Right, the Lords aſſembled at Oxford, where Queene Emma pleaded for her ſonne Hardiknute, urging the Covenant of Canutus at their marriage, and his laſt Will at his death; as alſo Earle Goodwyn of Kent did the like, being left Guardian of her Children, and keeper of his laſt Will. But Harolds preſence, together with the favour of the Londoners, Danes, and Northumbrians, ſo wrought with the Lords, that the abſent Hardiknute was neglected, and Harold was Proclaimed and Crowned King at Oxford, by Elnothus Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, in the yeare 1036.

Harold having now attained the Crowne, was not ſo jealous of his Brother Hardiknute, as of his mother in Law Queene Emma, and her Sonnes by King Ethelred who were beyond Sea, and therefore how to ſecure himſelfe againſt theſe, was his firſt care. For effecting whereof, he framed a Letter, as written by Queene Emma, to her two Sonnes Edward and Alfred; inſtigating them to attempt the Crown uſurped by Harold, againſt their Right: to which letter, comming firſt to the hands of Alfred, he ſuſpecting no fraud, returned Anſwer, that he would ſhortly come over, and follow her Counſaile. And thereupon with a ſmall Fleet, and ſome few ſouldiers, lent him by Baldwyn Earle of Flaunders, he tooke the Sea for England, where comming to ſhoare, Earle Goodwyn met him, and bound himſelfe by Oath to be his guide to his Mother Queene Emma, but being wrought firme for Harold, he led him and his company a contrary way, and lodged them at Guilford, making knowne to King Harold what he had done, who preſently committed them all to ſlaughter, ſparing onely every tenth man, for ſervice or ſale. Prince Alfred himſelfe he ſent Priſoner to the Iſle of Ely, where having his eyes inhumanely put out, in griefe and torment he ended his life. Some adde a more horrible kind of cruelty, as that his belly was opened, and one end of his bowels drawne out, and faſtned to a ſtake, his body pricked with Needles, or Poignards, and forced about, till all his Entrailes were extracted. This done, he then ſet upon Queene Emma, confiſcated her Goods, and baniſhed her the Realme. And now further to ſecure himſelfe, he kept the Seas with ſixteene Daniſh Ships, to the maintenance whereof, he charged the Engliſh with great payments; by which, if he procured the ſafety of his Perſon, he certainly procured the hatred of his Subjects. This King for his ſwiftneſſe in running was called Harefoot; but though by his ſwiftneſſe he outrunne his Brother for the Kingdome, yet could he not runne ſo faſt, but that death quickely overtooke him; For having Raigned onely foure yeares and ſome moneths, he dyed at Oxford, and was buryed at Weſtminſter, having never had Wife or Children.

Of the third and laſt Daniſh King in England.

KIng Harold being dead, the Lords to make amends for their former neglect, ſend now for Hardiknute, and offer him their Allegeance, who acceppteth their offer, and thereupon taking Sea, arrived upon the Coaſt of Kent, the ſixth day after he had ſet ſaile out of Denmarke; and with great pompe conveyed to London, was there Crowned King by Elnothus Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, in the yeare 1040. His firſt Act, was to be revenged of his deceaſed Brother brother Harold, whoſe body he cauſed to be digged up, and throwne into the Thames, where it remained till a Fiſherman found it, and buryed it in the Church yard of Saint Clement without Temple Barre, commonly called Saint Clement Danes, becauſe it was the burying place of the Danes, as ſome write. But towards his Mother, and halfe Brother Prince Edward, he ſhewed true naturall affection, inviting them both to returne into England; where he received them with all the honour, that from a Sonne or Brother could be expected.

But now, as the King Harold, for his ſwiftneſſe in running was ſurnamed Harefoote; So this King for his intemperance in dyet, might have beene ſurnamed Swines-mouth, or Bocca di Porco, for his Tables were ſpread every day foure times, and furniſhed with all kindes of curious diſhes, as delighting in nothing but Gormandizing and Swilling; and as for managing the State, he committed it wholly to his Mother Queene Emma, and to the politicke Earle of Kent, Godwyn, who finding this weakneſſe in the King, began to thinke himſelfe of aſpirings and to make the better way for it, he ſought by all meanes to alien the Subjects hearts from the Prince, amongſt other courſes, he cauſed him to lay heavy Taxes upon them; onely for Ship-money to pay his Danes, amounting to two and thirty thouſand pounds: which was ſo offenſive to the people, that the Citizens of Worceſter ſlew two of his Officers, Thurſtan and Feudax, that came to Collect it. But this King had ſoone the reward of his Intemperance; For in a Solemne Aſſembly and Banquet at Lambeth, Revelling and Carowſing, he ſuddenly fell downe without ſpeech, or breath, after he had Raigned only two yeares, and was buryed at Wincheſter. His death was ſo welcome to his Subjects, that the day of his death, is to this day commonly celebrated with open paſtimes in the ſtreet, and is called Hockſ-tide, ſignifying ſcorning or contempt, which fell upon the Danes by his death. For with him ended the Raigne of the Danes in England; after they had miſerably afflicted the kingdome, for the ſpace of two hundred and forty yeares, though in Regall Government, but onely ſix and twenty.

Of Engliſh Kings againe, and firſt of Edward the Confeſſour.

KIng Hardiknute dying without iſſue, as having never beene marryed, and the Daniſh line cleane extinguiſhed, Edward, for his Piety called the Confeſſour, halfe Brother to the deceaſed Hardiknute, and ſonne to King Ethelred by his Wife Queene Emma, was by a generall conſent admitted King of England, and was Crowned at Wincheſter by Edſyne Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, on Eaſter day, in the yeare 1042. being then of the age of forty yeares. He was borne at Iſlip, neare to Oxford, and after his Fathers death, for ſafety ſent into France, to the Duke of Normandy his Mothers Brother, from whence he now came, to take upon him the Crowne of England. His Acts for gaining the Peoples love, were firſt, the remitting the yearely tribute of forty thouſand pounds, gathered by the name of Danegilt, which had beene impoſed by his Father, and for forty yeares together paid out of all mens Lands, but onely the Clergy; and then, from the diuers Lawes of the Mercians, Weſt Saxons, Danes, and Northumbrians, he ſelected the beſt, and made of them one Body certaine, and written in Latine, being in a ſort the Fountaine of thoſe which at this day we tearme the Common Lawes, though the formes of pleading, and proceſſe therein, were afterward brought in by the Conquerour. The Raigne of this King was very peaceable: Onely in his ſixth yeare, the Daniſh Pirates entred the Port of Sandwich; which with all the Sea-coaſt of Eſſex they ſpoyled, and then in Flanders made merchandiſe of their prey. As likewiſe the Iriſh, with thirty ſhips entred Severne, and with the aſſiſtance of Griffyth King of Southwales, burnt or ſlew all in their way, till at laſt, Reeſe the brother of Griffyth was ſlaine at Bulenden, and his head preſented to King Edward at Gloceſter. His Domeſticall troubles were onely by Earle Godwyn and his ſonnes; who yet after many conteſtations and affronts, were reconciled, and Godwyn received againe into into as great favour as before. But though King Edward forgave his Treaſons, yet the Divine Providence did not; for ſoone after, as he ſate at Table with the King, on Eaſter Munday, he was ſuddenly ſtrucken with death, and on the Thurſday following dyed, and was buryed at Wincheſter. Some make his death more exemplar; as that juſtifying himſelfe for Prince Alfreds death, he ſhould pray to God, that if he were any way guilty of it, he might never ſwallow downe one morſell of bread, and thereupon by the juſt Judgement of God, was choaked by the firſt morſell he offered to eate.

In this Kings time, ſuch abundance of ſnow fell in January, continuing till the middle of March following, that almoſt all Cattell and Fowle periſhed, and therewithall an exceſſive dearth followed.

Two Acts are related of this King, that ſeeme nothing correſpondent to the generall opinion had of his Vertue, one concerning his Mother, the other touching his Wife. That concerning his Mother Queen Emma was this, that becauſe after King Ethelreds death, ſhe marryed the Daniſh King Canutus, and ſeemed to favour her iſſue by him, more then her iſſue by King Ethelred, therefore he diſpoſſeſt her of all her Goods; and committed her to cuſtody, in the Abbey of Worwell; and more then this, ſo farre hearkned to an aſperſion caſt upon her, of unchaſte familiarity with Alwyne Biſhop of Wincheſter, that for her Purgation, ſhe was faine to paſſe the tryall of Fire Ordeall, which was in this manner; nine Plow-ſhares red hot were laid in unequall diſtance, which ſhe muſt paſſe bare-foote and blindfold; and if ſhe paſſed them unhurt, then ſhe was judged Innocent, if otherwiſe, Guilty. And this tryall ſhe paſſed, and came off fairely, to the great aſtoniſhment of all beholders. The other touching his Wife was this; He had marryed Editha the beautifull, and indeed vertuous daughter of the Earle Godwyn, and becauſe he had taken diſpleaſure againſt the Father, he would ſhew no kindneſſe to the daughter; he had made her his wife, but converſed not with her as his wife, onely at board, but not at Bed, or if at bed, no otherwiſe then David with Abiſhagh, and yet was content to heare her accuſed of Incontinency, whereof if ſhe were guilty, he could not be innocent. So as, what the vertues were, for which after his death, he ſhould be reputed a Saint, doth not eaſily appeare. It ſeemes he was chaſte, but not without injury to his wife; Pious, but not without ungratefulneſſe to his Mother; Juſt in his preſent Government, but not without neglect of Poſterity; for through his want of providence in that point, he left the Crowne to ſo doubtfull ſucceſſion, that ſoone after his deceaſe it was tranſlated out of Engliſh into French, and the Kingdome made ſervile to a fourth forraine Nation. One Ability he had which raiſed him above the pitch of ordinary Kings, and yet at this day is ordinary with Kings, that by his onely touching and laying his hand upon it, he cured a Diſeaſe, which from his Curing, is called The Kings Evill. His Mother Queene Emma, in memory of the nine Plow-ſhares ſhe had paſſed in her Tryall, gave nine Manors to the Minſter of Wincheſter, and himſelfe remembring the wrong he had done her, beſtowed on the ſame place, the Iſland of Portland in Dorſetſhire, being about ſeven miles in compaſſe. He made alſo of a little Monaſtery in the Weſt of London, by the River of Thames, a moſt beautifull Church, (called of the place Weſtminſter) where he provided for his owne Sepulchre, and another Dedicated to Saint Margaret, ſtanding without the Abbey. This of Weſtminſter he endowed with many rich revenues, and confirmed his Charters under his broad Seale, being the firſt of the Kings of England, who uſed that large and ſtately Impreſſion in their Charters and Patents. He Founded alſo the Colledge of Saint Mary Otterey in Devonſhire, and gave unto it the Village of Otereg, and removed the Biſhops See from Cridington to Exceter, as to a place of farre more Dignity: and when he had Raigned the ſpace of three and twenty yeares and ſix moneths, he ended his life, the fourth of January, in that roome of his Palace at Weſtminſter, which is now called the Painted Chamber, in the yeare 1066. and was buryed in the Church at Weſtminſter, which he had builded.

Of Harold the ſecond Engliſh King after the Danes.

KIng Edward the Confeſſour, being himſelfe without iſſue, had in his life time, ſent into Hungary for his Nephew Edward called the Outlaw, the ſonne of Edmund Ironſide; with a purpoſe to deſigne him his Succeſſour in the Crowne, but he dying ſoone after his comming into England, King Edward then gave his Sonne Edgar the name of Atheling; as to ſay, Prince Edgar meaning to deſigne him for his Succeſſour, but being prevented by death, before the ſucceſſour was fully eſtabliſhed, and Edgar Atheling, though he had right, yet being young, and not of power to make good his Right, Harold the ſonne of Earle Goodwyn ſteps into the Throne, and never ſtanding upon ceremonies, ſet himſelfe the Crowne upon his owne head, wherein, though as a violater of holy Rites, he offended the Clergy, yet not any either of Clergy or Layity, durſt oppoſe him, as being at that time the moſt martiall man in the Kingdome; and ſuch a one, as the ſtate of the Realme ſtood at that time in need of, and beſides his owne worthineſſe had the aſſiſtance of Edwyn and Marchar, the two great Earles of Yorkeſhire and Cheſter, whoſe ſiſter Algyth he had marryed. It is true withall, that King Edward had appointed the Crowne after his owne deceaſe, ſometimes to William Duke of Normandy, ſometimes to Edgar Atheling, and ſometimes to this Harold, ſo as he was Crowned by Aldred Arch-biſhop of Yorke, as not comming in by intruſion or wrong, but by the appointment of King Edward, though that appointment of King Edward, was rather to make him Regent, during the minority of Edgar, then to make him abſolute King, but howſoever, being once in the Throne, he was then able to make his owne Title, and to make Prince Edgar ſome amends, he created him Earle of Oxford, which was indeed to uſe him like a Childe, take away a Jewell, and pleaſe him with an Apple. Yet Harold having once gotten into the Throne, he carryed himſelfe with great Valour and Juſtice, for the time he ſate in it, which was but very ſhort, as being indeed but tottering from the very beginning, and that chiefly by meanes of his owne Brother Tonſtayne, who by diverting his Forces to ſuppreſſe a Rebellion, made him of leſſe force to reſiſt an invaſion. But now that we have ſhewed how Harold entred the Throne, we muſt forbeare to ſhew how he was caſt out, till we come to him that caſt him out, who becauſe he was not onely of another Family, but of another Nation, we muſt neceſſarily take the beginning from a deeper roote, and indeed, ſeeing in him, we ſhall joyne our Iſland to the Continent, which is a larger world: Our Kings hereafter, will afford a larger Extent for matter of Diſcourſe then heretofore they have done.

THE LIFE OF KING WILLIAM THE FIRST, CALLED THE CONQVEROUR.

His Parentage and Deſcent.

THere were ſix Dukes of Normandie in France, in a direct line ſucceeding from father to ſonne. The firſt was Rollo, who of a private man in Denmarke, comming forth with the exuberancy of his Nation, wreſted by force of Armes from Charles the Simple King of France, to bee made Duke of Normandy. The ſecond was William his ſonne, called Long Eſpee, or Long Sword. The third was Richard his ſonne, called the Hardie, who had Richard, and a daughter called Emma, married to Ethelred King of England, father of Edward the Confeſſor. The fourth was Richard the ſecond his ſonne, called the Good. The fifth was Richard the third his ſonne, who by a firſt wife had three ſonnes, Richard, Robert and William, and by a ſecond, two other ſonnes, William Earle of Argues, and Mauger, Archbiſhop of Roan. So as Richard his eldeſt ſonne by his firſt wife ſucceeded him by the name of Richard the fourth, and dying without iſſue, the Dukedome deſcended to Robert his ſecond ſonne by his firſt wife; which Robert was father to our William the Conquerour, of whom it is thus recorded: that riding one time abroad, he happened to paſſe by a company of Country Maides that were a dancing, where ſtaying a while to looke upon them, he was ſo taken with the handſomneſſe and gracefull carriage of one of them whoſe name was Arlotte, a Skinners daughter, (from whence as ſome thinke our word Harlot comes) that affection commanding him, and authority her, he cauſed her that night to be brought to his bed; where being together, what was done or ſaid betweene them is no matter for Hiſtory to record, though ſome Hiſtorians have recorded both; making her not ſo modeſt as was fit for a Maide: onely tenne monthes after, it appeared that at this time our Duke William was begotten; who proving a man of extraordinary ſpirit, we may attribute it to the heate of affection in which he was begotten.

His ſucceeding in the Dukedome, notwithſtanding his Baſtardie.

IT appeares by many examples, that Baſtardie in thoſe dayes was no barre to ſucceſſion, till a law was afterward made to make it a barre. It brought ſome diſgrace where the mother was meane, but no impediment where the father was Noble; and even his Baſtardie ſeemed to have ſome allay, if it be true (as ſome write) that his father tooke the ſaid Arlotte afterward to be his wife, and yet perhaps he had not the Dukedome ſo much by ſucceſſion, as by gift. For when hee was about nine yeares old, his father calling his Nobility together, caused them to swear Allegeance to this base sonne of his, and to take him for their Liege Lord after his decease. Neither was this in those dayes unfrequent, for Princes to conferre their Principalities after their owne deceases upon whom they pleased; counting it as lawfull to appoint successours after them, as substitutes under them; even in our time and Kingdome, the Duke of Northumberland prevailed with King Edward the sixth, to exclude his two sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, and to appoint the Lady Jane Grey, daughter of the Duke of Suffolke, to succeed him.

His Education and Tuition in his minoritie.

His father having declared and appointed him to be his Successour, went soone after (whether out of devotion, or to do Penance for procuring his brothers death, whereof he was suspected) into the Holy Land, in which Journey he died, having left the tuition of his young sonne to his two brothers, and the Guardianship to the King of France, in whose Court for a time he was brought up. A strange confidence, to commit the tuition of a sonne that was base, to Pretenders that were legitimate, and to a King of France, who aimed at nothing more, then to reannexe this Dukedome to his Crowne. But it seemes his confidence was grounded upon the proximitie of blood in his brothers, and upon the merits of his owne service formerly done to the King of France, which though it proved well enough with him, yet is not to be taken into example to follow.

His Troubles in his minoritie.

First, Roger de Tresny, who derived his Pedegree directly from Rollo, and had won much honour by his valour in the warres, (notwithstanding the Oath of Allegeance he had formerly taken) takes exception to his Bastardy, and invites Complices to assist him in recovering the Dukedome to a legitimate Race: a faire pretext if the Fate of Duke William had not beene against it; who though hee were himselfe but young, and could not do much in his owne person, yet the Divine Providence raised him up friends that supplied him with Assistance, and particularly Roger de Beaumont, by whose valour this Roger de Tresny, with his two brothers, was defeated and slaine. After Roger de Tresny, William de Arques his Uncle layes claime to the Dutchy, and assisted by the King of France comes to a battaile, but by the valour of Count Gifford, the Dukes Generall, was likewise defeated: and these were troubles before he arrived to seventeene yeares of age. After this, one Guy Earle of Burgoigne, Grandchild to Richard the second, Duke of Normandy, grew sensible also of his Right to the Dukedome, and joyning with Viscount Neele, and the Earle of Bessin, two powerfull Normans, conspired Duke Williams death, and had effected it, if a certaine Foole about him, had not stolne away in the night, to the place where the Duke was, and never left knocking and crying at the gate, till he was admitted to his presence, willing him to flye for his life instantly, or he would be murthered. The Duke considering that being related by a Foole, it was like to be the more palpable, and that there might be danger in staying, none in going; rode instantly away, all alone, toward Falaise, his principall Castle, but missing his way, he happened to passe where a Gentleman was standing at his doore, of whom he asked the way, and was by him, as knowing him, directed; which he had no sooner done, but the conspiratours came presently inquiring if such a one had not passed that way, which the Gentleman affirmed, and undertooke to be their guide to overtake him, but leading them of purpose a contrary way, the Duke by this meanes, came safely to Falaise, and from thence journeyes to the King of France, complaining of his injuries, and imploring his ayd, as one that was his homager, and committed to his care, by his servant his Father. The King of France moved with his distresse, and remembrance of his Fathers merits, though he wished he was lesse then he was, yet he so ayded him, that he made him greater then he was;

was; for himselfe in person, suffering much in the Battaile, procured him the Victory. By which we may see that folly, and fortune, and even Enemies themselves are all assistants to the Destinies; or to say better, indeed to the divine Providence. Many other affronts were offered him, some by meaner Princes, some afterward by the King of France himselfe, who was now growne jealous of his Greatnesse; all which he encountred with such dexterity, that made his Bastardy, as it were become Legitimate, and Vertue her selfe to grow proud of his person.

His Carriage afterwards in Peace.

By this time he was come to the age of two and twenty yeares, and where all this while he had shewed himselfe a valiant Generall in Warre, he now began to shew himselfe a provident Governor in Peace, composing and ordering his State, wherein he so carryed himselfe, that as his Subjects did both feare and love him, so his Neighbouring Princes did both feare and hate him, or if not hate him, at least emulate him.

His Incitements for Invading of England.

He was now growne about fifty yeares old: an Age that might well have arrested all ambitious thoughts in him, but who can thinke himselfe too old for a Kingdome; when Galba for attaining the Romane Empire, was contented to buckle on Armour, being fourescore yeares old? The Duke in his time of peace came over into England to visite his cousin King Edward, who besides his Princely entertainment, made him at that time (as some thinke) a promise to leave him his Successour in the Kingdome; & Harold after this, going over to the Duke in Normandy, for procuring some friends of his to be released, the better to effect it, tooke his solemne Oath to assist him for obtaining the Kingdome. So as having the word of Edward, and the oath of Harold, he had now sufficient obligations to expect it. But hearing of the death of King Edward, and that Harold was Crowned King, he thought himselfe not more forgotten by Edward, then wronged by Harold; and therefore sent messengers to him to put him in mind of K. Edwards Promise, and his owne Oath: but Harold puffed up with the conceit of being a King, as though that very name were enough to expiate all breach of Oathes, and that nothing could binde him, who had now the fetters in his owne hand; returned onely sleight answers, that his Oath was forced, and voyd in it selfe, as being made without consent of the Kingdome. Whereupon the Duke thus sleighted by Harold, endevours to make him an honest man by force, assuring himselfe, he should find him the weaker Enemy, for finding him a perjured Friend.

The Reasons that facilitated his Conquest of England.

Duke William incensed with Harolds answers, acquaints his Nobility with his purpose, who with some adoe consented to ayd him, as likewise many other great Lords of France, but specially Baldwyn Earle of Flanders, whose daughter he had married; and who being at that time Guardian of the young King of France, procured ayde from him also; and to make the Enterprise the more successefull, Pope Alexander the second sent him a Banner with an Agnus of Gold, and one of the haires of Saint Peter. So as the preparation of the Duke, both by Sea and Land was very great, having three hundred saile of ships, and as some write, 890. and as one Norman, above a thousand, and as Gemeticensis, three thousand: and though Harold had likewise provided a warlike Fleet to encounter him, yet it was at that time unfortunately diverted another way; for Tosiayne his Brother, being then in rebellion in the North, and Harold Harfager King of Norway, at the same time invading those parts, and perhaps upon a bruite, that the Dukes Fleet was not yet ready to come forth, removed both his Fleet and Army thither: where though he got got the Victory at Stamford, with the death both of his Brother Toustayne, and of the King of Norway, yet it made way for the Duke to land quietly, and he entred the Kingdome, as one may enter a houſe, when the doores are all left open. By this meanes King Harolds ſhipping, (the beſt wall of defence to an Iſland) was utterly fruſtrate: and as for his Land Forces, they were by his Battaile at Stamford, exceedingly both weakned and impaired; yet hearing that Duke William was landed at Pemſey, not farre from Haſtings in Suſſex, he repaired thither with all ſpeed, and gathering together his broken Forces, and encreaſing them by all the meanes he could, made himſelfe ready to give the Duke Battaile. Duke William in the meane time, as ſoone as he had landed his men, ſent his ſhips preſently away, that there might be no thinking of any thing, but either Death or Victory. And then going himſelfe on land, it is ſaid, his foot ſlipped, and he fell downe; which ſome that ſtood by, taking for an ill ſigne, No (ſaith he) I have by this, taken poſſeſſion of this Land. And indeed Preſages are but as Animus ejus qui præſagit, as in this Dukes fall it afterwards fell out. Many wayes of compoſition, betweene Duke William, and King Harold were propounded, yet Harold would hearken to none, as nothing doubting of ſucceſſe, and perhaps thinking it a diſgrace, to capitulate for that, which was now his owne: and when one of his Brothers called Gyrth, being leſſe intereſſed, and therefore clearer ſighted, intreated him to conſider what a fearefull thing it was to breake an Oath, which he ſo ſolemnely had ſworne: Harold ſeemed to conceive, that nothing which he did, being a private man, could be of force to binde him now being a Prince; and ſo on the fourteenth day of October, being Saturday, in the yeare 1066. (which day he liked the better, becauſe it was his Birth-day, hoping, that the day of his Birth would not ſo much degenerate, to prove the day of his death, though even this alſo bred no good blood to the Action, for the Souldiers of Harold, thinking thereby to honour their Kings Birth-day, ſpent the night before in revelling and drinking, where the Souldiers of the Duke, out of conſideration of their next dayes worke, ſpent the night in quietneſſe and devotion) they joyned battaile, (the Kentiſh-men being placed in the Fore-front, as by an ancient cuſtome is their due, and King Harold with his Londoners, leading the maine Battaile) where though their Armies were not much unequall in number, (for they were each of them neare about threeſcore thouſand men) yet there was great oddes in the expertneſſe of their Souldiers, and more in the advantage of their weapons: for the Duke had with him all the flowre of France and Flanders, where King Harold had loſt his beſt men, in his late Battaile: and for advantage of weapons, the Normans had long Bowes and Arrowes, which of the Engliſh at that time, were not at all in uſe: what mervaile then that the Normans got the Victory, though King Harold loſing his life, yet loſt no Reputation; and though the Engliſh Souldiers ſhewed no leſſe valour, in being Conquered, then the Normans did in Conquering. One circumſtance may not be omitted, that King Harold as an expert Generall, had ordered his men in ſo firme a Body, that no force of the Normans could diſorder their Rankes, till Duke William, uſed a Stratagem, commanding his men to retire, and to counterfeit flight; by which he drew the Engliſh on, upon a hollow ground, covered with earth, whereinto many of them fell, and periſhed, and beſides into an ambuſh of his Horſemen, which unexpectedly fell upon them, and cut them in pieces. Withall, there ſeemes one great erreour to have beene committed (at leaſt, if it were an errour, and not rather a neceſſity) that there was not a ſupplementall Army provided; (as his Brother Gyrth would have had it) which might have come on if the firſt had failed, and would have beene of great advantage againſt a wearyed Army. But when Sic viſum eſt ſuperis, all humane force is weake and cannot withſtand, all humane Providence is unprovided, and cannot prevent. The body of Harold at his Mother Thyrace ſuite was recovered, and lyes buryed in Waltham Abbey, which he had begunne to build, at leaſt to repaire. But here Gyraldus Cambrenſis tels a ſtrange ſtory, that Harold was not ſlaine in the Battaile, but onely wounded and loſt his left eye, and then eſcaped by flight to Cheſter, where he afterwards led a holy Anchorets life.

How

How Duke William proceeded after his victory at Haſtings.

AS his Valour wonne him the Victory, ſo his Victory wonne him a Crowne; that now of an old Duke, he was ſuddenly become a young King: and indeed, nothing ſo much renues life, and makes the yeares in a manner young againe: as addition of Honour, ſpecially when it is the fruite of merit. Firſt therefore, having given publicke thankes to God for his happy ſucceſſe, he led his Army towards London, not the direct way (perhaps doubting ſome new Encounter) but coaſting about through part of Kent, through Suſſex, Surrey, Hampſhire and Barkeſhire, where at Wallingford he paſſed over the Thames; and then through Oxfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, and Hartfordſhire, untill he came to Barkehamſtead, where there came unto him Aldred Arch-biſhop of Yorke, Wooſtan Biſhop of Worceſter, Willfere, Biſhop of Hereford, and many other Prelates, accompanyed with Edgar Atheling, with Earle Edwyn and Marchar, Brothers, and men of the greateſt ſway in the Kingdome, and many others of the Nobility. It is true, upon the defeate at Haſtings, Earle Edwyn and Marchar, had a purpoſe to ſet up Edgar Atheling, as next Heire of the Royall blood; and Grand-childe to Edmund Ironſide, and ſo beloved of the people, that he was called their Darling: but conſidering his young yeares, and other inabilities, but ſpecially finding the mindes of the Biſhops, (who at that time bore all the ſway) to be otherwiſe inclined, they deſiſted from that courſe, and thus the Duke, without any oppoſition, comming to London, was received by Biſhops, and Lords and all, with great joy, though ſmall gladneſſe, and if he had not their hearts, yet he had their knees, for in moſt humble manner they ſubmitted themſelves to him, acknowledging him for their Soveraigne Lord, and upon Chriſtmas-day after, he was Crowned at Weſtminſter by Aldred Arch-biſhop of Yorke, the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury Stigand, not being admitted to doe that office, for ſome defect in his Inveſtiture; and perhaps for ſome aſperſion in his manners.

How he rewarded his followers.

THough he hath had the name of Conquerour, yet he uſed not the Kingdome as gotten by Conqueſt, for he tooke no mans living from him, nor diſpoſſeſſed any of their goods, but ſuch onely, whoſe demerit made unworthy to hold them; as appeares by his Act to one Warren a Norman, to whom he had given the Caſtle of Sherborne in Norfolke; for when Sherborne, who was owner of it, acquainted the King, that the Caſtle was his; and that he had never borne Armes againſt him; he preſently commanded Warren, to deliver it quietly up unto him. Onely vacancies of Offices, and filling up the places of thoſe who were ſlaine or fled, were the preſent meanes he made uſe of, for preferring his Followers. One ſpeciall preferment we cannot omit, that where one Herlowyn a Nobleman in Normandy, had marryed his Mother Arlette, and had by her a Sonne named Hugh Lupus, he gave to the ſaid Hugh, the Earledome of Cheſter, to hold of him as freely by his ſword, as himſelfe held England by his Crowne, by vertue of which Grant, the ſaid Hugh ordained under him foure Barons, Nigell he made Baron of Halton: Malbanke, Baron of Nantwich: Euſtace Baron of Mawpaſe; and Vernon, Baron of Shipbrooke: Such an Honour, as no Subject before or ſince, ever enjoyed the like.

What meanes he uſed for ſecuring himſelfe in the Kingdome.

BEſides the Oath of Fealty, which he tooke of all his Lords both Spirituall and Temporall, at his Coronation; in Lent following, going into Normandy, he tooke along with him the greateſt part of the great men of the Kingdome, of whom, Edwyn and Marchar, the two Earles of Northumberland and Mercia, Stigand Arch-

Arch-bishop of Canterbury, Edgar Atheling, Waltheoff sonne to Syward formerly Earle of Northumberland, and Agelnothus Abbot of Glastenbury were the chiefe; leaving the care of the Kingdome in his absence to Odo Bishop of Bayeux, his Brother by the Mother; and to William Fitz Osburne, whom he had made Earle of Hereford. And to abate the greatnesse of the Prelates, which at that time was growne in a manner unlimited, he ordained that from thenceforth, they should not command with any Temporall Authority whatsoever. And because the common people are no lesse to be feared for their number, then the Nobility for their greatnesse, he first tooke from them all their Armour, to the end, that leaving them without stings, they might afterward be but Droanes. And becausse there is seldome any danger from singular numbers, but all the danger riseth from plurality: therefore to prevent conspiracies and combinations, which are commonly contrived in the night, he commanded that in all Townes and Villages, a Bell should be rung at eight a clocke in the Evening, and that in every house they should then put out their Fire and Lights (which was called Couure Feu) and goe to Bed. And for more security he erected Castles in the most doubtfull places of the Kingdome. One at Yorke, another at Lincolne, a third at Nottingham, (at that time called Snottingham) and a fourth at Hastings, where he first Landed. By these meanes the Kingdome was quiet all the time of his being away in Normandy, saving onely that Edrick the Forester, in the County of Hereford, calling in to his ayde the Kings of Wales, made some small disturbance. And indeed all the States of the Kingdome might in his very person finde something to make them apt to tolerate his Government. For first, the People might thinke themselves in a sort advanced, being now made members of a greater Body; when the Dukedome of Normandy should come to be annexed to the Kingdome of England; and by experience of his good Government being a Duke, they might well hope, he would not governe worse being made a King. And the Nobility might be well content, as having a King of their former Kings choosing, and though a Stranger, yet no Alien, as having in him many veines of the same blood, and therefore likely also to have some veines of the same goodnesse, of their good King Edward. But specially the Clergy could not chuse but be content, as having a King who came commended to them, by a commending as strong as a commanding, the Popes Benediction.

What Troubles or Insurrections were during his Raigne.

BUt the Body of a State being more obnoxious to crudities and ill humours, then the state of a Naturall body; It is impossible to continue long without distempers; notwithstanding any preservatives that can be applyed. And therefore in the second yeare of his Raigne, brake forth the discontentment of Edgar Etheling, justly the first, as having most cause, being the next of the late Royall blood, and therefore most apt to be sensible of servitude; who taking along with him his mother Agatha, and his two Sisters, Margaret and Christine; stole secretly away to Sea, with intention to passe into Hungary, the Country where he was borne; but by contrary winds was cast upon the Coast of Scotland, where the King Malcolme, not onely most kindly entertained him, but for a stricter bond of kindnesse, tooke his Sister Margaret to Wife, by whom he had many Children, out of which, in the second Generation after, a match was found, by which in the person of King Henry the second, the Saxon and Norman blood were conjoyned, the union whereof continues in the race of our Kings of England to this day. Not long after to Edith the late King Harolds Wife; also Hereward, Gospatrick, and Syward, with many other Lords; and shortly after Stigand and Aldred Arch-bishops, with divers of the Clergy. And these Lords being together in Scotland, did but watch opportunity, to recover that, which for want of taking opportunity they had lost; And assisted by the Scots, they invaded the North parts, spoyling the Country, and killing many for the fault they had themselves committed, but all they could do, was but to forrage the Country, and so returne. After

After this, in the third yeare of his Raigne, the two sonnes of Swayne King of Denmarke, Harold and Canutus, with a Fleet of 240. ships, entered Humber, and invaded the North parts, with whom the English Lords in Scotland joyned, and forraged all the Country, till they came neere to Yorke. When the Normans that were in the Towne, to save the City, set fire on the suburbs; but the fire not so contented, by assistance of a violent winde, tooke hold of the City it selfe, burning a great part of it, and which perhaps was more worth then the City, a Library of excellent Bookes, and the Normans that were left in defence of the City, to the number of three thousand, were all slaine. King William hearing hereof was so much incensed, that with all speed he raised an Army, and entred Northumberland, wasting the Country that already lay waste; and yet for all his great rage, was contented with a great summe of money, to purchase the Danes departure. By these devastations in many Shires of the Kingdome, but especially in Northumberland, so great a Dearth and Famine followed, that men were glad to eate horses and dogges, cats and rats, and what else is most abhorrent to nature; and betweene Yorke and Durham, the space of 60. miles, for nine yeares together, there was so utter desolation, as that neither any house was left standing, nor any ground tilled.

Many other insurrections there were in his Raigne, as at Exceter, at Oxford, in the Isle of Ely, and many times by the Scots in the Northerne parts; but all these were easily suppresst, for they were but scattered Forces; Et dum singuli pugnant, universi vincuntur; whereas if they had united themselves into an Army, they might perhaps have made it a Warre, which now were little more then Routs and Riots. Yet some write, that King William granted Cumberland to Malcolme King of Scots, to hold from him conditionally, that the Scots should not attempt any thing prejudiciall to the Crowne of England, for which Grant King Malcolme did him Homage.

The greatest and last was an Insurrection raised in Normandie, by his sonne Robert, the more dangerous becausse unnatural, for by the instigation and assistance of Philip King of France, (emulous now of K. Williams greatnesse) he entred Normandie, & claimed it as in his owne right. His father indeede had made him a promise of it long before, but Robert impatient of delay, as counting so long staying to bee little better then disinheriting, endeavoured by strong hand to wrest it from his father. But his father King William hearing hereof, with a strong Army passeth over into Normandie, where in a battaile meeting hand to hand with his sonne, was by him unhorsed, and hurt in the arme: but his sonne perceiving him by his voyce to bee his father, suddenly leapes off his horse, takes up his father, casts himselfe downe at his feete, and humbly intreats his pardon; which as a father he easily grants, embraceth his sonne, and ever after, the sonne from the father had fatherly love, and the father from the sonne a filiall obedience. But though his father did thus pardon him, yet it seemes there is a Nemesis, or to say better, a Divine Providence, that did not pardon him; for after this, it is observed he never prospered in any thing hee undertooke. It cannot perhaps be discovered, whether the Kings severity begat his subjects Insurrections, or his subjects Insurrections the Kings severity; but which of them soever was the mother, it is certaine they were nurses each of them to other.

His aptnesse to forget Injuries.

CErtainly there is no such goodnesse of nature, as aptnesse to be reconciled, of which vertue it seemes King William had a large proportion, for he seldome remembred injuries after submission. Edric the first that rebelled against him, he placed in Office neere about him. Gospatric who had beene a factious man, and a plotter of conspiracies against him, he made Earle of Gloucester, and trusted him with managing a War against Malcolme King of Scots. Eustace Earle of Boleyne, who in the Kings absence in Normandy attempted to seise upon Dover Castle, he received afterward into great favour and respect. The Earles Marchar & Syward, with Wolnoth the brother of Harold, a little before his death, he released out of prison. Edgar, who as next heire to the Saxon Kings, had often attempted by Armes to recover his right, he not onely after twice defection pardoned, but gave him alſo allowance as a Prince: It is ſaid twenty ſhillings a day, or rather a pound weight of ſilver, and other large livings beſides; ſo as Edgar finding the ſweetneſſe of ſafety, and the pleaſures of a Country life, ſpent the reſt of his dayes (which were many) retired from Court, neither envying nor being envyed. Only Waltheoff Earle of Northumberland, and Northampton, of all the Engliſh Nobility was put to death in all the time of this Kings Raigne; and not he neither, till hee had twice falſified his Oath of Allegeance.

Of new Acqueſts to this Kingdome, by this Kings meanes.

IN the thirteenth yeare of his Raigne, he ſubdued Wales, and made it tributary to him, as before in the ſeaventh yeare of his Raigne, he brought Malcolme King of Scots to do him Homage, and thereupon to give him Hoſtages; that if England made him greater then he was before, a King of a Duke; he no leſſe made England greater then it was before, three Kingdomes in one.

Of his Exactions and courſes for raiſing of money.

AS his Taxations were many in number, ſo they were various in kinde, not alwayes bringing in money directly, but ſometimes obliquely ſaving it. The firſt taxe he laid upon his ſubjects was in the firſt yeare of his Raigne, after his returne out of Normandie; a grievous taxe all writers ſay, but none what taxe it was. In the third yeare of his Raigne he ranſacked all Monaſteries, and all the gold and ſilver of either Chalices or Shrines, he tooke to his owne uſe. Likewiſe he Seſſed all Biſhops and Abbots what number of ſouldiers they ſhould finde to ſerve him in his warres: alſo the ſtrangers which he maintained in Pay, he diſperſed into Religious houſes, and ſome alſo among the Nobility to bee maintained at their charge. Many other taxations he made, but laſt of all in the eighteenth yeare of his Raigne, by the adviſe of Roger Earle of Herisford, he cauſed the whole Realme to be deſcribed in a Cenſuall Roll, (whereof hee tooke a Preſident from King Alfred) ſo as there was not one Hyde of Land, but both the yearely rent, and the owner thereof was therein ſet downe: How many Ploughlands, what Paſtures, Fennes or Mariſhes, what Woods, Farmes, and Tenements were in every Shire, and what every one was worth: Alſo how many Villaines every man had; what Beaſts, what Cattell, what Fees, what other goods, what rent or commodity his Poſſeſſions did yeeld. This booke was called the Roll of Winton, becauſe it was kept in the City of Winchester. By the Engliſh it was called Doomeſday booke, either by reaſon of the generality thereof, or elſe corruptly, inſtead of Domus Dei booke, for that it was laid in the Church of Winchester, in a place called Domus Dei. According to this Roll taxations were impoſed; ſometimes two ſhillings, and at this time ſix ſhillings upon every Hyde of Land, (a Hyde containing as ſome account it, twenty Acres, but as Maſter Lambert proveth, a hundred Acres.) In all thoſe Lands which he gave to any man, hee reſerved Dominion in chiefe to himſelfe, as alſo a yearely rent, and likewiſe a Fine whenſoever the Tenant did alien or dye. Theſe were bound to him by Oath of Fealty and Homage, and if any died, his heire being within age, the King received the profits of his Lands, and had the cuſtody and diſpoſing of the heires body, untill his age of one and twenty yeares. To be ſhort, his greedineſſe of money was ſo great, that he ſpared not his owne brother Odo, but found accuſations againſt him, to the end he might ſeiſe upon his Treaſure; which was infinite great, and which he had gathered in hope to buy the Papacy. Onely one kinde of profit he forbare to meddle with, that is, Vacancies of Abbeys and Biſhopricks, which he alwayes reſerved for the Succeſſours: but then he tooke another courſe of farre greater profit, for he compelled all men to make new Fines at his pleaſure, for confirmation of any Grant or Priviledges formerly granted by any Prince of the Realme:

Realme: by which deviſe he got into his poſſeſſion, the greateſt part of all the riches of the Land, as well of the Clergie, as of the Laity. And one particular may not be omitted that is reported of him, which was this: The Monkes of Ely to purchaſe their peace, agreed to give him ſeven hundred Markes, when comming to pay it, there wanted a Groat in the weight, (for in thoſe dayes greater ſummes were not payd by tale, but by weight) which the King underſtanding, denied them all compoſition for Peace, untill with much ſuite he was intreated to accept of a thouſand Markes more.

Of his Lawes and Ordinances, and Courts of Juſtice erected by him.

ALthough at his Coronation he had taken an Oath to obſerve the Lawes of King Edward then in uſe, yet afterwards (perhaps counting his Coronation Oath but a matter of courſe) he abrogated many, and in their ſtead brought in the Lawes of Normandie; commanding them to be written in French, and alſo that all Cauſes ſhould be Pleaded, and all matters of Forme diſpatched in French; upon a pretenſe to dignifie the French tongue, but with a purpoſe to intrappe men through ignorance of the language, as indeed it did: or perhaps to make the Normans language predominant in the Kingdome as he had made their perſons; which yet hee was ſo farre from effecting, that there is not ſo much as any footſteps remaining of the Norman language in the Engliſh tongue. Formes of Judgement, and trials by Fire and Water, called Ordeal, formerly uſed, were in ſhort time after the Conqueſt diſuſed, and in the end utterly abrogated by the Pope, as derived from Paganiſme. That of Combat continued longer, but of no ordinary uſe: and all actions both criminall and reall, began now to be wholly adjudged by the Verdict of twelve men, according to the cuſtome of Normandie, where the like Forme is uſed, and called by the name of Enqueſt, with the ſame cautions for the Jurours, as it is here continued to this day; though by the Lawes of Ethelred it appeares, that the triall by twelve men was in uſe long before his time. And where before the Biſhop and the Alderman were the abſolute Judges to determine all buſineſſe in every Shire, and the Biſhop, in many Caſes, ſhared in the benefit of the Mulcts with the King; now hee confined the Clergie within the Privince of their owne Eccleſiaſticall Juriſdiction, to deale onely in buſineſſe concerning rule of ſoules, according to the Canons and Lawes Epiſcopall. And where the Cauſes of the Kingdome were before determined in every Shire, and by a Law of King Edward, all matters in queſtion were upon ſpeciall penalty decided in their Gemote, or Conventicle held monethly in every Hundred: Now he ordained that foure times in the yeare, for certaine daies, the ſame buſineſſes ſhould be determined in ſuch place as he would appoint, where he conſtituted Judges to attend for that purpoſe. Alſo he Decreed there ſhould be Sheriffes in every Shire, and Juſtices of Peace for puniſhment of Malefactors. Finally he ordained his Councell of State, his Chancery, his Exchequer, (Scaccarium corruptly called ſo, of the word Statarium, or rather of the Boord or Table where the Officers ſate;) alſo his Courts of Juſtice, which alwayes removed with his Court. Theſe places he furniſhed with Officers, and aſſigned foure Termes in the yeare for determining controverſies among the people. The place of theſe Courts was Weſtminſter, where King William Rufus afterward built a ſtately Palace. Now for his proviſionary Revenues, the Kings Tenants who held Lands of the Crowne, payd him no money at all, but onely Corne and other victuals, and a juſt note of the quality and quantity of every mans ratement, was taken through out all the Shires of the Kingdome, and levyed ever certaine, for maintenance of the Kings houſe. Onely the Kentiſh men procured the continuance of their ancient Lawes by a trick; for King William riding towards Dover, at Swanſcombe two miles from Gravesend, the Kentiſh men met him, but in the forme of a moving wood, by reaſon of the great boughes they had cut and carried in their hands, and compaſſing the King about, they onely made ſuite for the continuance of their Lawes, which the King without any great ſcruple granted, and glad he was ſo ridde of them. A ſtrange conceite ceite in the Kentish men, to hazard themſelves more, for the preſerving a ſimple Cuſtome, then for preſerving the Liberty of themſelves and their Country: But ſuch is the violence of conceit, till it be maſtered by time, or rather ſo very a Changeling is Humane Reaſon, that what they then cut downe great Woods to defend, they have ſince beene content to ſee aboliſhed, without cutting downe ſo much as a twigge. But one Law eſpecially he made, extreamely diſtaſtefull to all the Gentry of the Land: for where before they might at their pleaſure hunt and take Deere which they found abroad in the Woods; Now it was Ordained, under a great penalty, no leſſe then putting out their eyes; that none ſhould preſume to kill or take any of them, as reſerving them onely for his owne delight. And indeed ſo great delight he tooke in that kinde of ſport, that he depopulated a great part of Hamſhire, the ſpace of thirty miles, where there had beene (ſaith Carton) ſix and twenty Townes, and foureſcore Religious Houſes, and made it a Habitation for ſuch kind of Beaſts; which was then, and to this day is called the New-Foreſt. But the lamentable dyſaſters that have happened to this Kings Iſſue, doe plainely ſhew, that there is a power, that obſerves all our Actions, and which we may know to be Memorem Fandi atque Nefandi. But in the firſt yeare of this Kings Raigne, he granted to the City of London, their firſt Charter and Liberties, in as large forme, as they enjoyed them in the time of King Edward the Confeſſor, which he granted at the ſuite of William a Norman, Biſhop of London, in gratefull remembrance whereof, the Lord Major and Aldermen, upon the ſolemne dayes of their reſort to Pauls, doe ſtill uſe to walke to the Graveſtone, where this Biſhop lies interred. Alſo this King was the firſt, that brought the Jewes to inhabite here in England, as likewiſe he made a Law, that whoſoever forced a woman, ſhould loſe his genitals: and in his time, long Bowes came firſt into uſe in England, which as they were the weapons with which France under this King Conquered England: ſo they were the weapons with which England under after-Kings, Conquered France; as if it were not enough for us to beate them, if we did not beate them with their owne weapons. This King alſo appointed a Conſtable of Dover Caſtle, and a Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, with Immunities as they are at this day.

Affaires of the Church in his Raigne.

IN the twelfth yeare of his Raigne, Lanfranke Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, held a Synod at London, where amongſt other things, he removed Biſhops Sees, from ſmall Townes to great Cities, as from Silliway to Chicheſter; from Kyrton to Exeter; from Wells to Bathe; from Shirborne to Salisbury; from Dorcheſter to Lincolne; and from Lichfield to Cheſter; and from thence againe to Coventry; and not long before, the Biſhopricke of Lindafferne, otherwiſe called Holy Land, upon the river Tweede, had beene tranſlated to Durham. In the ſixth yeare of his Raigne, a controverſie ariſing betweene the two Arch-biſhops of Canterbury and Yorke, they appealed to Rome, and the Pope remitted it to the King and Biſhops of England. Hereupon a Synod is holden at Windſor, where ſentence was given on Lanfranks then Arch-biſhop of Canterburies ſide: that in matters of Religion, the Arch-biſhop of Yorke, ſhould ever be ſubject to the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury: Onely at Rome it was decreed, for matter of Title, that the See of Yorke ſhould be ſtiled Primas Anglia, and the See of Canterbury, Primas totius Anglia, as it is at this day. And as the Arch-biſhop of Yorke oweth obedience to the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury; So all the Biſhops of Scotland owe obedience to the Arch-biſhop of Yorke, as to the Primate of Scotland.

But as this King tooke downe the Prelates in Temporalties, for he ordained they ſhould exerciſe no Temporall Authority at all; So in Spiritualties, he rather raiſed them, as may be ſeene by a paſſage betweene Aldred Arch-biſhop of York, and the King: for at a time, upon the repulſe of a certaine ſuite, the Arch-biſhop in great diſcontentment offered to depart, when the King, in awe of his diſpleaſure, ſtayed him, him, fell downe at his feet, deſired pardon, and promiſed to grant his ſuite. The King all this while being downe at the Arch-biſhops feet; the Noblemen that were preſent, put him in mind that he ſhould cauſe the King to ariſe, Nay (ſaith the Arch-biſhop) let him alone, let him find what it is to anger Saint Peter. And as by this ſtory, we ſee the inſulting pride of a Prelate in thoſe dayes: So by another, we may ſee the equivocating falſe-hood of a Prelate at that time; For Stigand Arch-biſhop of Canterbury would often ſweare, he had not one penny upon the Earth, when under the Earth it was afterward found he had hidden great Treaſure. Alſo it is memorable, but ſcarce credible of another Biſhop, who being accuſed of Simony, and denying it, the Cardinall before whom he was to Anſwer, told him, that a Biſhopricke was the gift of the Holy Ghoſt, and therefore to buy a Biſhopricke, was againſt the Holy Ghoſt, and thereupon bid him ſay, Glory be to the Father, and to the Sonne, and to the Holy Ghaſt; which the Biſhop beginning, and oft eſſaying, could never ſay, [and to the Holy Ghoſt] but ſaid it plainely when he was put out of his Biſhopricke. And yet was not the Church in that Age ſo barren of Vertue, but that it afforded ſome good Biſhops, as William Biſhop of Durham, Founder of Univerſity Colledge in Oxford, but ſpecially Biſhop Wooſtan; whom, upon Lanfrankes reporting, to be inſufficient for the place, for want of Learning, the King commanded to put off his Pontificall Robes, and to leave his Biſhopricke: when ſuddenly out of a divine Inſpiration, Wooſtan anſwered: A better then you, O King, beſtowed theſe Robes upon me, and to him I will reſtore them. And therewithall going to Saint Edwards Shrine, who had made him a Biſhop, and putting off his Robes, he ſtrucke his Staffe upon Saint Edwards Monument, which ſtucke ſo faſt in the ſtone of it, that by no ſtrength it could be drawne forth, till he drew it forth himſelfe: which ſo terrifyed both Lanfranke and the King, that they intreated him to take his Robes againe, and keepe his Biſhopricke. Alſo Oſwald Biſhop of Salisbury, who deviſed a Forme of Prayers to be daily uſed in his Church, and was uſed afterwards in other Churches, from whence proceeded the common ſaying of Secundum uſum Sarum. In this Kings time was Berengarius, who denyed the true body of Chriſt to be in the Sacrament; Alſo in his time, Pope Gregory the ſeventh, removed marryed Prieſts from executing Divine Service, whereof great troubles aroſe in England.

Workes of Piety, by him, and others in his time.

THis King Founded the Abbey of Baltell in Suſſex, where he overcame Harold; the Abbey of Selby in Yorkeſhire; and a third neere London, called Saint Saviours. He founded alſo the Priory of Saint Nicholas at Exceter; and gave great priviledges to Saint Martins le Grand in London; which Church was founded before the Conqueſt, by Ingelricus and Emardus his Brother, Couſins to King Edward the Confeſſour. Theſe were this Kings workes of Piety in England, but in Normandy he Founded alſo an Abbey at Caen: where his Wife Maude built likewiſe a Monaſtery of Nunnes. He gave alſo to the Church of Saint Stephens in Caen, two Manors in Dorſetſhire, one Mannor in Devonſhire, another in Eſſex, much Land in Barkeſhire, ſome in Norfolke, a Manſion houſe in Woodſtreete, London, with many Advowſons of Churches, and even he gave his Crowne and Regall Ornaments to the ſaid Church, being of his owne Foundation, for the redemption whereof, his Sonne Henry gave the Manour of Brydeton in Dorſetſhire. In this Kings time, Robert, ſonne to Hyldebert Lacie, Founded the Priory of Pomfraite; Henry Earle Ferrers Founded a Priory within his Caſtle at Tuthury; Alwyn Chylde, a Citizen of London, Founded the Monaſtery of Saint Saviours at Bermondſey in Southwarke, and gave to the Monkes there divers Rents in London: Alſo in this Kings time, Maurice Biſhop of London, after the firing of the former Church of Saint Paul in London, began the Foundation of the new Church, a worke ſo admirable, that many thought it would never have beene finiſhed. Towards the building of the Eaſt end whereof, the King gave the choyce ſtones of his Caſtle, at the

the West end of the City, upon the banke of the River Thames; which Castle having beene at that time fired, in place thereof Edward Kilwarby Arch-bishop of Canterbury, did afterwards Found a Monastery of Blacke-fryers. The King also gave the Manor of Storford to the same Maurice, and to his Successours in that See; after whose decease, Richard his next Successour, bestowed all the Rents of his Bishopricke, to advance the building of this Church, maintaining himselfe by his private Patrimony; and yet all he could doe, made no great shew, but the finishing of the worke was left to many other succeeding Bishops. In the fifteenth yeare of this Kings Raigne, William Bishop of Durham, Founded Universtity Colledge in Oxford: Also one Gylbert a Norman Lord, Founded the Abbey of Merton in Surrey, seven miles from London; and Thomas Arch-bishop of Yorke, first builded the Minster of Yorke. In this Kings sixteenth yeare, his Brother Duke Robert, being sent against the Scots, builded a Fort, where at this day standeth New Castle upon Tyne: but the Towne and Walls were builded afterward by King John. Also in this Kings time, Ledes Castle in Kent was builded by Creveken, and the Castle of Oxford, by Robert d' Oylie: two Noble men that came into England with him. Osmond Bishop of Salisbury built the new Church there; Also Waring Earle of Shreweshury, built two Abbeyes, one in the Suburbs of Shrewesbury, and another at Wenlocke.

Casualties happening in his time.

IN the twentyeth yeare of his Raigne, so great a fire happened in London, that from the West-gate to the East-gate, it consumed Houses and Churches all the way, and amongst the rest the Church of Saint Paul, the most grievous fire that ever happened in that City. Also this yeare, by reason of distemperature of weather, there insued a Famine: and afterwards a miserable mortality of Men and Cattell. Also this yeare in the Province of Wales, upon the Sea shoare, was found the body of Gawen, sisters sonne to Arthur, the great King of the Britaines: reported to be foureteene foot in length. Also in this Kings time, a great Lord sitting at a Feast, was set upon by Mice, and though he were removed from Land to Sea, and from Sea againe to Land, yet the Mice still followed him, and at last devoured him.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE had to Wife, and her onely; Mathilde or Maude, Daughter to Baldwyn Earle of Flanders. She was Crowned Queene of England, the second yeare of his Raigne: the seventeenth yeare of his Raigne, she dyed; a Woman onely memorable for this, that nothing memorable is Recorded of her, but that she built a Nunnery at Caen in Normandy, where she lies Buryed. By her he had foure sonnes and five daughters. His Sonnes were, Robert, Richard, William, and Henry: of whom Robert the eldest, called Court-cayse, of his short thighes, or Court-hose, of his short Breeches, or Courtois, of his courteous behaviour: (for so many are the Comments upon his name) succeeded his Father in the Dutchy of Normandy. Richard his second Sonne, was kild by mis-fortune, hunting in the New-Forest. William his third Sonne, called Rufus, succeeded his Father in the Kingdome of England. Henry his youngest Sonne called Beauclerke, for his Learning, had by his Fathers Will, five thousand pounds in money, and the inheritance also of his Mother. His Daughters were Cicelie, Constance, Adela, Margaret, and Elenor, of whom Cicelie was Abbesse of Caen in Normandy. Constance was marryed to Alan Earle of Britaine. Adela to Stephen Earle of Blois. Margaret affianced to Harold King of England, but never marryed, and dyed young. Elenor, betroathed to Alphonsus King of Gallitia, but desiring to dye a Virgin, she had her wish, spending her time so much in Prayer, that with continuall kneeling, her knees were brawned.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was but meane of stature, yet bigge of body, and therewithall so strong, that few were able to draw his Bow: growing in yeares, he was bald before, his beard alwayes shaven, after the manner of the Normans; and where in his younger time, he was much given to that infirmity of Youth, which grows out of strength of Youth, Incontinency: after he was once marryed, whether out of satiety, or out of Grace, he was never knowne to offend in that kind. Of so perfit health, that he was never sicke, till that sicknesse whereof he dyed. Of a sterne countenance, yet of an affable nature: In warre, as expert as valiant: In Peace, as provident as prudent: and in all his Enterptises, as Fortunate, as Bold and Hardy. Much given to Hunting and Feasting, wherein he was no lesse pleasant then magnificent. He made no great proficience in Learning; as having had his education in the licentiousnesse of the French Court: yet he favoured learned men; and drew out of Italy, Lanfranke, Anselme, Durand, Traherne, and divers others, famous at that time for Learning and Piety. Very devout he was, and alwayes held the Clergy in exceeding great Reverence: And this is one speciall honour attributed unto him, that from him we beginne the Computation of our Kings of England.

His Places of Residence.

HIs Christmas he commonly kept at Gloceſter; his Easter at Wincheſter; and his Whitsontide at Weſtminſter; and once in the yeare, at one of these places would be new Crowned; as though by often puting on his Crowne, he thought to make it fit the easier upon his head. And for the houses which the Kings of England had in those dayes in London; I finde that at Weſtminſter was a Palace, the ancient habitation of the Kings of England, from the time of Edward the Confessour: which in the Raigne of King Henry the Eight, was by casuall fire burnt downe to the ground. A very large and stately Palace this was, and in that Age, for building incomparable. The Remaines whereof, are the Chamber of assembling the High Court of Parliament, and the next unto it, wherein anciently they were wont to beginne the Parliament, called Saint Edwards painted Chamber, because the Tradition holdeth, that the said King Edward dyed in it. Adjoyning unto this, is the White-hall, wherein at this day the Court of Requests is kept; Beneath this is the Great Hall, where Courts of Justice are now kept: This Hall which we now have, was built by King Richard the second, out of the Ground; as appeareth by his Armes engraven in the stone worke: (when he had plucked downe the old Hall, built before by William Rufus) and made it his owne habitation. But the aforesaid Palace, after it was burnt downe in anno 1512. lay desolate, and King Henry the Eighth shortly after translated the Kings seat, to a house not farre off, built by Cardinall Woolsey; and is called White-Hall. The Tower of London also was anciently used by the Kings of England to lodge in. Other Houses they anciently had; one where Bridewell now standeth, out of the ruines whereof, the now Bridewell was built. Another called the Tower Royall, now the Kings Wardrobe. Another in Bucklers-bury, called Scrnes Tower. Another where now the Popes-head Taverne is, over against the Old Exchange; and oftentimes they made use of Baynards Castle. But these are all long since demolished, that we may see Palaces and places have their Fates and periods as well as men.

His Death and Buriall.

TOwards the end of his Raigne, he appointed his two sonnes Robert and Henry with joynt authority, Governors of Normandy: These went together, to visit the King of France, lying at Constance, where entertaining the time with variety of sports, sports; Henry played with Lewis the Daulphin of France at Cheſſe, and winning much money of him, Lewis grew ſo cholericke, that he threw the Cheſſ-men at Henries face; calling him the ſonne of a Baſtard: and thereupon Henry ſtrucke Lewis with the Cheſſ-board, and had preſently ſlaine him, if his Brother Robert had not ſtept in, and ſtayed him. Upon this the King of France invades Normandy, and drawes Robert, King Williams eldeſt ſonne, to joyne with him againſt his Father: but King William comming preſently over with an Army, was ſoone reconciled to his Sonne, yet being corpulent and in yeares, was by this meanes much diſtempered in Body, and ſo retyred to Roan, where he ſtayed, as not being well in health. The French King hearing of his ſickneſſe, ſcoffingly ſaid, that he lay in Childe-bed of his great belly. Which ſo incenſed King William, that he ſwore by Gods Reſurrection and his Brightneſſe, (his uſuall Oath) that aſſoone as he ſhould be Churched of that Childe, he would offer a thouſand Lights in France; and indeed he performed it; for he entred France in Armes, and ſet many Townes and Corne-fields on fire, in which he was ſo violent, that by reaſon of his travaile and the unreaſonable heate, being in the moneth of Auguſt, it brought upon him a relapſe of his ſickneſſe, and withall, leaping on horſe-backe over a ditch, his fat belly did beare ſo hard upon the pommell of his ſaddle, that he tooke a rupture in his inner parts; whereupon returning to Roan, his ſickneſſe ſo encreaſed, that in ſhort time he dyed; and that which is ſcarce credible, yet Recorded for certaine, the very ſame day he dyed at Roan, his death was knowne at Rome, a thouſand miles off. In all the time of his ſickneſſe, he retained to the very laſt, his memory and ſpeech: and ſhewed many demonſtrations of Devotion, and true contrition, ſpecially for his ſeverity uſed towards the Engliſh. And thus he who was a Conquerour of men, was conquered himſelfe by death; the ninth day of September, when he had Raigned twenty yeares, and neare eleven moneths, in the three-ſcore and fourth yeare of his age: I may well ſay, he was conquered by Death; ſeeing death uſed him more deſpitefully, then ever he living uſed any whom he had conquered: For no ſooner was the breath out of his body, but his attendants purloyning what they could lay hands on, forſooke him and fled: leaving his body almoſt naked upon the Ground. Afterwards, William Arch-biſhop of Roan, commanded his body ſhould be conveyed to Caen, but his command was little regarded: till at laſt, one Herlewyne, a Country Knight, at his owne charges cauſed his body to be Embalmed, and conveyed thither; where the Abbot and Monkes meeting the Corps, ſuddenly in the middeſt of their ſolemnities, a violent fire brake out in the Towne, with the fright whereof, every man left the place; and thus was his body the ſecond time left forlorne. In the end a few Monkes returned and accompanyed the Herſe to the Abbey Church, but when the Divine Office was ended, and the body ready to be laid in the Grave, one Anſelme Fitz Arthur, ſtood up, and claimed that Ground to have beene the Floore of his Fathers houſe, which King William had violently wreſted from him; and thereupon charged them, as they would anſwer it before the dreadfull face of God, not to cover his Body with the Earth of his Inheritance. Whereupon after ſome pauſe, agreement was made with him, and three pound was payed in hand for the Ground broken up, and a hundred pounds more afterward for the Ground it ſelfe, payed him by Henry the Kings youngeſt Sonne, who onely of all his Sonnes was preſent at the Funerall. And yet this was not all, but when his Body was to be put in the Earth, it happened that the Sepulchre of Stone which ſtood within the Grave, was hewne ſomewhat too ſtrait for his fat belly, ſo as they were faine to preſſe it downe with ſome violence, with which, whether his bowels burſt, or whether ſome Excrements were forced out of their naturall paſſage; ſuch an intolerable ſtinke proceeded from him, that none were able to endure it, but made all the haſt they could to be gone. And yet neither was this the laſt of his miſeries: For in diers opened his Tombe, and not finding the Treaſure they expected, threw forth his bones with great deriſion: whereof ſome were afterward brought into England.

So

So that if we conſider his many troubles in life, and after his death, we may well thinke, that notwithſtanding all his greatneſſe, a very meane man would hardly be perſwaded to change fortunes with him.

Men of Note in his time.

MEn of Learning in his time, were but rare in this Iſland, yet ſome there were, particularly Marianus Scotus, a Hiſtoriographer, and Alphceredus a Monke of Beverley, a Writer alſo of Hiſtoricall Argument. And as for Men of Valour, they are not to be expected in a time of Servitude, but as if all the Engliſh Valour were now remaining in the Kentiſh men, they onely made reſiſtance, when all other Countries had ſubmitted.

THE RAIGNE OF KING WILLIAM THE SECOND.

KING William the Second called Rufus, second Son to William the Conquerour, appointed Successor by his Fathers Will, was upon the fifth of October, in the yeare 1087. by Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterbury, Crowned at Westminster King of England. Wherein his Father seemes to have followed the Example of Jacob, who gave to his younger sonne Joseph, the Land which he had taken with his Sword and his Bow: for with his sword and his Bow, had King William gotten the Land of England; and therefore might justly bestow it on which of his Sonnes he pleased. And besides, there was cause enough, why he should shew this Sonne of his some extraordinary favour, seeing in the Rebellion of his brother Robert, yet he stood firmely for his Father; and in his quarrell incurred no small hazard of his life, as wherein he received divers wounds: and perhaps also, his Father thought the rough disposition of this sonne, fitter to bridle the insurrections of the English, then the softly disposition of his sonne Robert.

But though he have thus quietly gotten the Crowne, he must not looke to hold it so; and indeed at his very beginning is assaulted with two troubles in one: for both his Brother Robert prepares to recover it from him, and the Lords of the Kingdome combine with Robert to assist him in it. The first mover of this trouble was Odo Bishop of Bayeux, his Unckle, who finding himselfe not to beare the sway he expected, and specially for an old grudge he bore to Lanfranke, Arch-bishop of Canterbury, as by whose means, in the former Kings time he had bin imprisoned (the Arch-bishop telling him, that though he might not imprison a Bishop, yet he might imprison an Earle of Kent, as this Odo was made not long before) he drawes many other Bishops and Temporall Lords to joyne with him, in behalfe of Duke Robert, against the King: but though the storme were violent for a while, yet it soon passed over; that indeed of his Lords, with more difficulty: but that of his brother Robert with more cost: For it was at last agreed, that Rufus should pay him three thousand markes a yeare, during his life, and leave him the Kingdome after his owne decease. But there was difficulty in repressing his Rebell Lords, by reason of their spreading themselves abroad in many quarters. For Odo fortifyed himselfe in Kent; Roger Montgomery, Earle of Shrewsbury, in Norfolke, Suffolke, and Cambridgeshire; Hugh de Grandmenill, in Leycestershire, and Northamptonshire; Robert bert Mowbray Earle of Northumberland, possest himselfe of Bristow; William Bishop of Durham, of the North parts of the Realme; and divers other of the Clergy, and Nobility, fortify themselves in Herefordshire, Shropshire, Worcestershire, and all the Countries adjoyning to Wales, thinking by this meanes to distract the King that he should not know where to beginne, nor whither to turne him. But this course, as it made it hard to represse them suddenly, so it made it easie to represse them at leisure; for being thus divided, they were but as single stickes, that are easily broken; where if they had united themselves, as into a Faggot, they might have made a strength of farre greater resistance. But the King having Lanfranke Arch-bishop of Canterbury, and Woolstan Bishop of Worcester, firme of his side: partly by their Authority and love amongst the people; but chiefely by his owne promises, to restore their ancient Lawes, and to allow them liberty of hunting in his Forests, he so firmely wonne the hearts of all unto him; that some of the Rebell Lords he reconciled with faire words, as Robert Montgomery; (a principall sinew of the Faction) some againe he mastered by strong hand; and Odo the chiefe Engineere of all the worke, he besieged in the Castle of Rochester, tooke him Prisoner, and forced him to abjure the Realme. And thus this great Rebellion was suppressed: In which it is observable, that though so many hot bloods were up, yet there was but little blood spilt. A happy rebellion for the English; for the Rebell Lords and Bishops being all Normans, the King had none to trust to, but the English, whom for their faithfulnesse to him in this service, he ever after respected more then he had done before.

After this storme was over in the South, there ariseth another in the North; For now Malcolme King of Scots, thinking it a fit time to doe some feates when King William was troubled at home; invades Northumberland, and having burnt and spoyled the Country, returnes home laden with booties. Which King William hearing, he takes his brother Robert along with him, and with a mighty Army enters Scotland, brings Malcolme to acknowledge his ancient homage: and upon Faith given, returnes to London. After this, Duke Robert finding his brother King William, not to keep his promise, in paying his Pension, complaines to the King of France, and with his ayde, assaults and takes some Townes, which he before had delivered in pawne for money to his brother King William; who hearing of it, hastens into Normandy with an Army, and by the mediation of money takes off the King of France, and makes his brother, being left destitute of assistance, to aske him pardon: a wise and mercifull course in King William; for to buy his peace with the King of France, did cost him but money, where to have purchased it by Warre, must besides money, have cost the lives of many. After this Malcolme, King of Scots, came in kindnesse to visit King William at Gloucester: but the King not vouchsafing so much as to see him, put him into so great an indignation, that returning home, he makes ready an Army, invades Northumberland, making great spoyle and getting great spoyles, but by Robert Mowbray, the Kings Lieutenant there, was taken in ambush, and together with his eldest sonne Edward, defeated and slaine. This King Malcolme was a most valiant Prince, as may appeare by an Act of his of an extraordinary straine; for hearing of a conspiracy plotted to murther him, whereof one was Authour, whose name is not recorded, he dissembled the knowing it, till being abroad one day a hunting, he tooke the fellow apart from the company, and being alone, said unto him: Here now is a fit time and place, to doe that manfully, which you have intended to doe treacherously; draw your weapon, and if you kill me, none being present, you can incurre no danger: with which speech of the King, the fellow was so daunted, that presently he fell downe at his feet, confessed his fault, humbly asked forgiveneſse, and being granted him, was ever after serviceable and faithfull to him. The death of King Malcolme and his Sonne, was so grievous, and so grievously taken of Margaret his Queene, the sister of Edgar Atheling, that she made it her Prayer, and had it granted, not to over-live them, and so, within three dayes after dyed: a woman as full of vertues all her life, as at this time of sorrowes; whom yet I should not not breake order to mention, but for one pious Act of hers, in cauſing a moſt barbarous cuſtome of Scotland to be abrogated, that when a man marryed, his Lord ſhould lye the firſt night with his Bride. Which cuſtome by her indevour was altered to a payment in money.

After theſe troubles were ended in the North, a new trouble ariſeth in the Weſt; for now the Welſh men hearing of King Williams diſtractions, enter upon the Engliſh borders, making ſpoyle and havocke of men and Townes: whom King William went with an Army to encounter, but could doe no good upon them, till he was faine to returne to London, and provide him a ſtronger Army. About this time alſo Robert Mowbray Earle of Northumberland, by whom Malcolme King of Scots was in King Williams ſervice formerly ſlaine, finding his ſervice not rewarded as he expected, enters into Conſpiracy againſt the King; but the King being informed of the practiſe, ſeiſeth ſuddenly upon many of his Compl ces, and himſelfe, after many deviſes and ſhifts for flight, is taken and put in priſon, in the Caſtle of Windſor. After this, King William to take a further revenge of the Welſh, and to make an abſolute conqueſt of that unquiet people, with a farre greater Army then ever before, enters Wales, and thinkes with new devices of Caſtles and Forts, utterly to ſubdue them, but they defending themſelves, with their Woods, and Mountainous paſſages, tyre and weary out the King and his Army, ſo as he leaves the buſineſſe to two Hughes, one, Earle of Salop, the other of Cheſter, who firſt invaded and tooke Angleſey, (their Iſland of refuge) where they uſed all kinde of cruelty, pulling out of eyes, and cutting off hands and noſes: in proſecuting of which buſineſſe, Hugh Earle of Salop was ſlaine, but Hugh Earle of Cheſter, entred Wales, and in the end, with the ſlaughter of Rees, the laſt King of Wales, made an abſolute Conqueſt of the Country. For after this, though they often rebelled, yet they were in a true ſubjection. And theſe for the moſt part, were all the troubles of his Raigne: where we may obſerve, that none of them did ever overtake him, but ſtill he met them, and from none of them he ever fled, but was ſtill the purſuer, and yet ſo many as might well have taken away all the comfort of a Crowne, and have made him willing to change his Diadem for a paire of Beades, but that Ambition, though ſometimes weary, yet never tyres.

His Exactions and Courſes for raiſing of money.

IN the ſecond yeare of his Raigne, Lanfranke Arch-biſhop of Canterbury dyed, who had kept the kingdome and King in ſome good Order, but aſſoone as he was dead, the King, as though he were then got looſe, ranged without reines, in all licentiouſneſſe: preying eſpecially upon the Clergy, as amongſt whom he found the richeſt Booties. When Biſhoprickes or Abbeyes were vacant, it was familiar with him to ſeiſe them into his owne hands, as this of Lanfranke, he kept to his owne uſe foure yeares together, and longer would have kept it, if a ſickneſſe of his Body had not healed this diſeaſe of his minde: For finding himſelfe in ſome hazard of death, he then conferred the Arch-biſhopricke of Canterbury upon Anſelme, and the Biſhopricke of Lincolne, upon Robert Bloet, two eminent men of that time; but aſſoone as hee was well againe, it repented him of that he had done, and was not quiet, till hee had drawne from the ſaid Bloet, five thouſand pounds, and from Anſelme alſo good ſummes of money. For he repented not more in time of ſickneſſe for the evill he had done in health, then being in health, he repented him of the good he had done in ſickneſſe; that it may in a manner be ſaid, there was nothing made him ſicke but health, and nothing made him be in health but ſickneſſe. But this preying upon the Clergy was growne into ſuch a cuſtome with him, that he kept in his hands at one time, three Biſhoprickes, Canterbury, Wincheſter, and Salisbury; and twelve Abbeys; all which he let out to Farme, and received the profits: and from this King, the uſe is ſaid to have riſen firſt in England, that the Kings ſucceeding had the Temporalties of Biſhops Sees, as long as they remained voyd. Having agreed to pay the King of France a great ſumme ſumme of money, he raiſed it in this manner; He cauſed twenty thouſand men to be levied, under pretence for his warres in Normandy; but when they were ready to be ſhipped, it was ſignified to them from the King, that whoſoever would pay tenne ſhillings towards the levying of Souldiers in Normandy, ſhould be excuſed from going, and ſtay at home; which was ſo plauſible an offer to the Army, that ſcarce a man was found that accepted not the condition. When Duke Robert went into the Holy Land he pawned his Dutchy of Normandy to his Brother King William for 6666. pounds, or as ſome write, for 12600. which money King William tooke up part by a grievous Impoſition: ſo that Biſhops melted their Plate, and the Temporall Lords ſpoyled their Tenants for the payment thereof: and part by loane, but chiefely of Religious perſons. He ſold the Abbey of Glaſtenbury to Thurſtan for five hundred pounds; and when he built Weſtminſter Hall, he made that an occaſion to lay a heavie taxe upon the people, who grudged at it, as done of purpoſe. He uſually ſold all Spirituall preferments, to them would give moſt; and tooke Fines of Prieſts for Fornication: as alſo he tooke money of Jewes, to cauſe ſuch of them as were converted, to renounce Chriſtianity, and returne to Judaiſme, as making more benefit by their Unbeliefe then by their Converſion. He cauſed divers of the Nobility to pay grievous Fines for tranſgreſſing his Laws, though the fault were never ſo ſmall. He ſet forth a Proclamation that none ſhould goe out of the Realme without his Licence, by which he drew much money from many; for either they muſt tarry at home and live diſcontented, or elſe content him for giving them leave to goe abroad. And from thence the Cuſtome or Law of Ne exeas Regno, ſeemes to have taken its beginning: for Precedents of ſervitude are ſure to live, where Precedents of Liberty are commonly ſtill-borne. Theſe were his wayes for raiſing of money, wherein Promoters and Informers were his darling ſervants; and the moſt officious of all was Ralph Biſhop of Durham, of whom he would often ſay, there was not ſuch another man in the world to ſerve a Kings turne. And yet he was not ſo greedy of lucre but that he did ſome Acts that may ſerve for examples: as one time, an Abbey being vacant, two Monkes of the Covent came ſuiters to him for the place, offering great ſummes, and each of them out-bidding the other; whereupon the King looking about, and eſpying another Monk ſtanding not farre off, asked him what he would give for the place? Who anſwering, he neither had any thing to give, nor would give any thing if he had it: Well (ſaid the King) thou haſt ſpoken honeſtly, thou art fitter to be Abbot then either of theſe; and ſo beſtowed the place upon him gratis.

Of his Magnanimity.

VVOrd was brought him as he ſate at dinner, that his City of Mans in Normandy was beſieged, and in great danger to be taken, if not preſently relieved: whereupon the King asked which way Mans lay; and then cauſed Maſons preſently to take downe the Wall, to make him paſſage the next way, and ſo rode inſtantly towards the Sea. His Lords about him, adviſing him to ſtay till his people were ready: No (ſaith he) but ſuch as love me I know will follow me. And being come on Shipboard, and the weather growing very tempeſtuous, he was adviſed by the Maſter of his Ship, to ſtay for ſome calmer ſeaſon: No (ſaith he) Feare nothing, I never yet heard of any King that was drowned. And thereby comming to Mans unexpected, he preſently diſperſed the Beſiegers, and tooke Helias Count de la Fleſche, who had been Authour of the tumult, Priſoner; who vaunting to the King, and ſaying, Now indeed you have taken me by a wile; but if I were at liberty againe, you ſhould finde me to doe other manner of feats: at which the King laughing; Well then (ſaith he) go your wayes and doe your worſt, and let us ſee what feats you will do. Being reconciled to his Brother Robert, he aſſiſted him to recover the Fort of Mount Saint Michael, which their Brother Henry did forcibly hold in Normandy: during which ſiege, ſtraggling one time alone upon the ſhoare, he was ſet upon by three horſmen, who aſſaulted him ſo fiercely, that they drove

drove him from his ſaddle, and his ſaddle from his horſe; but he taking up his ſaddle, and withall drawing out his ſword, defended himſelfe till reſcue came: and being afterward blamed for being ſo obſtinate to ſave his ſaddle, he anſwered: It would have angred me at the very heart, that the knaves ſhould have bragged they had wonne the ſaddle from me.

Of his juſtneſſe in keeping his word.

THis vertue ſpecially was commended in him, and he would often ſay, that even God himſelfe was obliged by his word. But if we obſerve the courſe of his life, we ſhall finde that howſoever he might keepe his word in ſmall matters, yet certainly not in great: For he kept not his word with his Brother Robert, to whom he promiſed to leave the Kingdome of England after his deceaſe, but performed it not. Nor he kept not his word with his ſubjects, for in the rebellion of the Norman Lords, he promiſed the Engliſh, if they would now ſtick to him, they ſhould have their ancient Lawes reſtored, and be allowed liberty to hunt in his Foreſts; which promiſe he either kept not at all, or at leaſt ſoone brake. Nor he kept not his word with God himſelfe, for being ſick at Gloceſter, and in ſome hazard of his life, he made a ſolemne vow, that if he recovered, he would leade a new life, and give over all his diſorderly courſes: but being recovered, he grew more diſorderly then he was before: that if denomination be made from the greateſt actions, it cannot be truly ſaid that he was juſt of his word; but ſuch is the priviledge of Princes over their ſubjects, that if they make a promiſe it muſt be beleeved; and if they breake it, it muſt not be queſtioned.

Of his Incontinencie.

MUch is ſpoken of his laſcivious life in generall, but nothing in particular: for neither is mentioned any violence he ever offered to any; nor is any woman named to have beene his Concubine, and Princes Concubines are ſeldome concealed. It is true he was never married, and of a ſtrong conſtitution of body, and ſo probable he might be inclining to that vice; but probabilities are not alwayes concluding, and therfore whether it be a true accuſation, or but a ſlander, it may well be doubted: only one baſe ſon of his is ſpoken of, called Bertrannus, whom he advanced in honour, and matched in a Noble Family. But why ſhould we more look for particulars of his Incontinency, then of his Prodigality? for he was taxed no leſſe for being Prodigall, then for being Incontinent; and yet of his Prodigality there is not ſo much as one inſtance recorded, unleſſe we take this for an inſtance; that when his Chamberlaine brought him a paire of hoſe, which becauſe they were new, he asked what they coſt? And being told they coſt three ſhillings, in a great chafe he threw them away; asking him, If he thought a paire of hoſe of three ſhillings, to be fit for a King to weare? Get thee gone (ſaith he) and let me have a paire of a Marke. His Chamberlaine went, and bringng him another paire ſcarce ſo good as the former, and telling him they coſt a Marke; I marry (ſaith the King) theſe are ſomething like, and was better ſatisfied with hearing what they coſt, then with ſeeing what they were worth: and yet was this no imputation to his wiſdome, for to ſay the truth, it is no defect of wiſdome in a King to be ignorant what his cloaths are worth.

Of his wavering in Religion.

HE appointed a diſputation to be held betweene Chriſtians and Jewes, and before the day came, the Jewes brought the King a Preſent, to the end they might have an indifferent hearing; The King took the Preſent, encouraging them to quit themſelves like men: and ſwore by Saint Lukes face (his uſuall oath) that if they prevailed in Diſputation, he would himſelfe turne Jew, and be of their Religion.

gion. A young Jew on a time was converted to the Chriſtian Faith, whoſe Father being much troubled at it, preſented the King ſixty Markes, intreating him to make his ſonne to returne to his Judaiſme; whereupon the King ſent for his ſonne, commanding him without more adoe to returne to the Religion of his Nation. But the young man anſwered, he wondred his Majeſty would uſe ſuch words; for being a Chriſtian, he ſhould rather perſwade him to Chriſtianity: with which anſwer the King was ſo confounded, that he commanded the young man to get him out of his ſight. But his Father finding the King could doe no good upon his ſonne, required his money againe; Nay (ſaith the King) I have taken paines enough for it, and yet that you may ſee how kindly I will deale, you ſhall have one halfe; and the other halfe you cannot in conſcience deny me. There were fifty Gentlemen accuſed for hunting and killing the Kings Deere, which they denied, and were therefore condemned to the triall of fire; which by Gods merciſull judgement they paſſed through untouched: the King hearing it, and deceived of the confiſcation he expected, is ſaid in a great chafe to ſay; How happens this? Is God a juſt Judge in ſuffering it? Now a murraine take him that beleeves it. It ſeemes alſo he doubted of many points of Religion, then in credit. For he would often proteſt, that he beleeved not that Saints could profit any man in Gods ſight, and therefore neither would he, nor any other that were wiſe (as he affirmed) make Interceſſion either to Peter, or to any other for helpe.

Affaires of the Church in his time.

THe King claimed the Inveſtiture of Biſhops to be his right, and forbad Appeales and Intercourſe to Rome; (for no Appeales had ever beene uſed till Anſelme in this Kings Reigne appealed to the Pope) upon whoſe complaint the Pope was about to Excommunicate the King, but having a little before Excommunicated the Emperour Henry the fourth (the firſt Chriſtian Prince with Soveraigne authority, that was ever Excommunicate by any Pope) he forbore at that time to doe it, leſt by making Excommunication comiion, he ſhould make it be ſlighted. At this time great contention aroſe betweene the King and the Arch-Biſhop Anſelme: and Anſelme not yeelding to the King in any point prejudiciall to the Popes authority; nor the King yeelding to Anſelme in any point prejudiciall to his owne Prerogative; (which were points indeed Incompatible) the contention continued long and hot, and the hotter, becauſe there were at that time two Popes on foote at once: one elected by the Conclave, called Urbanus the ſecond; another ſet up by the Emperour, called Clement the third: for Anſelme held with Urban, the King with Clement: and thus not agreeing in a third, it was impoſſible they ſhould agree between themſelves; and this contention, though palliated with pretentions, ſometimes of one ſide, ſometimes of another, yet brake out againe, and was renewed both in this Kings time, and in the times of many Kings after. Anſelme often threathing his going to Rome, the King told him plainely he would not thruſt him out of the Realme, but if he would goe without his leave, he would then keepe him out during his pleaſure; and beſides, he ſhould carry nothing out of the Realme with him: yet Anſelme ventured it, and the King performed it; for William Warlewaſt was ſent to riſle him in his paſſage at Sea of all he had, neither was he ſuffered to returne as long as the King lived; during all which time, the King tooke the profits of his Archbiſhoprick to his owne uſe. It may not be amiſſe to ſhew a paſſage here concerning the firſt cauſe of contention betweene the King and Anſelme, which ſome ſay was this; The King required a thouſand Markes of him for having preferred him to that See: which Anſelme refuſed to give, as judging it no leſſe Simony to give after the preferment then before: but yet afterward offering five hundred pounds, the King refuſed to accept it, as being worth (he ſaid) five times as much: whereupon Anſelme told him, Your Grace may have me, and all that is mine, to ſerve your turne in a friendly manner; but in the way of ſervitude and bondage, you ſhall never have me nor mine: Which words ſo angred the King, that they could could never after be reconciled. In this Kings Reigne Pope Urbane exhorted all Christian Princes to joyne together for recovery of Jerusalem and the Holy Land: and by the solliciting of Peter an Hermite, there assembled for that enterprise, under the conduct of Godefry of Bulloigne, to the number of three hundred thousand men; amongst whom was Robert Duke of Normandy, who so valiantly carried himselfe in the action, that after Jerusalem was won, the Kingdome of it (as some write) was offered to him: but he looking more after the Kingdome of England, and therefore refusing it; It is observed he never prospered all his life after. In this Kings Reigne, although he had no command in Ireland, yet their Bishop of Dublin was sent over to Anselme Arch-bishop of Canterbury, to be Consecrated by him; and the Citizens of Waterford also desiring to have a Bishop, procured Murcherdach, King of Ireland, to write to Anselme, to give his consent. Also in this Kings dayes, the Pope forbad the marriage of Priests.

Workes of piety by this King, or by other in his time.

THis King gave to the Monkes of Southwarke, the Church of Saint Saviour of Bermondsey, and Bermondsey it selfe; he also Founded at Yorke the Hospitall of Saint Leonards: He gave the Church of Saint Peter in the City of Bathe to be a Bishops See. Hugh Earle of Chester, in this Kings dayes builded the Abbey of Chester: Oswald Bishop of Salisbury, Founded the Cathedrall Church of Salisbury: Remigius Bishop of Dorchester, to the end his Bishoprick might be removed to Lincolne, beganne to build the Cathedrall Church of Lincolne; and Lanfrank Arch-Bishop of Canterbury builded two Hospitals without the City; the one of Saint John, the other at Harbaldowne, repaired Christs Church, and caused five and twenty Manors to be restored to that See, which had unjustly beene withholden. He repaired also the Abbey of Saint Albans, and the Church of Rochester, where for foure secular Priests, he placed to the number of fifty Monkes. In the sixth yeare of this Kings Reigne, William Warren the first Earle of Surrey, and Gundred his wife, Founded the Abbey of Lewis in Sussex: and Warren Earle of Shrewsbury built two Abbeys, one in the Suburbs of Shrewsbury, the other at Wenlock. In his twelfth yeare, Robert Losaunge, Bishop of Thetford, removed his See from Thetford to Norwich, and founded there a faire Monastery.

His buildings and Structures.

THis King enlarged the Tower of London, and compassed it with new wals: he also built the great Hall at Westminster, being 270. foote in length, and 74. in breadth; but thinking it too little, he intended to have built another Hall which should have stretched from the Thames to the Kings streete. He repaired the City and Castle of Carlile, which had beene wasted by the Danes two hundred yeares before, and because it had but few Inhabitants, he brought a Colony thither out of the Southerne parts. He finished New-Castle upon Tyne, and many other Castles he erected or repaired upon the borders of Scotland; many also upon the frontires, and within the very breast of Wales.

Casualties happening in his Reigne.

IN the fourth yeare of his Reigne, on Saint Lukes day, above six hundred houses in London were throwne downe with tempest; and the roofe of Saint Mary Bow Church in Cheape, was so raised, that in the fall six of the beames being 27. foote long, were driven so deepe into the ground: (the streets being not then paved with stone) that not above foure foote remained in sight, and yet stood in such ranke and order as the workmen had placed them upon the Church. Also in this Kings Reigne all the Lands in Kent, sometimes belonging to Earle Godwin, were by breaking in of the Sea covered with Sands, and are called Godwins Sands to this day. In his eleventh eleventh yeare, at a Towne called Finchamstead in the County of Barkshire, a Well cast out bloud, as before it had done water: and after by the space of fifteene dayes, great flames of fire were seene in sundry places and at sundry times.

Of his Personage and Condition.

HE was but meane of stature, thick and square bodied, his belly swelling somewhat round, his face was red, his haire deepe yellow, whereof he was called Rufus; his forehead foure square like a window; his eyes spotted, and not one like another; his speech unpleasant, and not easily uttered, specially when he was moved with anger. Concerning the qualities of his minde, they may best be knowne by looking upon the actions of his life; in which we shall finde he was never more assured, then when he was least sure, never lesse dejected, then when in most extremity; being like a Cube, that which way soever he fell, he was still upon his bottome. For his delights to passe the time, there was none in more request with him then hunting, a delight hereditary to him, which was the cause that as his Father had begunne the great new Forest, so he enlarged it to a farre greater extent. Other delights of his we finde not any, unlesse we shall reckon his warres for delights: for though they were oftentimes forced upon him, when he could not avoyd them; yet sometimes he entred into them when he needed not, but for his pleasure. And in generall, it may be said that one of his greatest vertues, was that which is one of the greatest vertues, Magnanimity; and his worst vice, was that which was the worst of vices, Irreligion.

Presages that preceded his Death.

AT Finchamstead in Barkshire, neare unto Abington, a spring cast up liquor for the space of fifteene dayes, in substance and colour like to bloud. The night before the King was kild, a certaine Monk dream'd, that he saw the King gnaw the Image of Christ crucified with his teeth; and that as he was about to bite away the legges of the same Image, Christ with his feete spurned him downe to the ground: and that as he lay on the earth, there came out of his mouth a flame of fire, with abundance of smoake. This being related to the King by Robert Fits Mammon, he made a jest of it, saying; This Monke would faine have something for his Dreame: Goe, give him a hundred shillings, but bid him looke that he dreame more auspitious Dreames hereafter. Also the same night, the King himselfe dream'd that the veines of his armes were broken, and that the bloud issued out in great abundance: and many other like passages there were, by which it seemes he had friends somewhere, as well as Julius Cæsar, that did all they could to give him warning: but that as Cæsars, so his Malus Genius would not suffer him to take it.

Of his Death and Burial.

KIng William having kept his Christmas at Gloucester, his Easter at Winchester, his Whitsontide at Westminster, notwithstanding forewarned by many signes of some great dysaster towards him, would needs the day after Lammas, goe a hunting in the New Forest; yet something resenting the many presages, he stayed within all the forenoone: about dinner time, an Artificer came and brought him sixe Crosse-bow Arrowes, very strong and sharpe; whereof foure he kept himselfe, and the other two he delivered to Sir Walter Tyrell, a Knight of Normandy his Bow-bearer; saying, Here Tyrell, take you two, for you know how to shoot them to purpose: and so having at dinner drunke more liberally then his custome, as it were in contempt of Presages, out he rides into the new Forest, where Sir Walter Tyrell shooting at a Deere, the arrow glanced against a tree, or as some write, grazed upon the back of the Deere, and flying forward, hit the King upon the breast; with which he instantly fell downe dead. Thus it is delivered by a common con-ſent of all; onely one Sugerius, a writer that lived at that time, and was a familiar acquaintance of the ſaid Tyrels; againſt the current of all Writers, affiirmes that he had often heard the ſaid Sir Walter ſweare that he was not in the Foreſt with the King all that day. I have beene the longer upon this point, becauſe a more pregnant example of Gods judgement remaines not any where upon Record. For not onely this King at this time, but before this, a brother of his named Richard, a young Prince of great hope; and alſo a Nephew of his, the ſonne of his brother Robert, came all in this place to violent deaths: that although King William the Founder of the Foreſt, eſcaped the puniſhment in his owne perſon, yet it was doubled and trebled upon him in his iſſue. Thus died King William Ruſus, in the three and fortieth yeare of his age, and twelfth and ſome moneths of his Reigne. His body was drawne in a Colliers Cart with one Horſe to the City of Winchester, where the day following it was buried in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Swithen, and was laid there in the Quire under a Marble ſtone, till afterward it was tranſlated, and laid by King Canutus bones.

Men of Note in his time.

FOr men of valour, he muſt ſtand alone by himſelfe: for men of learning, there was Lanfranke, a Lombard, but Biſhop of Canterbury: alſo Robert a Lorayne, who Epitomized the Chronicle of Marianus Scotus: alſo Turgotus an Engliſh man, Deane of Durham, who wrote the Annals of his owne time, and divers other works: but eſpecially Oſmund Biſhop of Saliſbury, who compoſed the ordinary Office, or book of Prayer.

ALthough Henry came not to the Crowne, as his Brother William did, by the gift of his Father, yet he came to it by the Propheſie of his Father: For, when his Father made his Will, and divided all his Eſtate in Land betweene his two eldeſt Sonnes, giving to Henry his youngeſt onely a portion in money, with which diviſion he perceived him to be much diſcontented; he ſaid unto him, Content thy ſelfe Harry, for the time will come, that thy turne ſhall be ſerved as well as theirs. And now the time was come that his prediction was accompliſhed; for on the fifth of Auguſt, in the yeare 1100. he was Crowned King of England, at Weſtminſter, by Maurice Biſhop of London, (as Deane of all the Biſhops of England, and therefore might doe it without any prejudice to the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, though he had beene preſent, who was indeed at this time in Exile.) But though it appeares fuiſſe in Fatis, to be decreed by the Divine Providence that it ſhould be ſo, yet it would not have been ſo, if his owne endevours had not beene concurring. And therefore being in the New Foreſt, when his Brother King William was killed, he never ſtayed to complement the Dyſaſter, but rode preſently to Wincheſter, and there, not without ſome oppoſition of the keepers, ſeiſed upon his Brothers Treaſure, as knowing treaſure to be the meanes for getting of Friends, and Friends the meanes for getting the Crowne; and having now gotten the firſt meanes, he made uſe of it for the ſecond, and both of them together brought him to this he is. Yet withall there were circumſtances in his owne Perſon that conduced to it; his Brother was borne, when their Father was but a Duke, he, when he was a King; Robert was a Forrainer, being borne in Normandy, himſelfe a Native, borne at Selby in Yorkeſhire; and it was not the leaſt circumſtance, that he was called Beauclerke, as to ſay, a good Scholar, having beene bred in Cambridge; not perhaps that his learning was ſo great, but that it was great, either in reſpect of that age, which had but little; or in reſpect of his Brothers, who had none at all: and the People having beene oppreſſed before, by the ill Government of two Kings, that were illiterate, could not chuſe but be glad to come under the Government of a King that was Learned. And though his Brother Robert, as being the Elder, had right unto it, yet he as out of ſight was out of minde, and perhaps neglected, as being himſelfe negligent; withall it was given out, that he was choſen King of Hieruſalem, and therefore no looking for him to come home; and to give force to all theſe reaſons, Henry Newborough Earle of Warwicke was a principall furtherer.

His course for eſtabliſhing himſelfe in the Kingdome.

IT is a hard matter to keepe that ſafely, which is unjuſtly gotten; and therefore he tooke all poſſible care to overcome that hardneſſe: which he effected by theſe meanes; Firſt, he called Anſelme Arch-biſhop of Canterbury home from Exile; placed William Gyfford a learned man, in the Biſhopricke of Wincheſter; and Monaſteries that had beene long vacant, he furniſhed with good Abbots. And becauſe it is no leſſe pleaſing to the People, to have bad inſtruments puniſhed, then the good to be advanced, he caſt Ralph Biſhop of Durham, (a principall cauſe of their late oppreſſions) into priſon: then mitigated the rigour of the new Lawes; and promiſed reſtitution of the old. And that there might be no abuſe in meaſures, he ordained a meaſure, made by the length of his owne Arme, which is called a Yard. He reſtored to his Subjects the uſe of Lights and Fire in the night, which before had beene forbidden after eight a clocke at night. He acquited the People from the Taxe of Danegelt, and from all other unjuſt payments, which had beene impoſed upon them by the two former Kings. He gave free liberty to the Nobility and Gentry of the Realme, to incloſe Parkes for Deere, and Warrens for Coneyes; and ſuch like game. And becauſe he knew Scotland might be an ill Neighbour to him, if not tyed by ſome Bond, and none ſo ſure as the Bond of Alliance, he therefore takes Matild ſiſter of the preſent King Edgar to be his Wife.

Ralph Biſhop of Durham, the late King Williams great Inſtrument for Exactions, that had by this King beene committed to the Tower, made an eſcape, and paſſing over to Duke Robert in Normandy; incenſeth him, not to ſuffer himſelfe to be baffled by a younger Brother; as for his Brother William, there was ſome reaſon, becauſe his Father had given him the Kingdome by his Will, but what could Henry pretend, who had his Portion given him in money? Beſides, it was an agreement with his Brother William, with conſent of all the Lords of the Realme, that the Surviver of them ſhould ſucceed. With ſuch like inſtigations, and withall aſſuring him, there were many in England would take his part; he eaſily perſwaded the Duke to that, from which he could hardly have diſſwaded him; who thereupon with a convenient Army, puts to Sea, and lands at Portſmouth, while Henry waited for his comming about Haſtings; and being landed there, much people reſorted to him, that it was like to have beene a bloody buſineſſe; but by mediation of Friends, working upon the flexible nature of Duke Robert, it was brought at laſt to this agreement, that King Henry ſhould pay to Duke Robert, three thouſand markes yearely, and Duke Robert ſhould ſucceed him in the kingdome, if he ſurvived. And thus, this cloud, that threatned ſo great a ſtorme, brought with it, rather Sunſhine and faire weather: for now, to his poſſeſſion of the Kingdome, there was added a right, and he might now juſtifie his being a King, without any ſcandall or uſurpation. After this, another little cloud aroſe, but was ſoone diſperſed: For Robert de Beleſme Earle of Shrewsbury, a raſh young man of diſpoſition, but more through diſcontentment, though diſcontented for nothing, but that having a great Eſtate, he was not a King as well as ſome others, fortifyed the Towne of Shrewsbury, and the Caſtle of Bridgenorth, and got many Welſhmen to aſſiſt him, but the King comming with a mighty Army, ſo terrifyed the Welſh, that they abandoned the Earle, and left him a prey to the King in his perſon, and more in his Eſtate, for the King ſeiſed his Eſtate into his hands, but for his Perſon he onely baniſht it the Realme. For as yet, the ſhedding of blood and putting to death, though for great Treaſonable practiſes, was not much in uſe; Policy of State was not yet growne to that heighth of ſeverity. The like attempt, and upon the like occaſion, was made by William Earle of Mortaigne in Normandy, and of Cornwall in England, Uncle to the King, onely for denying him the Earledome of Kent, which becauſe he could not obtaine, he entred into Treaſonable practiſes, by which he loſt loſt the Earledomes he had before. But theſe troubles were but as the labour of a Woman that is ſafely delivered; painefull for a time, but ending in joy: and indeed for the moſt part this King had the fortune to be a gainer by his loſſes.

After this, Duke Robert came in kindneſſe into England, to viſite his Brother Henry, where he was ſo well pleaſed with his entertainment, that in requitall thereof, and to doe a favour to the Queene, that was his God-daughter; he releaſed to King Henry, the three thouſand markes, which he was yearely to pay him. But returning into Normandy, and conſidering better what he had done, he ſo repented him, that he ſpared not to give out, that his Brother had directly couſened him. Which comming to King Henryes eare, ſo incenſed him, that he preſently ſent over a mighty Army, which forraged the Country, and wonne many Townes and Cities, and ſoone after went over himſelfe; where he ſo prevailed, that he left Duke Robert but onely Roan in all Normandy to put his head in, and this done, returnes into England. And now Duke Robert beginnes to be ſenſible of his owne weakneſſe, and therefore comes over into England to try the uttermoſt of his Brothers good nature; himſelfe had ſent him a Tunne of Wine to refreſh him withall, when in a ſiege he was ready to periſh for want of water: and it cannot be, but that gratefulneſſe and naturall affection, meeting together, muſt needes worke ſomething in the minde of a Brother. Thus reſolved, he preſents himſelfe to the King, referring both his Dukedome and himſelfe, and all differences and debates to his will and pleaſure. But whether incenſed with the ſcandalous words, Duke Robert had given out of him, or whether aſpiring to joyne Normandy to England, as his Father had done before; King Henry ſcarce vouchſafed to heare him ſpeake, at leaſt vouchſafed not to make him any anſwer, but in a ſullen manner turned away, and ſo left him: which ſcornefull uſage put the Duke into ſuch indignation, that he reſolved to ſet his whole ſtate at ſtake, and either to redeeme his diſgrace, or to forfeit his life. So returning into Normandy, he uſeth all his force in raiſing of Forces, but King Henry ſuſpecting his intentions, and not uſing to give Inſurrections time to ripen, came upon him ſo ſuddenly with a mighty Army, that he drew him to a battell before he was halfe ready to fight. Yet deſire of revenge ſo animated the Duke, and the Duke his Souldiers, that never battell was more fiercely fought, and the Normans ſeemed at firſt to have the better, till King Henry ſhewing himſelfe in the Army, put ſuch courage into his Souldiers, that they quickly made good the advantage they had in number, and King Henry obtained a compleate victory, both in ſlaughter of men, (of whom there were ſlaine above ten thouſand) and in taking of priſoners, (to the number of foure hundred) amongſt whom, beſides divers other Great ones, as the Earle of Mortaigne, William Criſpine, and William Ferreis, was Duke Robert himſelfe, whom the King, (having firſt taken order for all things, in his new State of Normandy) brought over with him into England, and committed him to the Caſtle of Cardyffe in Wales, where he remained a priſoner till he dyed, uſed for a time with reaſonable liberty for Recreation, till attempting to make an eſcape, it was thought fit to put out his eyes; which though it encreaſed his miſery, yet it ſhortned not his life, for he lived many yeares after, in all, from the time of his firſt impriſonment, ſixe and twenty. And thus this great Duke, who in his birth was the joy of Nature, in his life was the ſcorne of Fortune; and it is not unworthy the obſerving, that the Engliſh wonne Normandy, the very ſame day forty yeare, the Normans had wonne England. Such Revolutions of fortune there are in kingdomes, and ſo unſtable is the ſtate of all worldly Greatneſſe.

And now is King Henry as great as ever his Father was, and as Greatneſſe draws envy, as much envyed as ever his Father was; and as Envy makes Enemies, as much oppoſed as ever his Father was: for now Fulke Earle of Angiou, and Baldwyne Earle of Flanders, upon ſmall occaſions, and Lewis the groſſe King of France, upon none, but ſuch as envy ſuggeſted, ſeeking to place William, Sonne to Duke Robert, in his Right to Normandy, aſſaulted the Kings Dominions, perhaps to try whether Greatneſſe had not made him unwieldy; but King Henry, to

ſhew that Greatneſſe had made him more Active, went over into Normandy with a mighty Army, and at Nice encountred the French King, where a bloody Battell was fought, with exceeding valour on both ſides, but at laſt King Henry repelled the French King, and recovered Nice, and after many other conflicts betweene them, with variety of Fortune, at laſt the King made peace with the Earle of Angiou; confirmed by a marriage of the Earles Daughter with his Sonne William: and upon this alſo the two Kings grow to a peace, in which William, Son to King Henry, being about ſeventeene yeares of age, was inveſted into the Dutchy of Normandy, doing homage for the ſame to the King of France: From whence it was afterward a Cuſtome, that the King of Englands eldeſt Sonne (as long as Normandy remained in their hands) was made alwayes Duke of Normandy. After this, Charles Earle of Flanders, being ſlaine at Bruxels by a conſpiracy of his owne people, and leaving no iſſue behind him, Lewis King of France inveſted William, Sonne to Duke Robert, in the Earledome of Flanders, as deſcended from Earle Baldwyn, whoſe Daughter Maude was wife to King William the firſt, and Grandmother to this William: ſo as William now having gotten this ſteppe of advancement, ſeekes to goe on, and to recover Normandy, and was thereof, by aſſiſtance of the King of France, in a faire poſſibility, when in a certaine light conflict, receiving a wound in his hand, the thread of his faire poſſibility was upon a ſuddaine cut off, and of that light wound, he ſhortly after dyed.

King Henry now in perfect peace abroad, was not without ſome little diſquietings at home, and marching thorow Powis-land in South Wales, to repreſſe ſome Inſurrections of the Welſh, he came to certaine Straights, where his maine Army could not paſſe, in which place the King was ſmitten with an Arrow full upon the breaſt, whereat he ſwore by our Lords death (his uſuall Oath) that it was no Welſh arme, had ſhot that Arrow, yet in this diſtreſſe, for a thouſand head of Cattell, he had the paſſage left open, and came ſafely off. And theſe were his troubles of Armes, both at home and abroad, during all his Raigne.

His Taxations and wayes for raiſing of money.

TOwards the marriage of his Daughter Maude with the Emperour, he obtained at his firſt Parliament at Saliſbury, three ſhillings upon every Hide of Land, throughout the kingdome; which was afterward drawne to a cuſtome, to receive ayde from the Subjects, whenſoever the King gave his eldeſt Daughter in marriage. Beſides this he had no more in all his Raigne, but onely one ſupply for his Warres in France; but he kept Biſhoprickes and Abbeyes voyd in his hands, and that of Canterbury five yeares together. By an Act of Parliament, or rather by a Synod of Biſhops holden at London, he was authoriſed to puniſh marriage, and incontinency of Prieſts; which the Biſhops afterwards repented, for he ſuffered Prieſts to have Wives for Fines, or rather tooke Fines of them whether they had wives or no, becauſe they might have them if they would. Puniſhments which before his time were mutilation of Member, he made Pecuniary. And the Proviſions of his houſe, which were uſed to be paid in kind, were in his time rated at certaine prizes, and received in money. By this Chapter and the next before, it appeares there were in this Kings dayes, but few troubles at home, nor but few Taxations; whereof the one may be thought to be cauſe of the other, the firſt perhaps of the ſecond, but certainely the ſecond of the firſt.

Lawes firſt inſtituted in his time.

HE firſt inſtituted the forme of the High Court of Parliament: for before his time, onely certaine of the Nobility, and Prelates of the Realme were called to conſultation, about the moſt important affaires of State, but he cauſed the Commons alſo to be aſſembled, by Knights and Burgeſſes of their owne appointment, and made the Court to conſiſt of three parts, the Nobility, the Clergy, and the Common Common people, repreſenting the whole body of the Realme, and appointed them to ſit in ſeverall Chambers, the King, the Biſhops, and Lords of the Realme in one Chamber, and the Commons in another, to conferre together by themſelves. Other Orders of that Court he Ordained, as they are in uſe at this day. The firſt Councell of this ſort was held at Saliſbury, on the 19. day of April, in the 16. yeare of his Raigne. He forbad the wearing of long haire; which at that time was frequent, after the manner of the French. He commanded Robbers upon the High way, to be hanged without redemption: of whom a famous one at that time was one Dunne, and of him, the place where he moſt uſed, by reaſon of the great Woods thereabouts, is to this day called Dunſtable, where the King built the Borough as now it ſtandeth. Counterfeiters of money he puniſhed with pulling out their eyes, or cutting off their privy members, a puniſhment both leſſe then death, and greater.

AT his firſt comming to the Crowne, he forbore his claime to the Inveſtitures of Biſhops, but after he had beene King ſome time, he claimed that both to inveſt Biſhops, and to allow, or hinder appeales to Rome, belonged to him. In theſe, Anſelme Archbiſhop of Canterbury oppoſed him, affirming that both of them belonged to the Pope. The contention at laſt was brought to the Pope, to whom King Henry ſent William Warlewaſt, elect Biſhop of Excester, who ſaying to the Pope, that his Maſter would not, for the Crowne of his Realme, loſe the Authority of Inveſting his Prelates, the Pope ſtarted up and anſwered, Neither will I loſe the diſpoſing of Spirituall Promotions in England, for the Kings head that weareth the Crowne; before God (ſaid he) I avow it. So the contention grew long and hot, and many meſſengers were ſent to and fro about it, the concluſion was (which proved no concluſion) that the King ſhould receive homage of Biſhops elect; but ſhould not Inveſt them by Staffe and Ring: to which the King ſaid no hing for the preſent, but forbore not to doe it ever the leſſe: for five yeares after the death of Anſelme, Ralph Biſhop of Rocheſter, was by the King made Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, and notwithſtanding all former Decrees, and Threatnings of the Pope, he received his Inveſtiture of the King. About this time a Canon was made againſt the Marriage of Prieſts, to which purpoſe Johannes Cremenſis, a Prieſt Cardinall, by the Kings licence came into England, and held a ſolemne Synod at London, where inveighing ſharpely againſt it, affirming it to be no better then profeſt Adultery, he was himſelfe the night following, taken in bed with a common harlot. Even Anſelme himſelfe, the moſt earneſt enforcer of ſingle life, dyed not, it ſeemes, a Virgin, for elſe he would never in his Writings make ſuch lamentation for the loſſe thereof. Anſelme about this time dying, Rodulph ſucceeded in the See of Canterbury, and Thomas dying, Thurſtine ſucceeded in the Arch-biſhopricke of Yorke: betweene which two Prelates, there aroſe great contention; Rodulph would not conſecrate Thurſtine, unleſſe he would profeſſe obedience; Thurſtine was content to embrace his benediction, but profeſſe obedience he would not: In this contention the King takes part with Rodulph, the Pope with Thurſtine: after many paſſages in the buſineſſe, upon the Popes threatning to Excommunicate the King, Thurſtine entred upon his Biſhopricke, and the King connived. In the tenth yeare of his Raigne, the Abbey of Ely was made a Biſhops See, and Cambridgeſhire was appointed for the Dioceſſe thereof, which becauſe it belonged before to the Juriſdiction of Lincolne, the King gave the Biſhop of Lincolne, in recompence thereof, the Manor of Spalding. This King alſo created a Biſhopricke at Carlile, and endowed it with many Honours. In his time, the Order of the Templars beganne, and in the 27. yeare of his Raigne, the Grey Fryers, by procurement of the King, came firſt into England, and had their firſt houſe builded at Canterbury. I may here have leave to tell two ſtories of Church-men, for refreſhing of the Reader: Guymond the Kings Chaplaine, obſerving that unworthy men for the moſt part were advan-

advanced to the beſt dignities of the Church, as he celebrated Divine Service before him, and was to read theſe words out of Saint James, [It rained not upon the Earth, III yeares and VI moneths] he read it thus; It rained not upon the Earth, one, one, one yeares, and five one moneths. The King obſerved his reading, and afterwards blamed him for it, but Guymond anſwered, that he did it of purpoſe, for that ſuch Readers were ſooneſt preferred by his Majeſty. The King ſmiled, and in ſhort time after, preferred him to the Government of Saint Frideſwids in Oxford. The other is this, Thomas Arch-biſhop of Yorke falling ſicke, his Phyſitians told him, that nothing would doe him good, but to company with a woman; to whom he anſwered that the Remedy was worſe then the diſeaſe, and ſo dyed a Virgin. This King granted to the Church of Canterbury, and to William and his ſucceſſours, the Cuſtody, and Conſtable-ſhip of the Caſtle of Rocheſter for ever.

Workes of Piety done by this King, or by others in his time.

THis King Founded and erected the Priory of Dunſtable, the Abbey of Circeſter, the Abbey of Reading, and the Abbey of Shirborne. He alſo new builded the Caſtle of Windſor, with a Colledge there: He made alſo the Navigable River, betweene Torkeſay and Lincolne, a worke of great charge, but greater uſe. His Wife Queene Maude, paſſing over the River of Lue, was ſomewhat endangered, whereupon ſhe cauſed two ſtone-Bridges to be built, one at the head of the Towne of Stratford, the other over another Streame there, called Channelsbridge, and paved the way betweene them with Gravell. She gave alſo certaine Manors, and a Mill called Wyggon Mill, for repairing the ſame Bridges and Way. Theſe were the firſt ſtone-Bridges that were made in England, and becauſe they were Arched over like a bow, the Towne of Stratford was afterward called Bow. This Queene alſo founded the Priory of the Holy Trinity, now called Chriſts Church, within the Eaſt Gate of London called Aldgate; and an Hoſpitall of Saint Giles in the Field, without the Weſt part of the City. In this Kings time Jordan Briſet Baron, Founded the Houſe of Saint John of Hieruſalem, neare to Smithfield, in London, and gave 14. Acres of ground, lying in the field next to Clerkenwell, to build thereupon a Houſe of Nunnes, wherein he with Myriell his Wife were buryed in the Chapter houſe. Robert Fitſham, who came out of Normandy with the Conquerour, Founded anew the Church of Teukesbury, and was there buryed; Herbert Biſhop of Norwich, Founded the Cathedrall Church there. The Priory and Hoſpitall of Saint Bartholomew in Smithfield, was Founded by a Minſtrell of the Kings, named Reior, who became firſt Prior there. Before this time Smithfield was a Laſtall of all ordure and filth, and the place where Felons were put to Execution. Hugh Lacy Founded the Monaſtery of Saint John at Lanthony, neare to Gloceſter. Juga Bayit, halfe a Hide of Land. This Lady Juga was late Wife to Baynard, that firſt built Baynards Caſtle in London. Eudo the Kings Sewer, Founded the Monaſtery of Saint John at Colcheſter, of blacke Chanons, and thoſe were the firſt of that Order in England. Simon Earle of Northampton, and Maude his Wife, Founded the Monaſtery of Saint Andrew in Northhampton. In the ſeventh yeare of this Kings Raigne, the firſt Chanons entred into the Church of our Lady in Southwarke, called Saint Mary Overey, Founded by William Pountlarge knight, and Williams Dancyes, Normans. Robert the firſt Earle of Gloceſter, the Kings baſe Sonne, builded the Caſtles of Briſtow and Cardyffe, with the Priory of Saint James in Briſtow: And his Sonne Earle William began the Abbey of Kenſham. Geoffrey Clinton, Treaſurer, and Chamberlaine to the King, Founded the Priory at Kenelworth, of Regular Chanons. Henry Earle of Warwicke, and Margaret his Wife, Founded the Colledge of Saint Mary, in the Towne of Warwicke, and Roger de Belemond his Sonne, and Ellyne his wife, tranſlated the ſame Colledge into the Caſtle of Warwicke, in the yeare 1123. Roger Biſhop of Saliſbury built the Deviſes in Wiltſhire, the the Caſtles alſo of Mameſbury and Shirborne. He repaired the Caſtle of Saliſbury, and environed it with a wall; he alſo built the ſtately Church of Saliſbury: deſtined to a longer life then any of his other workes. Ralph, Biſhop of Durham, began to build the Caſtle of Norham, upon the banke of the River of Tweed. In the 32. yeare of this Kings Raigne, the Priory of Norton in Cheſhire, was founded by one William, the ſonne of Nychel, and the Abbey of Cumbermere in the ſame Shire. The Colledge of Secular Chanons alſo in the Caſtle of Leyceſter, and the Abbey without the North gate of the ſame Towne, called Saint Mary de Prato. Alſo in this Kings Raigne, was Founded the Monaſtery of Plimpton in Devonſhire, with the Cathedrall Church of Exeter; the Priory of Merton, the Hoſpitall of Kepar, the Priory of Oſeney neare Oxford by Robert de Oylye Knight: and the Hoſpitall of Saint Croſſe neare Wincheſter by Henry Blois Biſhop there: alſo Robert Earle of Ferrers Founded the Abbey of Merivall: and indeed ſo many in his time were built, that one would thinke the Inhabitants of England to be all Carpenters and Maſons, that were able to finiſh ſo many great buildings in ſo ſhort a time as this Kings Raigne..

IN this Kings dayes all the foure Elements were guilty of doing much miſchiefe, but chiefely the water: For King Henry returning into England after his conqueſt of Normandy, left his ſonne William with his ſiſter Mary Counteſſe of Perche; Richard his ſonne by a Concubine; the Earle of Cheſter with his wife Lucie, the Kings Neece by his ſiſter Adela, and other Lords and Ladies, and paſſengers to the number of 180. to follow after him: who taking Shipping (and the beſt Ship the King had) whether by careleſneſſe, or drunkenneſſe of the Saylours, were all drowned. The Prince indeed was got into the Ship-boate, and out of danger; but hearing the lamentable cries of his ſiſter, compaſſion wrought ſo in him, that he turned about his boate to take her in, which over-charged with the multitude, over-turned, and they all periſhed: none eſcaped but onely one Saylour, who had been a Butcher, who by ſwimming all night upon the Maſt, came ſafe to Land. An accident not more grievous then exemplary; for amongſt other concluſions, from hence we may gather, that no ſtate is ſo uncertaine as proſperity; no fall ſo ſudden as into adverſity; and that the rule [He that ſtands let him take heed he fall not] cannot alwayes be obſerved, becauſe a man happens ſometimes to fall before it is poſſible for him to take heed. Another great miſchiefe was in this Kings dayes wrought by the water; for by the breaking in of the Sea, a great part of Flanders was drowned: whereupon a great number of Flemmings being Suiters to King Henry for ſome place to inhabit, he aſſigned them a part in Wales neare the Sea, called Pembrokeſhire, where they have inhabited to this day: the King by this one action, working two good effects, both ſhewing compaſſion to diſtreſſed ſtrangers, and putting a bridle upon unquiet Natives. But the water had another way to doe miſchiefe as much by defect, as this was by exceſſe; for upon the tenth of October, the River of Medway many miles together did ſo faile of water, that in the midſt of the Channell, the ſmalleſt veſſels could not paſſe: and the ſame day alſo in the Thames, betweene the Tower of London and the Bridge, men waded over on foote for the ſpace of two dayes: alſo at another time the River of Trent at Notingham was dryed up a whole day. Now for the Earth, though naturally it be without motion, yet it moves ſometimes when it is to do miſchiefe, ſpecially being aſſiſted by the Aire, as in this Kings dayes, it moved with ſo great a violence, that many buildings were ſhaken downe, and Malmesbery ſaith, that the houſe wherein he ſate, was lifted up with a double remove, and at the third time ſetled againe in the proper place. Alſo in divers places it yeelded forth a hideous noyſe, and caſt forth flames at certaine riſts many dayes together, which neither by water, nor by any other meanes could be ſuppreſſed. But yet the active Element of Fire was buſieſt of all, for firſt Chicheſter with the principall Monaſtery was burnt downe to the ground: From Weſt-cheape in London to Aldgate, a long tract of buildings was consumed with fire: Worcester also and Rochester, even in the Kings presence; then Winchester, Bathe, Glocester, Lincolne, Peterborough, and other places, did also partake of this calamity, that there could be no charging the fire with any partiality: and to speake of one forraine casualty, because a strange one. In Lombardy this yeare was an Earthquake that continued forty dayes, and removed a Towne from the place where it stood, a great way off.

AT his first comming to the Crowne, he married Matild or Maude, sister to Edgar then King of Scotland, and daughter to Malcolme by Margaret the sister of Edgar Etheling. This Matild, if she were not a veyled Nun, she was at least brought up in a Nunnery, and thereby growne so averse from marriage, that when the motion was first made her to marry with King Henry, she utterly refused it, as resolved, though perhaps not vowed, to die a Virgin; till at last importuned, and even forced by the authority of her brother, she rather yeelded then consented; for she did it with so ill a will, that it is said she prayed, if ever she had issue by the marriage, that it might not prosper: and indeed it prospered but untowardly, as will be seene in the sequell. But though she made this imprecation before she knew what it was to be a Mother, yet when she came to be a Mother, she shewed her selfe no lesse loving and tender of her children, then loyall and obsequious to her husband. And to make amends for this seeming impiety towards her children, there is a story related of her reall piety towards the poore: for a brother of hers comming one morning to visit her in her chamber, found her sitting amongst a company of Lazar people, washing and dressing their ulcers and sores; and then kissing them afterward when she had done: who wondring at it, & saying to her, How could she think the King should like to kisse that mouth, which had kissed such filthy ulcerous people? she answered, she had a greater King to kisse, who she knew would like her never the worse for it. By this Queen Matild, King Henry, according to some Writers, had foure children; but as the received opinion is, only two, a sonne named William, and a daughter called Maude; of whom the sonne at foureteene yeares old had fealty sworne to him by the Nobility of Shrewsbury: at seventeene married the daughter of Fulke Earle of Anjou: and at eighteene was unfortunately drowned, as hath beene shewed. The daughter lived to be an Empresse, and afterwards a Dutchesse; but could never come to be a Queene, though borne to a Kingdome, as shall be shewed hereafter. She survived her second husband seventeene yeares, living a Widow, and at Roan in Normandy died, and was buried there in the Abbey of Bec; though there be a Tradition that she was buried at Reading, in the Abbey there beside her Father: but it appeares to have beene a custome in those dayes, for great personages to have their Monuments erected in divers places. After the death of this Queene Matild, who died at Westminster, in the eighteenth yeare of his Raigne, King Henry married Adelitia, the daughter of Godfry Duke of Lorraine; who though she were a beautifull and accomplisht Lady, yet had he never any issue by her. When she was to be Crowned, Ralph Arch-bishop of Canterbury, who was to doe the office, came to King Henry, sitting Crowned in his chaire of State, asking him who had set the Crowne upon his head? the King answering, he had now forgotten, it was so long since. Well (said the Arch-bishop) whosoever did it, did me wrong, to whom it belonged; and as long as you hold it thus, I will doe no office at this Coronation. Then (saith the King) doe what you thinke good: whereupon the Arch-bishop tooke the Crowne off from the Kings head; and after, at the peoples intreaty, set it on againe, and then proceeded to Crowne the Queene. By Concubines King Henry had many children; it is said seven sonnes, and as many daughters: of whom, some perished in the great Ship-wrack; of the rest, two of the sonnes, Reynold and Robert, were made Earles: Reynold of Cornwall, Robert of Glocester, and was a great assister of his sister Maude, in her troubles with King Stephen, who after many acts of valour performed by him, in the twelfth yeare of King Stephen, died, and was buried at Bristow. The daughters were all married to Princes and Noble men of England and France, from whom are descended many worthy Families: particularly one of those daughters by Anne Conbet, was married to Fitz-herbert, Lord Chamberlaine to the King: from which Fitzherbert, our Family (absit invidia verbo) is by Females descended; passing by the names of Cummin, Chenduit, Brimpton, Stokes, Foxcote, Dynely, and so to Baker.

Of his Incontinency.

OF this enough hath beene said, in saying he had so many children basely begotten: but if comparison be made betweene his brother Rufus and him, it may be said, that howsoever they might be equall in looseneſſe of life, yet in that looseneſſe, William Rufus was the baser, and King Henry the more Noble; for King Henry had certaine selected Concubines, to whom he kept himselfe constant, where King William tooke onely such as he found: constant to the pleasure, but not to the persons.

His course for establishing the succession in Maude and her issue.

HE married his onely daughter Maude, being but sixe yeares old, to the Emperour Henry the fourth; but he leaving her a Widow without issue, he married her againe to Geoffrey Plantagenet, sonne to Fulke Duke of Anjou: not the greatest Prince that was a Suitour for her; but the fittest Prince for King Henries turne: for Anjou was neighbouring upon Normandy, a great security to it, if a friend; and as great a danger, if an enemy. And having thus placed her in marriage, he now considers how to establish her succession in the Crowne of England, whereupon he cals his Nobility together, and amongst them David King of Scots, and enstalls them to give their Oaths of Allegeance to her and her issue: and as thinking he could never make her succession sure enough, he causeth his Lords the yeare after againe to take the like Oath, and after that a third time also; as conceiving that being doubled and trebled, it would make the tye of Allegeance the stronger: wherein nothing pleased him so much, as that Stephen, Earle of Blois, was the first man that tooke the Oath, because he was knowne to be, at least knowne he might be, a Pretender. But the King should have considered that Nulla fides Regni, and therefore no Oath, though never so often iterated, sufficient to warrant loyalty in persons so deeply interessed, as Stephen was: yet providence could doe no more, and the King was well satisfied with it; especially when hee saw his daughter a mother of two sonnes: for this, though it gave him not assurance, yet it gave him assured hope to have the Crowne perpetuated in his Posterity.

Of Ireland in his time.

THE King of England as yet had nothing to doe with Ireland; the Country was governed by its owne Kings: and the people of both Nations, though they were neighbours, yet divided by a rough Sea, but little acquainted; but now beganne entercourse to be more frequented: and Murchardach, chiefe King of the Irish, bore such awfull respect to King Henry, that he would doe nothing but by his counsell, and with his good liking.

Whom King Henry used as his Vicegerent in his absence.

HE was absent sometimes in Normandy, three or foure yeares together; during which times, he committed commonly the care of the Realme to Roger Bishop of Salisbury, a politick Prelate; and one as fit to be the second in government, as King Henry to be the first.

His perſonage and conditions.

HE was a perſon tall and ſtrong, broad breaſted, his limbes well knit, and fully furniſhed with fleſh; his face well faſhioned, his colour cleare, his eyes large and faire, his eye-browes large and thick, his haire black, and ſomewhat thinne towards his forehead; his countenance pleaſant, ſpecially when he was diſpoſed to mirth. A private man, vilified, and thought to have but little in him: but come to the Crowne, never any man ſhewed more excellent abilities: ſo true is the ſaying, Magiſtratus indicat virum. His naturall affection in a direct line was ſtrong, in an oblique, but weake; for no man ever loved children more, nor a brother leſſe. Though a King in act, yet he alwayes acted not a King, but in battels ſometimes the part of a common Souldier, though with more then common valour: as at a battell in France, where he ſo farre hazarded himſelfe, that though he loſt not his life, yet he loſt his bloud.

Of his death and buriall.

A Diſcontent of minde upon ſome differences between him and his ſonne in law, the Earle of Anjou, brought upon him a diſtemper, which encreaſed by eating, againſt his Phyſitians adviſe, of a Lamprey; a meate alwayes pleaſing to him, but never agreeing with him; caſt him into a feaver, which in few dayes put a period to his life: So certaine it is, that one intemperate action is enough to overthrow the temperance of a whole life; as of this King Henry it is ſaid, that he ſeldome did eat but when he was hungry, never did drink but when he was thirſty: yet this but once yeelding to his ſenſuall appetite, made him forfeit all benefit of his former abſtinence: though ſome write he tooke his death by the fall off his horſe. He died upon the firſt of December at night, in the yeare 1135. when he had Raigned five and thirty yeares, lived threeſcore and ſeven. His bowels, braines, and eyes, were buried at Roan in Normandy where he died: the reſt of his body was ſtuffed with Salt, wrapped in Oxe hides, and brought over into England, and with honourable Exequies, buried in the Monaſtery of Reading, which himſelfe had founded. His Phyſitian that tooke out his braines, with the intolerable ſtinch ſhortly after died. In this King Henry ended the line of the Normans, as touching the Heires Males, and then came in the French, by the title of Heires generall.

Men of note in his time.

MEn of learning in his time were many: firſt, Stephen Harding a Benedictine Monke, who was Founder of the Ciſtercian Order. Then Anſelme, Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, who beſides his activeneſſe in matters of State, writ many great and learned bookes. Then Walter Calone, Arch-deacon of Oxford, who delivered a Hiſtory written in the Britiſh tongue, from Brute to Cadwallader, to Geoffry of Monmouth to tranſlate, and added forty yeares of his owne time. Alſo Florentius a Monke of Worceſter, who writ Duorum Geſtis Anglorum. Alſo Eadmerus, a Monke of Canterbury, who beſides other works, writ the Hiſtory of his owne time, under the two Williams and Henry the firſt.

THE RAIGNE OF KING STEPHEN.

AFter the deceaſe of King Henry, preſently ſteps upon the Stage of Royalty, Stephen Earle of Boleyne, Sonne to Stephen Earle of Blois, by Adela, Daughter of King William the Conqueror; and though there were two other before him, Maude the Empreſſe, and Theobald his elder Brother, She in a ſubſtantiall right, He in a colourable, yet taking advantage of being Primus Occupans, the firſt Invader, (as being quickly here after King Henries death, where the other ſtayed lingring about other Affaires) he ſolicits all the Orders of the Realme, Biſhops, and Lords, and People, to receive him for their Soveraine: wherein beſides his owne large promiſes, what great matters he would do for them all, he had the aſſiſtance alſo of Henry his Brother, Biſhop of Wincheſter and the Popes Legate, and of Roger, Biſhop of Saliſbury, his great friend: (two the moſt powerfull men at that time in the State) who partly by force of Reaſons, but more indeed by force then Reaſons, procure the State to accept him for their King, and ſo upon Saint Stephens day, in Anno 1135. he was Crowned at Weſtminſter, in preſence of but three Biſhops, few of the Nobility, and not one Abbot, by William Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, with great ſolemnity. That which put a ſcruple in mens minds, and made them averſe at firſt, from conſenting to Stephen, was the Oath they had taken to receive King Henries Daughter Maude to be their Queen, after his deceaſe; but the weight of this ſcruple was ſomething abated, when it was urged, that no Precedent could be ſhewed, that ever the Crowne had beene ſet upon a Womans head. And Roger, Biſhop of Saliſbury, brought another Reaſon, becauſe they had taken that Oath but upon condition, that the King ſhould not marry her out of the Realme without their conſents, and the King having broken the condition, was juſt cauſe to nullifie their Obligation: to which was added, that the Oath having beene exacted by Authority, which is a kind of forcing, it might have the Plea of Per minas, and therefore void. And yet more then all theſe, Hugh Bigot, ſometime Steward to King Henry, immediately after his deceaſe, came over into England, and tooke a voluntary Oath before divers Lords of the Land, that he was preſent a little before King Henries death, when he adopted and choſe his Nephew Stephen to be his Succeſſour, becauſe his Daughter Maude had grievouſly at that time diſpleaſed him. But howſoever their breach of Oath was thus palliated, it is certaine that many of them, as well Biſhops as other Lords, came afterward to an evill end, at leaſt to many calamities before their end.

What courſe he tooke to eſtabliſh himſelfe in the Kingdome.

IT is a true ſaying, Iuvenibus optime ſervatur Imperium, quibus paratur, and this was Stephens courſe, he got the kingdome by Promiſes, and he eſtabliſht it by Perſon-

Performances; he pleased the People with easing them of Taxes and Impositions; He pleased the Clergy with forbearing to keepe Bishopricks and Abbeyes Vacant, and with exempting them from the Authority of the Temporall Magistrate; He pleased the Nobility with allowing them to build Castles upon their owne Lands; He pleased the Gentry with giving them liberty to hunt the Kings Deere in their owne Woods; and besides with advancing many of them in Honours: and for his Brother Theobald, who being the elder, was before him in preference to the Crowne, he pleased him with a grant to pay him two thousand Markes a yeare; and then to strengthen himselfe abroad no lesse then at home, he marryed his Son Eustace to Constance a Daughter of Lewis King of France, which alliance alone might be thought a sufficient security against all Opposition. And yet one thing more, which established him more then these, at least these the more for this, that he had seised upon King Henries treasure, which amounted to a hundred thousand pound, besides Plate and Jewels of inestimable value, which he spent not in vaine riot, but imployed to his best advantage, both in procuring of Friends, and in levying of Souldiers out of Britany and Flanders.

Of his Troubles in his Raigne.

THere may wel be made a Chapter of the troubles of his Raign, seeing his whole Raign was in a manner but one continued trouble, at least no longer intermissio, then as to give him breath against new encounters; til at last, when he grew towards his last, he rather left to be in trouble, then was at quiet, being forced to make his adversary his Heire; and to leave his Crown to him that had sought his life. For he was no sooner set in his Chaire of State, but he was presently disquieted and made to rise, by the provocation of David King of Scots, who solicited by some Lords of England, but chiefly by Maude the Empresse (whose Right he had sworne to defend) with a mighty Army entred Northumberland, tooke Carlile, and Newcastle, and was proceeding further, till King Stephen with a greater Army comming against him, yet rather bought his Peace then wonne it; for to recover Newcastle out of his hands, he was faine to let King David hold Cumberland, and his Sonne Henry the Earledome of Huntington, as their Inheritance; for which, the Father would not for his, as being engaged, but the Sonne for his, as being free, did Homage to King Stephen.

No sooner was this trouble over, but he was presently under another; for being falne somewhat ill at ease, it was bruited abroad that he was dead; which so distracted mens mindes, that every one thought it wisdome to shift for himselfe; and the Great Lords made a contrary use of Castles, to that which King Stephen intended, when he gave liberty to build them; for the King intended them for his owne defence against his Enemies, and they made use of them in their owne defence against the King; for now Hugh Bigot Earle of Norfolke possesseth himselfe of Norwich, Baldwyn Rivers of Oxford, and Robert Quelquerius of other Castles. In these difficulties King Stephen, though he could not in person be in all places at once, yet in care he was, and there most, where was most danger; imploying others against the rest; Against Baldwyn he went himselfe, whom, driven before out of Oxford, and gotten to the Isle of Wight, the King followed and drove him also from thence, and at last into Exile.

And now England afforded him once againe to take a little breath, but then Normandy presently begins with him a fresh. For now Geoffrey Plantagenet Duke of Anjou, in right of Maude his Wife, enters upon his Townes there, and seekes to get possession of the Country, when King Stephen passeth over with an Army, and arrests his proceeding: and after some small defeates of his Enemies, brings the matter at last to a pecuniary Composition: He to pay the Duke five thousand Markes a yeare, and the Duke to relinquish his claime to Normandy. This done, he returnes into England, where new Commotions are attending him. For the Lords in his absence, resenting his breach of Promises, upon which they had admitted mitted him to the Crowne, make use every one of their Castles, and stand upon their Guard: The Lord Talbot held Hereford; Earle Robert Mauds Brother, Bristow; William Lovell, the Castle of Cary; Paganell, the Castle of Ludlow; William Mounc, the Castle of Dunster; Robert Nicholor of Lincolne, the Castle of Warham; Eustace the Sonne of John, the Castle of Melton; William the Sonne of Alan, the Castle of Shrewsbury; and withall David King of Scots, never regarding his former agreement, enters Northumberland with an Army, committing so great cruelty, in ravishing of Maydes, murthering of Infants, slaughtering of Priests, even at the Altar, that never any barbarous Nation committed greater. Thus the kingdome from the one end to the other was in Combustion, that if the King had had as many hands as Briareus, there would have beene worke enough for them all. Yet all this dismayed not the King, but as having learned this Lesson, Tu ne cede malis, sed contra audentior ito, growes the more in confidence, the lesse he was in assurance; and as if danger were the fuell of Courage, the more erected in himselfe, the lesse he was upheld by others; and so, venturing what his Rebels at home would doe in his absence, he passeth himselfe in person against David King of Scots; as being the most dangerous, and therefore the first to be represt: but finding it hard to draw him to a Battell, and impossible without a battell to doe any good upon him; he leaves the care of that quarrell to Thurstine Arch-bishop of Yorke, and returnes himselfe home, if it may be called home, where he scarce had a safe place to put his head in. But though many Lords were Rebellious against him, yet some there were stucke firmely to him, by whose Assistance and his owne industry, partly by inticements, partly by inforcements, he reduced most of them to Obedience, and all of them to Submission; when in the meane time Thurstine Arch-bishop of Yorke; and in his sicknesse, Ralph Bishop of Durham, assisted with William Earle of Aumerle, William Piperell of Nottingham, and Hubert de Lacy, fought a memorable Battell against David King of Scots; wherein though King David himselfe, and his Sonne Henry performed wonderfull Acts of Prowesse, yet the English got the Victory, with the slaughter of eleven thousand Scots in the Fight, besides many other slaine in the flight; where of the English none of account were slaine, but onely a Brother of Hubert Lacyes, and some small number of Common Souldiers. This Victory infinitely pleased and comforted King Stephen, who not long after to make an absolute suppression of the Scots, passeth againe with an Army, and inforceth King David to demand a Peace, delivering his Sonne Henry into King Stephens hands for a pledge; and comming homeward, by the way he besieged Ludlow, one of Rebels nests, where Prince Henry of Scotland had beene taken Prisoner, if King Stephen in his owne person had not rescued him.

After this, once againe the King got a little breathing time, but it was but to prepare him for greater Encounters: For now Maud the Empresse her selfe in person comes into play; in whom the Oath before taken was to have its tryall; for till now, though never so really intended, yet it could not actually be performed; for how could they receive her for Queene, who came not in place to be received? but now that she came in person, now was the time of tryall, how the Oath would worke, and worke it did indeed with many, and that strongly; For Maude comming into England, with Robert Earle of Glocester her Brother; was most joyfully received at Arundell Castle, by William de Aubigny, who had marryed Adelida the Queene Dowager of the late King Henry, and had the said Castle and County assigned her for her Dower. King Stephen having intelligence hereof, commeth to Arundell Castell with an Army, and besiegeth it; but either diverted by ill counsell, or else finding the Castle to be inexpugnable, he left the siege, and suffered the Empresse to passe to Bristow. The King hearing, that Ranulph Earle of Chester, Sonne in law to Robert Earle of Glocester, had possest himselfe of the City of Lincolne, thither he goeth with an Army and besiegeth it: thither also came the said Earle of Chester, and Robert Earle of Glocester to raise his siege; at which time, a most fierce battell was fought betweene them, upon Candlemas day; wherein it is memorable what wonders of valour King Stephen performed; For, when all his men about him were either fled or slaine; yet he kept the field himselfe alone: no man daring to come neare him: Horrentibus inimicis incomparabilem ictuum ejus immanitatem, saith Hoveden: yet over-mastered at last by multitude, he was taken prisoner, and brought to Maude the Empresse; who sent him to be kept in safe custody in the Castle of Brissow, where he remained till All-hollantide after. And now the Empresse having gotten King Stephen into her hands, she takes her journey to London; received in all places, as she went, peaceably, and at London joyfully; where Queene Matild made humble suite unto her, for the liberty of King Stephen her husband; and that he might but be allowed to live a private life: the Londoners also made suite to have the Lawes of King Edward restored; but the Empresse not onely rejected both their suites, but returned them answers in harsh and insulting language; Indeed most unseasonably; and which gave a stop to the current of all her fortunes: for Queene Matild finding thereby, how high the Empresse pulses did beate; sent presently to her Sonne Eustace, being then in Kent, to raise Forces with all speed, with whom, the Londoners, as much discontented as she, doe afterwards joyne; and Henry Bishop of Winchester, as much discontented as either of them, fortifies his Castles at Waltham and Farnham; and specially Winchester, where he stayes himselfe, attending upon what Coast the next wind of the Empresse would blow. Of all these things the Empresse had intelligence, and thereupon secretly in the night she fled to Oxford, sending streight charge, to have King Stephen more narrowly watched, more hardly used; put (as some write) into fetters; and fed with very bare and poore Commons; withall she sends to her Unkle David Kings of Scots, to come unto her with all speed possible, who comming accordingly, they fall into consultation what is first to be done; the lot fals upon Winchester, as being their greatest adversary, now, no lesse in apparence then in power: so Winchester they besiege; which Queene Matild hearing, she with her Sonne Eustace and the Londoners, come presently to the succour, where a fierce battell being fought, the end was, that the party of Queene Matild prevailed, and the Empresse to make her escape, was faine to be laid upon a Horse backe in manner of a dead Corps, and so conveyed to Glocester; while Earle Robert her brother disdaining to flie, was taken Prisoner, whom Queene Matild caused to be used the more hardly, in retaliation of the hard usage which the Empresse before had shewed to King Stephen. Things standing in these termes, propositions were made by the Lords for pacification, but such were the high spirits of the Empresse, and her brother Robert, that no conditions would please them, unlesse the Empresse might enjoy the Crowne. But after long debate, whether by agreement betweene themselves, or by connivence of the keepers, both King Stephen and Earle Robert got to be at liberty. When the first thing King Stephen did, was to looke out the Empresse, to requite the kindnesse she had shewed him in prison; and hearing her to be at Oxford, he layes siege to the Towne, and brings the Empresse to such distresse, that she had no way to free her selfe but by flight; and no way to flee but with manifest danger, yet she effected it by this devise: It was in the Winter season, when frost and snow covered all the ground over; she therefore clad her selfe, and her foure servants that were with her in white cloathes, which being of the colour of Snow, made her passe the Watches without being discerned, and by this meanes came safe to her friends at Wallingford. Yet Mamesbury who lived at that time, confesseth he could never learne certainely by what meanes she made her escape. But howsoever she escaped this present danger; yet it left such an impression of feare upon her, that she never after had any mind to appeare upon this stage of Warre, but left the prosecution of it to her Sonne Henry, who was now about sixteene yeares of age, and being forward of his age, and able to beare Armes; was by his great Unkle David King of Scots, Knighted, to make him more forward.

It was now the ninth yeare of King Stephens Raigne, when Ralph Earle of Chester, keeping possession of the City of Lincolne, was in the night time assaulted by the King; but the Earle perceiving the Kings Forces to be but small, suddenly issued forth, and repelled the King with the slaughter of fourescore of his men. Yet two yeares after this, the Earle was reconciled to the King, and came of his owne accord to waite upon him, when perfidiously he was detained by the King; and not set at liberty, till he had surrendred into the Kings hands all the Castles that were in his possession; which though it brought the King some present benefit, yet it wrought him a greater future losse; for it lost him his credite with all men, and no man afterward would trust his word.

Now was Duke Henry come to the age of nineteene yeares, and was in possession of the Dukedome of Anjou, by the death of his Father Geoffrey Plantagenet; and not long after this, he marryed Eleanor the Daughter and Heire of William Duke of Guyen, by whom he had that Dutchy, and also the Earledome of Poicton: Normandy he had by his Mother; but more by the peoples inclination. So as being possest now of foure great Principalities, this greatnesse of Estate added to the greatnesse of his spirit, made him aspiring to recover his Right in England; and over he comes, bringing with him but small Forces, but promising himselfe great, from the people of this kingdome: and many indeed resorted to him; with whom he fell presently, and besieged Marleborough; but by the Kings greater Forces was repelled.

After this, their Armies continued in the field still; rather watching advantages to be doing, then doing any thing; sometimes advancing when no Enemy was neare, and then retiring when the Enemy came; till at last it was like to come to a set Battell, when suddenly Eustace King Stephens onely Sonne unfortunately dyed: Unfortunately for himselfe, but fortunately for the kingdome; For now King Stephen being left destitute of issue to succeed, was the more easily drawne to conditions of Peace, as likewise the Empresse Maude, having lately lost her Brother Robert Earle of Glocester, and Miles Earle of Hereford, (her two best Champions) was no lesse willing of Peace then he; which being furthered by the Lords of both sides, was at last concluded upon these conditions, that Stephen should hold the kingdome of England during his life, and adopt Duke Henry as his Heire to succeed him. And this agreement thus made, and in a Parliament at Winchester confirmed; Duke Henry ever after accounted King Stephen no lesse then a Father, and King Stephen, Duke Henry no lesse then a Sonne: and well he might; if it be true which some write, that the Empresse, when a Battell was to be fought betweene King Stephen and her Sonne, went privily to him, asking him how he could find in his heart to fight against him that was his owne Sonne? could he forget the familiarity he had with her in her first Widow-hood? But this was no matter for the Writers of that time to deliver: It touched too neare the interest of Princes then in being: and Princes must not be touched while they live, nor when they are dead neither with uncertainties, as this could be no other: But howsoever it was, certaine it is, that after this Agreement betweene King Stephen and Duke Henry, they continued in mutuall love and concord, as long after as they lived.

But what became of Maude the Empresse at this time? For, that she was alive, and lived many yeares after this agreement betweene King Stephen and her Sonne Henry, all Writers agree; and to say that she consented to the Agreement, without any provision made for her selfe, is to make her too much a Woman; a very weake vessell: and to say there might be provision made, though it be not Recorded, is to make all Writers defective in a great excesse. And besides, being so stirring a woman as she was, that upon a suddaine she should be so quiet, as not to deserve to have one word spoken of her, in all the long time she lived after, (being no lesse then twelve or thirteene yeares) is as strange as the rest. And if she placed her contentment so wholly in her Sonne, that in regard of him, she regarded not her selfe at all; It deserves at least the Encomium of such a motherly love as is very unusuall, and not alwayes safe. Whatsoever it was, I must be faine to leave it as a Gordian knot, which no Writer helpes me to unty.

OF Taxations in his time, there is no mention made; for Taxations indeed, are properly drawne from a body of State when it is entire, where the State all this Kings time was altogether in Fractions. But what he wanted in Taxations, he supplyed with Confiscations, which by reason of the many revoltings of men of all sorts, could not chuse but fill his Coffers; every Rebellion being in nature of a Purchase to him, for whatsoever became of the Persons, their Lands and Goods were sure to be his. And if it happened at any time, that Confiscations came in but slowly, he had then devises to hasten their pace, for upon light suggestions (not so much oftentimes as just suspitions) he would call men into question, and seise upon their good, as in the case particularly of Ralph Bishop of Salisbury; and it may not be unpleasing to heare from what beginning this Bishop grew to such a height of greatnesse, which was thus; In the time of King William Rufus, he was a poore Priest, serving a Cure in a village neare to Caen in Normandy, when the Kings younger Brother Henry chanced to passe that way, and to make some stay in the said Village, who being desirous to heare a Masse, this Roger being Curate, was the man to say it; which he dispatched with such celerity, that the Souldiers (who commonly love not long Masses) commended him for it, telling their Lord, that there could not a fitter Priest be found for men of warre then he. Whereupon Henry appointed him to follow him, and when he came to be King, preferred him to many great places, and at last to be Chancellour of England, and Bishop of Salisbury. You have heard his rising, now heare his fall; When King Stephen came to the Crowne, he held this man in as great account as his Predecessour King Henry had done, and perhaps in greater; For being a great begger of Suites, the King would say of him, If this man will never give over asking, neither shall I ever give over giving. Yet this great Prelate fell first through Pride into Envy, and then through Envy into Ruine. For King Stephen having given liberty to build Castles, this man did so farre exceed all others in magnificence (for he builded the Castles of Salisbury, the Vyes, Sherburne, Mamesbury and Newarke, to which there were no Structures comparable in the kingdome) that the Lords out of envy put it into the Kings head, that these Castles of his were built thus magnificently for entertainment of Maude the Empresse: which so possessed the King, or he would be thought to be so possessed, that taking this for a just cause, he seised them all into his hands, and forty thousand Markes besides, which he had in money: and not contented with this, he tooke the like course also with Alexander Bishop of Lincolne, onely because he was his Nephew and of his neare kindred. Another way he had for gaining of money: For in the first yeare of his Raigne, having given liberty to hunt in his Foresta, he afterward at Oxford caused many to be impleaded for using that liberty; a tricke which perhaps he learned from hunting, First to give men leave to doe a thing, and then to Fine them for having done it. But this is the priviledge of Princes, that their leave must be interpreted by him that gives it, and not by him that takes it.

Lawes and Ordinances in his time.

HE gave licence to the City of Norwich to have Coroners and Bayliffes, before which time, they had onely a Sergeant for the King to keepe Courts; and after this, in the 37. yeare of King Henry the third, they had license to inclose the Towne with Ditches.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

VPon the Kings seising into his hands, the Bishop of Salisburies Castles, and Goods, complaint was made, and a Synod called by the Bishop of Winchester

ster the Popes Legate, to right the Bishop, where the King was cited to appeare; who sending to know the cause, Answer was made, that it was to answer for his imprisoning of Bishops, and depriving them of their Goods, which being a Christian King he ought not to doe. The King replies by his Lawyer, Alveric de Ver, that he had not arrested the Bishop of Salisbury as a Bishop, but as his Servant, that was to make him accompt of his imployment. To this the Bishop answereth, that he was never Servant or Accomptant to the King: and many Allegations and Probations were urged to and fro, but in conclusion the Synod brake up, and nothing was done. The Bishops durst not Excommunicate the King without the Popes privity; so in the end they fell from Authority to Submission; and in the Kings Chamber fell downe at his Feet, beseeching him he would pity the Church; and not suffer dissention to be betweene the Kingdome and the Priest-hood. And this was no small magnanimity in the King, that he was able to pull downe the high stomachs of the Prelates in that time. In the eighth yeare of his Raigne a Synod was held in London by Henry Bishop of Winchester, where it was decreed, that whosoever should lay violent hands upon any Clergy man, should not be absolved but by the Pope himselfe: and from this time forward, Clergy men were exempt from the secular power. In the tenth yeare of his Raigne, by the soliciting of Saint Bernard, many tooke upon them the Crosse, for a supply to the Holy Land, amongst whom, some English Lords also.

Workes of piety done by him, or by others in his time.

HE Founded the Abbeys of Cogshall in Essex; of Furneys in Lancashire; of Hurguilers and Feversham in Kent; at Heigham in Kent, a House of blacke Nunnes; also an house for Nunnes at Carew: His Queene Matild builded the Hospitall of Saint Katherines by the Tower of London: A knight called Sir William of Mount Fitchet, Founded the Abbey of Stratford Langthorne, within foure miles of London. William of Ypre Founded Boxeley Abbey in Kent; Robert Earle of Ferrers, Founded the Abbey of Merivall in Warwickshire; and in the same Shire, Robert Earle of Gloceſter, the Abbey of Nonne Eaten. Also by others were Founded the Abbeys of Tilley; of Rievall; of Newborough and Beeland; of Garedon in Leycestershire; of Kirkstead in Yorkeshire: and divers others in other places, so that more Abbeys were erected in his dayes, then had beene within the space of a hundred yeares before.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE married, by his Unkle King Henries meanes, Matild, Daughter and Heire of Eustace Earle of Boleyne, a Woman made for the proportion of both Fortunes: In adversity not dejected; in prosperity not elated: while her Husband was at liberty, a Woman; during his durance, as it were a Man; Acting his part for him when he was restrained from acting it himselfe; not looking that Fortune should fall into her lappe, but industrious to procure it. By this Queene, he had onely one Sonne named Eustace, a Prince more then of hope, for he lived to the blossoming of much Valour, though it came not to maturity, as being cut off at eighteene yeares of age, some say, by drowning, and some by a stranger accident. But strange Relations must not alwayes be rejected, for though many of them be forged, yet some no doubt are true; and who knowes but it may be of this kind, which some Writers relate of the death of this Prince: that being at the Abbey of Bury in Norfolke, and denyed some money he required to have had; he presently in a rage went forth, and set fire on the Cornefields belonging to the Abbey, but afterwards sitting downe to dinner, at the first morsell of bread he put into his mouth, he fell into a fit of madnesse, and in that fit dyed? Certainely, the Persons of Princes are for more observation then ordinary people; and as they make Examples, so they are sometimes made Examples. This Prince Eustace was so beloved of his father, that he had a purpoſe to have joyned him King with himſelfe, but that the Pope upon the Biſhops complaining to him of it, diverted him from it. Howſoever being dead, he was buried in Feverſham Abbey, where his mother was buried a little before. Other legitimate iſſue King Stephen had none, but by a Concubine he had a ſonne named William, whom he made Earle of Norfolke, which honour was confirmed upon him, by a ſpeciall Article, in the agreement made betweene King Stephen and Duke Henry: Onely a French Chronicle ſpeakes of another ſonne of his, named Gervaſe, made Abbot of Weſtminſter, and that hee died in the yeare 1160. and was there buried.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

HE was tall of ſtature, of great ſtrength, and of an excellent good complexion. Concerning the qualities of his minde, there was apparent in him a juſt mixture of valour and prudence; for if he had not had both, hee could never have held out with ſuch weake friends as he did, againſt ſuch potent adverſaries as he had. And ſpecially it muſt be confeſt, he was of an excellent temper for a ſouldier, ſeeing he never kild any enemy in cold blood, as Anthonie did Cicero; nor any friend in hot blood, as Alexander did Clitus. What he would have beene in Peace, we are left to Judge by onely a Patterne, the ſhort time betweene his agreement with Duke Henry and his death: which ſeeing he ſpent in travelling to all parts of the Realme, and ſeeking to ſtitch up the breaches which the violence of Warre had made; we may well thinke, that if his life had beene continued, he would have given as good Proofes of his Juſtice in Peace, as he had done of his Valour in Warre. For of his extraordinary good nature we have a ſufficient example in one Action of his, which was this: Duke Henry being on a time, in ſome ſtraights for money, ſent to his Mother Maude the Empreſſe, deſiring her to furniſh him, but ſhe anſwered, that ſhe was in as great ſtraights her ſelfe, and therefore could not do it; then he ſent to his Unkle Earle Robert to furniſh him, and he anſwered, he had little enough to ſerve his owne turne, and therefore could not doe it; at laſt he ſent to King Stephen, and he though an Adverſary, and ſtanding in termes of oppoſition, yet ſent preſently and ſupplyed him with it. He was withall a great oppugner of Superſtition, which made him on a time to ride into Lincolne with his Crowne upon his head, onely to breake the people of a ſuperſtitious opinion they held, that no King could enter into that City in ſuch manner, but that ſome great dyſaſter would fall upon him. One ſpeciall Vertue may be noted in him, that he was not noted for any ſpeciall vice, whereof if there had beene any in him, Writers certainly would not have beene ſilent.

Of his death and buriall.

AS a Fiſh cannot live out of Water, no more was it in the Deſtiny of this King, to live out of trouble; as ſoone as he came to enjoy quietneſſe, he left to enjoy life, no more time left him betweene his Agreement with Duke Henry and his Death, but onely ſo much as might reaſonably ſerve him to take his laſt leave of all his Friends; For it was but from January to October, and the laſt Friend he tooke leave of, was Theodoricke Earle of Flanders, whom he met at Dover, and as ſoone as he had diſmiſſed him, he was ſuddenly taken with the Iliake Paſſion, and with an old diſeaſe of the Emeraulds: and dyed in the Monaſtery there, the five and twentyeth of October, in the yeare 1154. when he had Raigned almoſt nineteene yeares, Lived nine and forty; and was Buryed in the Abbey of Feverſham, which he had Founded.

Men

Men of note in his time.

OF Clergy men, there was Thurſtine Arch-biſhop of Yorke, and Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter the Kings Brother, alſo William, another Arch-biſhop of Yorke, whom we may finde in the Calender of Saints, as likewiſe Saint Bernard who lived in this time, though not of this Country, and if we may reckon ſtrangers, there lived at this time, Peter Lombard, Maſter of the Sentences; Peter Comeſter, writer of the Eccleſiaſticall Story; and Gratian, Compiler of the Canon Law, all three Brothers, and all three Baſtards; alſo Avicen, Averroes, Meſues, and Rabbi Salomon were in this time famous. Of military men, there was Ranulph Earle of Cheſter; Reynold Earle of Cornwall; Robert Earle of Leyceſter; Hugh Bigot, Earle of Norfolke, but ſpecially Robert Earle of Gloceſter, the Kings baſe Sonne, whoſe praiſes, if any deſire to heare ſounded out to the full, let him read William of Malmesbury, who writ the Hiſtory of thoſe times, of purpoſe to be his Trumpet. Of the Writers of our Nation, there was this William of Malmesbury, Henry Huntington, Simon Dunelmenſis, William Revellenſis, and Geoffrey of Monmouth, Biſhop of Saint Aſaph in Wales. Alſo Hugo Carthuſianus, a Burgundian, but made Biſhop of Lincolne here in England.

THE LIFE and RAIGNE OF KING HENRY THE SECOND.

KING Stephen being dead, Henry Duke of Anjou, by his Father Geoffry Plantagenet, succeeded him in the Kingdome of England by agreement; whom he preceded by right, as being Sonne and Heire of Mawde, sole daughter and Heire of King Henry the first; and was crowned at Westminster, by Theobald Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, on the seventeenth of December, in the yeare 1155. and was now a greater Prince then any of his Ancestours had beene before: and indeed, the Kingdome of England, the Dukedome of Normandy, and the Dukedome of Anjou in his owne right; and in the right of his wife Queen Eleanor, the Duchy of Guyen, and the Earldome of Poictou, being all united in his person, made him a Dominion of a larger extent then any King Christian had at that time.

He was borne at Ments in Normandy, in the yeare 1132. a great joy to his Father Geoffry, Duke of Anjou; a greater to his Mother Mawde the Empresse; but so great to his Grandfather King Henry the first, that it seemed to make amends for his sonne William, whom unfortunately he had lost before by Shipwrack. The yeares of his childhood were spent at home under the care of his Parents: at nine yeares old or there abouts, he was brought by his Unkle Robert Earle of Glocester into England, and placed at Bristow, where under the tuition of one Matthew his Schoolemaster, to instruct him in learning, he remained foure yeares, after which time he was sent into Scotland, to his great Unkle David King of Scots, with whom he remained about two yeares, initiated by him in the Principles of State, but chiefely of his owne estate: and being now about fifteene yeares of age, was by him Knighted, and though scarce yet ripe for Armes, yet as a fruit gathered before its time, was mellowed under the discipline of his Unkle Robert, one of the best Souldiers of that time. And now the Duke his Father not able any longer to endure his absence, sent with great instance to have him sent over to him; for satisfying of whose longing, Earle Robert provided him of passage, and conducted him himselfe to the Sea side, where he tooke his last farewell of him. Being come into Anjou, his Father, perhaps over-joyed with his presence, not long after died, leaving him in present possession of that Dukedome, being now about nineteene yeares of age: when shortly after he married Eleanor, late the wife of Lewis King of France, but now divorced. A yeare or two after he came againe into England, where after some velitations with King Stephen, they were at last reconciled, and his his succession to the Crowne of England, ratified by Act of Parliament. Not long after he went againe into France, and presently fell to besiege a Castle which was detained from him by the French King: in the time of which siege, newes was brought him of King Stephens death; which one would have thought should have made him hasten his journey into England; yet he resolved not to stirre till he had wonne the Caste: which resolution of his being knowne to the Defendants, they surrendred the Castle; but yet no sooner, but that it was sixe weekes after before he came into England, when he was now about the age of three and twenty yeares.

His first Acts after he came to the Crowne.

He beganne his Raigne as Solomon would have begunne it, if he had beene in his place: for, first he made choyce of wise and discreet men to be his Consellours: then he banished out of the Realme all strangers, and especially Flemmings, with whom the Kingdome swarmed; as of whom King Stephen had made use in his warres, amongst whom was William of Ypres, lately before made Earle of Kent. Castles which by King Stephens allowance had beene built, he caused to be demolished, (of which there were said to be eleven hundred and fifteene) as being rather Nurseries of rebellion to the subject, then of any safety to the Prince. He appointed the most able men of that profession, to reforme abuses of the Lawes, which disorder of the wars had brought in: He banished many Lords, who against their Oath had assisted King Stephen against him; as thinking that men once perjured, would never be faithfull: and to the end he might be the lesse pressing upon the people with Taxations, he resumed all such Lands belonging to the Crown, which had any way beene aliened or usurped; as thinking it better to displease a few then many: and many other things he did, which in a disjoynted State were no lesse profitable and expedient, then requisite and necessary.

He had no Competitors, nor Pretenders with him for the Crowne; and therfore his troubles at first were not in Capite, strooke not at the roote, as K. Stephens did: but were onely some certaine niblings at inferiour parts; till at last he brought them himselfe into his own bowels. For what was the trouble in his first yeare with the Welsh, but as an exercise rather to keep him in motion, then that it needed to disquiet his rest? for though they were mutinous for a time, while they looked upon their owne Bucklers, their Woods and Mountainous passages; yet as soone as K. Henry did but shew his sword amongst them, they were soone reduced to obedience for the present, and to agreater awfulnesse for the future. It is true, Henry Earle of Essex that bore the Kings Standard, was so assaulted by the Welsh, that he let the Standard fall to the ground, which encouraged the Welsh, and put the English in some feare, as supposing the King had beene slaine; but this was soone frustrated to the Welsh, and punished afterward in the Earle, by condemning him to be shorne a Monke, and put into the Abbey of Reading, and had his lands seised into the Kings hands. And what was his trouble with Malcolme King of Scots, but a worke of his owne beginning? for if he would have suffered him to enjoy that which was justly his owne, Cumberland and Huntingtonshire, by the grant of King Stephen, and Northumberland, by the gift of his Mother Maude the Empresse; he might have staied quietly at home, and needed not at all to have stirred his foote, but he could not endure there should be such parings off from the body of his Kingdome: and therefore went with an Army into the North, where he wonne not, but tooke Northumberland from him, with the City of Carleill, and the Castles of Newcastle and Bamberg: and meerely out of gratefulnesse, in remembrance of the many courtesies done him before, by David King of Scots; he left him the County of Huntington, but yet with condition to owe fealty, and to doe homage to him for it. And what was his trouble with his brother Geoffrey, but a Bird of his owne hatching? For his Father Geoffrey, Duke of Anjou, had three ſonnes, Henry, Geoffrey, and William; and dying he left his Dukedome of Anjou to his eldeſt ſon Henry, but to hold no longer then till he ſhould come to be King of England, and then to deliver it up to his ſecond ſonne Geoffrey: and he made his Lords to ſweare, not to ſuffer his body to be buried, untill his ſonne Henry had taken his Oath to doe it; which Oath Henry afterward, in reverence to his Fathers body, did take: but as he tooke it unwillingly, ſo he willingly brake it, and ſent preſently to Adrian the then Pope, for a Diſpenſation of his Oath: which granted, he enters Anjou with an Army, and takes from his brother Geoffrey, being little able to make reſiſtance, not onely the Dukedome of Anjou, but ſome other Cities alſo, which his Father had abſolutely given him for his maintenance: yet out of brotherly kindneſſe was content to allow him a Penſion of a thouſand pounds a yeare: which brotherly kindneſſe was ſo unkindly taken by his brother Geoffrey, that it brake his heart; and within a ſhort time after died.

And thus theſe troubles begun by Henry himſelfe, were ſoone ended; but now a trouble is comming on, begun by Lewis King of France, and this is like to ſtick longer by him. For King Lewis not having yet digeſted King Henries marriage with his divorced wife Eleanor, ſeekes all opportunities to expreſſe his ſpleene, by doing him diſpleaſure; and a fit opportunity was now offered: for there fell out a difference betweene Raymond Earle of Saint Giles, and Henry King of England, about the Earledome of Tholouſe, which Raymond poſſeſt, and Henry claimed: in this difference, King Lewis takes part with Raymond, as pretending it to be the juſter ſide. Hereupon are great forces provided on both ſides, and it was like to have come to a dangerous battell; but that by mediation of friends, a Peace was made; and to make the Peace the firmer, a marriage was concluded betweene Henry, King Henries eldeſt ſonne, ſcarce yet ſeven yeares of age; and Margaret, daughter of King Lewis, not paſt three: who was delivered to King Henry to bring up till fit yeares for conſummation. This was then thought a ſtrong linke to hold them in friendſhip, but it proved afterward a cauſe to make the greater breach: and indeed when a ſonne is once matched into a Family, the Father muſt never looke from thence afterward to have a good wiſh; ſeeing the daughter thus matched can have no advancement, but by the advancement of her husband; and he none, at leaſt, none ſo well, as by the ruine of his Father: yet this brake not out till ſome yeares after. It was now about the eighteenth yeere of King Henries Raigne, and his ſonne Henry growne to be ſeventeene yeares of age, when it came into the Kings minde to have his ſonne Henry crowned King, and Raigne with himſelfe in his owne time; partly out of indulgence to his ſonne, but chiefely, as having found by his owne experience, that Oaths for ſucceſſion are commonly eluded: but Oaths for preſent Allegeance, as being Verba de Præſenti, can have no evaſion: and pleaſing himſelfe with this conceit, he acquaints his Lords with his purpoſe, and cauſeth his ſonne Henry to be crowned King by the hands of Roger Arch-biſhop of Yorke; and all the Lords to ſweare Allegeance to him: at the Feaſt of which ſolemnity, King Henry to honour his ſonne, would needs carry up the firſt diſh to his Table; whereupon the Arch-biſhop Roger ſtanding by, and ſaying merrily to the new King: What an honour is this to you, to have ſuch a waiter at your Table? Why (ſaith he) what great matter is it for him that was but the ſonne of a Duke, to doe ſervice to me, that am the ſonne of a King and Queene? Which the old King hearing, began to repent him, now it was too late of that he had done. For indeed the honour which by Gods commandement, children are to doe to their Parents; is by ſuch making them their equals, in a manner aboliſhed; at leaſt it gives them ſtomachs to take more upon them then is fit. But King Henry paſſed it over, and meant to ſet the beſt ſide outward.

And now King Lewis tooke diſpleaſure that his daughter was not crowned as well as her husband, and therefore to ſatisfie him in that point, King Henry ſendeth his ſonne Henry and his wife Margaret into England, and cauſeth them both to be crowned crowned by Walter Arch-biſhop of Roan: and ſhortly after, the young King Henry and his wife goe backe to King Lewis her Father, and by him with great joy, and variety of ſports were entertained. In the time of their being there, King Lewis partly out of his old ſpleene to King Henry, and partly to make his ſonne in law more abſolute, fals oftentimes into conference with him, and finding his hot ſpirit to be fit tinder for ſuch fire, tels him, it was a ſhame he ſhould ſuffer himſelfe to be made a ſtale; have the title of a King, and not the authority: and that as long as he ſtood in ſuch termes, that which ſeemed an honour, was indeed a diſgrace. With which words of King Lewis, the young King Henry was ſet afloate, and from that time forward, ſtucke not openly to oppoſe his Father: whereof his Father having intelligence, ſent meſſengers to King Lewis, deſiring him from the King their Maſter, to be a meanes to bring his ſonne to more moderation. But King Lewis hearing the Embaſſadours name their Maſter King, with an angry countenance ſaid unto them; What mean you by this to call him King, who hath paſſed his Kingdome over to his ſon? and with this anſwer ſent them away. To this evill, another worſe was added: that Queene Eleanor his wife enraged with jealouſie of her husbands Concubines, both incenſeth her ſonne Henry, and perſwadeth alſo two other of her ſonnes, Richard and Geoffrey, to joyne againſt their Father; telling them, it would be better for them that their brother ſhould prevaile, who could not chuſe but allow them better maintenance, then their Father did. With theſe perſwaſions they paſſe over into Normandy, and joyne with their brother Henry; who emboldned by their aſſiſtance, growes now more inſolent then he was before; that when meſſengers were ſent to him from his Father, requiring him to lay downe his Armes, and to come lovingly to him: he proudly made anſwer, that his Father muſt not looke he would lay downe his Armes, unleſſe himſelfe firſt would lay downe his authority, and reſigne the Kingdome. And now Lewis King of France, calling together the great Lords of his Kingdome, and with them William King of Scots, Hugh Earle of Cheſter, Roger Mowbray, Hugh Pigot, and other of his ſonnes party; they all take their Oaths to aſſiſt the young King Henry with all their power; and thereupon all in one day, the French invade Normandy, Aquitaine and Britaine; the King of Scots Northumberland; and King Lewis the City of Vernoill, which he brought to that diſtreſſe, that it was agreed by the Inhabitants, if it were not ſuccoured within three dayes, then to ſurrender it. King Henry hearing of this agreement, promiſeth to ſuccour them by that day. But here King Lewis uſeth a trick, gets that by fraud, which he could not doe by force; for he ſends to King Henry, that if he were willing to have peace with his ſonnes, he ſhould meet him at a place appointed, at ſuch a time, and he doubted not to effect it. King Henry glad of ſuch an offer, and with that gladneſſe perhaps blinded, and not ſuſpecting any deceit, promiſeth to meete; and comming to the place at the day, which was the day he ſhould have ſuccoured Vernoill, he ſtayed there all day looking for King Lewis comming; who inſtead of comming, ſent word to Vernoill, that King Henry was defeated; and therefore their hope of ſuccour was in vaine: whereupon the Citizens thinking it to be ſo indeed, becauſe he came not according to his promiſe, ſurrendred the Towne: which King Lewis finding himſelfe unable to hold, ſet it on fire, and ſo departed. But King Henry when he perceived the fraud, followed him with his Army, and tooke a bloody revenge of his fraud, with the ſlaughter of many of his men. At the ſame time alſo King Henries forces encountred Hugh Earle of Cheſter, and Robert Fulger, who had taken Dole in Britaine, tooke them priſoners, and brought them to King Henry: and about the ſame time likewiſe in England, Robert Earle of Leyceſter thinking to ſurpriſe Raynold Earle of Cornwall, and Richard Lacy, King Henries Generals, at unawares, was himſelfe by them overthrowne, and the Towne of Leyceſter taken; which onely the ſite of the place defended from being battered to the ground. Robert Earle of Leyceſter being thus defeated, paſſeth over into France, and being ſupplied by King Lewis with greater forces then before, is together with Hugh Bigot ſent backe into England, to draw the Countrey to Henry the ſonnes party; who at firſt aſſault take Norwich: and then ſetting downe before Bury, they are in a great battell, by Richard Lucy, and other of King Henries Captaines, overthrowne with the ſlaughter of tenne thouſand men, and as many taken priſoners; amongſt whom Earle Robert himſelfe. Yet were not Roger Mawbray and Hugh Bigot ſo daunted with this overthrow, but that together with David the King of Scots brother, they gather new forces, and invade Northumberland and Yorkſhire, when Robert Scoccee, Ralph Granvile, William Veſci, and Barnard Bayliol (of whom Baynards Caſtle in London, firſt tooke the name) Knights of thoſe parts, aſſemble together, and fighting a great battell with them, overthrew them, and tooke the King of Scots priſoner, with many others. Yet is not Hugh Bigot daunted with this neither, but gathers new forces, and takes Norwich; and Robert Ferris, Nottingham: the newes whereof, when King Henry the ſonne heard, he recovered new ſpirits, and obtaining new aſſiſtance from King Lewis, prepares himſelfe afreſh for warre: which King Henry the Father hearing, returnes ſpeedily into England; and to appeaſe Saint Thomas Beckets Ghoſt, goes to viſit his Tombe, and there askes him forgiveneſſe. This done, he goes into Suffolke, and at Framingham Caſtle, which belonged to Hugh Bigot, ſtayes with his Army, when ſuddenly moved, by what inſtinct, no man knowes (unleſſe the appeaſing of Saint Thomas Ghoſt did worke it) both Hugh Bigot delivers up his Caſtle into King Henries hands, and likewiſe Roger Mawbray, Robert Ferris, and many others of that party, come voluntarily in, and ſubmit themſelves to the Kings mercy. Hereupon King Henry returnes to London, about which time he committed his wife Queene Eleanor to priſon, for her practiſes againſt him. In the meane time, King Lewis underſtanding that Normandy was but weakly guarded, together with his ſonne the young King Henry, and Philip Earle of Flaunders; he beſiegeth Roan, which the Kings forces valiantly defended, till he came himſelfe in perſon; and thereupon King Lewis deſpairing of any good to be done, ſends meſſengers to King Henry for a truce, and appointed a day to meete at Gyſors, where he doubted not to make a reconcilement betweene his ſons and him; K. Henry agreed willingly, but of the meeting nothing was done: It ſeemes it was but one of King Lewis his old tricks to come fairely off.

After this truce made with King Lewis, King Henry hearing that his ſon Richard had in the meane time poſſeſt himſelfe of a great part of the Province of Poictou, goes thither with an Army, where Richard at laſt, after ſome heſitation, as doubting his forces, ſubmits himſelfe to his Father, and askes his pardon; which his Father as freely grants, as if he had never committed any fault; and thereupon King Henry imployes him to King Lewis and his brother Henry, to perſwade them to peace: who wearied now with the warres, were eaſily drawne, and ſo reconciliation on all parts is made; and to confirme the reconciliation betweene the two Kings, Henry and Lewis, his daughter Adela is affianced to King Henries ſonne Richard, as Earle of Aquitaine, and becauſe the Lady was but young, ſhe was committed to the care of King Henry, till ſhe ſhould be fit for marriage. Upon this King Henry ſets Robert Earle of Leyceſter, and Hugh Earle of Cheſter, giving hoſtages and oath for their Allegeance, at liberty; and William alſo King of Scots, paying a certaine mulct; for which he delivered in pawne the ſtrong Caſtles of Berwick, Roxborough, and Sterling to King Henry, and was fined alſo to loſe the County of Huntington, and never to receive any Rebels into his protection. Theſe things done, the King with his ſonnes returnes into England, where with all joyfulneſſe they were received. It was now the yeare 1179. when King Lewis beganne againe to grow diſcontented with King Henry, becauſe his daughter was not yet married to his ſonne Richard, as was agreed: but King Henry making him promiſe to have them married within a few dayes, gave him ſatisfaction; though indeed he meant nothing leſſe, for it was thought he kept her for himſelfe, as with whom he had before that time, had unlawfull familiarity. The yeare after was memorable for nothing, or for nothing ſo much as the death of the young King Henry, who died then; whoſe Widow Margaret returning into France, was afterward married to Bela King of Hungary. Now King Henries ſonne Richard, no longer enduring to have his marriage delayed, which his Father often promiſed, but would never ſuffer ſuffer to be performed; fals into his old fit of diſcontentment: wherein though he cannot perhaps be juſtified, yet he may juſtly be excuſed, for to be kept from a wife at that time of his age, for which a wife was moſt proper; and eſpecially having beene affianced ſo long before, which could not chuſe but make his appetite the ſharper: muſt needs be, if not a juſt cauſe, at leaſt a ſtrong provocation to make him doe as he did: Howſoever, from this fit of diſcontentment, he fals into a relaps of Rebellion, and infecting with it his brother John, and a great part of his Fathers Adherents; they all take part with Philip (now after the deceaſe of Lewis) King of France, who willing to make uſe of their aſſiſtance, before the ſtreame of filiall awfulneſſe ſhould returne into the naturall Channell, takes them along with him, and beſiegeth the City of Ments, in which King Henry at that time was himſelfe in perſon; who apprehending the danger, and then reſenting the miſchiefe of falling into his enemies hands, gets him ſecretly out of the City, leaving it to defend it ſelfe, till he ſhould returne with greater forces: but hearing afterward that the Towne was taken, he fell into ſo great a diſtraction of minde, that it made him break out into theſe blaſphemous words; I ſhall never hereafter love God any more, that hath ſuffered a City ſo deare unto me, to be taken from me: but he quickly recollected himſelfe, and repented him that he had ſpoken the words. Indeed Ments was the City in which he was borne, that to have this City taken from him, was as much as to have his Birth-right taken from him; and to ſay the truth, after he had loſt this City, he ſcarce ſeemed to be alive; not onely becauſe he ſhortly after died, but becauſe the ſtate of Majeſty which had all his life accompanied him, after this forſooke him: for now he was faine to begge peace of his enemies, who often before had begged it of him: now he was glad to yeeld to conditions, which no force before could have wreſted from him. It is memorable and worth obſerving, that when theſe two Kings had meeting betweene Turwyn and Arras, for reconcilement of differences; there ſuddenly happened a Thunderbolt to light juſt betweene them, with ſo terrible a cracke, that it forced them for that time to breake off their conference: and afterward at another meeting, the like accident of Thunder happened againe, which ſo amazed King Henry, that he had fallen off his horſe, if he had not beene ſupported by thoſe about him; which could be nothing but drops let fall of the Divine anger, and manifeſt preſages of his future dyſaſters. And thus this great Princes troubles, which beganne in little ones, and were continued in great ones, ended at laſt in ſo great a trouble, that it ended his life, and left him an example of deſolation, notwithſtanding all his greatneſſe; forſaken of his friends, forſaken of his wife, forſaken of his children; and (if he were not himſelfe when he blaſphemed for the loſſe of Ments) forſaken of himſelfe; which might be exemplar in this King, if it were not the common Epilogue of all greatneſſe.

Of his Acqueſt of Ireland.

Robert Fits-ſtephen was the firſt of all Engliſhmen, after the Conqueſt, that entred Ireland, the firſt day of May, in the yeare 1170. with 390. men: and there took Werford, in the behalfe of Deruntius, ſonne of Marcherdach, called Mac Murg, King of Leymſter. In September following, Richard Earle of Chepſtow, ſurnamed Strong-bow, ſayled into Ireland with twelve hundred men, where he tooke Waterford and Dublin; and married Eeve, the daughter of Deruntius, as he was promiſed. From theſe beginnings, King Henry being then at reſt from all Hoſtile Armes, both at home and abroad, takes into his conſideration the Kingdome of Ireland, as a Kingdome which oftentimes afforded aſſiſtance to the French; and therefore purpoſing with himſelfe by all meanes to ſubdue it: he provides a mighty Army, and in the Winter ſeaſon ſaileth thither, taking Shipping at Pembroke, and landing neare to Waterford: where entring into conſultation what courſe was ſtreſt to be taken in the enterpriſe, ſuddenly of their owne accord, the Princes of the Countrey came in, and ſubmitted themſelves unto him, onely Rodorick King of Connacht ſtood out; who being the greatest, thought to make himselfe the onely King of that Nation: but King Henry forbearing him for the present, who kept himselfe in his fastnesses of Bogges and Woods, and was not to be followed in the Winter season: takes his journey to Dublin, the chiefe City of the Countrey; and there calling the Princes and Bishops of the Nation together, requires their consent to have him and his heires to be their King: which they affirming they could not doe without the Popes authority; to whom, at their first conversion to the Christian Religion, they had submitted themselves; the King sent presently to Adrian the then Pope an English man, requiring his assent; which upon divers good considerations he granted: and hereupon the King built him a stately Palace in the City of Dublin; and having thus without bloud possest himselfe of the Kingdome, the Spring following he returnes joyfully into England. About foure yeares after Rodorick also sends his Chancellour to King Henry, to offer his submission, with a tribute to be paid of every tenne beasts, one sufficient. After this, in the one and thirtieth yeare of his Raigne, he sent his sonne John to be the Governour there.

TAxations in his time, was chiefely once; when he tooke Escuage of Englishmen, towards his warres in France, which amounted to 12400. pounds: but confiscations were many, because many Rebellions, and every Rebellion was as good as a Mine. Also vacancies of Bishopricks and Abbeys, kept in his hands, sometimes many at once; no time without some. He resumed also all Lands which had either beene sold or given from the Crowne by his Predecessours: but a principall cause that made him plentifull in money, was his Parcimony; as when he was injoyned for a Penance, to build three Abbeys, he performed it, by changing Secular Priests into Regular Chanons, onely to spare cost. And it was not the least cause of alienating his sonnes from him; that he allowed them not maintenance answerable to their calling. And it could be nothing but Parcimony while he lived, which brought it to passe, that when he died, there were found in his Coffers, nine hundred thousand pounds besides Plate and Jewels.

Lawes and Ordinances in his time.

IN the beginning of his Raign, he refined and reformed the Lawes of the Realm; making them more tolerable & more profitable to his people then they were before. In the one and twentieth year of his Raign, he divided his whole kingdom into six severall Circuits; appointing in every Circuit three Judges, who twice every year should ride together, to heare and determine Causes between man and man: as it is at this day, though altered in the number of the Judges, and in the Shires of Circuit. In this Kings dayes the number of Jewes all England over was great: yet, wheresoever they dwelt, they might not bury any of their dead any where but in London; which being a great inconvenience to bring dead bodies oftentimes from farre remote places, the King gave them liberty of buriall in the severall places where they lived. It was in this Kings dayes also ordained that Clergy-men offending in hunting the Kings Deere, should be punishable by the Civill Magistrate, according to the Lawes of the Land; which order was afterward taken with them for any offence whatsoever they committed. Though it be not a Law, yet it is an Ordinance which was first brought in by this King, that the Lions should be kept in the Tower of London.

Affaires of the Church in his time.

THis Kings Raigne is famous for the contention of a Subject with the Prince, and though it may be thought no equall match, yet in this Example we shall find it hard to judge which of them had the victory. But before we come to speak of

of the Contention, it is fit to say something of the Man, and of the Quarrell. The man was Thomas Becket, borne in London, his Father, one Gilbert Becket, his Mother an outlandish Woman, of the Country of Syria. His first rising was under Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury, who taking a liking to him, (as one saith, no man knew for what) made him first Arch-deacon of Canterbury, and then used meanes to have him be the Princes Tutor, after that to be Chancellour of England, and after the decease of the said Theobald, was himselfe made Arch-bishop of Canterbury in his place. One memorable thing he did at his comming to be Archbishop, he surrendred his place of being Chancellour, as not thinking it fit to sit at the Helme of the Common-wealth, and of the Church, both at once. But now began the Contention betweene the King and him: the difference was, the King would have it ordained that Clergy men who were malefactors, should be tryed before the Secular Magistrate as Lay men were: This Becket opposed, saying, it was against the liberty of the Church, and therefore against the honour of God. Many Bishops stood with the King, some few with Becket the Contention grew long, and with the length still hotter, till at last Becket was content to assent to the Ordinance with this clause, Salvo Ordine suo: the King liked not the Clause, as being a deluding of the Ordinance: He required an absolute assent, without any clause of Reservation. At last, after many debatings and demurres, the Arch-bishop yeelds to this also, and subscribes the Ordinance, and sets his hand unto it. But going homewards, it is said, his Crosse-bearer and some other about him, blamed him for that he had done, but whether moved with their words, or otherwise upon second thoughts, the next day when they met againe, he openly repented his former deed, retracts his subscription, and sends to the Pope for absolution of his fault: which the Pope not onely granted, but encouraged him to persist in the course he had begunne. It may be thought a Fable, yet is related by divers good Authours, that one time during this Contention, certaine fellows cut off the Arch-bishops horses taile; after which fact, all their Children were borne with tailes like horses; and that this continued long in their Posterity, though now long since ceased, and perhaps their Families too. But King Henry finding there was no prevailing with Becket by faire meanes, beginnes to deale more roughly with him, and first makes use of Authority upon his Temporalties; and withall a censure was spoken of to be intended against his person; which Becket understanding, thought it his best course to flee the Realme, and thereupon passing under the name of Dereman, he passeth over Sea, and there, two yeares by the Pope, and five by the King of France, was maintained as it were of Almes: in which misery, nothing vexed him so much, as that King Henry sent all his kindred, Men and Women, old and young into Banishment after him. And now King Henry finding that Becket stood much upon his Legatine Power, sent messengers to the Pope, desiring him to take that power from him, and to conferre it upon his Arch-bishop of Yorke, but the Pope answered, he would not doe so, but was content the King himselfe should be his Legate, and sent him Letters to that purpose, which King Henry tooke in such scorne, that he threw away the Letters, and sent them presently backe to him againe.

In this meane time, the King of France prevailed with King Henry to afford Becket a conference, hoping to bring them to some Agreement, where being together, King Henry alledged before the King of France, that he required nothing of Becket, but his assent to an Ordinance, to which in his Grandfather King Henries the first time, all the Bishops of the Realme, and the Arch-bishop of Canterbury that then was did give their Assent; yet this moved not Becket at all, but he continued his former Tenet, it was against the honour of God, and therefore desired to be excused. See now (saith King Henry) the perverseness of this man, all that agrees not with his owne humour, is presently against the honour of God. While these things were thus a working, Becket had gotten him more friends at Rome, and by their meanes prevailed with the Pope, to give him power to interdict some Bishops in England that had done him wrong, and the Pope spared not to threaten Excommunication to King Henry himſelfe, if he reſtored not Becket to his Dignity. But whether awed with his threatning, or wonne by the King of Frances importunity, or elſe perhaps relenting in himſelfe, he was contented at laſt that Becket ſhould returne home, and enjoy his Biſhopricke; who being come to Canterbury, the Biſhops whom he had indicted, for Crowning the young King Henry, (which he ſaid, was his right to have done) made humble ſuite unto him, to be releaſed of the cenſure. Which, when the Arch-biſhop would not grant, but with certaine cautions and exceptions, the Biſhops diſcontented went over to the King, complaining of the hard meaſure that was offered them by the Arch-biſhop: whereat the King being much moved, Shall I never (ſaith he) be at quiet for this Prieſt? If I had any about me that loved me, they would find ſome way or other to ridde me of this trouble. Whereupon foure knights ſtanding by that heard the King make this complaint, namely Reynold Fits-urſe, or Bereſon, Hugh Morvyll, William Tracy, and Richard Britton, thinking they ſhould doe an acceptable ſervice to the King, went ſhortly after into England, and going to Canterbury, found the Arch-biſhop then at Church, when upon the ſteps there, they ſtrucke him upon the head with their ſwords and ſlew him the thirtieth day of December, in the yeare 1172. Afterward, with much adoe, by King Henries meanes they were pardoned by the Pope, onely enjoyned Penance, to goe on Pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, as ſome write; but others more probably, that the King abhorred them ever after; and that within three yeares they all dyed miſerably. You have heard his perſecution, and (as ſome would have it called) his Martyrdome: now heare the honours that have beene done him, and the viſitations to his Tombe. And firſt King Henry himſelfe comming to Canterbury, as ſoone as he came within ſight of Beckets Church, lighting off his horſe, and putting off his hoſe and ſhooes he went barefoot to his Tombe, and for a further penance ſuffered himſelfe to be beaten with rods, by every Monke of the Cloyſter. A few yeares after, King Lewis of France comes into England of purpoſe to viſite the Shrine of Saint Thomas, where having paid his Vowes, he makes Oblations with many rich Preſents. The like many Princes ſince that time have done; and many Miracles are reported to have beene done at his Tombe, which yet may be unbeleeved without unbeliefe, and with Faith enough. Another difference in this Kings dayes, was betweene the two Arch-biſhops of England, about the juriſdiction of Canterbury over Yorke, which being referred to the Pope, he gave judgement on Canterburies ſide. Alſo in this Kings dayes there was a Schiſme in the Church of Rome, two Popes up at once, of whom Alexander the third was one; which Schiſme continued the ſpace of almoſt twenty yeares. Alſo in this Kings dayes, one Nicholas Breakeſpeare, borne at Saint Albans, or as others write, at Langley in Hartfordſhire, being a bondman of that Abbey, and therefore not allowed to be a Monke there, went beyond Sea, where he ſo profited in Learning, that the Pope made him firſt Biſhop of Alba, and afterward Cardinall, and ſent Legate to the Norwayes, where he reduced that nation from Paganiſme to Chriſtianity, and returning backe to Rome, was choſen Pope, by the Name of Adrian the fourth, and dyed being choaked with a Fly in his drinke. In his dayes alſo, Heraclius Patriarch of Hieruſalem, came to King Henry, deſiring ayde for the Holy Land, but not ſo much of money as of men; and not ſo much of men neither, as of a good Generall, as himſelfe was; to whom King Henry anſwered, that though he were willing to undertake it, yet his unquiet State at home would not ſuffer him; with which anſwer the Patriarch moved, ſaid, Thinke not Great King, that Pretences will excuſe you before God, but take this from me, that as you forſake Gods cauſe now, ſo he hereafter will forſake you in your greateſt need. But (ſaith the King) if I ſhould be abſent out of my kingdome, my own Sonnes would be ready to riſe up againſt me in my abſence; to which the Patriarch replyed, No marvaile, for from the Devill they came, and to the Devill they ſhall; and ſo departed. Alſo in this Kings dayes there came into England, thirty Germans, Men and Women, calling themſelves Publicans, who denyed Matrimony, and the Sacraments of Baptiſme, and of the Lords Supper, with other other Articles, who being obſtinate, and not to be reclaimed, the King commanded they ſhould be marked with a hot iron in the forehead, and be whipped, which puniſhment they tooke patiently, their Captaine (called Gerard) going before them ſinging, Bleſſed are ye when men hate you. After they were whipped, they were thruſt out of doores in the Winter, where they dyed with cold and hunger, no man daring to relieve them. This King after his conqueſt of Ireland, impoſed the tribute of Peter pence upon that kingdome, namely, that every houſe in Ireland ſhould yearely pay a penny to Saint Peter.

Workes of piety done by him, or by others in his time.

THis King Founded the Church of Briſtow, which King Henry the eighth afterward erected into a Cathedrall: He alſo Founded the Priories of Dover; of Stoneley; and of Baſinwerke; and the Caſtle of Rudlan: and beganne the Stone Bridge over the Thames at London. He cauſed alſo the Caſtle of Warwicke to be builded. Maude the Empreſſe his Mother, Founded the Abbey of Bordeſly. In his time alſo Hugh Mortimer Founded Wigmore Abbey, Richard Lucye the Kings Chiefe Juſtice laid the Foundation of the Coventuall Church, in the honour of Saint Thomas, in a place which is called Weſtwood, otherwiſe Leſnes, in the Territory of Rocheſter, in the new Pariſh of Southſleete. He alſo builded the Caſtle of Anger in Eſſex. Robert Harding a Burgeſſe of Briſtow, to whom King Henry gave the Barony of Barkeley; builded the Monaſtery of Saint Auguſtines in Briſtow. In the tenth yeare of his Raigne, London Bridge was new made of Timber, by Peter of Cole-church a Prieſt. Robert de Boſcue Earle of Leyceſter, Founded the monaſtery of Gerendon, of Monkes; and of Leyceſter, called Saint Mary de Prate, of Chanons Regular, and his Wife Amicia, Daughter of Ralph Montford, Founded Eaton, of Nunnes. In the two and twentyeth yeare of his Raigne, after the Foundation of Saint Mary Overeyes Church in Southwarke, the Stone bridge over the Thames at London, beganne to be Founded, towards which a Cardinall, and the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury gave a thouſand Markes. Aldred Biſhop of Worceſter Founded a Monaſtery at Gloceſter of Benedictine Monkes.

Caſualties that happened in his time.

IN the Eleventh yeare of this Kings Raigne, on the ſix and twentyeth day of January, was ſo great an Earth-quake in Ely, Norfolke, and Suffolke, that it overthrew them that ſtood upon their feet, and made the Bells to ring in the Steeples. In the ſeventeenth yeare of his Raigne, there was ſeene at Saint Oſythes in Eſſex, a Dragon of marveilous bigneſſe, which by moving, burned houſes, and the whole City of Canterbury was the ſame yeare almoſt burnt. In the eighteenth yeare of his Raigne, the Church of Norwich with the houſes thereto belonging was burnt, and the Monkes diſperſed. At Andover, a Prieſt praying before the Altar, was ſlaine with Thunder. Likewiſe one Clerke and his Brother was burnt to death with Lightning. In the three and twentyeth yeare, a ſhowre of Blood Rained in the Iſle of Wight two houres together. In the foure and twentyeth yeare, the City of Yorke was burnt, and on Chriſtmas day, in the Territory of Derlington, in the Biſhopricke of Durham the Earth lifted up it ſelfe in the manner of an high Tower, and ſo remained unmoveable from morning till evening, and then fell with ſo horrible a noyſe that it frighted the Inhabitants thereabours, and the earth ſwallowing it up, made there a deepe pit, which is ſeene at this day: for a Teſtimony whereof Leyland ſaith, he ſaw the Pits there, commonly called Hell-kettles. Alſo in the ſame yeare, on the tenth day of Aprill, the Church of Saint Andrewes in Rocheſter was conſumed with fire. In the eight and twentyeth yeare of his Raigne, Barnewell, with the Priory, neare unto Cambridge was burnt. In the thirtyeth yeare, the Abbey of Glaſtenbury was burnt with the Church of Saint Julian. In the yeare 1180. a great Earthquake threw downe many buildings, amongſt which the Cathedrall thedrall Church of Lincolne was rent in peeces the five and twentieth of Aprill: And on the twentieth of October, the Cathedrall Church of Chicheſter, and all the whole City was burnt. This yeare alſo, neare unto Orford in Suffolke, certaine Fiſhers tooke in their Nets a Fiſh, having the ſhape of a Man in all points, which Fiſh was kept by Bartholomew de Glanvile in the Caſtle of Orford ſixe moneths and more; he ſpake not a word; all manner of meates he did gladly eate, but moſt greedily raw Fiſh, when he had preſſed out the juyce; oftentimes he was brought to Church, but never ſhewed any ſigne of adoration: at length, being not well looked to, he ſtole to the Sea, and never was ſeene after. In the yeare 1188. on the twentieth of September, the Towne of Beverley with the Church of Saint John there was burnt. And in this Kings time the bones of King Arthur, and his Wife Guynevour, were found in the Vale of Avalon, under an hollow Oake, fifteene foote under ground; the haire of the ſaid Guynevour being then whole and of freſh colour; but as ſoone as it was touched, it fell to powder, as Fabian relateth.

HE married Eleanor Daughter and heire of William Duke of Guien, late Wife of Lewis the ſeventh, King of France, but then divorced, but for what cauſe divorced is diverſly related; ſome ſay King Lewis carryed her with him into the Holy Land, where ſhe carryed her ſelfe not very holily, but led a licentious life, and which is the worſt kind of licentiouſneſſe, in carnall familiarity with a Turke; which King Lewis though knowing, yet diſſembled, till comming home, he then waived that cauſe, as which he could not bring without diſgrace to himſelfe, and made uſe of their neareneſſe in blood, as being Couſins in the fourth degree, which was allowed by the Pope, as a cauſe ſufficient to divorce them, though he had at that time two Daughters by her. Being thus divorced, Duke Henry marries her, with whom it was never knowne, but ſhe led a modeſt and ſober life, a ſufficient proofe, that the former Report was but a ſlander. By this Queene Eleanor he had five Sonnes, William, Henry, Richard, Geoffry, and John; and three Daughters, Maude, marryed to Henry Duke of Saxony; Eleanor, marryed to Alphonſo the Eighth of that name, King of Caſtile; and Jane or Joane, marryed to William King of Sicilie. Of his Sonnes, William dyed young. Henry borne the ſecond yeare of his Raigne, was Crowned King with his Father, in the eighteenth yeare, and dyed the nine and twentyeth yeare, and was buryed at Roan; marryed to Margaret, Daughter of Lewis King of France, but left no iſſue. Richard, borne at Oxford, in the fourth yeare of his Fathers Raigne, and ſucceeded him in the kingdome. Geoffrey, borne the fifth yeare of his Fathers Raigne, marryed Conſtance, Daughter and Heire of Conan, Earle of Little Britaine, in the foureteenth yeare, and in the two and thirtieth yeare dyed; leaving by his Wife Conſtance, two Daughters, and a Poſthumus Sonne named Arthur. John, his youngthers time; borne the twelfth yeare of his Fathers Raigne, and ſucceeded his Brother Richard in the kingdome. And this may be reckoned a peculiar honour to this King, that of his five Sonnes, three of them lived to be Kings; and of his three Daughters, two of them to be Queenes. Concubines he had many, but two more famous then the reſt; and one of theſe two, more famous then the other: and this was Roſamond, Daughter of Walter Lord Clifford; whom he kept at Woodſtocke, in lodgings ſo cunningly contrived that no ſtranger could find the way in, yet Queene Eleanor did, being guided by a thread: ſo much is the eye of jealouſie quicker in finding out, then the eye of care is in hiding. What the Queen did to Roſamond when ſhe came in to her, is uncertaine, but this is certaine, that Roſamond lived but a ſhort time after, and lyes buryed at the Nunnery of Godſtow neare to Oxford. By this Roſamond King Henry had two Sonnes, William called Long-Sword; who was Earle of Salisbury in right of his Wife Ela, Daughter and and Heire of William Earle of that Country, and had by her much iſſue, whoſe poſterity continued a long time: And a ſecond Sonne named Geoffrey, who was firſt Biſhop of Lincolne, and afterward Arch-biſhop of Yorke, and after five yeares baniſhment in his Brother King Johns time, dyed in the yeare 1213. The other famous Concubine of this King Henry, was the Wife of Ralph Blewet a Knight; by whom he had a Sonne named Morgan, who was Provoſt of Beverley, and being to be elected Biſhop of Durham, went to Rome for a diſpenſation, becauſe being a Baſtard, he was elſe uncapable: But the Pope refuſing to grant it, unleſſe he would paſſe as the Sonne of Blewet, he abſolutely anſwered, he would for no cauſe in the world deny his Father; and choſe rather to loſe the Dignity of the Place, then of his Blood, as being the Sonne, though but the baſe Sonne, of a King.

Of his perſonage and conditions.

HE was ſomewhat red of face, and broad breaſted; ſhort of body, and therewithall fat, which made him uſe much Exerciſe, and little Meate. He was commonly called Henry Shortmantell, becauſe he was the firſt that brought the uſe of ſhort Cloakes out of Anjou into England. Concerning endowments of mind, he was of a Spirit in the higheſt degree Generous; which made him often ſay, that all the World ſufficed not to a Couragious heart. He had the Reputation of a wiſe Prince all the Chriſtian World over; which made Alphonſus King of Caſtile, and Garſias King of Navarre, referre a difference that was betweene them, to his Arbitrament: who ſo judiciouſly determined the Cauſe, that he gave contentment to both Parties; a harder matter then to cut Cloath even by a thread. His Cuſtome was to be alwayes in Action; for which cauſe, if he had no Reall Warres, he would have Faigned: and would tranſport Forces either into Normandy or Britaine, and goe with them himſelfe, whereby he was alwayes prepared of an Army: and made it a Schooling to his Souldiers, and to himſelfe an Exerciſe. To his Children he was both indulgent and hard: for out of indulgence he cauſed his Son Henry to be Crowned King in his owne time; and out of hardneſſe he cauſed his younger Sonnes to Rebell againſt him. He was rather Superſtitious, then not Religious; which he ſhewed more by his carriage toward Becket being dead then while he lived. His Incontinency was not ſo much that he uſed other Women beſides his Wife, but that he uſed the affianced Wife of his owne Son: And it was commonly thought, he had a meaning to be divorced from his Wife Queene Eleanor, and to take the ſaid Adela to be his Wife. Yet generally to ſpeake of him, he was an excellent Prince; and if in ſome particulars he were defective, it muſt be conſidered he was a Man.

Of his death and buriall.

HE was not well at eaſe before, but when the King of France ſent him a Liſt of thoſe that had conſpired againſt him, and that he found the firſt man in the Lyſt to be his Son John, he then fell ſuddenly into a fit of Fainting, which ſo encreaſed upon him, that within foure dayes after he ended his life: So ſtrong a Corroſive is Griefe of mind, when it meetes with a Body weakned before with ſickneſſe. He dyed in Normandy, in the yeare 1189. when he had lived threeſcore and one yeares; Raigned neare five and thirty: and was buryed at Fountevarad in France. the manner of whoſe buriall was thus: He was Cloathed in his Royall Robes, his Crowne upon his head, white Gloves upon his hands, Bootes of Gold upon his legges, Gilt Spurres at his heeles, a great rich Ring upon his finger, his Scepter in his hand, his Sword by his ſide, and his face uncovered and all bare. As he was carrying to be Buryed, his Sonne Richard in great haſte ranne to ſee him, who no ſooner was come neare the Body, but ſuddenly at his Noſtrils he fell a bleeding afreſh; which though it were in Prince Richard no good ſigne of Innocency, yet his breaking presently into bitter teares upon the seeing it, was a good signe of Repentance. It may not be unseasonable to speake in this place of a thing which all Writers speake of, that in the Family of the Earles of Anjou, of whom this King Henry came, there was once a Princesse a great Enchantresse, who being on a time enforced to take the blessed Eucharist, she suddenly flew out at the Church window, and was never seene after: From this Woman these latter Earles of Anjou were descended, which perhaps made the Patriarch Heraclius say, of this King Henries Children, that from the Devill they came, and to the Devill they would. But Writers perhaps had beene more compleat, if they had left this Story out of their Writings.

OF Clergy men, there was Theobald Arch-bishop of Canterbury, Hugh Bishop of Lincolne; Richard Bishop of Winchester; Geoffrey of Ely; Robert of Bathe; Aldred of Worcester; all Learned Men, and of great integrity of life. Of Military Men, there was Robert Earle of Leycester; Reynold Earle of Cornwall; Hugh Bigot, Robert Ferrys, Richard Lacy, Roger Mowbray, Ralph Fulger, Ranulph Granula, William Vesei, and Baynard Baylioll; Men of great atchievements in Warre, and of no lesse abilities in Peace.

of his comming to the Crowne, and of his Coronation.

KING Richard, the first of that name, after his Fathers Funerall, went to Roan, where he setled the state of that Province; and from thence came into England, where he was Crowned King at Westminster, by the hands of Baldwin Arch-bishop of Canterbury, the third day of September, in the yeare 1189. And herein this Prince is more beholding to Writers then any of his Predecessors: for in speaking of their Crowning, they content themselves with telling where, and by whom they were Crowned: but of this Prince, they deliver the manner of his Crowning, in the full amplitude of all circumstances; which perhaps is not unfit to doe, for satisfaction of such as are never like to see a Coronation; and it was in this manner. First, the Arch-bishops of Canterbury, Roan, Tryer, and Dublin, with all the other Bishops, Abbots, and Cleargy, apparelled in rich Copes, and having the Crosse, holy Water, and Censers carried before them; came to fetch him at the doore of his Privie-Chamber; and there receiving him, they led him to the Church of Westminster, till they came before the high Altar, with a solemne Procession. In the middle of the Bishops and Clergy, went foure Barons, bearing Candlesticks with Tapers; after whom came Geoffrey de Lucie, bearing the Cap of Maintenance, and John Marshall next to him, bearing a massive paire of Spurres of Gold; then followed William Marshall Earle of Striguill, alias Pembroke, who bare the Royall Scepter, in the toppe whereof was set a Crosse of Gold; and William de Patricke Earle of Salisbury going next him, bare the Warder or Rodde, having on the toppe thereof a Dove. Then came three other Earles, David, brother to the King of Scots; the Earle of Huntington, John the Kings brother, Earle of Mortaigne; and Robert Earle of Leycester, each of them bearing a Sword upright in his hand, with the scabberds richly adorned with Gold. The Earle of Mortaigne went in the midst betwixt the other two; after them followed sixe Earles and Barons, bearing a Checker Table, upon the which were set the Kings Scotchens of Armes; and then followed William Mardevill Earle of Albemarle, bearing a Crowne of Gold a great heighth before the King, who followed having the Bishop of Durham on the right hand, and Reynold Bishop of Bathe on the left; over whom a Canopy was borne: and in this order he came into the Church at Westminster, where before the high Altar, in the presence of the Clergy and the people, laying his hand upon the holy Evangeliſts, and the reliques of certaine Saints, he tooke a ſolemne Oath that he ſhould obſerve peace, honour and reverence to Almighty God, to his Church, and to his Miniſters, all the dayes of his life: alſo that he ſhould exerciſe upright juſtice to the people committed to his charge, and that he ſhould abrogate and diſanull all evill Lawes and wrongfull cuſtomes, if any were to be found in the precinct of his Realme; and maintaine thoſe that were good and laudable. This done, he put off all his garments from his middle upwards, but onely his ſhirt, which was open on the ſhoulders, that he might be annoynted. Then the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury annoynted him in three places, on the head, on the ſhoulders, and on the right arme, with Prayers in ſuch caſe accuſtomed. After this, he covered his head with a linnen cloath hallowed, and ſet his Cap thereon; and then after he had put on his Royall Garments, and his uppermoſt Robe, the Arch-biſhop delivered him the Sword, with which he ſhould beate downe the enemies of the Church: which done, two Earles put his Shooes upon his feete, and having his Mantle put on him, the Arch-biſhop forbad him on the behalfe of Almighty God, not to preſume to take upon him this Dignity, except he faithfully meant to performe thoſe things which he had there ſworne to performe; whereunto the King made anſwer, that by Gods grace he would performe them. Then the King tooke the Crowne beſide the Altar, and delivered it to the Arch-biſhop, which he ſet upon the Kings head, delivering to him the Scepter to hold in his right hand, and the Rod Royall in his left hand: and thus being Crowned, he was brought backe by the Biſhops and Barons, with the Croſſe and Candleſticks, and three Swords, paſſing forth before him unto his Seate. When the Biſhop that ſang the Maſſe, came to the Offertory, the two Biſhops that brought him to the Church, led him to the Altar, and brought him backe againe. The Maſſe ended, he was brought with ſolemne Proceſſion into his Chamber: and this was the manner of this Kings Coronation. But at this ſolemnity there fell out a very dyſaſtrous accident: For this Prince not favouring the Jewes, as his Father had done; had given a ſtrict charge, that no Jew ſhould be admitted to be a ſpectator of the ſolemnity: yet certaine Jewes, as though it had beene the Crowning of their King Herod, would needs be preſſing in; and being put backe by Officers ſet of purpoſe, it grew to a brabble, and from words to blowes, ſo as many Jewes were hurt, and ſome ſlaine: and thereupon a rumour was ſuddenly ſpread abroad, that the King had commanded to have all the Jewes deſtroyed. Whereupon it is incredible what riſling there was of Jewes houſes, and what cutting of their throats: and though the King ſignified by publike Declaration, that he was highly diſpleaſed with that which was done, yet there was no ſtaying the fury of the multitude till the next day; ſo often it fals out, that great ſolemnities are waited on with great dyſaſters; or rather indeed, as being connaturall, they can hardly be aſunder.

Of his firſt Acts after he was Crowned.

HE beganne with his Mother Queene Eleanor, whom upon her Husbands diſpleaſure, having been kept in Priſon ſixteen yeares, he not onely ſet at liberty, but ſet in as great authority, as if ſhe had beene left the Regent of the kingdom. The next he gratifies, was his brother John; to whom he made appeare, how much the bounty of a Brother was better then the hardneſſe of a Father. For he conferred upon him, in England, the Earledomes of Cornwall, Dorſet, Somerſet, Nottingham, Darby, and Leyceſter; and by the marriage of Iſabel, daughter and heire to the Earle of Gloceſter, he had that Earledome alſo, as likewiſe the Caſtles of Marleborough, and Lutgarſall, the Honours of Wallingford, Tichill, and Eye, to the value of 4000. Markes a yeare: an eſtate ſo great, as were able to put a very moderate mind into the humour of aſpiring, of which Princes ſhould have care. Concerning his affianced Lady Adela, it may be thought ſtrange, that having deſired her ſo infinitely when he could not have her, now that he might have her, he cared not for her:

her: but the cauſe was knowne, and in every mans mouth; that ſhe was now but his Fathers leavings: yet he would not ſend her home but very rich in Jewels, to make amends, if it might be, for the loſſe of her Virginity: though this was ſomething hard on his part, when the Father had taken all the pleaſure, that the ſonne ſhould afterward pay all the charges. But by this at leaſt he made a quiet way for his marriage now concluded; and ſhortly after to be conſummated in Sicilie with Berengaria the daughter of Garſyas King of Navarre. And now his minde is wholly ſet upon his long intended voyage to the Holy Land, for which he thinkes not the treaſure left by his Father, to be ſufficient, which yet amounted to nine hundred thouſand pounds: but forecaſting with himſelfe the great charge it muſt needs be, to carry an Army ſo long a journey, he ſeekes to enlarge his proviſion of money by all the means he can deviſe. Not long before, Hugh Pudſey had been advanced to the Biſhopricke of Durham; and now for a great ſumme of money he ſold him the Earledome: and then ſaid merrily amongſt his Lords, Doe yee not thinke me a cunning man, that of an old Biſhop can make a young Earle? From the Londoners alſo he drained great ſummes of money, and made them recompence in Franchiſes and Liberties, which they had not before. He made alſo great ſales: to the King of Scots, he ſold the Caſtles of Berwick and Roxborough, for ten thouſand pounds: to Godfryde Lucie, Biſhop of Wincheſter, the Manors of Weregrave and Ments: to the Abbot of Saint Edmundsbery, the Manor of Mildhall, for one thouſand Markes of ſilver: to the Biſhop of Durham, the Manor of Sadborough; and when it was marvelled that he would part with ſuch things, he anſwered, that in this caſe he would ſell his City of London, if he could finde a Chapman. But the worſt way of all was, that pretending to have loſt his Signet, he made a new; and made Proclamation, that whoſoever would ſafely enjoy what under the former Signet was granted, ſhould come to have it confirmed by the new; whereby he raiſed great ſummes of money to himſelfe, but greater of diſcontentment in his ſubjects. By theſe, and ſuch like meanes he quickly furniſhed himſelfe with money: and now it remained onely to conſider, to whoſe care he ſhould commit the government of the Kingdome in his abſence; and after deliberation, he made choyce for the North parts, of Hugh Biſhop of Durham; joyning in Commiſſion with him, Hugh Baldulph, and William Brunell: and for the South parts, he appoints William Longſhampe Biſhop of Ely, and Chancellour of England, and for his greater ſtrength, cauſeth the Pope to make a Legat of all England and Scotland: and for Normandy, and Aquitaine, Robert Earle of Leyceſter; all men eminent for prudence and uprightneſſe, and which is moſt of all, for loyalty: and indeed to make a man fit for ſuch imployment, all theſe vertues muſt concurre. As for his brother John, he knew very well his aſpiring minde, and therefore would have tied him to live in Normandy, and not to come into England till his returne; but that their Mother Queene Eleanor interceded, and paſſed her word for him: and that nothing might be left unprovided for, he appointed his Nephew Arthur, the ſonne of his brother Geoffrey Duke of Britaine to be his Succeſſor, if himſelfe ſhould faile. And now, Undique convenere, vocat jam carbaſus auras: every man is ready to take Shipping, and no ſtay now but for a Wind, onely ſome ſay that King Richard before his departing, calling his Lords and Knights unto him, and ſwearing them to be true, gave to every of them a blew riband to be knowne by; from whence the firſt occaſion of the Order of the Garter is thought to beginne.

Of his journey into the Holy Land.

KING Richard having prepared an Army of thirty thouſand foote, and five thouſand horſe, and having appointed to meete Philip King of France in Sicilie, at the latter end of June, in the yeare 1190. ſets forward himſelfe by Land to Marſeilles, and there ſtayes till his Ships ſhould come about; but his Navy being driven by tempeſt to other parts, and the King weary of long ſtaying, after ſixe weekes, he hireth ſhipping for himſelfe and his company, and paſſeth forward ward to Meſſana in Sicilie, where arrived alſo the King of France; and not long after, his owne Navy. In this Iland the King William now lately dead, had married Jane, King Richards ſiſter; from whom Tancred the preſent King with-held her Dower: and therefore though he ſhewed King Richard faire countenance, yet he dealt ſecretly with the Meſſanians to uſe all meanes to get him gone; whereupon the Meſſanians taking a ſmall occaſion, ſet ſuddenly upon the Engliſh, and thruſt them out of their Towne: with which King Richard juſtly offended, who had his Campe without the Towne, prepares himſelfe to revenge the affront, when Tancred ſending to him, to ſignifie that the affront was offered without his knowledge, and much againſt his liking, ſo pacified him, that for the preſent he remained ſatisfied; but underſtanding afterward, that the Meſſanians did but waite their opportunity till the Spring, when King Richard ſhould be going: he reſenting their intention, ſtaies not their leiſure, but aſſaulting the Towne with fire and ſword, in one dayes labour takes it, and had made great ſlaughter in it, if King Richard had not beene moved to compaſſion with the Meſſanians teares, but chiefely with King Tancreds offers, both to pay his ſiſter Jane her Dower, and to marry his daughter to King Richards Nephew Arthur, Duke of Britaine, and to give a good part of the Portion in hand. But King Philip was not well pleaſed with theſe conditions, yet he breakes not out into open diſſention, till more fuell was afterward caſt upon the fire of his anger. In the Spring King Philip ſayles with his Army to Ptolemais (otherwiſe called Acon) which the Chriſtians had long beſieged, and with them he joynes: while King Richard taking his ſiſter Jane, and Berengaria the young daughter of the King of Navarre with him in 190. Ships, and 50. Galleys, puts to Sea for the Holy Land, but is by tempeſt caſt upon the Coaſt of Cyprus; where the Ilanders ſeeking to hinder his landing, he ſets upon them with his forces; and invading the Iland, eaſily ſubdues, and brings it under his ſubjection; and the King of the Countrey being taken priſoner, and intreating King Richard not to put him in bonds of Iron, King Richard gives him his word, and keeps it, but puts him in bonds of Silver. In this Iland he ſolemnizeth his marriage with Berengaria, and then leaving Richard de Canvile, and Robert de Turnham, his Lieutenants in Cyprus; he paſſeth on to Ptolemais, which City was defended by Saladine, and had beene beſieged now two yeares: when the enemy ſeeing and fearing the encreaſe of the Chriſtian forces, propounds conditions, upon which accepted, they deliver it up in Auguſt, the yeare 1192.

At the taking of this Towne there fell out an accident, ſeeming an honour to King Richard for the preſent, but proving a diſgrace, at leaſt a great trouble and charge to him afterward. For Leopold Duke of Auſtria had firſt ſet up his Colours upon the wall, which King Richard cauſed to be throwne downe, and his owne to be ſet up; but this was no place to ſtand a quarrelling, it came not to the reckoning till ſome time after. When Ptolemais was taken, Saladine fearing the Chriſtians further proceeding, diſmantles all the beſt Townes that were neare it: as Porphyria, Caſarea, Aſcalon, Gaza; but of Joppa King Richard takes a care, and placeth in it a Colony of Chriſtians. For Joppa is a City of Paleſtine, that was built before the Floud; and hath belonging to it a Haven of great convenience. And now the King of France, though valiant enough himſelfe, yet thinking his owne great acts to be obſcured by greater of King Richards; he beganne, beſides his old hating him, now to envie him. For indeed emulation when it is in Vertue, makes the ſtronger knot of love and affection: but when it is in Glory, it makes a ſeparation, and turnes into the paſſion of envie and malice; and ſo did it with King Philip, who pretending the aire of the Countrey did not agree with his body; but was indeed becauſe the aire of King Richards Glory did not agree with his minde; obtained King Richards conſent to returne home, ſwearing firſt ſolemnly, not to moleſt his Territories in his abſence. But this fell out for the preſent enterpriſe moſt unſeaſonably: For the departure of the King of France, though it diminiſhed not much the ſtrength; (for he left Odo, Duke of Burgundy in his place) yet it diminiſhed much the ſhew of aſſiſtance: and indeed Saladine, who was at this time in termes termes of ſurrendring Jeruſalem; when he ſaw the King of France departed; as knowing there muſt needs be a concluſion, where there was a beginning; doubted not but the reſt would follow ſoone after, and thereupon ſtaied his hands, and grew more confident then he was before. At this time Guy of Luſignan was poſſeſt of the City of Tyre, and with it, of the right of the Kingdome of Jeruſalem: with him King Richard makes an exchange; that Guy ſhould have the Iland of Cyprus which King Richard had wonne, and King Richard ſhould have the kingdome of Jeruſalem, to which Guy had a right: and upon this Title the Kings of England were ſtiled Kings of Jeruſalem a long time after: as likewiſe the poſterity of the ſaid Guy hath by this exchange held the kingdome of Cyprus to this day. Now was King Richard more hot upon taking Jeruſalem then ever before, and had certainely taken it, but that by ill counſell diverted, becauſe the Winter drew on: and indeed by the drawing backe of Odo Duke of Burgundie, who envied that King Richard ſhould have the honour of taking it, he removed for that ſeaſon to Askalon; after which time, the Enemy growing ſtronger, and the Chriſtians weaker, all opportunity of taking it was utterly loſt, and they could never come to the like againe. And ſhortly after King Richard was advertiſed of the King of France his invading Normandy, contrary to his oath at his departure; which forced King Richard, much to his griefe, to conclude a peace with Saladine, and that upon conditions not very honourable for the Chriſtians; and himſelfe preſently to returne home: and ſo ſending his wife Berengaria, and his ſiſter Jane, with a great part of his Army into Sicilie, and from thence into England: he paſſeth himſelfe with ſome few in his company, by the way of Thrace, and was by tempeſt brought into Dalmatia; from whence being to paſſe through Germany, and particularly through Duke Leopolds Countrey of Auſtria: he remembring the old grudge, changed his apparell, and travelling ſometimes afoote, and ſometimes on horſebacke, he uſed all meanes poſſible to keepe himſelfe from being knowne: but deſtiny is not to be avoyded, for as ſoone as he came to Vienna, partly by his tongue, and partly by his expenſes, it was preſently found he was an Engliſhman, and withall ſome great man; and by and by a rumour was ſpread, that it was Richard King of England: who finding himſelfe to be diſcovered, and no meanes poſſible to eſcape, he puts off his diſguiſe, putting on his Princely apparell, and avowes himſelfe: which Duke Leopold underſtanding, ſent preſently to have him apprehended; but King Richard refuſing to yeeld himſelfe to any, but to the Duke himſelfe; the Duke himſelfe came and led him to his owne Palace honourably enough, but yet ſtrongly guarded: whereof as ſoone as Henry the Emperour heard, he ſent with great inſtance to Duke Leopold to ſend King Richard over to him, under pretence of ſafer cuſtody, but with a purpoſe indeed to be a ſharer in his Ranſome. And the Duke though well knowing his meaning, yet knowing withall that it was not ſafe for him to deny the Emperour, he ſent him over to him; who ſoone after put him into a priſon he had, called Trivallis, into which no man was ever knowne to be put that eſcaped with life, though done perhaps to him, but in terrorem, to draw the better Ranſome from him. That with which King Richard was charged, beſide the wrong done to Leopold, in throwing downe his Colours at Ptolemais, was the death of Conrade Duke of Tyre, whom they pretended King Richard had murthered; wherein though King Richard made his innocency appeare by the teſtimony of Limboldus, who confeſſed himſelfe to have beene the author of the Marqueſſes death; yet the pretence ſerved to detaine him in priſon; and in priſon indeed they kept him, till his Ranſome was agreed upon and paid: which being a hundred thouſand pounds, foure-ſcore thouſand was paid in hand: whereof two parts to the Emperour, a third part to Duke Leopold: and for the reſt, hoſtages given to the number of fifty; of whom the Biſhop of Roan was one: though the hoſtages afterward were delivered without paying the reſt: for Henry the Emperour dying ſhortly after, his Succeſſour had the conſcience not to take it, as knowing it had beene unjuſtly exacted: and indeed the accidents that befell both the Emperour and the Duke Leopold, were evident demonſtrations of the injuſtice they had done; for the Emperour ſhortly after died; and the Duke Leopold, in a Tilting for ſolemnity of his Birth-day, fell off his horſe, and ſo broke his leg, that to ſave his life, he was faine to have his leg cut off. And now after fifteen months impriſonment, King Richard is releaſed, and returnes into England foure yeares elder then he went out; and thus ended his journey to the Holy Land. Yet one memorable accident happening to him in the Holy Land, may not be omitted; that going one day a Hawking about Joppa, finding himſelfe weary, he laid him downe upon the ground to ſleepe; when ſuddenly certaine Turkes came upon him to take him; but he awakened with their noyſe, ariſeth up, gets a horſebacke; and drawing out his ſword, aſſaults the Turkes, who faigning to flie, drew the King into an Ambuſh, where many Turkes lay; who had certainely taken him if they had knowne his perſon: but one of the Kings ſervant, called William de Patrelle, crying out in the Saracene tongue, that he was the King; they preſently lay hold upon him, and let the King eſcape.

Troubles in his Dominions in his abſence.

KING Richard at his going out of England, had ſo well ſetled the Government of the Kingdome, that might well have kept it in good order during all the time of his abſence; but diſorders are weeds which no foreſight can hinder from growing, having ſo many hands to water them: where occaſions of diſtaſt are no ſooner offered, then taken; and oftentimes taken before they be offered, as was here to be ſeene. For King Richard had left in chiefe place of authority, William Longſhampe, Biſhop of Ely; a man who ſo carried himſelfe, that although the things he did, were juſtifiable; yet the pride with which he did them was unſufferable: ſeldome riding abroad without five hundred, ſome ſay a thouſand in his traine; not for ſafety, but for ſtate: and though there were other left in authority beſides himſelfe, yet his power was ſo predominant, that he made of them but Ciphers, and ruled all as he liſt himſelfe. This inſolency of governing was ſoone diſtaſted by many, and ſpecially by John the Kings brother, who counting the greatneſſe of his Birth an equall march at leaſt with any ſubſtitute greatnes, affronted the Biſhop in the managing of affaires, in ſuch ſort, that while ſome adhered to the one, and ſome to the other; the Kingdome in the meane time was in danger to be rent aſunder, till at laſt the Biſhop finding himſelfe too weake, or at leaſt fearing that he was ſo; but rather indeed depoſed from his authority by the Kings Letters, and the Arch-biſhop of Roan put in his place, thought it beſt for him to flie the Realme: wherupon for his greater ſafety, diſguiſing himſelfe in womans appatell, and carrying a Webbe of Cloath under his arme, hee ſought in this manner to take Shipping and paſſe the Sea. But being diſcovered and knowne, the women in revenge of the abuſe done to their cloathes, in making them his inſtruments of fraude; fell upon him, and ſo beat him, that it might have beaten humility into him for ever after. This diſgrace made him glad to get him into Normandy, his native Countrey, where to little purpoſe he wooed King Richard and Queene Eleanor for reparation. But this was but a ſport in compariſon of the miſchiefes done in Normandy by Philip King of France: for firſt he invades Normandy, where he takes many Towns, and amongſt others Gyſorts, and drawes the Kings brother John to combine with him, promiſing to aſſiſt him in winning the Kingdome of England, and to have his ſiſter Adela, whom King Richard had repudiated to be his wife; with which promiſe Duke John had beene enſnared, if his Mother Queene Eleanor had not diſſwaded him. But in England Duke John tooke upon him as King, perſwading the people that his brother King Richard was not living; and indeed it was eaſie to remove, the knowing him to be a priſoner, to the affirming him to be dead; but ſuch was the faithfulneſſe of the Arch-biſhop of Roan, and other the Princes of the Realme to King Richard, that they oppoſed Duke John, and fruſtrated all his practiſes: and the Biſhop of Ely had told him plainely, that though King Richard were dead, yet the ſucceſſion in the kingdome belonged not to him, but to Arthur Duke of Britaine, ſonne of Geoffrey his elder brother. And in theſe termes King Richard found his State when he returned from the Holy Land.

His Acts and Troubles after his returning from the Holy Land.

AT his comming home from the Holy Land, the firſt thing he did, was to give his Lords and people thankes for their faithfulneſſe to him in his abſence, and then for their readineſſe in ſupplying him for his Ranſome. But as for his brother John in whom ungratefulneſſe ſeemed to ſtrive with ambition, which ſhould be the greater in him; he depriveth him of all thoſe great poſſeſſions he had given him: ſome adoe he had to make ſound certaine peeces which he had corrupted, as the Caſtles of Marleborough, Lancaſter, and a Fortreſſe at Saint Michaels Mount in Cornwall; but chiefely the Caſtles of Nottingham and Tichill, which ſtood ſo firmly for Duke John, that they were not reduced to obedience without ſome bloud, and much expenſe. But his greateſt trouble was with Philip King of France, in whom was ſo ingraffed a ſpleene againſt King Richard, that he ſeemed to be never well but when he was working him ſome ill. Now therefore King Richard to make it appeare he had not left the Holy War for nothing (having firſt obtained in Parliament a Subſidy towards his charges, & cauſed himſelfe to be new Crowned at Wincheſter, leſt the people through his long abſence might have forgotten theyh ad a King) he departs with a hundred Ships into Normandy; but it was withall, upon this occaſion: ſitting one day at dinner, in his little Hall (as it was called) newes was brought him, that King Philip had beſieged Vernoull, with which he was ſomoved, that he ſwore a great oath, he would not turne his face till he were revenged: whereupon he cauſed the wall right before him to be preſently beaten downe, that ſo he might paſſe forward without turning his face; and thus in haſte he goes to Vernoull, whither he was no ſooner come, but the King of France made as great haſte to be gone, not without ſome loſſe, and more diſgrace. Here his brother John ſubmits himſelfe to him, and with great ſhew of penitence intreats his pardon, which he readily granted; ſaying onely, I wiſh you may as well remember your fault, as I ſhall forget it. The King of France having left Vernoull, enters Turonia, and neare to Vindocinum pitcheth his Tents; thither King Richard followes him, and with his comming ſo affrighted him, that leaving bagge and baggage, Munition, Tents, and Treaſure to a marvellous valew, he gets him gone, and glad hee was ſo rid of King Richard. After this a Truce was agreed upon for a yeare, which each of them longed till it were expired, as having no pleaſure but in troubling one another. In this time there was a trouble at home, though not to the King, yet to the kingdome: for Robin Hood accompanied with one little John, and a hundred ſtout fellowes more, moleſted all paſſengers upon the High-way; of whom it is ſaid, that he was of Noble bloud, at leaſt made Noble, no leſſe then an Earle, for ſome deſerving ſervices: but having waſted his eſtate in riotous courſes, very penury forced him to take this courſe; in which yet it may be ſaid he was honeſtly diſhoneſt, for he ſeldome hurt any man, never any woman, ſpared the poore, and onely made prey of the rich: till the King ſetting forth a Proclamation to have him apprehended, it hapned he fell ſicke at a certaine Nunnery in Yorkſhire, called Birckleys; and deſiring there to be let bloud, was betraid, and made bleed to death. Such another trouble, though not to the King, yet to the kingdome, fell out by reaſon of the Jewes: and firſt at the Towne of Linne in Norfolke, upon this occaſion: A Jew being turned Chriſtian, was perſecuted by thoſe of his Nation, and aſſaulted in the ſtreete; who thereupon flying to a Church hard by, was thither alſo followed, and the Church aſſaulted; which the people of the Towne ſeeing, in ſuccour of the new Chriſtian they fell upon the Jewes, of whom they ſlew a great number, and after pillaged their houſes. By this example the like aſſaults were made upon the Jews at Stamford; and after that at Lincolne; and laſtly at Yorke, where infinite numbers of Jewes were maſſacred; and ſome of them blocked up in the Caſtle, cut the throats of their wives and children, and caſt them over the wals upon the Chriſtians heads, and then burnt both the Caſtle and themſelves: neither could this ſedition be ſtaied, till the King ſent his Chancellour, the Biſhop of Ely, with force of Armes, to punish the offenders. His last trouble was a punishment of covetousnesse, for one Guydomer having found a great treasure in the Kings Dominions, and for feare of King Richard, flying to a Towne of the King of France for his safegard; was pursued by the King, but the Towne denying him entrance, and he thereupon going about the wals to finde the fittest place for assaulting it, one Bertram de Gurdon, or as others call him, Peter Basile, shot at him with a Crossebow, and hit him on the arme, of which wound he died within foure dayes after, and so ended all his troubles.

Of his Taxations, and wayes for raising of money.

OF Taxations properly so called, there were never fewer in any Kings Raigne: but of wayes to draw money from the subject, never more. It is true, the first money raised for his journey, was all out of his owne estate, by selling or pawning of Lands; but when at his comming backe, he resumed the Lands into his hands againe, without paying backe the money he had received; this if it may not have the name, yet certainely it had the venome of a bitter Taxation. Likewise the feigning to have lost his Seale, & then enjoyning them to have their Grants confirmed by a new; though it went not in the number, yet it had the weight of a heavy Taxation where it lighted. Afterward, the money raised for his Ransome, was not so properly a Taxation, as a Contribution: or if a Taxation for him, yet not by him; which was done in his absence, by the subjects themselves: and indeed no Taxations are commonly so pinching, as those which are imposed upon the subject by the subject, and such was this; for to raise money for his Ransome, there was imposed upon every Knights Fee, 20.s. of all Lay-mens Revenues, the fourth part, and the fourth part of all the Revenues of the Clergy, with a tenth of their goods. Also the Chalices and Treasure of all Churches were taken to make up the sum. Afterward, this onely was a plaine Taxation, and granted in Parliament; that of every Plough-land through England, he should have two shillings, and of the Monkes Cisteaux, all their Wooll of that yeare: And one more greater then this; and was this yeare imposed towards his warres in Normandy; that every Hide of Land, as much as to say, every hundred Acres of Land, should pay five shillings; which computed without deductions, will rise to a summe that will seeme incredible.

Lawes and Ordinances in his time.

HIs Ordinances were chiefely for the Meridian of London: for where before his time the City was governed by Portgraves, this King granted them to be governed by two Sheriffes and a Major, as now it is; and to give the first of these Magistrates the honour to be remembred, the names of the Sheriffes were Henry Cornhill, and Richard Reyner; and the name of the first Lord Major, was Henry Fitz-Alwyn, who continued Major during his life, which was foure and twenty yeares. And now beganne the City first to receive the forme and state of a Commonwealth, and to be divided into Fellowships and Corporations, as at this day they are: and this Franchise was granted in the yeare 1189. the first year of King Richard the first.

Affaires of the Church in his time.

THe Church within his owne Dominions was quiet all his time, no contestation with the Pope, no alterations amongst the Bishops, no difference betweene the Clergy and the Laity, or the Clergy amongst themselves; they all seemed to lie asleepe, till they were afterwards awakened, in the time of the succeeding King. But abroad, in his time, there was an addition of three Orders of Devotion; the Order of the Augustine Friers, called Friers Mendicants, begunne by William of Paris;

Paris; then the Order of Friers Minors begunne by Saint Francis; and lastly the Orders of Friers Preachers begunne by Saint Dominick, though not confirmed till the first yeare of Pope Honorius.

Workes of Piety in his time.

VVOrkes of Piety are for the most part workes of plenty; penury may inwardly have good wishes, but outwardly it can expresse but little: and indeed all parts of the kingdome, all sorts of people were drawne so dry; by the two great occasions of his Journey and his Ransome, and afterward by other Taxations, that the richest men had enough to doe to maintaine themselves, without being at the charge to make provision for others. All workes of Piety were now for the service of the Holy Land, and therefore it may well passe, if not for a worke of Devotion, at least worthy to be remembred; that William Bishop of Ely builded the outer wall of the Tower of London, and caused a deepe ditch to be made about it, with an intention the River of Thames should have surrounded it, though it could not be effected. Onely Hubert Walter, who at one time was Arch-bishop of Canterbury, the Popes Legat, Lord Chancellour, Lord Chiefe Justice, and the immediate Governour under the King, both in Wales and England, Founded a Monastery at West Derham in Norfolke, where he was borne: begunne another at Wolverhampton, and finished a Collegiate Church at Lambeth.

Of his Wife and Children.

IN his Infancy he was contracted to a daughter of Raymond Earle of Barcelone, after that affianced to Adela, or Alice, daughter of Lewis King of France, yet married to neither of them; but he married Berengaria daughter of Garsias King of Navarre, whom his Mother Queene Eleanor brought unto him into Sicilie; from whence passing into Cyprus, their marriage was there solemnised: afterward, going forward to the Holy Land, he carried her and his sister Jane Queene of Sicilie along with him, where they remained till his returne home; and then sent them to passe to Sicilie, and from thence into England: but that ever she came into England, no mention is made, neither what became of her after she parted from King Richard at the Holy Land. But children certainely he had none, either by his wife, or by any Concubine, unlesse we reckon as a Priest in Normandy did; who told King Richard, he had three daughters: and the King marvelling who they should be, seeing he knew of none he had; yes (saith the Priest) you have three daughters, Pride, Covetousnesse, and Lechery; which the King taking merrily, called to the company about him, and said; I am told by a Priest here, that I have three daughters, and I desire you to be witnesses how I would have them bestowed: my daughter Pride, upon the Templars and Hospitallers: my daughter Covetousnesse, upon the Monks of the Cistercian Order: and my daughter Lechery, upon the Clergy.

Casualties happening in his time.

IN his time the Towne of Mawling in Kent, with the Nunnery, was consumed with fire, and in his time the bones of Arthur the famous King of Britaine were found at Glastenbury in an old Sepulchre, about which stood two Pillars, in which letters were written but could not be read; Upon the Sepulchre was a crosse of Lead, whereon was written, Here lyeth the Noble King of Britaine Arthur. Also in this Kings dayes for three or foure yeares together, there raigned so great a dearth, that a Quarter of Wheate was sold for 18. shillings 8. pence, and then followed so great a mortality of men, that scarce the living sufficed to bury the dead.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

HE was tall of ſtature, and well proportioned, faire and comely of face, of haire bright abourne, of long armes, and nimble in all his joynts, his thighes and legs of due proportion, and anſwerable to the other parts of his body. To ſpeake of his morall parts, his Vices for the moſt part, were but onely upon ſuſpition: Incontinency in him much ſpoken of, nothing proved: but his Vertues were apparent, for in all his actions he ſhewed himſelfe Valiant, (from whence he had the appellation or ſurname of Cœur de Lyon) wiſe, liberall, mercifull, juſt, and which is moſt of all, Religious; a Prince borne for the good of Chriſtendome; if a Barre in his Nativity had not hindred it. The remorſe for his undutifulneeſſe towards his Father, was living in him till he dyed: for at his death he remembred it with bewailing, and deſired to be Buryed as neare him as might be, perhaps as thinking they ſhould meete the ſooner, that he might aske him forgiveneſſe in another world.

Of his Death and Buriall.

HE dyed of a wound with an Arrow in his Armæ, which neglected at firſt, and ſuffered to wrankle, or as others ſay, ill handled by an unskilfull Chirurgeon, in foure dayes brought him to his End. But his Charity deſerves to have it remembred, that finding himſelfe paſt hope of Recovery, he cauſed the Party that had wounded him to be brought before him, who being asked what moved him to doe this Fact? anſwered, that King Richard had killed his Father and two of his Brothers with his owne hand, and therefore would doe it, if it were to doe againe. Upon this Inſolent anſwer, every one looked the King ſhould have cenſured him to ſome terrible puniſhment, when contrary to all their expectations in a high degree of Charity, he not onely freely forgave him, but gave a ſpeciall charge he ſhould be ſet at liberty, and that no man ſhould dare to doe him the leaſt hurt: commanding beſides to give him a hundred ſhillings for his paines. An Act that well ſhewed he had beene at the Holy Land, or rather indeed that he was going to it. He dyed the ſixth day of April in the yeare 1199. when he had lived 44. yeares, Raigned nine, and about nine moneths, and had his Body Buryed at Fonteverard, by his Father; his heart at Roan, in remembrance of the hearty love that City had alwayes borne him; and his bowels at Chalons, for a diſgrace of their unfaithfulneſſe; others ſay at Carlile in England.

Of Men of Note in his time.

IN his time were famous Baldwyn Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who followed King Richard into the Holy Land, and dyed there; Hubert that ſucceeded him; Hugh Biſhop of Lincolne; William Biſhop of Ely, a man equally famous and infamous; alſo Baldwyn Archbiſhop of Canterbury, a learned Writer in Divinity; Daniel Morley a great Mathematician; John de Herham, and Richard de Herham, two notable Hiſtorians; Guilielmus Stephonides a Monke of Canterbury, who wrote much in the praiſe of Arch-biſhop Becket; alſo one Richard Diviſienſis, Nicholas Walkington, and Robert de Bello Foco, an excellent Philoſopher. Of Martiall men, Robert Earle of Leyceſter; Ranulph de Fulgers; two of the Bardolphs, Hugh and Henry; three Williams, Marſhall, Brunell and Mandevill, with two Roberts, Roſſe, and Sauevile.

THE RAIGNE OF KING IOHN.

KING Richard being dead, the right of Succeſſion remained in Arthur, Sonne of Geoffrey Plantagenet elder Brother to Earle John, but John as thinking the title of Arthur but a Criticiſme in State, and not for every ones capacity; at leaſt in common ſenſe not ſo plaine as his owne, who was the ſonne of a King, and the Brother to a King, aſcends into the Throne as confidently as if he had no competitor: Onely Hubert Arch-biſhop of Canterbury went before, and made an Oration in his behalfe, wherein ſeeking to doe him a courteſie, he did him indeed a wrong; for waiving his Right of Succeſſion, he inſiſted wholly upon their Right of Election; whereof would follow, that as they brought him in, ſo they might caſt him out; of which errour when he was told, he ſaid, he did it of purpoſe to make King John the more carefull of his Government, by making him ſenſible upon what an unſure ground his Regality ſtood: King John reſented it, but ſeeing it to ſerve his turne for the preſent, he tooke it not ill, as knowing that his turne once ſerved, he could afterward be his owne carver of what title he pleaſed; and ſo upon Aſcenſion day in the yeare 1199. he was Crowned King at Weſtminſter, with more ſolemnity then joy; many preſaging by their countenances, and more in their mindes, that all would not long be well. It cannot be denyed, but that in morall circumſtances Earle John had the advantage of his Nephew Arthur; for he was a Man of yeares fit to Governe, Arthur but a Childe, not above thirteene yeares old; he a Native, at leaſt alwayes bred up in the Kingdome, Arthur a Forrainer, and had never beene here; He well knowne both to the Nobility and the People, Arthur a ſtranger to both, as one they had never ſeene; and beſides to theſe morall advantages, he had now added one from the Politickes, that he had gotten Poſſeſſion; (of more force in the practicall part then all the former) and withall a greater then all theſe, if it be true which ſome write, that his Brother King Richard had aſſigned him his Succeſſour after his deceaſe. But yet knowing the Title at laſt would come to be tryed in a Court, where the Sword muſt be Judge; he imployeth all his endevours to get this Judge to be his friend, and by all meanes poſſible to ſtrengthen himſelfe with Armes; and thereupon going to Chinon and Roan, he ſeiſeth upon the Treaſure which his Brother had left in thoſe parts, and with it, gets Friends and Souldiers, the Armour of Armes. And indeed all he could have done himſelfe would have done him no good, if he had not had the helpe of able Aſſiſtants, who yet aſſiſted him no leſſe for their owne ends then for his; and theſe were chiefly his Mother Queene Eleanor, who knew if her Grand-ſonne Arthur ſhould be King, that then his Mother Conſtantia would rule all; at leaſt during his Minority, and thereby her ſelfe put from the Stage of all Authority; and the Arch-

biſhop Hubert, who alſo knew that if Arthur ſhould come to Raigne, that then the Anjowyn and French ſhould have all the beſt Offices, and the Engliſh wholly be neglected, as it was in the time of King William the Conquerour. And yet a greater Friend then both theſe, for comming to Roan, he uſed meanes that Walter the Arch-biſhop in the Cathedrall Church with great pompe girt him with the Ducall ſword of Normandy, and Crowned him with a Coronet of Golden Roſes, he taking his Oath for Faithfull Adminiſtration in that Dukedome, and they their Oath for being his Loyall Subjects.

of his troubles in conteſtation with his Nephew Arthur.

THough King John had entred upon Normandy, and made that Province ſure unto him, yet the Province of Anjou ſtood firme for Arthur, in obſervance of their love to his Father their former Prince: which alſo King John ſoone after invading, reduceth by Force of Armes to his Obedience. And now Conſtantia the Mother of Prince Arthur, finding King John too powerfull an adverſary, and no likelihood for her party, to be able long to ſtand out againſt him without further aſſiſtance, conceives it her beſt way to have recourſe to the King of France, and thereupon commits her Sonne Arthur to his Tuition: who ſeemed to receive him with the tenderneſſe of a Father, and promiſeth to aſſiſt him with his uttermoſt Forces, in the recovery of his Right both in France and England. Here we may obſerve upon what hinge the affection of the Kings of France was uſed to turne. For in King Henry the ſeconds time, King Lewis of France was ſo great a Friend to his Sonne Richard, that by all meanes he would helpe him to get the kingdome from his Father; Afterward when Richard was King, then Philip King of France, was ſo great a Friend to John, that by all meanes he would helpe him to get the kingdome from his Brother; and now that John is come to be King, he is preſently growne ſo great a Friend of Arthur, that by all meanes he will helpe him to get the kingdome from his Unkle; and no doubt, if Arthur ſhould ever have come to be King, he would have beene as ready to helpe any other to get the kingdome from him: by which it appeares, that it was not the Perſons of the Men they either hated or loved, but that they were alwaies jealous of their growing too great; and indeed this ballancing of States keepes Princes affections alwayes in ſuſpenſe, and never ſuffers the Glaſſe of their Love or Hate, to make a true Reflection. About this time William King of Scots came to London to viſit King John, and there did homage to him for his kingdome of Scotland, though ſome ſay, but onely for the Counties of Northumberland and Cumberland, but being required ayde againſt the French, he excuſed himſelfe, ſaying, he could not doe it without conſent of his kingdome, and ſo returned home.

And now Philip King of France having undertaken the protection of the young Prince Arthur, with a mighty Army enters Normandy, takes many of the beſt Townes, and purſuing his Victories, enters the Province of Anjou alſo, and recovers it from King John, which he the yeare before had gotten from Prince Arthur. Upon this King John makes a Journey into Normandy, accuſing King Philip for breaking the Truce, which formerly he had made with King Richard for five yeares; but when he ſhould come to make his Accuſation good by Armes, he falleth to Treaties, and obtaineth a new Truce for fifty dayes: with which new Truce, Baldwyn Earle of Flanders, who had profeſſed himſelfe of that ſide, was not well pleaſed; and thereupon commeth to King John to Roan, and entring a new League with him, they there conſult how to proceed, when the fifty dayes ſhould be expired. This conſultation the King of France underſtood; and thereupon both ſides prepare for warre, but at the end of the Truce, both ſides ſeemed to relent, and divers meetings were had for Treaties of Peace, and in concluſion, King John more deſirous of Peace then was for his Honour, agreed to theſe Conditions; that his Niece Blanch, Daughter of Alphonſus King of Caſtile by his Siſter Eleanor, ſhould marry with Lewis King Philips Sonne, who ſhould have with her her in Dower, beſides thirty thouſand Markes in money, all thoſe Cities, except onely Angiers, which the French before that time had taken, which were many and very great: and his Peace thus made, he returnes into England with great joy, but was not with like joy received of the Engliſh Lords, who counted themſelves diſhonoured, in the diſhonourable Conditions he had made; and Baldwyn Earle of Flanders alſo, when he ſaw the poore ſpirits of King John, to deſcend to ſuch baſe Conditions; left his Party, and entring League with the King of France, diſpoſed himſelfe for the Holy Warre.

But King John having now gotten a Vacation, and a time of eaſe, which agreed much better with his nature then Warre, ſets his minde wholly upon pleaſures, and for maintaining his pleaſures, upon ſeeking after profit, which he purſues by all manner of injuſtice, under the name of Prerogative; and with ſuch violence, that when his Brother Geoffrey Arch-biſhop of Yorke, in the dutifulneſſe of a Counſellour, adviſed him not to take ſuch unlawfull courſes, he moſt unworthily tooke from him all he had, and it was a yeares worke for all the Arch-biſhops friends to pacify his anger. In the necke of this injuſtice, he commits another, he procures a divorce from his Wife Avis, the Daughter of Robert Earle of Gloceſter, onely for being of kinne to him in the third degree, and by advice of the King of France, marries Iſabell Daughter and Heire of the Earle of Angouleſme, Affianced before to Hugh le Brun Earle of March; and ſhortly after brings her with him into England, where he and ſhe together, are both Crowned at Canterbury. And here the Earles and Barons of the Realme, being all ſummoned to attend the King into Frante at Whitſontide following; they all by a generall conſent ſend him word, that unleſſe he would reſtore them their Rights and Liberties, they would doe him no ſervice out of the kingdome. But what it was that made the Lords more violent in preſſing their Demands at this time then before, no Writers of theſe times doe ſufficiently deliver: Onely ſome of them ſpeake ſcatteringly of certaine oppreſſions (beſides the generall Grievance for Exactions) lately offered to ſome of the Lords, one to the Earle of Cheſter, whom he would have baniſhed, onely for adviſing him to leave his cruelty and incontinency: Another, a purſuite in Love to a Daughter of Robert Fits-Water, called Maude the Faire, who not conſenting to the Kings luſt, a meſſenger was ſent to give her poyſon in a potched Egge, whereof ſhe dyed: And a third, offered to William de Brawſe and his Lady, for a raſh word ſpoken; for when the King ſent to have de Brawſes Sonne delivered him for a pledge, the Lady anſwered, We ſhall doe well indeed to commit our Sonne to his keeping, who kept ſo well his owne Nephew Prince Arthur. This raſh word coſt de Brawſe his Country, and his Lady and their Son their lives, both of them being famiſhed to death in Priſon. For, though theſe directly were but particular Grievances, yet reflectingly they were generall, what one ſuffered all might; but whether any of theſe, or all of theſe together, were Ingredients to make a Compound of violence in the Lords at this time, or whatſoever was the true cauſe, this was plainely the effect, that unleſſe the King would reſtore their liberties, they would not follow him out of the kingdome. But notwithſtanding this refuſall of his Lords, he paſſeth over with his Queene into Normandy, and from thence to Paris, where the King of France receives them with all complements of Love and amity. But now Hugh Earle of March, reſenting the injury done him by King John, in taking away his affianced Wife, joynes with Prince Arthur, and the King of France alſo, for all his faire ſhew of amity lately made, joynes with them, as having ſometime before married his youngeſt Daughter to Prince Arthur, and theſe with their Forces joyned, invade firſt the Turones, and then the Anjovins: of which Province Queene Eleanor the Kings Mother was left Regent, who thereupon betakes her ſelfe to Mirabell the ſtrongeſt Towne of thoſe parts, and ſends to her Sonne King John, acquainting him with the danger ſhe was in, and requiring his ſpeedy ſuccour. When in the meane time Prince Arthur takes the City, and in it his Grand-mother Queene Eleanor, whom he uſed with greater reverence and reſpect then ſhe expected. But King John at the hearing hereof, was ſo moved, calling the French King ungratefull and perfidious for succouring Prince Arthur, contrary to his League, that ſtudying preſently the Art of Revenge, he fell upon a ſtratagem, of all other the moſt prudent againſt an Enemy: For a Surpriſe in Warre is like to an Apoplexy in the Body, which ſtrikes without giving warning for defence: And this Stratagemme at this time King Iohn put in practiſe, for travelling night & day with indefatigable labor, he came upon his enemies before they were aware, and ſetting upon them unprovided, it was rather an execution then a battell; and they who remained unſlaine were taken priſoners, amongſt whom Prince Arthur himſelfe, who committed preſently to the cuſtody of Robert de Veypont in Roan, lived not long after: whether it were that attempting to make eſcape, he fell down from the wals of his Priſon, and was drowned in the River Seyne, as ſome ſay; or whether it were, that through anguiſh of minde he fell ſicke and dyed, as others ſay; or whether indeed he were made away by King Iohn, as the common fame went; Certaine it is, that he ſurvived his impriſonment but a very few dayes. But though he were gone, yet his ſiſter Eleanor, a preceding Competitor to King Iohn, was ſtill remaining: Her therefore, at this time alſo King Iohn ſeiſeth upon, and commits her in ſafe cuſtody to Briſtow Caſtle, where, after ſhe had lived long, ſhe dyed.

KIng Iohn being now freed from his Competitor, one would thinke he ſhould have ended all his troubles, but like a Hydraes head, they rather multiplyed upon him: For they who had beene ſo ready to aſſiſt Prince Arthur in his life, were now as ready to revenge his death. And firſt, Conſtance his Mother comes to King Philip, with open exclamations againſt King Iohn, accuſing him with the murther of her Sonne, and with all the inſtance of Teares and Intreaties, ſolicites him to revenge it. Hereupon King Philip ſummons King Iohn to appeare at a day, and becauſe he appeared not according to the tenure of his Homage, it was decreed againſt him, that he had forfeited all the property of his Eſtate in France, and thereupon King Philip, with mighty Forces invades his Territories, takes many Townes of principall conſequence, while King Iohn lived idle at Roan, no more regarding it then if it had not at all concerned him; and when ſome of his Lords ſeemed to marvell what he meant to ſuffer the French to rob him of ſuch goodly Cities: You ſay true indeed, (ſaith he) for it is but Robbery, and within a few dayes you ſhall ſee, I will make him to reſtore them backe with uſury. In this ſlighting humour he returnes into England, where he lookes not after the levying of Souldiers, or the raiſing of an Army, as this caſe required, but continues his old courſe for raiſing of money, accuſing ſometimes one of his Lords, ſometimes another, as if it were their fault that he had loſt theſe Townes in France; and upon the accuſations made many of them pay great ſummes of money, which brought him not only into hatred at home, but into contempt abroad; for the King of France underſtanding his unworthy courſes, proceeds more violently in his Invaſion before, getting Falais, Damfront, and all the good Townes of Normandy, but only Roan, and at laſt, though Roan was a Towne ſtrongly fortified with Walls, and more ſtrongly with the faithfull hearts of the Inhabitants, yet finding no hope of ſuccour from King Iohn, it was forced for want of Victuals to ſubmit it ſelfe to the King of France, whoſe example all the other Cities followed; and ſo all Normandy returned to the ſubjection of the French, after three hundred and ſixteene yeares that Rollo the Dane had firſt poſſeſt it. It was now the yeare 1205. and the fourth of King Iohns Raigne, about which time, the two props of his Eſtate, or rather indeed, the two Bridles of his intemperancy, dyed, his Mother Queene Eleanor, whoſe vertues had oftentimes qualified the vices of her Sonne; and Hubert Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, who repented him at his death of nothing more, then that he had beene an Inſtrument of bringing him to the Crowne.

And

And now King Iohn being a Subſtantive of himſelfe, hath a deviſe in his head to make his ſubjects as willing to give him money as he was to have it: for knowing the great diſcontentment they all had for his loſſes in France; he gives it out, that he would preſently raiſe an Army, for recovery of thoſe loſſes, if he might have money to goe about it: whereupon, never was money given with more alacrity; and as ſoone as he had it, he inſtantly went to Porteſmouth, and there took Shipping before it was poſſible for his Lords and others to be in readineſſe to accompany him; and ſayling forward ſome certaine Leagues into the Sea, upon a ſudden he returnes backe againe, and then laies the fault upon his Lords, that had not followed him; and for this backwardneſſe of theirs, impoſed afterwards great Fines upon them; by which meanes he got money no leſſe by pretence of his not going, then he had done before by pretence of his going. About this time died Geoffrey Fits-Peter Juſtitiar of England, who while he lived kept the King in ſome awe, in ſo much, as hearing he was dead, he ſwore by the feete of God, that now at length he was King of England; and with great rejoycing ſaid to ſome Lords about him: Now when this man comes into Hell, let him ſalute the Arch-Biſhop Hubert, whom certainely he ſhall finde there. But Philip, King of France, intending to leave the Engliſh nothing on that ſide the Sea, invadeth Chinon, and takes it; and in it the valiant Captaine Roger Lacie, which had given a period to King Philips victories, had not Guido the husband of Conſtantia Prince Arthurs Mother revolted to King Iohn; who with his aſſiſtance once againe leavies an Army, beſiegeth Mount Auban, a Caſtle thought impregnable, and within fifteene dayes takes it, which Charles the Great could not get with his ſeven yeares ſiege: where ſo great a number of French Lords were taken priſoners, that King Iohn ſent a Catalogue of their names into England, for a memoriall of ſo great a victory. After this, he taketh the ſtrong Towne of Angiers, and utterly defaceth it; for which afterward he was ſorry, as being the Towne where he was borne. But now when the two Kings were ready to meete, and to give battell, interceſſion was made by friends of both ſides, and thereupon a Peace concluded for two yeares: and King Iohn returned into England.

King Iohn being returned, performes no leſſe worthy acts at home, then he had done in France: for firſt he invades the Borders of Scotland, and brings Alexander King of Scots to doe him homage; and then underſtanding many of the Iriſh to be revolted, he paſſeth over to Dublin, and reduceth them to his obedience; and then placing John Biſhop of Norwich Governour there, he returnes into England; where paſſing through Wales, he ſubdueth certaine Rebels there, and takes eight and twenty children of the beſt Families, for pledges of their future loyalty; but not long after, hearing they grew mutinous and rebelled againe, he was ſo incenſed, that he would not goe to dinner till he had ſeene thoſe twenty eight children to be all hanged before his face: ſo inconſiderate a thing is the deſire of revenge, that it makes no difference betweene innocency and guiltineſſe; though indeed a thing oftentimes muſt be done for example, which conſidered in it ſelfe, would be forborne.

And it was the yeare 1214. and the fourteenth of K. Johns Raign, when he going to Angiers, ſtrongly repaires it; and the Province of Poictou revolted to him; which Lewis King Philips ſonne underſtanding, comes upon them with a mighty Army, and uſing much ſeverity upon the Authors of the revolt, takes priſoners, Reynold Earle of Boleigne, and William Earle of Saliſbury, with many others of King Johns Captaines, and defeateth his whole Army: whereof when King Iohn was certified, he grew in a manner deſperate, and as a man dejected, makes a new Truce upon any conditions with the King of France, and returnes into England; where he findes a worſe buſineſſe ready to entertaine him: for the Lords of the Realme having often required their ancient Rights and Liberties; and finding nothing but deluſions, endure no longer to be abuſed; but meeting at Saint Edmundsbery, they there conferre how they may finde a remedy to redreſſe this evill; and at laſt concluded to goe to the King themſelves in perſon, and make their Demands;

whereof a Charter was produced, that had beene formerly granted in King Henry the firſts time: whereupon comming to the King after Chriſtmas, lying then in the New Temple, and acquainting him with their Demands; he gives them this faire Anſwer, that within a few dayes he would give them ſatisfaction; and cauſeth the Biſhops of Canterbury and Ely, with William Marſhall, Earle of Glocester, to paſſe their words for him, that it ſhould be performed. But the King meaning nothing leſſe then to doe as he ſaid, fals preſently a leavying of Souldiers; which the Lords underſtanding, they alſo doe the like; and going to the Biſhop of Canterbury, deliver him a Copy of their Demands, and require the Kings Anſwer. But the Biſhop ſhewing it to the King, and humbly intreating him to give the Lords a ſatisfactory Anſwer: he ſwore a great Oath, they might as well demand the Kingdome, and that he would die before he would yeeld to any ſuch demands. Whereupon the Lords (knowing now what they were to truſt to) fall to beſiege Northampton, and after that, Redford, which is yeelded to them; and withall they are ſent to by the Londoners, to ſignifie their readineſſe to joyne with them. At this time the King was at Windſor providing an Army, but hearing the Londoners were joyned with the Lords, he thought it no good way to proceed by force, but rather by fraud; and thereupon ſends to the Lords, that if they would come to him to Windſor, he would grant their demands. The Lords comming thither, but in a Military manner, (for they durſt not truſt his word) the King ſaluted them all kindly, and promiſed to give them ſatisfaction in all they demanded; and ſo in a Meadow betweene Windſor and Staines, called Running-meade, he freely conſented to confirme their former Liberties; and was content ſome grave Perſonages ſhould be choſen to ſee it performed. But the next day, when it ſhould be done, he gets him gone to South-hampton, and from thence to the Ile of Wight; where adviſing with his Councell, what in this caſe was fitteſt to be done: It was concluded he ſhould ſend to the Pope, to acquaint him with this mutiny of the Lords, and to require his help: while the King in the meane time lived skulking up and downe in corners, that no man might know where to find him; or which is worſe (as ſome write) roving about and practiſing Piracy. And now the Lords beginne to ſuſpect fraud, when ſhortly after the Kings Meſſengers, who were Walter and John, Biſhops of Worceſter and Norwich, returne with the Popes Decree; which was, that the Kings Grant to the Lords ſhould be void: with this Decree, the King after three moneths that he had ſtaied in the Ile of Wight, comming backe to Windſor, acquaints the Lords; but they accuſing the Meſſengers for falſe informing the Pope, and the Pope alſo for making a Decree without hearing both ſides, betake them to Armes, and ſweare by the holy Altar to be revenged for this ludification and injurious dealing. The King finding the Lords nothing moved with the Popes Decree, ſends againe unto him, to acquaint him with it: who mightily incenſed to have his Decree ſo ſleighted, adjudgeth them all to be held as enemies of Religion; and gives power to Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, and to the Abbot of Reading to Excommunicate them. In the meane time the King had ſent the Biſhop of Worceſter, Chancellour of England, and others with his Seale, to hire Souldiers from the parts beyond the Seas; who returned ſhortly after, bringing along with him out of Poictou and Glaſconie, Savery de Malcon, Geoffrey and Oliver Botevile, brothers, & under their conduct ſo great a rabble, that with theſe Forces, within halfe a yeare the King had gotten all the Caſtles of the Barons, to the borders of Scotland. And now he divides his Army, committing part of it to his brother William, Earle of Salisbury, and others, to ſet upon London; and with the other part he goes himſelfe into Yorkſhire, where moſt of the Lords had Poſſeſſions, which in moſt cruell manner he deſtroyeth with fire and ſword. The Lords being thus on all ſides diſtreſſed, reſolve upon a courſe, neither honourable nor ſafe; yet ſuch as neceſſity made ſeeme both: they ſend to Philip King of France, requiring him to ſend over his ſonne Lewis to their aide, and promiſing they would ſubmit themſelves to be governed by him, and take him for their Soveraigne. To this motion of the Lords, King Philip was as forward as themſelves; which King John underſtanding, ſends againe to the Pope, requiring him to uſe his authority to ſtay the

the King of France from comming. But King Philip, though much regarding the requeſt of the Pope, yet nothing ſo much as the requeſt of England, with all ſpeed provides an Army, and with a fleete of ſixe hundred ſayle, ſends over his ſonne Lewis, who paſſing into England, landeth at Sandwich, whither many of the Lords, and others reſort unto him; and giving Oaths of Allegeance, joyne themſelves with him. King John at this time was at Dover, but not daring to ſtay there for feare of the enemy, he commits the Caſtle to Hubert Burgh, and goeth himſelfe to Canterbury, and from thence to Wincheſter in manner of a flight, which Prince Lewis underſtanding, goeth ſtraight to London, and by a plauſible Oration makes that City ſure unto him: and thither come to him the King of Scots with an Army of choyce Souldiers, as alſo the Earles, Warren, Arundel, Salisbury, with many others. And now Prince Lewis paſſeth all the Countrey over without reſiſtance, but not without infinite outrages committed by his Souldiers, which it was not in him to hinder: and then comming to Norwich, he takes that City eaſily, but Dover coſt him a longer ſiege, as being defended by the valiant and loyall Captaine Hubert Burgh. In this meane while King John finding his enemies imployed in theſe difficult ſieges; ſends about and gathers a rabble of all raskall people to him, and with them runneth over all the Countrey, ſpoyling and killing in moſt barbarous manner; and now was the kingdome made the Stage of all miſeries of rapine and cruelty: two Armies in it on foote at once, each of them ſeeking to prey upon the other, and both of them upon the Countrey. But the King comming to Wallpoole in Norfolke, where the Waſhes were to be paſſed over, he ſendeth one to ſearch where the Foord was paſſable, and there himſelfe with ſome few paſſed over, but the multitude, with all the cariages, paſſing without order, they cared not where, were all drowned; with which dyſaſter, the King through anguiſh of minde fell into a Feaver, whereof within a few dayes he died. And here was an end of all the troubles of this King: In whom it is obſervable, that loving his eaſe, ſo well as he did, he ſhould runne voluntarily into ſuch troubles, eſpecially at home, upon ſo ſmall occaſions as he did; but it ſhould ſeeme there is no greater hinderance to men for accompliſhing their will, then their owne wilfulneſſe.

Of his Taxations.

TO ſpeake of his Taxations, it may not unproperly be ſaid that it was but one continued Taxation all his Raigne through; yet to divide it into parts: his firſt was the Taxation of three ſhillings upon every Plough-land through the kingdome, to pay the thirty thouſand Markes, for his Neece Blanches Portion; and to mend this Taxation, he ſeiſeth upon all the Temporalties of his brother Geoffrey Arch-biſhop of Yorke, for oppoſing it; and for a continuation, he makes a progreſſe ſhortly after into all the North parts, where he exacts great Fines of offenders in his Foreſts. Very ſhortly after ſolicited by the Popes Legate, he grants a Subſidy of the fortieth part of al his ſubjects Revenues for one year, to ſuccor the Holy Land. Shortly after this, he chargeth his Earls and Barons with the loſſes he ſuſtained in France, & thereupon Fines them to pay the ſeventh part of all their goods: neither ſpared he the Church, or the Commons in this Impoſition. Before this year is ended another Levy is made at a Parliament in Oxford, wherein is granted two Markes and a halfe of every knights Fee, for Military aide; neither are the Clergy exempted from paying their part: and before another yeare is out, another Impoſition is laid of the thirteenth part of all movables and other goods, both of the Clergy and Laity. It may be reckoned amongſt his Taxations, that when the Monkes of Canterbury had diſpleaſed him about the election of their Arch-biſhop, he ſeiſed upon all their goods, and converted them to his owne uſe: and preſently after this, upon the like diſpleaſure, he deputes many Biſhopricks, Abbeys, and Priories into the hands of Lay-men, and confiſcates all their Revenues. To theſe may be added that he tooke eleven thouſand Markes of Silver of the King of Scots for granting him Peace. Adde to theſe alſo great ſummes of money exacted and gathered from the

the Iewes, among whom there was one that would not be ransomed, till the King caused every day one of his great teeth to be pulled out by the space of seven dayes, and then he was content to give the King tenne thousand Markes of Silver, that no more might be pulled out. Adde to these, that at his returne out of Ireland, he summoned all the Prelates of the kingdome to appeare before him; of whom he extorted for their redemption, the summe of an hundred thousand pounds Sterling. Adde lastly to these, that at his returne out of Wales, he exacts of every knight that attended him not in that expedition, two Markes.

Of his Lawes and Ordinances.

HE was the first that appointed the Formes of Civill Government in London and other Cities, endowing them also with their greatest Franchises. The first that caused Sterling money to be here Coyned; The first that ordained the Honourable Ceremonies in Creation of Earles; The first that setled the Rates and Measures for Wine, Bread, Cloath, and such other necessaries of Commerce; The first that planted English Lawes and Officers in Ireland; The first that enlarged the Royall stile with Lord of Ireland, and both annexed that kingdome, and fastned Wales to the Crowne of England.

Affaires of the Church in his time.

AFter the death of Hubert Arch-bishop of Canterbury, the Monkes of that Covent secretly in the night Elected one Reginold their sub-prior to succeed him; and caused him to goe to Rome for confirmation: but afterward doubting how the King would take it, being done without his knowledge, they crave leave of the King to chuse a fit man, the King is content to allow them the Election, but requires himselfe to have the Nomination, and thereupon commends unto them John Grey Bishop of Norwich, whom he specially favoured, and accordingly the Monkes Elect him. But the matter being afterward referred to the Pope, which of these two Elections should stand good, after many Allegations of both sides, the Pope to shew himselfe indifferent to both, disallowes them both, and nominates a third man, one Stephen Lanthon, Cardinall of Saint Chrysogone, an Englishman borne, and a man of great learning. The Monkes admit him, but the King opposeth it: and now, as it were, a Prize began to be played between the two Swords, the Spirituall and the Temporall: but he that used the Spirituall Sword, proved so much the better Fencer, that he disarmed the other, and tooke away his temporall Sword from him. It is true, in the first Venue, the King gave the Pope as good as he brought; for as the Pope threatned the King to excommunicate him, and to interdict the kingdome; So the King threatned the Pope to pulliste his Authority, and to banish Clergy men out of the Realme. In the second Venue, as the Pope acted as much as he had threatned; (for he interdicted the kingdome) So the King performed as much as he had spoken; (for he drove the Monkes out of their Cloyster) yet at last when Pandulphus the Popes Legate came into England, and made appeare to the King in what great dangers he stood; First, of the King of France, by Invasion; and then of his owne Subjects, by Rebellion; for both which, there was no other helpe but Reconcilement with the Pope; he so touched him to the quicke, that he made him leave his great words, and fall to asking forgivenesse. So as taking off the Crowne from his head, he laid it downe at Pandulphus feete, to be disposed of, as the Pope should please. And Pandulphus stucke not to take up his Crowne, and to keepe it three or foure dayes in his hands before he restored it; and did not then neither, but upon condition that he and his Successours should hold the kingdome of the See of Rome, at the annuall tribute of a thousand Markes. And all those three or foure dayes, in which Pandulphus kept the Crowne, it might be truely said, the kingdome was without a King. And upon this, no doubt it was that Peter an Hermite in a Propheticall Rapture had given out some time before, fore, that by Ascension day, there should be no King of England. Which though in some sort it was true, yet in some sort it was not true, and it was in the Prerogative of the King to make his owne interpretation: And so it cost the poore Hermite and his Sonne their lives, and they remaine as a pillar of Salt, to make men take heed of Ludere cum Sanctis; and of playing the Critickes in matters of State.

But by this meanes the kingdome was released of the Interdiction, which had continued six yeares, three moneths, and foureteene dayes: During all which time, there was no publique Exercise of Religion; no Churches open; no Ecclesiasticall Sacraments administred, but onely to them that were in danger of death, and baptisme to children, all that dyed were buryed like dogges, in ditches and corners, but onely such as had purchased or procured licence from the Pope.

In this Kings Raigne, Saint Dominicke continued his Preaching ten yeares together, against the Albigenses. Also in his time Saint Francis renounced the world, and when a Priest to whom he offered it, would not take his money, he cast it away, and entred into a Vow of perpetuall Poverty. Also in this Kings time, was held the Lateran Councell, under Pope Innocent the Third, in which was established the Popes power over Princes, and in matters of Faith, Auricular confession, and Transubstantiation.

Of his Irreligion.

I Need not relate a Speech of his, though very unchristian, that having beene a little before reconciled to the Pope, and then taking an overthrow in France, in great anger he cryed out, that nothing had prospered with him since the time he was reconciled to God and the Pope. Nor another speech of his, which though spoken merrily, was in good earnest very irreligious, that being on a time a hunting at the opening of a fat Bucke, he said: See how this Deere hath prospered, and how fat he is, and yet I dare sweare he never heard Masse. It is sufficient to relate one act of his, (if it be true which some write) that being in some distresse, he sent Thomas Hardington, and Ralph Fitz Nichols, knights, in Embassage to Miramamolin King of Affricke and Morocco, with offer of his kingdome to him, upon condition he would come and aide him; and that if he prevailed, he would himselfe become a Mahometan, and renounce the Christian Faith. Though some there be that say, All these were but false Criminations charged upon him by Monkes that did not love him. But though we believe not these things of him; yet to suffer his kingdome to stand Interdicted so many yeares together, upon so small occasion as he did, was certainely no good signe of Religion in him. Yet one Act he did, wherein he shewed a respect to Religion, by the honour he did to a Religious man: For Hugh Bishop of Lincolne lying very sicke, he not onely went to visit him, but being dead, was one of the three Kings, (the other two were, William King of Scotland, and the King of Southwales) that carryed his Herse upon their shoulders, till they delivered it to the Peeres, and the Peeres afterward to the Arch-bishops and Bishops to carry it into the Quire.

Workes of piety done by him, or by others in his time.

YEt did this King leave more Workes of Piety behinde him, then all his Subjects that were in his time. For he Founded the Abbey of Bowley in the New Forest in Hampshire: also an Abbey of blacke Monkes in the City of Winchester, and the Monastery of Farendon, and the Monastery of Hales Owen in Shropshire: he reedified Godstow and Wroxell, and enlarged the Chappell of Knaresborough. Now for his Subjects, onely Richard Prior of Bermondsey builded an House against the wall of the said house of Bermondsey, called the Almary or Hospitall of Converts and Children, in honour of Saint Thomas. In this Kings time Saint Mary Overeyes in Southwarke was begun to be builded, and the Stone Bridge over the Thames, was by by the Merchants of London finiſhed. Alſo Hubert Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, Founded a Monaſtery at Weſt Derham in Norfolke, which upon the diſſolution came to the family of the Derhams, who hold it to this day.

Of his Lawes and Ordinances.

IN this Kings time, five and thirty of the moſt ſubſtantiall Citizens of London, were choſen out, and called the Counſell of the City, and the King gave the City liberty to alter their Major and Sheriffes every yeare, which before continued during life. He cauſed the Lawes of England to be executed in Ireland, and money to be Coyned there, according to the weight of Engliſh money.

Of his Wives and Children.

KING Iohn lived to have three Wives: His firſt was Alice Daughter of Humbert Earle of Morton, who left him a Widower without iſſue. His ſecond was Iſabell Daughter and Heire of Robert Earle of Glaceſter, by whom no iſſue neither, divorced from her by reaſon of Conſanguinity in the third degree. His third Wife was Iſabel Daughter and Heire of Aymer Earle of Angouleſme, Affianced before to Hugh le Brun, Earle of March: By this Wife he had two Sonnes, Henry and Richard, and three Daughters, Ioane, Eleanor, and Iſabell: Henry ſucceeded him in the kingdome; Richard was Earle of Cornwall, and Crowned King of the Romans, and had iſſue Henry and Iohn, that dyed without iſſue: alſo Edmund Earle of Cornwall, and others. Ioane his eldeſt Daughter marryed to Alexander the ſecond King of Scots, dyed without iſſue: Eleanor the ſecond Daughter (marryed to Simon Earle of Leyceſter) had iſſue Henry, Simon, Almaricke, Guy, Richard, and Eleanor. Henry ſlaine without iſſue. Simon Earle of Bigorre, and anceſtour to a Family of the Mountfords in France. Almaricke, firſt a Prieſt, after a knight. Guy Earle of Angleria in Italy, and Progenitour of the Mountfords in Thuſcany, and of the Earles of the Campo Bacchi in the kingdome of Naples. Richard, remaining privily in England, and changing his name from Mountford to Wellesborne, was anceſtour of the Wellesburnes in England. Eleanor borne in England, brought up in France, marryed into Wales, to Prince Lewin ap Griffith. Iſabel his youngeſt Daughter, marryed to the Emperour Frederjcke the ſecond, had iſſue, Henry appointed to be King of Sicilie, and Margaret Wife of Albret Langrave of Thurine. She dyed in Childbed, after ſhe had beene Empreſſe ſixe yeares. He had alſo two naturall Sonnes, Geoffrey Fitz Roy, and Richard, that marryed the Daughter and Heire of Fulbert de Dover, (who built Childham Caſtle) had iſſue by her, of whom ſome Families of good account are deſcended. Alſo one baſe Daughter named Ioane, marryed to Lewin Prince of Wales.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

HE was of Stature indifferent tall, and ſomething fat, of a lowre and angry countenance, and concerning his conditions, it may be ſaid, that his Nature and his Fortune did not well agree: For naturally he loved his eaſe, yet his Fortune was to be ever in Action. He won more of his Enemies by ſurpriſes then by Battels, which ſhewes he had more of Lightning in him then of Thunder. He was never ſo true of his word as when he threatned, becauſe he meant alwayes as cruelly as he ſpake, not alwayes as graciouſly; and he that would have known what it was he never meant to performe, muſt have looked upon his promiſes. He was neither fit for Proſperity nor Adverſity: For Proſperity made him inſolent, and Adverſity dejected, a meane Fortune would have ſuited beſt with him. He was all that he was by Fits: Sometimes doing nothing without deliberation, and ſometimes doing all upon a ſudden; Sometimes very Religious, and ſometimes ſcarce a Chriſtian. His inſatiableneſſe of money was not ſo much as that no man knew knew what he did with it, gotten with much noyſe, but ſpent in ſilence. He was but intemperate in his beſt temper, but when diſtempered with ſickneſſe, moſt of all, as appeared at his laſt, when being in a Feaver he would needs be eating of raw Peaches, and drinking of ſweete Ale. If we looke upon his workes we muſt needes thinke him a worthy Prince, but if upon his Actions, nothing leſſe: For his Workes of Piety were very many, as hath beene ſhewed before, but as for his Actions, he neither came to the Crowne by Juſtice, nor held it with Honour, nor left it in Peace. Yet having had many good parts in him, and eſpecially having his Royall poſterity continued to this day, we can doe no leſſe then honour his memory.

Caſualties that happened in his time.

ONe Caſualty we might count dyſaſtrous, if it had not had relation to our ſelves: for Hugh de Bones comming to aide King Iohn with threeſcore thouſand out of Britany and Flanders, by misfortune at Sea were all Drowned, to whom the King had granted Norfolk and Suffolk for the people he brought with him to Inhabit. In this Kings time were great thunders and lightnings, and ſhowers with hailſtones as big as Gooſe-Egges. Fiſhes of ſtrange ſhape were taken in England, armed with helmets and ſhields, and were like unto armed knights, ſaving that they were farre greater in proportion. About Maidſtone in Kent a certaine Monſter was found ſtrucken with the Lightning, which Monſter had a head like an Aſſe, a belly like a man, and all other parts farre differing from any other Creature.

VVHen Prince Lewis of France was come into England, and was received by the Lords and by the Londoners, King Iohn with an Army went into the North parts, and comming to Wallpoole, where he was to paſſe over the Waſhes, he ſent one to ſearch where the water was paſſable, and there himſelfe with ſome few paſſeth over, but the multitude with all his Carriages and Treaſure paſſing without Order, they cared not where, were all Drowned. With the griefe of which diſaſter, and perhaps diſtempered in his body before, he fell into a Feaver and was let blood; but keeping an ill dyet, (as indeed he never kept good) eating greene Peaches, and drinking ſweete Ale, he fell into a looſeneſſe, and grew preſently ſo weake, that there was much adoe to get him to Newarke, where ſoone after he dyed. Though indeed it be diverſly related; Caxton ſaith, he was poyſoned at Swineſheads Abbey by a Monke of that Covent, the manner and cauſe this: The King being there, and hearing it ſpoken how cheape Corne was, ſhould ſay, he would ere long make it dearer, and make a penny loafe be ſold for a ſhilling. At this ſpeech the Monke tooke ſuch indignation, that he went and put the poyſon of a Toade into a cup of Wine, and brought it to the King, telling him there was ſuch a cup of Wine as he had never drunke in all his life, and therewithall tooke the aſſay of it himſelfe, which made the King to drinke the more boldly of it, but finding himſelfe preſently very ill upon it, he asked for the Monke, and when it was told him that he was falne downe dead; then (ſaith the King) God have mercy upon me, I doubted as much. Others ſay, the poyſon was given in a diſh of Peares. But the Phyſitian that diſ-bowelled his body, found no ſigne of poyſon in it, and therefore not likely to be true; but howſoever the manner of his death be uncertaine, yet this is certaine, that at this time and place he dyed, on the 19. day of October, in the yeare 1216. when he had Raigned ſeventeene yeares and ſixe moneths; Lived one and fifty: He was buryed, his bowels at Croxton Abbey, his body at Worceſter under the High Altar, wrapped in a Monkes Cowle, which the ſuperſtition of that time accounted Sacred, and a defenſative againſt all evill Spirits.

Of the prises of things in his time.

NEitheir is this unfit to be recorded in Chronicles, to the end comparison may be made betweene the time past and the present: as in the time of King Henry the second, a Quarter of Wheate was sold for twelve pence; a Quarter of Beanes or Oates for a groat. Neitheir is the price of Silver it selfe much lesse altered, for an ounce of Silver was then valued but at twenty pence; which is now valued at least at five shillings. Whereof Philosophers must tell the reason, for seeing scarcity makes things deare, why should not plenty make them cheape?

Of Men of speciall Note in his time.

IN Military matters there were many famous men in his time, as Robert Fitz-Roger, and Richard Mount-Fitchet, with many others; but chiefely two, whose Acts make them specially memorable: the one was Hubert Burgh, whom K. John had left Governour of Dover Castle, of whom it is related, that when Prince Lewis of France came to take the Towne, and found it difficult to be taken by force; he sent to Hubert, whose brother Thomas he had taken prisoner a little before; that unlesse he would surrender the Castle, he should presently see his brother Thomas be put to death with exquisite torments before his eyes: but this threatning moved not Hubert at all, who more regarded his owne loyalty, then his brothers life: then Prince Lewis sent againe, offering him a great summe of money; but neither did this move, but he kept his loyalty as inexpugnable as his Castle. The other was Robert Fitz-Water, of whom it is related, that King John being with an Army in France, one of his knights in a great bravery would needs make a challenge to any of the French Campe, that durst encounter him in a Combat, when presently comes forth this Robert Fitz-Water; and in the encounter, threw horse and man downe to the ground: whereof when King John heard, By Gods tooth (saith he) he were a King indeed that had such a Champion; whereupon some that stood by, saying to him, He is Sir, a servant of your owne, it is Robert Fitz-Water, whom you have banished. Whereupon his sentence of banishment was presently reversed, and the King received him, as he well deserved, into speciall favour. In matter of Literature also there lived many famous men in the Kings Raigne; as Geoffrey Vinesauf, Simon Fraxinus, alias Ash, Adam Dorensis, John de Oxford, Colman simamed The wise, Richard Canonicus, William Peregrine, Alane Tewksbery, Gervasius Doroberneusis, John Hamvill, Nigell Worker, Gilbert Holland, Benet de Peterborough, William Parvus a Monke of Newburgh, Roger Hoveden, Hubert Walter, Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, Alexander Theologus, Gervasius Tilberiensis, Gyraldus Cambrensis, Johannes Devonius, Walter Mapis, Radulphus de Diceto, Gilbert Legley, Mauricius Morganius, John de Fordeham, William Leycester, Joceline Brakeland, Roger of Crowland, Hugh White, alias Candidus, who wrote an History intituled Historia Petroburgensis; John de Saint Omer, Adam Barking, John Gray an Historigrapher, and Bishop of Norwich, Walter of Coventry, Radulphus Niger, and lastly, Simon Thurvay, who for came at last so utterly ignorant, that hardly he could read a letter of the booke.

THE LIFE and RAIGNE OF KING HENRY THE THIRD.

Of his comming to the Crowne, and of Acts done in his Minority.

KING John being dead, his eldest soone Henry was next to succeed: who being but nine yeares old, though he were capable of having his Right, yet he was scarce capable of understanding his Right: especially there being another at that time, to whom a great part of the Kingdome had sworne Allegeance. But those Lords who had beene constant to the Father, notwithstanding his faults, were more tender of the son, who was altogether innocent, and whose gracious aspect gave no small hope of a better disposition. Amongst all which Lords, there was none so eminent in worthinesse, none so neare him in Alliance, as William Marshall Earle of Pembroke, who had married his Aunt; and he drawing the rest of the Lords together, with a solemne Oration in behalfe of the young Prince, so confirmed them, and so ordered the matter, that on the twenty eight day of October, in the yeare 1216. he was Crowned at Glocester, by Peter Bishop of Winchester, and Joceline Bishop of Bathe, in the presence of Guallo the Popes Legat, and many Lords and Bishops: and the said William Earle of Pembroke, by a generall consent, assigned Protector of the Realme during the Kings Minority. In which place, the first thing he did, was to give notice of the new Kings Coronation to all the Countries round about; and proclaime pardon to all offenders, that within a time limited should come and submit themselves to him. In the meane time Prince Lewis of France, who at his first hearing of King Johns death, thought himselfe then sure of injoying the Kingdome quietly, and that he should need to feare no more opposition; now that he heares of the new Kings Crowning, and that so solemnly, and with so unanimous a consent, he begins to thinke himselfe in worse case then before; and to grow jealous of the English Lords that had adhered to him, what they would doe in this new world. And indeed a conflict was already growne in their minds, which of the two Obligations should be the greater; either that of their Oath to Prince Lewis, or that of their Allegeance to King Henry. They could not but think it extreme ungratfulnes to forsake Prince Lewis, whom they had themselves invited to come: and they could not but thinke it extreme undutifulnesse to stand out in opposition against K. Henry, their naturall Soveraigne: and that which added no small weight to this scale, was a discovery lately made by the Viscount Melun a French Lord at the time of his death, who confessed as a matter of conscience, that Prince Lewis had vowed, if once he got the kingdome, vtterly to extirpate all the English Nobility, and to admit none but French to any place of dignity. But whether any of these reasons, or any other were their motives, certaine it is, that many of them, of whom were principall, the Earles of Arundell, Warren, Salisbury, and William, the eldest sonne of the Protectour, shrunke from Prince Lewis, and went to King Henry, as thinking no Obligation so great as Allegeance: and many againe continued constant to Prince Lewis, as thinking no Obligation so great as an Oath. And now Prince Lewis, to cast the Dice of Fortune, before his enemies, though they had gotten them a Head, should gather to a head, and draw more forces together, staying himselfe at London, sent his Lieutenants with an Army of twenty thousand, to take in as many Townes as they could; and many they tooke with small opposition: but comming to Lincolne, where though they had the Towne it selfe, yet the Castle stood out, and had beene defended by a Noble Lady a whole yeare before; they found such resistance, that their proceeding was there arrested; for thither came presently William the Protectour, with his sonne William, the Bishops of Winchester, Salisbury, and Chester; the Earles of Salisbury, Ferrers and Albemarle, William de Albinet, William de Cantilupe, Falcasius, Thomas Basset, Robert Vipont, Brent de Lisle, Geffrey Lacie, and many other Barons, with all the power of the young King: who with wonderfull violence assault the City; at which time it was propounded by the French, to sally forth, and give them battell; but conceiving their Army to be greater then indeed it was (for the English had set double Ensignes to every Company, which made a shew of twice as many as they were) they forbare that course, and kept them selves within the Towne; by which meanes being cooped up and straitned in place, so as they could not make vse of their Forces as otherwise they might; they were in conclusion all defeated, and all the principall men of the English that had adhered to Prince Lewis, were taken prisoners: as namely, Saer Earle of Winchester, Henry de Bohun Earle of Hereford, Gilbert de Gant, lately made Earle of Lincolne by Prince Lewis, Robert Fitzwater, Richard Mount-fitchet, William Hawbeby, William Beauchamp, William Maudet, Oliver Hurcourt, Roger de Creffy, William de Colvile, William de Ros, Robert de Ropesley, Ralph Chenduit Barons; besides foure hundred knights or men at Armes. Onely the Earle of Perch their Generall, being compassed about, and willed to render himselfe, swore he would never become prisoner to any English: and thereupon was runne thorow the sight of his Helmet into the braines, and instantly died. This was a maine blow to Prince Lewis, and the last of his battels in England; and because the City was very rich in Merchandise, the English in derision called it Lewis Faire. But Prince Lewis was not yet discouraged, for he had sent to King Philip his Father, to send him new supplies out of France; and new supplies were indeed sent: but Hubert de Burgh, Governour of Dover, being as vigilant as he was valiant, watched their comming, and in a Sea-fight defeated them all, of whom but few escaped: and now this blow at Sea was so much greater then that at Land; that where that made him onely doubt, this made him despaire, at least made him malleable, and fit to be wrought upon by composition; whereupon it was at last concluded, that Prince Lewis should have fifteene thousand Markes for the charges he had beene at, and abjure his claime to any interest in the kingdome; and withall to worke his Father for restitution of such Provinces in France as appertained to this Crowne: and that when himselfe should be King, he should resigne them in a peaceable manner. On the other part, King Henry takes his Oath; and for him the Legat Guallo and the Protectour, to restore vnto the Barons of the Realme, and other his subjects, all their Rights and Priviledges; for which the discord beganne betweene the late King and his people. After this Prince Lewis is honourably attended to Dover, and departs out of England about Michaelmas, above two yeares after his first arrivall.

And now the kingdome is come to vnity within it selfe, one King and one people; and for a yeare or two there was little to be done, onely some few there were, whom whom the corruption of the times had engendred; and who being borne in a storme, could not live in a calme: of whom the principall were the Earle of Albemarle, Robert de Vipont, Foulke de Brent, Brian de Lisle and Hugh de Baylioll; who bustling about, got possession of some Castles: with what intention, all men knew; but with what hope of effecting their intention, no man could imagine: for being but a handfull of men to the body of the Realme; they were easily suppressed, and either brought to acknowledge their faults, or else punished for not acknowledging them. It was now the fourth yeare of King Henries Raighe; at which time William Earle of Pembroke, Protectour of the Realme, died, and was buried in the new Temple at London: in whose place came the Bishop of Winchester, and now was the King the second time Crowned, and had granted him by Parliament; for Escuage, two Markes of silver of every knights Fee; for the affaires of the kingdome, and recovery of his Transmarine Dominions, which is now designed and Malleon de Savery, the Poictovin, with William Long-sword Earle of Salisbury; sent over to try the affections of that people; whom they finde for the most part inclinable to the obedience of this Crowne: but the King of France being required peaceably to deliver them; made answer, that having gotten them by the sword, by the sword he would hold them. But now the King being come to some yeares of understanding, was in a Parliament holden at London, put in minde by the Archbishop of Canterbury, of the Oath he had taken for confirmation of the Liberties of the kingdome, which though oppugned by some (and specially by William Brewer, and Hubert de Burgh, whom the King had now made his chiefe Justiciar) as having beene an Act of constraint: yet the King then againe ratified, and twelve knights or other Legat men of every Shire, by Writs were charged to examine what the Lawes and Liberties were which the kingdome injoyed under his Grandfather; and that they should returne them by a certaine day: and here the King by Parliament resumeth into his hands such Alienations as had beene made by his Ancestors of any Crowne Land. The next yeare after, another Parliament is held at Westminster, wherein is required the fiftieth part of all the moyables, both of the Cleargy and Laity, for the recovery of those parts in France, with-held from the Crowne by Lewis now King, contrary to his Oath and promise made here in England at his departure; which, though it concerned the Honour and Dignity of the kingdome, and the estates of most of the Nobility; yet would it not be yeelded to, but upon confirmation of their Liberties, which in the end was obtained, in the same words and forme as King John had granted them in the two Charters before: and twelve knights are chosen in every Shire, to dispart the old Forests from the new, and the new to be laid open and ploughed, and improved, to the great comfort and benfit of the subject; and two yeares they were accordingly injoyed.

of his Acts after he came to be of age.

IT was now the tenth yeare of King Henries Raigne; and being about nineteene yeares of age, he claimed to take the government of the kingdome into his own hands, and no longer to be under a Protectour; and now will presently appeare the difference betweene a Prince that is ruled by good Counsell; and a Prince that will doe all of himselfe, and take no advise. For the ten yeares hee was ruled by a Protectour, were all passed, as it were in a calme, without noyse or clamour; but as soone as he tooke upon him the government himselfe, there grew presently stormes and tumults; no quietnesse either to the subject or himselfe: nothing but grievances all the long time of his Raigne. For at the Parliament now holden at Oxford, as soone as he was Crowned againe, he presently cancels and annuls the Charter of the Forests, as granted in his Nonage; and therefore he not bound to observe it: and then not using any longer the Seale which the Protectour had used, he makes a new; and causeth a Proclamation to be made, that whosoever would enjoy any benefit of Grants under his Seale, should come and have them signed by his new Seale; by which course he drew much mony from many: and this was the first grievance. Shortly after, he commits the keeping of Barkehamstead Caſtle to one Walleran a Dutchman, which Caſtle, belonged to his Brother Richard Earle of Cornewall: but when Earle Richard required to have the poſſeſſion as of right he ought, it was then plotted by Hubert Burgh Chiefe Juſtice, and the Kings chiefe Counſellor, to commit him to priſon, which the Earle underſtanding, or at leaſt ſuſpecting, flies preſently to Marlebrough, where he finds William Earle Marſhall his vowed friend, with whom he hathens to Stamford, and there meets with the Earles of Cheſter, Gloceſter, Warren, Hereford, Ferrers, Warwicke, and divers other Barons; who all conſederate together, and ſend to the King, that unleſſe he reſtore the Caſtle to his brother, and to them the Liberties of Forreſts which he had lately cancelled at Oxford, they would ſeeke to recover them by the ſword. Hereupon King Henry to pacifie his brother, not onely renders the Caſtle to him, but gives him beſides all that his Mother had in Dower, and alſo great poſſeſſions which the Earle of Britaine, and the Earle of Bolleine lately deceaſed, had in England, but to the Petition of the Lords he makes a dilatory anſwer, and this was another grievance. Not long after King Henry is perſwaded by Hughde le Brun, Earle of March, who had married his Mother, to make a journey into France, for recovery of his right there: but the Earle perſwaded it for cauſe of his owne, which to have diſcovered, had beene no way to compaſſe them, he muſt therefore lay ſome colours upon his worke, and it was colour enough, that the action would be of great benefit to the King, if it might ſucceed, and the likelihood of ſucceeding was moſt apparent, by reaſon of the great inclination of the people to King Henry, and their great averſneſſe from King Lewis. Upon theſe colours, King Henry undertaking the action, raiſeth great ſummes of money from the Clergy, and from the Londoners for redemption of their Liberties, and takes the third part of all the goods of the Jewes; but when he returned home a yeare after, without having done any thing but ſpent his treaſure, and his time, and that which was more worth then both theſe, the lives of many Noble men and others, this was another grievance. And now King Henry bringing many Poictouins over with him, who had ſerved him in his warres, he was to reward them there, which he could not doe, but by diſplacing and ſpoyle of his Officers. Firſt therefore he calleth Ralph Bretton Treaſurer of his Chamber to account, and grievouſly Fines him for defrauding him in his Office: Then likewiſe is Hubert de Burgh Chiefe Juſticiar, and his Chiefe Counſellour called to account for ſuch Treaſure as paſſed his Office, who being further charged with crimes of Treaſon, flies to the Church of Merton for ſanctuary; from whence, when the King commanded him to be drawne out by violence, the Biſhop of London hearing of it, commanded him to be returned back to ſanctuary, upon paine of Excommunication: but the King commanding him to be kept from ſuſtenance, hunger at laſt enforced him to render himſelfe to the Kings mercy: all his goods, which were very great, confiſcate. Alſo Walter Biſhop of Carlile is thruſt out of his Office of Treaſure, and William Rodon knight, from his place of Marſhall of the Kings houſe, and all the chiefe Counſellours, Biſhops, Earles, and Barons of the kingdome are removed, as diſtruſted, and onely ſtrangers preferred to their roomes: of which courſe, Peter de Rupibus a Poictouin, Biſhop of Winchester, and one Peter de Rivalis, the Kings ſpeciall Favorite, were ſaid to be the Authors: and this was another grievance. The King was now about eight or nine and twenty yeares old, and a Conſultation was had for a fit wife for him. There was propounded a ſiſter of Alexander King of Scots, but it was not thought fit the King ſhould marry the younger ſiſter, when Hubert de Burgh had married the elder: he therefore takes one of his owne chooſing, and marries Eleanor, daughter to Raymond Earle of Province, by which match he neither had Pormade vaine by diſtance: onely he had by her a number of poore kindred, who to great charge as if he had beene to have Mountaines with her: and this was another grievance. And now is the ſcore of theſe grievances called upon to be paid, for the

the Lords could no longer endure ſo many indignities, to ſee themſelves ſleighted, and onely ſtrangers advanced; as Foulke de Brent, who held the Earledomes of Nottingham, Oxford, Bedford, and Buckingham, and others the like: and to ſee their perſons expoſed to danger, and their eſtates to ruine: for which no remedy could be, but onely the Kings confirming their Charter of Liberties: wherein it is ſtrange to obſerve upon what different grounds the King and the Lords went: It ſeemes the King thought, that to confirme that Charter, were to make himſelfe to be leſſe then a King; and the Lords thought, that as long as it was denied, they were no better then ſlaves: and as the King could endure no diminution, ſo the Lords could endure no ſlavery, but the King might keep his owne with ſitting ſtill, the Lords could not recover their owne but by motion: and ſeeing their ſtrength muſt be in their number, by commotion: hereupon they confederate together, and of this confederacie, Richard now Earle Marſhall, upon the death of his brother William, is chiefe; who repaire to the King, and boldly ſhew him his error, and require ſatisfaction. Hereupon the King ſends preſently over for whole Legions of Poictouins, and withall ſummons a Parliament at Oxford, whither the Lords refuſe to come: after this a Parliament is called at Weſtminſter, whither likewiſe they refuſe to come, unleſſe the King would remove the Biſhop of Winchester, and the Poictouins from the Court; and more then this, they ſend him word, that unleſſe he did this, they would expell both himſelfe and his evill Counſellours out of the Land, & create a new King. Upon this threatning, Pledges are required of the Nobility for ſecuring of their Allegeance, and Writs are ſent out to all who hold by knights ſervice, to repaire to the King at Gloceſter by a certaine day, which the Earle Marſhall and his aſſociates refuſing, the King without the judgement of his Court, and their Peers, cauſeth them to be Proclaimed Out-lawes, ſeiſeth upon all their Lands, which he gives to his Poictouins, and directs out Writs to attach their bodies where ſoever in the kingdome. But now of theſe confederate Lords, the Biſhop of Winchester wonne the Earles of Cheſter and Lincolne with a thouſand Markes, and the King had ſo pleaſed his brother the Earle of Cornwall, that he likewiſe left them: whereupon they withdrew them into Wales, and confederate with Lewilin Prince of Wales, whither alſo came Hubert de Burgh, eſcaped out of priſon, and joynes with them; taking intermutuall Oaths, that no one without other ſhould make their accord. Hereupon the King goeth himſelfe in perſon into Wales, where not prevailing, he returnes to Gloceſter, imployes new forces of ſtrangers, but all without ſucceſſe. At laſt a Frier is imployed to perſwade the Earle Marſhall to ſubmit himſelfe to the King, but all in vaine; till at length a traine is laid to draw him over into Ireland, to defend his ſtate there, being ſeiſed upon by the King; where by treachery circumvented he loſt his life. Yet the King diſavowes the ſending of any ſuch Commiſſion into Ireland, proteſting he never knew thereof, and layes the fault upon his Officers: an eaſie way for Princes, never to be found in any fault.

After two yeares affliction, a Parliament is aſſembled at Weſtminſter, wherein the Biſhops admoniſh the King by his Fathers example, to be at unity with his people; and to remove from him ſtrangers, and to governe the Kingdome by Natives of the Realme, and by the Lawes: otherwiſe they would proceed by Eccleſiaſticall cenſure, both againſt his Counſellours and himſelfe. The King ſeeing no way to ſubſiſt but by temporiſing, conſents to call home thoſe Lords out of Wales; reſtores them to their places and poſſeſſions, removes all ſtrangers from about him, and cals his new officers to account. Hereupon the Biſhop of Winchester, Peter de Rivalis, and Stephen Seagrave take ſanctuary; but afterward by mediation they obtained with great Fines their Liberty, dearly paying for their two years greatnes. After this a Parliament is againe called, which the King would have to be kept in the Tower, whither the Lords refuſing to come, another place of more freedome is appointed, in which Parliament, order is taken for removing all Sheriffes from their places, upon complaint of corruption: and here the King diſplaceth his Steward, and offers to take from the Biſhop of Chicheſter then Chancellour, the great Seale, which he refuſeth to deliver, as having received it by the common councell of the kingdome; and now Peter de Rivalx, and Stephen Segrave, are received againe into grace: by which may appeare the viciſſitude of fortune in Princes favours. After this, in the one and twentieth yeare of his Raigne, another Parliament is held at London, where the King requires the thirteenth part of all the moveables as well of the Clergy as Laity; which being directly oppoſed, the King promiſeth by oath, never more to injure the Nobility, ſo they would but relieve him at that preſent: After foure dayes conſultation, the King promiſing to uſe onely the counſell of his naturall Subjects, and proteſting againſt the Revocation lately propounded, and freely granting the inviolable obſervation of their Liberties, under paine of Excommunication, a Subſidy is granted him, but ſo, that foure knights be appointed in every Shire to receive and deliver the ſame, and to ſome Abbey or Caſtle, where it may be ſafely kept, that if the King faile in performance of his Grants, it may be reſtored to the Countrey from whence it was collected: And now the King, to make a ſhew of true reconciliation for his part, ſuddenly cauſeth the Earles, Warren and Surrey, with John Fitz-Geoffrey to be ſworn his Counſellours; yet was neither of the points either for removing of ſtrangers, or for diſpoſing the money obſerved afterward by the King: for the money he made bold to take at his pleaſure; and for ſtrangers, they were ſo farre from removing, that they were drawne nearer to him: for now William Valentine, Uncle to the Queen, is growne the moſt inward man with him, and nothing done but by his counſell; alſo the Earle of Provence, the young Queenes Father, a poore Prince, hath a good ſhare of the money that was collected: and Simon de Montford, a French man borne, is entertained by the King, and preferred ſoberly in marriage to Eleanor the Kings ſiſter, Widow of William Earle of Pembroke, the great Marſhall, and is made Earle of Leyceſter, by right of his Mother Aoice, daughter of Blanchman, Earle of Leyceſter: which courſes ſo incenſe the Nobility, that it put them out into a new commotion, and Richard the Kings brother becomes one of the party whom the other Lords make their ſpokeſman to the King, to aggravate his breach of promiſe, and to acquaint him with all the diſorders of the kingdome; with whoſe remonſtrance the King is ſo moved, that after he had tried the Londoners, and found them alſo to partake with the Lords, he cals a Parliament at London, whither the Lords come armed for their own ſafety: where after long debating, the King taking his Oath to referre the matter to certaine grave men of the kingdome, Articles are drawne, ſealed, and publikely ſet up to the view of all, with the ſeales of the Legat, and divers great men: but before it came to be effected, the Earle of Cornwall, by the working of Simon Montford, hath his edge rebated, and is brought to be unwilling to meddle in the matter any more; which the other Lords ſeeing, they alſo grow cold, and ſo for that time it reſted, and no more was done in it.

Chan-

And now is the Kings turne to play his part, in uſing his authority, which he failes not to doe to the uttermoſt: for upon a ſmall occaſion he cauſeth the gates of Gilbert now Earle of Pembroke (the third ſonne of William the great Marſhall) to be ſhut againſt him at Wincheſter, whereupon the Earle retires into the North. Alſo Simon Norman, Maſter of the Kings Seale, and his greateſt Favorite, is thrown out with diſgrace, and his brother Geoffrey a knight Templar, is put out of the Counſell; both of them for not yeelding to paſſe a Grant from the King, made unto Thomas Earle of Flanders, the Queenes Unkle, of foure pence upon every ſack of Wooll. And now that load enough is laid upon thoſe of the Laity, comes a new load to be laid upon the Clergy; for the Pope nothing dainty to make uſe of the power he had in the King, ſends over three hundred Romans, requiring to have the firſt Benefices that ſhould be vacant, beſtowed upon them: which ſeemed ſo unreaſonable a requeſt, and to the Clergy of England ſo dammageable, that it made Edmund Arch-biſhop of Canterbury to give over all, and betake himſelfe to a voluntary Exile in the Abbey of Pontiniac in France; yet to ſhew his reſpect to the Pope, gave him eight hundred Markes before his departure. And to lay more weight upon the Clergy, great ſummes are alſo required of them for maintenance of

of the Popes warre againſt the Emperour: which though the Clergy oppoſed, and ſhewed many good reaſons of their oppoſition both to the King and the Legat, yet by promiſes or threatnings, they were won or forced to yeeld unto it. And now comes the Earle of March, and once againe ſolicits the King to make another journey into France, which being yeelded to by the King, and aſſented to in Parliament, an aide preſently was demanded towards it: but this demand was not onely oppoſed, but all the Kings Taxations and aides before granted, were now repeated; and thereupon an abſolute deniall to grant any more. Upon this, the King comes to the Parliament himſelfe in perſon; earneſtly, and indeed, humbly craving their aide for this once: but all prevailed not, they had made a vow to the contrary: and the King is driven to get what he could of particular men, of whom partly by gift, and partly by loane, he gets ſo much, that he carries over with him thirty Barrels of Sterling money. This expedition had no better ſucceſſe then the former, for after a whole yeares ſtay, the King was driven to make a diſhonourable Truce with the King of France, and returne home. At his returne he puts the Jewes to another redemption, and the Londoners to another exaction; and to helpe on his charge, his wives mother, the Counteſſe of Provence comes now to viſit him; who bringing her daughter Zanchia with her, a marriage is ſolemniſed betweene her and Richard Earle of Cornwall, whoſe wife was lately dead, and he returned from the Holy warres. The old Counteſſe at her returne, is preſented with many rich gifts, having beſides received an Annuall Penſion of foure thouſand Markes out of England, for five yeares paſt; in conſideration of a pact made, that King Henry after her deceaſe ſhould have the Earledome of Provence: but ſhortly after her returne, ſhe diſappoints him of that, and beſtowes it upon her youngeſt daughter Beatrix, married to Charles the French Kings brother; who was after King of Naples and Sicilie: ſo as this Counteſſe lived to ſee all her foure daughters Queenes: Richard Earle of Cornwall comming after to be elected King of the Romans. Upon theſe profuſions, a conſultation is had for new ſupplies, and no way thought ſo fit as by Parliament; hereupon a Parliament is againe aſſembled at Weſtminſter, whither the King comes againe himſelfe in perſon, urging his neceſſities, yet nothing wou'd be granted without the aſſurance of reformation and due execution of the Lawes. And here they deſire to have it ordained that foure of the moſt grave and diſcreet Peeres ſhould be choſen as conſervatours of the kingdome, and ſworne of the Kings Councell, both to ſee Juſtice adminiſtred, and the treaſure iſſued; and theſe, or two of them at leaſt, ſhould ever attend about the King. Alſo that the Lord Chiefe Juſticiar, and the Lord Chancellour, ſhould be choſen by the generall voyces of the States aſſembled, or elſe be one of the number of thoſe foure. Beſides they propound, that there might be two Juſtices of the Benches, two Barons of the Exchequer, and one Juſtice for the Jewes, and thoſe likewiſe to be choſen by Parliament. But while theſe things were in debating, comes one Martin, a new Legat from the Pope, with a larger Commiſſion then ever any before, to exact upon the State; but at the ſame time, Letters comming from the Emperour Fredericke, to intreat that the Pope might have no more ſupplies out of England, the Popes Mandate is rejected, and his Agent Martin diſgracefully ſent home. This buſineſſe took up ſo much time, that nothing elſe was done in this Parliament; but onely an aide granted to the King for the marriage of his daughter to Alexander King of Scots, twenty ſhillings of every knights Fee; and that with much adoe, and repetition of his former aides.

The Winter following he aſſembles another Parliament, wherein he moves for an ayde upon a deſigne he had upon Wales, and to pay his debts, which were urged to be ſo great that he could not appeare out of his Chamber for the infinite clamour of ſuch, to whom he owed for his Wine, Waxe, and other neceſſaries of houſe: but they all to his face, refuſed to grant him any thing: whereupon other violent courſes are taken, an ancient quarrell is found out againſt the City of London, for which they are commanded to pay fifteene thouſand Markes, and Paſſeleve the Clerk is imployed, with others, in a moſt peremptory commiſſion, to

to inquire of all ſuch Lands as had beene inforeſted, and either to fine the occupyers thereof at their pleaſure, or elſe to take it from them and ſell the ſame to others; wherein ſuch rigour was uſed, that multitudes of people were undone. But now to ſhew the King the eſtate of his kingdome, and the oppreſſions of Popes, inquiry was made of the Revenues which the Romans and Italians had in England: which were found to be annually ſixty thouſand Markes; being more then the yearely Revenues of the Crowne: which ſo moved the King that he cauſed the ſame to be notifyed, with all other Exactions, to the Generall Councell now Aſſembled at Lyons; and this (with the ill uſage of his Agent Martin) ſo vexed the Pope, that he is ſaid to have uttered theſe words: It is time to make an end with the Emperour, that we may cruſh theſe petty Kings, for the Dragon once appeaſed or deſtroyed, theſe leſſer Snakes will ſoone be trodden downe. But upon the Popes rejecting the conſideration of theſe grievances of England, and deſpiſing the Kings meſſage (who he ſaid, began to Frederike) it was abſolutely here ordained, under great penalty, that no contribution of money ſhould be given to the Pope by any Subject of England: and the King for a time aſſents unto it, but being of an irreſolute and wavering nature, and afraid of threats, he ſoone gave over what he undertooke, ſo as the Pope continued his former rapine; and though he had promiſed never to ſend any more Legats into England, yet ſent he other Miniſters under the title of Clerkes, that had as great power as Legats, and effected as much. And now, for the other part of the State, new occaſions alſo of complaint were offered: Peter of Savoy Earle of Richmond, comes into England, bringing with him certaine Maides to be marryed to young Noble men of this Countrey, the Kings Wards, of whom Edmund Earle of Lincolne hath one, and Richard de Burgh another, and the ſame yeare three of the Kings Brothers by the Mother, Guy de Luſignan, William de Valence, and Athelmar Clerke, are ſent over to be provided of Eſtates in England: alſo Thomas of Savoy (ſometimes Earle of Flanders by Right of his Wife) comes with his ſiſter Beatrix, Counteſſe of Provence the Queenes Mother, who are againe Feaſted and Gifted; for which the King is taxed the next Parliament in Candlemas Terme, and beſides ſharply reprehended for his breach of Promiſe, having Vowed and Declared by his Charter never more to injure the State in that kinde; alſo for his violent taking up of proviſion, of Waxe, Silke, Roabes, and ſpecially of Wine, contrary to the will of the ſellers, and many other grievances they complaine of; all which the King patiently heares, in hope to obtaine his deſire, but yet nothing is effected, and the Parliament being Prorogued till Midſummer following, and the King growing more obdurate then before, it afterward brake up in diſcontent. But the Parliament not ſupplying him, he is adviſed to furniſh his wants with ſale of his Plate, and Jewels of the Crowne, being told, that though they were ſold, yet they would revert againe unto him; and having with great loſſe received money for them, he askes who had bought them: Anſwer is made, the City of London. That City (ſaid he) is an inexhauſtible Gulph: If Octavius Treaſure were to be ſold, they ſurely would buy it.

And now to vexe them, he appoints a Faire to be kept at Weſtminſter, forbidding under great penalty, all exerciſe of Merchandiſe within London, for fifteene dayes, and all other Fayres in England, and namely that of Ely: but this Novelty came to nothing; the Inconvenience of the place, as it was then, and the fouleneſſe of the weather, brought more affliction then benefit to the Traders. That Chriſtmas alſo he requires Newyeares gifts of the Londoners, and ſhortly after writes unto them his Letters imperiouſly deprecatory to ayde him with money, and thereby gets of them twenty thouſand pounds, for which the next yeare after he craves pardon of them. And notwithſtanding his continuall taking up all Proviſions for his Houſe, yet he leſſens his Houſe-keeping in no honourable manner. And then ſeeing he could get nothing of the States together, he calls unto him, or writes to every Nobleman apart, declaring his poverty; and how he was bound by Charter in a debt of thirty thouſand pound to thoſe of Burdeaux and his Gaſcoynes, coynes, (who otherwiſe would not have ſuffered him to depart home) at his laſt being in France: but ſa ling herein of Temporall Lords, he addreſſeth his Letters to the Prelates, of whom he findes as little reliefe, by much importunity and his owne preſence, he got of the Abbot of Ramſey a hundred pound; but the Abbot of Borough had the face to deny him, though the King told him, it was more Almes to give money to him, then to a Begger that went from doore to doore. The Abbot of Saint Albons yet was more kind, and gave him threeſcore Markes. To ſuch lowneſſe did the neceſſity of this indigent King (through his profuſion) bring him. The Jewes ever expoſed to his will, feele the weight of theſe his wants; One Abraham, found a Delinquent, redeemes himſelfe for ſeven hundred Markes, and Aaron another Jew proteſts, the King had ſince his laſt being in France taken from him at times thirty thouſand Markes of Silver, beſides 200. Markes of Gold given to the Queene.

But now the Lords aſſemble againe at London, and preſſe him with his promiſe made unto them, that the Chiefe Juſticiar, Chancellour and Treaſurer, ſhould be appointed by the Generall Councell of the kingdome, but by the abſence of Richard Earle of Cornwall, (which was thought to be done of purpoſe) they returne fruſtrate of their deſire. And now the Biſhopricke of Wincheſter falling void, the King ſends preſently to the Monkes of the Cathedrall Church, to Elect his Brother Athelmar, and becauſe he would not be denyed, he goes thither himſelfe in perſon, and there enters the Chapter houſe as a Biſhop or Prior, gets up into the Preſidents Chaire, beginnes a Sermon, and takes his Text, Juſtice and Peace have kiſſed each other; and thereupon uſeth theſe words: To me and other Kings who are to governe the people, belongs the rigour of Judgement and Juſtice, to you who are men of quiet and Religion, Peace and Tranquillity; and this day I heare you have (for your owne good) beene favourable to my requeſt; with many ſuch like words: whereby the Monkes finding the earneſtneſſe of his deſire, held it in vaine to deny him, and Athelmar is Elected; but with this reſervation, if the Pope allow it. Shortly after followes the memorable Caſe of Sir Henry de Bathe, a Juſticiar of the kingdome, and a ſpeciall Counſellour to the King, who by corruption had attained to a mighty Eſtate, and is ſaid, in one Circuit to have gotten two hundred pound land per annum; He is accuſed by Sir Philip Darcy of falſehood in the Kings Court; and the King is ſo incenſed againſt him, that in the Parliament at this time holden in London, Proclamation is made, that whoſoever had any Action or Complaint againſt Henry de Bathe ſhould come and be heard. One of his fellow Juſticiars accuſed him of acquiting a malefactor for a bribe. The King ſeeing Henry de Bathes friends to be many and ſtrong, breakes out into rage, proteſting, that whoſoever would kill Henry de Bathe ſhould be acquited for the deed. But afterward by interceſſion of the Earle of Cornwall, and the Biſhop of London; the King becomes pacifyed, and Sir Henry is releaſed, paying two thouſand Markes; and after is reſtored to his former place and favour. The King keeping his Chriſtmas at Yorke, the marriage is ſolemnized betweene Alexander King of Scots, and Margaret his Daughter: to the Feaſt of which ſolemnity it is ſaid the Arch-biſhop gave ſixe hundred fat Oxen, which were all ſpent at one meale: and beſides, the Feaſt coſt him foure thouſand Markes.

About this time, the Pope ſolicits King Henry to undertake the Croſſe, and ſo doth Alphonſus King of Caſtile, offering to accompany him in perſon, to reſcue the King of France, who was now held Priſoner by the Souldan. And becauſe a ranſome collected for him in France was by tempeſt caſt away at Sea, the Captive King offers to reſtore Normandy to the King of England, ſo he would come to his reſcue. Upon this ſolicitation of the Pope, and the grant of a tenth of the Clergy and Laity for three yeares to come, the King undertakes the Croſſe, rather, it ſeemes, to get the money, then with any purpoſe to performe the Journey: which had it beene collected (ſaith Paris) would have amounted to ſix hundred thouſand pounds, to the utter impoveriſhing of the kingdome. And now the King by Proclamation calls the Londoners to Weſtminſter, and there cauſeth the Bishops of Worcester and Chichester to declare his Intentions, and to exhort the people to undertake the Crosse and attend him: but few are moved by their perswasions, onely three knights of small note, whom thereupon the King in open view, imbraceth, kisseth, and cals his Brethren; checking the Londoners as ignoble Mercenaries: and there himselfe takes his Oath for performing it, and to set forth upon Midsummer day next. In taking his Oath, he layes his right hand on his Breast, according to the manner of a Priest, and after on the Booke, and kist it as a Lay man. About this Tenth (granted by the Pope, but not by the People) a Parliament is called at London, where the Bishops are first dealt withall, (as being a worke of Piety) and they absolutely refuse it; then the Temporall Lords are set upon, and they answer as the Bishops: which put the King into so great a rage, that he drove out all that were in his Chamber, as he had beene madde. Then he fals to perswade them apart, sending first for the Bishop of Ely, and deales with him in all kind manner, recounting the many favours he had done him. The Bishop replies, Disswading him from the Journey by the Example of the King of France; and to that purpose useth many good reasons; which the King hearing, in great passion commanded his servants to thrust him out of doore; perceiving by this what was to be expected of the rest; and thereupon fals upon his former violent courses; and first the City of London is compelled to the Contribution of a thousand Markes: and the Gascoyners being upon revolt, unlesse speedy succour be sent them; generall Musters are made, and commandement given, that whosoever could dispend thirteene pounds per annum, should furnish out a Horseman. This occasions another Parliament, wherein it seemes, the State beganne wisely to consider that all their oppositions did no good, the Kings turne must be served one way or other; therefore they agreed to relieve him rather by the usuall way, then force him to those extravagant courses which he tooke, but yet so, as the Reformation of the Government, and the ratification of their Lawes and Liberties, might once againe be solemnely confirmed. And after fifteene dayes consultation, to satisfie the Kings desire for his holy Expedition, a Tenth is granted by the Clergy, and Scutage, three Markes of every knights Fee by the Laity; and thereupon those often confirmed Charters are againe ratifyed, and that in the most solemne and Ceremoniall manner, that State and Religion could possibly devise. The King with all the Great Nobility of England, all the Bishops in their reverent Ornaments with burning Candles in their hands, assemble to heare the terrible sentence of Excommunication against the infringers of the same. And at the lighting of those Candles the King having received one in his hand, gives it to a Prelate that stood by, saying: It becomes not me, being no Priest, to hold this Candle, my heart shall be a greater Testimony; and withall laid his hand spread upon his Breast all the time the sentence was read; which was thus Pronounced, Authoritate Dei Omnipotentis, &c. Which done, he caused the Charter of King John his Father, granted by his free consent, to be openly read. In the end, having throwne away their Candles, which lay smoaking on the ground, they cryed out, So let them who incurre this sentence be extinct, and have no better savour then these snuffes: and the King with a loud voyce said, As God helpe me, I will, as I am a Man, a Christian, a Knight, a King Crowned and annoynted, inviolably observe all these things: and therewithall the Bels rung out, and the people shouted for Joy.

Yet was not all so quieted by this Grant, but that there were grievances still, whereof the first fals upon his Brother Richard Earle of Cornwall: for the King having seven and twenty yeares before given him the Province of Gascogne, now that he had a Sonne of his owne, he would take it from his Brother, and give it to his Sonne; and the Earle refusing to deliver his Charter, it is plotted to imprison him, but he escaping out of Burdeaux, comes over into England. The King to win the Nobility of Gascogne to turne to him, promiseth them thirty thousand Markes, which they accept, so as he binde himselfe by his Oath and Charter to performe it. This strictnesse of theirs the King takes in ill part, and thereupon sends Simon Mont-

Montford Earle of Leycester, a sterne man, to be their Governour, who with his insolent Government, so discontents them, that after three yeares suffering, they send the Arch-bishop of Burdeaux, with other great men, to complaine of his Insolencies; whereupon Montford is sent for, and because the Lords tooke part with him, the King takes part with the Gascoyners; which Montford tooke so ill; that he upbraides the King with breaking his Promise: to whom the King in great rage replyed, that no promise was to be kept with an unworthy Traytor: at which word Montford riseth up, protesting that he lyed; and were he not Protected by his Royall Dignity, he would make him repent those words. The King commands his Servants to lay hold on him, but the Lords would not permit it. Yet after this great affront to the King, is Montford sent over againe into Gascogne, though with a more limited Authority, and shortly after the King with a Fleete of three hundred Ships goes thither himselfe, and soone composeth all differences in the Country.

But now the King of Spaine pretends a title to Aquitaine, and to take him off, King Henry sends to treate of a marriage betweene Prince Edward and his Sister Eleanor, which being accepted by the King of Spaine, the Marriage is solemnized at Burgos, where the King of Spaine knights the Prince, and quits his claime to Aquitaine for him and his Successours for ever: and King Henry invests the Prince and his Wife in it, and gives unto him besides, Ireland, Wales, Bristow, Stamford, and Grantham; and from hence it came that ever after this, the Kings eldest Sonne was immediately upon his Birth Prince of Wales, and Earle of Chester. After this King Henry prepares to returne home, and well he might, having spent in this and his former Journeyes into those parts, the summe of seven and twenty hundred thousand pounds: More then all the Lands if they had beene sold were worth, which when the King was told, he desired there might be no words made of it for his credite. And now being to returne, he is desirous with the King of Frances leave, to passe thorow France; and comming to Paris with a thousand Horse, where he stayed eight dayes, is there most Royally Feasted by the King of France; and he as royally Feasts the King of France againe. But it is the Londoners and the Jewes that are like to pay for all. For comming home about Christmas, when the Londoners presented him with a hundred pounds in money, and afterwards with two hundred pounds in Plate: it was so sleighted, and so ill taken, that a hole was presently found in their coate, for an escape of a Prisoner, which cost them three thousand Markes: Yet was not this enough, but he takes good Fleeces from the Jews, and then lets them out to Farme to his Brother Richard, for a great summe of money, and he to make what more of them he could.

Yet after all this he complaines of his Debts, which he saith are at least three hundred thousand Markes, which must needes be the heavyer to him, because he had diminished his owne meanes, by the allowance of fifteene thousand Markes per annum to his Sonne the Prince. The onely hope is in the Parliament, but a Parliament being called, they fall presently upon their old Grievances, complaining upon the King for breach of Charters, and renuing their Claime, to have the Chiefe Justiciar, the Chancellour and Treasurer, to be chosen by themselves: so nothing was done for the King at this time, and the Parliament being prorogued till Michaelmas after, as little then, by reason many of the Peeres came not, as not being summoned according to the tenour of Magna Charta. And now while the King was using meanes to winde himselfe out of Debt, there happened occasions to put him further in; For now Thomas Earle of Savoy, the Queenes Brother, being at warre with the City of Thurin, must be supplyed with money towards it by the King of England: Now the Elect Bishop of Toledo the King of Spaines Brother, comes into England, and must be sumptuously Feasted, and have great gifts presented him: Now Eleanor the Princes Wife, arrives with a multitude of Spaniards, and must all be entertained at the Kings charge, and have no small presents given them at their departure: Now comes Rustandus from the Pope, with power to Collect the Tenth of the Clergy, for the Popes use and the Kings, and to absolve ſolve him from his Oath of the Holy warre, ſo he would come to deſtroy Manfred Sonne to the Emperour Fredericke, now in poſſeſſion of the kingdome of Sicilie, and Apulia. And this man likewiſe hath great gifts beſtowed upon him, beſides a rich Prebend in Yorke. But the Pope by too much ſeeking his profit, loſeth credit and all, for the Clergy ſleights him, and will give him nothing: and when he would have borrowed of the Earle of Cornwall five hundred Markes, the Earle anſwered, he liked not to lend his money to one, upon whom he could not Diſtraine. But King Henries greateſt charge, was his purchaſing a kingdome for his Sonne Edmund; for now comes the Biſhop of Bononia from the Pope, with a Ring of Inveſtiture to Prince Edmund, in the kingdome of Sicilie, which he pretends to be at his diſpoſing; and King Henry takes it in ſo good earneſt, that after this he cals his Sonne Edmund by no other name then King of Sicilie. But all this was done by the Pope, but to angle away King Henries money, as indeed upon this hope, he had drawne the King into the engagement of a hundred and fifty thouſand Markes; for to draw the King on, it was given out that the Pope had defeated all Manfreds Forces, and was thereby in poſſeſſion of the kingdome, when the truth was, that Manfred had defeated the Popes Forces, and was thereby himſelfe eſtabliſhed in the kingdome.

The yeare 1275. the King keepes his Chriſtmas at Wincheſter, where new Grievances ariſe. The Merchants of Gaſcogny, having their Wines taken from them by the Kings Officers without ſatisfaction; complaine to their Lord the Prince, he to his Father, and his Father having beene informed before-hand by his Officers, that their clamour was unjuſt, as relying upon the Princes favour; he falls into a great rage with the Prince, and breakes out into theſe words: See! now my Blood and my owne Bowels impugne me: but afterwards pacified, he gives order the injuries ſhould be redreſſed. And now the Princes Followers themſelves come to be a Grievance, who relying upon their Maſter commit many outrages, and ſpoyle and wrong men at their pleaſure, and the Prince himſelfe is not altogether free, of whom it is ſaid, that meeting a young man travailing by the way, he cauſed one of his eares to be cut off, and one of his eyes to be put out: and many ſuch prankes plaid by him and his Followers in Wales, made the Welſh breake out into open Rebellion, which the Prince would faine have ſuppreſſed, but there was no money to be had towards the doing it. And now the King fals to ſhifts, he comes into the Chequer himſelfe, and there layes penalties upon Sheriffes, that returne not their moneys in due time; then he fals upon meaſures of Wine and Ale, upon Buſhels and Weights, and ſomething he gets; but London is his beſt Chequer, and every yeare commonly he hath one quarrell or other to the Londoners, and they are ſure to pay. And now fals out an accident, ſeeming of great honour, but certainely of no profit to the kingdome. Richard Earle of Cornwall the Kings Brother is Elected King of the Romans, for although Alphonſus King of Spaine the great Mathematician were his Competitour, yet Earle Richards money wrought more then his Learning, and the Arch-biſhop of Collen comes over to fetch him, and Crowned he is at Aquiſgrane. This Earle of Cornwall is reported able to diſpend a hundred Markes a day, for ten yeares, beſides his Revenues in England. But now, as a man that payes deare for an Office, lookes that his Office ſhould pay him againe: ſo Earle Richard having given infinitely to compaſſe this Advancement, looked to helpe himſelfe againe by the Place; and this, and the deſire he had to revenge himſelfe upon thoſe that had oppoſed his Election, made him take ſuch violent courſes that he came ſoone to be diſpoſſeſſed, forſaken, and forced to returne into England a poorer King, then he went out an Earle.

Acts done in the contention betweene the King and his Barons.

NOw King Henry very proud to have his younger ſonne a King as well as his brother, cals a Parliament, wherein he brings forth his ſonne Edmund, clad in Sicilian habit, and tels the Parliament, that for advancing this ſonne of his to the kingdome kingdome of Sicilie, he had bound himſelfe under covenant of loſing his kingdome in the ſumme of an hundred and forty thouſand Markes, and hoped they would not thinke much to aide him with money for ſo great an advancement: but the Parliament ſtood firme to their uſuall condition of Magna Charta; ſo as that might be confirmed, they were content to give two and fifty thouſand Marks, but this gave the King no ſatisfaction. The yeare after, another Parliament is holden at London, wherein upon the Kings preſſing them againe for meanes to pay his debts to the Pope; the Lords tell him plainely, they will not yeeld to give him any thing for any ſuch purpoſe; and give their reaſons, and withall repeate their owne grievances, his breach of promiſe, the inſolencie of his brothers, and ſpecially William de Valence, who had given the lie to the Earle of Leyceſter, and no right done him in it; and many ſuch things, which the King hearing, and not able to deny, humbles himſelfe, and tels them how he had often by ill counſell beene ſeduced; but promiſeth by his Oath which he tooke on the Tombe of Saint Edward, to reforme all thoſe errours. But the Lords not well knowing how to deale in this buſineſſe, as being divided betweene a deſire to ſatisfie the King, and a deſire to be ſatisfied themſelves; and knowing withall the variableneſſe of the Kings nature, they get the Parliament to be adjourned to Saint Barnabies day, and then to aſſemble at Oxford. In which meane time, the Earles Gloceſter, Leyceſter, Hereford, the Earle Marſhall Bigod, Spenſer, and other great men confederate, and provide by Armes to effect their deſire: and here is the foundation laid of thoſe bloudy wars that enſued betweene King Henry and his Barons. And now the King being put to his ſhifts for money, gets the Abbot of Weſtminſter to put his Seale and that of his Covent to a Deed Obligatory, as a ſurety for two hundred Markes; making account, that by his example, others would be drawne to doe the like: but his truſty ſervant Simon Paſſeleve being imployed to other Monaſteries, and telling them amongſt other reaſons to perſwade them, that the King was Lord of all they had, they only anſwered; they acknowledged indeed the King to be Lord of all they had, but yet ſo, as to defend, not to deſtroy the ſame: and this was all he could get of them. The Prince alſo in no leſſe want then his Father, is driven to morgage his Towne of Stamford, Brahan, and many other things, to William de Valence, a Poictouin, wherby appeared the diſorder of the time, when the Prince was in want, and ſtrangers had ſuch plenty. And now is the Parliament aſſembled at Oxford, whither the Lords come attended with large traines: and here they beginne with the expoſtulation of the former Liberties, requiring that the Chiefe Juſticiar, the Chancellour and Treaſurer may be ordained by publike choyce; and that the twenty foure Conſervatours of the kingdome may be confirmed, twelve by the election of the Lords, and twelve by the King, with whatſoever elſe made for their imagined ſecurity. The King ſeeing their ſtrength, and in what manner they required theſe things; ſweares ſolemnly againe to the confirmation of them, and cauſeth the Prince to take the ſame Oath. But the Lords left not here, the Kings brethren, the Poictouins, and other ſtrangers muſt preſently be removed; and this alſo, though with ſome little oppoſition, was at laſt concluded: and thereupon the Kings brethren and their followers are deſpoyled of all their fortunes, and exiled by proſcription under the Kings owne hand, directed to the Earles of Hereford and Surrey. But now ſickneſſe and mortality happening to many great ones, it is imputed to poyſons, ſuppoſed to have beene prepared by thoſe ſtrangers proſcribed; the Earle of Gloceſter in a ſickneſſe, ſuddenly loſt his haire, his teeth, his nailes; and his brother hardly eſcaped death: which made many to ſuſpect their neareſt ſervants, and their Cookes: Walter Scoynie the Earle Steward, is ſtrictly examined, committed to priſon, and afterward without confeſſion, is upon preſumptions only executed at Wincheſter: Elias a converted Jew, is ſaid to have confeſſed, that in his houſe the poyſon was confected; but it was when he was a Jew, and not a Chriſtian. Every man that had received any wrong by thoſe ſtrangers, now put up their complaints, and are heard. Guydo de Rochfort a Poictouin, to whom the King had given the Caſtle of Rocheſter, is baniſhed, and all his goods conficonfiscate. William Busſey, Steward to William de Valence, is committed to the Tower of London, and moſt reproachfully uſed. Richard Gray, whom the Lords had made Captaine of Dover Caſtle, is ſet to intercept whatſoever the Poictouins convaied that way out of England, and much treaſure of theirs, and of the elect of Winchester is by him taken, beſides great ſummes committed to the new Temple are found out, and ſeiſed for the King.

And now the new Chiefe Juſticiar Hugh Bigod, brother to the Earle Marſhall, (choſen this laſt Parliament by publike voyce) procures that foure knights in every Shire ſhould inquire of the oppreſſions of the poore, done by great men; and certifie the ſame, that redreſſe might be made. Alſo order was taken againſt corrupting of juſtice; when yet notwithſtanding this pretended care of the publike, it is noted by the Writers and Records of that time, how the Lords were themſelves but as totidem tyranni, enforcing the ſervices of the Kings tenants that dwelt neare them. But to make their cauſe the more popular, it was rumored that the King ſtood upon it, that his neceſſity muſt be ſupplied out of the eſtates of his people, whether they would or no: which the King hearing, ſends forth Proclamation, declaring how certaine malitious perſons had falſely and ſeditiouſly reported, that he meant unlawfully to charge his ſubjects, and ſubvert the Lawes and Liberties of the kingdome; and by theſe falſe ſuggeſtions, averted the hearts of his people from him: and therefore deſires them not to give credit to ſuch perturbers: for that he was ready to defend all Rights and Cuſtomes due unto them: and that they might reſt of this ſecured, he cauſed his Letters to be made Patents. But now Montford, Glocester, and Spenſer, inforce the King to call a Parliament at London, where they get the authority of the twenty foure to be eſtated wholly upon themſelves, and they alone to diſpoſe of the cuſtody of the Caſtles, and other buſineſſes of the kingdom: and here they bind the King to loſe to them their Legall obedience whenſoever he infringed his Charter. At this time intelligence was given to the Lords, that Richard King of the Romans had a purpoſe to come into England; and the Lords ſuſpecting he would come with power to aide the King his brother, take order for guarding the Ports, with intent to hinder his landing: but finding his traine to be but ſmall, accompanied onely with his Queene, two German Earles, and eight knights: upon his promiſe to take their propounded Oath, they admit him to land; but would nether permit the King (who came thither to meete him) nor himſelfe to enter into Dover Caſtle. At Canterbury they bring him into the Chapter houſe, where the Earle of Glocester ſtanding forth in the midſt, cals out the Earle, not by the name of King, but Richard Earle of Cornwall; who in reverent manner coming forth, taketh his Oath in theſe words. Heare all men, that I Richard Earle of Cornwall, doe here ſweare upon the holy Evangeliſts, that I ſhall be faithfull and diligent to reforme with you the Kingdome of England, and be an effectuall Coadjutor to expell all Rebels and diſturbers of the ſame; and this Oath will inviolably obſerve, under paine of loſing all the Land I have in England: ſo helpe me God. But though this Earle came home but weake and poore, yet upon his returne the King takes heart, and ſeeks all meanes to vindicate his power: and firſt ſends meſſengers ſecretly to Rome, to be Abſolved from his enforced Oath; and to have the more aſſurance from the King of France, he makes an abſolute reſignation of all his Right to the Dutchy of Normandy, and the Earledomes of Anjou, Poictou, Tourene, and Maine: in regard whereof, the King of France gives him three hundred thouſand pounds (ſome ſay Crownes) of Anjouin money; and grants him to enjoy all Guyen, beyond the River Garonne, all the Countrey of Xantoigne to the River of Charente, the Countrey of Limouſin and Quercy, for him and his ſucceſſours, doing their homage to the Crowne of France, as Duke of Aquitaine: And now was the King of France made Arbiter of the difference betweene King Henry and his Barons, who gives ſentence againſt the Barons concerning the Proviſions at Oxford; but of their ſide concerning King Johns Charter: by which nice diſtinction, though he did but leave the matter as he found it: (for thoſe Proviſions, as the Lords pretended, were grounded upon that Charter) yet did his ſentence draw many many away from the party of the Barons, amongſt whom was Henry ſonne to the Earle of Cornwall, Roger Clifford, Roger de Leisbourne, Haimo Leſtrange, and many others. But the Earle of Leyceſter, notwithſtanding this revolt, recovers the Town and Caſtle of Glocester; conſtraines the Citizens to pay a thouſand pounds for their redemption; goes with an Army to Worceſter; poſſeſſeth him of the Caſtle, thence to Shrewsbery, and ſo comes about to the Ile of Ely, ſubdues the ſame, and growes exceeding powerfull. The King doubting his approach to London, fals to treat of a Peace, and a Peace is concluded upon theſe conditions; that all the Caſtles of the King ſhould be delivered to the keeping of the Barons; the Proviſions of Oxford ſhould inviolably be kept; all ſtrangers by a certaine time ſhould avoid the kingdome, except onely ſuch as were licenſed to ſtay. The Prince had fortified Windſor Caſtle; but Leyceſter comming to beſiege it, he treats with him for Peace, which is refuſed, and the Caſtle is rendred to him.

The King at this time, to win time, convokes another Parliament at London, wherin he won many Lords to take his part; as namely the Prince Richard his brother, Henry his ſon, William Valence, with the reſt of his brothers lately returned, and with them the King marcheth to Oxford, whither divers Lords of Scotland repaire to him; as John Commin, John Bayliol, Lords of Galloway, Robert Bruce, and others: alſo many Barons of the North; Clifford, Percey, Baſſet, and others. From Oxford he goes to Northampton, where he tooke priſoners, Simon Montford the younger, with foureteene other principall men; thence to Nottingham, making ſpoyles of ſuch poſſeſſions as pertained to the Barons in thoſe parts. And now the Kings ſide growes ſtrong, which the Earles of Leyceſter and Glocester ſeeing, they write to the King, proteſting their loyalty, and how they oppoſed onely ſuch as were enemies to him and the kingdome, and had belied them. The King returnes anſwer, that themſelves were the perturbers of him and his State, and ſought his and the kingdomes deſtruction; and therefore defies them. The Prince likewiſe and the Earle of Cornwall ſend letters of defiance to them. Yet the Barons continue to mediate a Peace, and ſend the Biſhops of London and Worceſter, with offer of thirty thouſand Markes to the King, for the dammages done in theſe warres, ſo as the Statutes of Oxford may be obſerved; but this offer is not accepted. The Earle ſeeing no remedy, but it muſt be put to a day; takes his time to be earlier ready then was expected, and ſupplies his want of ſtrength with policie, placing on the one ſide of a hill neare Lewis, where the battell was fought, certaine Enſignes without men, in ſuch ſort, as they might ſeeme a farre off, to be Squadrons of ſuccours to ſecond thoſe he brought to the encounter, whom he cauſed all to weare white Croſſes, both for their owne notice, and the ſignification of his cauſe, which he would have to be thought for juſtice. Here the fortune of the day was his, the King, the Prince, the Earle of Cornwall, and his ſonne Henry, the Earles of Arundell and Hereford, with all the Scottiſh Lords, are taken priſoners; the Eale Warden, William de Valence, Guy de Luſignan, the Kings brothers, with Hugh Bigod Earle Marſhall, ſave themſelves by flight: five thouſand (ſome ſay twenty thouſand) others are ſlaine in the battell. A yeare and a halfe is Simon Montford in poſſeſſion of his priſoners, carrying the King about with him to countenance his actions, till he had gotten all the ſtrongeſt Caſtles in the kingdome.

And now comes Erinnys and ſets debabte betweene the two great Earles of Leyceſter and Glocester, about their Dividend: Leyceſter is taxed to doe more for his owne particular then the common good; his ſonnes alſo preſuming upon his greatneſſe, grew inſolent: whereupon Glocester diſcontented, forſakes that ſide, and betakes him to the Prince; who lately eſcaping out of the Caſtle of Hereford, had gotten a power about him to try the fortune of another battell. The revolt of this Earle being great in it ſelfe, was greater by its example; for now many others revolted likewiſe: and the Earle of Leyceſter ſeeing the improvement of the Princes forces, who was now with his Army about Worceſter, though he ſaw his owne diſadvantage, yet imbattels in a Plaine neare Eveſham to encounter him; and noting the manner of the approach of the Princes Army, ſaid to thoſe about him; Theſe men men come bravely on, they learne it not of themſelves, but of me; and ſeeing himſelfe likely to be beſet, and overlaid with multitude, he adviſed his friends, Hugh Spenſer, Ralph Baſſet, and others, to ſhift for themſelves; which when they refuſed to doe, then (ſaith he) let us commend our ſoules to God, for our bodies are theirs: and ſo undertaking the maine weight of the battell, periſhed under it; and with him are ſlaine, his ſonne Henry, eleven Barons, with many thouſands of common Souldiers. And thus ended Montford the great Earle of Leyceſter, highly honoured in his life, and more highly ſhould have beene after his death, if the people might have had their will, who talkt of Miracles enough to have made him a Saint.

And now is King Henry by this victory of his ſonne, at liberty; who together repaire to Wincheſter, where a Parliament is convoked, and all who adhered to the Earle Montford are diſinherited, and their eſtates conferred on others, at the Kings pleaſure; the Londoners alſo have their Liberties taken from them. But though the death of Montford gave a great wound to the party of the Barons, yet it was not mortall, at leaſt not mortal preſently, for there remained reliques that kept it alive a good while after. Simon and Guy de Montford, ſons of the Earle of Leyceſter, and other of the Barons, take and defend the Ile of Ely: the Caſtle of Killingworth held out halfe a yeare, till their victuals failed; and then yeelded upon conditions to have their lives and goods ſaved: and many others there were, reſolute and deſperate perſons, ſtrongly knit and faſtned together, though now ſhortly upon diſſolving. For after the Parliament at Weſtminſter, the King with an Army going againſt them, and being at Northampton, Simon and Guy de Montford ſubmit themſelves to him: but when the Earle of Glocester oppoſed the reſtoring them to their eſtates, they were faine to flie the kingdome, and make their fortunes in other Countries, as indeed they did; the younger in Italy, the elder in France, where they were Propatours of two great Families. Their mother was baniſht ſhortly after the battell of Eveſham, a Lady of eminent note, as being the daughter and ſiſter of a King; and yet of more note for her patient bearing of adverſity, or rather for her making a benefit of adverſity; for by this meanes ſhe betooke her ſelfe to the veile of piety, and died a Nunne at Montarges in France.

Three yeares after this, the diſinherited Barons held out, till at length, conditions of render are propounded; but here the Councell are divided in opinion: Mortimer and others ſtated in the poſſeſſions of the diſinherited, are againſt reſtoration; alleadging, it were injuſtice to take from them the rewards of their ſervice. Glocester, and the twelve ordained to deale for the peace of the State, are earneſt for reſtoration; alleadging, it were hard meaſure to grant them their lives, & not their livelihoods: but not prevailing, in great diſcontentment Glocester retires from Court, ſends meſſengers to warne the King to remove ſtrangers from his counſell; and obſerve the Proviſions at Oxford, as he promiſed at Eveſham: otherwiſe that he ſhould not marvell if himſelfe did what he thought fit. Hereupon John de Warren, Earle of Surrey, and William de Valentia are ſent to the Earle of Glocester: who though they could not perſwade him to ſubmit to the King; yet thus much they got of him under his hand and ſeale, that he would never beare Armes againſt the King or his ſonne Edward, but onely defend himſelfe, and purſue Roger Mortimer and his other enemies. And now a Parliament is convoked at Bury, wherein many demands are made by the King and the Legat, and all for money from the Clergy; but all denied, that nothing but denials are done in this Parliament. After this, the Legat imployes Solicitours to perſwade the diſinherited Lords which held the Ile of Ely, to returne to the faith and unity of the Church, and to the peace of the King, according to the forme propounded at Coventry: to which the Lords make anſwer, that they never oppoſed the unity of the Church, but the avarice of Church-men that were put in authority; and that they never oppoſed the King, but for the good of the kingdome: and then required that the Proviſions of Oxford might be obſerved, and pledges be given them for their ſecurity. Hereupon the yeare after, the King prepares a mighty Army, and Prince Edward with bridges entring entring the Ile of Ely, ſhuts them up ſo, that he conſtraines them at laſt to yeeld; alſo the Earle of Glocester comming to London with an Army, is by the Legat once againe perſwaded to render himſelfe to the King, and upon forfeiture of twelve thouſand Markes if ever he ſhould raiſe any commotion againe, is reconciled. Now remaines Lewilin and the Welſh, to be chaſtened for aiding of Simon Montford; but the King going againſt them with an Army, they give him two and thirty thouſand pounds Sterling, and ſo make their peace. And here was an end of the firſt warres betweene the Kings of England and their Barons. The next yeare after the Popes Legat Ottobon ſignes with the Croyſado both the Kings ſonnes, Edward and Edmund, the Earle of Glocester, and divers Noble men induced to undertake the Holy warre, by the ſollicitation of him and the King of France: who notwithſtanding his former calamities endured in that action, would once again adventure it: and becauſe Prince Edward wanted meanes to furniſh himſelfe out, the King of France lends him thirty thouſand Markes upon a morgage of Gaſcoyne. And now whilſt this preparation is in hand, King Henry labours to eſtabliſh the peace of the kingdome, and to reforme the exceſſes which the warre had bred; and the ſame yeare aſſembles his laſt Parliament at Marleborough, where the Statutes of that title were enacted. Neare two yeeres it ſeemes to have beene after the undertaking the Croſſe before Prince Edward ſet forth; but then taking his wife Eleanor with him, though young with childe, he ſet forward; and in the voyage, when many of his people ſeemed deſirous to leave him, and returne home, he is ſaid to have ſtrucken his breaſt, and ſworne; that if all his followers forſooke him, he would yet enter Acon, or Ptolemais; though but onely with his horſe-keeper Fowin. Shortly after Richard King of the Romans died, and the yeare following King Henry.

Of his Taxations, and wayes for raiſing of money.

NEver ſonne was more like a Father in any thing, then King Henry was like his Father King John, in this point, for raiſing of money; for he trode directly in all his ſteps, if he added not ſomething of his owne. King John had great Subſidies granted him by Parliament, for any great action he undertooke, ſo had King Henry. King John reſumed the lands alienedfrom the Crowne, ſo did King Henry. King John made benefit of the vacancie of Biſhopricks and Abbeys, ſo did King Henry. K. John took great Fines of many for crimes not proved, but onely ſuppoſed, ſo did King Henry. King John made benefit of a new Seale, ſo did King Henry. King John extorted great ſummes from the Jewes, ſo did King Henry. And one way more he had to get money, which perhaps his Father had not, and that was by begging, as he told the Abbot of Borough, It was more Almes to give money to him, then to the Begger that went from doore to doore. Indeed Taxations in this Kings Raigne may be reckoned amongſt his Annuall Revenues, for ſcarce any yeare paſſed without a Parliament, and ſeldome any Parliament without a Taxe, or if any ſometimes without, it was then cauſe of the greater Taxation ſome other way; as when he tooke of the Londoners for having aided the Barons, twenty thouſand Markes.

Of his Lawes and Ordinances.

IN this Kings Raigne were ratified and confirmed the two great Charters of Magna Charta, and Charta de Foreſta: alſo in his time were enacted the Statutes called of Merton, of Oxford, and of Marleborough. Alſo ſtealing of cattell, which before was but Pecuniary, he made capitall: and the firſt that ſuffered for the ſame, was one of Dunſtable, who having ſtollen twelve Oxen from the Inhabitants of Colne, and being purſued to Redburne, was by a Bailiffe of Saint Albons, according to the Kings Proclamation, condemned and beheaded. And it may ſeeme ſtrange that in theſe times ſo much bloud ſhould be ſhed in the field, and none upon the ſcaffold; for till the twenty ſixth yeare of this King, that one William Mariſe, the ſonne of Geoffrey Mariſe, a Noble man of Ireland, being condemned for Piracie and Treaſon, was hanged, beheaded, and quartered; there is no example of that kinde of puniſhment to be found in our Hiſtories. Particularly in this Kings Raigne was made that Statute, by which the Ward and marriage of the heires of Barons within age, is given to the King. Alſo in this Kings Raigne the Pleas of the Crowne were pleaded in the Tower of London. All Weares in the Thames are in this Kings time ordained to be pluck'd up and deſtroyed. Alſo the Citizens of London are allowed by Charter, to paſſe Toll-free through all England, and to have free Warren about London, alſo to have and uſe a common Seale. Alſo it was ordained that no Sheriffe of London ſhould continue in his office longer then one yeare, which they did before for many. In the five and twentieth yeare of this King were Aldermen firſt choſen within the City of London, which then had the rule of the City, and of the Wards of the ſame, and were then yearely changed, as now the Sheriffes are. It was in this Kings time allowed to the City of London, to preſent their Major to the Barons of the Exchequer to be ſworne, which before was to be preſented to the King, whereſoever he were. In his time the clauſe Non obſtante (brought in firſt by the Pope) was taken up by the King in his grants and writings. Alſo in this Kings time, William Biſhop of Salubury, firſt cauſed that cuſtome to be received for a Law, whereby the Tenants of every Lordſhip are bound to owe their ſuite to the Lords Court, of whom they hold their Tenements.

Affaires of the Church in his time.

AFfaires of the Church for matter of Doctrine, were never more quiet then in this Kings Raigne; for now all Hereſies accounted of the time, eſpecially the Albigenſes were in a manner ſuppreſſed by the Armes of the King of France, not without the Vote of the King of England, who forbore to make warre upon him in tenderneſſe to this ſervice; but for matter of manners, they were never more turbulent: for now Abbeys were fleeced, Sanctuaries violated, Clergy-men outraged, Biſhops themſelves not ſpared; and all for greedineſſe of money, or for revenge. Ottobone the Popes Legat here in England, lying at the Abbey of Oſeney, there happened a difference betweene his ſervants and the Schollers of Oxford; in which contention, a brother of his was ſlaine, and the Legat himſelfe faine to fly into the Steeple for ſafegard of his life: whereupon afterward being gotten from thence by the Kings ſafe conduct, he thundred out curſes againſt the Schollers, and interdicted the Univerſity, ſo as the Colledges grew deſolate, and the Students were diſperſed abroad into other places, for the ſpace of halfe a yeare: till the Monkes of Oſeney, and the Regent Maſters of Oxford were faine to goe bare-foote and bare-head through London, as farre as Durham houſe, where the Legat lay; and there upon their humble ſubmiſſion, and great mens interceſſion, they were abſolved, and the Univerſity reſtored to its former eſtate. But of this Ottobone, it may not be impertinent to relate a little further; that going afterward out of England, he came by degrees, after the death of Innocent the fifth, to be Pope of Rome himſelfe, by the name of Adrian the fifth, and died within fifty dayes after his election. Amongſt affaires of the Church, may be reckoned the Ulcers of any member of the Church: ſuch a one as in this Kings time brake out moſt loathſome; for one procuring five wounds to be made in his body, in reſemblance to the five wounds in Chriſts body, tooke upon him to be Chriſt, and had gotten a Woman, that tooke upon her to be the Virgin Mary; who continuing obſtinate in their madneſſe, were adjudged to be immured and ſhut up betweene two wals, to the end (no doubt) the contagion of their filthineſſe ſhould ſpread no further. In this Kings time, a little novelty was firſt brought in by Pope Innocent the fourth, who ordained that Cardinals ſhould weare red Hats: ſomething perhaps for myſtery, and ſomething for diſtiction.

Workes

Workes of piety done by him, or by others in his time.

THis King cauſed a cheſt of Gold to be made for laying up the Reliques of King Edward the Confeſſour, in the Church of Weſtminſter. Hee builded a Church for converted Jewes in London: alſo an Hoſpitall at Oxford, for paſſengers and diſeaſed perſons: alſo the new Coventuall Church and the Chappell of our Lady at Weſtminſter, whereof hee laid himſelfe the firſt ſtone: alſo the houſe of Black-Friers in Canterbury. In his time, Ela Counteſſe of Salisbury, founded the Abbey of Lacok in Wiltſhire; Richard Earle of Cornwall, founded Hayles a Monaſtery of Ciſterſian Monkes neare to Winchcombe in Glocesterſhire: Reginold de Moun, Earle of Somerſet, and Lord of Dunſter, founded the Abbey of Newham in Devonſhire: Ranulph the third Earle of Cheſter, and Lord of little Britaine, builded the Caſtles of Chartley, Beſtone, and the Abbey of Dela Creſſe: Sir John Manſell the Kings Chaplaine, founded a houſe of Regular Chanons neare to Rumney in Kent: William de Albineto Earle of Arundell, founded the Priory of Wimondham: William Brunc, a Citizen of London, and Roſia his wife, founded the Hoſpitall of our Lady without Biſhopſgate in London: And Iſabel Counteſſe of Arundell, founded the Nunnery of Marran neare to Linne. Friers Minors firſt arrived at Dover, nine in number, whereof five remained at Canterbury, and there builded the firſt Covent of Friers Minors that ever was in England: the other foure came to London, who encreaſing in number, had a place aſſigned them in Saint Nicholas Shambles; which John Iwyn, Mercer of London, appropriated to the uſe of the ſaid Friers, and became himſelfe a Lay brother. Alſo in this Kings time the new worke of Saint Pauls Church in London was begunne. If it were piety in the Jew, who falling into a Privie upon a Saterday, would not be taken out that day, becauſe it was the Jewes Sabbath: It was as much piety in the Earle of Glocester, that would not ſuffer him to be taken out the next day, becauſe it was the Chriſtian Sabbath; and when the third day he was taken out dead, whoſe piety was the greater? A ſtrange accident upon an act of piety, is related in this Kings time; which if true, is a Miracle, if not true, is yet a Legend, and not unworthy to be read: that in a time of dearth, one man in a certaine Pariſh, who allowed poore people to relieve themſelves with taking Corne upon his ground, had at Harveſt a plentifull crop; where others that denied them, had their Corne all blaſted, and nothing worth. In this Kings time alſo, Hugh Balſamus, Biſhop of Ely, founded Saint Peters Colledge in Cambridge. Hubert de Burgh Earle of Kent, was buried in the Church of the Friers Preachers in London, to which Church he gave his Palace at Weſtminſter, which afterward the Arch-biſhop of Yorke bought, and made it his Inne; ſince commonly called Yorke place, now White-Hall.

Caſualties happening in his time.

AT one time there fell no Raine in England, from the firſt of March to the Aſſumption of our Lady; and at another time there fell ſo much Raine, that Holland and Holdernes in Lincolneſhire were over-flowed and drowned. In the ſeventeenth yeare of his Raign, were ſeene five Suns at one time together; after which followed ſo great a Dearth, that people were conſtrained to eate horſe fleſh, and barkes of Trees: and in London twenty thouſand were ſtarved for want of foode. Alſo in his time the Church of Saint Mildred in Canterbury, and a great part of the City was burnt. Alſo the Towne of New-Caſtle upon Tine was burnt, Bridge and all. And though it may ſeeme no fit place to tell it, yet here or no where it muſt be told; that in this Kings time there was ſent by the King of France, the firſt Elephant that ever was ſeene in England.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE married Eleanor, the ſecond of the five Daughters of Raymond Earle of Provence, who lived his Wife thirty ſeven yeares, his Widow nineteene, dyed a Nun at Aimesbury, and was buryed in her Monaſtery. By her, he had ſixe Sonnes, and three Daughters: of his Sonnes, the foure youngeſt dyed young, and were buryed, three of them at Weſtminſter, and the fourth in the New Temple by Fleetſtreet. His eldeſt Sonne Edward, ſurnamed Longſhanke, of his tall and ſlender body, ſucceeded him in the kingdome. His ſecond Sonne Edmund, ſurnamed Crouch-backe, of bowing in his backe, (as ſome ſay) but more likely of wearing the ſigne of the Croſſe, (anciently called a Crouch) upon his backe, which was uſually worne of ſuch as had vowed voyages to Hieruſalem, as he had done. He was inveſted Titular King of Sicilie and Apulia, and created Earle of Lancaſter; on whoſe perſon originally the great contention of Lancaſter and Yorke was Founded. He had two Wives, the firſt was Avelin. Daughter and Heire of William Earle of Albemarle, by whom he left no iſſue. The ſecond was Queene Blanch, Daughter of Robert Earle of Artois, (Brother of Saint Lewis King of France) Widow of Henry of Champaigne King of Navarre: by her he had iſſue three Sonnes, and one Daughter. His eldeſt Sonne Thomas, who after his Father was Earle of Lancaſter, and having marryed Alice, Daughter and Heire of Henry Lacie Earle of Lincolne, was beheaded at Pomfret without iſſue. His ſecond ſonne Henry Lord of Monmouth, who after his Brothers death was Earle of Lancaſter, and Father of Henry the firſt Duke of Lancaſter: his third Sonne John; who dyed unmarryed. His Daughter Mary marryed to Henry Lord Percy, Mother of Henry the firſt Earle of Northumberland. This Edmund dyed at Bay in Gaſcoyne, in the yeare 1296. when he had lived fifty yeares, whoſe body halfe a yeare after his death was brought over into England and entombed at Weſtminſter. Of King Henries three Daughter, the eldeſt Margaret was marryed to Alexander the third, King of Scotland, by whom ſhe had iſſue, two Sonnes, Alexander and David; who dyed both before their Father, without iſſue, and one Daughter Margaret Queene of Norway, Wife of King Erike, and Mother of Margaret the Heire of Scotland and Norway, that dyed unmarryed. The ſecond Daughter of King Henry was Beatrice, borne at Burdeaux, unmarryed to John the firſt Duke of Britaine, and had iſſue by him, Arthur Duke of Britaine, John Earle of Richmont, Peter; and Blanch marryed to Philip Sonne of Robert Earle of Artois, Eleanor a Nunne at Aimesbury, and Mary marryed to Guy Earle of S. Paul, ſhe deceaſed in Britaine, and was buryed at London, in the Quire of the Gray Fryers within Newgate. The third Daughter of King Henry, named Katherine, dyed young, and lies buryed at Weſtminſter, in the ſpace betweene the Chappels of King Edward and Saint Benet.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

HE was of ſtature but meane, yet of a well compacted body, and very ſtrong: one of his eyelids hanging downe, and almoſt covering the blacke of his Eye: For his inward endowments, it may be ſaid, he was wiſer for a man, then for a Prince; for he knew better how to governe his life then his Subjects. He was rather Pious then Devout, as taking more pleaſure in hearing Maſſes then Sermons, as he ſaid to the King of France, He had rather ſee his Friend once, then heare from him often. His minde ſeemed not to ſtand firme upon its Baſis, for every ſudden accident put him into paſſion. He was neither conſtant in his love, nor in his hate; for he never had ſo great a Favorite whom he caſt not into diſgrace, nor ſo great an Enemy whom he received not into favour. An example of both which qualities was ſeene in his carriage towards Hubert de Burgh, who was for a time his greateſt Favourite, yet caſt out afterward in miſerable diſgrace, and then no man held in greater hatred, yet received afterward into grace againe. And it it is memorable to heare with what crimes this Hubert was charged at his Arraignment; and ſpecially one: That to diſſwade a great Lady from marriage with the King, he had ſaid, the King was a ſquint-eyed Foole, and a kinde of Leper, deceitfull, perjured, more faint-hearted then a Woman, and utterly unfit for any Noble Ladies company. For which, and other crimes laid to his charge in the Kings Bench, where the King himſelfe was preſent; he was adjudged to have his Lands confiſcate, and to be deprived of his title of Earle; yet after all this, was reſtored to his eſtate againe, and ſuffered to live in quiet. He was more deſirous of money then of honour, for elſe he would never have ſold his Right to the two great Dukedomes of Normandy and Anjou to the King of France for a Summe of money. Yet he was more deſirous of honour then of quietneſſe, for elſe he would never have contended ſo long with his Barons about their Charter of Liberty, which was upon the matter, but a point of Honour. His moſt eminent vertue, and that which made him the more eminent, as being rare in Princes, was his Continency, for there is nothing read, either of any baſe children he had, or of any Concubine he kept.

Of his Death and Buriall.

THough he had lived a troubleſome life, yet he dyed a quiet death; for he had ſetled Peace in his kingdome, and in his Conſcience. For being at Saint Edmundsbury, and finding himſelfe not well at eaſe, he made the more haſt to London; where calling before him his Lords, and ſpecially Gilbert de Clare, Earle of Gloceſter; he exhorted them to be true and faithfull to his Sonne Prince Edward, who was at that time farre from home, and therefore had the more need of their care, which conſiſted chiefly in their agreement one with another. And then, his ſickneſſe encreaſing, he yeelded up his Soule to God, on the ſixteenth day of November, in the yeare 1272. when he had lived threeſcore and five yeares, Raigned five and fifty, and was buryed at Weſtminſter, which he had newly Builded.

Of Men of note in his time.

OF Martial men famous in his time there were many, but three ſpecially who obſcured the reſt: The firſt was William Marſhall Earle of Pembroke, memorable for the great care he had of King Henry in his minority, and more memorable for the little care, that Deſtiny had of his Poſterity; for leaving five Sonnes behind him, they all lived to be Earles ſucceſſively, yet all dyed without iſſue: So as the great name and numerous Family of the Marſhals came wholly to be extinct in that Generation. The ſecond was Richard de Clare Earle of Gloceſter, who in a Battaile againſt Baldwyn de Giſnes, a valiant Fleming, imployed by King Henry, himſelfe alone encountred twelve of his Enemies, and having his Horſe ſlaine under him, he pitcht one of them by the legge out of the ſaddle, and leapt into it himſelfe, and continued the fight without giving ground, till his Army came to reſcue him. An Act that may ſeeme fitter to be placed amongſt the Fictions of knights Errant, then in a true Narration. The third was Simon Montford, a man of ſo audacious a ſpirit, that he gave King Henry the lye to his face, and that in preſence of all his Lords; and of whom it ſeemes, the King ſtood in no ſmall feare: for paſſing one time upon the Thames, and ſuddenly taken with a terrible ſtorme of Thunder and Lightning, he commanded to be ſet aſhore at the next Staires, which happened to be at Durham Houſe, where Montford then lay, who comming downe to meet the King, and perceiving him ſomewhat frighted with the Thunder, ſaid unto him, Your Majeſty need not feare the Thunder, the danger is now paſt: No Montford (ſaid the King) I feare not the Thunder ſo much as I doe thee. Of men famous for Sanctity of life, there were likewiſe many in his time, but three more eminent then the reſt, Edmund Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, Richard Biſhop of Chicheſter, and Thomas Arch-deacon of Hereford; All three either Canonized, or at leaſt thought thought worthy to be Canonized for Saints. To these may be added Robert Grosshead Bishop of Lincolne, who Translated the Testaments of the twelve Patriarchs, out of Greeke into Latine; which through envy of the Jewes never came to the knowledge of Saint Hierome, wherein are many Prophesies of our Saviour Christ. Of men famous for learning there were likewise many in his time; of whom, some left workes behinde them for testimonies of their knowledge in divers kindes, as Alexander Hales a Fryer Minor, who wrote many Treatises in Divinity; Ralph Coggeshall, who wrote the Appendix to the Chronicle of Ralph Niger; Randolph Earle of Chester, the third and last of that name, who compiled a Booke of the Lawes of England; Henry Bracton, who wrote the Booke commonly called by his name, De Consuetudinibus Anglicanis: and besides these, Hugh Kirkestead, Richard of Ely, Peter Henham, John Gyles, and Nicholas Fernham, excellent Physitians; Richard surnamed Theologus, and Robert Bacon, two notable Divines; Stephen Langthon, Richard Fisaker, Simon Stokes, John of Kent, William Shirwood, Michael Blaunpaine, John Godard, Vincent of Coventry, Albericke Veer, Richard Wich, John Basing, Roger Waltham, William Senyngham, and others.

Of his comming to the Crowne,

AS soone as King Henry was dead and buryed, the great Lords of the Land causèd his eldest Sonne Prince Edward to be proclaimed King: and assembling at the New Temple in London, they there tooke order for the quiet Governing of the kingdome, till he should come home. For at this time he was absent in the Holy Land; and had beene there above a yeare when his Father dyed. But we cannot bring him home without telling what he did, and what he suffered in all that time, and in his returne; for at his first comming thither, he rescued the great City of Acon, from being surrendred to the Souldan; after which, out of envy to his Valour, one Annacim a desperate Saracen, who had often beene employed to him from their Generall, being one time, upon pretence of some secret message, admitted alone into his Chamber, with a poysoned knife gave him three wounds in the Body, two in the Arme, and one neare the armepit, which were thought to be mortall, and had perhaps beene mortall, if out of unspeakeable love, the Lady Eleanor his Wife had not suckt out the poyson of his wounds with her mouth, and thereby effected a cure, which otherwise had beene incurable: and it is no wonder, that love should doe wonders, which is it selfe a wonder. And now being disappointed of Aides that were promised to be sent him, and leaving Garrisons in fit places for defence of the Country, he with his Wife Eleanor takes his journey homewards, and first passing by Sicilie, was there most kindly received by Charles King of that Island, where he first heard of his Fathers death; which he tooke more heavily farre, then he had taken the death of his young Sonne Henry, whereof he had heard a little before; at which when King Charles marvailed, he answered, that other Sonnes might be had, but another Father could never be had. From hence he passeth through Italy, where much honour is done him both by the Pope and other Princes; and then descends into Burgoigne, where by the Earle of Chalbourn, a stout man at Armes, he is challenged at a Turneament, with a pretence to solemnize his presence, but with a purpose indeed to disgrace his person; and though Prince Edward in many respects might justly juſtly have refuſed it, yet the nobleneſſe of his mind would not ſuffer him to paſſe by any occaſion of ſhewing his valour, and in this encounter he acquitted himſelfe as he made it appeare, that Fame had not ſpoken too much in the report of him. And here a great part of his Engliſh Nobility met him, from whence he paſſeth on to France, where the King Philip his deare Cousin (as being Sister's Sonne) entertaines him with great ſolemnity: and graceth his ſolemnity with ſo much courteſie, that it wonne Prince Edward ſolemnarily to do him homage for the Territories he held in France; & this voluntarines in Prince Edward, won the King of France againe to grant quietly unto him, all the Lands in France that belonged to him; and ſo theſe two great Kings by reciprocall courteſie effected that, which their Predeceſſours by force could never effect. From hence he paſſeth through Aquitaine, and having there taken homage of his Subjects, and ſet all things in order, he ſet Saile and arrived in England, above a yeare after the death of his Father: a long time for plotting of miſchiefe, and a ſtrong temptation to plotters of miſchiefe; if all the cauſes of quietneſſe had not concurred: but ſuch was the worthineſſe of Prince Edwards perſon, and ſuch the undoubtednesſe of his Title, that as there could be no Competitour, ſo there would be no Oppugner. And indeed the Divine Providence had ſhewed a ſpeciall care over him from his Child-hood: whereof one or two Examples will not be unfit to be related. One was this, that being yet but young, and playing one time at Cheſſe with a Friend, in the midſt of his game, without any apparent occaſion, he removed himſelfe from the place where he ſate, when ſuddenly there fell from the roofe of the houſe a great ſtone, which if he had ſtayed in the place but never ſo little had beaten out his braines. Another Example of the Divine Providence over him, (though it happened afterwards) was this: Having prepared a great Fleete of Ships for a journey into Flanders, and being at Winchelſey, where the Ships were to meete; it happened that riding about the Harbour, his Horſe frighted with the noyſe of a Windmill, which the wind drove violently about, skrambled up and leapt over the Mud-wall of the Towne, ſo as neither the King nor the Horſe was to be ſeene, but every one judged the King could not chuſe but be throwne and killed; yet ſuch was the Divine Providence over him, that the Horſe lighted upon his feet, and the King keeping the Saddle returned ſafe. And under the wing of this Divine Providence, he had now paſſed all the dangers of his tedious Journey; and being ſafely come to London, was on the fifteenth day of Auguſt in the yeare 1274. Crowned at Weſtminſter, together with his Wife Queene Eleanor, by Robert Kilwarby Arch-biſhop of Canterbury: where five hundred great Horſes were let looſe, for any that could take them; and yet the outward ſolemnity was not more great, then the inward joy was univerſall, every man rejoycing, not onely at a change, which of it ſelfe is pleaſing, but at a change ſo much for the better, as this was like to be.

Of his Acts done after he was Crowned.

THe Acts of this King after he was Crowned, may not unfitly be divided into five parts: His Acts with his Temporall Lords; His Acts with his Clergy; Then with Wales; Then his Acts with Scotland; And laſtly with France. And firſt, concerning his Lords, he gave them good contentment in the beginning of his Raigne, by enlarging their liberties, and granting them eaſier Lawes, for which purpoſe he called a Parliament, wherein were made the Statutes called of Weſtminſter the firſt, ſo as he had no difference with them, till toward the end of his Raigne, as ſhall be ſhewed hereafter. In the next place, concerning his Acts with his Clergy, he began with them betimes; for having lived to be of good age, three or foure and thirty yeares old, in his Fathers Raigne, he obſerved in that time, that their power was too predominant, and therefore thought fit to clip their wings; at leaſt to keepe them from farther growing: which he did by theſe meanes: Firſt, in the ſixth yeare of his Raigne, he deprived many chiefe Monaſteries of their Liberties, and tooke from the Abbot and Covent of Weſtminſter, the Returne of Writs

Writs granted them by the Charter of his Father, King Henry the third. The next yeare after he got to be enacted the Statute of Mortmaine, to hinder the encreaſe of their Temporall Poſſeſſions. In the ſecond Statute of Weſtminſter, he defalked the Juriſdiction of Eccleſiaſticall Judges; and growing more upon them, he required the moity of all their Goods, as well Temporall as Spirituall, for one yeare. Then cals he a Parliament of his Nobles at Salisbury, without admiſſion of any Church-men in it: And it is worth the noting, that Marchian his Treaſurer, acquainting him that in Churches and Religious houſes, there was much treaſure to be had, if it might be taken; he made no ſcruple of it, but cauſed it to be taken and brought into his Exchequer. But finding his Prelates not well contented with it, to pleaſe them againe, he bids them aske ſomething of him, wherein they ſhould ſee how much he favoured them. And they asking of him to repeale the Statute of Mortmaine, that had beene made ſo much to their hinderance; He anſwered, that this was a Statute made by the whole body of the Realme, and therefore was not in his power, who was but one Member of that Body, to undoe that which all the Members together had done; and perhaps whatſoever they ſhould have asked elſe, he would have had an anſwer to redeeme his Offer. And thus much concerning his Clergy.

In the next place are the Welſh, who had themſelves begun with the King: For their Prince Leolyn being ſummoned to attend at his Coronation, refuſed to come; and afterward at more leiſure, being required to come and doe his Homage, he ſtood upon termes of ſafe conduct, pretending doubt to be uſed, as his Father Gryffin had beene; who upon hard uſage in the Tower, ſeeking to make eſcape, fell from the Walls and brake his necke. But indeed it was alwayes a Cuſtome with this Nation, at every change of Princes in England, to try concluſions, hoping at one time or other to have a day of it, and to change their yoke of bondage into liberty; for which they were never better Provided then now; eſpecially (which is the greateſt matter in Warre) having a Valiant Prince to be their Leader. But there happened an accident which tooke off their edge at this time: For the Lady Eleanor, a Daughter of the late Earle Simon Montford, whom Prince Leolyn extreamely loved, being paſſing out of France into Wales, was by the way upon the Sea taken by Engliſh ſhips, and brought to King Edward, and for the love of her, Prince Leolyn was content to ſubmit himſelfe to any conditions: which beſides ſubjection of his State, was to pay fifty thouſand pounds Sterling, and a thouſand pounds per annum during his life; and upon theſe conditions the marriage with his beloved Lady was granted him, and was ſolemnized here in England, whereat the King and Queene were themſelves preſent. Three yeares Leolyn continued loyall, and within bounds of obedience, in which time David, one of his Brothers, ſtaying here in England, and found by the King to be of a ſtirring Spirit, was much honoured by him; Knighted, and matched to a rich Widow, Daughter of the Earle of Derby, and had given him by the King beſides, the Caſtle of Denbigh, with a thouſand pounds per annum: though (as it was afterwards found) he lived here but in the nature of a ſpy: For when Prince Leolyns Lady was afterward dead, and that he (contrary to his Conditions formerly made) brake out into rebellion, then goes his Brother David to him, notwithſtanding all theſe Favours of the King: and they together enter the Engliſh Borders: Surpriſe the Caſtles of Flynt and Rutland, with the perſon of the Lord Clifford, ſent Juſticiar into thoſe parts: and in a great Battaile overthrew the Earles of Northumberland and Surrey, with the ſlaughter of Sir William Lyndſey, Sir Richard Tanny, and many others. King Edward adverriſed of this Revolt and overthrow, being then at the Vyzes in Wiltſhire, prepares an Army to repreſſe it; but before his ſetting forth, goes privately to his Mother Queene Eleanor, lying at the Nunnery of Aimesbury, with whom whileſt he conferred, there was one brought into the Chamber, who faigned himſelfe (being blinde) to have received his ſight at the Tombe of King Henry the third: Aſſoone as the King ſaw the man, he remembred he had ſeene him before, and knew him to be a moſt notorious lying Villaine, and wiſhed his Mother in no caſe to be-leeve him: but his mother, who much rejoyced to heare of this Miracle, for the glory of her husband, finding her sonne unwilling that his Father should be a Saint, grew suddenly into such a rage against him, that she commanded him to avoid her Chamber: which the King obeyes; and going forth, meetes with a Clergy man, to whom he tels the story of this Impostour, and merrily said, He knew the justice of his Father to be such, that he would rather pull out the eyes (being whole) of such a wicked wretch, then restore them to their sight. In this meane time the Arch-bishop of Canterbury had gone of himselfe to Prince Leolin, and had laboured to bring him and his brother David to a re-submission, but could effect nothing, for besides other reasons that swayed Prince Leolin, the conceit of a Propheste of Merlin, that he should shortly be Crowned with the Diadem of Brute, so overweighed him, that he had no care for peace, and shortly after no head: for after the Earle of Pembroke had taken Bere Castle, which was the seat of Prince Leolin, he was himself slain in battell; and his head cut off by a common Souldier, was sent to King Edw. who caused the same to be Crowned with Ivie, and to be set upon the Tower of London; And this was the end of Leolin, the last of the Welsh Princes, betrayed (as some write) by the men of Buelth. Not long after his brother Dauid also is taken in Wales, and judged in England to an ignominious death: First, drawn at a horse taile about the City of Shrewsbury, then beheaded, the trunke of his body divided, his heart and bowels burnt, his head sent to accompany his brothers on the Tower of London, his foure quarters to foure Cities, Briſtow, Northampton, York, and Winchester: A manifold execution, and the first shewed in that kind to this kingdome, in the person of the son of a Prince, or any other Noble man that we reade of in our History. It is perhaps something which some here observe, that at the sealing of this conquest, King Edward lost his eldest son Alphonsus, of the age of twelve years, (a Prince of great hope) and had onely left to succeed him, his sonne Edward lately borne at Carnarvan, and the first of the English, intituled Prince of Wales, but no Prince worthy of either Wales or England. And thus came Wales to be united to the Crowne of England, in the eleventh yeare of this King Edwards Raigne; who thereupon established the government thereof, according to the Lawes of England, as may be seene by the Statute of Rutland, in the twelfth yeare of his Raigne.

The worke of Wales being setled, King Edward passeth over into France, upon notice of the death of Philip the Hardy, to renew and confirme such conditions as his state in those parts required, with the new King Philip the fourth, intituled the Faire, to whom he doth homage for Aquitaine, having before quitted his claime to Normandy for ever. After three yeares and a halfe being away in France, he returns into England; and now in the next place comes the businesse with Scotland, and will hold him worke at times as long as he lives, and his sonne after him. Alexander the third, King of Scots, as he was running his horse, fell horse and man to the ground, and brake his necke, and died immediately; by reason whereof (he leaving no issue, but onely a daughter of his daughter Margaret, who died also soone after) there fell out presently great contention about succession. Ten Competitors pretend title, namely, Erick King of Norway, Florence Earle of Holland, Robert Bruce Earle of Anandale, John de Baylioll Lord of Galloway, John de Hastings Lord of Abergeveny, John Cummin Lord of Badenow, Patrick de Dunbarre Earle of March, John de Vescie, Nicholas de Sules, William de Rosse; all or most of them descending from David Earle of Huntington, younger brother to William King of Scots, and great Unkle to the late King Alexander. This title King Edward takes upon him to decide, pretending a Right of Superiority from his Ancestours over that kingdome and proving it by authority of old Chronicles, as Marianus Scotus, William of Malmsbury, Roger de Hoveden, Henry of Huntington, Ralph de Luceto, and others; which though the Scottish Lords who swaied the Interregnum opposed, yet are they constrained for avoyding of further inconveniences, to make him Arbiter thereof, and the reyne Competitours bound to stand to his award. Two are especially found, betweene whom the right lay, John de Baylioll Lord of Galloway, and Robert Bruse; the one descending from an elder daughter, the other from a sonne of a younger daughter daughter of Alan, who had married the eldest daughter of this David brother to King William. The controversie held long, twelve of either kingdome learned in the Lawes, are elected to debate the same at Berwick; all the best Civilians in the Universities of France are solicited to give their opinions; all which brought forth rather doubts then resolutions: whereupon King Edward the better to sway this businesse by his presence, takes a journey Northward; where being come as farre as Lincolnshire, he lost his beloved wife Queene Eleanor: and thereupon going backe to see her Funerall performed at Westminster: that done, he returnes presently to his Scottish businesse. And now sixe yeares were passed since the death of King Alexander, and yet nothing concluded in this controversie; whereupon King Edward deals privately with Bruce, (who had the weaker Title, but the more friends) and promiseth him, if he would sweare fealty and homage to the Crowne of England, he would Invest him in that of Scotland. But Bruce answers, he was not so desirous to rule, as thereby to infringe the liberties of his Countrey. Whereupon with the like offer he sets upon Baylioll, who having better right, but lesse love of the people, and more greedy of a kingdome then honour, accepts the condition; and thereupon is Crowned King at Scone, hath fealty done him by all the chiefe Nobility, except Bruce: comes to New-Castle upon Tyne, where King Edward then lay; and there, with many of his Nobles, sweares fealty, and doth homage to him, as his Soveraigne Lord. Which act done to secure him, overthrew him: for being little beloved before, hereby he became lesse: such as stood for Bruce, and others of the Nobility (tender of the preservation of their Countries liberty) took stomach against him; and not onely for this, but shortly after for his injustice in the case of the Earle of Fife, one of the sixe Governours in the time on the Interregnum, who had beene slaine by the Family of Alberneth; the brother of which Earle prosecuting Law before King Baylioll, in his high Court of Parliament, and having no right done him (King Baylioll giving judgement of the side of the Albernethes) he appeales to the Court of the King of England: whereupon King Baylioll is summoned, appeares, sits with King Edward in his Parliament till his cause was to be heard, and then is cited by an Officer to arise, and to stand in the place appointed for pleading; then he craves to answer by a Procuratour, but is denied, and thereupon descends to the ordinary place, and defends his cause himselfe: which indignity (as he tooke it) so incenseth him, that he returnes home with a breathfull charged with indignation; meditates revenge, renues the ancient league with France, confirmes it with marriage of his sonne Edward, to a daughter of Charles brother to King Philip, glad in regard of late offences taken against the King of England, to embrace the same; which done, Baylioll defies King Edward, renounceth his Allegeance, as unlawfully done, being not in his power, without consent of the State, to doe any such Act. Hereupon brake out that mortall dissension betweene the two Nations, which consumed more Christian bloud, and continued longer then ever quarrell we reade of did, between any two people in the world. For he that beganne it, could not end it, but it lasted almost three hundred yeares, and was never throughly abolished, till the late blessed union wrought by him in whom Wisdome and Vertue, Right and Power concurred all to make it firme. And now the fatall Chaire in which the Kings of Scotland used to be Inaugurated, seemes to recover its secret operation, according to antient Propheste: that whither soever that Chaire should be removed, the kingdome should be removed with it; and this Chaire King Edward caused to be brought out of Scotland to Westminster, and to be placed there amongst the Monuments, where it still continues. But now King Baylioll being summoned to appeare at New-Castle, and refusing to come; King Edward enters Scotland with an Army, consisting of foure thousand horse, and thirty thousand foot, besides five hundred horse, and one thousand foote of the Bishop of Durham. Berwicke is first wonne, with the slaughter of fifteene thousand Scots, (our Writers say more) and after that, the Castles of Dunbarre, Roxborough, Edinburgh, Sterling, and Saint Johns Towne; and now King Baliol sues for Peace, submits himselfe, takes againe his Oath of Fealty to King Edward, as his Soveraigne Lord: which done, a Parliament for Scotland is held at Berwicke, where the Nobility likewiſe did Homage to him, confirming the ſame by their Charter, under their hands and ſeales: onely William Douglaſſe refuſeth; content rather to endure the miſery of a Priſon, then yeeld to the ſubjection of the King of England. But King Bayliol, notwithſtanding his ſubmiſſion, is ſent priſoner into England after his foure yeares Raigne in Scotland; and King Edward returnes home, leaving John Warren Earle of Suſſex and Surrey, Warden of all Scotland; Hugh Creſſingham Treaſurer, and Ormeſby Chiefe Juſtice, with Commiſſion to take in his name, the Homages and Fealties of all ſuch as held Lands of that Crowne. But this continued not long, for King Edward being abſent in France, the Scots fell upon the Officers he had left, ſlew Sir Hugh Creſſingham with ſixe thouſand Engliſh, recovered many Caſtles, and regained the towne of Berwick, and all by the animation and conduct of one William Walley, a poore private Gentleman, (though Nobly deſcended) who ſeeing his Countrey without a Head, and thereby without a Heart (all the great men, either in captivity or ſubjection) aſſembles certaine of as poore and deſperate eſtate as himſelfe, and leads them to attempt upon whatſoever advantages they could finde to annoy the Engliſh, and having therein good ſucceſſe, it ſo encreaſed both his courage and company, that he afterward came to be the generall Guardian of the whole kingdome; and was in poſſibility to have abſolutely redeemed his Countrey from the ſubjection of the Engliſh, if the ſpeedy comming of King Edward had not prevented him. For now King Edward, to bring his worke neare together, removes his Exchequer and Courts of Juſtice to Yorke, where they continued above ſixe yeares; and thither he cals a Parliament, requiring all his ſubjects that held of him by knights ſervice, to be ready at Roxborough by a peremptory day: where there aſſemble three thouſand men at Armes on barded horſes, and foure thouſand other armed men on horſe without bards, with an Army of foote anſwerable, conſiſting moſt of Welſh and Iriſh, beſides five hundred men at Armes out of Gaſcoyne; and with this power he makes his ſecond expedition into Scotland: the Earles of Herford and Norfolke, with the Earle of Lincolne, led his Vauntgard at the famous battell of Fonkirke, where the ſhouts of the Scots were ſo great, that King Edwards horſe frighted withall, caſt him off, and brake two of his ribs; which notwithſtanding he gets up againe, goes on, and gets the victory; wherein are reported to be ſlaine two hundred knights, and forty thouſand foot of the Scots: but William Walley with ſome few, eſcaped to make more work. And here againe that kingdome might ſeeme as if quite overthrowne. Moſt of the eſtates of the Earles and Barons of Scotland (with their titles) that had ſtood out, were beſtowed on the Engliſh; and a Parliament is called at Saint Andrewes, where all the great men of that kingdome, except onely Walleys, once againe ſweare Fealty to the King of England. It ſeemes ſwearing of Fealty was with the Scots but a Ceremony without ſubſtance, as good as nothing: for this is now the third time they ſwore Fealty to King Edward, yet all did not ſerve to make them loyall: for not long after, comes the newes of a new King made and Crowned in Scotland: Robert Bruce Earle of Carrick, ſonne to that Bruce who was competitour with Bayliol, eſcaping out of England, becomes Head to the confuſed Body of that kingdome: and perceiving John Cummyn (who had a title himſelfe) to goe about to bewray his intentions to King Edward; he finding him at Dunfrayes, ſets upon him, and murthers him in the Church. Whereof as ſoone as King Edward heard, he ſends Aymer de Valence, Earle of Pembroke, and the Lords Clifford and Percie, with a ſtrong power to revenge the death of Cummyn, and to relieve his Wardens of Scotland; who upon Bruces revolt, were all retired to Berwicke, whilſt himſelfe prepares an Army to follow: wherein to be the more nobly attended, he cauſed Proclamation to be made, that whoſoever ought by their Paternall ſucceſſion, or otherwiſe had meanes of their owne for ſervice, ſhould repaire to Weſtminſter, at the Feaſt of Pentecoſt, to receive the Order of knighthood, and a Military Ornament out of the Kings Wardrobe. Hereupon three hundred young Gentlemen, all the ſonnes of Earles, Barons, and knights, aſſemble at the day appointed, and receive Purples, ſilkes, Sindons, Scarffes, wrought with Gold

Gold or Silver, according to every mans Eſtate. For which traine (becauſe the Kings Houſe was too little, by reaſon a part of it had beene lately burnt) roome is made, and the Apple-trees cut downe at the new Temple for their Tents, where they attire themſelves, and keepe their Vigile. The Prince (whom the King then likewiſe knighted, and gave him the Dutchy of Aquitaine) kept his Vigile with his Traine at Weſtminſter, and the next day girds theſe three hundred knights, with the Military Belt, in ſuch manner as he himſelfe had received it. Which done, the King before them all makes a Vow, that alive or dead, he would revenge the death of Cummyn upon Bruce, and the perjured Scots: Adjuring his Sonne and all the Nobles about him, upon their Fealty, that if he dyed in this Journey, they ſhould carry his Corps with them about Scotland, and not ſuffer it to be interred, till they had vanquiſhed the Uſurper, and abſolutely brought the Country to Subjection. The Prince and all the Nobles promiſe upon their Faith, to imploy their uttermoſt power to performe his Vow: and herewithall he ſets forth with a potent Army, preſently after Whitſontide, and makes his laſt Expedition into Scotland, in the foure and thirtieth yeare of his Raigne.

The Earle of Pembroke, with that power ſent before, and aid of the Scottiſh party, had before the King arrived in Scotland, defeated in a battaile neare Saint Johns Towne, the whole Army of the new King, and narrowly miſſed the taking of his Perſon, but he eſcaping in diſguiſe, and ſheltring himſelfe in obſcure places, was reſerved for greater Battailes, his Brothers Nigell, Bruce, and ſhortly after, Thomas and Alexander a Prieſt, were taken and Executed after the manner of Traytors at Berwicke. And now King Edward had done for Fighting, all was now for Executions, and indeed his deſire of Revenge made him inexorable, and vow to ſpare none of what degree ſoever. The Earle of Atholl, (though of Royall blood, and allyed unto him) was ſent to London, where all his preferment was, to have a higher paire of Gallowes then the reſt. The Wife of Robert Bruce, taken by the Lord Roſſe, is ſent Priſoner to London, and his Daughter to a Monaſtery in Lindſey. The Counteſſe of Bonghan, who had beene ayding at Bruces Coronation, is put into a woodden Cage, and hung out upon the walls of Berwicke for people to gaze on. But though Bruces party was thus dejected, and himſelfe at this time appeared not, but ſhifted privily from place to place, in a diſtreſſed manner, (attended onely with two Noble Gentlemen, who neeer forſooke him in his misfortunes, the Earle of Lenox and Gilbert Hay) yet gives he not over, but gathers new Forces, with which he ſuddenly aſſailes the Earle of Pembroke at unawares, gives him a great defeate, and within three dayes after chaſeth the Earle of Glocester into the Caſtle of Aire, where he beſieged him, till by the Kings Forces he was driven againe to his former retire. Whereupon King Edward, who had ſpent his Winter at Carlile, in July following with a freſh Army enters Scotland himſelfe, but falling into a Dyſentery or Bloody-flix, at Borough upon the Sands he ended his life: and thus ended King Edwards troubles with Scotland, but not Englands troubles, which are more to come, then yet are paſt.

But though this buſineſſe of Scotland never left King Edward till his dying day, yet it had been upon him but as an Ague, ſometimes putting him into violent heats, and ſometimes leaving him in a quiet temper, with ſuch a viciſſitude, that when he had quietneſſe with Scotland, he had troubles with France, whereof the time is now to ſpeake. It is well knowne, that Philip King of France, Father of the preſent King, and Edward King of England were neare Couſins, the Sonnes of two Siſters; and it hath beene ſhewed before at King Edwards returning from the Holy Land, and paſſing through France, what extraordinary kindneſſe and mutuall courteſie paſſed betweene them, that one would have thought neither they nor theirs ſhould ever have falne out: and perhaps never ſhould, if they had beene private men, and not Princes. For private men may eaſily continue Friends, as having none to conſider but themſelves; but Princes hardly, as having beſides themſelves, their Subjects to conſider. And though they be the Subjects oftentimes that make the Quarrell, yet they are the Princes that muſt maintaine it. And beſides, betweene Princes ces there can never be but jealousies, and where jealousies are, every trifle makes a quarrell. And this was the case of these two Kings, certaine of the King of Englands Subjects, had upon the Coast of Normandy done spoyle to some Subjects of the King of France: and this difference of the Subjects made a difference betweene the Kings, while each of them standing in defence of his owne, fall out themselves; and for a beginning the King of France summons King Edward, as owing homage to that Crowne, to appeare and answer it in his Court. And King Edward, though voluntarily before he had done it in a way of Courtesie, yet being now imperiously commanded, he refuseth it: upon which refusall, all his Territories in France are condemned to be forfaited, and an Army is presently sent to seise upon the same, led by Charles de Valois, and Arnold de Neele, Constable of France. Burdeaux; with divers other Peeces of importance, are taken from him. And now King Edward well knowing what danger it was to have so powerfull an Adversary; endevours first to strengthen himselfe with Friends abroad, seekes to match his Sonne Edward with a Daughter of Guy Earle of Flanders: Marries one of his Daughters to the Duke of Barre, who pretended Title to Champaigne; another to John Duke of Brabant; sends fifteene thousand pounds Sterling to Adolph de Nassaw the Emperour, for recovery of certaine Lands which he claimed in France; and with all these and many other confining Princes, he sets upon the King of France, and then sends over his Brother Edmund Earle of Lancaster, the Earles of Lincolne and Richmond, with eight and twenty Banners, seven hundred men at Armes, and a Navy of three hundred and sixty Saile. In the meane time the King of France, having had intelligence of the intended alliance betweene King Edward, and Guy Earle of Flanders, sends for the said Earle (as if knowing nothing thereof) to come with his Wife and Daughter to make merry with him at Paris: where instead of Feasting him, he makes him Prisoner, and takes from him his Daughter, in regard he fought (being his Vassall) to match her with his capitall Enemy. The Earle excuseth it the best he could, and by much mediation is released himselfe, but not his Daughter; whereupon the Earle, presuming upon aide from King Edward, takes Armes, and defies the King of France; who thereupon comes with an Army of sixty thousand against him: which caused King Edward, with all speed possible to relieve this distressed Earle, and so leaving the Government of the kingdome in his absence, to the Bishop of London, the Earle of Warwicke, and the Lords Reynold, Grey, and Clifford; with five hundred Saile, and eighteene thousand men at Armes, he passeth over into France, but finding the Country distracted into many popular Factions, and the King of France daily getting upon them, (having already won Lisle, Douay, Courtray, Burges and Dam) and the Emperour Adolph failing to send him aide as he had promised, he fell into great perplexity: and having stayed the whole Winter at Gaunt, where by reason of many outrages committed by his Souldiers, he was so affronted by the Gauntois, that his owne person was not without some danger; He thereupon in the Spring of the yeare, concludes a Truce with the King of France for two yeares, takes his sister Margaret to Wife, and affianceth the Daughter of the same King to his Sonne Prince Edward, and so returnes into England: And these were all the troubles King Edward had with France.

But now must something be spoken of troubles with his Lords at home, whereof this was the beginning: In a Parliament at Salisbury, the five and twentieth yeare of his Raigne, the King requires certaine of his Lords to goe to the Warres in Gascoyne; which needed a present supply by reason of the death of his Brother Edmund: but the Lords make all their excuses, every man for himselfe: Whereupon the King in great rage threatned, they should either goe, or he would give their Lands to others that should. Upon this Humfrey Bohun Earle of Hereford, High Constable, and Roger Bigod Earle of Norfolke, Marshall of England, make their Declaration, that if the King went in Person they would attend him; otherwise not. Which answer offended the King more, and being urged againe, the Earle Marshall protested he would willingly goe thither with the King, and march before him in the Vauntguard, as by right of inheritance he ought to doe; But the King told told him plainely, he should goe with any other, though he went not himselfe in Person. I am not so bound (saith the Earle) neither will I take this journey without you. The King sware by God, Sir Earle, you shall either goe or hang. And I sweare by the same Oath (said the Earle) I will neither goe nor hang, and so without leave departs. Shortly after the two Earles assemble many Noble men, and other their Friends, to the number of thirty Bannerets, so as they were fifteen hundred men at Armes, well appointed, and stood upon their Guard. The King like a prudent Prince, who knew his times, prosecutes them not as then, but lets the matter passe, in regard that his businesse called him presently into Flanders; when being ready to take ship, the Arch-bishops, Bishops, Earles, Barons, and the Commons send him a Roll of the Grievances of his Subjects, concerning his Taxes, Subsidies, and other Impositions, with his seeking to force their services by unlawfull courses: to which the King sends answer, that he could not alter any thing without the advice of his Councell, who were not now about him, and therefore required them, seeing they would not attend him in his Journey, (which they absolutely refused to doe, though he went in Person, unlesse he had gone into France or Scotland) that they would yet doe nothing in his absence, prejudiciall to the peace of the kingdome; and that at his returne, he would set all things in good order to their contentment. But having taken his Journey, and being held there with long delayes, to his exceeding great expenses, he was forced to send over for more supply of Treasure; and thereupon gave order for a Parliament to be held at Yorke by the Prince, and (because of his Minority, for he was then but sixteene yeares of age) by such as had the manage of the kingdome in his absence: and to the end he would not be disappointed of aide, he condescends to all such Articles as were demanded, concerning the great Charter: Promising from thenceforth never to charge his Subjects otherwise then by their consents in Parliament, and to pardon all such as had denyed to attend him in this Journey. After this, in the 27. yeare of his Raigne, a Parliament is called at Westminster, wherein the promised Confirmation of the two Charters, and the allowance of what disafforestation had heretofore beene made, was earnestly urged, and in the end with much adoe Granted; and that with omission of the Clause, Salva Jure Coronæ nostræ; which the King laboured to have inserted, but the people by no meanes would agree, and the perambulation of the Forests of England was then committed to three Bishops, three Earles, and three Barons. But some yeares after, in the two and thirtieth yeare of his Raigne, King Edward begunne to shew his resentment of the stubborne behaviour of his Nobles towards him in times past; and so terrifies Roger Bigod, Earle Marshall, that to recover his favor the Earle made him his Heire in Possession; (though he had a Brother of his owne living) reserving onely to himselfe a thousand pounds per annum, during his life. Of others likewise he got great summes for the same offence; The Earle of Hereford escaped his fine by death. But the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, (whom he accused to have disturbed his Peace in his absence) he sends over to Pope Clement the fifth, (who succeeded Bonifacius) that he might be crusht with a double power. This Pope was Native of Burdeaux, and so the more regardfull of the Kings desire, and the King the more confident of his favour, which to entertaine and encrease, King Edward sends him a whole furnish of all vessels for his Chamber of cleane Gold: which great gift so wrought with the Pope, that he untied the King from the Covenant made with his Subjects concerning their Charters, confirmed unto them by his last three Acts of Parliament, and absolved him from his Oath: A safe time for Princes, when they might tye themselves in any obligation to their Subjects, and afterward for a bribe to the Pope be untyed againe.

His Taxations, and wayes for raising of money.

IF Taxations may suffer degrees of comparison, it may not unfitly be said of these three last Kings, that King John was in the Positive; his Sonne Henry the third in in the Comparative: and this King Edward in the Superlative. For not onely he farre exceeded the two former, but he hath left a ſpell to all that come after, for ever comming neare him: but then under the name of Taxations, wee muſt include the wayes he tooke for raiſing of profit. But firſt in the way of Parliament. In the firſt yeare of his Raigne, was granted him a tenth of the Clergy for two yeare, beſides a fifteenth of them and the Temporalty. In his fifth yeare, a twentieth of their goods towards the Welſh warres. In his ſeventh, the old money was called in, and new coyned, in regard it had beene much defaced by the Jewes; for which 297. were at one time executed in London: and this brought in profit of no ſmall value. In his eleventh yeare, he had a thirtieth of the Temporalty, and a twentieth of the Clergy, for his warres in Wales. In the thirteenth, Eſcuage, forty ſhillings of every knights Fee. In his foureteenth yeare, he had a thouſand Markes of certaine Merchants Fined for falſe weights. In his nineteenth, the eleventh part of all movables of the Clergy, and ſhortly after a tenth for ſixe yeares. In his twentieth, William Marchyan then Lord Treaſurer of England, perceiving great riches to be in Churches and religious houſes, put it ſo into the Kings head, that they were all brought into the Kings Treaſury. In the eighth yeare of his Raigne, he ſent out his Writ Quo Warranto, to examine by what title men held their lands; which brought him in much money, till John Earle of Warren, being called to ſhew his title, drew out an old ruſty Sword, and then ſaid, He held his land by that, and by that would hold it to death; which though it made the King deſiſt from his Project, yet he obtained at that time a fifteenth part of the Clergy. In his ſeventeenth yeare he Fined all his Judges for corruption: Sir Ralph Higham Chiefe Juſtice of the higher Bench, in ſeven thouſand Markes: Sir John Loveton Juſtice of the lower Bench, in three thouſand Markes: Sir William Brompton, in ſixe thouſand Markes: Sir Salamon Rocheſter, in foure thouſand Markes: Sir Richard Boyland, in foure thouſand: Sir Walter Hopton, in two thouſand: Sir William Saham, in three thouſand: Robert Lithbury Maſter of the Rolls, in one thouſand: Roger Leyceſter, in one thouſand: Henry Bray Eſcheatour, and Judge for the Jewes, in one thouſand: but Sir Adam Stratton chiefe Baron of the Exchequer, in foure and thirty thouſand: and Thomas Wayland (found the greateſt Delinquent, and of the greateſt ſubſtance) had all his goods, and whole eſtate confiſcated to the King; and himſelfe baniſhed out of the kingdome. In his eighteenth yeare he baniſhed the Jewes; of whom there was at that time above fifteen thouſand in the kingdom, who had but all their goods confiſcate leaving them onely meanes to beare their charges in going away.

In his foure and twentieth yeare, he commanded a new Subſidy to be levied upon all ſarplers of Wooll going out of England: as likewiſe with Fels and Hides. In his five and twentieth yeare, he cals a Parliament at Saint Edmundsbery, where is granted the eighth part of the goods of good Townes, and of other people the twelfth. As for the Clergy, they deſire to be excuſed, and refuſe to contribute, in regard of their many late paiments; as in the two and tweatieth yeare of his Raigne, they paied the moity of their goods: and in his three and twentieth yeare, he ſeiſed into his hands, all Priories aliens and their goods: beſides he had a loane of the Clergy, which amounted to an hundred thouſand pounds: but notwithſtanding upon this refuſall of the Clergy, the King puts all Clergy men out of his protection, whereby they were to have no Juſtice in any of his Courts; (a ſtraine of State beyond any of his Predeceſſours) which ſo amazed them, that in the end, the Arch-biſhop of Yorke, with the Biſhops of Durham, Ely, Salisbury, and Lincolne, yeelded to lay downe in their Churches, the fifth part of all their goods towards the maintenance of the Kings warres; whereby they appeaſed his wrath, and were received into grace. But the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, by whoſe animation the reſt ſtood out, had all his goods ſeiſed on, and all the Monaſteries within his Dioceſe, taken into the Kings hands, and Wardens appointed to miniſter onely neceſſaries to the Monkes, converting the reſt to the Kings uſe: at length by much ſuite, the Abbots and Prieſts, giving the fourth part of their goods, redeeme themſelves, and the Kings favour. In the ſixe and twentieth yeare of his Raigne, at a Parliament holden at Yorke, is granted him the ninth penny of the goods of the Temporalty: the tenth penny of the Clergy of the Dioceſe of Canterbury, and of Yorke the fifth: and in this yeare alſo he raiſed the Impoſition upon every ſack of Wooll, from a noble to forty ſhillings. In his two and thirtieth yeare he ſends out a new Writ of Inquiſition, called Traile-baſton, for intruders on other mens lands; who to oppreſſe the right owner, would make over their land to great men; for Batterers hired to beate men, for breakers of Peace, for Raviſhers, Incendiaries, Murtherers, Fighters, falſe Aſſiſours, and other ſuch Malefactours: which Inquiſition was ſo ſtrictly executed, and ſuch Fines taken, that it brought in exceeding much treaſure to the King. As likewiſe did another Commiſſion at the ſame time, ſent forth to examine the behaviour of Officers, and Miniſters of Juſtice; wherein many were found Delinquents, and paid dearly for it. At this time alſo he called his Lords to account for their ſtubbornneſſe ſome yeares before, in denying to attend him into Flanders; which brought him in profit anſwerable to their greatneſſe that were called. After all this, in his foure and thirtieth yeare, there is granted him the thirtieth penny of both Clergy and Laity, and the twentieth of all Merchants towards his journey into Scotland. And this may be ſufficient to ſhew his Taxations to have beene in the Superlative degree. And yet beſides theſe, he had no ſmall benefit by Silver Mines, which in his time were found in Devonſhire.

Of his Lawes and Ordinances.

IN the firſt yeare of his Raine were made the Statutes called of Weſtminſter the firſt. In his twelfth yeare were made the Statutes of Acton Burnell. In the foureteenth yeare of his Raigne were made the Statutes called Additamenta Gloceſtriæ. He ordained ſuch men to be Sheriffes in every County, as were of the ſame County where they were to be Sheriffes. He ordained that Jewes ſhould weare a Cogniſance upon their upper Garment whereby to be knowne, and reſtrained their exceſſive taking of Uſury. In his time was alſo Enacted the Statute of Mortmaine. In his twelfth yeare, in the Quindenes of Saint Michael, the Juſtices Itinerants beganne to goe their generall Circuits. In his time new pieces of money were coyned, and halfe pence of Silver came to be in uſe, which were before of baſe metall. In his time, three men for reſcuing a priſoner, arreſted by an Officer, had their right hands cut off by the wriſts. In his time all Jewes were baniſhed out of the Realme. This King by Proclamation prohibited the burning of Sea-coale in London and the Suburbs, for avoiding the noyſome ſmoake. In his eleventh yeare the Bakers of London were firſt drawne upon Hurdles, by Henry Waleys Major; and Corne was then firſt ſold by weight. In this Kings time the title of Baron which had before beene promiſcuous to men of eſtate, was firſt confined to ſuch onely as by the King were called to have voice in Parliament.

Affaires of the Church in his time.

IN his time, at a Synod holden at Reading by the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, it was ordained according to the Conſtitutions of the Generall Councell, that no Eccleſiaſticall perſon ſhould have more then one Benefice, to which belonged the Cure of ſoules: and that every perſon promoted to any Eccleſiaſticall Living, ſhould take the Order of Prieſthood within one yeare after. In his time lived and died Pope Boniface the 8. of whom his Predeceſſour had Prophe ſied: Aſcendes ut Vulpes, Regnabis ut Leo, Morieris ut Canis.

Workes of Piety done by him, or by others in his time.

THis King Founded the Abbey of the Vale Royall in Cheſhire, of the Ciſteaux Order. In his time John Bayliol King of Scots, builded Bayliol Colledge in Oxford: alſo in his time, Walter Marton Lord Chancellour of England, and after Biſhop of Rocheſter, Founded Marton Colledge in Oxford, who was drowned paſſing over the water at Rocheſter, being at that time no Bridge there, as now there is. In his time was finiſhed the new worke of the Church of Weſtminſter, which had beene threeſcore and ſixe yeares in building. In his time was laid the Foundation of the Black-Friers beſides Ludgate, and of Baynards Caſtle: alſo in his time, his ſecond wife Queene Margaret beganne to build the Quire of the Gray-Friers in London. In his time was begunne to be made the great Conduit in London, ſtanding againſt the Church called Acres in Cheape. In his time Henry Walleys, Major of London, cauſed the Tonne upon Cornhill, to be a Priſon for night-walkers: and alſo builded a houſe called the Stocks, for a Market of fiſh and fleſh, in the midſt of the City. In this Kings time, Edmund Earle of Leyceſter, the Kings brother, Founded the Minories, a Nunnery without Aldgate. This King builded the Caſtle of Flint in Wales, and the Caſtle of Beaumaris in the Ile of Angleſey, and the Caſtle of Carnarvan by Snowdon. Alſo in this Kings time, John Peckham Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, Founded a Colledge of Canons at Wingham in Kent.

Caſualties happening in his time.

IN the ſecond yeare of this Kings Raigne, there happened the greateſt rot of Sheepe in England that ever was knowne, which continued five and twenty years; and came (as was thought) by one infected Sheepe of incredible greatneſſe, brought out of Spaine by a French Merchant into Northumberland. In the fifteenth yeare of this Kings Raigne, Wheate was ſold for tenne Groats a Quarter; where the next yeare after there was ſo great a Dearth, that it was ſold for eighteene pence the Buſhell. In the ſeventeenth yeare of his Raigne, there fell ſo much raine, that Wheate was raiſed from three pence the Buſhell, to ſixteene pence; and ſo encreaſed yearely, till at laſt it was ſold for twenty ſhillings the Quarter. And this yeare the City of Carlile, and the Abbey with all the houſes belonging to the Friers Minors, was conſumed with fire. In his one and twentieth yeare, a great part of the Towne of Cambridge, with the Church of our Lady, was alſo burnt. In the ſeven and twentieth yeare of his Raigne, his Palace at Weſtminſter, and the Monaſtery adjoyning, were conſumed with fire. The Monaſtery of Gloceſter alſo was burnt to the ground. In this yeare alſo, an Act of Common Counſell, by conſent of the King, was made concerning victuals; a fat Cocke to be ſold for three halfe pence, two Pullets for three halfe pence, a fat Capon for two pence halfe penny, a Gooſe foure pence, a Mallard three halfe pence, a Partridge three halfe pence, a Pheaſant foure pence, a Hearon ſixe pence, a Plover one penny, a Swanne three ſhillings, a Crane twelve pence, two Woodcocks three halfe pence, a fat Lambe from Chriſtmas to Shrovetide, ſixteene pence; and all the yeare after for foure pence.

HE had two Wives, his firſt was Eleanor, daughter to Ferdinand the third King of Spaine; and was married to him at Bures in Spaine: who having lived with him ſixe and thirty years, in a journey with him towards Scotland, at Herdeby in Lincolneſhire ſhe died; in whoſe memory, and as Monuments of her vertue, and his affection, King Edward cauſed Croſſes with her Statue to be erected in all chiefe places, where her Corps in carrying to Weſtminſter, reſted: as at Stamford, Dunſtable, Saint Albons, Waltham, Cheapſide; and laſtly, at the place called Charing Croſſe: ſhe was buried in Weſtminſter, at the feete of King Henry the third, under a faire Marble Tombe, adorned with her Portraiture of Copper guilt. By this wife, King Edward had foure ſonnes and nine daughters; his eldeſt ſonne, John; his ſecond, Henry; his third, Alphonſus; died all young in their Fathers time: his fourth ſonne, Edward, called of Carnarvan, becauſe borne there, ſucceeded him in the kingdome. Of his daughters, the eldeſt married Eleanor, was firſt married by Proxie to Alphonſus, King of Arragon; but he dying before the mariage ſolemniſed, ſhe was afterward married at Briſtow, to Henry Earle of Barry in France; by whom ſhe had iſſue, ſons and daughters. Joane the ſecond daughter of King Edward and Queene Eleanor, borne at Acon in the Holy Land, was married to Gylbert Clare called the Red Earle of Gloceſter and Hereford, by whom ſhe had iſſue, ſonnes and daughters. She ſurvived her husband, and was re-married to the Lord Ralph Monthermere, Father to Margaret the mother of Thomas Montacute, Earle of Salisbury; from whom the now Vicount Montacute is deſcended. Margaret the third daughter of King Edward and Queene Eleanor, was married to John Duke of Brabant. Berenger and Alice, their fourth and fifth daughters, dying young and unmarried. Mary their ſixth daughter, at tenne yeares of her age, was made a Nunne in the Monaſtery of Aimesbury in Wiltſhire, at the inſtance of Queene Eleanor her Grandmother, who lived there. Elizabeth their ſeventh daughter, was firſt married to John Earle of Holland, Zeland, and Lord of Freeſeland; he dying within two yeares, ſhe was afterward married to Humphrey Bohun Earle of Hereford and Eſſex, Lord of Breknok, and High Conſtable of England; by whom ſhe had iſſue, ſonnes and daughters. Beatrice and Blanch, their eighth and ninth daughters, died young and unmarried. King Edwards ſecond Wife was Margaret, eldeſt daughter of Philip King of France, called the Hardy, and ſiſter to Philip called the Faire; at eighteene yeares old ſhe was married to King Edward, being above threeſcore; yet at the unequall yeares ſhe had iſſue by him, two ſonnes and a daughter: their eldeſt ſonne was borne at a little Village in Yorkſhire called Brotherton, and was thereof called Thomas of Brotherton: he was created Earle of Norfolke, and Earle Marſhall of England, after Roger Bigod, who died without iſſue. Their ſecond ſonne Edmund, was borne at Woodſtocke in Oxfordſhire, and of the place was ſo called: he was created Earle of Kent, and married Margaret daughter of John, and ſiſter and ſole Heire of Thomas Lord Wakes of Lydell in the County of Northampton; by whom he had iſſue two ſonnes and one daughter: his ſonnes Edmund and John, died without iſſue; his daughter Joane, for her beauty called the Faire maid of Kent, was married firſt to William Montacute Earle of Salisbury, and from him divorced; was re-married to Sir Thomas Holland, in her Right Earle of Kent, and by her, Father of Thomas and John Holland, Duke of Surrey, and Earle of Huntington: and laſtly, ſhe was the Wife of Edward of Woodſtocke, the blacke Prince of Wales; and by him Mother of King Richard the ſecond. This Earle Edmund was beheaded at Winchester, in the fourth yeare of King Edward his Nephew. Eleanor, the daughter of King Edward by his ſecond Wife Margaret, died in her childhood.

Of his perſonage and conditions.

HE was tall of ſtature, higher then ordinary men by head and ſhoulders, and thereof called Longſhanke; of a ſwarthy complection, ſtrong of body, but leane; of a comely favour, his eyes in his anger, ſparkling like fire; the haire of his head black and curled. Concerning his conditions, as he was in warre peacefull; ſo in Peace he was warlike, delighting ſpecially in that kinde of hunting, which is to kill Stagges or other wilde beaſts with Speares. In continencie of life, he was equall to his Father; in acts of valour, farre beyond him. He had in him the two wiſdomes, not often found in any, ſingle; both together, ſeldome or never: An ability of judgement in himſelfe, and a readineſſe to heare the judgement of others. He ſeemed to be a great obſerver of opportunity (a great point of wiſdome in any, in Princes greateſt) and that he could beare an injury long, without ſeeking to revenge it; as appeared by his carriage towards the Earle Roger Bigod, whom when he ſaw his time, he called to account for an affront he had offered him divers yeares before. He was not eaſily provoked into paſſion, but once in paſſion, not eaſily appeaſed, as was ſeene by his dealing with the Scots; towards whom he ſhewed at firſt patience, and at laſt ſeverity. If he be cenſured for his many Taxations, he may be juſtified by his well beſtowing them; for never Prince laid out his money to more honour of himſelfe, or good of his kingdome. His greateſt unfortunateneſſe was in his greateſt bleſſing; for of foure ſonnes which he had by his Wife Queen Eleanor, three of them died in his owne life time, who were worthy to have out-lived him; and the fourth out-lived him, who was worthy never to have beene borne.

Of his death and buriall.

IN his laſt expedition into Scotland, being at Carlile, he fell ſicke; and lying in his death-bed, he ſent for his ſonne Edward: to whom, beſides many admonitions to Piety; he commanded three things ſpecially: that he ſhould carry his bones about with him through Scotland till he had ſubdued it: that he ſhould ſend his heart into the Holy Land, with ſevenſcore knights to that warre, and the two and thirty thouſand pounds he had provided for that purpoſe; and that he ſhould never recall Gaveſton from baniſhment: and ſoon after of a dyſentery or Bloudy-Flix, he died at Borough upon the Sands, the ſeventh of July, in the yeare 1307. when he had Raigned foure and thirty yeares and ſeven moneths, lived threeſcore and eight yeares: Being dead, his Corps was brought to Waltham Abbey, and there kept the ſpace of ſixteene weekes, and after, on Simon and Judes day buried at Weſtminſter.

Men of Note in his time.

OF Martiall men there were many, theſe ſpecially: John Earle of Warren, who oppoſed the Kings Inquiſition by Quo Warranto: and Roger Bigod, who gave the King an affront to his face. Of learned men alſo many, ſpecially theſe; John Breton biſhop of Hereford, who compiled a booke of the Lawes of England, called le Breton: Thomas Spot a Chronographer: John Everſden a writer of Annals, and of this Kings Raigne: Gregory Cairugent a Monke of Glocester, and a writer alſo of Annals. John Peckham a Franciſcan Frier, made Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, who writ many excellent workes: John Read an Hiſtoriographer: Thomas Bungey a Frier Minor, an excellent Mathematician: Roger Bacon a Franciſcan Frier, an excellent Philoſopher and Mathematician: Robert Kilwarby Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, and after made a Cardinall: alſo Ralph Baldock Biſhop of London, who writ a Chronicle of England in the Latine tongue: but above them all, though of another Countrey, Thomas Aquinas, borne of a Noble Family, whoſe workes are too famous to be ſpoken of; who going to the Councell holden at Lyons by Pope Gregory the tenth, died by the way.

Of his Acts before, and at his Coronation.

EDward of Carnarvan, eldeſt Sonne of King Edward the firſt, ſucceeded him in the kingdome; and never did Prince come to a Crowne with more applauſe of Nobility and People; and there was good cauſe for it: For he had beene trained up in all good courſes for Piety and Learning; he had ſeene the Government of his Father, from whoſe Example he could not but have learned many good Leſſons; he had been initiated in the wayes of State, having beene left Governour of the Realme, and preſiding in Parliament in his Fathers abſence; and he was now three and twenty yeares old, a fit age for bearing the weight of a Scepter; and yet for all theſe advantages, there wanted not feares of him in the mindes of many, who could not but remember what prankes he had played not long before; how he had broken the Biſhop of Cheſters Parke, and in moſt diſorderly manner had killed his Deere, for which both himſelfe had beene committed to Priſon, and his Friend Pierce Gaveſton baniſhed the Realme: and if he did ſuch things being but Prince, what might not be feared of him comming to be King? For ſeldome doth advancement in honour alter men to the better; to the worſe often, and commonly then, when it is joyned with an Authority that ſets them above controlement. Neither yet was their feare more out of what they had ſeene, then out of what they ſaw; for where he ſhould have endevoured to accompliſh the charge his Father had given him in his death-bed, he ſeemed to intend nothing leſſe: nothing more then wholly to breake it; for he preſently called home Pierce Gaveſton from baniſhment; and the two and thirty thouſand pounds, which his Father had ſpecially appointed for the Holy Warre; either all or the moſt of it he beſtowed upon Gaveſton: and for carrying his Fathers bones with him about Scotland; it had beene well if he had ſuffered them quietly to be laid at reſt in England; for after the Corps had beene kept above ground, ſixteene weekes in the Abbey of Waltham, and that the Biſhop of Cheſter, Walter Langton, the then Lord Treaſurer, and Executor of his Fathers Will, was buſie in preparing for his Funerals; he ſent the Conſtable of the Tower to arreſt him, and impriſon him at Wallingford, ſeiſing upon all his Goods, and giving them to Gaveſton, and all for old grudges. And (that which ſeemed a high ſtraine of incongruity)

before he had ſeene performed his Fathers Funerals, which was not till the 27. of October following; he entred into Treatie of his owne Nuptials, for going over to Boleigne, on the two and twentieth of January, he married Iſabell, the Daughter of Philip the Faire, King of France: which Marriage was honoured with the preſence of foure Kings, the King of France himſelfe, the King of Navarre his Sonne, the King of the Romans, and the King of Sicilie: and three Queenes beſides the Bride, Mary Queene of France, Margaret the Dowager Queene of England, and the Queene of Navarre: and yet did Gaveſton exceed them all in bravery. This was obſerved by the Lords of England: and thereupon when his Queene and he came afterward to be Crowned, they went unto him, ſignifying what a hainous tranſgreſſion of his Fathers will it was to call home Gaveſton, and ſeeing the charge was no leſſe given to them then to him, if he did not performe it they would; and therefore unleſſe he would remove Gaveſton from the Court and kingdome, they would hinder his Coronation from proceeding: which ſtrooke ſuch a dampe to Prince Edwards ſpirits, to thinke what a diſgrace it would be to him; if ſo many of his great Friends being preſent, Charles of Valois, the King of Frances Brother, the Dukes of Britaine and Brabant, the Count of Luxenburg, who was afterward Emperor, the Duke of Savoy, the two Dutcheſſes of Brabant & Artois, with many other Princes and great Ladies, if now his Coronation ſhould be called in queſtion, that he ſolemnly ſwore he would do what they deſired in the next Parliament, ſo they would be quiet now; and thereupon, on the 24. day of February, in the yeare 1307. his Queene and he were both Crowned at Weſtminſter, by the hands of Henry Biſhop of Winchester, by Commiſſion from Robert Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, being then in Exile, and out of the kingdome: At which ſolemnity there was ſo great a preſſe of People, that Sir John Blackwell knight was crowded to death. And now in the very Act of his Coronation, there was given another provocation to the Lords againſt Gaveſton: for the King had appointed him to carry the Crowne of Saint Edward before him, (the greateſt honour could be done to a Subject) which added to the other honours the King had done him, (for he had made him Earle of Cornewall, Lord of Man, and Lord Chamberlaine) ſo incenſed the Lords, that they entred into conſultation, how to ſuppreſſe this violence of the Kings affection; which ſhortly after they put in execution. Portion in money King Edward had none with his Wife: but the King of France gave him the Dutchy of Guyenne, which he had ſeiſed upon before, as confiſcate to him: and thereupon King Edward did him Homage for that Dutchy, and for the County of Ponthieu.

Of his difference with his Lords about Gaveſton.

WE ſhall have here no Quinquennium Neronis, no ſuch five yeares, as Nero afforded in the beginning of his Raigne; but this King at his firſt entrance will ſhew what he is, and what he will continue to be as long as he lives; for though he tooke ſome great and grave men to be of his Councell, yet (as appeared afterward) he did it rather to the end they ſhould be pliant to him, then that he had any meaning to apply himſelfe to them; For let them ſay what they would, Gaveſton muſt be the Oracle; all the Kings actions were but Gaveſtons impreſſions: And now Gaveſton preſently after the Coronation, to let the world be a witneſſe of his worthineſſe, and that the King had not beſtowed his Favours upon him without cauſe, cauſed to be publiſhed a Turneament at Wallingford: whither came all the great Lords of the kingdome, as Thomas Earle of Lancaſter, Humfrey Earle of Hereford, Aymer Earle of Pembroke, and John Earle of Warren, with many others, all Valiant men at Armes; yet none had the honour of the day like to Gaveſton. And thus farre he did well, if he could have ſtayed here, if having gotten true glory, he had not falne into vaine-glory: For the Lords envyed him not ſo much for his advancement in Honours, as they hated him for his inſolency in Manners: for in a ſcornefull pride he would be caſting ſcoffes upon them all, calling Thomas Earle of Lancaſter the Stage Player, the Earle of Lincolne Burſtenbelly, belly; Mimer de Valence Earle of Pembroke, Joſeph the Jew; and Guy Earle of Warwicke, the blacke Dogge of Arderne; which ſcoffes together with his other inſolencies, drew ſuch a party upon him, that in the next Parliament, the whole aſſembly obtaines of the King to draw Articles of their grievances: of which the chiefe were, that the great Charter of Magna Charta ſhould be obſerved; that all ſtrangers ſhould be baniſhed the Court and kingdome; that the buſineſſe of the State ſhould be treated of by the Counſell of the Clergy and the Nobles; and that the King ſhould not begin any warre, nor goe out of the kingdome without conſent of Parliament. Which Articles, though ſeeming harſh to the King, yet for avoyding of further inconvenience, he yeelds unto them; and ſpecially to the baniſhment of his Minion Gaveſton, as hoping that would excuſe him for all the reſt; and Robert of Winchelſey, Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, lately called home from Exile, pronounceth Excommunication againſt all ſuch as ſhould oppoſe the Articles. Hereupon Gaveſton is ſent away into Ireland, where he lived awhile, not as a baniſht man, but as Lieutenant rather of the Country, and indeed not unworthily; for in the time of his being there, he is ſaid to have made a Journey into the Mountaines of Dublin, and to have broken and ſubdued the Rebels there; built New Caſtle in the Kerns Country, repaired the Caſtle of Kevyn, and paſſed up to Munſter, and Thoumond: performing every where much ſervice with great valour and worthineſſe, that if he had ſtayed there but a while longer, he might perhaps by his deſerts in Ireland, have redeemed his defects in England: but the King impatient of his abſence, and asking advice what meanes might be uſed to recall him; It was told him, that if he could but match him with the Earle of Gloceſters ſiſter, a man of ſuch greatneſſe, and ſo greatly beloved of the people, for his ſake certainely no man would grudge at his comming home. Hereupon the King ſends for Gaveſton, and makes up the match betweene them, and marryed they were at Barkamſtead; but this did no good. For Gaveſton ſtill working upon the King in ſuch manner, that he ſcarce left him meanes to ſuſtaine himſelfe, and as little to maintaine the Queene; nothing being done but as Gaveſton would have it; put the Lords into a new diſcontentment; who thereupon went againe to the King, and told him plainly, that unleſſe he would put Gaveſton out of the Court and kingdome, they would riſe up in Armes againſt him as a perjured King. This put the King into a great ſtrait: Loath he was to leave Gaveſton, and fearefull he was to provoke the Lords; in the end, his feare prevailing over his love, he was content he ſhould be Baniſhed, and in ſuch ſort Baniſhed, that if ever he returned, or were found in the kingdome, he ſhould be held, and proceeded againſt as an Enemy of the State. So once againe is Gaveſton ſent packing out of the kingdome, and goes into France, but found no ſafe Harbouring there: For the King of France hearing of it, gave ſtrait charge, if he were found in his Dominions to apprehend him: Then he paſſeth into Flanders, but is there no ſafer then in France: After waving about, and finding no place to reſt in ſafety, he returnes ſecretly into England, relying upon the Kings Love, and the Duke of Gloceſters Favour. The King receives him as an Angell ſent from Heaven, and to be out of the Lords Eye, goes a Journey to Yorke, taking Gaveſton along with him, and there thinkes to be in quiet; but the Lords hearing of it follow him thither, chuſing for their Generall, Thomas Earle of Lancaſter, a man poſſeſt of five Earledomes, Lancaſter, Leyceſter, Ferrers, Lincolne, and Salisbury, beſides the Liberty of Pickering, and the Honour of Cokermore, and other Lands in Wales; and there was not a man of the whole Nobility that was not of the Party, but onely Gilbert Earle of Gloceſter, the Kings Siſters Sonne; Theſe Lords ſent to the King, either to deliver Gaveſton into their hands, or at leaſt to ſend him peremptorily out of the kingdome. But the King led by ill Counſell, and little regarding the Lords Meſſage, takes Gaveſton with him to New-Caſtle upon Tine, thence to Tynmouth, where the Queene then lay, who (though great with Childe, and entreating the King with teares to ſtay with her) yet ſuch was his deſire to ſee Gaveſton put into ſome place of ſecurity, that hearing of the Lords approaching, he tooke a Ship, and paſſed with Gaveſton to Scarborough, and leaving leaving him there in a ſtrong Caſtle, not eaſie to be wonne, he went himſelfe into Warwickſhire; perhaps that the Lords might ſee he had not Gaveſton with him. But the Lords hearing where Gaveſton was, aſſaulted the Caſtle with ſuch violence, that Gaveſton ſeeing no meanes to eſcape, was content to render himſelfe; requeſting onely, that he might but once be allowed to ſee the Kings face; and the King hearing he was taken, deſired as much: to which the Earle of Pembroke conſented; and taking Gaveſton into his cuſtody, promiſed upon Forfeiture of all he had, to have him forth-comming: but deſiring to be with his Wife that night, who lay not farre off, at Dedington he delivers him to his Servants to carry to Wallingford. From whom, as they paſſed by Warwicke, the Earle of that place hearing of it, tooke him forcibly from his keepers, and brought him to his owne Caſtle. Where after long deliberation, whether it were wiſedome to ſuffer Gaveſton to ſpeake with the King or no; It was at laſt concluded to take off his head; which at a place thereby, called Blacklow, was preſently put in execution. His Corps was carryed to Oxford, and kept there two yeares, till the King cauſed it to be brought to Langley, and there builded a Monaſtery of purpoſe, where his Soule ſhould be prayed for.

This Gaveſton was the Sonne of a Gentleman of France, who had done good ſervice for King Edward the firſt, in France; and for his ſake this Sonne of his was taken and brought up with the Prince: a man of excellent parts of body, and of no leſſe Endowments of minde; Valiant and Witty; to which if we might adde Vertuous, he had beene compleate; Though the Lords (whether they had heard ſo, or whether they ſaid it to weane the King from him) told the King that his Father was a Traitor to the King of France, and for the ſame was executed; and that his Mother was burnt for a Witch; and that this Gaveſton was baniſhed out of France for conſenting to his Mothers Witch-craft; and that he had now bewitched the King himſelfe. But why ſhould the Lords be ſo violent againſt Gaveſton: might not the King place his Affection where he pleaſed: Might he not make his owne choyce of what companion he liked? No doubt he might; and fit he ſhould: but yet in this caſe, the Lords had great cauſe to doe as they did; both in regard of the King, of themſelves, and of the Common-wealth. It is true, if the Valour of Gaveſton could as well have made the King Valiant, as his riot made him riotous, there might ſome good have come of their extraordinary conjunction: but ſeeing Vertues are but perſonall, Vices onely are communicative; it now made the King not onely more Vicious then otherwiſe he would have beene, but Vicious, where otherwiſe he would not have beene; and therefore great cauſe in regard of the King, to remove Gaveſton from his company; and no leſſe in regard of the Lords themſelves; For Gaveſtons advancing was their debaſing; his greatneſſe with the King made them but Cyphers: but in regard of the Common-wealth, moſt cauſe of all; For while the King was altogether ruled by Gaveſton, and Gaveſton himſelfe was altogether irregular; the Common-wealth could have but little hope of Juſtice, but was ſure to ſuffer as long as Gaveſton was ſuffered. And this may be ſufficient to juſtifie the Lords, that it be not interpreted to be Rebellion, which was indeed but Providence.

Of his Troubles with Scotland.

AND now we have ſeene two of the charges of his Fathers Will broken by the King, and puniſhed in him; the two and thirty thouſand pounds appointed for the Holy Warre, beſtowed upon Gaveſton, and the King for it puniſhed himſelfe with want; Gaveſton called home from baniſhment, and the King for it puniſhed with the loſſe of his Subjects love. It remaines to ſee how well he performed the third charge of his Fathers Will, for ſubduing of Scotland. It was now the ſixth yeare after the death of his Father King Edward, and Robert Bruce now gotten to be King of Scotland, had ſtayed all this while to ſee how this new King Edward would prove: and when he found by the courſes he held, that he was like to prove prove a good eaſie Enemy; he thereupon tooke heart, and began to ſtirre, and in a very ſhort time had brought almoſt all Scotland under his obedience; and finding no oppoſition, he entred the Engliſh Borders, tooke and burnt Townes, that now King Edward, unleſſe he would ſit ſtill, and ſuffer Bruce to come and pull his Crown from his head, he could not chuſe but doe ſomething to ſtop his proceeding. Hereupon he prepares an Army, but like himſelfe, fitter for a Court then for a Campe: Many men, and great Bravery; but readier to take ſpoiles, then to make ſpoile: and accordingly they ſped; For going to raiſe the ſiege at Striveling, defended for King Edward, by the valiant knight Philip Mowbray, the Kings Army conſiſting of a hundred thouſand, was defeated and overthrowne by the Scots Army, conſiſting of ſcarce thirty thouſand: So true is that ſaying of an ancient Souldier, There is more hope of an Army where the Generall is a Lion, though the Souldiers be but Sheepe; then of an Army where the Generall is a Sheepe, though the Souldiers be Lions. But indeed the Scots, beſides Valour, uſed Policy; For having in their owne Army none but Foot, no Horſe at all, they had made Trenches in the Ground three foot deepe, covering them with Twigges and Hurdles, where the Engliſh Horſemen were to paſſe, who Floundring in thoſe Trenches, were killed no leſſe by their owne Fellowes then by the Enemy. In this Battell, called of Bannocks borough, were ſlaine the Lord Mawle, the Lord Clifford, the Lord Tiptoft, the Lord William Marſhall, Sir Giles, Doctor Argenton, and ſeven hundred Knights and Squires, ſpecially Gylbert Earle of Glocester, who had ſhewed much Valour that day; and whom the Scots would willingly have kept for ranſome, if they had knowne him; but he had forgotten to put on his Coate of Armes, whereby to be knowne. The ſlaughter of common Souldiers was certainely great, though perhaps not ſo great as Hector Boetius ſpeakes of, who ſaith they were fifty thouſand. There were taken Priſoners, Humfrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford, John Seagrave, John Claveringham, William Latimer, and Sir Roger Northbrooke, bearer of the Kings ſhield; the King himſelfe with the Biſhops, the Earles of Hartford and Pembroke, and Hugh Spenſer, ſaved themſelves by flight; Humfrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford, was afterward releaſed in exchange for Bruces Wife, who had beene long kept a Priſoner in England. After this, many Engliſh fell away to the Scots, and all the North parts from Carlile to Yorke, came under their Subjection; and the Engliſh grew ſo faint-hearted, and into ſuch contempt, that three Scots durſt venture upon a hundred Engliſh, when a hundred Engliſh durſt ſcarce encounter with three Scots. And what can be thought the cauſe of this great dyſaſter to this King, but the want of his Fathers bleſſing for not performing the charge he gave him dying, which is commonly accompanyed with the want of a higher bleſſing, without which a Vacat is ſet upon the labours of men, that makes them all fruſtrate? But Bruce, not ſatisfied with his Acqueſts in England, ſends his Brother Edward into Ireland alſo; who ſo farre prevailed, that many Iriſh came in unto him, and in the end Crowned him King of a great part of that Iſland, and ſo continued the ſpace of three yeares; till the Primat of Armagh, and the Lord Brinningham, Juſticiar of Ireland, gathering Forces together oppoſed him, and in a Battaile taking him Priſoner, at Dundalke cut off his head, with the ſlaughter of many thouſands of the Scots beſides. With which the Scots are ſo incenſed, that they invade againe the Engliſh Borders, forraging as farre as Yorke; whereupon a Parliament is aſſembled at London, wherein an ayde is granted of Armed men to goe againſt them; London ſets forth two hundred, Canterbury forty, Saint Albons ten, and ſo proportionably for all Cities and Boroughs, whereby a great Army was levyed; which comming to Yorke, through mutiny, emulation, and other impediments, was ſoone diſſolved, and returned backe without effecting any thing. Not long after the Towne of Berwicke was betrayed to the Scots, through the treaſon of Peter Spalding the Governour, and other Engliſhmen; whom the King of Scots to make them an Example, cauſed to be hanged for being Traitors to their Country. King Edward hearing of the ſurrendring of Berwicke, raiſeth an Army, and beleaguers it; but the Scots to divert his Forces, enter upon England by other wayes, and were like to have surprised the person of the Queene, lying then neare Yorke. The siege of Berwicke is notwithstanding eagerly continued, and the King in great possibility to have regained the Towne, had not the Earle of Lancaster with his followers withdrawne himselfe upon discontent, hearing the King say he would give the keeping thereof to Hugh Spenser the younger, who was now grown a speciall favourite of the Kings, and therefore not to be endured by the Earle. In the mean time the Scots wonne the Castles of Harbottle, Mitford, and Midford, so as they possessed the greater part of all Northumberland, burning all before them, till they came to Ripon, which Towne they spoyled, and carrying there three dayes, they received a thousand Markes to save the Towne from burning, as they had done the Townes of Norhallerton, Borough-bridge and others. In their returning backe, they burnt Knaresborough, and Shipton in Craven, and all other afore them, carrying into England a marvellous number of Cattell, besides prisoners, men and women. The Yorkshire men thus grievously endammaged, gather together to the number of ten thousand: and at the Towne of Myton, tenne miles from Yorke, encounter the Scots, where they lost three thousand of their men, and were defeated: which battell, because of the many Spirituall men that were in it, was called the white battell. Whereof when the King heard, he left the siege of Berwicke, to follow the Scots, but they returned another way. The yeare following, King Edward once againe with a great Army entred Scotland, but the Scots having destroyed all afore, the King oppressed with famine was forced to returne: whom the Scots followed, and in a place of the Forest of Blackmore, fell upon him, that he hardly escaped; where were taken John Earle of Britaine, and the Lord of Sulliac, the French Kings Embassadour, and many others. After this, King Edward finding the Scots either too strong, or too wily for him, made a Truce with them for two yeares, some say for thirteene. And this was the successe of this unfortunate King in his warres with Scotland.

BUt his troubles abroad were not so grievous as those at home; or rather, they were those at home that made his troubles abroad so grievous: for though the Lords having made an end of Gaveston, and cut off his head, thought they had made an end of their need to beare Armes, and had but off the head of all their discontents; yet as if Gaveston had beene a Phœnix, as it were out of his ashes another Phœnix riseth presently up, and puts the Lords to as much trouble as ever Gaveston did. For now the younger Spenser upon a sudden growes as great a Favorite of the Kings as ever Gaveston was: and indeed in all points just such another, equall to him in goodlinesse of personage, in favour of the King, and in abusing the Lords, for though they were the Lords themselves that brought him at first in to be the Kings Chamberlaine, the rather (as was thought) because he was one whom the King did not love: yet being once in the place, he so wonne upon the King by diligent service, and by complying with the Kings humour, that he brought the King at last to comply with his humour, and nothing must be done but as Spenser would have it. It seemes it was the Kings nature, that he could not be without a bosome friend, one or other to be an Alter idem: and to seeke to remove such a one from him, was to seek to remove him from himselfe, as impossible a thing as to alter nature; yet the Lords being more sensible of their owne grievance, to be insulted on by a Favourite, then of the Kings grievance to be affronted by his subjects, are more intentive to worke their owne ends then the Kings: and therefore to remove Spenser and his Father from the King, which they knew was a worke not to be done but by strong hand; they continue their Armes, and confoederating together, they send to the King, peremptorily requiring the confirmation and execution of the Articles formerly granted, threatning withall, that unlesse he presently performe the same, they would constraine him to it by force of Armes: and thereupon assemble strong forces about Dunstable, where the King then lay. The great Prelates of the kingdome, dome, with the Earle of Glocester, labour to appease them, and with two Cardinals sent lately by the Pope to reforme these disorders: they repaire to Saint Albons, and desire conference with the Lords, who receive them very peaceably; but the Letters which the Pope had written to them, they refuse to receive, saying, they were men of the Sword, and cared not for reading of Letters; that there were many worthy and learned men in the kingdome, whose counsell they would use, and not strangers, who knew not the cause of their commotion: so the Cardinals with this answer returned to London. But the Prelates of England so labour the businesse, that the Lords were content to yeeld up to the King such horses, treasure, and jewels, as they had taken of Pierce Gaveston at New-Castle, so as the King would grant their Petitions; and thereupon John Sandall Treasurer of the kingdome, and Ingelard Warle keeper of the Wardrobe, are sent to Saint Albons to receive those things at their hands.

Shortly after a Parliament is called at London, wherein the King complaines of the great contempt was had of him by the Barons, their rising in Armes, their taking and murthering Pierce Gaveston, and such other affronts. Whereunto with one accord they answer, that they had not offended therein, but rather merited his love and favour; having taken Armes, not for any contempt of his royall person, but to destroy the publike enemy of the kingdome, which otherwise would never have beene done. Which stout resolution of theirs, the Queene with the Prelates and the Earle of Glocester seeing, they seeke by all meanes to qualifie their heate; and at length so prevailed with them, that they humble themselves to the King, and crave pardon for that they had done, which they obtained; and the King receives them into grace, as his loyall subjects: grants them their Articles, and particular pardons by his Charter, for their Indemnity concerning the death of Gaveston: and for the greater shew of true reconcilement, Guy de Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke, is made of the Kings Counsell, though shortly after he ended his life, not without suspition of poyson; as being a man much envied by such as possest the King. The King kept his Christmas at Clipston, and his Easter at Clarendon: and they seemed to be all good friends, but this reconcilement of the King with his Barons, was but as the covering of fire with ashes, every little wind that blew, made it breake out into flames afresh, & the time being so unsetled as it was, it was impossible but such winds would continually be blowing. It was such a wind blew, when the great Earle of Lancaster had his wife (a Lady who had lived with him alwayes in good fame) taken out of his house at Canford in Dorsetshire, by one Richard Saint Martin, a deformed lame Dwarfe, who challenged her to be his wife, and that he had lien with her before the Earle married her: and this wind was made to blow the stronger, by the Ladies owne confession; for upon examination, she voluntarily averred, it was all true: and thereupon the ugly fellow in her sight claimed the two Earledomes of Lincolne and Salisbury, which he durst not have done, if he had not beene back'd with great Abettours: and it was not without aspersion upon the King himselfe. It was another such wind blew, when at the Feast of Pentecost, at dinner in the open Hall at Westminster, a woman fantastically disguised, entred on horsebacke, and riding about the Table, delivered the King a Letter, wherein was signified the great neglect he shewed of such as had done him and his Father noble services, taxing him for advancing men of unworthy parts, and such other complaints; which Letter read, and the woman departed, put the King into a great rage; they who guarded the doore being sharply reprehended for suffering her to enter in such manner, answered, It was the fashion of the Kings house in times of Festivals, to keepe out none that came as this woman did, to make sport. Search being made for the woman, she is found and examined who set her on; she confessed a knight gave her money to doe it; the knight is found, and upon examination, boldly answered, he did it for the Kings honour, and to no other end; and thereupon escaped without further trouble. It was such another wind blew, when a knight was taken passing by Pomfret, with Letters sealed with the Kings Seale, directed to the King of Scots, about murthering the Earle of Lancaster; which messenger is executed, his head set upon the top of the Caſtle, and the Letters reſerved to witneſſe the intended plot. Which whether it were fained, or true, the report thereof reflected upon the King, and made many to take the Earles part. It was ſuch another wind blew, when a fanatick fellow, one John Pondrat, a Tanners ſonne of Exeter, gave forth, that himſelfe was the true Edward, eldeſt ſonne of the late King Edward the firſt, and by a falſe Nurſe was changed in his Cradle, and that the now King Edward was a Carters ſon, and laid in his place: but this wind was ſoone blowne over, when at his death being drawne and hanged, he confeſſed he had a Familiar Spirit in his houſe in the likeneſſe of a Cat, that aſſured him he ſhould be King of England, and that he had ſerved the ſaid Spirit three yeares before to bring his purpoſe about. But moſt of all, it was ſuch a wind blew, when a Baron named William Brewis, having waſted his eſtate, offers to ſell unto divers men, a part of his inheritance called Powis. Humphrey Bohun Earle of Hereford, obtaines leave of the King to buy it, & bargains for it. The two Roger Mortimers, Unkle and Nephew, great men likewiſe in thoſe parts, not underſtanding, it ſeemes, any thing of the former bargaine, contract alſo for the ſame Land with the ſaid Sir William Brewis. Hugh Spenſer the younger, hearing of this ſale, and the land adjoyning to part of his, obtaines a more ſpeciall leave of the King, being now his Chamberlaine, and buyes it out of their hands. The Earle of Hereford complaines hereof to the Earle of Lancaſter: who thereupon at Sherburne enters into a new confederation with divers Barons there aſſembled, taking their Oaths intermutually, to live and die together in maintaining the right of the kingdome; and to procure the baniſhment of the two Spenſers, father and ſonne, whom they now held to be the great ſeducers of the King, and oppreſſours of the State, diſpoſing of all things in Court at their pleaſure, and ſuffering nothing to be obtained but by their meanes: and under this pretence they take Armes, and comming at-med to Saint Albons, they ſend to the King, being then at London, the Biſhops of London, Salisbury, Hereford, and Chicheſter, (who were there aſſembled to conſult for peace) requiring him as he tendred the quiet of the Realme, to rid his Court of thoſe Traitours, the Spenſers, condemned in many Articles of high treaſon by the communalty of the Land; and withall to grant his Letters Patents of pardon and indemnity both to them and all ſuch as tooke part with them. The King returnes anſwer, that Hugh Spenſer the father was now beyond the Seas, imployed in his buſineſſe, and his ſonne was guarding the Cinque-ports according to his office; and that it was againſt Law or Cuſtome they ſhould be baniſhed without being heard: and withall ſwore, he would never violate the Oath made at his Coronation, by granting Letters of pardon to ſuch notorious offenders, who contemned his perſon, diſturbed the kingdome, and violated the royall Majeſty. Which anſwer ſo exaſperated the Lords, that preſently they approached to London, and lodged in the Suburbs, till they had leave of the King to enter into the City; where they peremptorily urge their demands: to which at length by mediation of the Queene, and the chiefe Prelates, the King is wrought to condeſcend, and by his Edict, publiſhed in Weſtminſter Hall, by the Earle of Hereford, the Spenſers are baniſhed the kingdome. Hugh the father hearing it, keepes beyond the Seas, but the ſonne ſecretly hides himſelfe in England, expecting the turne of a better ſeaſon. And indeed ſhortly after, the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury in a Councell holden at London, pronounceth the baniſhment of the Spenſers to have beene erroneous, and thereupon the Edict is revoked, and the Spenſers are called home, and ſet in as great authority as they were before. But the Lords having thus obtained their deſire, with the Kings Letters of indemnity returne home, but yet not with ſuch ſecurity as to give over the proviſion for their owne defence. Not long after there fell out an unexpected accident, that ſuddenly wrought the Lords confuſion. The Queene making her progreſſe towards Canterbury, intended to lodge in the Caſtle of Leeles, belonging to the Lord Badleſmer, (who had beene long the Kings Steward, but now tooke part with the Lords) and lending her Marſhall to make ready for her and her traine, they who kept the Caſtle told him plainely, that neither the Queene, nor any elſe ſhould enter there without Letters from their Lord. The Queene her ſelfe goes to the the Caſtle, and receives the like anſwer; whereupon ſhe is driven to take ſuch lodging otherwhere as could be provided. Of which indignity ſhe complaines to the King; who tooke it ſo to heart, that preſently with a power of armed men out of London, he laies ſiege to the Caſtle, takes it, hangs the keeper Thomas Colepepper, ſends the wife and children of the Lord Badleſmer to the Tower, and feiſeth upon all his goods and treaſure. And having this power about him, and warmed with ſucceſſe and the inſtigation of the Queene, ſuddenly directs his courſe to Chichester, where he keepes his Chriſtmas, and there provides for an Army againſt the Barons: whereof many (ſeeing the Kings power encreaſing) left their Aſſociats, and yeeld themſelves to his mercie: amongſt whom were the two Roger Mortimers, men of great might and meanes; the Lord Hugh Audely, the Lord Maurice Berkely, and others: who notwithſtanding, contrary to their expectation, were ſent to divers Priſons. The Earles of Lancaſter and Hereford ſeeing this ſudden change, withdrew themſelves and their companies from about Gloceſter, towards the North-parts: whom the King followes with his Army; wherin were the Earles of Athell & Angus, and at Burton upon Trent, where they had made a head, diſcomfited their forces, and put them to flight. In the meane time the Earle of Lancaſter had ſent into Lancaſhire a knight of his, named Robert Holland, (one whom he had brought up of naught) to raiſe more forces amongſt his Tenants; but he hearing of this flight of his Lords, goes with his forces to take the Kings part; which ſo diſmaies the Earle, that he beganne now to thinke of ſuing to the King for grace; but being in the way, at a Towne called Borough-bridge, was there ſet upon by Sir Simon Warde Sheriffe of Yorke, and Sir Andrew Harkeley Conſtable of Carlile, who utterly defeat his forces: In which fight was ſlaine the Earle of Hereford, (who fighting valiantly upon a Bridge, was by a Varlet skulking under the Bridge, thruſt with a Speare into the fundament) Sir Roger Benefield, Sir William Sulland and others, there was taken the Earle of Lancaſter, Sir Roger Clifford, Sir John Mowbray, Sir Roger Tuckets; Sir William Fits-Williams, with divers other, and were led to Yorke. This field was fought the fifteenth day of March, in the yeare 1320. It was not long after that Sir Hugh Daniell, Sir Bartholomew de Baddelſmer were taken. Three dayes after the Earle of Lancaſter is brought to Pomfret, where the King ſitting himſelfe in judgement with Edmund Earle of Kent his brother, the Earle of Pembroke, the Earle Warren, Hugh Spenſer, lately created Earle of Wincheſter, and others; ſentence of death is given againſt him, to be drawne, hanged, and beheaded as a Traitor. The two firſt puniſhments are pardoned, in regard he was of Royall bloud: onely beheaded he was the ſame day without the Towne of Pomfret, before his owne Caſtle. To ſpeake of the Miracles ſaid to be done by him after his death, might be fit for a Legend, but not for a Chronicle, and therefore I omit them. By the like judgement were condemned, the Lord Roger Clifford, the Lord Warren Liſle, the Lord William Tuchet, Thomas Maudit, Henry Bradburne, William Fitz-Williams, William Lord Cheyney, Thomas Lord Mowbray, Foceline Lord Danill, all which were executed at Yorke. Shortly after, the Lord Henry Teyes is taken, drawne, hanged, and quartered at London, the Lord Aldenham at Windſor, the Lords Badleſmere and Aſſburton at Canterbury: at Cardiffe in Wales, Sir William Flemming at Briſtow, Sir Henry Womington, and Sir Henry Montford Bannerets, at Gloceſter, the Lord Clifford, and Sir William Elminbridge, principall men in principall places, to ſpread the more terrour over the kingdome: all their eſtates and inheritances are confiſcated, and many new men advanced by the ſame. And this is the firſt bloud of Nobility that ever was ſhed in this manner in England ſince William the Conquerour.

But not long after, the King in a calmer humour, beganne to have a ſenſe of the Earle of Lancaſters execution, which he diſcovered upon this occaſion: ſome about him making earneſt ſuite for a Pardon to one of the Earles followers, and preſſing the King hard to it, he fell into a great paſſion, exclaiming againſt them as unjuſt and wicked Counſellours, who would urge him to ſave the life of a notorious Varlet, and would not ſpeake one word for his neare kinſman, the Earle of Lancaſter: who (ſaid he) had) he lived, might have beene uſefull to me, and the whole kingdome; dome; but this fellow the longer he lives, the more mischiefe he will doe, and therefore by the soule of God, he should die the death he had deserved. Sir Andrew Harkeley, who was the man that tooke the Earle of Lancaster prisoner, being advanced for his service to the Earledome of Carlile, enjoyed his honour but a while; for the next yeare after, either thrust out into discontent by the Spensers, envying his high preferment, or combining with the Scots, upon hope of a great match, (as he was accused) he is degraded of all his honours; drawne, hanged, and quartered at London for Treason. But now the King of France summons King Edward to come and doe his homage for Gascoyne, and he not comming, all his Territories in France are adjudged to be forfeited, and many places of importance are seised on by the French. Hereupon a Parliament is called, and it is by common consent of all agreed, that the King should not goe in person himselfe, in regard of the distraction of the times, but should send some speciall man to excuse his appearance; whereupon Edmund Earle of Kent the Kings brother is sent, but to little effect. Then it is thought fit the Queene should goe, and indeed the Queene went; but what was the cause of her going, there is amongst Writers great variance: some say she was sent by the King to accommodate this businesse, which she negotiated so well, as that all quarrels were ended, upon condition the King should give to his sonne Edward, the Dutchie of Aquitaine, with the Earledome of Ponthieu, and send him over to doe his homage for them; which after many consultations, the King is wrought to yeeld unto; and the Prince is sent with the Bishop of Exeter and others to the Court of France accordingly: but others say, she went out of discontent, to complaine to her brother the King of France, for wrongs offered her by the Spensers, who had so alienated the Kings minde from her, that he would scarce come where she was, nor allow her fit maintenance for her calling. But whatsoever was the cause of her going; there appeared no cause of her staying, but that she had gotten into her company, Roger Mortimer Lord of Wigmore, a gallant young Gentleman, whom she specially favoured, lately escaped out of the Tower of London, by giving his keepers (as was said) a sleeping drinke. And withall, the Bishop of Exeter perceiving some plots to be in hand, and their close consultations made without him, withdrawes himselfe secretly, and discovers to the King what he observed in their courses. Whereupon the King sends presently for the Qu. and Prince, and solicits the King of France to hasten their return; which when he saw was neglected and delaied, he caused them openly to be proclaimed enemies to the kingdome, banished them and all their adherents out of the Land: and withall causeth all the Ports to be strongly kept; and sends three Admirals to attend in severall Coasts to hinder their landing. It was not without suspition, that as the King for love of the Spensers, had his minde alienated from loving the Queen; so the Queen for love of Mortimer, had her minde alienated from loving the King, and therefore having him with her, cared not how long she staied. However it was, when the Queene heard of the Kings Proclamation, she knew there was no returning for her into England without some good assistance: whereupon soliciting her brother the King of France, he aided her with men and money (say some: but others, that he refusing to aide her, as being wrought under hand by the Spensers against her; she left the French Court, and went into Heynault, to the Earle of that Countrey, who upon a contract betweene her sonne Prince Edward and Philippa the Earles daughter, aided her with a competent Army, under the conduct of his brother John: and with them and her beloved Mortimer, she tooke shipping and landed at Orwell, a Port neare into Harwich in Suffolke: where presently came to her the Earle Marshall, Henry Earle of Leycester, and Henry Earle of Lincaster with the wry neck, called Torcell, with many other Lords and Bishops. The King at this time being at London, and hearing of the Queenes landing with such forces, and chiefely how all the Realme ranne flocking to her, was suddenly stricken into a great amazement; and though he had his great Counsellours the Spensers about him, yet now he found what little good their counsel could do him: and indeed in this case, what should he, or what could he do? To stay in London was apparent danger, for he plainely saw the Londoners

Londoners to be more inclining to take the Queenes part then his, and to goe from London to any other place was as unsafe, all places being possest either with certaine Enemies or uncertaine Friends: at last the Isle of Lundy is thought of, a place plentifull of provision, abounding with Conies, Fish and Fowle, and the Iland of hard accesse, as having but one place in it where it could be entred, and that so narrow, that a few might easily keepe out many; upon this place he resolves; and taking with him the Earle of Glocester, the Spensers, and Robert Baldocke, with some few others, he takes shipping, but by contrary windes is driven backe, and faine through Tempests to land in Wales, and there in the Abbey of Neth in Glamorganshire kept himselfe close. In the meane time the Queene was come to Oxford, where Adam Bishop of Hereford Preaching tooke for his Text, Caput malum dolet, and thereupon inferred, that the kingdome being now deadly sicke of its head, it was fit to remove that head, and put a founder in the place. At this time also, the Londoners to shew their love to the Queene, seised upon Walter Stapleton the good Bishop of Exeter and Lord Treasurer of England, left Governour there by the King, and with great despight beheaded him, as also divers others, onely because they favoured the King. In the meane time, the Queene went from Oxford to Glocester, and from thence to Bristow, where Hugh Spenser the Father was, a man of fourescore and ten yeares old, who is there taken, and without examination or Judgement, in most cruell manner Executed, having his heart pulled out of his body being yet alive, and his body left hanging upon the Gallowes. After this the Queene staied at Hereford the space of a moneth, and then dividing her Army, she sends one part of it, under the Conduct of Henry Earle of Lancaster, and Rice a Powell a Clerke, to find out the King: and this Rice being a Welshman, and knowing the Country well, brought the Earle to the Monastery of Neathe where the King was, whom they there take together with Spenser the Sonne, Robert Baldocke, and Simon of Reading. The King is by the Bishop of Hereford committed to the custody of the Earle of Leycester: where all that Winter he was used no worse then was fit for a captive King. But Edmund Earle of Arundell, John Daniel, and Thomas Micheldene, at the instance of Mortimer, are all three beheaded. Presently after is Hugh Spenser the younger, who was now Earle of Glocester, drawne, hanged and quartered, his head sent up to be set upon London Bridge, and his foure quarters bestowed in severall Cities. The like is done with Simon of Reading, but Robert Baldocke is committed to New-Gate, against whom, when no just cause of death could be found, there was used so much cruelty in his imprisonment, that he shortly after dyed.

Presently after Christmas a Parliament is called, wherein it is agreed to depose the King, and set up his Sonne; which he hearing refused it, unlesse his Father would freely resigne; whereupon are appointed three Bishops, two Earles, two Abbots, foure Barons, and of every City a Burgesse, to goe to the King, (in custody then at Kenelworth) The Bishops were, John of Stratford Bishop of Winchester, Adam Torleton Bishop of Hereford, and Henry Bishop of Lincolne. But the Bishops of Winchester and Lincolne getting to the King before the rest came, perswade the King to resigne his Crowne to his eldest Sonne; craftily promising him he should have as good maintenance afterward, as ever he had when he was King. And contrarily threatning him, that if he did it not, the people would exclude both him and his Sonne too, and make a King of another Race. By these promisses and threatnings, the meeke King is drawne to yeeld to the Bishops motion; but when afterward the Bishop of Hereford, and the other Commissioners came, and were sate in a place appointed to take his Resignation, the King comming forth amongst them in mourning Robes, upon a sudden fell downe in a swound; in whom the Earle of Leycester, and the Bishop of Winchester, had much adoe to recover life; but then the Bishop of Hereford rising up, delivered the cause of their comming, as the other Bishops before had done. To which the King answered, that as he much grieved his People should be so hardned against him as utterly to reject him; so it was some comfort unto him, that they would yet receive his Son to be their Soveraigne. After this, Thomas Blunt knight, Steward of the Kings house, brake the Staffe of his Office; and William Trussell Speaker of the Parliament, in name of the whole kingdome, pronounced a Forme of Renouncing all Allegeance to Edward of Carnarvan. Here Caxton writes, that from the time of this Kings Deposing, which was in December, to the time of his Sonnes Crowning, which was not till Candlemas following, all Pleas of the Kings Bench were stayed, and all Prisoners, arrested by Sheriffes, commanded to be set at liberty; which seemes to have little probability, seeing his Sonne Edward presently upon his Deposing was received for King: But howsoever so great a Dowre was then assigned to Queene Isabel; that scarce a third part of the Revenues of the Crowne is left for the new King and his Wife. And to the late King is allowed a hundred Markes a moneth for his maintenance, with which he lived with his Cousin the Earle of Leycester, in good plenty and contentment for a time, onely this grieved him much at all (he said) that the Queene his Wife would never be gotten to come to see him: For he swore most devoutly that from the time he first saw her face, he could never like of any other Woman. By which it may appeare, that neither Gaveston nor the Spensers had so debauched him, as to make him false to his bed, or to be disloyall to his Queene. But the Queene being hardned against him, and conceiving he had too great Liberty under the Earle of Leycester, by advise of her pestilent Counsellour, Adam Torleton Bishop of Hereford, appoints Thomas Gourney, and John Matrevers knights, to take him from the Earle into their owne Custody; and to carry him whither they thought good; who thereupon take him from Kenelworth, and carry him first to Corfe Castle, and from thence to Brifton, where they shut him in the Castle; till upon knowledge of a Plot laid to get him out, and send him beyond Sea, they tooke him in the night and carryed him to Barkeley Castle, where by the way they abused him most inhumanely, as Sir Thomas de la More knight of Glocestershire in his Life relateth: For to the end he should not be knowne, they shaved his Head and Beard, and that in most beastly manner; for they took him from his Horse and set him upon a Hillocke, and then taking puddle water out of a Ditch thereby, they went to wash him, his Barber telling him that cold water must serve for this time: whereat the miserable King looking sternely upon him, said, That whether they would or no, he would have warme water to wash him: and therewithall to make good his word, he presently shed forth a showre of teares. Never was King turned out of a kingdome in such a manner; Many kingdomes have beene lost by the chance of Warre, but this kingdome was lost before any Dice were cast; no blow strucke, no Battell fought; done forcibly, and yet without force; violently, and yet with consent; both parties agreed, yet neither pleased; for the King was not pleased to leave his kingdome, and the Queene was not pleased to leave him his life; it was not safe to leave him a part, by which he might afterward recover the whole; and therefore this was the marke now aimed at, having taken away his kingdome openly, how they might take away his life secretly; bethe Authours of it, and not be seene in it; but this must be the Contents of a Chapter hereafter.

BY this King it appeares, there is something else besides the grievance of Taxations, that alienates the mindes of English Subjects from their King; for never were fewer Taxations then in this Kings time, yet never were the Subjects minds more alienated from their King, then they were from him. Before his Coronation, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, there was granted him a fifteenth of the Clergy, and a twentieth of the Temporalty. In his fifth yeare in a Pasliament at London, was granted him a fifteenth of the Temporalty. In his fifteenth yeare was granted the sixth penny of temporall mens Goods, through England, Ireland, and Wales, towards his Warres with Scotland. And more then these we reade not of: but then at the defeate of the Earle of Lancaster, there were Confiscations that supplyed plyed the place of Taxations, by which (as one saith) he became the richest King that had beene since the Conquest.

Of his Lawes and Ordinances.

HE Ordained that the moneyes of his Father, though counted base by the People, should be currant. In the eight yeare of his Raigne, by reason of a dearth which raised the price of all Victuals, it was Ordained by Parliament, that an Oxe fatted with grasse, should be sold for fifteene shillings; fatted with Corne, for twenty; the best Cow for twelve shillings; a fat Hogge of two yeares old, three shillings foure pence; a fat Sheepe shorne, foureteene pence, with the Fleece, twenty pence; a fat Goose for two pence halfe-penny; a fat Capon two pence; a fat Hen a penny; foure Pigeons a penny; whosoever sold for more, should forfait their Ware to the King. But after these Rates imposed, all kinde of Victuals grew so scarce, that provision could hardly be made for the Kings house; whereupon shortly after, the Order was revoked, and Market Folkes permitted to make the best of their Wares. In this Kings time an Ordinance was made against knights Templars, accused of Heresie and other crimes, and they were all apprehended, and committed to divers Prisons. The like was done by all the Kings of Christendome, at one instant, being condemned in a Generall Counsell at Vienna. In the 14. yeare of his Raigne, on the 15. of October, the Clerkes of the Exchequer went towards Yorke with the Booke called Domus Dei, and other Records and Provision that laded one and twenty Carts, but within halfe a yeare they were brought backe againe.

Affaires of the Church in his time.

IN the 17. yeare of his Raign the Bishop of Hereford was arrested, accused of High Treason, for aiding the Kings enemies in their late rebellion; but he refused to answer, (being a consecrated Bishop) without leave of the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, whose Suffragan he was, (and who he said was his direct Judge, next the Pope) or without the consent of his fellow Bishops: who then all arose, and humbly craved the Kings Clemency in his behalfe; but finding the King implacable, they tooke him away from the Barre, and delivered him to the custody of the Arch-bishop of Canterbury: shortly after, he was againe taken and convented as before; which the Clergy understanding, the Arch-bishops, Canterbury, Yorke, and Dublin, with terme other Bishops, all with their Crosses erected, went to the place of Judgement, and againe tooke him away with them; charging all men, upon paine of Excommunication, to forbeare to lay violent hands upon him; with which audacious Act, the King was so much displeased, that he presently commanded inquiry to be made ex Officio Fiscis, concerning those Objections against the Bishop; wherein he was found guilty, though absent, and had all his Goods and Possessions seised into the Kings hands. In this Kings time the Crowchet Fryers came first into England. In his time, Pope John the two and twentieth, first Instituted the Feast of Corpus Christi; beguine before by Urban the fourth.

Workes of piety done by him, or by others in his time.

THis King founded Oriall Colledge, and Saint Mary Hall in Oxford: He builded a Church of Fryers at his Manour of Langley, where the foule of Gaveston should be prayed for. In this Kings twentieth yeare, Richard Rothing Sheriffe of London builded the Parish Church of Garlickhithe in London. Ralph Baldocke Bishop of London gave two thousand Markes to the building of the new Worke of the Chappell, on the South side of Pauls Church: And left much more by his Testament.

Casualties.

IN the eighth yeare of this Kings Raigne, was so great a dearth, that Horses and Dogges were eaten, and Theeves in prison pluckt in peeces those that were newly brought in amongst them, and eate them halfe alive; which continuing three yeares, brought in the end such a pestilence, that the living scarce sufficed to bury the dead. In the fourth yeare of his Raigne, the Church of Middleton in Dorsetshire, with all the Monuments, was consumed with Lightning, the Monkes being at Mattins. In this Kings time, digging the Foundation of a worke about Pauls, were found more then a hundred heads of Oxen and kine, which confirmed the opinion, that of old time it had beene the Temple of Jupiter, and that there was the Sacrifice of Beasts.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE marryed Isabel Daughter of Philip the Faire, King of France, she being but twelve yeares of age, who lived his Wife twenty yeares, his Widdow thirty, and dying at threescore and three yeares old, at Rysings neare London, was buried in the midst of the Gray Fryers Quire in London. By her he had issue two Sons and two Daughters: his eldest Sonne named Edward of Windsor, because borne there, succeeded him in the kingdome. His second Sonne named John of Eltham, because borne there, was at twelve yeares old created Earle of Cornwall: he dyed in Scotland, in the flowre of his Youth, unmarryed. His eldest Daughter Joane, being a childe, was marryed in the fourth yeare of King Edward her Brother, to David Prince of Scotland, Sonne to King Robert Bruce, at seven yeares old, who comming afterward into England to visit her Brother, dyed here, and was buryed at the Gray Fryers in London. His second Daughter Eleanor, was marryed to Reginold the second Earle of Gelder, with a portion of fifteene thousand pounds, and had issue by him two Sonnes, who were Earles successively.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was faire of body, and of great strength, but given much to drinke, which made him oftentimes bewray his owne Secrets; For his other conditions, his greatest fault was, that he loved but one, for if his love had beene divided, it could not have beene so violent. He was extreame in nothing but in loving, and though love moderated, be the best of affections, yet the extremity of it is the worst of passions. He was rather unfortunate then unhappy; seeing unfortunatenesse is in the Event, unhappinesse in the Cause; and if his fortune had beene to love good men, his owne goodnesse would have made him happy. Two Vertues were eminent in him above all his Predecessours, Continence, and Abstinence: So continent that he left no base issue behind him; So abstinent, that he tooke no base courses for raising of money. They who despised him being alive, so much honoured him being dead, that they could have found in their hearts to make him a Saint.

Of his Death and Buriall.

MAny wayes were attempted to take away his life: First, they vexed him in his dyet, allowing him nothing he could well endure to eate, but this succeeded not. Then they lodged him in a chamber over carion and dead carkasses, enough to have poysoned him; and indeed he told a workman at his window, he never endured so great a misery in all his life, but neither did this succeed: Then they attempted it by Poysons, but whether by the strength of his constitution, or by the Divine Providence, neither did this succeed. At last the pestilent Achitophel, the Bishop of Hereford, devised a Letter to his keepers, blaming them for giving him too too much liberty, and for not doing the service which was expected from them: and in the end of his Letter wrote this line, Edwardum Occidere nolite timere bonum est: Craftily contriving it in this doubtfull sense, that both the keepers might find sufficient warrant, and himselfe might find sufficient excuse. The keepers guessing at his meaning, tooke it in the worst sense, and accordingly put it in execution; they tooke him in his bed, and casting heavy bolsters upon him, and pressing them hard downe, stifled him; and not content with that, they heated an iron red hot, and through a pipe thrust it up into his Fondament, that no markes of violence might be seene; but though none were seene, yet some were heard; For when the Fact was in doing, he was heard to roare and cry all the Castle over. Gourney and Matrevers, his murtherers, looking for reward, had the reward of murtherers: For the Queene and Bishop Torleton disavowing the command, threatned to question them for the Kings death: whereupon they fled beyond Sea; and Gourney after three yeares being taken in France, and sent into England, was in the way upon the Sea beheaded. Matrevers flying into Germany, had the grace to repent, but lived ever after miserably. Thus dyed this King in the yeare 1327. more then halfe a yeare after his deposing; when he had Raigned almost 19. yeares, lived 43. His body was carryed to Gloucester, and there without any Funerall Pompe buryed in the Monastery of Saint Peter, by the Benedictine Fryers.

Of Men of note in his time.

IN this Kings time, of Martiall men were many, whose Acts have beene spoken of in the late Kings life. Of Learned men, also many, as John Duns the great Logician, called Doctor Subtilis, borne in Northumberland, at Emildune a Village three miles distant from Alnwicke; though both the Scots and the Irish challenge him for theirs. Robert Walsingham a Carmelite Fryer, who wrote divers Treatises. Robert Baston borne in Nottingham-shire, a Carmelite Fryer of Scarborough, whom King Edward tooke with him into Scotland, to write some Remembrances of his victories; but being taken by the Scots was constrained by Robert Bruce to write Remembrances of his overthrowes. William Rishanger, a Monke of Saint Albans, an Historiographer; Ralph Baldocke Bishop of London, who wrote a History intituled Historia Anglica; John Walsingham, a Carmelite Fryer, who wrote divers Treatises; Nicholas de Lyra a Jew by birth, who wrote many excellent Treatises in Divinity; William Ockam a Fryer Minor, who wrote divers Treatises, and namely against John Duns, and also against Pope John the 23. in favour of the Emperour Lewis of Bavaria; Thomas Haselwood, a Canon of Leedes in Kent, who wrote a Chronicle, called Chronicon compendiarium; Robert Perscrutator, borne in Yorkeshire, a blacke Fryer and a Philosopher, or rather a Magician; and lastly, though not least worthy to be remembred, John Mandevile, the great Travellour, a Doctor of Physicke, and a Knight.

THE LIFE and RAIGNE OF KING EDWARD THE THIRD.

Of his comming to the Crowne, and Acts done in his minority.

EDward of Windſor, eldeſt ſonne of King Edward the ſecond, by Order of Parliament, upon his Fathers Reſignation, was proclaimed King of England, on the five and twentieth day of January, in the yeare 1327. and becauſe he had not yet received the Order of knighthood, he was by Henry Earle of Lancaſter girt ſolemnly with the Sword, and on the firſt day of February following, was Crowned at Weſtminſter by Walter Reginolds Archbiſhop of Canterbury: and thereupon a generall Pardon is Proclaimed, which hath ſince beene uſed as a Cuſtome with all the ſucceeding Kings: that at their firſt comming to the Crowne, a Generall Pardon is alwayes granted. And becauſe the King was under age, ſcarce fifteene yeares old (though Froyſſard ſaith he was then Eighteene) there were twelve appointed Governours of him and the kingdome, namely the Arch-biſhops of Canterbury and Yorke, the Biſhops of Wincheſter, Hereford, and Worceſter; Thomas of Brotherton, Earle Marſhall, Edmund Earle of Kent, the Kings Unkles; John Earle Warren, Thomas Lord Wake, Henry Lord Percie, Oliver Lord Ingham, and John Lord Roſſe: but though theſe were appointed and bore the name, yet the Queen and Roger Mortimer tooke all the authority to themſelves. The firſt action that was undertaken, was an expedition againſt the Scots; for Robert Bruce, though now old and ſickly, and (as was ſaid) Leprous: yet conſidering the youth of the new King, and the diſtractions of the kingdome, thought it now a fit time to doe ſome good upon England: and entring the Engliſh borders with an Army, ſent defiance to King Edward: whereupon an Army is raiſed, and the Heynaulders (whom the Queen had brought over) are joyned with the Engliſh; but a variance falling out betweene the two Nations, made the action not ſucceſſefull. For the Kings Army encountring the Scots at Stanhope Parke in Weridall in the Biſhopricke of Durham, though three times as many as the Scots, as being thirty thouſand; yet through this variance, but more through treaſon of ſome great men, ſuffered them all to eſcape their hands, and the Scots returned home in ſafety, the Engliſh with diſhonour: and after this, the Engliſh ſeeing the Heynaulders could doe them no good, ſent them away to their owne Countrey. In King Edwards ſecond yeare, his marriage with Philippa of Heynault is ſolemniſed, (a diſpenſation being firſt gotten, becauſe of their neareneſſe in bloud) and a Parliament is holden at Northamp-

Northampton, where the King made three Earles: John of Eltham his brother, Earle of Cornwall; Roger Mortimer, Earle of March, and James Butler of Ireland, Earle of Ormond: and in this Parliament a diſhonourable peace is concluded with the Scots, and confirmed by a match betweene David Bruce Prince of Scotland, being but ſeven yeares old, and Joane ſiſter to King Edward, not ſo old; at which time, by the ſecret working of Queene Iſabell, Roger Mortimer and Sir James Dowglaſſe; the King ſurrenders by his Charter, all his title of Soveraignty to the Kingdome of Scotland, reſtores divers Deeds and Inſtruments of their former Homages and Fealties, with the famous Evidence called Ragmans Roll, and many ancient Jewels and Monuments, amongſt which was the blacke Croſſe of Scotland; and beſides, any Engliſh man is prohibited to hold lands in Scotland, unleſſe he were a dweller there. In conſideration whereof King Bruce was to pay thirty thouſand Markes, and to renounce his claime to the Counties of Cumberland and Northumberland, and any other place poſſeſſed by him in England. This was no good beginning, and yet worſe followed after. For another Parliament being holden at Wincheſter, Edmund Earle of Kent, the Kings Unkle, is there accuſed, and condemned upon his confeſſion, for intending to reſtore his brother, the late King Edward; an intention onely without any fact; yet condemned he was, and brought to the Scaffold, but generally, ſo beloved of the people, that he ſtood on the Scaffold from one a clocke till five, before any executioner could be found that would doe the office, till at laſt a ſilly wretch of the Marſhalſey was gotten to cut off his head. But the Authors of his death eſcaped not long themſelves, for in the third yeare of the Kings Raigne, another Parliament is holden at Nottingham, wherein the Queen hath all her great Joynture taken from her, and is put to her Penſion of a thouſand pounds a yeare, and her ſelfe confined to a Caſtle, where ſhe remained the reſt of her dayes, no fewer then thirty yeares, a time long enough to finde that her being the daughter of a King, the ſiſter of a King, the wife of a King, and the mother of a King, were glorious titles, but all not worth the liberty of a meane eſtate; and as for Mortimer, (lying then in the Caſtle of Nottingham) and lately created Earle of the Marches of Wales) he was ſeiſed on in this manner; the King taking with him William Montacute, Robert Holland, and others, goe ſecretly one night by Torch-light, through a privie way under ground, till they came to the Queenes Chamber, where leaving the King without, they entred, and found the Queene with Mortimer, ready to goe to bed: then laying hands on him, they led him forth, after whom the Queene followed, crying, Bel fits, bel fits, eyes pitie du gensil Mortimer; good ſon good ſonne, take pity upon the gentle Mortimer, ſuſpecting that her ſonne had beene amongſt them: this courſe was taken to apprehend him for avoyding of tumult, he having no fewer then nineſcore knights and Gentlemen, beſides other meaner ſervants continually about him. But thus ſeiſed on, he is committed preſently to the Tower, accuſed of divers great crimes, whereof theſe were chiefe; that he had procured the late Kings death; that he had beene the author of the Scots ſafe eſcaping at Stanhope Parke, corrupted with the gift of thirty thouſand pounds; that he had procured the late marriage and Peace with Scotland, ſo diſhonourable to the King and kingdome; that he had beene too familiar with the Queene, as by whom ſhe was thought to be with child: of which Articles he is found guilty, and condemned; and thereupon is drawne and hanged on the common Gallowes at the Elmes, now called Tiburne, where his body remained two dayes as an opprobrious ſpectacle for all beholders.

After theſe buſineſſes in England, there comes a new buſineſſe upon him from the King in France: for about this time Philippe le Bel, King of France, the Queens brother dying without iſſue, the right of ſucceſſion to the Crowne is devolved upon the Heire to Charles a former King, wherein are competitours Philip Duke de Valois, and Edward King of England; Edward is the nearer in bloud, but drawes his Pedegree by a Female: Philippe, the further off, but deſcending by all Males; and becauſe the Law Salique excluding Females, was conceived as well to exclude all deſcendants by Females, therefore is Philips title preferred before King Edwards; and and Philip is received and crowned King of France: to which preferment of his, Robert d' Arthois a Peere of great power, gave no ſmall furtherance. And now as ſoone as Philip was Inveſted in the Crowne, he ſummons King Edward to come and doe his Homage for the Dutchy of Guyenne, and his other lands in France, held of that Crowne, according to the cuſtome; which though it were ſome prejudice to King Edwards claime afterward, yet in regard his kingdome of England was ſcarce well ſetled, and himſelfe but young, he was contented to doe; and thereupon the ſixth of June, in the yeare 1329. King Edward in a Crimſon Velvet gowne imbroidered with Leopards, with his Crowne on his head, his Sword by his ſide, and golden Spurres on his heeles; preſents himſelfe in the body of the Cathedrall Church of Amyens before King Philip, ſitting in his Chaire of Eſtate, in a Velvet Gowne of a Violet colour imbroydered with Flowers de lys of Gold, his Crowne on his head, and his Scepter in his hand, with all his Princes and Peeres about him. The Viſcount Melun Chamberlaine of France, firſt commands King Edward to put off his Crowne, his Sword, and his Spurres, and to kneele downe, which he did, on a Crimſon Velvet Cuſhion before King Philip; and then the Viſcount putting both his hands together betweene the hands of the King of France, pronounced the words of the Homage, which were theſe: You become Liegeman to my Maſter here preſent, as Duke of Aquitaine and Peere of France, and you promiſe to beare faith and loyalty unto him; Say yea: and King Edward ſaid yea, and kiſſed the King of France in the mouth, as Lord of the Fee. The like Homage alſo he did for the Earldome of Ponthieu. But this act of ſubmiſſion left a rancour in King Edwards heart, which afterwards brake ſo out, that it had beene good for France it had never beene exacted.

This done, King Edward returnes home, and there finds a new buſines with Scotland, upon this occaſion. Edward Bayliol, ſonne to John Bayliol (ſometimes King of Scotland) two and thirty yeares after his fathers depoſition, beganne now to ſhew himſelfe, attempting the recovery of that Crowne; and comming out of France, where he had all that while remained; and getting aide under-hand in England, with them he ſuddenly aſſailes thoſe who had the government of Scotland, during the Nonage of the young King David, (being at that time with the King of France) and in a battell overcame them, with the ſlaugher of many Noble men, and thouſands of the common people; and thereupon was immediatly Crowned King of Scotland at Scone. But notwithſtanding this great defeat, King Bayliol was forced to retire him into England to get more aide of King Edward: who now ſhewes himſelfe in the action, joynes with Bayliol againſt his brother in Law, King David, goes in perſon with a ſtrong Army to recover Berwicke, which after three moneths ſiege, being valiantly defended by the Lord Seton, was taken in; and the Army of the Scots which came to the reſcue thereof, at Halidowne-hill, utterly defeated: where were ſlaine ſeven Earles, ninety knights and Bannerets, foure hundred Eſquires, and about two and thirty thouſand common Souldiers, as our Writers report; as theirs, but foureteene thouſand: and with this effuſion of bloud is Bayliol returned to his miſerable kingdome, and to hold good correſpondence with the King of England hereafter, doth him Homage for his Realme of Scotland, and the Ilands adjacent. But though he had a kingdome, yet he had not quietneſſe, for many of the Scots aided by the French, made warre upon him divers yeares after; during all which time, King David with his wife remained in France. If any man marvell why King Edward would aide Bailiell againſt King David, who had married his ſiſter; he may conſider that Alliances, how neare ſoever, weigh but light in the Scales of State.

About this time the Ile of Man is conquered by William Montacute, Earle of Salisbury; for which ſervice King Edward gave him the Title of King of Man.

of his Acts after he came of age.

And now Robert of Arthois baniſhed out of France, comes into England, whom King Edward makes Earle of Richmond, and of his Counſell. This Robert perſwades King Edward to make warre upon France, to which Crowne (he ſaid) he had more right then he that held it; with whoſe perſwaſions, King Edward is at laſt reſolved to undertake the enterpriſe: and to furniſh himſelfe of Noble Chiefetaines, he at one time in a Parliament at Weſtminſter, the eighth yeare of his Raign, creates ſixe Earles, Henry of Lancaſter he made Earle Derby, William Montacute he made Earle of Saliſbury, Hugh Audeley Earle of Glocester, William Clinton Earle of Huntington, and Robert Clifford or Ufford Earle of Suffolke; alſo twenty knights, of whom Thomas de la Moore, who writ the life of the Kings Father, was one: withall he enters League of amity with many Princes abroad, with the Dukes and Earles of Gelders, Fulyers, Cleves, Heynault, and Brabant, and with the Arch-biſhop of Colen, and Valeran his brother: as on the other ſide, the King of France got to take his part the Biſhop of Liege, John King of Bohemia, Earle of Luxemburg, Henry Count Palatine, Aubert Biſhop of Mets, Otho Duke of Auſtria, Ame Earle of Geneva, with many other Princes and Captaines out of Germany, Spaine, and other Countries. King Edward thus reſolved in himſelfe, and furniſhed with friends abroad, goes over into Flanders with his Queene and children, makes his reſidence at Antwerp, where by perſwaſion of the Flemings he takes upon him the Stile, Title, and Armes of the King of France; for by this they accounted themſelves diſobliged of the Bond of twenty hundred thouſand crownes, which they had entred into, never to beare Armes againſt the King of France; and hereupon the League was eſtabliſhed betweene them and King Edward. And now King Edward for a beginning to put his claime in execution, ſets upon Cambray, and enters France by the way of Vermandois and Thierach, on the other ſide King Philip ſeiſeth on the Dutchy of Guienne, and ſends thither the Conte d' Eu, Conſtable of France, with the Earles of Foix and Armigniack. At laſt both Armies came ſo neare together, that a fight was appointed the Friday after; but upon better conſideration, the Engliſh thought it no diſcretion to give battell to an Army ſo much greater then their owne, if they could avoid it; and the French thought it as little diſcretion for them to hazard the perſon of their Prince within his owne kingdome; and perhaps were not a little moved with the warning given them by Robert King of Sicilie, a great Aſtronomer, that he fore-ſaw by the Starres, ſome great misfortune to threaten the French, if they ſhould that day fight with the Engliſh, King Edward being preſent: and thus both Armies having their ſeverall reaſons to decline the battell, they parted without doing any thing; onely an accident happened ſcarce worth remembring, yet muſt be remembred. A Hare ſtarting out before the head of the French Army, cauſed a great ſhout to be made; whereupon, they who ſaw not the Hare, but onely heard the ſhout, ſuppoſing it to be the onſet to the battell, diſpoſed themſelves to fight, and foureteene Gentlemen for encouragements ſake, as the cuſtome is, were knighted; called afterward in merriment, knights of the Hare.

But now King Edward muſt a little looke home, and therefore leaving the Queen in Brabant, he paſſeth himſelfe into England about Candlemas, having beene in Brabant about a yeare; and landing at the Tower about midnight, and finding it unguarded, was ſo much diſpleaſed, that he preſently ſends for the Major of London, commanding him to bring before him the Chancellour and Treaſurer, with Sir John Saint Paul, Michael Watch, Philp Thorpe, Henry Stratford, Clergy men, (who it ſeemes were Officers for his Receipts) and John Stoner Juſtice of the Bench; all which, except the Chancellour, were apprehended and committed to priſon; as were afterward in like manner divers Officers of Juſtice, and Accomptants, upon inquiry made of their unjuſt proceeding. During the Kings abode in England, William Montacute Earle of Saliſbury, and Robert Ufford Earle of Suffolke, left in Flanders to oppoſe the French, having performed divers great exploits, were at laſt in in an encounter about Lisle, ſo overlaid by multitude, as they were both taken, and ſent priſoners to Paris. Beſides, about this time two accidents happened that were thought would be great rubs in King Edwards proceeding; one, that his Wives Father, William Earle of Haynault, dying, and leaving his ſonne to ſucceed, this ſon left his brother King Edward, and fell to take part with the King of France: the other, that the Duke of Normandy, thinking himſelfe as ſtrong as ever William Duke of Normandy was that conquered England, he ſaw no reaſon but he might conquer it as well as that William; and thereupon makes preparation by Sea and Land to attempt the enterpriſe: but theſe were but vapours that never came to be winds, at leaſt brought no ſtormes: for John Earle of Haynault had quickly enough of the King of France, and was ſoone after reconciled to his brother King Edward; and the Duke of Normandy went no further then preparations: for indeed King Edward proſecuted his courſes againſt France with ſuch heate, that all the neighbouring Princes ſeeing a fire kindled ſo neare their owne borders, were glad to looke to themſelves at home. But now to impeach the King of England, returne into France, King Philip had provided a mighty Navie in the Haven of Sluce, conſiſting of two hundred ſaile of Ships (beſides many Gallies) and two thouſand armed men in the Port ready to encounter him upon his landing: whereof King Edward being adverti-ſed, prepares the like number of Ships, and ſets out to Sea upon Midſommer Eve, is met the morrow after with a Navy likewiſe from the North parts, conducted by Sir Robert Morley, and encounters his enemy who lay to intercept him with ſuch force and courage, and ſuch advantage of Wind and Sun, that he utterly defeated their whole Navy, took and ſunke all their Ships, ſlew thirty thouſand men, and landed with no great glory, as ſuch a victory (the greateſt that ever before was gotten by the Engliſh at Sea) could yeeld, though King Edward himſelfe was there wounded with an Arrow in the thigh. Moſt of the French, rather then to endure the Arrowes of the Engliſh, or be taken, deſperately leapt into the Sea; whereupon the French King's Jeſter, ſet on to give him notice of this overthrow, (which being ſo ill newes, none elſe would willingly impart unto him) ſaid, and oftentimes repeated it in the Kings hearing; Cowardly Engliſh men, Daſtardly Engliſh men, faint-hearted Engliſh men! the King at length asked him why? for that (ſaid he) they durſt not leap out of their Ships into the Sea, as our brave French men did. By which ſpeech the King apprehend a notion of this overthrow: which the French attribute to Nicholas Bache, one of their chiefe Commanders, who had armed his Ships with men of baſe condition (content with ſmall pay) and refuſed Gentlemen and ſufficient Souldiers, in regard they required greater wages: And indeed it often happens that the avarice of Commanders is the occaſion of great defeats.

By this victory King Edward gained a free entrance into Flanders, and preſently went and beſieged Tournay with an Army of five and fifty thouſand, but was ſo valiantly encountred by the Duke of Burgundy and the Earle of Armigniack, that they routed his Army, and ſlew foure thouſand upon the place; which ſo enraged King Edward, that two dayes after he ſent a Challenge to King Philip to meete him in a ſingle combate, or with an hundred againſt as many, before the wals of Tournay. King Philip anſwers, that his Challenge being made to Philip de Valois, without mention of King; he tooke it not to be to him, who was truly King of France; but he wiſhed him to remember the Homage he had done him at Amiens, and the wrong he did to the Chriſtian world, by his troubleſome courſes to hinder him from his voyage intended to the Holy Land. Beſides this anſwer in writing, he ſends to him by word of mouth, that by his Challenge he hazarded nothing of his owne, but expoſed onely the Dominion of another, which was againſt all reaſon: but if he would ſet his kingdome of England, though much meaner, againſt his of France, he would then accept the Challenge, and meete him in the field in ſingle combate. But this King Edward would not hearken to, for as he was valiant to make the Challenge, ſo he was circumſpect to looke to the conditions. But hereupon he continues his ſiege of Tournay, to the reliefe whereof King Philip ſends all the forces he could poſſibly make by himſelfe or his friends, and after the ſiege had had continued three moneths, partly by mediation of Robert King of Sicille, but chiefely by the Lady Jane of Valois, ſiſter to King Philip, and mother of King Edwards wife (who had vowed her ſelfe a Nunne, but to doe this good office, travelled from one to another) a Truce was concluded for a yeare, and both their Armies are diſſolved.

After this, K. Edward returning into England, was advertiſed how the Scots after many other places gained, had beſieged the Caſtle of Striveling; for reliefe whereof, the King makes all the haſte he can; and yet before he could come, it was by force of battery compelled to render it ſelfe upon conditions. Then King Edward being at Berwicke, paſſeth to New-Caſtle upon Tyne, where he ſtaies a moneth waiting for his proviſion that was to come by Sea, but that being driven into other parts by tempeſt, he makes a Truce with the Scots for three or foure moneths, and then returnes home. In the time of this Truce, the Scots ſend to King David, to come and governe the kingdome in his owne perſon, who thereupon taking his leave of the King of France, with whom he had remained ſeven yeares, he with his wife Joane, King Edwards ſiſter, returnes into Scotland; where after he had beene moſt honourably received by the Prince of Orkney, and the other Lords and Barons of the Kingdome, as ſoone as the Truce was ended, with a ſtrong Army enters Northumberland, paſſing on to New-Caſtle upon Tyne, where he plants his Campe. Of this Caſtle, John Nevile was left governour by King Edward, who ſending out certaine companies, tooke the Earle Murray priſoner, and with the ſlaughter of divers of his men, and rich booties, returned backe to his Caſtle; which ſo incenſed King David, that he aſſaulted the Caſtle as a man enraged, but finding it too ſtrong for his taking, he then paſſed into the Province of Durham, where he uſed all kinds of cruelty, firſt upon the Countrey, and then upon the City, killing men, women and children, Clergy, and others; burning and deſtroying houſes and Churches, and utterly defacing it. From thence he paſſeth on to the Caſtle of Salisbury, which Caſtle belonged to William Mountacute Earle of Salisbury in right of his wife; but himſelfe being then priſoner in France, onely his Counteſſe, and one William Mountacute a Couſin of his, was in the Caſtle. This William perceiving the Scottiſh horſe to be ſo over-charged with pillage, that they were ſcarce able to goe, iſſues out of the Caſtle with forty horſe, ſets upon them, kils two hundred, and takes ſixe ſcore, whom he brings with their rich pillage, into the Caſtle. King David ſoone after with his whole Army arrived, but hearing of King Edwards comming (who certified of theſe things, made all the haſte he could) he retires himſelfe from thence; and King Edward finding him gone before he came, yet would needs goe in and viſit the Counteſſe: of whom, as ſoone as he ſaw her, he was ſo enamoured, that he laid more battery to her chaſtity, then King David had done to her Caſtle; but finding it inexpugnable, after a day and a night he left it, and followed after the Scots, with whom for three dayes together he had many skirmiſhes, till at laſt a Truce was concluded for two yeares; and amongſt other conditions, William Earle of Salisbury, priſoner with the King of France, was ſet at liberty in exchange for the Earle Murray, priſoner with the King of England.

About this time another difference fell out betweene the Kings of France and England. John Earle of Montford laid claime to the Dutchy of Brittaine, but in the quarrell was taken priſoner by the King of France: his Lady ſends to King Edward for ſuccour; which King Edward grants upon condition that a marriage be made betweene his daughter Mary and the Earle of Montfords ſonne, which being agreed on, he ſeads over to her aide, firſt, Walter de Manny a valiant knight, and afterward Robert d' Arthois: but whileſt his Army was preparing, King Edward was informed by Edward Bayliol, the pretended King of Scotland, and Governour of Berwicke, that the Scots had not kept the conditions of the Truce; whereupon King Edward drawes a great Army to Berwicke, with a purpoſe to doe great matters, but nothing was done, for a new Truce was againe concluded for two yeares. By this time Robert d' Arthois had made ready his Army, and taking with him the Counteſſe of Montford, the Earles of Pembroke, Salisbury, and Suffolke, and many other Barons;

after great tempests and encounters at Sea, lands safely at last neare to Vannes, which was held by the French, and laying siege to the City, with the assistance of Walter de Manny, who came unto him, after many assaults, at last he tooke it, to the great joy of the Countesse of Montford, though she held it not long: for certaine resolute French knights assaulted it soone after, and recovered it from the English. In which action many Lords were slaine or wounded, and particularly Robert de Arthois himselfe; who passing over into England, for the better curing of his wounds, soone after died, and was buried in Pauls Church in London. And now King Edward himselfe with a strong Army passeth over into Britaine, and plants his Campe before the City of Vannes, where was like to have beene a cruell battell, but in the instant, there came from Pope Clement the sixth, two Cardinals, the Bishops of Preneste and Thusculum, who upon certaine conditions concluded a Peace, amongst other conditions, this was one; that the City of Vannes should be delivered to King Philip, and thereupon John Earle of Montford should be set at liberty, but yet with this charge, not to goe into Britaine: which promise notwithstanding, he kept not, but went presently and besieged a Towne in Britaine, though he were forced to retire, and died shortly after. But the Truce cracked thus, as it were, by Montford, was afterward absolutely broken by King Edward, though he charged the breach of it upon K. Philip, and King Philip upon him. But howsoever broken it was, and Henry of Lancaster Earle of Derby, with divers other Earles and Barons, is sent into France, who won many Townes in Gascoyne, and in the Counties of Perigort and Tholouse, and then went to winter at Burdeaux. And afterward, in May following, pursuing his victories, he wonne many more Townes, and amongst others, the great Towne of Reoll. After this againe, he tooke Montpesat, Maurore, Villefranche, and many other Townes; and at last the great City of Angoulesme, and then came to winter againe at Burdeaux.

Of his Acts together with the Prince.

KING Philip informed of so many great losses, assembles a mighty Army, no lesse then a hundred thousand men, with which he recovers Miremont, and Villefranche, and then proceeded to besiege Angoulesme, whom the Earle of Derby having not forces sufficient to encounter, King Edward (leaving for Wardens of England in his absence, the Lords Percie and Nevill) goeth himselfe in person with an Army (as Froyssard saith) of fourescore thousand men at Armes, and ten thousand Archers, besides those out of Wales and Ireland; taking with him his sonne, the Prince of Wales, and Duke of Guyenne, being then but of the age of fifteene yeares. It may be thought preposterous in King Edward, to put his sonne to be a Souldier before he was come to be a man; but it seemes he had a longing to try his sonnes valour in the bud, and perhaps was loath to omit any thing that might give any countenance to this battell, in which the two kingdomes were laid as it were at stake; but howsoever, taking him along with him, and almost all the Lords of his kingdome, he takes Shipping, and lands at Normandy, where at the first setting his foote on ground, he tooke such a fall, that the bloud gushed out at his nose; which the Barons tooke for an ill signe, but the King tooke it for a good: saying, it was a signe that the Land desired to have him: and in deede he presently tooke the Townes of Harfleur, Moulbourg, Carenton, and Saint Lo, and afterward the City of Caen it selfe; and from thence passed to the County of Eureux, saccaged and pillaged it, as also the City of Gisors, Vernon, Meulan, and Boulebourse to the City of Poyssy. King Philip all this while staied about Paris, as looking for King Edward to give him battell there; and for that purpose had planted his Campe neare to Saint Germans; but King Edward deceived him: for going from Poyssy, he passed into Picardie and Ponthieu, where he tooke and burned many Townes and Castles: and then passed the River of Somme, though not without danger: for King Philip had sent thither Gundemar de Fay with a thousand horse, and sixe thousand foote, to stop his passage: King Edward notwithstanding resolves to passe, or perish, and plungeth foremost into the River, crying out, They who love me, will follow me: at which voyce, each man strove who should be foremost, and so the shoare was presently gained by the English. Gundemar astonished with this bold adventure, astonisheth his people with his fearfull countenance: so that the English encountring the French all in disorder, put them to flight. King Philip enraged with this dishonour, resolves to encounter it, and presently provokes King Edward to a battell. King Edward had now encamped in a Village called Cressy, his Army consisted of thirty thousand men, which he divided into three battalions: the first was led by the young Prince of Wales, with whom were joyned the Earle of Warwicke, Geoffrey of Harecourt, Reinold, Richard Stafford, John Chandoes, Robert Nevile, and many other Knights and Gentlemen, to the number of eight hundred men at Armes, two thousand Archers, and a thousand Welsh. In the second were the Earles of Northampton and Arundell, the Lords Rosse, Basset, and others, to the number of eight hundred men at Armes, and twelve hundred Archers. In the third the King was himselfe having about him seven hundred men at Armes, and three thousand Archers. The battels thus ordered, mounted on a white Hobby, he rode from ranke to ranke before them; encouraging every man that day to have regard to his right and honour. The French King's Army was farre greater, consisting of above sixty thousand men at Armes well armed, whereof the chiefe were Charles Duke of Alanson his brother, John of Luxembourg King of Bohemia, Charles de Blois the Kings Nephew, the Duke of Lorraine, the Earles of Flanders, Nevers, Sancerre, of Barrois, Blanc, and Gentlemen, about three thousand. The Vaunt-guard he commits to his brother the Count de Alanson, the Reere to the Earle of Savoy, the maine battell he leads himselfe; his heate out of confidence of victory was so great, that he was permitted time for a little counsell what was fit to be done. The old King of Bohemia advised that the Army should take some repast, and that the Infantry consisting of Genoueses (which were above fifteene thousand Crossebowes, and therefore) should make the first Front, and the Cavallery to follow; which was agreed on. But the Count of Alanson, contrary to this order, tooke it ill that the Genoueses were in the first ranke, and in fury caused them to change place; which bred that discontentment, that it irritated them more against the Leader, then the enemy; besides there fell at the instant, such a showre of raine, as dissolved their strings, and made their Bowes of little use, and at the breaking up of the showre, the Sun shone full in the face of the French (dazling their sight) and on the backe of the English, as if all made for them. K. Edward who had gotten to a Windmill, beholding from a Sentinell, the countenance of the Enemy, and discovering the disturbance about the change of place; instantly sends to charge that part, without giving them time to re-accommodate themselves; whereupon the discontented Genoueses retyred, which the Count de Alanson perceiving, he comes on with the horse, and in his rage cries out, On, on, Let us make way upon the bellies of these Genoueses, for they but hinder us: and instantly pricks on with a full carreere through the midst of them, followed by the Earles of Lorraine and Savoy, and never staies till he came to the English battell, where the Prince was; the fight grew hot and doubtfull, in so much as the Commanders about the Prince send to King Edward to come up with his power to aide him. The King askes the messengers whether his son were slaine or hurt: who answering, no; but that he was like to be over-laid: Well then (said the King) returne, and tell them who sent you, that so long as my sonne is alive they send no more to me what ever happen; for I will that the honour of this day be his. And so being left to try for themselves, they wrought it out with the sword; the rather by reason the French King having his horse slaine under him, and in danger to be trodden to death, had he not been recovered by the Lord Beaumont, was to the great discouragement of his people, withdrawne out of the field. Which notice being once taken by the English, the day was soone after theirs, and the greatest victory they ever had yet against the French, and so bloudy, as there is no mention made of any one prisoner taken in the battell, but all slaine outright, onely some few troopes that held together, saved themselves by retiring to places neare adjoyning. The French King himselfe, with a small company, got to Broy in the night, and approaching the walls, and the Guard asking him who goes there? he answered, the Fortune of France. By his voyce he was knowne, and thereupon received into the Towne, with the teares and lamentations of his people. The number of the slaine are certified to be thirty thousand; the chiefe whereof, were Charles de Alanson, John Duke of Bourbon, Ralph Earle of Lorraine, Renne Earle of Flanders, Jaques Dauphin de Vienne, Sonne to Imbert, (who after gave Dauphin to the Crowne of France) the Earles of Sancerre, Harecourt, and many other Earles, Barons, and Gentlemen, to the number of fifteene hundred. This memorable Victory happened upon the Saturday after Bartholomew day, in the yeare 1346. The next day, early in the morning, being Sunday, he sets out 300. Lances, and 2000. Archers, to discover what was become of the Enemy, who found great Troopes comming from Abbeville, Saint Remies, Rue, and Beauvoyes, (ignorant of what had happened) led by the Arch-Bishop of Rouen, and the Priour of France: whom they likewise defeated, and slew seven thousand.

But this was not all the Victories that fell to King Edward that yeare, there was another of no lesse importance gotten in England, by the Queene and his people at home against the Scots, who being set on by the French, to divert the warre there, entred upon this kingdome with threescore thousand men, (as our Writers report) assuring himselfe of successe, in regard (as he supposed) the maine strength there of was now gone into France, but he found it otherwise. For the Lords of the North, as Gylbert de Umfreville, the Earle of Angus, Henry Percy, Ralph Nevile, William Deyncourt, with the Arch-bishop of Yorke, the Bishop of Durham, and others of the Clergy, gathered so great Forces, and so well ordered them, by the animation of the Queene, (who was there in person) as fighting a great Battaile at Nevils Crosse in the Bishopricke of Durham, they utterly defeated this great Army, tooke David their King Prisoner, with the Earles of Fife, Menteth, Monry, Sutherland, the Lord Douglas, the Arch-bishop of Saint Andrewes, and others; and put to the sword fifteene thousand Scots. This Victory also fell upon a Saturday, sixe weekes after that of Cressy. He that tooke King David Prisoner, was one John Copland, an Esquire of Northumberland, whom King Edward rewarded with five hundred pounds land a yeare, and made him a Banneret. And as if all concurred to make this yeare Triumphant, the Aides sent to the Countesse of Montford in Britaine, led by Thomas Dagworth a Valiant knight, overthrew and tooke Prisoner, Charles de Bloüe, Pretender to that Dutchy, and with him Monsieur la Vall, the Lords Rochford, Beaumanoyre, Laisque, with many other Barons, Knights, and Esquires: Where were slaine the Lord De la Vall, Father to him that was taken, Viscount Rohan, Monsieur de Chasteau Bryan, de Malestroit, de Quintin, de Dyrevill, besides many other Knights and Esquires, to the number of seven hundred. And now King Edward without medling with the great Cities of Amiens and Abbeville, marcheth on directly, and sits downe before Callice, a Town of more importance for England, and the Gate to all the rest: Wherein John de Vienne Marshall of France, and the Lord de Andreghen, (a great man in his time) commanded.

All that Winter King Edward lay without any molestation by the French King, who was busied at home in his owne State about raising of money; wherewith supplyed at last, he raiseth an Army and approacheth Callice, but findes no way open to come to relieve it. The King of England was both Master of the Haven, and posseth all other wayes that were passable; and the Flemings his friends had besieged Aire, to oppose whom, John Duke of Normandy is sent for out of Guyenne: who departing leaves Henry of Lancaster Earle of Derby, Master of the Field, and he having an Army consisting of twelve hundred men at Armes, two thousand Archers, and three thousand other Foot, takes in most of the Townes of Xaintoigne, and Poitou, and in the end besieged and sacked Poitiers, and then returnes to Burdeaux, with more pillage then his people could well beare: Thus the English flourish every where, and the French suffer. During this siege of Callice (in the foure thirtieth King Edward first tuned Gunnes) the Flemings send to King Edward to make a marriage betweene his Daughter Isabell and their Lord the Prince Dowrie, to which the King consented, but the Duke of Brabant gets the King of France to make the match for a Daughter of his. The Flemings presse hard with the match of England; but he absolutely refuseth it, saying, he would never marry a Daughter of him, that had killed his Father, though he should have halfe his kingdome. This answer so incensed the Flemings, that they put their Lord in Prison, rail with long durance he at last consented, and thereupon King Edward and his Queene, with their Daughter Isabell, come over to Sandwich, and there the young Earle is affianced to her; but returning afterwards into Flanders, as soone as he found opportunity, he went to King Philip, and left his Contract Lady unmarryed, and married afterwards a Daughter of the Duke of Brabant. Whilst this while the siege of Callice was continued, and King Philip of France having got some to relieve it, solliciteth King Edward to appoint some place where unto he would meete him. But King Edward returnes answer, that if he would take his owne way, to come thither to him, there he should finde him; but in this case he would not part, having laine there so long to his great dishonour and losse, and being now so neare the point of gaining the place. Two Cardinals are sent from the Pope, to mediate a Peace, but could effect nothing, for as the French King was forced to breake up his Army and retire to Paris; leaving Callice to the mercy of the Besieger: to which when the Towne understood, they sent to desire a Parley, and it granted, and therein received this finall answer, that sixe of the chiefe Burgesses should be sent to the King, bare-headed, bare-footed, in their shirts, with Halters about their necks, the keyes of the Towne and Castle in their hands, and should yeeld themselves to the Kings will; the rest he was content to take to mercy. This seemed a hard condition, and much difficulty who should be those sixe: but conceiving up, and out of love to his Country offering himselfe to be one, the sixe were soone made up, for now by his example every one strove to be of the number: who presenting themselves before the King, he commanded them instantly to be put to death. Great supplication was made by his Lords for their lives, but he would not be drawne to alter his sentence, till the Queene, great with child, fell on her knees, and with teares obtained pardon for them; which done, she caused them to be cloathed, and besides a good repast, gives to every one of them six Nobles a peece. But though the King in this sentence shewed severity, yet in Act before he had shewed mercy. For when Victuals began to faile in the Towne, and all unusefull persons, as old men, women, and children, were put out at the Gates, he forced them not backe againe as he might have done, thereby the sooner to consume their store, but suffered them to passe through his Army, and gave them to eate, and two pence a piece to all of them. And thus was that strong Towne of Callice gotten, the third day of August, in the yeare 1347. after eleven moneths siege, and continued afterward in possession of the English two hundred and fifteene yeares. All the Inhabitants are turned out, but onely one Priest, and two or three yeares. All the Inhabitants are turned out, but onely one Priest, and two old men, to informe of the Orders of the Towne: and a Colony of English, a thousand which seven and thirty good Families out of London is sent to inhabit it; The King and Queene enter the Towne triumphantly, and make their abode there; where Queene was brought a bed of her Daughter Margaret. The King made Gouernour of the Town Aymery of Pavia a Lombard, whom he had brought up from his infancy, and then with his Queene returnes into England, at which time the Burgesses of Calais send to signifie that they had chosen him King of the Romans, but the King refuseth to accept it, as being in honour out of his way, and scarce compatible with his State at home.

Aymery

After this Truces were made by mediation, from one time to another, for the space of two yeares, in which time, Geoffrey de Charny Captaine of Saint Omer, a Aymery and charged him with this perfidiousnesse, whereupon Aymery comes visite King, and humbly desiring pardon, promiseth to handle the matter so as shall be to the Kings advantage, and thereupon is sent backe to Callice. The King, the night before the time of agreement, arives with three hundred men at Armes, and five hundred Archers: Monsieur de Charny sets out likewise the same night from Saint Omers with his Forces, and sent a hundred men before with the Crownes to Lou*vry*: the men are let in at a Posterne Gate; the crownes received, and assured to be all weight; which done, the Gates of the Towne are opened, and out marches the King before day, to encounter Monsieur de Charny, who perceiving himselfe betrayed, defended himselfe the best he could, and put King Edward to a hard bickering; who for that he would not be thus worne out there in person, put himselfe and the Prince under the Colours of the Lord William Montacute, and hee Knighted them: he on his knees by Monsieur de Ribamont, a hardy knight, (with whom he fought hand to hand) and yet recovered; and in the end slewe Ribamont prisoner. Charny was likewise taken, and all his Forces defeated. King Edward the night after (which was the first of the New-yeare) feasted with the Prisoners, and gave Ribamont in honour of his valour, a fayre Chaplet of Pearle, which himselfe wore on his head, (for a New-yeares gift) forgave him his ransome, and set him at liberty. But the English not long after, in the like purchase, shed better successe, and got the Castle of Guysnes, (a piece of great importance neere Callice,) for a summe of money, given to one Beaucourt a Frenchman. Of which Castle, when the French King demanded restitution in regard of the Truce, King Edward returnes answer, that for things bought and sold betweene their people, there was no exception, and so held it.

About this time Philip King of France dyed, leaving his Sonne John to succeed him; in the beginning of whose Raigne, Humbert Prince of Dauphin, dying without issue, made him his Heire, and thereupon Charles King Johns Sonne, was created the first Dauphin of France: from whence it grew to be a Custome, that the King of France his Heire should alwayes be called Dauphin of France. About this time also the Duke of Lancaster was to performe a combat, upon a challenge, with a Prince of Bohemia, but when they were entred the Lists, and had taken their Oathes, King John interposed, and made them Friends. And now when after many meanes of mediation, no Peace could be concluded betweene the two Kings; the Prince of Wales being now growne a man, is appointed by Parliament, to goe into Gascoyne with a thousand men at Armes, two thousand Archers, and a great number of Welshmen; and in June following he sets forth with three hundred Saile, attended with the Earles of Warwicke, Suffolke, Salisbury, and Oxford, the Lord Chandos, the Lord James Audeley, Sir Robert Knolles, Sir Francis Hall, with many others. About Michaelmas following, the King himselfe passeth over to Callice, with another Army, taking with him two of his Sonnes, Lionell of Antwerpe, now Earle of Ulster in Right of his Wife, and John of Gant, Earle of Richmond. There met him at Callice of mercenaries out of Germany, Flanders and Brabant, a thousand men at Armes, so that his Army consisted of three thousand men at Armes, and two thousand Archers on horse-backe, besides Archers on foot. The City of London sent three hundred men at Armes, and five hundred Archers, all in one livery, at their owne charge; but all this great Army effected nothing at that time, by reason the King of France would not be drawne to any Encounter, and had so disfurnished the Country of all provisions, that the King of England was forced to returne. King Edward solicited by the King of Navarre to aide him against the King of France, sends over the Duke of Lancaster with foure thousand men at Armes, who winnes many Townes, and the Prince enters Guyenne, passeth over Languedoc to Tholouse, Narbonne, Burges, without any Encounter, lackes, spoyles and destroyes where he goes, and loadeth with bootes returnes to Bordeaux. The French King thus assaulted on all sides, gathers all the power he possibly could, and first makes against his Enemies in Normandy, recovers many of his lost Townes, and was likely to have there prevailed, but that he was drawne of force to oppose this this fresh Invader, the Prince of Wales, who was come up into Tourayne, against whom he brings his whole Army, consisting of above threescore thousand: whereupon the Prince, whose Forces were not likely to be able to encounter him (being ten for one) was advised to retire againe to Burdeaux. But the French King, to prevent this course, followes, and within two leagues of Poytiers, hath him at a great advantage: at which instant, two Cardinals came from the Pope to mediate a Peace. But the French King supposing he had his enemy now in his mercy, would accept of no other conditions, but that the Prince should deliver him foure Hostages, and as vanquished, render himselfe and his Army to his discretion. The Prince was patient to restore unto him what he had gained upon him, but without prejudice of his honour, wherein he said he stood accomptable to his Father, and to his Country. But the French King would abate nothing of his demands, as making himselfe sure of victory; and thereupon was instantly ready to set upon the Prince: who being himselfe reduced to this straight, takes what advantage he could of the ground, and providently got the benefit of Vines, Shrubs, and Bushes, on that part where like to be assailed, to impester and intangle the French horse, which he saw were to come furiously upon him. The successe answered his expectation, for the Cavallery of his enemies upon their first assault were so wrapt and encombred amongst the Vines, that his Archers galled and annoyed them at their pleasure. For the French King, to give the honour of the day to his Cavallery, imployed them only without his Infantery; so as they being disordered and put to rout, his whole Army came utterly to be defeated. In this battell were taken prisoners, King John himselfe, with his youngest sonne Philip, by Dennis de Morbecque a knight of Arthois; Jaques de Bourbon, Conte de Ponthieu, the Arch-bishop of Sens, John de Arthois, Conte de Eu, Charles de Arthois, his brother Count de Longueville, John de Melun, Count de Tankarvile, the Counts of Vendosme, Vaudemont, Estampes, Salbourg, Dampmartin and La Roche; also John de Ceintre, accounted (as Froissard saith) the best knight of France, with many other Lords, besides two thousand Knights and Gentlemen; in so much, as the Conquerours holding it not safe to retaine so many, let many of them goe. The French, who can give best account of their owne losses, report there died in the battell, a thousand seven hundred Gentlemen, amongst which were fifty two Bannerets: the most eminent, Peter de Bourbon, the Duke of Athens Constable of France, Ethan de Clermont Marshall, Geoffrey de Charny, High Chamberlaine; the Bishop of Chalons, the Lords of Landas, of Pons, and of Chambly. There escaped from this battell, three of the French Kings sons, (for he brought them all thither) Charles Prince Daulphin, Louys after Duke of Anjou, and John Duke of Berry, all great actours in the time following. The special great men of the English in this fight, were the Earles of Warwicke, Suffolke, Salisbury, Oxford, Stafford; the Lords Cobham, Spenser, Barkeley, Basset: of Gascoynes, Le Capital de Beuff; the Lords, Pumyer, Chaumont, and others. The Lord James Audeley wonne honour both by his valour, and his bounty; for having vowed to be foremost in this fight, he performed his word, and sealed it with many wounds: for which the Prince having rewarded him with the gift of five hundred Markes Fee-simple in England, he presently gave it to foure of his Esquires; whereupon the Prince demanding whether he accepted not his gift? he answered, that these men had deserved the same as well as himselfe, and had more needs of it: with which reply the Prince was so well pleased, that he gave him five hundred Markes more in the same kinde. A rare example, where desert in the Subject, and reward in the Prince, strive which should be the greater.

And now, though King John had the misfortune to fall into the hands of his enemy, yet he had the happinesse to fall into the hands of a Noble enemy; for Prince Edw. used him with such respect and observance, that he could not find much difference betweene his captivity and liberty. After the battell, which was fought the nineteenth day of September, in the yeare 1357. Prince Edward leads King John and the captive Lords to Burdeaux, where he retaines them till the spring following, but sends present newes of his victory to his Father: who thereupon causeth a generall nerall Thanksgiving all England over eight dayes together: and in May following, King John rather comming over with the Prince, then brought over by him, is lodged at the Savoy; a Palace belonging to Henry Duke of Lancaster, and the faireſt at that time about London. And King Edward, as though he thought it honour enough to have one King his priſoner at once, at the ſuite of his ſiſter Queene Foane, he ſets her Husband David King of Scots at liberty, after he had beene priſoner in England eleven yeares, but not without paying a Ranſome, which was a hundthouſand Markes, to be paid in ten yeares.

After this, by mediation of Cardinals ſent by the Pope, a Truce for two yeares is concluded betweene the two kingdomes of France and England, and in the time of this Truce, Articles of Peace betweene the two Kings are propounded: King Edward requires the Dutchies of Normandy and Guyenne, the Counties of Poictou, Touraine, Mayne, and Anjou, with all their appurtenances as large as King Richard the firſt held them, and many other Provinces beſides; and ſo hold them all without Homage or any other ſervice; to which Articles, King John (weary of impriſonment) aſſents and ſeales, but the Dauphin and Councell of France utterly reject it: whereupon King Edward in great diſpleaſure reſolves to make an end of this worke with the ſword, and to take poſſeſſion of the kingdome of France; and leaving his younger ſonne Thomas Governour of his kingdome at home, with a Fleet of eleven hundred ſaile, and taking all the great Lords of the Realme with him, he paſſeth over to Callice, dividing his Army into three battels, whereof one he commits to the Prince of Wales, another to the Duke of Lancaſter, and the third he leads himſelfe: and firſt marching through Picardy, where he takes in many Townes, he plants his ſiege afterward before Rhetmes; but having ſpent there ſixe or ſeven weekes without effecting any thing, he paſſeth thence, and takes in the Cities of Sens & Nevers; the Dutchy of Burgoyne redeemes it ſelfe from ſpoil with paying two hundred thouſand Florens of gold: then he marcheth up to Paris, and plants his Camp within two ſmall Leagues of the Towne, where he honoured 400. Eſquires and Gentlemen with the Order of knighthood: but when Sir Walter de Manny had made a Bravado before the Gates of the City, and the King ſaw that the Dauphin would by no provocations be drawne out to battell; he raiſeth his ſiege, and returnes into Britaine to refreſh his Army; from thence he marcheth towards Chartres with a purpoſe to beſiege that City, and though great offers were made him by the French, and Commiſſioners from the Pope ſolicited him with all earneſtneſſe to accept them, yet neither they, nor the Duke of Lancaſters perſwaſions could prevaile with him, till a terrible ſtorme of haile with thunder and lightning fell upon his Army, which ſo terrified him, being a warning as it were from Heauen, that he preſently vowed to make Peace with the French King upon any reaſonable conditions, as ſhortly after he did at a Treaty of Britigny neare to Chartres, upon theſe Articles: that the Fiefs of Thouars and Belleville, the Dutchy of Guyenne, comprizing Gaſcoyne, Poictou, Saintogne, Limouſin, Perigort, Quercie, Rhodes, Angouleſme, and Rochell, together with the Counties of Guyſnes and Callice, and ſome other places, with the Homages of the Lords within thoſe Territories ſhould be to the King of England, who beſides was to have three Millions of crownes of gold; whereof ſixe hundred thouſand in hand, foure hundred thouſand the yeare following, and the reſt in two yeares after: and for this the King of England, and his ſonne the Prince of Wales, for them and their ſucceſſours for ever, ſhould renounce all their right pretended to the Crowne of France; the Dutchy of Normandy, the Countries of Touraine, Anjou, Mayne, the Homage and Soveraignty of Britaine, and the Earledome of Flanders; and within three weekes King John to be rendred at Callice at the charge of the King of England, except the expenſes of his houſe. For aſſurance of which accord, ſhould be given into his hand five and twenty of the greateſt Dukes and Lords of France for Hoſtages. The Scots not to be aided by the French King, nor the Flemmings by the Engliſh. This accord and finall Peace ſigned by both Kings, was ratified by their two eldeſt ſonnes, Edward and Charles, and ſworne unto by the Nobility of both kingdomes. The Hoſtages are delivered to King Edward, who brought brought them into England; and thereupon King John is honourably conducted to Callice, after he had remained priſoner in England neare about five yeares: but being come to Callice, he was detained there above three moneths, till the money which he was to pay in hand, could be provided; and for providing the reſt he was put to hard ſhifts, being faine to give the Jewes leave to dwell in France for twenty yeares, paying twelve Florins a man at the entry, and ſixe every yeare after. At this time the Prince by diſpenſation marries the Counteſſe of Kent, daughter to Edmund, brother to Edward the ſecond, and his Father inveſting him with the Dutchy of Aquitaine, he was now Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitaine, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Cheſter and Kent: and not long after, with the Princeſſe his wife, he paſſeth over into France, and keepes his Court at Burdeaux.

This was now the yeare 1362. and the fiftieth yeare of King Edwards age, wherein for a Jubilee, he ſhewes himſelfe extraordinarily gracious to his people, freely pardoning many offences, releſing priſoners, revoking exiles, with many other expreſſions of his love and bounty. The yeare following was famous for three Kings comming into England: John King of France, Peter King of Cyprus, and David King of Scots. The King of Cyprus came to ſolicite King Edward to joyne with other Princes in the Holy Warre, but receives onely royall entertainment and excuſes. The King of Scots came for buſineſſe and viſitation; but why the King of France came, is not ſo certaine, whether it were about taking order for his Hoſtages, or to ſatisfie King Edward for breach of ſome Articles, or elſe for love to the Counteſſe of Salisbury; or perhaps out of a deſire to let England ſee his Majeſty, being at liberty, which had beene darkened before by the cloud of captivity; but whatſoever the cauſe of his comming was, the cauſe of his ſtaying (at leaſt, of longer ſtaying then he meant) was a mortall ſickneſſe, whereof (having lien all the Winter at the Savoy) in March or Aprill following, he died; and his body convaied over into France, was buried at Saint Denis with his Anceſtours. The Prince of Wales was now growne famous all the Chriſtian world over, and the man to whom all wronged Princes ſeemed to appeale, and to flie for ſuccour: for which end there came at this time to his Court, James King of Majorque, and happened to come at a time when the Princeſſe lay in; and thereupon he and Richard King of Navarre were taken to be Godfathers to his ſonne Richard. For the like aſſiſtance alſo, there came at the ſame time to him, Peter King of Caſtile, driven out of his kingdome by the French, in favour to Peter King of Aragon: and Prince Edward, partly out of charity, to ſuccour a diſtreſſed Prince, and partly out of policy, to keepe his Souldiers in exerciſe; undertakes the enterpriſe, and was ſo proſperous in it, that with one battell, (having but thirty thouſand againſt a hundred thouſand) hee put King Peter in poſſeſſion of his kingdome, though he was ill rewarded for his labour: for the ungratefull King would not ſo much as pay his Souldiers. An unfortunate journey for the Prince, for though he came back with victory, yet he brought backe with him ſuch an indiſpoſition of body, that he was never throughly well after: not perhaps by poyſon, nor given him by his brother the Duke of Lancaſter, though both were ſuſpected; but there were cauſes of diſtempering him enough beſides, the Countrey, the ſeaſon, the action it ſelfe; and it may be more marvelled that his Souldiers came home ſo well, then that he came ſo ill; but howſoever, being now returned, there was preſently to his indiſpoſition of body, added diſcontentment of minde: for not having meanes to pay his Souldiers, which forced him to winke at that which he could not chuſe but ſee, and ſeeing, grieve at, how they preyed upon the Countrey, and thereupon how the Countrey murmured againſt him: and now to ſtop this murmuring, his Chancellour, the Biſhop of Rhodes, deviſed a new Impoſition, of leavying a Frank for every Chimney, and this to continue for five yeares, to pay the Princes debts: but this Impoſition made the murmuring the more; for though ſome part of his Dominions, as the Poictovins, Xaintonois, and Lymouſins in a fort conſented to it, yet the Count of Armeniack, the Count of Commynges, the Viſcount of Carmayn, and many others ſo much diſtaſted it, that they complained thereof to the King of France, as to their

Supreme Lord; who upon examination finding their complaint to be juſt, he thereupon, by adviſe of his Councell, Summons Prince Edward to appeare in perſon, to anſwer the complaint: whereunto Prince Edw. made anſwere, that if he muſt needs appeare, he would bring threeſcore thouſand men in Armes to appeare with him; and had certainely brought his Army that Summer againſt Paris, if he had not fallen into Symptomes of a Dropſie, which (Walſingham ſaith) was wrought by Enchantments. But upon this anſwer of the Prince, King Charles ſends defiance to King Edward; who thereupon prepares Armes both by Sea and Land to oppoſe him. The French enter upon the Territories of the Prince, and defeate divers of his Troopes; in revenge whereof, John Chandos the Princes Lieutenant, aſſaults Terrieres in the Province of Tholouſe, and takes it. The Count of Perigourd aſſaults Royanville, in Quercy, and puts all the Engliſh to the ſword; in revenge whereof, James Audeley Seneſchall of Poictou, aſſaults the City of Broſſe, and takes it. In the meane time Robert Knols, by ſome called Robin, and by others, Arnould, or Reynold Knoll, had drawne Perducas de Albert to the party of the Engliſh; and thereupon went and encamped before the Fort of Darcuell in Quercy, which John Chandos underſtanding, went alſo and joyned with him in the Siege; but finding they could doe no good there, they removed, and Beſieged the City of Damme: and when they could doe no good there neither, they marched forward, tooke the Fort of Freyns, Rochevaudour, and Villefranche; and that done, returned to the Prince at Angouleſme. At the ſame time, the Earles of Cambridge, and Pembroke, having ſpent nine weekes at the Siege of Bordeille, at laſt tooke it; but other Captaines of the Engliſh did yet more, for they ſcaled Belleperche in the Province of Bourbon, where the Mother of the Duke of Bourbon, and of the Queene of France was, and take her priſoner.

About this time, Philippa Queene of England, King Edwards Wife died, and was buried at Weſtminſter; but this hindred not the proceeding of the Engliſh in France; the Earle of Pembroke enters Anjou, where he takes many Townes: the Duke of Lancaſter doth the like about Callice, and marching forward, plants his Campe before Harfleur, with a purpoſe to burne the King of France his Navy, but being watched by the Count Saint Poll, was forced to forbeare that deſigne; and ſo paſſing other wayes, and ſpoyling all the places where he paſſed, he returned to Callice. Winter now was drawing on, and John Chandos, deſiring to recover the Abby of Saint Silvin in Poictou, which not long before had beene betraied to the French; was in the enterpriſe diſcovered, and being aſſaulted by greater forces, was ſlaine in the place, to the great griefe of the Prince of Wales, and of the Engliſh Lords: but dying without iſſue, his eſtate, which amounted to foure hundred thouſand Franks, came to the Prince. At this time, the Dukes of Anjou and Berry, with two great Armies enter upon the Territories of the Prince of Wales; whereof the Prince advertiſed, aſſembles Forces to oppoſe them: but when the newes was brought him of the taking of Limouges, he was ſo much troubled at it, by reaſon of the Biſhop of that place was his Goſſip, and one in whom he ſpecially had affiance, that he reſolved to recover it at any price, and not to ſpare a man that had any hand in the rendring it up: and thereupon taking it by force, he commanded to ſacke and pillage it, and would not be ſtaied by the cries of the people, caſting themſelves downe at his feete; till paſſing through the Towne, he perceived three French Captaines, who themſelves alone had withſtood the aſſault of his victorious Army, and moved with the conſideration of their valour, he then abated his anger; and for their ſakes, granted mercy to all the Inhabitants. So much is vertue even in an enemy, reſpected by generous minds. In the meane time, David King of Scots died without iſſue; and Robert Stuart his Nephew ſucceeded him in the kingdome, and was Crowned at Scone. At this time Robert Knolls with a great Army is ſent into France, where making many attempts, with valour enough, but with little ſucceſſe; he was comming home, though with no gaine, yet with no loſſe: till Bertrand de Gueſchlyn aſſaulting him, ſlew the moſt part of his men; and ſo this great Army on a ſudden came to nothing. It ſeemes Knolls his action was the leſſe ſucceſſfull, fully, by reaſon ſome young Lords that were with him, ſcorning to be ruled by his command, as being but a new man, and riſen from a low eſtate, were refractory to his directions: And indeed what can a Generall do, if he have not as well reputation of perſon, as of place?

And now the Prince of Wales, his eldeſt ſonne Edward dying in Burdeaux, the Princes with his wife, and his other ſonne Richard, come over into England, at which time the valliant knight Walter de Mauny died at London, and was buried in the Monaſtery of the Chartreux which he had builded; leaving one onely daughter, married to John Earle of Pembroke. This Earle of Pembroke, was ſoone after ſent Governour into Aquitaine, but ſet upon by the way by Spaniards in favour of the French; was by them taken priſoner, and carried with other into Spaine, who being chained together, as the manner is, one Evans a Welſh Fugitive, who gave himſelfe out for the right Heire of Wales; came unto him fooliſhly playing upon him with ſcornfull language, as though to inſult over another mans miſery, could ſmile for a cordiall to mitigate his owne. And now upon the taking of this Earle, the Princes Dominions in France are either taken away, or fall away faſter then they were gotten; Gueſchlyn enters Poictou, and takes Montmorillon, Chauvigny, Luſſack, and Montcontour: ſtraight after followes the Countrey of Aulnay, of Xainctoigne, and the reſt of Poictou, then Saint Maxent, Neele, Aulnay, then Benaon, Marans, Surgere, Fontenay; and at laſt they came to Thouars, where the moſt part of the Lords of Poictou that held with the Prince, were aſſembled; at which time King Edward with the Prince, the Duke of Lancaſter, and all the great Lords of England, ſet forward to their ſuccour, but being driven backe by tempeſt, never came to give them aſſiſtance, ſo as Thouars yeelded upon compoſition. Yet did this preparation of the King ſtand him in nine thouſand Markes; that it may be truly ſaid, it coſt him more now to loſe Townes, then it had coſt him before to win them: ſo great oddes there is betweene the Spring and Fall of Fortune. After this, the Duke of Lancaſter is ſent over with another great Army, who paſſed up into many parts of the Country, but King Charles reſolved to hazard no battell; ſaying, They were but clouds, and would ſoone paſſe away; yet ſo watched him, that what with light skirmiſhes, and what with ſkarcity of victuals, his forces were ſo diminiſhed, that of thirty thouſand which went out of Callice, there ſcarce returned ſix thouſand home: which made King Edward ſay of this King Charles, that he did him more miſchiefe ſitting ſtill, then his Predeceſſours had done with all their ſtirring. And now by this time all Poictou is loſt, and all Aquitaine alſo, but onely Burdeaux and Bayon: when the Archbiſhop of Roan and others, are ſent from Pope Gregory the eleventh, to mediate a Peace betweene the two Kings; but each of them ſtanding upon high termes of conditions, nothing could be effected but Truce upon Truce, for two or three yeares together. In which time Edward Prince of Wales died, and with him we may ſay, the Fortune of England; being a Prince ſo full of vertues, that he left no place for any vice; and if he had lived in the Heroicke times, might well have beene numbred amongſt the nine Worthies. His body was buried at Canterbury, where his Monument ſtandeth. King Edward in his ſeven and fortieth yeare calleth a Parliament at Weſtminſter, which laſted but eight dayes; and to which were Summoned by Writ, of Clergy men onely foure Biſhops, and five Abbots.

Of King Edwards Acts after the death of the Prince.

IN the time of the Princes ſickneſſe, King Edward cals a Parliament at Weſtminſter, in which, when demands were made for ſupply of the King, demands were preſently made for redreſſe of grievances for the ſubjects. It was required that the Duke of Lancaſter, the Lord Latymer then Lord Chamberlaine, Dame Alice Pierce the Kings Concubine, and one Sir Richard Sturry might be removed from Court. And this was ſo vehemently urged by their Speaker, Sir Peter la Moore, that the King, rather then not to be ſupplied, gave way unto it; and thereupon all theſe perſons are preſently put from Court: but the Prince ſoone after dying, they are are all recalled to Court againe, and restored to their former places.

About this time exemplary justice was done upon Sir John Minsterworth knight, who was drawne, hanged, and quartered at Tiburne, for Treason, by him committed, in defrauding Souldiers of their wages.

This was now the fiftieth yeare of King Edwards Raigne, and he for another Jubilee, grants another generall pardon to his subjects, onely William Wickham Bishop of Winchester is excepted, being lately by preferment of the Duke of Lancaster, fallen into the Kings displeasure, and forbidden to come to the Parliament. This Parliament was called the good Parliament, though it wrought ill effects; for Sir Peter de la Mare, at the suite of Alice Pierce, is committed to perpetuall imprisonment at Nottingham, though within two yeares after, by importunate suite of friends, he regained his liberty. This Alice Pierce presuming upon the Kings favour, grew so insolent, that she entermedled with Courts of Justice, and other Offices, where she herselfe would fit, to countenance her Causes. And now the Duke of Lancaster is come to have the Regencie, and to manage all the affaires of the kingdome; but King Edward to prevent the mischiefes, which by disordering the succession might grow in the kingdome, providently settled the same in Parliament upon Richard of Burdeaux, creating him first Earle of Chester and Cornwall, and then Prince of Wales; and caused all the Lords of the Realme to take an Oath, to accept him for their King, as his lawfull Heire, when himselfe should be dead. In this meane time a Treaty was had about a marriage betweene this Prince Richard and Mary a daughter of Charles King of France: and an offer was made to King Edward, to leave him foureteene hundred Townes, and three thousand fortresses in Aquitaine, upon condition he would render Calice and all that he held in Picardy; but before any thing could be concluded, King Edward died.

Of his Taxations.

IN the eighth yeare of his Raigne, in a Parliament holden at London, there was granted him a fifteenth of the Temporalty, a twentieth of the Cities and Boroughs, and a tenth of the Clergy. In his tenth yeare, in a Parliament at Northampton, is granted a tenth penny of Cities and Boroughs, a fifteenth of others, and a tenth of the Clergy. Also all such treasure as was committed to Churches through England for the Holy Warre, is taken out for the Kings use, towards his warres with France. The next yeare after, all the goods of three orders of Monks, Lombards, Cluniakes, and Cistercians, are likewise seised into the Kings hands: and the like Subsidy as before granted at Nottingham. In his twelfth yeare (and as some write, in absence of the King) in a Parliament at Northampton, is granted by the Laity, one halfe of their Woolls, but of the Clergy the whole. The next yeare after a fifteenth was likewise paid in Woll by the Commonalty. In his foureteenth yeare, in a Parliament at London, is granted him for Custome of every sacke of Woolls forty shillings, for every three hundred Woolls Fells forty shil. for every Last of Leather forty shillings; and of other Merchandises according to the rate: the same to endure from that Easter to the Whitsontide twelve moneth after. Besides, there was granted of Citizens and Burgesses, a ninth part of goods; of forraine Merchants and others, a fifteenth; of Husbandmen, the ninth Sheafe, the ninth Fleece, the ninth Lamb for two yeares; also another tenth of the Clergy: and for his present supply, he had Loanes of divers persons; and the City of London lent twenty thousand Markes. For the grant of which mighty Subsidy, the King (besides his Pardon to divers kinds of offendours) remits all Amerciaments for transgressions in his Forests, Reliefs and Scutage, to the first time of his going into Flanders, besides all aides for the marriage of his sonnes and daughters during his Raigne; pardoning and remitting all ancient debts and arrerages, both of his Fermors and others, till the tenth yeare of his Raigne; and likewise confirmes the great Charter of Magna Charta. In his eighteenth yeare, in a Parliament at London, a tenth was granted by the Clergy, and a fifteenth by the Laity. Besides a Commission is sent into every Shire to inquire of mens abilities, and all of five pounds to tenne of Lay Fee, were appointed to finde an Archer on horsebacke; of twenty five, a Demilaunce; and so ratably above. There had formerly been made a certaine coyne of Gold called the Floren, of base alloy, for the Kings benefit, towards his warres in France, but this was now called in; and Nobles of finer metall coyned, to the great contentment of the people. In his nine and twentieth yeare, he hath by Parliament granted unto him fifty shillings upon every sack of Wooll, for six years next ensuing; by which Imposition, it was thought, the King might dispend a thousand Markes Sterling a day, the vent of Wooll was so great in that time. But that which exceeded all his Taxations, was the Ransome he had in his foure and thirtieth yeare, of the King of France, three millions of crownes of Gold. In his thirty seventh yeare, he had taken from the Priors Aliens, their houses, lands, and tenements, for the maintenance of his French warres, which he kept twenty yeares in his hands, and then restored them againe. In his six and thirtieth year was greater twenty six shillings eight pence, for transportation of every sacke of Wooll for three yeares. In the five and fortieth yeare of his Raigne, in a Parliament at Westminster, the Clergy granted him fifty thousand pounds to be paid the same yeare, and the Laity as much; which was levied by setting a certaine rate of five pounds fifteene shillings upon every Parish, which were found in the 37. Shires to be eight thousand and five hundred, and so came in the whole to fifty thousand one hundred eighty one pounds and eight pence: but the 181. li. was abated to the Shires of Suffolke and Devonshire, in regard of their poverty. In his eight and fortieth yeare, in a Parliament, is granted him a tenth of the Clergy, & a fifteenth of the Laity. In his fiftieth year, a Subsidy of a new nature was demanded by the young Prince Richard, whom (being but eleven years of age) the Duke of Lancaster had brought into the Parliament of purpose to make the demand; to have two tenths to be paid in one yeare, or twelve pence in the pound of all Merchandises sold, for one yeare, and one pound of silver for every knights Fee, and of every Fire-house, one penny: but instead of this Subsidy, after much altercation, there was granted another of as new a nature as this; that every person, man and woman, within the kingdome, above the age of foureteene yeares, should pay foure pence, (those who lived of Almes onely excepted) the Clergy to pay twelve pence of every Parson Beneficed, and of all other religious persons foure pence; a mighty aide, and such as was never granted to any King of England before.

Of his Lawes and Ordinances.

HE instituted the Order of the Garter, upon what cause is not certaine; the common opinion is, that a Garter of his owne queene, or (as some say) of the Lady Joane Countesse of Salisbury, slipping off in a Dance, King Edward stooped and tooke it up; whereat some of his Lords that were present, smiling, as at an amorous action; he seriously said, it should not be long ere Soveraigne honour should be done to that Garter; whereupon he afterward added the French Motto, Honi soit qui mal y pense; therein checking his Lords sinister suspition. Some conjecture that he instituted the Order of the Garter, for that in a battell wherein he was victorious, he had given the word Garter, for the word or signe: and some againe are of opinion, that the institution of this Order is more ancient, and begunne by King Richard the first, but that this King Edward adorned it, and brought it into splendour. The number of the knights of this Order is twenty five, whereof the King himselfe is alwayes one, and president, and their Feast yearely celebrated at Windsor on Saint Georges day, the Tutelar Saint of that Order. The lawes of the Order are many, whereof there is a booke of purpose. In the five and thirtieth yeare of his Raigne, he was earnestly Petitioned by a Parliament then holden, that the great Charter of Liberties, and the Charter of Forests might be duly observed, and that the great Officers of the kingdome should (as in former times) be elected by Parliament: to which Petition, though the King at first stood stiffe upon upon his owne Election and Prerogative; yet at last (in regard to have his present turne served, (as himselfe after confessed) he yeelded, that such Officers should receive an Oath in Parliament, to doe justice to all men in their Offices: and thereupon a Statute was made and confirmed with the Kings Seale, both for that and many other Grants of his to his Subjects, which notwithstanding were for the most part shortly after revoked.

This King also causeth all Pleas, which were before in French, to be made in English, that the Subject might understand the course of the Law. Also in his time an Act was passed for Purveyours, that nothing should be taken up but for ready money, upon strict punishment. In the next Parliament holden the seven and thirtieth yeare of his Raigne, certaine Sumptuary Lawes were ordained, both for apparell and diet; appointing every degree of men, the stuffe and habits they should weare, prohibiting the wearing of gold and silver, silkes and rich furres to all, but eminent persons. The labourer and husbandman is appointed but one meale a day, and what meates he shall eate. Also in his time, at the instance of the Londoners, an Act was made that no common Whore should weare any Hood, except striped with divers colours, nor Furres, but Garments reversed the wrong side outward. This King also was the first that created Dukes, of whom Henry of Bullingbrooke, Earle of Lancaster, created Duke of Lancaster in the seven and twentieth yeare of his Raigne, was the first. But afterward he erected Cornwall also into a Dukedy, and conferred it upon the Prince: after which time, the Kings eldest sonne used alwayes to be Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester. This King altered monies, and abated them in weight, & yet made them to passe according to the former value. Before his time, there were no other peeces but Nobles and halfe Nobles, with the small peeces of Silver, called Sterlings; but now Groats of foure pence, and halfe Groats of two pence, equivalent to the Sterling money, are coyned, which inhaunsed the prises of things, that rise or fall, according to the plenty or scarcity of coyne, which made Servants and Labourers to rule their wages accordingly. Whereupon a Statute was made in the Parliament now held at Westminster, to reduce the same to the former rate. Also an Act was made in this Kings time, that all Weares, Mils, and other stoppages of Rivers, hindering the passage of Boats, Lighters, and other Vessels, should be removed; which though it were most commodious to the kingdome, yet it tooke little effect, by reason of bribing and corrupting Lords and great men, who regarded more their owne private, then the publike benefit. In a Parliament holden the tenth yeare of his Raigne, it was enacted that no Woolls growing within the Realme should be transported, but that it should be made in Cloath in England. Peter-pence are forbidden by the King, to be paid any more to Rome. The custome of washing poore mens feete on Maundy-Thursday, thought to have beene first brought in by this King.

Affaires of the Church in his Time.

KING Edward upon some displeasure had imprisoned divers Clergy men; whereupon John Stratford Arch-bishop of Canterbury writes him a Letter, charging him with violation of the Rights of the Church, and with the breach of Magna Charta; and after much good counsell given him, threatens, that if he amend not these disorders, he must and will exercise his Ecclesiasticall authoritie, and proceed to Excommunication of his Officers, though not of himselfe, Queen, or children. The King answers, and sends his Letter to the Bishop of London; charging the Arch-bishop to be the cause of all this disturbance, having beene the man that first set him upon the warre with France, assuring him he should want no money, and now had beene the hinderance, that monies given him by Parliament, were not duly levied: and after many remonstrances to such purpose, concludes, that if he desisted not from his rebellious obstinacie, he would use his Temporall authority, and proceed against him as against a Rebell. But this difference betweene them was not long after, upon the Arch-bishops submission, reconciled.

And

And indeed the great account which this King made of Clergy men, may appeare by his imploying almost none but Clergy men in all his Offices of account. Simon Langham Arch-bishop of Canterbury, was Chancellour of England; William Wickam Arch-deacon of Lincolne, keeper of the Privy Seale; David Wriller Parson of Somerham, Master of the Rolles; ten Beneficed Priests, Civilians, Masters of the Chancery; William Mulso Deane of Saint Martins le Grand, chiefe Chamberlaine of the Exchequer, Receiver and keeper of the Kings Treasure and Jewels; William Ashby Arch-deacon of Northampton, Chancellour of the Exchequer; William Dighton Prebendary of Saint Martins, Clerke of the Privy Seale; Richard Chesterfield Prebend of Saint Stephens, Treasurer of the Kings house; Henry Snaith Parson of Oundell, Master of the Kings Wardrobe; John Newnham Parson of Feuny-stanton, one of the Chamberlaines of the Exchequer; John Rousby Parson of Harwicke, Surveyor and Controller of the Kings workes; Thomas Brittingham Parson of Asby, Treasurer of the King, for the parts of Guisnes, and the Marches of Callice; John Troy a Priest, Chancellour of Ireland.

In the seventeenth yeare of his Raigne, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, complaint is made of the great inconvenience that came by the Popes Collation of Benefices in England, conferring them upon Strangers who understood not the Language, and therefore not fit to be Pastours over a Flocke they could not feede: and hereupon Sir John Shordith is sent to Pope Clement the sixth, to require him to forbeare such Collations, and to signifie his consent therein: but this Message was answered with welcome to the Pope, that the Messenger came backe, unheard, at least unanswered: and the King taking his silence for consent, or perhaps not much caring whether he consented or no, proceeded to a Prohibition of all such Collations within his Realme, on paine of Imprisonment, or death, to whomsoever should in time to come, present or admit any such person, who by the Pope were preferred to the prejudice of the Kings Prerogative. These were disturbances in matter of Discipline; but towards the end of his Raigne, there fell a disturbance in matter of Doctrine, for a certaine Divine, named John Wickliffe, inveighted in his Sermons and other Acts in the Schooles, against the abuses of Churchmen, Monks, and other religious Orders, and had by his Doctrine wonne many Disciples unto him, (who after were called Lollards) professing poverty, going bare-foot, and poorely clad in Russet; amongst other his Doctrines, he taught that neither King nor other secular Lord, could give any thing in perpetuity unto Church-men, and that Temporall Lords, if they needed, might lawfully take the Goods of Religious persons to relieve them in their necessities, by the example of William Rufus, and others. Thisphan, the Duke of Lancaster, and Sir Henry Percy Marshall, much favoured and cherished him, extolling him for his learning and integrity of life; which made him so bold to presume, that daily in one Church or other, he published his Opinions. Whereupon at length he is cited to answer before the Arch-bishop, the Bishop of London and others in Paules. At the day appointed, the Duke of Lancaster and the Lord Marshall goe to conduct him; when they were come to our Ladies Chappell, the Duke and Barons with the Bishops sitting downe, John Wickliffe was by the Lord Marshall willed to sit downe, in regard (he said) the man had much to answer, and needed a convenient seat. The Bishop of London told him, It was against all Law and Reason, that he who was there cited before his Ordinary should sit. Hereupon contumelious words arose betweene the Lord Marshall and the Bishop, the Duke takes the Marshals part, and sharply reprehended the Bishop; the Bishop returnes the like to the Duke, who in a great rage swore he would pull downe the pride of him, and of all the Bishops of England, and whispering in his eare, told him he had rather pull him out of the Church by the haire of the head, then to suffer such indignities; which words, the Londoners (who were then assembled in great numbers) hearing, swore with a loud voyce, they would rather lose their lives then ever suffer their Bishop to be thus injuriously used. Their fury was the more against the Duke, for that the day before in the Parliament (whereof he was President) it was inquired in the Kings name, that from thenceforth there should be no more a

Major

Major of London, but a Captaine appointed for the Government of the City, and that the Lord Marshall of England should arrest Offenders within the Liberties, as in other places. The morrow after the Citizens assembling to consult of this businesse, it happened the Lord Fitz-water, and Guido Bryan, came into the City; which the People seeing, furiously ranne upon them, and were like to beate them downe for comming at that time. The Lord Fitz-water protested, he came to no other end, but to offer his service to the City, being by inheritance their Standard bearer, and was to take injuries offered to them, as to himselfe; and therefore willed them to looke to their defence. Whereupon they presently take Armes, assaile the Marshals Inne, breake open the Gates, brought forth a Prisoner, in his Gives, and set him at liberty, but found not the Lord Marshall, who with the Duke, was that day to dine with one John de Ipres. Then this furious multitude ranne to assaile the Savoy; which a knight of the Dukes seeing, hasted to the place where his Lord dined, and acquaints him with this uproare in the City. The Duke upon hearing it, leapes from the Table so hastily, that he hurt both his thinnes on the fowrme; and with Sir Henry Percy alone takes boate and goes to Kennington neare Lambeth, where the Princesse with the young Prince lay: to whom he complaines of this Riot, and the violence offered him. In the meane time the multitude comming to the Savoy, a Priest inquisitive to know the businesse, was answered, they went to take the Duke and the Lord Marshall, and compell them to deliver Sir Peter de la Mare, unjustly kept in Prison. The Priest replyed, that Sir Peter was a Traytor to the King, and worthy to be hanged. At which words they all cryed out, This is Percy, This is the Traytor of England, his speech bewrayes him, though his Apparell be disguised, and presently they ran upon him, and wounded him to death. The Bishop of London hearing of this outrage, leaves his dinner, hastes to the Savoy, admonisheth them of the holy time being Lent; assuring them all should be fairely ended for the good of the City with whole perswasions they were somewhat pacified; but yet they tooke the Dukes Armes, and hung them up reversed, in signe of Treason, in all the principall streets of the City. Upon the Princesses advice, the chiefe Citizens send to the sicke King, to excuse this tumult; saying, it was not in their power to suppresse it, the Commonalty being in commotion, upon an information that their Liberties should be taken from them by Parliament. The King told them, it never was in his thought to infringe their liberties, but he rather desired to enlarge them. But this affront of the Citizens would not downe with the Duke, till he had pulled downe some of the Principall of them; for he caused the Major and Aldermen to be displaced, and other put in their roomes: a revenge he had better beene without, for he never had the love of the City after: and to want their love is a kind of banishment. Wickliffe himselfe, censured by the Bishops to abjure his Opinions, chose rather to leave his Country then his Doctrine, and going over into Bohemia, was there much honoured while he lived, and hath beene more since he dyed, at least a great part of his Doctrine continues in veneration amongst that people to this day.

Workes of piety done by him, or by others in his time.

HIs workes of Piety were great and many, as the Founding of East Minster, an Abbey (of the Cisteaux Order) neare the Tower. An Abbey for Nunnes at Dertford in Kent. The Kings Hall in Cambridge for poore Schollers. An Hospitall for the poore at Callice. He conferred upon the University of Oxford, where he had himselfe beene trained up, under the learned Walter Burley, the chiefe rule of the City, subordinating the Major and Citizens to the Chancellour of the University. He Built Saint Stephens Chappel at Westminster, with the endowment of 300. pound per annum. He augmented the Chappell at Windsore, and made provisions there for Church-men, and foure and twenty poore knights. These were his publicke workes; But besides these, his private Buildings were, the Castle of Windsore, which he re-edified and enlarged, the Castle at Quinborough, Fortifications at Callis

Callis and other places. His Queen Philippa founded Queens Colledge in Oxford: and Mary Countesse of Pembroke, the Colledge called Pembroke Hall in Cambridge. In this Kings time Sir John Poultney Major of London, built the Colledge in London called Saint Laurence Poultney, and little Alhallowes, a Parish Church in Thames street, and also the Carmelite Friers Church in Coventry. Henry Earle of Lancaster and Leycester, founded the new Hospitall by the Castle of Leycester, wherein a hundred poore impotent people were provided for with all things necessary. William Elsing Mercer of London, made a new Hospitall of an old house of Nunnes by Cripplegate, and placing Chanons Regular there, he became the first Prior thereof. Walter Stapleton Bishop of Exeter, Founded Exeter Colledge, and Hart Hall in Oxford. William Bateman Bishop of Norwich, builded Trinity Hall in Cambridge. Simon Islip Arch-bishop of Canterbury, Founded Canterbury Colledge in Oxford. William Edendon Treasurer of England, Founded the Monastery of Edendon; the religious brethren whereof were called Bonhommes. Sir Walter de Manny, borne in Cambray, purchased a piece of ground called Spittle Croft, containing thirteene Acres, without the barres of West Smithfield, and caused the same to be enclosed, where he built a Chappell, and after Founded the same to be a house of Charter-house Monkes. Humphrey Bohun Earle of Hereford and Essex, re-edified the Augustine Friers Church in London, and was buried in the Quire there. In the two and thirtieth yeare of this Kings Raigne, John Stody Major of London, gave unto the Vintners of London all the Quadrant where the Vintners Hall now standeth, with the Tenements round about, from the lane to this day called Studis lane, where are Founded three ne houses for thirteene poore people, which are there kept of charity. Also in this Kings time Sir John Cobham Founded the Colledge of Cobham in Kent. John Lovekin foure times Major of London, builded at Kingston upon Thames, where he was borne, a Chappell called Magdalens, to the which he joyned an Hospitall, wherein was a Master, two Priests, and certaine poore men: and for that the Parish Church of Saint Michael by Crooked-lane, where he dwelled, was a very homely thing, and the ground thereabout a filthy plot, by reason of the Burchers in Eastcheape, who made the same their lay-stall; he on the same ground builded the faire new Parish Church of Saint Michael now standing, and was buried there in the middle of the Quire, under a faire Tombe of stone. He also Foundded a Colledge to the same Church, neare thereunto adjoyning. John Barnes Major of London, gave a Chest with three locks, and a thousand Markes to be lent to young men, upon security, so that it passed not one hundred Markes; and for the occupying thereof, if he were learned, to say at his pleasure, De Profundis, for the soule of John Barnes; if he were not learned, to say Pater Noster: but howsoever the money is lent, the Chest at this day standeth in the Chamber of London, without money or pledges. Thomas of Woodstocke, the youngest sonne of King Edward, Founded a Colledge at Playsie in Essex, where in his life he had provided a sumptuous Tombe, where he was first laid, but translated afterward to Westminster.

Casualties happening in his time.

IN the the two and twentieth yeare of his Raigne, a contagious Pestilence arose in the East and South parts of the world, and spread it selfe over all Christendome, and comming at last into England, it so wasted the people, that scarce the tenth person of all sorts was left alive. There died in London (some say in Norwich) betweene the first of January, and the first of July, 57374. persons: In Yarmouth, in one yeare, 7052. men and women: before which time, the Parsonage there was worth 200. Markes a yeare, and afterwards was scarce worth forty pounds a yeare. This Plague beganne in London about Alhallontide, in the yeare 1348. and continued till the yeare 1357. Where it was observed, that those who were borne after the beginning of this mortality, had but twenty eight teeth, where before they had two and thirty. In the twelveth yeare of his Raigne, a sudden inundation of water, at New-castle upon Tyne, bare downe a piece of the Towne wall, wall, and sixe pearches in length, neare to a place called Walkenew, where a hundred and twenty men and women were drowned. In the five and thirtieth yeare of his Raigne, another Pestilence happened in England, which was called the second Pestilence, in which died Henry Duke of Lancaster, also Reginold Lord Cobham, and Walter Fitz-warren, two famous men; and five Bishops, of Worcester, of London, of Ely, of Lincolne, and of Chichester. In this Kings time, a Frost lasted from the midst of September, to the moneth of Aprill. In the fourth yeare of his Raigne, a solemne Justing or Turnament was holden at London in Cheapside, betwixt the great Crosse and the great Conduit, nigh Soper-lane, which lasted three dayes, where the Queen Philippa, with many Ladies, fell from a stage, set up for them to behold the Justing; and though they were not hurt at all, yet the King threatned to punish the Carpenters for their negligence, till the Queene interced pardon for them upon her knees: as indeed she was alwayes ready to doe all good offices of mercie to all people. In the eleventh yeare of his Raigne was so great plenty, that a quarter of Wheate was sold at London for two shillings, a fat Oxe for a Noble, a fat Sheepe for sixe pence, and sixe Pigeons for a penny, a fat Goose for two pence, and a Pigge for a penny, and other things after that rate.

HE married Philippa, the daughter of William Earle of Haynolt at Yorke, a match made up in haste by Queene Isabell his mother, for her owne ends, although a better could never have beene made upon deliberation for King Edward, ends: for though her Parentage were not great, and her portion lesse, yet she made amends for both, in vertue, for never King had a better Wife. By her King Edward had seven sonnes and five daughters: his eldest sonne Edward Prince of Wales, and commonly called the Blacke Prince, (but why so called uncertaine: for to say, of his dreadfull acts, as Speede saith, hath little probability) was borne at Woodstocke, in the third yeare of his Fathers Raigne; he married Joane, the daughter of Edmund Earle of Kent, brother by the Fathers side to King Edward the second. She had beene twice married before; first to the valiant Earle of Salisbury, from whom she was divorced: next to the Lord Thomas Holland, after whose decease, this Prince passionately loving her, married her: by her he had issue two sonnes, Edward the eldest, borne at Angoulesme, who died at seven yeares of age; and Richard borne at Burdeaux, who after his Father, was Prince of Wales, and after his Grandfather King of England. This Prince had also naturall issue, Sir John Sounder, and Roger Clarendon Knights; the latter being attainted in the Raigne of King Henry the fourth, is thought to have beene Ancestour to the house of Smiths in Essex. He died at Canterbury, in the sixe and fortieth yeare of his age, and of his Fathers Raigne, the nine and fortieth, and was buried at Christs Church there. His second sonne William was borne at Hatfield, in Hertfordshire, who deceased in his childhood, and was buried at Yorke. His third sonne Lyonell was borne at Antwerpe, in the twelveth yeare of his Fathers Raigne; he married first Elizabeth, the daughter and Heire of William Burgh, Earle of Ulster in Ireland; in whose Right he was first created Earle of Ulster: and because he had with her the honour of Clare, in the County of Tommond, he was in a Parliament, created Duke of Clarence, as it were of the Country about the Towne and Honour of Clare, from which Durchy, the name of Clarentieux (being the title of the King of Armes, for the South parts of England) is derived. This Duke had issue by her one onely daughter, named Philippa, afterward wife of Edmund Mortimer, Earle of March, mother of Earle Roger, Father of Anne Countesse of Cambridge, the mother of Richard Duke of Yorke, Father of King Edward the fourth. The second marriage of this Duke was at Millaine in Lombardy, with the Lady Violanta, daughter of Galeacto the second Duke thereof; but through intemperance he lived not long after. King Edwards fourth sonne named John, was borne at Gaunt, in the fourteenth yeare of his Fathers Raigne; he had three wives, the first was Blanch, daughter and Coheire, and in the end the sole Heire

Heire of Henry Duke of Lancaster, sonne of Edmund, sirnamed Crouch back; by whom he had issue, Henry of Bullingbrooke Earle of Derby, after Duke of Hereford, and lastly King of England, named Henry the fourth, who first placed the Crowne in the house of Lancaster. By her also John of Gaunt had two daughters, Philip wife of John the first, King of Portugall; and Elizabeth married first to John Holland, Earle of Huntington, and after him, to Sir John Cornwall, Baron of Fanhope. John of Gaunts second wife was Constance, the eldest daughter of Peter King of Castile and Leon, in whose Right, for the time he intitled himselfe King of both those Realmes: by her he had issue one onely daughter named Katherine, married to Henry the third, sonne of King John, in possession before, and in her Right after King of both the said Realmes. John of Gaunts third wife was Katherine, the Widow of Sir Hugh Swinford, a knight of Lincolnshire, eldest daughter and Coheire of Payn Roet, a Gascoyne, called Guien King of Armes for that Countrey; his younger daughter being married to Sir Geoffrey Chawcer, our Laureat Poet. By her he had issue born before matrimony, and made legitimate afterward by Parliament, in the twentieth yeare of King Richard the second; John Earle of Somerset, Thomas Duke of Exeter, Henry Bishop of Winchester, and Cardinall, and Joane (who was first married to Robert Ferrers Baron of Wemme, and Ouesley, in the Counties of Salop and Warwicke) and secondly, to Ralph Nevill, the first Earle of Westmerland. She and all her brethren were sirnamed Beaufort, of a Castle which the Duke had in France, whose they were all borne, and in regard thereof, bare the Portcullis of a Castle for the Cognisance of their Family. This Duke in the thirteenth yeare of his Nephew King Richard was created Duke of Aquitaine, but in his sixteenth yeare he was called home, and this title re-called; and the third yeare after, in the sixtieth of his age, he died at Ely house in Holbourne, and lieth honourably Entombed in the Quire of Saint Paul. King Edwards fifth sonne Edmund, sirnamed of Langley, was first in the yeare 1362. created Earle of Cambridge, and afterward in the yeare 1386. made Duke of Yorke; he married Isabell, daughter and Coheire to Peter, King of Castile and Leon: his sonne Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke, tooke to wife Anne Mortimer, Heire of the foresaid Lyonell, elder brother to Edmund of Langley. King Edwards sixth sonne William, sirnamed of Windsor, where he was borne, died young, and is buried at Westminster. King Edwards youngest sonne Thomas, sirnamed of Woodstocke, where he was borne, was first Earle of Buckingham, and after made Duke of Glocester by his Nephew King Richard the second. He was a man of valour and wisdome, but the King surmizing him to be a too severe observer of his doings, consulted with Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolke, how to make him away: whom Mowbray unawares surprising, conveied secretly to Callice, where he was strangled the twentieth yeare of King Richards Raigne. He had issue one sonne, Humphrey Earle of Buckingham, who died at Chester of the Pestilence, in the yeare 1400. and two daughters, Anne married first to Edmund Earle of Stafford, by whom he had Humphrey Duke of Buckingham; secondly to William Bourchier Earle of Eue, by whom she had Henry Earle of Essex, and Joane married to Gylbert Lord Talbot, and had issue by him a daughter, who died young. Of King Edwards daughters, the eldest named Isabell, was married at Windsor to Ingelram of Guysnes, Lord of Coucy, Earle of Soysons, and after Arch-duke of Austria; created also by King Edward, Earle of Bedford: by whom she was mother of two daughters; Mary married to Henry Duke of Barre, and Philip married to Robert de Vere Earle of Oxford, Duke of Ireland, and Marquesse of Dublyn. This Robert in the height of his fortunes forsooke his Lady Philip, and married one Lancerona a Joyners daughter (as was said) which came with King Richard the seconds wife out of Bohemia; and being for abusing the Kings eare, driven out of the Land by the Lords, he died at London in extreame poverty in the yeare 1392. Isabell his wives mother, was buried in the Church of Friers Minorites neare Aldgate in London. King Edwards second daughter Joane was married by Proxie to Alphonsus, King of Castile and Leon, but passing into Spaine, died by the way; and King Alphonsus met her, instead of consummating his Espousall, to solemnise her Funerall. His third daughter Blanch died died young. His fourth named Mary, was married to John Montford Duke of Britaine. His youngeſt named Margaret, borne in Callice, was the firſt wife of John de Haſtings, Earle of Pembroke, but died without iſſue.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

HE was of ſtature indifferent tall, of ſparkling eyes, of a comely and manly countenance, in his later time ſomething bald; and concerning his conditions, no man was more gentle, where there was ſubmiſſion; where oppoſition, no man more ſterne. He was a Prince no leſſe of his paſſions, then of his people; for he was never ſo loving, as to be fond; nor ever ſo angry, as to be inexorable: but this muſt be underſtood of the time while he was a man, for in his old age, when he came to be a childe againe, he was Prince of neither. He was no leſſe fortunate then valiant; and his fortunatenes was the greater by a kind of Antiperiſtaſis, as comming betweene two unfortunate Princes; Succeſſour to one, and Predeceſſour to another. He was of ſo warlike a diſpoſition, that his very ſports were warlike; for no delights were ſo frequent with him as Juſts and Tournaments. To ſhew his devotion, one example may be ſufficient, for when neither Cardinals nor Counſellours could move him to make peace with France, a tempeſt from Heaven did it; to which may be added, that he never wanne great battell, of which he wanne many, but he preſently gave the glory of it to God by publike Thankſgiving. He outlived the beſt wife, and the beſt ſonne that ever King had; and to ſay the truth, he out-lived the beſt of himſelfe, for his later years were not anſwerable to his former.

Of his Death and Buriall.

KING Edward beſides his being old, and worne with the labours of warre, had other cauſes that haſtened his end: his griefe for the loſſe of ſo worthy a ſonne, dead but tenne moneths before; his griefe for the loſſe of all benefit of his conqueſts in France, of all which he had little now left, but onely Callice: and oppreſſed thus in body and minde, he was drawing his laſt breath, when his Concubine Alice Pierce packing away what ſhe could catch, even to the Rings of his fingers, left him; and by her example, other of his attendants, ſeaſing on what they could come by, ſhift away; and all his Counſellours and others forſooke him, when he moſt needed them, leaving his Chamber quite empty; which a poore Prieſt in the houſe ſeeing, he approaches to the Kings Bed-ſide, and finding him yet breathing, cals upon him to remember his Saviour, and to aske mercie for his offences, which none about him before would doe: but now moved by the voyce of this Prieſt, he ſhewes all ſignes of contrition, and at his laſt breath expreſſes the name of Jeſus. Thus died this victorious King at his Manor at Sheene, (now Richmond) the one and twentieth day of June, in the yeare 1377. in the ſixty fourth yeare of his age, having Raigned fifty yeares, foure moneths, and odde dayes. His body was conveyed from Sheene by his foure ſonnes and other Lords, and ſolemnly interred within Weſtminſter Church, where he hath his Monument, and whereit is ſaid, the ſword he uſed in battell, is yet to be ſeene, being eight pound in weight, and ſeven foote in length.

Of Men of Note in his time.

MArtiall men were never more plentifull then in this Kings Raigne: whether it were that the Starres have an influence to produce ſuch men at one time more then another: or whether it were that Regis ad exemplum, the Kings example made his ſubjects like himſelfe: or laſtly, that his continuall exerciſe of Armes put them as it were into a mould of fortitude. The firſt of this kinde, is worthily Edward the Blacke Prince, and ſo worthily the firſt, that Longe erit à primo quiſque ſecundus erit. Next him is Henry Earle of Lancaſter, the Princes right hand, in all his great atchieve-ments: then William the valiant Earle of Salisbury, then John Eure, Anceſtor to the Lord Eures that now liveth; then follow the Lord John Chandos, Sir James Audeley, Sir Walter de Manny, Sir Robert Knolls, then Sir John Hawkewood born in Eſſex, who though not much honoured at home, having been a Taylour, yet in forrain parts, and eſpecially in Italy ſo famous, that his Statue was erected in publike, for a Monument to teſtifie his valour to poſterity. And here muſt not be forgotten, Robert Venile a knight, a Norfolke man; who when the Scots and Engliſh were ready to give battell, a certaine ſtout Champion of great ſtature, commonly called Tournboll, comming out of the Scots Army, and challenging any Engliſh man to meete him in a ſingle combate; this Robert Venile accepteth the challenge, and marching towards the Champion, and meeting by the way a certaine blacke Maſtiffe Dogge which waited on the Champion, he ſuddenly with his ſword cut him off at the loynes, and afterwards did more to the Champion himſelfe, cutting his head from off his ſhoulders. And as there was this great plenty of Martiall men, ſo there was no leſſe plenty of learned men; John Baconthorpe borne in Norfolke, a Carmelite Frier, who wrote divers excellent Treatiſes in Divinity; Nicholas Trivet born alſo in Norfolke: a blackFrier, who wrote two Hiſtories, and a book of Annals: Richard Stradley, born in the Marches of Wales, a Monk and a Divine, who wrote divers excellent Treatiſes of the Scriptures: William Herbert a Welſhman, and a Frier Minor, who wrote many good Treatiſes in Divinity: Tho. Walleis a DominicanFrier, and a writer of many excellent books: John Everſden a Monk of Bury in Suffolk, an Hiſtoriographer: Walter Burley a Doctor of Divinity, brought up in Martin Colledge in Oxford, who wrote divers excellent Treatiſes in Naturall and Morall Philoſophy, which remaine in eſtimation to this day; and who for the great fame of his learning, had the honour to be one of the Inſtructours of Edward the blacke Prince: Roger of Cheſter, a Monke of that City, and an Hiſtoriographer: John Burgh a Monke, who wrote a Hiſtory, and alſo divers Homilies: Richard Aungervill Biſhop of Durham, and Lord Chancellour of England, borne in Suffolke: Walter Heminford, an Hiſtoriographer: Richard Chicheſter a Monke of Weſtminſter, who wrote an excellent Chronicle from the yeare 449. to the yeare 1348. Richard Rolle, alias Hampole, who writ many excellent Treatiſes in Divinity: Robert Holcot a blacke Frier, borne in Northampton, a learned Schooleman, and wrote many bookes in Arguments of Divinity: Thomas Bradwardin, borne neare Chicheſter in Suſſex, Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, and who wrote againſt the Pelagians, and for his depth of learning, had the Title of Doctor Profundus: Richard Fits Ralph, Arch-biſhop of Armagh in Ireland, a learned writer: William Gryſant, named Anglicus, a notable Phyſitian, whoſe ſon came to be Pope, and was called Urbane the fifth: John Killingworth an excellent Philoſopher, Aſtronomer, and Phyſitian: Ranulph Higden a Monke of Cheſter, an Hiſtoriographer: Bartholomew Glanvile, deſcended of thoſe Glanviles that were ſometimes Earles of Suffolke: Simon Iſlip Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, and Founder of Canterbury Colledge in Oxford, who wrote many Treatiſes: Matthew Weſtmonaſterienſis, who wrote the booke called Flores Hiſtoriarum: William Fleete an Hermit, who wrote ſundry Treatiſes, exhorting England to repentance: Henry Knighton, who wrote a Hiſtory Intituled De geſtis Anglorum: and laſtly two other, worthy perhaps to have beene placed firſt; John Mandevill the great Travellour, a Doctor of Phyſicke, and a knight, who died at Liege, in the yeare 1372. and Sir Geoffrey Chawcer, the Homer of our Nation; and who found as ſweete a Muſe in the Groves of Woodſtocke, as the Antients did upon the banks of Helicon.

THE REIGNE OF KING RICHARD THE SECOND.

RICHARD, called of Burdeaux, becauſe born there, the onely Sonne of Edward the black Prince, was by his Grandfather in his life-time declared to be his Heire and lawfull Succeſſour; and accordingly after his death was crowned King of England, at Weſtminſter, the ſixteenth day of July, in the yerre 1377. by Simon Sudbury Archbiſhop of Canterbury: And for the more ſolemnity of his Coronation, he then made nine Knights, and created foure Earles: Thomas of Woodſtock, King Edward the Thirds youngeſt Sonne, was created Earle of Buckingham and Northampton; Thomas Mowbray, younger brother of John L. Mowbray, Earle of Nottingham; Gifford Angouleſme a Gaſcoigne, was made Earle of Huntington; and Henry Percy ſonne of Henry L. Percy, was created Earle of Northumberland. At the time of the Coronation, the Duke of Lancaſter, by the name of John King of Caſtile and Leon, and Duke of Lancaſter, put in his claim as Earle of Leiceſter, to have the place of Earle Marſhall of England; as Duke of Lancaſter, to carry the ſword called Curtana; as Earle of Lincolne, to be Carver that day; all which to be executed by himſelfe, or by his ſufficient Deputy; which, with the fees thereunto belonging, were confirmed unto him. As likewiſe, divers others made their claimes: Robert de Veere, Earle of Oxford, to have the office of Chamberlaine, and to powre out water for the King to waſh: John Wiltſhire Citizen of London, by reaſon of a Moyitie of the Manour of Heydon, holden in Sergeantie, claimed to hold a Towell for the King to wipe with when he went to meat: Thomas Beauchampe Earle of Warwick, to beare the third Sword before the King; and alſo to exerciſe the office of Pantler: Sir John Argentine, by reaſon of his Manour of Wiquodtey in the County of Hartford, to ſerve the King at his Cup: William L. Furnivall, for his Manour of Fernham, to ſupport the Kings right arme when he held the Royall Scepter: Anne late wife of John de Haſtings Earle of Pembrooke, for his Manour of Aſhele in Norfolke, to have the Office of Naperer; which ſhe was admitted to doe by her Deputy Sr. Thomas Blunt: Richard Earle of Arundell, for his Manour of B. in Kent, was admitted to be chiefe Butler: The L. Major of London, to attend in his owne perſon, as chiefe Cup-waiter: Sir John Dimmock, for his Manour of Scrivelbie; and Sir Baldwin Freville, for his Caſtle of Tamworth, in the County of Warwick, contended for the Office of being the Kings Champion; but adjudged to Dimmock: William de Latimer, and John the ſonne and heire of John Mowbray of Axholm, joyntly petitioned to have the Office of Almoner; but adjudged to Latimer: Richard Lion, as Tenant of the Manour of L. held by the ſervice of making wafers for the King at his Coronation, was thereunto admitted: The Barons of the Cinque-Ports were admitted to beare the Kings Canopy, upon foure ſtaves of ſilver, over the Kings head; and alſo to ſit at meat in the Hall, at the higheſt Table on the Kings right hand: John Fitz-John, by reaſon of his Manour of S. in Norfolk, was admitted to be chiefe Larderer: Richard Herring, for the Manour of C. in the County of Surry, claimed to be Uſher of the Kings Chamber; but becauſe that claim did no way concern the Coronation, he was left to purſue his Right ſome other time. The

The Coronation it ſelfe was performed with great ſolemnity: After a Sermon, the King tooke his Oath; and then the Archbiſhop bleſſed the King; which done, he tore off his garments, and ſtrippped him into his ſhirt; then he annoynted his hands, head, breaſt, ſhoulders, and the joynts of his armes, with the ſacred Oyle; and after certaine Prayers, he then cladde him, firſt with the Coat of S. Edward, and after with his Mantle: after which, the Archbiſhop delivered him the Sword, ſaying, Accipe Gladium; with which two Earles gyrded him: Then he gave him Bracelets, ſaying, Accipe Armillas: After this, he put upon him an upper veſture called a Pall, ſaying, Accipe Pallium: In the meane time, while the Archbiſhop bleſſed the Crowne, it to whoſe Office it pertained, put ſpurres on his heeles; after the Crown was bleſſed, the Archbiſhop ſet it on his Head, ſaying, Coronet te Deus: then he delivered him a Ring, ſaying, Accipe Annulum: Immediately herewith came the L. Furnivall, by virtue of his Office, offering him a red Glove, which the Arch B. bleſſed, and putting it on his hand, gave him the Scepter, ſaying, Accipe Sceptrum: and after that, in his other hand, delivered him a Rod, on the top whereof ſtood a Dove, ſaying, Accipe Virgam Virtutis; and then bleſſed the King, ſaying, Benedicat te Deus: which done, the King kiſſed the Biſhops and Abbots, by whom he was afterward led to his ſeat: and ſo ended the ſolemnity.

The tender yeares of the King, being but eleven yeeres of age, required a Protector: but being perhaps thought dangerous to commit that Authority to one only one, who might rather ſeeke to get it for himſelfe, then to keep it for another, It was thought fit to commit it to many; and thereupon John Duke of Lancaſter, Edmund Earle of Cambridge, the Kings Unkles; with ſome other Lords and Biſhops, were joyned in Commiſſion to manage the State; and Guiſhard de Angoulesme appointed to be his Schoole-maſter. And now the Kings Minority made forreigne Princes conceive, that this would be a time of advantage for any that had quarrell to England: which the French and Scots tooke preſently hold of; For, the French came now, and burnt the Town of Rye; and ſoone after, entring the Iſle of Wight, burnt divers Townes there; and though they were repelled from the Caſtle by the valiant Sir Hugh Tyrrell Captaine thereof, yet they conſtrained the men of the Iſle to give them a thouſand Markes, to ſpare the reſidue of their houſes and goods: and departing thence, they ſet on land where they ſaw advantage, burning ſundry Townsneere to the ſhoare; as Portſmouth, Dertmouth, and Plimmouth: and then ſayling towards Dover, they burnt Haſtings, aſſaulted Winchelſey; but being valiantly defended by the Abbot of Battell, were forced to retire: After this, they landed not far from the Abby of Lewis, at a place called Rottington, where the Prior of Lewis, with Sir Thomas Cheyny, and Sir John Falleſly, encountring them, were overthrowne, and taken Priſoners. And no leſſe then the French, were the Scots alſo now buſie; for comming one morning by ſtealth, they wonne the Caſtle of Barwick; but ſhortly after, upon knowledge thereof had, they were driven out againe by the Earles of Northumberland and Nottingham; and all the Scots they found in it, except Alexander Ramſey their Captaine, put to the ſword. About Michaelmas, a Parliament was held at Weſtminſter, wherein Alice Pierce, the late Kings Concubine, was baniſhed the Realme, and all her goods confiſcate; and two Tenths of the Clergie, and two Fifteenths of the Temporalty were granted; but ſo, as that two Citizens of London, William Walworth, and John Philpot, ſhould receive and keepe it, to ſee it beſtowed for defence of the Realme. In this time, Sir Hugh Calverley, Deputy of Calis, burnt ſix and twenty French ſhips in the Haven of Bulloigne: and at the ſame time a great Navy is ſet out, under the guiding of the Earle of Buckingham, the Duke of Britaine, the Lord Latimer, Sir Robert Knolls and others, with a purpoſe to intercept the Spaniſh Fleet; but through Tempeſt were twice driven back: when in the mean time, one Mercer a Scottiſh Pyrate, came to Scarborough, tooke there divers ſhips, and committed many outrages: and no order being taken to repell him, a Citizen of London named John Philpot, at his own charges ſet forth a Fleet, and in his own perſon encountring them, tooke the ſaid Mercer, and all his ſhips: and returning home, in ſtead of being rewarded for his ſervice, he was called in queſtion for for preſuming to raiſe a Navy, without advice of the Kings Councell: but he gave ſuch reaſons for that he had done, that not onely he came off then with credit, but lives in reputation for it to this day. Indeed Reaſons of State, though they may ſecretly be cenſured, yet they muſt not openly be controlled, for this were to bring Authority into contempt, and in ſtead of Errors to bring in Confuſion; but yet when wrongs be offered that are publick, every particular perſon ſeemes to have an intereſt in taking revenge; and though it may be no manners not to ſtay the States leiſure, yet it can be no offence to doe their worke for them. Many actions paſſed at this time with the French and Scots, ſome proſperous, and ſome adverſe: The Scots burne Roxborough; this was adverſe: but the Earle of Northumberland entring Scotland with ten thouſand men, ſpoyleth the Lands of the Earle of March, the chief Incendiary; this was proſperous: but when the Northern men would needs make a Road into Scotland, and were encountred by the Scots, and put to flight, this was adverſe. Anon after Midſomer, the Duke of Lancaſter, with the Earles of Buckingham, Warwick, Stafford, and others of the Nobility, with a ſtrong Power to ake the Sea, and landing in Britaine, beſieged the Towne of St. Malo, but finding ſtrong oppoſition, is forced to raiſe his Siege, and returne home: this was adverſe. And now againe, the Scots by night entred ſecretly into the Caſtle of Berwick, and ſlew Sir Robert Baynton, that was Conſtable there: this alſo was adverſe: But when the Earle of Northumberland, being advertiſed thereof, came with a Power, aſſaulted the Caſtle, and after two dayes defence recovered it againe; this was proſperous. William Montacute Earle of Salisbury, the Kings Lieutenant in Calis, forrageth the Country round about, and furniſheth Calis with Booties of French cattell: Sir Hugh Calverley and Sir Thomas Percy made Admiralls, put to Sea, and take divers ſhips laden with merchandiſe, and one ſhip of warre: Sir John Huſleſton, Captaine of Cherbourg in France, iſſuing forth, aſſaults a Fortreſſe of the French, which was the ſtorehouſe of their Proviſion, and with much valour takes it: theſe were proſperous: But when Sir John Clerke, lying in Garriſon in a Caſtle in Britaine, where lay many Engliſh ſhips in the Haven, had theſe ſhips ſet upon by the French, where though he ſhewed incredible valour in the action, yet the ſhips were taken, and himſelfe ſlaine: this was adverſe. Alſo in the third yeere of this Kings Reigne, Sir John Arundell, Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir Thomas Percie, Sir William Elmham, Sir Thomas Baniſter, and many other Knights, went to Sea, with a purpoſe to paſſe over into Britaine; but were ſo beaten back with Tempeſt, that divers of their ſhips were caſt away; and Sir John Arundell, Sir Thomas Baniſter, Sir Nicolas Trumpington, Sir Thomas Dale, and above a thouſand others were all drowned; oneiy Sir Thomas Percie, Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir William Elmham, and certaine others eſcaped. It may not be impertinent to note here the ſumptuouſneſſe of thoſe times; for this Sir John Arundell was then ſaid in his Furniture to have two and fifty new ſutes of apparell of cloath of Gold and Tiſſue, all loſt at Sea. This yeere alſo, there being found inconvenience in having many Governors of the King and Kingdome, it was by Parliament decreed, That the Lord Thomas Beauchampe, Earle of Warwick, ſhould himſelf alone hold the place of Protector. About this time Sir John Annesley Knight accuſed Thomas Katrington Eſquire, for betraying the Forreſſe of St. Saviour to the French: which Katrington denying, at the ſuit of Annesly a ſolemne combat is permitted to be between them; at which combat the King and all the great Lords were preſent: the Eſquire Katrington was a man of a mighty ſtature, the Knight Annesley a little man; yet through the juſtneſſe of his cauſe, after a long fight, the Knight prevailed; and Katrington, the day after the combat dyed. In the beginning of the fourth yeere of this King, Thomas of Woodſtock Earle of Buckingham, the Kings Unkle, with divers Earles and Lords, and an Army of ſeven or eight thouſand, was ſent into France, to aide the Duke of Britaine; but the King of France at that time dying, the Duke of Britain grew to have peace with the new King; whereupon the Earle of Buckingham came home againe, without doing much, but making of Knights, and forraging the Country. In this time the French and Spaniſh Gallies did much miſchiefe on the Coaſt of England: they burnt Rye, Haſtings, and Portſmouth:

Portſmouth; and at laſt, entring the River of Thames, they came up to Graveſend, where they burnt moſt part of the Towne, and taking many Priſoners and ſooties returned into France. At this time alſo, there fell out an Accident of great diſturbance to the Realme; for the Commons roſe in divers parts, beginning at Deptford in Kent: and the cauſe of their Riſing grew (as was thought) through the rude behaviour of a Collector of the Poll-money, who comming into the houſe of one John Tyler, and demanding Pollmony of his wife for a daughter of hers, and ſhe ſaying that her daughter was not of that age to pay, the rude fellow ſaid, he would preſently ſee whether that were ſo, or no, and thereupon forceably turned up her cloathes; whereat the mother making an outcry, her huſband being at work hard by, and hearing the noyſe, came in with his lathing-ſtaffe in his hand, with which he gave the Collector ſuch a blow on the head, that his braines flew out, and he preſently dyed. Upon this, at the complaint of Tyler amongſt his neighbours, and withall, a factious Clergie-man, one John Ball, taking occaſion hereat to rip up the ground of this Miſgovernment, and telling the people, that this differeuce of ments Eſtates, where ſome are Potentates, and ſome are Bondmen, was againſt Chriſtian liberty, taking for his Theame, When Adam delv'd and Eve ſpan, who was then a Gentleman? he ſo incenſed them, that the Commons in divers parts drew together; and whether beginning in Kent, or otherwiſe in Eſſex, they drew at laſt into their faction the Commons of Suſſex, Hartfordſhire, Cambridgſhire, Suffolk, Norfolk, and other Shires; and arreſting all ſuch as paſſed, made them ſweare to be true to K. Richard, and to the Commons, and never to receive any King that ſhould be called John; which they did for the envy they bore to John Duke of Lancaſter. Thus their number ſtill increaſed, that by that time they were come as farre as Black-heath, they were eſteemed to be a Hundred Thouſand. The firſt thing they did when they came to London, was to ſend for one Richard Lyon, a grave Citizen, who had been Tylers Maſter, and his head they ſtruck off, and carried it upon a pole, in Triumph before them: The next day they goe to the Savoy, the Duke of Lancaſters houſe, which they ſet on fire, burning all his rich Furniture, breaking in pieces all his Plate and Jewels, and throwing them into the Thames, ſaying, They were men of juſtice, and would not like Robbers enrich themſelves with any mans goods: and when one of their fellowes was eſpyed to thruſt a faire ſilver piece into his boſome, they tooke him, and caſt both him and the piece into the fire: Two and thirty of them were got into the Dukes Wine-Cellar, where they ſtayed drinking ſo long, till the rafters of the houſe, on fire, fell upon them, and ſo covered them, that not able to get out, they were heard cry ſeven dayes after, and then periſhed. From the Savoy they went to the Temple, where they burnt the Lawyers lodgings, with their bookes and writings, and all they could lay hand on: Alſo the Houſe of St. Johns by Smithfield they ſet on fire, ſo that it burned for the ſpace of ſeven dayes together. After this they came to the Tower, where the King was then lodged; and though he had at that time ſixe hundred armed men, and as many Archers about him, yet he durſt not but ſuffer them to enter; where they abuſed the Kings mother, offering to kiſſe her, in ſuch rude manner, that ſhe fell into a ſwound: and finding in the place Simon Thybold Archbiſhop of Canterbury and Lord Chancellour; and Sr. Robert Hales alſo Lord Treaſurer; they led them to the Towerhill, and there in moſt cruell manner ſtruck off their heads, as alſo of divers others: Neither ſpared they ſacred places; for breaking into the Church of the Auguſtine Fryers, they drew forth thirteene Flemmings, and beheaded them in the open ſtreets; as alſo ſeventeen other, out of other Churches. Yet after all theſe outrages, the King proclaimed Pardon to all ſuch as would lay down Armes, and goe quietly home; which the Eſſex-men did, but the Kentiſh-men continued ſtill, with their Captaine Wat Tyler: to whom when the King ſent Sir John Newton to underſtand what his meaning was; Wat Tyler, offended becauſe he came on horſe-back, told him, it became him to light from his horſe in his preſence; and therewith drew out his dagger to ſtrike him: the King perceiving his Knight to be in danger, bade him alight from his horſe: but when this would not pacifie him, the Major of London, William Walworth, by the Kings appointment pointment rode to him and arreſted him, and gave him ſuch a blow on the head, that he aſtonied him; and then other of the Kings ſervants drew their ſwords, and thruſt him through in divers parts of his body, ſo as he died there in the place. When the Commons ſaw this, they cryed out, Our Captain is ſlain, let us revenge it. Here the King, though very young, not above fifteen yeeres of age, yet had the courage to ride unto them, telling them, that now their Leader was dead, he would be their Leader himſelfe; and if they would follow him into the fields, they ſhould have whatſoever they deſired. In the meane time, the Lord Major Walworth had gone into the City, and raiſed a Thouſand armed men, and meeting Sir Robert Knolls by chance, got him to be their Leader; who comming into the fields where the Rebels were, ſo daunted them, that throwing downe their weapons, they cryed for mercy: that it was a wonderfull thing to ſee how ſuddenly Fear overtook Preſumption; for ſcarce their words of Inſolency were out of their mouths, when they fell to words of moſt ſervile ſubmiſſion: And as ſtrange an alteration in thoſe about the King, to ſee how ſuddenly Boldnes ſurprized Feare; for ſcarce they left trembling at the ſight of the Rebels, when ſuddenly upon ſight of this Ayde their fingers itched to be ſetting upon them, but that the King would not ſuffer it, becauſe ſome amongſt them were there by compulſion, and to ſet upon them thus mingled, might as well be the death of the innocent, as of the guilty. But to pacifie them the more, the King cauſed his Charter of Manumiſſion to be ſent unto them; which yet ſtayed them not from committing outrages at St. Albans, and cancelling the antient Charters of the Abbots and Monks there. Beſides, the Sedition was more generall, then that the appeaſing it in one place could be finall; for at the ſame time there were gathered together in Suffolk to the number of Fifty thouſand, by the ſetting on of one John Wraw a lewd Prieſt: and theſe fell to deſtroying the houſes of Lawyers ſpecially; and Sir John Cavendiſh L. Chiefe Juſtice of England, they beheaded, and ſet his head upon the Pillory in St. Edmundsbury. The like commotion of the Commons was at the ſame time alſo in Cambridgſhire, in the Iſle of Ely, and in Norfolke, under the guiding of one John Litteſter a Dyer: and to countenance their proceeding the more, they had a purpoſe to have brought William Vfford Earle of Suffolke into their fellowſhip; but he, advertiſed of their intention, ſuddenly roſe from ſupper, and got him away: but many other Lords and Knights they compelled to be ſworne to them, and to ride with them; as the Lord Scales, the Lord Morley, Sir John Brewis, Sir Stephen Hales, & Sr. Robert Salle, who not enduring their inſolencies, had his braines daſht out by a Country Clowne that was his Bondman: The reſt terrified by this example, were glad to carry themſelves ſubmiſſively to their Chieftaine John Litteſter, who named himſelfe King of the Commons, and counted it a preferment for any to ſerve him at his Table, in taking the aſſay of his meates and drinkes, with kneeling humbly before him, as he ſate at meat. And now theſe fellowes, upon a conſultation, ſend two choycemen, namely, the L. Morley and Sir John Brewis, with three of their chiefe Commons, to the King, for their Charter of Manumiſſion and Enfranchiſing: who being on their way, at Itchingham not farre from Newmarket, they met with Henry Spenſer Biſhop of Norwich; and he examining them if there were any of the Rebels in their company, and hearing that three of the chiefe were there preſent, he preſently cauſed their heads to be ſtruck off; and then purſuing on towards Northwalſham in Norfolke, where the Commons ſtayed for Anſwer from the King; by that time he came thither, where he had at firſt but eight Launces, and a ſmall number of Archers in his company, his number was ſo increaſed, that it came to be a compleat Army, with which he ſet upon the Rebels, diſcomfited them, and tooke John Litteſter and their other Chieftains, whom he cauſed all to be executed; and by this meanes the Country was quieted. After this, the Major of London ſate in Judgment upon Offenders; where many were found culpable, and loſt their heads; amongſt other, Jack Straw, John Kirkeby, Alane Tredder, and John Sterling, who gloried that he was the man had ſlaine the Archbiſhop. Alſo Sir Robert Treſilian Chiefe Juſtice, was appointed to ſit in Judgement againſt the Offenders; before whom above fifteen hundred were found guilty, and in ſundry places put to death:

death: amongst others, John Ball Priest, their Incendiary; of whom it is not impertinent to relate a letter he wrote to the Rebell-rabble of Essex; by which we may see how fit an Oratour he was for such an Auditory, and what strength of perswasion there was in Non-sence:

John Sheepe S*t*. Mary Priest of Yorke, and now of Colchester, greeteth well John Nameless, and John the Miller, and John Carter; and biddeth them that they beware of guile in Borough, and stand together in Gods name: and biddeth Piers Plowman goe to his work, and chastise well Hob the robber, and take with you John Trewman and all his fellowes, and no moe. John the miller ye ground small, small, small; the Kings Sonne of Heaven shall pay for all. Beware or ye be woe: Know your friend from your foe: Have enough, and say Ho; and doe well and better: Flee sinne, and seeke peace, and hold you therein: and so biddeth John Trewman and all his fellowes.

Neither is it impertinent to declare the Confession of Jack Straw at his execution: "When we were assembled (said he) upon Blackheath, and had sent to the K. to come "to us, our purpose was to have slaine all Knights and Gentlemen that should be a-"bout him: and as for the King, we would have kept him amongst us, to the end "the people might more boldly have repaired to us; and when we had gotten power "enough, we would have slaine all Noblemen, and specially the Knights of the "Rhodes; and lastly we would have killed the King, and all men of possessions, with "Bishops, Monkes, Parsons of Churches; onely Friers Mendicants we would have "spared, for administration of the Sacraments: Then we would have devised Laws "according to which the people should have lived; for we would have created "Kings, as Wat Tyler in Kent, and other in other Countries: and the same evening "that Wat Tyler was killed, we were determined to set fire in foure corners of the "City, and to have divided the spoyle amongst us: and this was our purpose, as "God may helpe me now at my last end." For his service done in this seditious businesse, the King knighted the Major William Walworth, and gave him a hundred pounds a yeere in Fee; also he knighted five Aldermen his brethren, girding them about the waste with the girdle of knighthood, which was the manner of Graduating in those dayes: And to doe the City it selfe honour, he granted there should be a Dagger added to the Armes of the City; for till this time the City bore onely the Crosse without the Dagger.

And now all parts being quiet, the King by Proclamation revoked and made void his former Charters of Infranchising the Bondmen of the Realme; and that they should stand in the same condition they were before. In the time of this sedition, the Duke of Lancaster had been sent into Scotland, to keep the Scots quiet; who so carried the matter, that before the Scots heard of the Sedition, a Truce was concluded for two or three yeeres. But the Duke comming back to Berwick, was denied by the Captaine Sir Matthew Redman, to enter the Towne, because of a Commandement given him by the Earle of Northumberland, L. Warden of the Marches, not to suffer any person to enter the same; which the King indeed had appointed to be done, forgetting the Duke of Lancaster that was then in Scotland: but howsoever, this bred such a spleen in the Duke against the Earle, that at his comming home, he laid many things to the Earles charge, and the Earle as stoutly answered his objections: and so farre it proceeded, that both of them came to the Parliament which was then beginning, with great numbers of Armed men, and themselves in Armour, to the great terrour of the people: but the King, wisely taking the matter into his owne hands, made them friends. At which time, the Lady Anne, Sister to the Emperour Wenceslaus, and affianced wife to the King, was come to Calis; whereupon the Parliament was Prorogued: the Lady was brought to London, joyned in mariage to the King, and Crowned Queene at Westminster by the Archbishop of Canterbury, with great solemnity. After the Mariage, the Parliament began againe; in deliver in behalfe of the Commonwealth certaine matters concerning the same, the very day and houre in which he should have done the businesse, as he went up the staires staires towards the upper House, he suddenly fell down and dyed, having been merry and well before, to all mens judgements. About this time the Lord Scroope was deposed from the Chancellourship, for refusing to seale some Grants which the King had made: and the King receiving the great Seale at his hands, kept it a certaine time, and sealed with it such Grants and Writings as he pleased; till at length it was delivered to Robert Braybrooke Bishop of London, who was made Lord Chancellour.

Henry Spenser Bishop of Norwich, had lately with the Kings leave raised an Army, and was gone into France, in behalfe of Pope Urban, against the Anti-pope Clement; and entring first into Flanders, he tooke and sacked many Townes; at last besieged Ypres; till by an Army of French (greater then was thought could have been raised in France) he was forced to raise his siege: and then passing divers places, he came to Gravelling; from whence he writ to King Richard, that if ever he meant to try battell with the French, now was the time. The King was at that time at Daintrie in Northamptonshire; and being at supper when the word was brought him, he instantly rose from the Table, got to horse-back, and rode in Post with such speed that he came to S*t*. Albans about midnight; where making no stay, but while he borrowed the Abbots Gelding, he hasted forth till he came to Westminster, as though he had meant never to rest till he had given battell to the French-men: but after he had taken councell of his pillow, his minde was altered, and he thought it better to imploy some other, then to goe himselfe: so the Duke of Lancaster is thought the fittest man; but he protracted the time so long in making preparation, that before he could be gone, the Bishop was come away: And this indeed is the condition of many, to spend so much time in preparing, that they utterly lose all opportunity of acting; like to men that are putting on their cloathes so long, till it be time to put them off againe. Shortly after, a Truce was concluded between France and England, to endure till the Feast of S*t*. Michael, which should be in the yeere 1384.

Of Acts done after He came of Age.

THe Scots in this meane time had made Roades into England, and taken and burnt divers Townes upon the Borders: whereupon the Duke of Lancaster, with his Brother the Earle of Buckingham, is sent with a mighty Army to represse them; but having entred Scotland, and not able to draw the Scots to a Battell, they onely burnt certaine Townes, and then returned.

About this time an Irish Frier, of the Order of the Carmelites, charged the Duke of Lancaster with heynous crimes; as that he intended to destroy the King, and usurpe the Crowne; shewing the time, the place, and other circumstances of the whole ploc. But the Duke called to his Answer, so cleered himselfe, at least gave such colours of cleering, that the Accuser was committed to the custody of John Holland the kings halfe-brother, till a day appointed for further tryall: The night before which day, the said Lord Holland and Sir Henry Greene are said to have come to this Frier, and putting a cord about his neck, tyed the other end about his privy members; and after hanging him up from the ground, laid a stone upon his belly, with the weight whereof his very back-bone burst asunder; thereby putting him to a most tormenting death: An act not more inhumane then unadvised; for though it took away the Accuser, yet it made the Accusation more suspitious.

At this time, though a Truce had been made with the Scots, yet they would not be quiet, but entred and wonne the Castle of Barwick, whereof the Earle of Northumberland was Captaine, but had committed the keeping of it to another; for which being blamed, he went against them with an Army, but took an easier course, for with the summe of two thousand markes he bought them out, and had the Castle surrendred into his hands againe. The king upon some new displeasure, being now incensed against the Duke of Lancaster, had a purpose to have him arrested, and arraigned of certaine points of Treason, before Sir Robert Tresilian Chiefe Justice, though though he ought to be tryed by his Peeres: but the Duke having intimation he rec[ei] go to him to his Caſtle of Pomfret, and ſtood upon his guard; till the Kings mother, (notwithſtanding her indiſpoſition of body, by reaſon of her corpulency) riding to and fro betwixt them, pacified the King, and made them friends.

In the ninth yeere of K. Richards Reigne, the French-king ſent the Admirall of France into Scotland, with a Thouſand men of Armes, beſides Croſſe-bowes and others, to ayde the Scots againſt the Engliſh; with which ayde the Scots encouraged, enter the Engliſh Borders: whereof K. Richard advertiſed, himſelfe with a mighty Army enters Scotland, and comming to Edingborough, and finding all the people fled, he ſet fire on the houſes, burnt the Church of S. Giles, onely Holy-Rood-houſe was ſpared at the Duke of Lancaſters ſuit, in remembrance of friendſhip he had formerly received in that houſe. The Scots by no meanes could be drawn to any Battell; but to divert the Kings Army, they entred Cumberland, and beſieged Carlile, whereby the valour of Sir Lewis Clifford and Sir Thomas Muſgrave they were repelled; and hearing of the Kings Army comming towards them, and fearing to be incloſed, they drew back into Scotland, and the King returned into England. But in this meane while, the Engliſh of Calis tooke many prizes of French ſhips at Sea, and many Booties alſo by land; at one time foure thouſand ſheep, and three hundred head of great Cattell. This yeere the King called a Parliament at Weſtminſter, where he created two Dukes, one Marqueſſe, and five Earles: Edmund of Langly Earle of Cambridge, the Kings Unkle, was created Duke of Yorke: Thomas of Woodſtock Earle of Buckingham, his other Unkle, Duke of Glocester: Robert Veere Earle of Oxford, was made Marqueſſe of Dublin: Henry of Bullingbrooke ſonne of John of Gaunt, was created Earle of Derby: Edward Plantagenet ſonne to the Duke of Yorke, was made Earle of Rutland: Michael de la Poole Chancellour of England, was created Earle of Suffolke: and Thomas Mowbray Earle of Nottingham, was made Earle Marſhall. Alſo by authority of this Parliament, Roger Mortimer Earle of March, ſonne and heire of Edmund Mortimer, and of the Lady Philip eldeſt daughter and heire to Lionell Duke of Clarence third ſonne to king Edward the Third, was eſtabliſhed heire apparent to the Crowne of the Realme, and ſhortly after ſo Proclaimed: but going into Ireland to his Lordſhip of Vlſter, was there by the wilde Iriſh ſlaine. This Roger Earle of March had iſſue, Edmund, Roger, Anne, Alice, and Eleanor; which Eleanor was made a Nun: The two ſonnes dyed without iſſue: Anne his eldeſt daughter, was maried to Richard Earle of Cambridge, ſonne to Edmund of Langley; which Richard had iſſue by the ſaid Anne, a ſonne called Richard, that was after Duke of York, and father to king Edward the Fourth; alſo a daughter named Iſabel, maried to the Lord Bourchier.
Alſo this yeere Henry of Bullingbrooke Earle of Darby, maried the daughter and heire of Humfry Bohun Earle of Hereford; in whoſe Right he was after made Duke of Hereford.

This yeere alſo K. Richard holding his Chriſtmas at Eltham, Leo king of Armenia came thither to him; who in feare to have his kingdome conquered by the Turkes, was come into Chriſtendome to ſeeke for ayde: but his chiefe Errand into England was, to have procured a Peace between the two kings of England and France; but their ſpleenes were ſo great againſt one another, that it was not in the phyſick of his Power to cure them.

At this time, the Duke of Lancaſter, taking with him his wife the Lady Conſtance, and a daughter he had by her named Katherine, and two other daughters which he had by his former wife, failed into Spaine: he was attended in his journy with the Lord Lucie, the Lord Talbot, the Lord Baſſet, Willoughby, Fitzwater, Poynings, Brat-ſton, and many other Lords and knights, to the number of fifteen hundred men of Armes; whereof a thouſand at the leaſt were knights and Eſquires. The king at his taking leave gave him a Crowne of Gold, and commanded he ſhould be called king of Spaine: and the Queen likewiſe gave another Crown of Gold to the Dutcheſſe.
He landed firſt at Breſt, and freed that Caſtle from the French: from thence he ſai-led, and arrived at the Groyne in Spaine, where he remained a moneth; and then went to Compoſtella, where he ſtayed a while: In which time, his Conſtable Sir John Holland

Holland wonne divers Townes. At Monſon, the king of Portingale, and the Duke of Lancaſter met; where a mariage was concluded betweene the ſaid king of Portingale and the Lady Philip daughter to the Duke; which mariage ſhortly after was conſummated, and the Lady ſent into Portingale honorably accompanied. The Duke continued at Compoſtella all the winter: At March the king of Portingale and he en-tred the Confines of Caſtile, where they tooke many Townes; and paſſing over the River of Dure, entred into the Country De Campo: But the Spaniards not willing to come to a Battell, but meaning to weary them out with delayes; the Engliſh not uſed to ſuch hot aire, fell daily into many diſeaſes: which the Duke ſeeing, accorded to a Truce. There dyed in this action, the Lord Fitzwater, Sir Richard Burley a knight of the Garter, the Lord Poynings, and Sir Henry Percy Coſin-german to the Earle of Northumberland, alſo the Lord Talbot; and in all, twelve great Lords fourſcore knights, two hundred Eſquires, and of the meaner ſort above five hundred.
When the Army was broken up, the Duke of Lancaſter, and the Dutcheſſe his wife went into Portingale; and after ſome ſtay there, they ſailed to Bayon, in the Marches of Gaſcoigne, where he reſted a long time after: In which meane while, there were offers made for a Mariage to be had, betweene the Duke of Berry, Unkle to the French king, and the Lady Katherine, daughter to the Duke of Lancaſter: which the king of Spaine underſtanding, he began to doubt, leaſt if that mariage went forward, it might turne to his diſadvantage; and thereupon by earneſt ſuit, at length concluded a peace with the Duke of Lancaſter, on this wiſe, That his eldeſt ſonne Henry ſhould marry the the Lady Katherine, the Duke of Lancaſters daughter, and be intituled Prince of Auſturgus; and in conſideration of this mariage, and that all claimes ſhould ceaſe, which the Duke in right of his wife might challenge or pretend; It was agreed, that the ſaid Duke ſhould receive yeerely the ſumme of Ten thouſand marks, during the lives of him and his Dutcheſſe; and to have in hand the ſumme of two hundred thouſand Nobles.

At this time, the French had a purpoſe to invade England, with no leſſe a hope then to make a Conqueſt: and to that end, they prepared a mighty Navy; ſo as in the moneth of September, there were numbred about Sluis, Dam, and Blankerke, 1287 ſhips, beſides thoſe which were rigged in Britaine by the Conſtable, who had cauſed an incloſure of a Field to be made of Timber, that when they were landed in England, they might therewith incloſe their field, and ſo lodge at more ſurety:
but it ſo fortuned, that the Lord William Beauchampe Captaine of Calis, tooke two of their ſhips, whereof one was laden with a piece of the ſaid Incloſure; and after that, another ſhip, laden with Guns, Gunpowder, and other Inſtruments of warre; and after that againe, two ſhips more, laden with parcels of the ſaid Incloſure, which
K. Richard cauſed to be reared and ſet up about Winchelſey Towne: at laſt the fore-ſaid Army came into Flanders, and arrived at Sluis; where, after ſome ſtay, they were ſo diſtreſſed for victuals, that in the end of November, they were glad to be gone, and returne into France.

At this time, in a Parliament, Robert Veere Earle of Oxford and Marques of Dublin, was created Duke of Ireland; and Michael de la Poole, a Merchants ſon, had lately before been created E. of Suffolk, and made Chancellor of England. And now begins K. Richard to enter, I may ſay, upon the confines of his Deſtiny: His gracing of undeſerving men, and diſgracing of men deſerving, if they were not the cauſes, they were at leaſt the occaſions of his owne diſgracing, and deſtruction in the end. He was now come to be of full age to doe all himſelfe; which was indeed to be of full age to undoe himſelfe: for the faults of his younger yeeres might have the excuſe to be but Errors; but the faults of the age he was now at, were peremptory againſt him, and admitted no defence. And to haſten the pace of his deſtiny the faſter, the ill Counſell which before was but whiſpered in his eare, was now ſcarce forborne to be given him aloud: It is told him, that he is under tuition no longer, and therefore not to be controll'd, as in former times he had been; That to be croſt of his will by his ſubjects, was to be their ſubject; It is no Soveraignty, if it be not abſolute.
At the inſtigation of which Counſell, the king in a Parliament now aſſembled, fell to expoſtulate with his Lords, aſking them what yeeres they thought him to be of? who anſwering, that he was ſomewhat more then one and twenty; Well, then (ſaid he) I am out of Wardſhip, and therefore looke to injoy my kingdome as freely, as your ſelves at the like yeeres enjoy your Patrimonies. But his flattering Favorite ſhould have remembred, that though the king may not be controlled, where he can command, yet he may be oppoſed, where he can but demand; as now indeed he was for when he came to demand a Subſidy towards his warres, he was anſwered, That he needed no ſubſidie from his Subjects, if he would but call in the debts which the Chancellour owed him: and if he were ſo tender of him, that he could not finde in his heart to doe it himſelfe, they would doe that work for him: and thereupon charged him with ſuch crimes, that all his goods were confiſcate, and himſelfe adjudged to dye, if the king ſo pleaſed: though ſome write, his ſentence was onely to pay a Fine of twenty thouſand markes, and a thouſand pounds yeerly beſide. Upon this provocation, the oppoſite ſide ſeek preſent revenge: It is deviſed, that the Duke of Glocester as principall, and other Lords that croſſed the kings courſes, ſhould be invited to a Supper in London, and there be murthered. In the execution of which ploe, the former Lord Major, Sir Nicolas Brember, had a ſpeciall hand: but the preſent Major Richard Exton, moved to it by the king, would by no meanes conſent; and thereupon the plot proceeded not. But for all theſe harſh ſtraines, and many ſuch other that paſſed this Parliament, a Subſidie was at length granted to the king, of halfe a Tenth, and halfe a Fifteenth; but with condition, that it ſhould not be iſſued but by order from the Lords, and the Earle of Arundell was appointed to receive it. But before this time, both Houſes had directly agreed, that unleſſe the Chancellour were removed, they would meddle no further in the Parliament. The king advertiſed hereof, ſent to the Commons, that they ſhould ſend unto Eltham (where he then lay) forty of their Houſe, to declare their mindes unto him: but upon conference of both Houſes, it was agreed, that the Duke of Glocester, and Thomas Arundell Biſhop of Ely, ſhould in the name of the Parliament goe unto him: who comming to the king, declared, That by an old Statute, the king once a yeere might lawfully ſummon his Court of Parliament, for reformation of all corruptions and enormities within the Realme: and further declared, That by an old Ordinance alſo it was Enacted, That if the king ſhould abſent himſelf 40 dayes, not being ſick, the Houſes might lawfully break up, and returne home. At this the king is ſaid to ſay, Well, we perceive our people goe about to riſe againſt us, and therefore we thinke we cannot doe better then to aſke ayd of our Coſin the king of France, and rather ſubmit us to him then to our own Subjects. To which the Lords anſwered, They wondred at this opinion of his Majeſty, ſeeing the French king was the antient Enemy of the kingdome; and he might remember what miſchiefes were brought upon the Realme in king Johns time, by ſuch a courſe. By theſe and the like perſwaſions, the king was induced to come to the Parliament: and ſoon after, John Fortham Biſhop of Durham is diſcharged of his Office of Lord Treaſurer; and in his place was appointed John Gilbert Biſhop of Hereford, a Frier of the order of Preachers: alſo Michael de la Poole Earle of Suffolke, is diſcharged of his Office of Chancellour; and Thomas Arundell Biſhop of Ely, by conſent of Parliament, placed in his roome. Alſo by Order of Parliament, thirteen Lords were choſen to have overſight, under the king, of the whole government of the Realme: of which thirteen, there were three of the New-Officers named; as the Biſhop of Ely Lord Chancellour, the Biſhop of Hereford Lord Treaſurer, and Nicolas Abbot of Waltham Lord keeper of the Privy Seale: The other ten were, William Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Alexander Archbiſhop of York, Edmund of Langley Duke of York, Thomas Duke of Glocester, William Biſhop of Winchester, Thomas Biſhop of Exeter, Richard Earle of Arundell, Richard Lord Scroope, and John Lord Devereux. But this participation of the Government being found inconvenient, held not long. Alſo in this Parliament, it was granted, that Robert de Veere, lately created Duke of Ireland, ſhould have & receive to his own uſe 30000. markes, which the French-men were to give for the heires of the Lord Charles de Bloys: but it was granted upon this condition, condition, That before the next Eaſter he ſhould paſſe over into Ireland, to recover ſuch lands as the King had there given him: ſo deſirous the Lords and Commons were to have him removed from the Kings preſence. But though the King gave way to this torrent of the Parliament for the preſent, yet as ſoone as the Parliament was diſſolved, he diſſolved alſo all that had been done, either againſt the Lord Chancellour, or againſt the Duke of Ireland, or againſt Alexander Nevil Archbiſhop of York; and received them into more favour then ever he had done before.

In his Tenth yeere, about the Beginning of March, Richard Earle of Arundell appointed Admirall, and Thomas Mowbray Earle of Nottingham, the Earle of Devonſhire, and the Biſhop of Norwich, went to Sea, with a warlike power of men and armes, to watch for the Fleet of Flanders, that was ready to come from Rochell with wines; and meeting with them, they ſet upon them: and tooke of them, to the number of a hundred Veſſels, all fraught with wines; ſo as wine grew ſo plentifull, that it was ſold for thirteen ſhillings foure pence the Tonne; and the beſt and choyſeſt for twenty ſhillings. Beſides this, they landed in Flanders, where they relieved and fortified Breſt, and demoliſhed two Forts which the Enemy had built againſt it. But this happy ſervice of the Earle of Arundell; the Duke of Ireland, the Earle of Suffolke, Sir Simon Burley, and Sir Richard Sturrey, who continued ſtill about the King, ſeemed rather to envy, then to commend; inſomuch that when the Earle of Nottingham, that had ever been the Kings playfellow, and of equall age to him, came to the Court, he was neither received by the Duke of Ireland with any good welcome, nor by the King with any good countenance: and therefore indeed, not by the King with any good Countenance, becauſe not by the Duke of Ireland with any good Welcome.

About this time, the Duke of Ireland ſought to be divorced from his lawfull wife, daughter to the Lady Iſabel, one of king Edward the third's daughters; and took to wife one Lancerona a Vintners daughter of Bohemia, one of the Queenes maids: at which indignity, the Duke of Glocester, that was unkle to the Lady thus forſaken, tooke great diſpleaſure; which the Duke of Ireland underſtanding, ſtudied how by ſome meanes he might diſpatch the Duke of Glocester out of the way. Eaſter was now paſt, the time appointed for the D. of Irelands going over into Ireland; when the King, with a ſhew to bring him to the waters ſide, went with him into Wales, and in his company, Michael de la Poole Earl of Suffolke, Robert Treſilian L. Chief Juſtice, and divers others; who there conſulted how they might diſpatch the Duke of Glocester, the Earles of Arundel, Warwick, Darby, Nottingham, with divers others of that Faction: but when the King had remained in thoſe parts a good while, he returned, and brought back the Duke of Ireland with him; and ſo his voyage into Ireland was cleane forgotten. About the ſame time, Robert Treſilian Chiefe Juſtice came to Coventry, where he Indicted two thouſand perſons. The King and the Queene came to Groby; and thither came by his Commandement the Juſtices of the Realme, Robert Belknap Lord Chiefe Juſtice of the Common Pleas, John Holt, Roger Fulthorpe, and William Borough, knights: to whom it was propounded, to anſwer to theſe Queſtions following:

Firſt, Whether the New Statute and Commiſſion made in the laſt Parliament, were againſt the kings Prerogative, or no? To which they all anſwered, It was.

Secondly, How they ought to be puniſhed, that procured the ſaid Statute and Commiſſion to be made? They anſwered with one aſſent, that they deſerved death, except the king would pardon them.

Thirdly, How they ought to be puniſhed who moved the King to conſent to the making of the ſaid Statute and Commiſſion? They anſwered, They ought to loſe their lives, unleſſe the King would pardon them.

Fourthly, How they ought to be puniſhed, that compelled the king to the making of that Statute? They anſwered, They ought to ſuffer as Traitours.

Fiftly, Whether the king might cauſe the Parliament to proceed upon Articles by him limited, before they proceeded to any other? They anſwered, That in this the king ſhould over-rule; and if any preſumed to doe contrary, he was to be puniſhed as a Traitour.

Sixthly, Whether the king might not at his pleasure dissolve the Parliament, and command the Lords and Commons to depart? They all answered, He might.

Seventhly, Whether the Lords and Commons might, without the kings will, impeach Officers and Justices upon their offences, in Parliament, or no? It was answered, They might not; and he that attempted contrary, was to suffer as a Traitour?

Eightly, How he is to be punished, who moved in the Parliament, that the Statute wherein Edward the Second was indicted in Parliament, might be sent for; by inspection of which Statute, the present Statute was devised? It was answered, That as well he that moved it, as he that brought the Statute into the House, were to be punished as Traitours?

Ninthly, Whether the Judgement given in Parliament against Michael de la Pole were erronious and revocable? They answered, It was erronious and revocable: and that if the Judgement were now to be given, the Justices would not give the same.

In witnesse of the Premises, the Justices aforesaid, to these Presents have set their Seales; in the presence of Alexander Archbishop of Yorke, Robert Archbishop of Dublin, John Bishop of Durham, Thomas Bishop of Chester, John Bishop of Bangor, Robert Duke of Ireland, Michael Earle of Suffolk, John Ripon Clerk, and John Blake.

At this time the Londoners incurred much obloquie; For, having before beene pardoned by the king of some crimes laid to their charge, they were now ready to comply with the king in his desires; and thereupon being impannelled, they indicted some Lords of many crimes informed against them. But not onely the Justices aforesaid, but all other Justices and Sheriffes of the Realme were called at this time to Nottingham: the chiefe cause was, to understand what power of men they could assure the king of, to serve him against the Lords: and further, that where he meant shortly to call a Parliament, they should so use the matter, that no knight or Burgesse should be chosen, but such as the King and his Councell should name. To which the Sheriffes made answer, that it lay not in their power to assemble any forces against the Lords, who were so well beloved: And as for choosing knights and Burgesses, the Commons would undoubtedly look to enjoy their antient liberties, and could not be hindered. But yet the king and the Duke of Ireland sent into all parts of the Realme, to raise men in this quarrell against the Lords: Whereof the Duke of Glocester being advertised, he came secretly to Conference with the Earles of Arundell, Warwick, and Derby; who upon consultation, determined to talke with the king, with their Forces about them: and the king, on the other part, tooke advice how he might apprehend them apart; and thereupon, sent the Earle of Northumberland and others to the Castle of Rygate, to take the Earle of Arundell, who lay there at that time: but howsoever it fortuned, they failed of their purpose. After this, he sent others to apprehend him: but he being warned by a messenger from the Duke of Glocester, conveyed himselfe away by night; and by morning was come to Haringey-Parke, where he found the Duke of Glocester and the Earle of Warwick, with a great power of men about them. The king hearing of this Assembly at Haringey-Parke, called his Councell, to heare their opinions what was fit to be done: Some were of opinion, that the king should assemble his friends, and joyning them with the Londoners, give them battell; the chiefest of this minde was the Archbishop of York: Others thought best, the king should seeke to appease the Lords with faire promises, till a fitter opportunity to suppresse them. But the king not yet resolved what course to take, caused onely order to be taken, that no Citizen of London should sell to the Duke of Glocester, the Earle of Arundell, or to any other of the Lords, any armour or furniture of warre, under a great paine. But for all this, the Lords proceeded in their course, and sent the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord John Lovell, the Lord Cobham, and the Lord John Devereux, requiring to have delivered to them such as were about the king, that were Traitours and Seducers both both of him and the Realme: and further to declare, that their Assembling was for the honour and wealth both of him and the kingdome. The Duke of Ireland, the Earle of Suffolk, and two or three other about the king, perswaded him to offer Calis to the king of France, to have his assistance against the Lords. Withall, the king sent to the Major of London, requiring to know how many able men the City could make? To which the Major answered, that he thought it could make Fifty thousand men at an houres warning. Well then (said the king) goe and prove what will be done. But when the Major went about it, he was answered, They would never fight against the kings friends, and defenders of the Realme. At the same time, the Earle of Northumberland said to the king: Sir, there is no doubt but these Lords have alwaies been, and still are your true and faithfull subjects, though now distempered by certaine persons about you, that seeke to oppresse them: therefore my advice is, that you send to them, to come before your presence in some publick place; and I verily believe, they will shew such reasons of their doings, that you will hold them excused. The Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Ely Lord Chancellour, and other of the Bishops there present, approved all of the Earles advice: whereupon the king sent the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Ely to the Lords, requiring them to come to him to Westminster, on Sunday then next following: which, upon oath given by the Archbishop and the Chancellour, that no fraud nor evill practice should be used against them, they were content to doe. But when the Lords were ready to come at the day appointed, they heard of an Ambush laid to inwrap them at the Mewes, and thereupon stayed, so as they came not at the time appointed: Whereupon, the king asking why they came not according to their promise? It was answered, because hee kept not his promise, there being an Ambush of a Thousand armed men laid to surprize them at the Mewes. The king hearing this was astonied, and swore he knew of no such thing, and commanded presently the place should be searched, but it was true; an ambush was laid, but not at the Mewes, but in a place about Westminster, where Sir Thomas Tryvet and Sir Nicholas Brember had assembled them. This one action might have made the king sensible of his favorites abusing his authority; but that where affection makes the construction, all things are taken in a good sense; or was it perhaps they had a Warrant dormant, to prosecute the kings ends without the kings knowledge? Yet the Lords after this, receiving a safe conduct from the king, came to Westminster; of whose comming when the king heard, hee apparelled himselfe in his royall-Robes, and with his Scepter in his hand, came into the great Hall; before whom, the Lords upon their knees presented themselves, the king bidding them welcome, and taking each of them by the hand; Then the lord Chancellor making a speech, wherein he blamed them for raysing of Armes, and requiring to know the cause; they answered, They had done it for the good of the King and kingdome, and to take away the Traitors about the King. Upon this the king himself spake, asking him whether they thought to compel him by strong hand? have not I (saith he) sufficient men to beat you down? truly in this behalf I make no more account of you then of the basest skullion in my kytchin; yet after these great words, he lift up the Duke of Glocester, who all this while was kneeling, and commanded the rest also to rise, and then led them courteously to his chamber, where they sate and dranke together: And finally it was concluded they should all meete againe, as well these Lords, as those they accused, at the next Parliament; which the king promised to call speedily, and each party to receive there according to Justice, and in the meane time all parties to be in the kings protection. But when the Favorite Lords heard this, they told the king plainly, they neither durst nor would put themselves to the hazard of such a meeting, and therfore the Duke of Ireland and the rest of that faction left the Court to bee out of the way: But the king not enduring their absence, appointed Thomas Mollineux the Constable of the castle of Chester, to raise an Army, and to safe-conduct the duke of Ireland to him; But they being come as far as Radcost-bridge, were encountred by the Earle of Darby; and the Duke of Ireland, not daring to joyne battell with him, fled; and being to passe a River, cast away his gantlets and sword (to bee the more nimble) nimble) and giving his horſe the ſpur, leapt into the river, and ſo eſcaped; that when theſe things were afterwards found, it was verily thought hee had been drowned, till news came he was got into Holland, where being no very welcome gueſt, hee went from thence into the Biſhoprick of Utricht, and after two or three yeeres ſcambling about in manner of a fugitive, at Lovaine in Brabant he ended his life. A man of many good parts, and worthy enough of his Princes favor, if with that favor he had not grown proud, and in that pride, injurious and inſulting over others no leſſe deſerving then himſelfe. Hee was valiant enough againſt any man but the Earle of Darby, and of him indeede both the Genius of the Duke of Ireland, and of King Richard himſelfe ſeemed to ſtand in feare, for neither of them durſt meet him in the field, though encouraged to it by thoſe about them.

About this time the Duke of Suffolke doubting ſome plots laid to ſurprize him, fled over to Calis in diſguiſe, ſhaving his beard, and counterfeiting himſelfe a Poulterer, to ſell certain foule which hee had gotten; but being come to Callis, was by the Lord William Beauchampe, Deputy of the Town, ſent back into England, whom the King notwithſtanding permited to goe at large, to make it be thought hee was more afraid then hurt, more ſuſpicious then he needed By this time the Lords had gotten matter enough againſt the King, at leaſt to juſtifie their Armes, and thereupon with an Army of forty thouſand men, they came to London, where after ſome debate, they were received; and then the Duke of Glouceſter, the Earles of Darby and Nottingham went to the King in the Tower; to whom, after humble ſalutations, they ſhewed the Letter which he had written to the Duke of Ireland, to levy an Army for their deſtruction: likewiſe the Letters which the French King had written to him, conteining a ſafe conduct for him to come into France, there to doe Acts to his own diſhonor and the kingdoms.

This done, upon the Kings promiſe that he would come the next day to Weſtminſter to treate further of theſe matters, the Lords departed, only the Earles of Nottingham and Darby, at the Kings inſtance, ſtayed all night; but before the King went to bed, his minde was cleane altered for keeping his promiſe to meete the Lords the next day at Weſtminſter: which the Lords underſtanding, they ſent peremptorily to him, that if he came not according to his promiſe, they would chooſe another king, that ſhould hearken to the faithfull Counſell of his Lords. This touched the king ſo to the quick, that the next morning he went and met the Lords; who there declared to him, how much it concerned the good of the kingdome, that thoſe Traitours ſo often ſpoken of, ſhould be removed from the Court: To which, the king, though much againſt his will, yet at laſt condiſcended. And thereupon preſently Alexander Nevil Archbiſhop of York, and Thomas Ruſhoke Biſhop of Chicheſter, and Confeſſour to the king, were expelled the Court; who not willing to come to after-reckonings, fled no man knew whither. They expelled alſo John Fourdham Biſhop of Durham, Lord Treaſurer; the Lord Zouch of Haringworth, the Lord Burvell, the Lord Beaumont, Albery de Veere, Baldwin de Bereford, Richard Adderbury, John Worth, Thomas Clifford, and John Lovel, knights: but conſtreined to put in Sureties to appeare at the next Parliament. Alſo certaine Ladies were expelled the Court; as the Lady Poynings, the Lady Mouling, and others; bound to appeare at the next Parliament. There were alſo arreſted, and committed to ſeverall Priſons, Sir Symon Burley, William Elmham, John Beauchamp Steward of the kings houſe, Sir John Salisbery, Sir Thomas Trivet, Sir James Berneys, Sir Nicolas Dagworth, and Sir Nicolas Brember, knights. Alſo Richard Clifford, John Lincolne, Richard Mitford, the kings Chaplains; Nicolas Sclake Deane of the kings Chappell, and John Blake a Lawyer.

Shortly after, the Parliament began, (called afterward, The Parliament that wrought wonders:) On the firſt day whereof, were arreſted as they ſate in their places, all the Juſtices (but onely Sir William Skipwith:) as Sir Roger Fulthorpe, Sir Robert Belknappe, Sir John Cary, Sir John Holt, Sir William Brooke, and John Aſton the kings Serjeant at Law; and were all ſent to the Tower, for doing contrary to an Agreement made the laſt Parliament. Alſo in the beginning of this Parliament, Robert Veere Duke of Ireland, Alexander Nevill Archbiſhop of York, Michael de la Poole

Poole Earle of Suffolke, and Sir Robert Treſilian Lord Chiefe Juſtice of England, were openly called to anſwer Thomas of Woodſtock Duke of Glouceſter, Richard Earle of Arundell, Henry Earle of Darby, and Thomas Earle of Nottingham, upon certaine Articles of high Treaſon: and becauſe none of them appeared, It was ordained by whole conſent of Parliament, they ſhould be baniſhed for ever, and all their lands and goods ſeized into the Kings hands (their intailed lands onely excepted.) Shortly after, the Lord Chief Juſtice Robert Treſilian, was found in an Apothecaries houſe in Weſtminſter; where being taken, he was brought to the Duke of Glouceſter, who cauſed him the ſame day to be had to the Tower, and from thence drawne to Tyburne, and there hanged. On the morrow after, Sir Nicolas Brember was brought to his Anſwer; who being found guilty, was beheaded with an Axe which himſelfe had cauſed to be made for beheading of others. After this, Sir John Salisbery, and Sir James Berneys, luſty young men, were drawne and hanged; as alſo John Beauchamp L. Steward of the Kings houſe, John Blake Eſquire: and laſtly, Sir Symon Burley, ſonne to the great Sir John Burley Knight of the Garter, was beheaded on Tower-hill; whoſe death the King tooke more heavily and more heynouſly then all the reſt. Alſo all the Juſtices were condemned to dye; but by the Queenes interceſſion, they were onely baniſhed the Realme, and all their lands and goods confiſcate, onely a ſmall portion of money was aſſigned them for their ſuſtentation. Finally, in this Parliament, an Oath was required and obteined of the King, that he ſhould ſtand unto, and abide ſuch Rule and Order as the Lords ſhould take: and this Oath was required alſo of all the Inhabitants of the Realme.

In the later end of the Kings eleventh yeere, the Earle of Arundell was ſent to Sea, with a great Navy of ſhips and men of warre; with whom went the Earles of Nottingham and Devonſhire, Sir Thomas Percy, the Lord Clifford, the Lord Camoin, Sir William Elmham, and divers other Knights, to ayde the Duke of Britaine againſt the king of France: but before they came, the Duke of Britaine was reconciled to the king of France; and ſo needing not their ayde, all this great Fleet returned with doing nothing. And it was indeed a yeere of doing nothing, unleſſe we reckon ſome petty Inroades of the Scots: and that Sir Thomas Tryvet dyed with a fall off his horſe: and that Sir John Holland, the Kings brother by the mother, was made Earle of Huntington: and that there was Contention in Oxford, between the Northerne and the Southerne Scholars; which was pacified by the Duke of Glouceſter.

In his twelveth yeere, Commiſſioners were appointed to meet at Balingham, betwixt Callis and Bulloigne, to treat of a Peace betweene the Realmes of England, France, and Scotland: and after long debating, a Truce was at laſt concluded, to begin at Midſomer next, and to laſt three yeeres. But now the king, to ſhew his plenary authority of being at full age, removed the Archbiſhop of York from being Lord Chancellor, and put in his place William Wickham Biſhop of Winchеſter: alſo he removed the Biſhop of Hereford from being Treaſurer, and put another in his place: The Earle of Arundell likewiſe, unto whom the Government of the Parliament was committed, and the Admiralty of the Sea; was removed, and the Earle of Huntington put in his roome.

About this time, the Lord John Haſtings Earle of Pembrooke, as he was practiſing to learne to Juſt, was ſtricken about the Privy parts, by a knight called Sir John St. John, of which hurt he ſoone after dyed. In whoſe Family, it is memorable, that for many Generations together, no ſonne ever ſaw his father, (the father being alwaies dead, before the ſonne was borne.) The Originall of this Family was from Haſtings the Dane, who in the Reigne of K. Alured, long before the Conqueſt, about the yeere 890. came with Rollo into England. But howſoever, in this John Haſtings ended the then Honorable Titles of the Haſtings; for this man dying without iſſue, his Inheritances were diſperſed to divers perſons: The Honour of Pembrooke came to Francis at Court, by the kings Gift: the Baronies of Haſtings and Welford came to Reynold Gray of Ruthin: the Barony of Aburgeveny was granted to William Beauchamp of Bedford.

About this time, John Duke of Lancaſter was created Duke of Aquitaine, receiving ving at the Kings hands the Rod and the Cap, as Inveſtitures of that Dutchy. Alſo the Duke of Torke ſonne and heire was created Earle of Richmond.

In his thirteenth yeere, a Royall Juſts was Proclaimed to be holden within Smithfield in London, to begin on Sunday next after the Feaſt of S. Michael: which being publiſhed, not onely in England, but in Scotland, in Almaigne, in Flanders, in Brabant, and in France; many ſtrangers came hither; amongſt others, Valeran Earle of S. Poll, that had maried king Richards Siſter; and William the young Earle of Oſtervant, ſonne to Albert de Bavyere Earl of Hollond and Heynoult. At the day appointed there iſſued forth of the Tower, about three a clock in the afternoone, ſixty Courſers apparrelled for the Juſts; and upon every one an Eſquire of Honour, riding a ſoft pace: After them, came forth foure and thirty Ladies of Honour, (Froyſſard ſaith, threeſcore) mounted on Palfries, and every Lady led a knight with a chaine of Gold: Theſe knights being on the Kings part, had their armour and apparell garniſhed with white Hearts, and Crownes of Gold about their necks; and ſo they came riding through the ſtreets of London, unto Smithfield: The Juſts laſted divers dayes; all which time the King and Queen lay at the Biſhops Palace by Pauls Church, and kept open houſe for all Commers.

In his Fifteenth yeere, the Duke of Lancaſter went into France, having in his traine a thouſand horſe; and met the king of France at Amiens, to treat of a Peace between the two kingdomes: but after long debate, a Truce onely was concluded for a yeere.

About this time alſo, the King required the Londoners to lend him a Thouſand pounds: which they refuſed to doe; and not onely ſo, but they abuſed an Italian Merchant, for offering to lend it. This moved the King to ſome indignation: to which was added the complaint of a Ryot committed by the Citizens, againſt the ſervants of the Biſhop of Salisbury L. Treaſurer; for that, where one of the Biſhops ſervants, named Walter Roman, had taken a horſe-loafe out a Bakers baſket, as he paſſed in the ſtreets, and ran with it into his Lords houſe; the Citizens thereupon aſſaulted the houſe, and would not be quieted, till the Major and Aldermen were faine to come, and with much adoe appeaſed them. Upon complaint hereof, urged againſt the Citizens, by the Biſhop of Salisbury L. Treaſurer, and Thomas Arundell Archbiſhop of York L. Chancellour, the Major and Aldermen, and divers other ſubſtantiall Citizens are arreſted: the Major is committed to the Caſtle of Windſor, and the other to other Caſtles; the liberties of the City are ſeized into the Kings hands, and the authority of the Major utterly ceaſed; the king appointing a Warden to governe the City, firſt Sir Edmund Derligrug, and afterward Sir Baldwin Radington; till at length, by ſpeciall ſuit of the Duke of Glocester, the king was contented to come to London, to ſo great joy of the Citizens, that they received him with foure hundred on horſe-back, clad all in one livery, and preſented the king and Queene with many rich gifts: yet all gave not ſatisfaction, to have their liberties reſtored, till they afterwards paid Ten thouſand pounds. This it is to provoke a Lyon: It may be fortune enough to us, if by any meanes we can but keepe him quiet; for if once we provoke him to lay his paw upon us, it will be hard getting from him, and not be torne in pieces.

In his Sixteenth yeere, the Dukes of Lancaſter and Glocester are once againe ſent into France, to treat of a Peace: but when they could not agree with the French Commiſſioners upon Articles propounded, there was onely a Truce concluded for foure yeeres; though perhaps a further Agreement had then been made, but that the king of France fell newly againe into his old fit of Frenſie, which called away the French Commiſſioners from further Treaty.

In his Eighteenth yeere, a Proclamation was ſet forth, That all Iriſh men ſhould avoyd this Realme, and returne home: The occaſion was, becauſe ſo many Iriſh were come over, that Ireland in a manner was left unpeopled: in ſo much, that where K. Edward the Third had received from thence yeerely the ſumme of Thirty thouſand pounds, the king now laid forth as much to repell Rebels. Whereupon at Michaelmas K. Richard went himſelf into Ireland, attended with the Duke of Glocester, the the Earles of March, Nottingham, and Rutland, the Lord Thomas Percy L. Steward, and divers others of the Engliſh Nobility; to whom came in the Great Oneale king of Meth, Bryan of Thomond king of Thomond, Arthur Macmur king of Leymſter, and Conbur king of Cheveney and Darpe: and there K. Richard ſtayed all that winter, and after Chriſtmas called a Parliament; at which time alſo, the Duke of Torke Lord Warden of England, in the Kings name called a Parliament at Weſtminſter: to the which was ſent forth of Ireland the Duke of Glocester, that he might declare to the Commons the Kings great occaſions for ſupply of money: whoſe words ſo farre prevailed, that a whole Tenth was granted by the Clergie, and a Fifteenth by the Laytie.

In his Twentieth yeere was the famous Enterview between the two Kings of England and France: There was ſet up for K. Richard a rich Pavilion, a little beyond Guyſnes, within the Engliſh pale; and another the like for the French King, on this ſide Arde: The diſtance betwixt the two Tents was beſet on either ſide with Knights armed with their ſwords in their hands, foure hundred French on one ſide, and foure hundred Engliſh on the other: The two Kings before their meeting, took a ſolemne Oath, for aſſurance of their faithfull and true meaning, to obſerve the ſacred Lawes of Amity one toward another, in this Enterview. After the two Kings were come together, it was accorded, that in the ſame place where they met, there ſhould be builded at both their coſts, a Chappell, for a perpetuall memory, which ſhould be called, The Chappell of our Lady of Peace. On Simon and Judes day, the kings talked togther of Articles concerning the Peace; and having concluded them, they received either of them an Oath, upon the holy Evangeliſts, to obſerve and keepe them. This done, the French king brought his daughter Iſabel, and delivered her to K. Richard, who ſhortly after at Calis maried her, and upon the 17. of January following, ſhe was Crowned Queen at Weſtminſter. A Match of great honour, but of little conveniency, and leſſe profit; for the Lady being but eight yeeres of age, there could be no hope of iſſue a long time, which was K. Richards greateſt want; and as little ſupply of his wants otherwiſe, her Portion perhaps ſcarce paying the charges of his journey to fetch her, which coſt him three hundred thouſand markes.

The Duke of Lancaſter, in the thirteenth yeere of K. Richards Reigne, had been created Duke of Aquitaine: but when the Gaſcoigners would not receive him, ſhewing reaſons why that Dukedome ought not to be ſeparated from the Crown of England, his Grant was revoked, and ſo it remained ſtill in Demeſne of the Crown.

At this time, in a Parliament, the Duke of Lancaſter cauſed to be legitimated, the iſſue he had by Katherine Swinford, before he maried her; of whom, Thomas Beaufort was created Earle of Sommerſet.

This yeere alſo, the king receiviug the money back, which had been lent to the Duke of Britaine, upon Breſt, delivered up the Towne unto him; and thereupon, the Engliſh ſouldiers that were there in Garriſon, were all diſcharged and ſent home; who, at a Feaſt which the king kept at Weſtminſter, comming in companies together into the Hall; as ſoone as the king had dined, and was entring into his Chamber, the Duke of Glocester aſked him, if he did marke thoſe men that ſtood in ſuch troops in the Hall: Yes marry (ſaid the king) who were they? They were (ſaid the Duke) thoſe ſouldiers, who by your rendring up of Breſt have been ſent home, and now muſt either ſtarve or ſteale; and therewithall, very unadviſedly in words, taxed the king with unadvisednes of his deed: To whom the king in great anger reply'd, Why Unkle, doe you thinke me either a Merchant, or a Foole, to ſell my land? By S. John Baptiſt, no: But could I refuſe to render the Town, when tender was made of the money lent upon it? Indeed nothing could more diſcover the Duke of Glocesters, either weakneſſe, if he knew not that Breſt was but onely a Morgage; or injuſtice, if knowing it, he would have had the king, though the money were tendred, to have kept it ſtill: but ſuch is the courſe of many, to take part with the Politicks againſt the Ethicks; work their ends by doing unjuſtly, when doing juſtly ought to be their chiefeſt end. How-ever it was, the multiplying of words about this matter, kindled in the King such a displeasure against the Duke, that it could never afterward be quenched, but by his blood. And first he complained to his other two Unkles, the Dukes of Lancaster and Yorke, of his undutifull behaviour towards him; who told the King, Their brother perhaps might let fall some unadvised words, but they knew his heart to be true and faithfull. Yet doubting how far the King might presse upon them to answer for their brothers faithfulnes, they retired from Court: which gave the Dukes enemies time to incense the King farther against him. It happened, that the Duke of Glocester had with him one day at his house, the Abbot of S. Albans, that was his Godfather, and the Prior of Westminster: and after dinner falling in talke with them, amongst other communications the Duke required the Prior to tell truth, whether he had any Vision the night before? To which the Prior was loath, at first, to make a direct Answer; but at last, being earnestly requested, as well by the Abbot as the Duke, he confessed that he had a Vision indeed, which was, that the Realme of England should be destroyed through the Misgovernance of K. Richard. By the Virgin Mary (said the Abbot) I had the very same Vision. Whereupon the Duke presently disclosed to them all the secrets of his minde, and by their devices contrived an assembly of divers great Lords of the Realme, to meet at Arundell-Castle that day Fortnight; at which time he appointed to be there himselfe, with the Earles of Darby, Arundell, Marshall, and Warwick; also the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Abbot of S. Albans, the Prior of Westminster, with divers others: And accordingly all these met at Arundell Castle, at the day appointed: where receiving first the Sacrament, by the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury, to be assistant each to other, in all such matters as they should determine; They resolved to seize upon K. Richard, and upon the Dukes of Lancaster and York, and commit them to Prison; and all the other Lords of the Kings Councell, they determined should be drawne and hanged. But the Earle Marshall, that was Deputy of Calis, and had maried the Earle of Arundels daughter, discovered all their Counsell to the King; who thereupon, by a plot devised by his Councell, tooke his brother the Earle of Huntington with him, and rising from supper, rode that night to the Duke of Glocesters house at Plashey in Essex. When the King came thither, the Duke was a-bed; but informed of it, cast his cloake about his shoulders, and came down, bidding the Kings Grace, with all reverence, welcome. The King courteously requested him to goe and make him ready, for that he must needs ride with him a little way, to conferre of some busines. The Duke presently made him ready and came downe; and as soone as the King and his Company was gone a little way from the house, and the Duke with him, the Earle Marshall arrested the Duke, as he had been appointed to doe by the King; who immediately was sent to Calis, where, after some time, he was dispatched of his life, either strangled, or else smothered with pillowes, as some write. At the very same time was the Earle of Arundell apprehended, by the Earles of Rutland and Kent: the Earle of Warwick also, when the King had invited him to dinner, and shewed him very good countenance, was taken and arrested in the place: As likewise at the same time were apprehended, and committed to the Tower, the Lord John Cobham, and Sir John Cheyny. Shortly after, the King procured them to be indicted at Nottingham, suborning such as should appeale them in Parliament; namely, Edward Earle of Rutland, Thomas Mowbray Earle Marshall, Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, John Holland Earle of Huntington, Thomas Beaufort Earle of Somerset, John Montacute Earle of Salisbury, Thomas L. Spenser, and the Lord William Scroope L. Chamberlaine: and in the meane time, the King sent for a Power of Cheshire men, to keep Watch and Ward about his person.

On the 17. of September, a Parliament began at Westminster; wherein the King complained as well of many things done by the Lords in his Minority, as also of the hard dealing which they had used towards the Queen, who was three houres at one time on her knees, before the Earle of Arundell, for one of her Esquires, named John Calverley, who nevertheless had his head smitten from his shoulders; and all the answer she could get, was this: Madame, pray for your selfe and your Husband, and and let this suit alone. Those that set forth the Kings grievances in this Parliament, were John Bushie, William Bagot, and Thomas Gregne. The cause of assembling the Parliament was shewed, that the King had called it for reformation of divers transgressions against the Peace of his Land, by the Duke of Glocester, the Earles of Arundell, Warwick, and others. Then Sir John Bushie, Speaker of the Parliament, made request on behalfe of the Commonalty, that they might be punished according to their deservings; and specially the Archbishop of Canterbury, who then sate next the king, whom he accused of high Treason. When the Archbishop began to answer, Sir John Bushie besought the king that he might not be admitted to answer, least by his great wit and cunning he might lead men away to believe him. And here Sir John Bushie in all his talke did not attribute to the king Titles of honour due and accustomed, but such as were fitter for the Majestie of God then for any Earthly Prince. And when the Archbishop was constrained to keepe silence, Sir John Bushie proceeded, requiring on the behalfe of the Commons, that the Charters of Pardon, granted to the Duke of Glocester, and the Earles of Arundell and Warwick, should be revoked. The king for his part protested that they were drawne from him by compulsion, and therefore besought them to deliver their opinions, what they thought thereof: whereupon, the Bishops first gave their sentence, that the said Pardons were revocable, and might be called in; but pretending a scrupulosity, as if they might not with safe consciences be present where Judgement of Blood should passe, they appointed a Lay-man to be their Prolocutor for that turne. The Temporall Lords likewise gave their sentence, that the Pardons were revocable: onely the Judges and Lawyers were not of this opinion. But howsoever, the Archbishop of Canterbury is hereupon condemned to perpetuall Exile, and appointed to avoyd the Realme within sixe weekes. Also the Earle of Arundell is by the Duke of Lancaster who sate that day as High Steward, condemned of Treason, and on the Tower-hill beheaded. There went to see the execution, divers Lords; amongst whom was the Earle of Nottingham, that had maried his daughter, and the Earle of Kent, that was his daughters sonne: to whom, at the place of his execution he said, Truly it would have beseemed you rather to bee absent, then here at this businesse; but the time will come ere long, that as many shall marvell at your misfortune, as they doe now at mine. After his death, a Fame went, that his head was grown to his body againe: whereupon, the tenth day after his buriall, his body, by the kings appointment was taken up, and then found to be a Fable. After this, the Lord Thomas Beauchamp Earle of Warwick was brought forth, and charged with the like Treasons; but by the intercession of the Duke of Lancaster and other Lords, after confession of his fault, was only confin'd into the Isle of Man. Likewise the lord Cobham, and Sir John Cheyny were onely banished, or (as Fabian saith) condemned to perpetuall Prison. The Parliament after this was held at Shrewsbery; where, for the love the king bore to the Gentlemen and Commons of the Shire of Chester, he caused it to be Ordained, that from thenceforth it should be called and known by the name of the Principality of Chester; and herewith intitled himselfe Prince of Chester. At this Parliament also, called the Great Parliament, He created five Dukes, and a Dutchesse; one Marquesse, and foure Earles. The Earle of Darby was created Duke of Hereford; the Earle of Nottingham, Duke of Norfolke; the Earle of Rutland, Duke of Aubemarle; the Earle of Kent, Duke of Surrey; the Earle of Huntington, Duke of Exceter; and the Lady Margaret Marshall Countesse of Norfolke, was created Dutchesse of Norfolke: The Earle of Somerset was created Marquesse Dorset; the Lord Spenser was made Earle of Glocester; the Lord Nevill, Earle of Westmerland; the Lord Scroope, Earle of Wiltshire; and the Lord Thomas Percy L. Steward of the kings house, was made Earle of Worcester: and for the better maintenance of their estates, he divided amongst them a great part of those lands that belonged to the Duke of Glocester, the Earles of Arundell and Warwick. Also in this Parliament, the Judges gave their opinions, That when Articles are propounded by the king to be handled in Parliament, if other Articles be handled before those be first determined, that it is Treason in them that doe it. And in this Parliament, the king brought it so to-bout, that he obtained the whole power of the Parliament to be conferred upon certaine persons, namely, John Duke of Lancaster, Edmund Duke of Yorke, Edmund Duke of Aumerle, Thomas Duke of Surrey, John Duke of Exceter, John Marquesse Dorset, Roger Earle of March, John Earle of Salisbury, and divers others; or to any seven or eight of them: and these, by virtue of this Grant, proceeded to conclude upon many things, which concerned generally the knowledge of the whole Parliament, to the great prejudice of the State, and a dangerous example in time to come. A Generall Pardon was also granted for all offences, to all the Kings subjects, but only to Fifty, whose names he would not expresse, but reserved them to his own knowledge, that when any of the Nobility offended him, he might at his pleasure name him to be one of the number excepted, and so keepe them still within his danger. And for the more strengthening the Acts of this Parliament, the King purchased the Popes Buls, containing grievous censures and curses to them that should break them. And now the heads of the opposite Faction having lost their heads, and all things as well setled as could be desired, the King was secure, as thinking himselfe safe; and he had indeed been safe, if Time and Fortune were not Actours in Revenge, as well as men; or rather, if a Superiour Power did not interpose, whose wayes are as secret as himselfe is invisible.

It now fell out, (though Writers differ what it was fell out) for some write, that Thomas Mowbray accused the Duke of Hereford; others, that Henry Duke of Hereford accused Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolke, for speaking words sounding highly to the Kings dishonour: to which the Duke of Norfolk being called to answer, charged the Duke of Hereford before the King, that he lyed falsly. Whereupon a Combat was agreed upon between them: The King labored to make them friends; but not prevailing, he gave way to proceed in Combat, and the place to be at Coventry: where at the day and houre appointed, the Duke of Hereford, mounted on a white Courser, barded with green and blew Velvet, imbroidered sumptuously with Swans and Antelops of Goldsmiths worke, approached the Lists; Of whom the Marshall, being the Duke of Surry, demanding who he was? he answered, I am Henry of Lancaster, Duke of Hereford, that am come hither to doe my endeavour against Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolke, as a Traitour, untrue to God, the King, his Realme, and me: Then incontinently he swore upon the holy Evangelists, that his quarrell was true and just, and thereupon required to enter the Lists, where in a Chaire of green Velvet he sate downe and reposed himselfe. Then came the Duke of Norfolke, his horse barded with Crimson velvet, imbroidered richly with Lyons of Silver, and Mulbery trees; and when he had taken his oath before the Constable the Duke of Aumerle, that his quarrell was just, he entred the Lists, and sate him down in his Chaire of Crimson velvet, curtained about with white and red Damask. Then the Marshall viewed their speares, to see that they were of equall length; and then the Heralds proclaimed, on the Kings behalfe, they should mount on horseback, and addresse themselves to the Combat. But when they were set forward, and had their Speares in their Rests, the King cast down his Warder, and the Heralds cryed, Stay, Stay. Then the king caused their Speares to be taken from them, and deliberated with his Councell, what was fit to be done in so weighty a cause. After two long houres, it was at last concluded, that Henry Duke of Hereford should within fifteen dayes depart out of the Realme, and not returne before ten yeeres were expired, upon paine of death; And that Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolke, should likewise avoyd the Realme, and never to returne into England, upon the like paine. It is observable, that this Censure was passed against the Duke of Norfolke, the very same day Twelve-moneth, in which he had taken order to put the Duke of Glocester to death at Calis, whereof he was then Governour. When these Judgements were once read, the king called before him both the Dukes, and made them sweare, that the one should never come in place where the other was. After this, the Duke of Norfolke went into Almaine, and from thence to Venice, where after some time he dyed with sorrow. The Duke of Hereford, at the taking his leave of the king, had foure yeeres of his Banishment released, and then went to Calis, and from thence to Paris, Paris, where, of the French king he was so kindly received, that by his favour he had obtained in mariage the onely daughter of the Duke of Berry, Unkle to the French king, if King Richard by messengers had not hindered him.

It was a Custome in those dayes, to punish the delinquencies of Great men by banishment out of the Realme; a Custome not more grievous to the Subject, then dangerous to the Prince; for by this course, they had meanes to worke so closely in their mines of Revenge, that the Fabrick of a Kingdome was in danger to be blown up, before their working could be perceived. An example whereof was never more plainly seen then at this time, in the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Hereford: For they in their Banishment meeting often together, and aggravating the Grievances of king Richards Government, fell at last to consult by what meanes he might best be removed, seeing there was no hope he could ever be reclaimed. In the time of their consultation about it, John Duke of Lancaster, father to the Duke of Hereford, dyed, at Ely house in Holborne: And as if Fortune herselfe meant to doe their worke for them, Sollicitations came from many parts of England, to move the Duke of Hereford to come now & take the Government upon him, wherein they would be ready to assist him. The Duke heated before by the Archbishops instigation, and now set on fire by this sollicitation, gives Fortune no leisure to alter her minde, by delaying the time, but without further deliberation prepares to be going: and taking with him the Archbishop, the Lord Cobham, Sir Thomas Erpington, and Sir Thomas Ramston Knights; John Norbury, Robert Waterton, and Francis Coyne Esquires, and about some threescore other persons, as many as he could readily get; in three ships which the Duke of Britaine lent him, he put to Sea; where hovering about the Coast a while, to marke the countenance of the shores, he landed at last, about the beginning of July, at Ravenspurre in Yorkeshire; which no sooner was knowne, but there repaired to him, the Lords, Willoughby, Rosse: Darcie, and Beaumont; and shortly after, at Doncaster, the Earle of Northumberland, and his sonne Sir Henry Percy, with the Earle of Westmerland, and great numbers of the Gentry and common sort; of whom, though some had invited him to come to take the Government of the Realme upon him, yet he forbore to pretend that for any cause of his comming, but made a solemne Protestation, that he came onely to take possession of the Inheritances descended upon him from his father, which king Richard most unjustly, and contrary to his promise, had seized into his hands: for this was a Reason had no objection: the other he reserved, till his Power should not need to regard Objections. And indeed, no snow-ball ever gathered greatnesse so fast by rolling, as his Forces increased by marching forward; for by that time he came to Berkly, he had got a mighty Army; and within three dayes after, all the Kings Castles in those parts were surrendred to him. The Duke of Yorke, left Governour of the Kingdome, used his best meanes to raise Forces to resist him, but found few willing to beare Armes against him: whereupon, and perhaps hearing withall, that the Dukes comming was but onely to take possession of his Inheritance, he thought good to goe to Berkly to him, to have there some communication about it. At Berkly, at that time, was arrested the Bishop of Norwich, Sir William Elmham, and Sir Walter Burlie knights; Laurence Drew, and John Golofer Esquires. From Berkly the two Dukes went forward towards Bristow; where in the Castle were the Lord William Scroope Earle of Wiltshire and Treasurer of England, Sir Henry Greene, and Sir Henry Bushye; who were taken, and brought forth bound before the Duke of Lancaster, and the day after arraigned before the Constable and Marshall, found guilty of Treason for misgoverning the King and the Realme, and presently had their heads smitten off. Sir John Russell also was taken there; but he feigning himselfe to be out of his wits, escaped for that time.

All this while K. Richard was in Ireland, where he performed Acts in repressing the Rebels there, not unworthy of him; and having with him amongst other of the Great Lords, the Duke of Lancasters sonne Henry, he there for his towardlinesse in service, Knighted him, by which it appeared that he had no great feare of the Father, when he graced the Sonne; and indeed he needed not have feared him, if his owne absence abſence out of England had not given him advantage. Six weekes were now paſt after the Dukes arrivall in England; in all which time king Richard had no notice of it, by reaſon the windes were contrary to come forth of England: But as ſoon as he heard it, and in what hoſtile manner he proceeded, he then determined to return inſtantly into England; and had done it, but that the Duke of Aumerle his principall Counſellor (whether out of a good meaning, but grounded upon errors, or out of an ill meaning, but ſhadowed with colours) by all meanes perſwaded him to ſtay ſo long till things fitting for his journy might be made ready. It was king Richards ill luck to hearken to this Counſell: but yet he preſently ſent the Earle of Salisbury into England, to provide him an Army out of Wales and Cheſhire, againſt his own comming, which he promiſed faithfully ſhould be within ſixe dayes at the moſt. The Earle landed at Conway in Wales, and had ſoon gotten to the number of Forty Thouſand men: but the ſixe dayes paſſed, and no newes of the King: which made the ſouldiers ſuſpect that he was dead, and thereupon were ready to diſband; but at the Earle of Salisburies perſwaſion, they were contented to ſtay for ſome dayes longer; and when the King came not in that time neither, they then would ſtay no longer, but departed and went home. At length, about eighteen dayes after that the King had ſent away the Earle of Salisbury, he tooke ſhipping, together with the Dukes of Aumerle, Excester, and Surrey, and divers other of the Nobility; with the Biſhops of London, Lincolne, and Carlile; and landed at Barkelowly in Wales. He had about him ſome Cheſhire men, and was at firſt in no great doubt of prevailing: but when he heard that all the Caſtles from the borders of Scotland unto Briſtow, were delivered to the Duke of Lancaſter, and that the greateſt part of the Nobility and Commons tooke part with him, and ſpecially that his principall Counſellors had loſt their heads at Briſtow; then, ſolvuntur frigore membra, he fell ſo utterly to deſpaire, that calling his Army together, he licenſed every man to be gone, and to ſhift for himſelfe. The ſouldiers beſought him to be of good cheere, ſwearing they would ſtand with him to the death: But this encouraged him not at all; ſo as the next night he ſtole from his Army, and with the Dukes of Excester and Surry, the Biſhop of Carlile, Sir Stephen Scroope, and ſome halfe a ſcore others, he got him to the Caſtle of Conway, where he found the Earle of Salisbury, determining there to ſtay, till he might ſee the world at ſome better ſtay. Here the Earle of Worceſter Steward of the Kings houſe, broke his white ſtaffe, and without delay went to the Duke of Lancaſter, who underſtanding that K. Richard was returned out of Ireland, he left the Duke of York at Briſtow, and came back with his Power to Berkly, and from thence the next day came to Glocester, then to Roſſe, after to Hereford, where came to him the Biſhop of Hereford and Sir Edmund Mortimer: on the Sunday following he went to Lymſter, and there the Lord Charleton came to him: from thence he went to Ludlow, and the next day to Shrewsbery, and thither came to him Sir Robert Leigh and Sir John Leigh, and many other, being ſent from Cheſter, to offer their ſervice; thither alſo came to him the Lord Scales, and the Lord Bardolphe, forth of Ireland: From Shrewsbery he went to Cheſter, and from thence ſent for his ſonne and heire, and likewiſe for the Duke of Glocesters ſonne and heire (whom K. Richard had left in cuſtody in Ireland) with all ſpeed to come into England; but the Duke of Glocesters ſon through misfortune periſhed at Sea, or as ſome write, dyed of the plague; the ſorrow whereof cauſed, ſhortly after, his mothers death. After this, the Duke ſent the Earle of Northumberland to the king; who upon ſafe-conduct comming to him, declared, that if it might pleaſe his Grace to undertake, that there ſhould be a Parliament aſſembled, in which Juſtice might be had, and herewith pardon the Duke of Lancaſter of all things wherein he had offended, the Duke would be ready to come to him on his knees, and as an humble ſubject obey him in all dutifull ſervices. Yet upon this conference with the Earle, ſome ſay, the king required onely, that himſelfe and eight more, whom he would name, might have honorable allowance, with the aſſurance of a private quiet life, and that then he would reſigne his Crown; and that upon the Earles Oath that this ſhould be performed, the king agreed to goe with the Earle to meet the Duke: but after foure miles riding, comming to the place where where they had laid an Ambuſh, the King was encloſed, and conſtrained to goe with the Earle to Rutland, where they dined, and from thence to Flint, to bed. The King had very few of his friends about him, but onely the Earle of Salisbury, the Biſhop of Carlile, the Lord Scroope, Sir Nicolas Ferebye, and James D'Arthois a Gaſcoigne, who ſtill wore a white Heart, the Cognizance of his Maſter K. Richard, and neither for Promiſes nor Threats would be drawne to leave it off.

The King being in the Caſtle of Flint, and Duke Henry with his Army approaching neere the Towne, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with the Duke of Aumerle and the Earle of Worceſter, went before to the King; whom the King ſpying from the walls where he ſtood, went downe to meet, and finding they did their due reverence to him on their knees, he tooke them up, and taking the Archbiſhop aſide, talked with him a good while, and as it was reported, the Archbiſhop willed him to be of good comfort, for he ſhould be aſſured not to have any hurt as touching his perſon. After this, the Duke of Lancaſter came to the Caſtle himſelfe, all-armed; and being within the firſt gate, he there ſtayed, till the King, accompanied with the Biſhop of Carlile, the Earle of Salisbury, and Sir Stephen Scroope, who bore the ſword before him, came forth, and ſate down in a place prepared for him. As ſoone as the Duke ſaw him, he came towards him, bowing his knee; and comming forward, did ſo the ſecond time, and the third, till the king tooke him by the hand, and lift him up, ſaying, Deere Couſin, you are welcome. The Duke humbly thanking him, ſaid, My Soveraigne Lord and king, the cauſe of my comming at this preſent, is (your Honour ſaved) to have reſtitution of my Perſon, my Lands and Heritage: Whereto the king anſwered: Deere Couſin, I am ready to accompliſh your will, ſo that you may enjoy all that is yours without exception. After this, comming forth of the Caſtle, the king called for wine; and after they had drunke, they mounted on horſe-back, and rode to Cheſter, the next day to Nantwych, then to Newcaſtle, from thence to Stafford, and then to Lichfield, and there reſted Sunday: after that, they rode forward, and lodged firſt at Coventry, then at Daintree, then at Northampton, next day at Dunſtable, then at S. Albans, and ſo came to London: In all which journy they ſuffered not the king to change his apparell, but made him ride ſtill in one ſuit of raiment, and that but a ſimple one, though he in his time was exceeding ſumptuous in apparell, having one Coate which was valued at Thirty Thouſand markes: And in this ſort he was brought the next way to Weſtminſter, and from thence the next day had to the Tower, and committed to ſafe Cuſtodie. After this, a Parliament was called by the Duke of Lancaſter, but in the name of K. Richard, in which many heinous points of Miſgovernment were laid to his charge, and were ingroſſed up in three and thirty Articles, the chiefe whereof were theſe:

That he had waſtefully ſpent the Treaſure of the Realme.

That without Law or Juſtice, he had cauſed the Duke of Glocester, and the Earle of Arundell to be put to death.

That he had borrowed great ſummes of money, and given his Letters Patents to repay the ſame, and yet not one Penny ever paid.

That he had ſaid, The Laws of the Realme were in his head, and in his breaſt: by reaſon of which fantaſticall opinion, he deſtroyed Noble-men, and impoveriſhed the Commons.

That he changed Knights and Burgeſſes of the Parliament at his pleaſure.

That moſt tyrannouſly he ſaid, that the lives and goods of all his ſubjects were in his hands and at his diſpoſition.

That whereas divers Lords were by the Court of Parliament appointed to treat of matters concerning the ſtate of the Kingdome; they being buſied about the ſame Commiſſion, he went about to appeach them of high Treaſon.

That by force and threats, he enforced the Judges of the Realme, at Shrewſbery, to condiſcend to his way, for the deſtruction of divers of the Lords.

That he cauſed his fathers own brother, the Duke of Glocester, without Law to be attached and ſent to Callis, and there without reaſon ſecretly murthered.

That notwithſtanding the Earle of Arundell at his Arraignment pleaded his Charter of Pardon, yet he could not be heard, but was ſhamefully and ſuddenly put to death.

That

That he assembled certaine Lancastire and Cheshire men, to make warre upon his Lords and suffered them to rob and spoyle, without prohibition.

That though he had made Proclamation that the Lords were not attached for any crime of Treason, yet afterward in the Parliament he laid Treason to their charge.

That notwithstanding his Pardon granted to them, he enforced divers of the Lords partakers to be againe intolerably Fined, to their utter undoing.

That without the assent of the Peeres, he caried the Jewels and Plate of this Kingdome into Ireland.

Upon these, and some other Articles, he was by Parliament adjudged to be deposed from all Kingly Honour, and Princely Government. And thereupon, the King being advised by his owne servants, rather voluntarily to resigne the Crowne, then by compulsion to be forced to it; on the Monday before the nine and twentieth day of September, in the yeere 1399. he made a solemne Resignation, before divers Lords and others, sent to him for that purpose: and an Instrument of his Resignation being made, he would needs read it before them all himselfe, and then subscribed it; and withall, made it his suit, that the Duke of Lancaster might be his Successor, and King after him; and for a signe of his desire hereof, he tooke his Signet Ring of Gold from his finger, and put it upon the Duke of Lancasters; that never man who had used a Kingdome with such violence, gave it over with such patience, or rather such willingnes, that he seemed rather to affect it, then that he was any way forced to it. This Resignation of K. Richard being shewed to the Parliament, both Houses gave their assent; and then Commissioners were appointed to pronounce openly the sentence of his deposing, which was done by the Bishop of Asseph, and all Allegiance renounced to him.

And now it is easie to be observed, what a wonderfull concurrene of fortunes, in behalfe of the Duke of Lancaster, and against K. Richard, happened together, whereof if any one had been missing, he had never been turned out of his Throne in such manner as he was: For first, if it had not happened that K. Richard had been in Ireland at the time when the Duke began his attempt, it had not been possible for him to compasse his designe as he did: And then, if King Richard being in Ireland, he had not by misfortune of weather been kept sixe weekes from hearing of the Dukes arrivall, he had not given him so large a time for raising of Forces, and so more easily might have resisted him: Or after K. Richard heard of the Dukes arrivall, if he had followed the Earle of Salisbury, and not stayed so many dayes longer then he promised, he had found an Army ready to receive him, sufficient at least to have given a stop to the Dukes proceedings: Or when at last he came over, and found his Army to faile him, if withall his own courage had not failed him, but that he had manfully put it to the hazard of a Battell, as his souldiers themselves would have had him to doe, he could not chuse but have made a better end of his busines then now he did. But when all is done, there is no warding the blowes of Fortune; or to say better, No resisting the Decree of Heaven: but seeing that Decree is an Abyssus to us, and may perhaps but be conditionall; we shall manifestly be Traitors to our selves, if we use not our uttermost endeavours to divert it. That it may truly be said, King Richard lost his Crown, more by his own Treason, then by the Treason of any other.

Of his Taxations.

IN his second yeere, in a Parliament held at Glocester: was granted to be paid by the Merchants, upon every sack of wooll a Mark, for this present yeere; and for every pounds worth of wares, brought from beyond Sea, and sold here, sixe pence of the Buyer. In his Third yeere, in a Parliament at Westminster, a Subsidie was granted to be levied of the Great men of the Realm, to the end the Commons might be spared: The Dukes of Lancaster and Britain paid 20 marks; every Earl 6 marks; Bishops and Abbots with Miter, as much: every Monk, three shillings foure pence: also every Justice, Sheriffe, Knight, Esquire, Parson and Vicar, were charged after a certaine rate:

rate; but no Commons of the Layitie. Also this yeere, in another Parliament, was granted a Tenth by the Clergie, and a Fifteenth by the Laytie; but with this condition, That from thenceforth, which was in March, 1380. till the Feast of S. Michael, which should be in the yeere 1381: there should be no more Parliaments: but yet was not observed. In his Fourth yeere, in a Parliament at Northampton, a new kinde of Subsidie was granted; of every Priest Secular or Regular, sixe shillings eight pence; and as much of every Nunne; and of every man or woman, maried or not maried, being sixteen yeeres of age, (beggers onely excepted) foure pence. In his Fifth yeere, a Subsidie was granted by the Merchants, of certaine Customes of their wools which they bought and sold, called a Maletot, to endure for foure yeeres. In his Seventh yeere was granted him one Moyity of a Fifteenth by the Laytie; and shortly after, a Moyitie of a Tenth by the Clergie. In his Ninth yeere, halfe of a Tenth, and halfe of a Fifteenth by the Laytie. In his Eleventh yeere, there was granted him a Tenth of the Clergie, and a Fifteenth of the Laytie. In his Twelveth yeere, at a Parliament, was granted of every Sack of wooll, forty shillings; whereof, ten shillings to be applyed presently to the Kings use; the other thirty to remaine in the hands of Treasurers, towards the charges of warres, if any should happen. Also there was a Subsidie granted, of sixe pence in the pound; whereof, foure pence to the use last mentioned; the other two pence to be at the kings pleasure. In his Fifteenth yeere, at a Parliament, was granted a Tenth of the Clergie, and a Fifteenth of the Laytie, towards the charges of John Duke of Lancaster, sent into France. In his Eighteenth yeere, a Tenth was granted by the Clergie, and a Fifteenth by the Laytie, towards his own journey into Ireland. In his Twentieth yeere, the Clergie granted him a Tenth, to be paid that yeere. In his one and twentieth yeere, upon pretence of having ayded the Duke of Glocester, and the Earles of Arundell and Warwick against him, he caused blanke Charters to be made, which he compelled both Citizens and Gentlemen in the Country to seale, whereby he might charge them afterward to pay whatsoever he required. In his two and twentieth yeere, a Fifteenth and a halfe was granted; and for the Customes of wools, fifty shillings upon every Sack, of Englishmen borne, and three pounds of Strangers.

Of Lawes and Ordinances in his time.

IN his second yeere, in a Parliament at Glocester, it was enacted, That Merchant-strangers might buy and sell in Grosse, or by Retaile, within this Realme. In his Third yeere, in a Parliament at Westminster, It was Ordained, that the Priviledges and Immunities of the Abby of Westminster should remaine inviolate; but with this Proviso, against those that tooke Sanctuary with purpose to defraud their Creditours, That their lands and goods should be lyable to their debts. In his Sixth yeere, a Parliament was holden, in which the Major of London, upon suggestion that the Fishmongers used great deceit in uttering of their Fish, obtained to have it Enacted, That from thenceforth, none of that Company, nor of the Vintners, Grocers, Butchers, or other that sold any provision of Victuals, should be admitted Major of the City: but in the Parliament next following, were restored to their liberty againe, saving that they might not keepe Courts among themselves, but that all transgressions of their Customes should be tryed at the Majors Court. In his Eleventh yeere, K. Richard created John Beauchamp of Holt, Baron of Kedermister, by his Letters Patents; the first that was so made; for before this time, Barons were alwayes made by calling them to Parliaments by the Kings Writ.

Affaires of the Church in his time.

IN the second yeere of this Kings Reigne, there came messengers from the new-elected Pope Urban, to require the Kings ayd against such Cardinals as he named Schismaticks, that had elected another Pope, whom they named Clement: which Cardinalls ſent meſſengers likewiſe to crave his ayd for them, but through perſwaſion of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Urbans requeſt was granted, and Clement rejected. In his fourth year, John Wickliffe ſet forth his opinion touching the Sacrament of the Altar, denying the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation, in ſuch ſort, as the Church of Rome did then teach. In his ſixth year, Henry Spencer Biſhop of Norwich received Bulls from Pope Urban, to grant all priviledges of the Cruſado to all ſuch as would come over and aſſiſt him againſt the Anti-Pope Clement; which being debated in Parliament, It was after much oppoſition, agreed that it ſhould go forward; and thereupon, the Biſhop not only gathered much money from ſuch as would contribute to the expedition, but drew many great Captaines to go themſelves in perſon; as namely, Sir Hugh Calverley, ſir William Farington, the Lord Henry Beaumont, ſir William Elmham, ſir Thomas Tryvet, and divers others. The money raiſed by contribution, came to 25000 Franks, and the Army to 3000 Horſe, and 15000 Foot; with which Forces, the Biſhop paſſing over into Flanders, wonne the Towns of Graveling, Dunkirke, and Newport; but at laſt encountred by a mighty Army of the French, he was put to the worſe, and returned into England. In the twelveth yeare of this Kings Reigne, an Act was made that none ſhould paſſe the Seas to purchaſe promotions or proviſions (as they tearmed them) in any Church or Churches. Alſo in this yeare Thomas late Earle of Lancaſter, by reaſon of miracles reported to be done by him, was Canonized for a Saint. At this time alſo, the Wickliffs merveloully increaſed, Preaching againſt Pilgrimages and Images, whoſe greateſt oppoſer was the Biſhop of Norwich. In his thirteenth yeare, Proclamation was made, that all Beneficed men abiding in the Court of Rome, ſhould return into England by a certain day, under pain of forfeiting their Benefices; and all other not Beneficed, under a certain pain likewiſe. Alſo about this time a Statute was made, that no Eccleſiaſticall perſon ſhould poſſeſſe Manours, Houſes, Lands, Revenues, or Rents whatſoever at the hands of the Feoffee, without the Kings Licence, and the chiefe Lords. In his eighteenth yeare, the Wickliffs were perſecuted, and excommunication pronounced againſt them by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. In this Schiſme of the two Popes, the French Clergy wrote in behalfe of Clement their Pope, and ſent it into England; the Clergy of England on the contrary, wrote in behalfe of Pope Urban, and ſo nothing was agreed.

Works of Piety in his time.

IN the 20th yeare of this Kings Reign, William Bateman Biſhop of Norwich builded Trinitie Hall in Cambridge. In the third year of his Reign, John Philpot Major of London, gave to the Citie certain Tenements, for the which the Chamberlain payeth yearly to thirteen poore people, to every of them ſeven pence the week for ever; and as any of thoſe thirteen perſons dyeth, the Major appointeth one to ſucceed, and the Recorder another. In the one and twentieth yeare of his Reign, King Richard cauſed the great Hall at Weſtminſter to be repaired, both the Walls, Windows, and Roofe. In his time, Simon Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſlain by the Rebels upon Tower hill, built the Weſt-gate of Canterbury, and from thence to the North-gate, commonly called the long wall. Thomas Fits-Alan or Arundell, being Biſhop of Ely, built the great Gatehouſe of Ely houſe in Holborne; and being after Biſhop of Canterbury, he built a faire ſpire ſteeple at the Weſt-end of his Church there, called to this day, Arundell ſteeple, and beſtowed a tuneable ring of five Bells upon the ſame.

Of Caſualties happening in his time.

IN his third yeare, ſo great a mortality afflicted the North parts of England, that the Country became almoſt deſolate. In his ſixt yeare, on the 24 day of May, there happened ſo great an earthquake, or (as ſome write) a waterſhake, that it made Ships in the Havens to beat one againſt the other. In July, in the year 1389. whileſt the King was at Sheene; there ſwarmed in his Court ſuch multitudes of Flyes and Gnats, Gnats, skirmiſhing with one another; that in the end they were ſwept away with brooms by heaps, and buſhels were filled with them. In his twelveth yeare, in March, firſt there were terrible Windes; afterward followed a great mortality, and after that a great dearth; that a buſheli of wheat was ſold for thirteen pence, which was then thought a great price; for the years before it was ſold for ſix pence, and Woull was ſold for two ſhillings a ſtone. In his fourteenth year, on Chriſtmas day, a Dolphin was taken at London-bridge, being ten foot long, and a monſtrous grown fiſh. Ind his eighteenth year, an Exhalation, in likeneſſe of fire appeared in the night in many places of England; which when a man went alone, went as he went, and ſtayed as he ſtayed; ſometimes like a wheele, ſometimes like a Barrell, ſometimes like a timberlogge; but when many went together, it appeared to be far off. Alſo in a Parliament time, ther was a certain Image of waxe made by Necromancie (as was ſayd) which at an houre appointed, uttered theſe words:

The Head ſhall be cut off; the Head ſhall be lift up aloft; the feet ſhall be lift up above the Head: and then ſpake no more. This happened in the Pariiament, called the Marvellous Parliament, not long before the Parliament that wrought wonders. In his one and thirtieth yeare, a River not far from Bedford, ſuddenly ceaſed his courſe, ſo as the channell remained dry by the ſpace of three miles; which was judged to ſignifie, the Revolting of the Subjects from their naturall Prince. In his two and twentieth yeare, almoſt through all England, old Bay-trees withered, and afterwards grew green againe; which was ſuppoſed to import ſome ſtrange event. About the yeare 1380. the making of Gunnes was found by a Germane, which may well be reckoned amongſt caſualties, ſeeing it was found by caſualty; for this Germane having beaten Brimſtone in a morter to powder, and covered it with a ſtone; it happened, that as he ſtruck fire, a ſparke chanced to fall into the powder; which cauſed ſuch a flame out of the morter, that it raiſed the ſtone a great heigth; which after he perceived, he made a Pipe of iron, and tempered the powder with ſome other ingredients, and ſo finiſhed that deadly Engine. The firſt that uſed it, were the Venetians againſt the inhabitants of Geneva.

Of his Wives.

KING Richard in his time had two Wives; the firſt was Anne Daughter to the Emperour Charles the Fourth, and Siſter to the Emperour Wenceſlaus; who lived his wife ten years, and dyed without iſſue at Sheene in Surry, in the year 1392; whoſe death King Richard tooke ſo heavily, that he cauſed the buildings of that Pallace to be thrown down and defaced, as though to revenge himſelfe upon the place, could eaſe his minde, and mitigate his ſorrow. His ſecond Wife was Iſabel Daughter to Charles the Sixth King of France; She was married to him at eight years of age, and therefore never co-habited. After King Richards death ſhe was ſent home, and married afterwards to Charles Son and heire to the Duke of Orleance.

Of his Perſonage and conditions.

HE was the goodlieſt perſonage of all the Kings that had been ſince the conqueſt; tall of ſtature, of ſtreight and ſtrong limbes, faire and amiable of countenance; and ſuch a one as might well be the Son of a moſt beautifull mother. Concerning his Conditions, there was more to be blamed in his Education, than in his Nature; for there appeared in him many good inclinations, which would have grown to be abilities, if they had not been perverted by corrupt flatterers in his youth. He was of a credulous diſpoſition, apt to believe, and therfore eaſie to be abuſed. His greateſt tranſgreſſion was, that he went with his friends ultra aras, where he ſhould have gone but uſq; ad aras. His greateſt imbecilitie, that he could not diſtinguiſh between a flatterer and a friend. He ſeemed to have in him both a French nature and an Engliſh; violent at the firſt apprehenſion, calm upon deliberation; He never ſhewed himſelf more worthy of the Government, than when he was depoſed as unworthy to Governe; for for it appeared, that his Regality was not ſo deare unto him, as a private quiet life, which if he might have enjoyed, he would never have complained that Fortune had done him wrong.

KIng Richard, ſhortly after his Reſignation, was conveyed to the Caſtle of Leeds in Kent, and from thence to Pomfret; where the common fame is, that he was ſerved with coſtly meat, like a King, but not ſuffered once to touch it, and ſo dyed of forced famine. But Thomas Walſingham referreth it altogether to a voluntary pining of himſelfe, through grief of his misfortunes. But one Writer, well acquainted with king Richards doings, ſaith, that king Henry ſitting one day at his Table, ſaid ſighing, Have I no faithfull friend that will deliver me of him who will be my death? This ſpeech was ſpecially noted by one Sir Piers of Exton; who preſently, with eight perſons in his company, went to Pomfret, commanding the Eſquire that tooke the Aſſay before king Richard, to doe ſo no more, ſaying, Let him eat now, for he ſhall not eat long. King Richard ſitting down to dinner, was ſerved without Aſſay; whereat marvelling, he demanded of his Eſquire, why he did not his duty? Sir (ſaid he) I am otherwiſe commanded by Sir Piers of Exton, who is newly come from king Henry. When king Richard heard that word, he tooke the Carving knife in his hand, and ſtroke the Squire on the head, ſaying, The Devill take Henry of Lancaſter and thee together: And with that word, Sir Piers entred the Chamber, with eight armed men, every of them having a Bill in his hand. King Richard perceiving this, put the Table from him, and ſtepping to the foremoſt man, wrung the bill out of his hands, and ſlew foure of thoſe that thus came to aſſaile him; but in concluſion, was felled with a ſtroke of a Poll-axe, which Sir Piers gave him upon the head, with which blow he fell down dead; though it be ſcarce credible, that a man upon his bare word, and without ſhewing any warrant, ſhould be admitted to doe ſuch a fact. Sir Piers having thus ſlaine him, wept bitterly: a poore amends for ſo heynous a treſpaſſe. King Richard thus dead, his body was embalmed, and covered with Lead, all ſave the face, and then brought to London, where it lay at Pauls three dayes together, that all men might behold it, to ſee he was dead: The corps was after had to Langley in Buckinghamſhire, and there buried in the Church of the Friers Preachers: but afterward, by k. Henry the Fift, it was removed to Weſtminſter, and there honorably entombed, with Queen Anne his wife; and that beautifull picture of a King, ſitting crowned in a Chaire of State, at the upper end of the Quire in S. Peters at Weſtminſter, is ſaid to be of him: although the Scots untruly write, that he eſcaped out of Priſon, and led a ſolitary and vertuous life in Scotland, and there dyed, and is buried (as they hold) in the Black-Friers at Sterling. He lived three and thirty yeares, Reigned two and twenty and three moneths.

Men of Note in this Kings time.

MEn of Valour in his time were ſo many, that to reckon them all, would be a hard taſke; and to leave out any, would be an injury: yet to give an inſtance in one, we may take John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, whoſe valour was no leſſe ſeen abroad then at home: In France, in Germany, in Spaine; in all which places he left Trophies of his Victories. But of learned men, we may name theſe: William Thorne an Auguſtine Frier of Canterbury, an Hiſtoriographer: Adam Merimouth, a Canon of Pauls Church in London, who wrote two Hiſtoricall Treatiſes; one intitled Chronicon &c. annorum; another, Chronicon 60. annorum. William Packington ſometime Secretary to the Black Prince, an excellent Hiſtoriographer: William Badbye a Carmelite Frier, Biſhop of Worceſter, and Confeſſour to the Duke of Lancaſter: John Bourg, Chancellour of the Univerſity of Cambridge: William Sclade, a Monke of Buckfaſt Abby in Devonſhire: John Thoriſbye Archbiſhop of Yorke, Lord Chancellour of England, and a Cardinall: William Berton Chancellour of Oxford, an Adverſary verſary to Wickliffe: Philip Repington Abbot of Leiceſter, a Defender of Wickliffe: Walter Brit, a Scholar of Wickliffs, a writer both in Divinity and other Arguments: John Sharpe, a great adverſary to Wickliffe, who wrote many Treatiſes: Peter Pateſhall, a great favourer of Wickliffe: Marcell Ingelno, an excellent Divine, one of the firſt Teachers in the Univerſity of Heydelberg: Richard Withee a learned Prieſt, and an earneſt follower of Wickliffe: John Swaſham Biſhop of Bangor, a great adverſary to the Wickliffs: Adam Eſton, a great Linguiſt, and a Cardinall: John Treviſe, a Corniſh man, and a ſecular Prieſt, who tranſlated the Bible, Bartholmew, De Proprietatibus Rerum; Polichronicon of Ranulph Higden, and divers other Treatiſes: John Moone, an Engliſh man, but a Student in Paris; who compiled in the French tongue, The Romant of the Roſe; tranſlated into Engliſh by Geoffry Chaucer, and divers others.

THE REIGNE OF KING HENRY THE FOURTH.

AFter the Resignation of King Richard, and the sentence of his Deposing openly read in Parliament, Henry Duke of Lancaster riseth up from his seat; and first, making the Signe of the Crosse upon his forehead and breast, he said: In the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost: I Henry of Lancaster claime the Crown of England, as descended by right line from King Henry the Third. And having thus spoken, he sate downe againe. Upon this, the Archbishop conferred with the Lords; and having heard their opinions, he turned to the Commons, asking them, if they would joyne with the Lords, in choosing Henry of Lancaster for their King: who all with one voyce cryed, Yea, Yea: whereupon going to the Duke, he bowed his knee, and taking him by the hand, led him to the Royall seat; and then began a Sermon, taking for his Text, out of the first Booke of the Kings, cap. 9. Vir dominabitur in populo: wherein he declared what a happinesse it is to a Nation to have a King of wisedome and valour, and shewed the Duke of Lancaster to be such a one; and as much the defects in both, of the late king Richard. The Sermon ended, the king thanked them all for his Election; and testified unto them, that he meant not to take advantage against any mans estate, as comming in by Conquest, but that every one should freely enjoy his own, as intimes of lawfull succession. And now a time was appointed for his Coronation; and accordingly, upon the 13th day of October following, the very day wherein the yeere before he had been banished, he was Crowned at Westminster, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, with all Rites and Ceremonies accustomed. At his Coronation, he was anoynted with an Oyle which a Religious man had given to Henry, the first Duke of Lancaster, together with this Prophecie, That the kings anoynted with this oyle, should be the Champions of the Church. This oyle comming to the hands of king Richard, as he was looking amongst his Jewels, going then into Ireland, he was desirous to be anoynted with it, but that the Archbishop of Canterbury told him, it was not lawfull to be anoynted twice: whereupon putting it up againe, at his comming afterwards to Flint, the Archbishop got it of him, and kept it till the Coronation of king Henry, who was the first king of the Realme that was anoynted with it. The day before the Coronation, the king in the Tower made one and forty, some say but twelve, knights of the Bathe, whereof foure were his owne sonnes, Henry, Thomas, John, and Humfry, all then alive; and with them, three Earles, and five Barons.

Barons. Upon the Feast-day, many claimed Offices, as belonging to their Tenures, to which, upon shewing their Right, they were admitted. And now the King made divers new Officers: The Earle of Northumberland he made Constable of England; the Earle of Westmerland was made Lord Marshall; Sir John Serle, Chancellor; John Newbery Esquire, Treasurer; and Sir Richard Clifford was made Lord Keeper of the Privy Seale: The Lord Henry his eldest sonne, being then about thirteen yeers of age, was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester, and soone after also Duke of Aquitaine: and the Crowne was by Parliament Entailed to King Henry, and the heires of his body lawfully begotten.

After this a Parliament was holden, in which the Acts made in the Eleventh yeere of King Richard were revived, and the Acts made in his one and twentieth yeere were wholly repealed; and they who by that Parliament were attainted, were restored to their Lands and Honours: whereupon Richard Earle of Warwick was delivered out of Prison, and the Earle of Arundells sonne recovered his Inheritance; and many other also that were banished, or imprisoned by King Richard, were then fully restored to their liberty and estates. Also the King gave to the Earle of Westmerland the County of Richmond; and to the Earle of Northumberland the Isle of Man, to be holden of him by bearing the sword wherewith he entred into England. And now was the time for shewing of Spleens: Sir John Bagot then Prisoner in the Tower, accused the Earle of Aumerle for speaking words against the Duke of Lancaster, now King: also the Lord Fitzwater accused him for the death of the Duke of Gloucester: The Lord Morley appealed the Earle of Salisbury of Treason: and one Hall accused the Duke of Exceter, for conspiring the death of John of Gaunt the Kings father: But King Henry having entred the Throne in a storme, was willing now to have a Calme; and therefore laying aside the ones Accusations, he accepted of the others Excuses, and received the Duke of Aumerle, and the Duke of Exceter into as much favour, as if they had never been accused:

And to qualifie the hard opinion which forraigne Princes might conceive of King Richards Deposing, He sent Ambassadours into divers Countries, to make it knowne, by what Title, and by what favour of the People he came to the Kingdome. To the Court of Rome he sent John Trenevant Bishop of Hereford, Sir John Cheyny Knight, and John Cheyny Esquire: Into France he sent Walter Sherlow Bishop of Durham, and Thomas Percy Earle of Worcester: Into Spaine he sent John Trevor Bishop of Assaph, and Sir William Parre: and into Germany he sent the Bishop of Bangor, and certaine others. Most of these Princes seemed either not to regard what was done, or were easily perswaded that all was done well: onely Charles King of France was so distemper'd with this indignity offered to his sonne in Law K. Richard, that by violence of his Passion, he fell into his old pangues of Frensie; but somewhat recovered, he resolved to revenge it; wherein many Lords of France shewed themselves forward, but specially the Earle of S. Paul, who had maried K. Richards halfe-sister: yet having prepared an Army in readinesse, when afterward they heard of King Richards death, they dissolved it againe, as considering the time was then past. The Aquitaines also, and specially the Citizens of Burdeaux, as being the place where K. Richard was born, were mightily incensed: but Sir Robert Knolls Lieutenant of Guyen, and afterwards Thomas Percy Earle of Worcester, being sent to them by the King, so perswaded them, that with much adoe they continued in obedience.

It was about this time, moved in Parliament, what should be done with King Richard (for he was not as yet murthered:) Whereupon, the Bishop of Carlile, a learned man and wise, and who had never given allowance to the Deposing of King Richard; now that he was in a place of freedome of speech, he rose up, and said:

"My Lords, The matter now propounded is of marvellous weight and consequence; wherein there are two points chiefly to be considered: the first, Whether King Richard be sufficiently put out of his Throne: the second, Whether the Duke of Lancaster be lawfully taken in. For the first, how can that be sufficiently done, when there is no Power sufficient to doe it? The Parliament cannot, for of

"of the Parliament the King is the Head; and can the Body put down the Head
"You will say, But the Head may bow it selfe downe; and so may the King resigne
"It is true; but what force is in that which is done by force? and who knowes not "that King Richards Resignation was no other. But suppose he be sufficiently cle
"yet how comes the Duke of Lancaster to be lawfully in? If you say, by Conquest
"you speak Treason; for what Conquest without Arms? and can a subject take Arm

"as descended from Edmund Crouchback, the elder sonne of King Henry the Third
"though put by the Crowne for deformity of his body; For who knowes not the "falsenesse of this allegation? seeing it is a thing notorious, that this Edmund was "neither the elder brother, nor yet crooke-backt, (though called so for some other "reason) but a goodly personage, and without any deformity. And your selves
"cannot forget a thing so lately done; who it was, that in the fourth yeere of King
"Richard was declared by Parliament to be Heire to the Crowne, in case K. Richard "should dye without issue. But why then is not that claime made? because, Silent
"leges inter arma; what disputing of Titles against the streame of Power? But "howsoever, it is extreame injustice, that King Richard should be condemned, with"out being heard, or once allowed to make his defence. And now, my Lords, "have spoken thus at this time, that you may consider of it before it be too late;
"for as yet it is in your power to undoe that justly, which you have unjustly done.

Much to this purpose was the Bishops speech; but to as little purpose as if he had gone about to call back Yesterday: The matter was too farre gone; and scarce a person there present, that had not a hope of either a private or a publick benefit by that which was done. Yet against this speech of the Bishop there was neither Protesting nor Excepting; It passed in the House as but one mans opinion: And as for the King, it was neither fit he should use much severity against any Member of that Parliament which had so lately shewed so much indulgence towards him; nor indeed safe, to be too hot in his Punishment, when he was yet scarce warme in his Government. Yet for a warning to use their liberty of speech with more moderation hereafter, the Bishop was arrested by the Marshall, and committed to Prison in the Abby of S. Albans, but afterward without further censure set at liberty; till upon a conspiracy of the Lords, wherein he was a Party, he was condemned to dye, though through extremity of griefe he prevented execution. But as for King Richard, and Edmund Mortimer Earle of March, enough was spoken by the Bishop in both their behalfes, to undoe them both: and indeed, K. Richard was soone after made away; the Earle secured himselfe by retiring farre off, to his Lordship of Wigmore, avoyding the danger of Contention, by not entring the Lists of Aspiring: But although the Divine Providence, for causes hidden from humane knowledge, gave way at this time to the advancement of the younger, the House of Lancaster; yet in the third Generation after, the elder, the House of Clarence recovered its Right, in K. Edward the Fourth; that we may know, it is but staying the leisure of Heaven, for every one to have his Right, either in Person, or by Proxie.

But whether incited by this speech of the Bishop, or otherwise out of the rancour of envy in some, and malice in others; it was not long after, before there grew in the mindes of many both Lords and other, a malignant inclination towards King Henry; and came first to be a Conspiracie in the house of the Abbot of Westminster. This Abbot was a kinde of Booke-statesman, but better read in the Politicks of Aristotle then of Solomon; who remembring some words of King Henry, which he had spoken long before, when he was but Earle of Derby; That Princes had too little, and Religious men too much: and fearing, lest being now king, he should reduce his words into act, he thought it better to use preventing Physick before-hand, then to stand to the hazard of a curing afterward: and thereupon invited to his house the discontented Lords as namely, John Holland Duke of Exceter, Thomas Holland his brothers sonne, Duke of Surry, Edward Duke of Aumerle, John Montacute Earle of Salisbury,

Salisbury, Hugh Spenser Earle of Glocester, John Bishop of Carlile, Sir Thomas Blunt, and Maudlin one of King Richards Chappell: who after dinner conferring together, and communicating their spleenes against King Henry one with another; they resolved at last, both to take away the Kings life, and of the way how to doe it. The device was this: They would publish a solemne Justs to be holden at Oxford, at a day appointed, and invite the King to honor it with his presence; and there, in the time of acting the Justs, when all mens intentions should be otherwise busied, they would have him be murthered. This device was resolved on; Oaths for secrecy were taken; and Indentures sextipartite for performing conditions agreed upon between them, sealed and delivered: The Justs are proclaimed; the King is invited, and promiseth to come; secrecie of all hands kept most firmly to the very day: But though all other kept counsell, yet Fortune would not, but the discovered all; For it fortuned, that as the Duke of Aumerle was riding to the Lords at Oxford, against the day appointed, he tooke it in his way to goe visit his father the Duke of Torke; and having in his bosome the Indenture of Confederacy, his father, as they sate at dinner, chanced to spy it, and asked what it was? to whom his sonne answering, It was nothing that any way concerned him; By S. George, saith his father, but I will see it: and therewithall snatching it from him, read it; and finding the Contents, and reviling his sonne for being now the second time a Traitour, before to King Richard, and now to King Henry, he commanded his horses to be instantly made ready, and with all the speed he could make, rode to Windsor, where the King then lay: but the younger yeeres of his sonne out-rid him, and came to the Court before him; where locking the Gates, and taking the keyes from the Porter, pretending some speciall reason, he went up to the King, and falling on his knees, asked his Pardon. The king demanding, for what offence? he then discovered the whole Plot: which he had scarce done, when his father came rapping at the Court-gates, and comming to the king, shewed him the Indenture of Confederacy which he had taken from his sonne. This, though it amazed the king, yet it informed him of the truth of the matter, whereof he was before doubtfull; and thereupon layes aside his journey to see the Justings of others in jest, and takes care that he be not justled in earnest out of his Throne himselfe. In the meane time, the confederate Lords being ready at Oxford, and hearing nothing of the Duke of Aumerle, nor seeing any preparation for the kings comming, were certainly perswaded that their Treason was discovered: Whereupon falling into consideration of the case they were in, they found there was no place left for them of Mercy, and therefore were to stand upon their Guard, and provide the best they could for their safety: To which purpose, the first thing they did was to apparell Magdalen in Princely robes, a man as like to king Richard in countenance and personage, as one man lightly can be to another; and to give forth that he was king Richard escaped out of Prison, thereby to countenance their proceedings: The next thing was to dispatch messengers to the king of France, and require his assistance. This done, they set forward in Battell-array towards Windsor, against king Henry; but finding him gone to London before they came, they then deliberate what course to take: Some advised to set K. Richard at liberty, before their counterfeit Richard should be discovered: Others thought best to follow the king to London, and set upon him unprovided, and before he had gathered Forces. In this division of Advises, when they could not doe both, they did neither; but as men amazed, marched on, though they knew not well whither, till they came to Colbrooke; by which time the king had gathered an Army of twenty thousand, and was marching towards them: but they not thinking so well of their cause, that they durst put it to the tryall of a battell; or perhaps staying for ayde out of France; withdrew themselves back to Sunnings neere to Reading, where the young Queen lay: to whom their comming gave some flashes of comfort, but quenched before they were throughly kindled: and from thence they march to Cicester; where the Duke of Surry and the Earle of Salisbury tooke up their lodging in one Inne; the Duke of Exceter and the Earle of Glocester in another: And now a strange Accident, beyond the reach of all consultation, gave a period to their Designe; for who would thinke that a private company durſt oppoſe thoſe Lords hauing their Army ſo neere them? yet the Bailiffe of the Towne, upon intelligence (no doubt) that theſe Lords were up in Armes againſt the King, taking with him a company of Townſmen, in the night aſſaulted the Inne where the Duke of Surry and the Earle of Salisbury lay; who thus aſſaulted, made ſhift to defend themſelves till three a clock in the afternoone; but then, being in danger to be taken, a Prieſt, one of their company, ſet diuers houſes in the Towne on fire, thinking thereby to divert the Aſſailants from proſecuting the Lords, to ſaue their houſes: but this inflamed them the more; and ſo hotly they purſued their aſſault, that they wounded the Duke and the Earle to death; who dying that night; their heads were ſtricken off, and ſent up to London. With them alſo were taken, Sir Bennet Shelley, Sir Barnard Brocas, Sir Thomas Blunt, and eight and twenty other Lords, Knights and Gentlemen; who were ſent to Oxford, where the King then lay, and there were put to execution. The Duke of Excester in the other Inne, hearing of this aſſault, fled out of the backſide towards the Campe, intending to bring the whole Army to the reſcue, but the ſouldiers having heard a clamour, and ſeeing fire in the Towne, ſuppoſing the King had been come with all his Forces, out of a ſodaine feare diſperſed themſelves and fled; which the Duke ſeeing, he alſo, with Sir John Shelley, fled into Eſſex, where wandring and lurking in ſecret places, he was at laſt apprehended as he ſate at ſupper in a friends houſe, and led to Plaſhey, and there ſhortly after beheaded; the place, where by his counſell and countenance, the Duke of Glocester, formerly had been apprehended: that we may obſerve, how the Diuine Providence, in revenging of injuries, takes notice, and makes uſe of the very circumſtance of place where the injuries are done. The Earle of Glocester fled towards Wales, but was taken, and beheaded at Briſtow. Magdalen the counterfeit king Richard, was apprehended and brought to the Tower, and afterward hanged and quartered; with Mr. Ferby, another of king Richards Chaplaines. Divers other Lords, and Knights, and Gentlemen, and a great number of meane perſons, were in other places put to death; that ſo much Noble blood, at one time, and for one cauſe, hath ſcarce been heard or read of. The Abbot of Weſtminſter, in whoſe houſe the Plot was contrived, hearing of theſe misfortunes, as he was going between the Monaſtery and his Manſion, fell ſuddenly into a Palſie, and ſhortly after, without ſpeech, ended his life. About this time alſo, a ſtrange peece of Treaſon is reported to have been practiſed againſt the kings life: that there was found in his bed-cloaths an Iron with three ſharpe pikes ſtanding upright; that when the king ſhould have layd him downe, he might have thruſt himſelfe upon them. But ſeeing there is no farther mention of inquiring after it; it ſeemes to have been but an idle rumour not worth beleeving.

But now that the hot Engliſh blood was well allayed, the Welch blood ſprings up as hot: For now, Owen Glendour an Eſquire of Wales, brought up at the Innes of Court in London; partly out of a deſire to revenge a wrong done him (as he conceived) in a ſuit for lands in controverſie between the Lord Grey of Ruthin and him, but chiefly out of an humour of aſpiring, endeavored to draw the Welchmen to a generall defection, telling them, That the Engliſh being at variance amongſt themſelves, now was the time to ſhake off their yoake, and to reſume their owne antient Lawes and Cuſtomes. To whoſe perſwaſions the Welchmen hearkening, made him their king and Captaine; and he having gotten a competent Army, ſets firſt upon his old Adverſary Reynold Lord Grey of Ruthin, and takes him Priſoner; yet with promiſe of Releaſement, if he would marry his daughter; which offer, though the Lord Grey at firſt not onely refuſed, but ſcorned, yet out of neceſſity at laſt he was contented to accept; when notwithſtanding, his deceitfull father in Law trifled out the time of his enlargement, till he dyed. But the Welchmen growing confident upon this ſucceſſe, breake into the borders of Herefordſhire, making ſpoyle and prey of the Country as freely as if they had leave to doe it; for indeed none oppoſed them but onely the Lord Edmund Mortimer, who had formerly withdrawne himſelfe to his Caſtle at Wigmore; and he having aſſembled the Forces of the Country, and joyning battell with them, was taken Priſoner, and then fettered, and caſt into a deepe and vile vile Dungeon. It was thought if Glendour had as well known how to uſe his victory, as to get it; he might at this time have put the Engliſh yoak into a great hazard to be ſhaken off: but he having killed a thouſand of the Engliſh, thought he had done for that time, and ſo giving over the purſuit, retired. The inhumanity of the Welſh women was here memorable, who fell upon the dead carkaſſes of the Engliſh, firſt ſtripping them, and then cutting off their privie parts, and noſes; whereof the one they thruſt into their mouthes, the other they preſſed between their buttocks. Many noble men, ſpecially his kinſmen the Percies, ſollicited King Henry to deliver Mortimer; but the King was deafe of that eare, he could rather have wiſhed both him and his two Siſters in heaven, for then he ſhould be free from conceal'd competitours.

Theſe affronts were at this time ſuffered in the Welch, becauſe the King was now employed in a more dangerous ſervice with the Scots; for they taking advantage of the diſtraction in the kingdome (as it was alwayes their cuſtome to do) had made an In-rode into the County of Northumberland, and ſuddenly one night ſet upon the Caſtle of Werke; tooke and ſpoiled it, and then returned. In revenge wherof, the Engliſh invaded and ſpoiled certain Iſlands of the Orkneys: Then the Scots ſet forth a Fleet, under the conduct of Sir Robert Logon; but before he came to any action, he was encountred, and the greateſt part of his Fleet taken. But theſe were but ſuch affronts, as often happen between troubleſome neighbours; for all this while the Peace was ſtill in being between the Nations, but at laſt it brake out into an open warre upon this occaſion: Robert King of Scots had offered to match his Son David with a Daughter of George Earle of Dunbarre, and had received money of him in part of her portion; and afterward would neither ſuffer the Match to proceed, nor yet pay back the money; but married his Son to a Daughter of Archibold Earle of Douglaſſe: Upon which indignity, George of Dunbarre flyes into England to king Henry; and with his ayd makes divers incurſions into Scotland: Whereupon Robert king of Scots ſent to king Henry, that if he would have the Truce between them to continue, he ſhould deliver to him George of Dunbarre. King Henry anſwered, that he had given him a ſafe conduct, and could not now recall it with his Honor; but as for continuing the Truce, king Robert might do in that what he thought beſt. Upon this anſwer, the king of Scots preſently proclaimed warre againſt him; But king Henry as ready in that matter as he, ſtayed not for king Roberts invading of England; but himſelfe with a puiſſant Army invaded Scotland, burning Caſtles, and Cities, and not ſparing Churches, and Religious Houſes. About the end of September, he beſieged the Caſtle of Maydens in Edenbourgh, where Prince David, and the Earle Douglaſſe were: At which time, Robert Duke of Albanye, who in the king of Scots ſickneſſe managed the buſineſſe, ſent an Herald to king Henry, proteſting upon his honor, that if he would ſtay but ſix dayes, he would give him battell. K. Henry rewarded the Herald, and ſtayed; but ſix times ſix dayes paſſed, but neither Duke of Albany, nor any other for him appeared. And now winter came on, Victualls grew ſcant, and which was worſt, a mortality began in the Engliſh Campe; For which cauſes, king Henry removed his Siege, and returned into England. As ſoone as he was gone, ſir Patrick Hebborne a Scottiſhman, having a good opinion of his valour, thought to do great matters; and with a competent Army of the men of Lough-deane, he invaded Northumberland, making great ſpoile, and loading his Souldiers with prey, and priſoners; but in the Retreit, marching looſely and licentiouſly, was ſet upon by the Earle of Northumberland Vice-warden, at a Towne called Nesbye; where Hebborne himſelfe, and all the floure of Lough-deane were ſlaine; ſir John and William Cockburne, ſir William Buſſe, John and Thomas Hablington Eſquires, and a multitude of common Souldiers taken priſoners. On the Engliſh part few ſlain, and none of any ranke or quality: In revenge whereof, Archibold Douglaſſe with an Army of twenty thouſand entred Northumberland; but at a place called Homildon, were encountred by the Engliſh, under the leading of Henry Lord Percye, ſirnamed Hotſpurre, and George Earle of March, who put them to flight; and after the ſlaughter of ten thouſand of them, tooke five hundred priſoners; whereof the chiefe were Mordack Earle of Fife, (ſonne of the Generall, who in the fight loſt one of his eyes) Thomas Earle of Murrey, Robert Earle of Angus, the Earls of Atholl and Menteith, and amongſt the ſlaine, were Sir John Swinton, Sir Adam Gourdon, Sir John Levinſton, Sir Alexander Ramſey, and three and twenty other knights.

In this meane time, Glendour of Wales had ſolicited the king of France for ayde, who ſent him twelve hundred men of quality, but the windes were ſo contrary, that they loſt twelve of their ſhips, and the reſt returned home. The Engliſh, deriding this ill ſucceſſe of the French, ſo exaſperated the French-king, that preſently after he ſent twelve thouſand, who landed ſafely, and joyned with the Welch; but as ſoone as they heard of the Engliſh armies approach, whether miſtruſting their own ſtrength, or ſuſpecting the Welch-mens faithfullneſſe, they ran to their ſhips and diſgracefully went home.

King Henry's Ambaſſadors lately ſent into Britaine to fetch the Lady Jane de Navarre Dutcheſſe of Britaine, the relict of John de Montford ſirnamed the Conqueror, with whom the king by Procurators had contracted Matrimony; in the beginning of February returned with her in ſafety: The king met her at Wincheſter, where the ſeventh of February the marriage was ſolemnized.

About this time ſome affronts were offered by the French: Valerian Earle of S. Paul, with ſeventeene hundred men, landed in the Iſle of Wight, where hee burnt two Villages and ſome few Cottages; but hearing the people of the Iſland to have aſſembled, hee made haſte to his ſhips, and returned home. Alſo John Earle of Clermont (the heire of Bourbon) won from the Engliſh the Caſtles of S. Peter, S. Mary, and the New-Caſtle: The Lord de la Brett, won the Caſtle of Calafin; places of great conſequence to the Engliſh.

And now to make k. Henry ſenſible that a Crown can hardly ever ſit eaſie upon the head, if it be not ſet on right at firſt; a new Conſpiracy is hatching againſt him: The Percies, Earls of Northumberland and Worceſter, with Henry Hotſpur, began about this time to fall off from king Henry; their reaſon was, Firſt, becauſe the king at their requeſt refuſed to redeeme their kinſman Mortimer from Glendours ſlavery; and then becauſe he denied them the benefit of ſuch priſoners as they had taken of the Scots, at Homildon or Neſbye: whereupon they went of themſelves, and procured Mortimer's delivery, and then entred into a League offenſive and defenſive with Glendour, and by their Proxies, in the houſe of the Arch-deacon of Bangor, they agreed upon a Tripartite Indenture under their hands and ſeales, to divide the kingdome into three parts; whereby all England from Severn and Trent, South and Eaſtward, was aſſigned for the portion of the Earle of March: All Wales and the Lands beyond Severn VVeſtward, were aſſigned to Owen Glendour: And all the remainder of land from Trent Northward, to bee the portion of the Lord Percy. In this, as Glendour perſwaded them, they thought they ſhould accompliſh a Propheſie; as though king Henry were the Mouldwarp curſed of Gods own mouth; & they three were the Lyon the Dragon and the Wolfe which ſhould divide the Land among them. In this meane time king Henry, not acquainted with this Conſpiracy, cauſed a Proclamation to bee made, intimating that the Earle of March had voluntarily cauſed himſelf to bee taken priſoner, to the end, the Rebels having him in their cuſtody, might pretend ſome colour for their Conſpiracy; and therefore hee had ſmall reaſon to take care for his deliverance. Hereupon the Percies aſſiſted with a company of Scots, and drawing to their party the Earle of Stafford, and Richard Scroope Archbiſhop of Yorke and many other, purpoſed to joyne with the Caprain of the Welch, but firſt they framed certaine Articles againſt the king, and ſent them to him in writing. That hee had falſified his Oath given at his landing, ſwearing that he came but only to recover his Inheritance, and would not meddle with the King, or with the Crowne. That moſt trayterouſly hee had taken Armes againſt his Soveraigne Lord, Impriſoned him, and then moſt barbarouuſly cauſed him to be murthered. That ever ſince the death of king Richard, he had unjuſtly kept the Crown from his kinſman Edmund Mortimer Earl of March, to whom of right it belonged. That upon no occaſion, hee had impoſed divers Taxes upon the people. That by his

his Letters hee procured Burgeſſes and Knights of the Parliament to bee choſen; for which cauſes and many other, they defyed him, and vowed his deſtruction, and the reſtoring of the Earle of March to his right. King Henry could not but know that all theſe Articles againſt him were true, yet ſeeing the knowing it hindred him not from ſeeking to get the Crowne when hee had it not; it could leſſe hinder him from ſeeking to keep it now that he had it; and if he were able, being a private man, to get it from a King, he was likely to bee more able, being now a king, to keepe it from private men; and as for any objections that Conſcience could make, he had enough to anſwere them all: For, if his Title were good againſt king Richard, by his Reſignation, it was as good againſt Mortimer by his ſwearing Allegiance; and upon theſe grounds, with a minde as confident as if all cyrcumſtances were of his ſide, he rayſed an Army, and marched towards the Lords, taking care they might by no meanes joyne with the Welch; and about Shrewsbury, on Saturday S. Mary Magdalen Eve, hee encountred them, in which fight though the Scots and Henry Hotſpur ſhewed much valour, yet the victory reſted on the kings ſide; Hotſpur himſelfe was ſlayne, the Earle of Worceſter was taken priſoner, together with Sir Richard Vernon, Sir Theobald Truſſel, the Baron of Kinderton; and the reſt fled. On the kings part (beſides the Earle of Stafford, who had that morning revolted from the Conſpirators) were ſlaine Sir Hugh Sherley, Sir John Clifton. Sir John Cockayn, Sir Nicholas Gauſell, Sir Walter Blunt, Sir John Calverley, Sir John Maſſie of Puddington, Sir Hugh Mortimer and Sir Robert Gauſell, all which had beene but that morning dubbed knights, with Sir Thomas Wendſley, who died afterwards of his wounds; of common Souldiers about ſixteene hundred, but of the Conſpirators above ſix thouſand, whereof 36 the king ſlew with his own hand, but was once unhorſed by Douglaſſe, who in his preſence ſlew Sir Walter Blunt, with divers others, that day in all things attired like to the king; for which exployt, Douglaſſe (being after by the fall of his horſe taken priſoner) was by the kings command, carefully attended, and without Ranſom ſet at liberty: In this battell, the young Prince Henry, though wounded in the face with an Arrow, yet was not wounded in his courage, but continued fighting ſtill. After this victory the king cauſed publique thanks to bee given to God, and then cauſed the Earle of Worceſter to bee beheaded, and many others of that Rebellion to bee drawne hanged and quartered, and their heads placed on London Bridge: And then the king ſent his ſonne Henry Prince of Wales, with his whole Army into that Country; but before his comming, Owen Glendour was abandoned by all his Company, and lurking in the woods was there famiſhed; many of his aſſociats were taken and put to death. Whileſt the Prince was in Wales, Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, of his own accord, came and ſubmitted himſelfe to the king, proteſting his innocency, as not being once acquainted with any intent of Treaſon and Rebellion; whoſe excuſe the king received for the preſent with gentle language, the rather for that hee had the poſſeſſion of Barwick Caſtle and other places of ſtrength in his power, but yet he wiped not off the ſcore of his miſdemeanors out of his minde.

And now with the fourth yeere of his Reigne ended all the great Troubles of this k. Henry the fourth: thoſe that follow are but ſuch accidents as are frequent in all times both abroad and at home. The Britans under the leading of the Lord of Caſtiles, ſpoyled the Towne of Plimouth; In revenge whereof, the Weſtern-men, under the command of William Wilford, ſet forth a Fleete, which arriving in Britaine, tooke forty ſhips laden with Oyle and Wines, and burnt forty more. Againe the French landed a thouſand men in the Iſle of Wight, where they got together a great booty of Cattell, but the Iſlanders comming upon them tooke away their booty, and made many of them leave their Carkaſes for a booty to the Iſland. Yet the French would not leave ſo, but a while after, as having gotten new ſpirits, they caſt Anchor before the Iſle of Wight, and require noleſſe then to have the Iſland into their poſſeſſion, but a reſolute anſwere of the Iſlanders frighted them away, and made them glad they were gone. Soone after this the Duke of Orleance, brother to the French king, in a vaunting ſtile, ſent a challenge to king Henry to meete him in the field, each of them to have a hundred in his Company; to which the king answered, That for his own valour it had sufficiently been tryed, and for this challenge of the Dukes, neither the Person nor the Cause were worthy of his undertaking. Upon this refusall of the kings, divers taunts and jeeres were bandied betweene them, till at last the Duke, in great passion, falls upon Vergie a Towne in Guyen, but after three moneths assaulting it, being valiantly defended by Sir Robert Anisfield and three hundred Englishmen, he was glad to give over with losse, and returne into France. Presently upon this, the Admirall of Britaine, accompanied with the Lord du Castile, and thirty saile of ships, attempted to land at Dertmouth in Devonshire, but were repelled, and the Lord du Castile, and two of his brothers, and foure hundred of his men were slaine, besides two hundred taken Prisoners; of whom, the Lord Baquevile Marshall of Britaine, was one. After this, five hundred men of armes, five hundred Crosse-bowes, and a thousand Flemmings, under the conduct of the Earle of S. Paul, laid siege to the Castle of Marck, three leagues from Callice; but first by Sir Philip Hall Captaine of Callice, and after by Sir Richard Aston Lieutenant of the English pale, they were forced to retire and flye: The Earle of S. Paul escaped to S. Omers, but left many of his men of quality behind him, and more taken Prisoners. After this, Thomas Duke of Clarence, the Kings second sonne, and the Earle of Kent, with competent Forces entred the Haven of Sluce, where they burnt foure ships riding at anchour, and then returned to the reliefe of Callis, besieged at that time by the French; and in the way tooke three Carricks of Genoua richly laden, and brought them into the Chamber of Rye. And these were the troubles of this King abroad: But now at home, the Reliques of the former Northerne Rebellion began to revive; for now, Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, Richard Scroope Archbishop of Yorke, Thomas Mowbray Earle Marshall, the Lords Hastings, Fauconbridge, and Bardolfe, with divers others, conspired, at a time appointed, to meet upon Yorkswould-Downes, and there to bid defiance to king Henry. Articles of Grievances were framed, and set up in all publick places, which drew multitudes to be partakers of the enterprize. But now, Ralph Nevill Earle of Westmerland, with the Lord John the Kings third sonne, the Lords Henry Fitz-Hughes, Ralph Evers, and Robert Umphrevile, make head against them; and comming into a Plaine in the Forrests of Gaultree, they sate down right against the Archbishop and his Forces, which were twenty thousand; and Westmerland perceiving the Enemies forces to be farre more than theirs, he used this policie: he sent to the Archbishop, demanding the reason why he would raise Forces against the king? who answering, that his Armes were not against the king, but for his owne defence, whom the king, upon the instigation of Sycophants, had threatned; withall he sent him a scrowle of their grievances, which Westmerland read, and seemed to approve, and thereupon desired a conference with him: The Archbishop more credulous then wise, perswaded the Earle Marshall to goe with him to the place appointed to conferre: the Articles are read and allowed of; and thereupon Westmerland seeming to commiserate the souldiers, having beene in armour all day, and weary, wished the Archbishop to acquaint his Party, as he would his, with this their mutuall agreement; and so shaking hands, in most Courtly friendship dranke unto him; whereupon the souldiers were willed to dismisse, and repaire home: which they had no sooner done, but a Troop of horse, which in a colourable manner had made a shew to depart, wheeled about, and afterwards returned; and being come in sight, the Earle of Westmerland arrested both the Archbishop and the Earle Marshall, and brought them both Prisoners to the king at Powfret; who passing from thence to York, the Prisoners likewise were carried thither, and the next day both of them beheaded. At Durham, the Lords Hastings and Fauconbridge, with two knights, were executed. Northumberland, with the Lord Bardolfe, fled first to Barwick, and after into Scotland, where they were entertained by David Lord Flemming: whereupon the king gave summons to the Castle of Barwick, which at first they refused to obey, but upon the planting and discharging of a Piece, they presently yeelded without composition: and here William Greystock, Henry Bayuton, and John Blinkensop, knights, and five other were presently presently put to execution, and many others committed to severall Prisons. About this time, James sonne and heire of Robert king of Scotland, a childe of nine yeares old, attended by the Earle of Orkney, as he was sailing into France, was taken by certaine Mariners of Norfolk, who brought him to the King at Windsor, the 30. of March, 1408. and the King sent them to the Tower of London.

Northumberland and Bardolfe, after they had been in Wales, France, and Flanders, to raise a Power against King Henry, returned back into Scotland, and after a yeere with a great Power of Scots entred England, and came into Yorkshire, making great spoyle and waste as they passed: but Sir Thomas Rokesby Sheriffe of Yorke, levying the forces of the County, upon Bramham-moore gave them battell; in which Northumberland was slaine, Bardolfe taken, but wounded to death, and the rest put to flight. About this time also, Sir Robert Umphreville Vice-admirall of England, with ten men of warre entred Scotland, burnt their Gallyet, and many other ships over against Lieth, and brought away with him fourteen tall ships laden with corne and other staple commodities, which at his returne he sent into the Markets round about, and thereby brought down the prizes of all things, and purchased to himselfe the name of Mend-market.

The Prince had been a Student in Queenes Colledge in Oxford, under the tuition of his Unkle Henry Beaufort, Chancellor of that University, afterwards Bishop of Lincolne and Winchester, and lastly made a Cardinall, by the title of Eusebius. From Oxford, the Prince was called to Court, and the Lord Thomas Percy Earle of Worcester was made his Governour: but comming afterward to be at his owne disposing, whether being by nature valorous, and not yet well stayed by time and experience; or whether incited by ill companions, and emboldened by the opinion of his owne greatnesse; he ranne into many courses so unworthy of a Prince, that it was much doubted what he would prove when he came to be Prince. Once, it is said, he lay in wait for the Receivers of his fathers Rents, and in the person of a Thiefe set upon them and robbed them. Another time, when one of his companions was arraigned for felony before the Lord Chiefe Justice, he went to the Kings Bench barre, and offered to take the Prisoner away by force; but being withstood by the Lord Chiefe Justice, he stepped to him, and struck him over the face: whereat the Judge nothing abashed, rose up and told him, that he did not this affront to him, but to the King his father, in whose place he sate; and therefore to make him know his fault, he commanded him to be committed to the Fleete. You would have wondred to see how calme the Prince was in his own cause, who in the cause of his companion had been so violent: for he quietly obeyed the Judges sentence, and suffered himselfe to be led to Prison. This passage was not a little pleasing to the King, to thinke that he had a Judge of such courage, and a Sonne of such submission: but yet for these and such other pranks, he removed him from being President of the Councell, and placed in it his third sonne John. This made the Prince so sensible of his fathers displeasure, that he thought it necessary to seek by al means to recover his good opinion; which he endeavored to doe by a way as strange as that by which he lost it: for, attiring himselfe in a garment of blew Sattin, wrought all with Eyler-holes of black silke, at every hole the needle hanging by which it was sowed, and about his arme a thing in fashion of a hounds collar, studded with SS. of gold, he came to the Court at Westminster: to whom, the King (though not well in health) caused himselfe, in a Chaire, to be brought into his Privy Chamber; where, in presence of but three or foure of his Privy Councell, he demanded of the Prince the cause of his unwonted habit and comming? who answered, That being not onely his subject but his sonne, and a sonne so tenderly alwayes regarded by him, he were worthy of a thousand deaths, if he should intend or but imagine the least offence to his sacred Majestie, and therefore had fitted himselfe to be made a sacrifice; and therewithall reached his dagger, holding it by the point to his father, For (said he) I desire not to live longer, than I may be thought to be, what I am and shall ever be, Your faithfull and obedient Vassall. With this or the like Answer, the King was so moved, that he fell upon his sonnes neck, and with many teares imbracing him, confessed that his ears had been too open to receive reports against him, and promising faithfully, that from thenceforth no reports should cause any disaffection towards him. The king about this time, made his Son John Duke of Bedford, and his Son Humphrey Duke of Glocester; he made also sir Thomas Beauford Earle of Dorset, and the Earle of Arundel he created Duke of Yorke.

The rest of king Henries dayes, from this time forward, being scarce a year, was free from all trouble both abroad and at home; unlesse perhaps he might be troubled in minde: for having shed so much English and Noble bloud; for expiation whereof, or else to the end he might joyne Valour and Devotion in one action together, which hitherto he but used singly; he tooke upon him the Crusado, and at a Councell in White-Friars, order was taken, and great preparation was made for his journey to Jerusalem: But it was otherwise Decreed in Heaven; and yet not so otherwise, but that he ended his life in Jerusalem, as shall be shewed hereafter.

Of his Taxations.

IN the very begining of his Reigne, it might passe instead of a Taxation, that he found in king Richards Coffers, in money and jewells, to the value of seven hundred thousand pounds. In his fourth yeare, an extraordinary Subsidie was granted him; Twenty shillings of every knights Fee, and of every one that had twenty shillings a yeare in land, twelve pence and upward, according to that rate; and of every one that had twenty pounds in goods, twelve pence, and upward according to that rate; but with this caution and protestation, that it should not hereafter be drawn for a President, and that no Record thereof should be made. In his sixth yeare, the Clergie granted to the king a Tenth. In his seventh yeare, the Clergie granted a Tenth and a halfe, and the Commons two Fifteens. In a Parliament holden the ninth yeare of his Reigne, the king moved to have allowed him in every yeare wherein there was no Parliament kept, a Tenth of the Clergy, and a Fifteenth of the Layity; to which demands the Bishops assented, but the Commons would not. In his seventh yeare, a Parliament began which lasted almost a whole yeare, in which a Subsidie was at last granted; so sharpe, that even Priests and Friers who lived of Alms, were forced every one to pay a noble.

Of Lawes and Ordinances made in his time.

IN this kings dayes, burning and execution by fire for controversies in Religion was first put in practise.

Also in the first yeare of his Reigne an Act was made, that no person of what degree soever, should after that day alleadge for his excuse, any constraint or coarcting of his Prince, for doing of any unlawfull act; and that such excuse after that day, should stand him in no stead.

Also an Act was made, that no Lord, nor other, might give any Liveries to any but their household and meniall servants. In his twelveth yeare, the king caused a new coyne of Nobles to be made, which was of lesse value than the old Noble, by foure pence.

Also that all Rypiers, and other Fishers from any of the Sea-coasts, should sell their fish in Cornhill and Cheapside themselves, and not to Fishmongers that would buy it to sell againe.

Also this king instituted the Dutchie Court, which he did in honor of the House of Lancaster; to the end, the Lands belonging to that Dutchie, might in all following times be distinguisht and known from the Lands of the Crown. In his first year, the king called a Parliament at Coventry, and sent Processe to the Sheriffes, that they should chuse no knights nor Burgesses, that had any knowledge in the Lawes of the Realm; by reason whereof, it was called the Lay-mens Parliament. In his seventh yeare, the Major of London for preservation of fish; obtained, that all Weres which stood between London and seven miles beyond Kingstone; as also, such as stood betweene London and Gravesend, should be pulled up and taken away.

BY reason of discord between John of Gaunt, and Wickham Bishop of Winchester; the Bishop either in durance, could not, or in feare durst not come to the Parliament House, at a time when the King required a supply of money; but the Clergie unanimously affirming, that without their brother, the Bishop of Winchesters presence, they neither can nor will consult of any thing; he is presently sent for, and by the King secured. After this, the King called a Parliament at Coventry, and sent Processe to the Sheriffs that they should chuse no knights or Burgesses that were Lawyers, and was therefore called the Laymens Parliament: And shortly after another Parliament was called, and named the unlearned Parliament, either for the unlearnednesse of the persons, or for their malice to learned men; In which the Commons presented a Petition to the King and the upper House; desiring that the king might have the Temporall Possessions of the Bishops and Clergie; the value whereof, they pretended would be sufficient maintenance for a hundred and fifty Earls, one thousand five hundred knights, six thousand two hundred Esquires, and a hundred Hospitals for maymed Souldiers. They craved likewise, that Clerks convict should not be delivered to the Bishops prison; and that the Statute made in the second yeare of the king against Lollards, might be Repealed. But the king denied their Petition; and in Person commanded them from thenceforth, not to presume to trouble their brains about any such businesse, for he was resolved to leave the Church in as good state as he found it. In the twelveth yeare of his Reigne, certain learned men in Oxford, and other places, in their Sermons maintained the opinions of Wickliffe; but the Bishops and Doctors of the University, inhibited and condemned them. In his time was a great Schisme in the Church, by reason of two Anti-Popes; but afterwards in an assembly of Cardinalls and Bishops, a third man was elected, named Alexander the fifth, who had been trained up at Oxford.

Works of Piety in his time.

KING Henry Fownded a Colledge at Battlefield in Shropshire, where he overcame the Lord Henry Percy. In his third yeare, the Conduit upon Cornhill was begun to be built. Also in his time Sir Robert Knolls made the Stone bridge of Rochester in Kent; and founded in the Town of Pomfret a Colledge, and an Hospitall; he also re-edified the body of the White-Friers Church in Fleetstreet, where he was afterward buried: Which Church was first founded by the Ancestours of the Lord Grey of Codnor. In the eighth yeare of his Reigne, Richard Whittington Major of London, erected a house or Church in London, to be a house of Prayer, and named it after his own name, Whittington Colledge; with lodgings, and weekly allowance for divers poore people. He also builded the Gate of London, called Newgate, in the yeare 1420, which was before a most loathsome prison: He builded also more than halfe of St. Bartholmews Hospitall in West-Smithfield, and the beautifull Library in the Grey Friars in London, now called Christs Hospitall: He also builded a great part of the east end of Guildhall, and a Chappell adjoyning to it, with a Library of stone, for the custodie of the Records of the Cirie. But he that exceeded all at this time in works of Piety, was William Wickham Bishop of Winchester; his first worke was the building of a Chappell at Tychfield, where his Father, Mother, and Sister Perrot was buried: Next, he founded at Southwick in Hampshire, neere the Towne of Wickham, the place of his birth, as a supplement to the Priorie of Southwicke; a Chauntry, with allowance for five Priests for ever: He bestowed twenty thousand marks in repairing the houses belonging to the Bishopricke; he discharged out of Prison, in all places of his Dioceese, all such poore prisoners as lay in execution for debt, under twenty pounds: he amended all the high-wayes from Winchester to London, on both ſides the River. After all this, on the fifth of March 1379, he began to lay the foundation of that magnificent Structure in Oxford, called New-College, and in perſon layd the firſt ſtone thereof; in which place before, there ſtood Natius-Colledge, built by Alver, at Natius intreaty; and for the affinity of the name, came to be called New-Colledge. In the yeare 1387, on the 26 of March, he likewiſe in perſon layd the firſt ſtone of the like foundation in Wincheſter, and dedicated the ſame, as that other in Oxford, to the memory of the Virgin Mary. The Grocers in London purchaſed their Hall in Cunyhope Lane for 320 marks; and then layd the foundation thereof on the tenth of May. King Henry founded the Colledge of Fotheringhey in Northamptonſhire; to which King Henry the fifth gave land of the Priories of Monkes Aliens, by him ſuppreſſed.

John Gower the famous Poet, new builded a great part of St. Mary Overyes Church in Southwarke, where he lyes buried. In the ſecond yeare of this king, a new market in the Poultry, called the Stocks, was builded for the free ſale of Forreign Fiſhmongers and Butchers. In his twelveth yeare, the Guildhall of London was begun to be new Edified; and of a little Cottage, made a goodly houſe, as now it is.

Caſualties happening in his time.

IN his third yeare, in the Moneth of March, appeared a Blazing-ſtarre; firſt betwixt the Eaſt and the North, and then ſending forth fiery beams towards the North; foreſhewing perhaps the effuſion of bloud that followed after, in Wales and Northumberland. In the ſame yeare, at Danbury in Eſſex, the Devill appeared in likeneſſe of a Gray-Frier; who entring the Church, put the people in great fear, and the ſame houre, with a tempeſt of Whirlewinde and Thunder, the top of the ſteeple was broken down, and halfe the Chancell ſcattered abroad. In his ſeventh yeare, ſuch abundance of water brake ſuddenly over the Banks in Kent, that it drowned Cattell without number. Alſo this yeare, the Town of Keyſtone in Hartfordſhire was burnt. In his ninth yeare was ſo ſharpe a winter, and ſuch abundance of ſnow; continuing December, January, February, and March, that almoſt all ſmall Birds died through hunger.

Of his Wives and Children.

HE had two Wives, the firſt was Mary, one of the Daughters and heirs of Humphrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford, Eſſex, and Northampton; ſhe died before he came to the Crowne, in the yeare 1394. His ſecond Wife was Joane, Daughter to Charles the firſt king of Navaere, ſhe being the widdow of John de Montford ſurnamed Streany, or the Conquerour, Duke of Brittaine; who dyed without any iſſue by king Henry, at Havering in Eſſex, the yeare 1437, in the fifteenth yeare of king Henry the ſixth, and lyeth buried by her husband at Canterbury. He had foure Sons and two Daughters; Of his Sons, Henry his eldeſt was Prince of Wales, and after his Father, king of England. His ſecond Son was Thomas Duke of Clarence, and Steward of England; who was ſlaine at Beaufort in Anjou, and dyed without iſſue. His third Son was John Duke of Bedford; he married firſt with Anne Daughter to John Duke of Burgundie; and ſecondly with Jacoba Daughter of Peter of Luxenbourgh, Earle of St. Paul, but dyed alſo without iſſue. His fourth Son was Humphry; by his brother king Henry the fifth created Duke of Glouceſter, and was generally called the good Duke; he had two Wives, but dyed without iſſue, in the yeare 1446, and was buried at St. Albans; though the vulgar opinion be, that he lyes buried in St. Pauls Church. Of king Henry the fourths Daughters; Blanch the elder was married to Lewis Barbatus, Palatine of the Rhene, and Prince Elector: Philippe his younger Daughter, was married to John king of Denmarke, and Norway.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

COncerning his Body; he was of a middle ſtature, ſlender limbes, but well proportioned. Concerning his Minde; of a ſerious and ſolid diſpoſition, and one that ſtood more upon his own legges than any of his Predeceſſors had done: in caſes of difficulty, not refuſing, but not needing the advice of others; which might confirme, but not better his own. He was neither merry nor ſad, but both: beſt pleas'd when he was oppoſed, becauſe this was like to doe him good, by ſharpening his invention: moſt angry when he was flattered, becauſe this was ſure to doe him hurt, by dulling his judgement. No man ever more loved, nor leſſe doted upon a wife, than he: a good husband, but no uxorious; that if there be reines to that Paſſion, we may know he had them. It may be thought, he affected the Crown, not ſo much out of Ambition as out of Compaſſion, becauſe the oppreſſions of his Country he could not ſo well helpe being a Subject, as a King; for otherwiſe we may truly ſay, he was a loſer by the Crowne, being not ſo great for a King, as he was before for a Subject: The Crowne rather was a gainer by him, which hath ever ſince been the richer for his wearing it. We may thinke he was either weary of his life, or longing for death; for why elſe would he take upon him the Cruſado, having been told by a ſkilfu'l Southſayer, that he ſhould dye in Jeruſalem? but it ſeemes, he did not believe him.

Of his Death and Buriall.

IN the forty-ſixth yeare of his Age, having Peace both at home and abroad, and being of too active a ſpirit to be idle, he tooke upon him the Cruſade, and great proviſion was made for his journey to Jeruſalem: but alas, his journey to Jeruſalem required no ſuch proviſion; for being at his prayers at S. Edwards ſhrine, he was ſuddenly taken with an Apoplexie, and thereupon removed to the Abbot of Weſtminſters houſe; where recovering his ſenſes, and finding himſelfe in a ſtrange place, he aſked what place it was? and being told that he was in the Abbots houſe, in a Chamber called Jeruſalem: Well then (ſaid he) Lord have mercy upon me, for this is the Jeruſalem where a Southſayer told me I ſhould dye. And here he dyed indeed, on the 20. day of March, in the yeare 1413. when he had lived ſixe and forty yeares, Reigned thirteen and a halfe. It is worth remembring, that all the time of his ſickneſſe, his will was to have his Crowne ſet upon his bolſter by him; and one of his ſons being ſo ſtrong upon him, that all men thought him directly dead; the Prince comming in, tooke away the Crowne: when ſuddenly the king recovering his ſenſes, miſſed his Crown; and aſking for it, was told, the Prince had taken it: whereupon the Prince being called, came back with the Crown, and kneeling down, ſaid: Sir, to all our judgements, and to all our griefes, you ſeemed directly dead, and therefore I tooke the Crown as being my Right: but ſeeing to all our comforts, you live, I here deliver it much more joyfully than I tooke it, and pray God you may long live to weare it your ſelfe. Well (ſaith the king ſighing) what right I had to it, God knowes. But (ſaith the Prince) if you dye king, my ſword ſhall maintaine it to be my Right againſt all Oppoſers. Well (ſaith the king) I referre all to God: but I charge thee on my Bleſſing, that thou adminiſter the Lawes indifferently, avoyd Flatterers, deferre not to do Juſtice, nor be ſparing of Mercy: And then turning about, ſaid, God bleſſe thee, and have mercy on me: and with thoſe words, gave up the Ghoſt. His body with all Funerall pomp was conveyed to Canterbury, and there ſolemnly buried.

Of men of Note in his time.

OF men of Valour in his time, of whom there was great ſtore, I ſhall need to ſay no more than what hath already been ſaid in the body of the ſtory: onely I cannot but remember Sir Robert Knolls, who borne of meane parentage, made himſelfe famous over all Chriſtendome; and dying at a Manour of his in Norfolk, was brought to London, and buried in the Church of the White Friers in London, which himſelfe had re-edified. But for men of learning, I muſt ſet in the firſt place, William Wickham, a man of no learning, yet well worthy to hold the place: In relating of whole life, I muſt have leave to expatiate a little. His fathers name was John Long, or as ſome ſay, Perot; but as Campian proveth, Wickham; and not from the place of his dwelling, though he was Pariſh-Clerke of Wickham in Hamſhire, where he taught children to write: in which quality his ſonne William proved ſo excellent, that Nicolas Wooddall, Conſtable of Wincheſter Caſtle, tooke him from his father, and kept him at Schoole, firſt at Wincheſter, afterward at Oxford, till himſelfe being made Surveyor-generall of the Kings works, he ſent for this William to ſerve him as his Clerke; who in ſhort time grew ſo expert in that imployment, that Adam Torleton B ſhop of Wincheſter, commended him to the King, who imployed him preſently in ſurveying his Fortifications at Dover, and Quinborough Caſtles, and afterward made him Surveyor of his Buildings at Windſor Caſtle, and his houſes of Henley and Eaſt-Hamſtead. And here firſt, Envy roſe up againſt him; for having cauſed to be engraven on the ſtone of a wall in Windſor Caſtle, theſe words; This made William Wickham: ſome that envyed his riſing, complained to the King of this inſolencie, as arrogating to himſelfe, that excellent piece of Building to de done at his charge: but Wickham called before the King about it, made anſwer, that his meaning was not, neither by any ind fferent conſtruction could it import, that Wickham made that building, but that the ſame building made Wickham, as being a meanes of the Kings great favour towards him. This anſwer pacified the King, who tooke him daily more and more into his favour; and being now entred into the Miniſtery, was firſt made Parſon of S. Martins in the Fields, then Miniſter of S. Martins le Grand, afterwards Archdeacon of Lincolne, Provoſt of Wells, and Rector of Manyhens in Devonſhire; ſo as at one time he had in his hands ſo many Eccleſiaſticall livings, that the value of them, in the Kings bookes, amounted to eight hundred ſeventy ſixe pounds thirteen ſhillings: beſides which, he was honored with many Temporall places of great profit and reſpect, as to be his principall Secretary, Keeper of the Privy Seale, Maſter of the Wards and Liveries, Treaſurer of the Kings Revenues in France, and ſome other Offices. After which, the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter falling voyd, meanes was made to the King to beſtow that place upon him: And here, the ſecond time, did Envy riſe up againſt him, informing the King that he was a man of little or no learning, and no way fit for ſuch a dignity: whereupon the King made ſtay of granting it: but when Wickham came before the King, and told him, that what he wanted in perſonall learning, he would ſupply with being a Founder of learning; This ſo ſatisfied the King, that he beſtowed the place upon him. After this, he was made Lord Treaſurer of England: and here the third time did Envy riſe up againſt him; for the King requiring of his ſubjects a ſupply of money, It was anſwered, that he needed no other ſupply, than to call his Treaſurer to accompt: This blow ſtruck deepe upon the Biſhop; for he was preſently charged to give accompt for eleven hundred ninety ſix thouſand pounds; and whilſt he was buſie in preparing his account, all his Temporalties, upon importunity of John of Gaunt, were ſeized into the Kings hands, and given to the Prince of Wales, and himſelfe upon paine of the Kings diſpleaſure, commanded not to come within twenty miles of the Court. In this caſe, he diſmiſſeth his traine, and ſendeth copies abroad of his accompt, if it might be received; but was hindred by the working of John of Gaunt againſt him. Upon this ground (as was thought) Queen Philip wife to K. Edward the Third, upon her death-bed, by way of Confeſſion, told Wickham, that John of Gaunt was not the lawfull iſſue of king Edward, but a ſuppoſititious Son; for when ſhe was brought to bed at Gaunt, of a Daughter, knowing how deſirous the King was to have a Son; ſhe exchanged that daughter, with a Dutch woman, for a Boy: whereof ſhe had been delivered about the ſame time with the Queen. Thus much ſhe confeſſed, and withall made the Biſhop ſweare, that if the ſaid John of Gaunt ſhould at any time, either directly, or indirectly attempt the Crown; or that rightfully, through want of iſſue, it ſhould devolve unto him; that then he ſhould diſcover this matter, and make it known unto the King, and Councell. Afterward the Queen being dead, and the Biſhop finding John of Gaunt, as he thought, too much aſpiring, he ſecretly told him this relation, and this adjuration of his ſuppoſed mother, adviſing him not to ſeeke higher than a private ſtate; for elſe he was bound by oath to make it known to all the World: Thus far the Biſhop did well; but when he ſaw the Son of John of Gaunt not only aſpiring, but poſſeſſed of the Crown, why did he not then diſcover it, and joyn at leaſt with the Biſhop of Carlile, in oppoſing it? Certainly, we may know, that either the whole relation was but a Fable, or that Wickham was a Temporizer, or that John of Gaunt was a moſt patient man, to ſuffer the affront of ſuch an indignity, with leſſe than the death of him that did it. But howſoever it was, it is certain, the Duke bore a mortall grudge to the Biſhop; who had no way to withſtand ſuch an enemy, but by making Alice Pierce his friend: by whoſe means, after two years, he was reſtored to all his livings; and afterward K. Edward being dead, and Alice Pierce baniſhed; by the means of a greater friend than Alice Pierce (his full purſe) he obteined in the ſecond year of k. Richard, a generall pardon under the Great Seale of England; and from that time forward enjoyed a quiet life, and dyed in the fourth yeare of this King Henry the fourth, being then of the age of above 80 years, and lieth buried in the Church of St. Swithens in Wincheſter, in a monument of his own making in his life time; leaving for his heire Thomas Perrot, the ſon of his ſiſter Agnes, married to William Perrot.

Another great example of the volubility of Fortune, in Profeſſors of learning, was Roger Walden, who dyed in the ninth yeare of this King: he was at firſt a poor Scholler in Oxford; and the firſt ſtep of his riſing, was to be a Chaplain in the Colledge there of St. Maries; from thence by degrees he got to be Dean of Yorke; and after this, a high ſtep, to be Treaſurer of England; and yet a higher after that, upon the baniſhment of Thomas Arundell, to be Archbiſhop of Canterbury: But being now at the top, he came down again; for in this kings time, Thomas Arundell being reſtored to the Archbiſhopricke, Walden was not only put out of that place, but was called to accompt for the Treaſureiſhip: and though he ſhewed his quietus eſt, yet all his Temporalties were ſeized, and his perſon impriſoned, till by the mediation of the now Archbiſhop Arundell, he was made Treaſurer of Calice, and after promoted to be B ſhop of London.

The next place after theſe, is juſtly due to Geoffry Chaucer, and John Gower, two famous Poets in this time, and the Fathers of Engliſh Poets in all the times after: Chaucer dyed in the fourth yeare of this king, and lyeth buried at Weſtminſter: Gower, in this kings ninth yeare, and was buried in St. Mary Overys Church in Southwarke. And now come others to be remembred, who lived and died in this kings time: Hugh Legate, born in Hartfordſhire, a Monke of St. Albons, who wrote Scholies upon Boetius de conſolatione. Nicholas Gorham, born alſo in Hartfordſhire, a Dominick Frier, and the French kings Confeſſor, though an Engliſhman. Walter Diſſe, ſo called of a Town in Norfolke where he was borne, Confeſſor to the Duke of Lancaſter. Lawrence Holbeck, a Monke of Ramſey, who wrote an Hebrew Dictionary. John Cotton Archbiſhop of Armagh: Richard Scrope, brother to William Scroope Lord Treaſurer of England, made Archbiſhop of Yorke; and writing an invective againſt King Henry, loſt his head. William Thorpe, an earneſt follower of John Wickliffe, for which he was committed to Saltwood Caſtle, where he dyed. Stephen Patrington, born in Yorkſhire, and Robert Maſcall a Carmelite Frier of Ludlow; both of them Confeſſors to king Henry the fifth. Beſton a Monke of the Abbey of Burie in Suffolke; who wrote a Catalogue of all the Writers of the Church, and other Treatiſes. John Purvey, who was convented for teaching Doctrine contrary to the Church of Rome, and compelled to recant. Thomas Rudburne Biſhop of S. Davids, who wrote a Chronicle. Nicolas Riſton, who conſidering the ſtrife between the then Anti-popes, wrote a booke, De tollendo ſchiſmate. Robert Wanſham a Monke in Darſetſhire, who wrote a booke in verſe, Of the Originall and ſignification of Words. Robert Wimbledon an excellent Preacher, as appeareth by the Sermon he made upon this Text, Redde rationem Villicationis tuæ.

THE REIGNE OF KING HENRY THE FIFTH.

HENRY of Monmouth (so called from the place in Wales, where he was born) eldest Son of King Henry the fourth, succeeded his Father in the kingdom of England, to whom the Lords of the Realm swore Homage and Allegiance, before he was yet Crowned; an honor never done before to any of his Predecessors: and afterwards, on the ninth of Aprill, in the yeare 1412, he was Crowned at Westminster, by Thomas Arundell Archbishop of Canterbury, with all Rites and Solemnities in such case accustomed: And as the Scripture speaks of Saul, that assoone as Samuel had annointed him King, he had a new heart given him, and he became another man than he was before. So was it with this king Henry; for presently after his Coronation, he called before him all his old Companions, who had been fratres in malo with him; strictly charging them, not to presume to come within ten miles of his Court, untill such time as they had given good proofe of their amendment in manners; and least any of them should pretend want of maintenance to be any cause of their taking ill courses, he gave to every one of them a competent meanes whereby to subsist. And knowing (as he did) the fashion of the Scots and Welch, that in times of change they would commonly take advantage, to make Inroades upon the Borders; he therefore caused Forts and Bulwarks in fit places to be erected, and placed Garrisons in them, for preventing or repelling any such incursions. Immediately after this, he called a Parliament, where a Subsidie was granted without asking: and in this Parliament the Commons began to harp upon their old string, of taking away the Temporalties of the Clergie; and the Bishops fearing how it might take in the kings ears, thought it best to divert him, by striking upon another string, which they knew would be more pleasing to him; which was, to shew him the great right he had to the Crown of France. And hereupon Chicheley Archbishop of Canterbury, in a long narration, deduced the kings Right from Isabel Daughter to Philip the fourth, married to king Edward the second; from whom it discended by direct line to his Majesty, and no hinderance of enjoying it, but pretension of the Salique lawes, which (said he) was neither according to the law of God, nor yet intended at first to that Nation; and though his Predecessors, by reason of other incumbrances forbore to prosecute their Claime, yet he being free from all such incumbrances, had no lesse power, than right to do it. This indeed struck upon the right string of the kings inclination; for as he affected nothing more than true glory, so in nothing more than in Warlike actions. Hereupon, nothing was now

now thought of, but the Conquest of France. First therefore he begins to alter in his Arms the bearing of Semy-de-Luces, and quarters the three Flower Deluces, as the Kings of France then bare them; and that he might not be thought to steale advantage, but to do it fairly, he sent Embassadours to Charles the sixth then king of France, requiring in peaceable manner, the surrender of the Crown of France; which if he would yeeld unto, then King Henry would take to Wife his Daughter Katherine; but if he refused to do it, then King Henry would with fire and sword enforce it from him, or lose his life. The Ambassadors sent, were the Duke of Exeter, the Archbishop of Dublin, the Lord Grey, the Lord High Admirall, and the Bishop of Norwich, with five hundred horse; who comming to the Court of France, were at first received and feasted, with all the honor and shew of kindnes that might be; but assoone as their message was delivered, and that it was knowne what they came about, the copy of their entertainment was altered, and they were sent away with as little complement, as they were before received with honor; only told, that the king would speedily make Answer to the King their Master, by his owne Ambassadors: and speedily indeed he did it; for the Earle of Vendosme, William Bastier Archbishop of Bourges, Peter Fresnel Bishop of Lysieux, with others, were arrived in England, assoone almost as the English were returned. But being come, the Archbishop of Bourges made a long Oration in the praise of Peace, concluding with the tender of the Lady Katherine, and 50000 Crowns with her in Dower, besides some Towns of no great importance; To which King Henry, by the Archbishop of Canterbury made Answer; That these offers were trifles, and that without yeelding to his demands, he would never desist from that he intended: and with this Answer, the French Ambassadors were dismissed. It is sayd, that about this time, the Dolphin (who in the King of France his sicknes, managed the State) sent to King Henry a Tonne of Tennis Balls, in derision of his youth, as fitter to play with them, then to manage Arms; which king Henry tooke in such scorne, that he promised with an oath, it should not be long ere he would tosse such iron balls amongst them, that the best armes in France should not be able to hold a Racket to returne them. And now all things are prepared and in a readines for the kings journey into France, his men shipped, and himselfe ready to go on shipboord; when sodainly a Treason was discovered against his Person, plotted by Richard Earle of Cambridge, Henry Lord Scroope of Masham, Lord Treasurer, and Thomas Grey Earle of Northumberland, and plotted and procured by the French Agents. These being apprehended, and upon examination confessing the Treason, and the money (which was sayd to be a Million of Gold) by them for that end received; were all of them immediately put to death. From this Richard Earle of Cambridge, second Sonne of Edmund of Langley, did Richard afterward Duke of Yorke claime and recover the Crown from the Lancastrian Family. This execution done, and the winde blowing faire, king Henry weighs Anchor; and with a Fleet of 1200 Sayle, (Grafton saith, but 140 ships) but Enguerant saith, 1600, attended with six thousand spears, and 24000 Foot, besides Engineers and labourers; he puts to Sea, and on our Lady Eve landeth at Caux; where he made Proclamation, that no man upon paine of death, should robbe any Church, or offer violence to any that were found unarmed; and from thence passing on, he besieged Harflew; which when no succour came within certain dayes agreed upon, the Town was surrendred and sacked. Of this Towne he made the Duke of Exeter Captain, who left there for his Lieutenant, Sir John Falstoffe, with a Garrison of 1500 men. It is said that when king Henry entred Harflew, he passed along the streets bare foot, untill he came to the Church of St. Martin; where, with great devotion, he gave most humble thanks to God, for this his first atchieved Enterprize. From thence he marched forward, and comming to the River of Soame, he found all the Bridges broken; whereupon he passed on to the bridge of Sr. Maxene, where 30000 French appearing, he pitcht his Campe, expecting to be fought with; and the more to encourage his men, he gave the order of knighthood to John Lord Ferrers of Groby, Reynold Graystocke, Percy Tempest, Christopher Morisby, Thomas Pickering, William Huddleston, Henry Mortimer, John Hosbalton.

Hosbelton, Philip Hall, but not perceiving the French to have any minde to fight, he marched by the Town of Amyens to Bowes, and there ſtayed two dayes, expecting battell, and from thence marched to Corby, where the Peaſants of the Country with certain men of Arms ſent from the Dolphin, charged the right wing of the Engliſh, which was led by Hugh Stafford Lord Bourchier, and wonne away his Standard, but was recovered againe by John Bromley of Bromley, a Commander in the Lord Stafford's Regiment, who with his own hand ſlew him that had taken the Colours, and then taking them up, diſplayed the ſame; with ſight whereof, the Engliſh were ſo encouraged, that they preſently routed the French, and put them to flight: which valiant exploit, the Lord Stafford recompenced, by giving to Bromeley an Annuity of fifty pounds a yeare out of his lands in Staffordſhire. After this, the king marched towards Calice, ſo ſtrictly obſerving his Proclamation againſt Church robbing, that when one was complained of for having taken a ſilver Pyxe out of a Church, he not only cauſed the ſame to be reſtored, but the ſouldier alſo to be hanged: which point of Diſcipline, both kept the reſt from offending in that kinde, and drew the people of the Country, under hand to relieve his men with all things neceſſary. The French king hearing that king Henry had paſſed the River of Soame; by advice of his Councell (who yet were divided in opinion) ſent Montjoy the French king at Arms to defye king Henry, and to let him know he ſhould be fought with; which king Henry, though his Army was much infected with Feavers, whereof the Earl of Stafford, the Biſhop of Norwich, the Lords Molines and Burnell, were lately dead, yet he willingly heard, and rewarded the Herald for his meſſage: and firſt having cleered a paſſage over a bridge, where of neceſſity he was to paſſe, on the 22 of October he paſſed over with his Army: At which time the Duke of York that led the Rereward, had diſcovered the Enemy to come on apace, whereof he ſent word to the king; who thereupon made a ſtand, and appointing his Officers what courſe to hold, and encouraging his Souldiers, they all attended when the battell ſhould begin. The French Army was divided into three battells; in the firſt were placed eight thouſand men at Arms, foure thouſand Archers, and fifteen hundred Croſſe-bowes; the wings conſiſting of two thouſand two hundred men at Arms; this battaile, was led by the Conſtable of France himſelfe, the Dukes of Orleance and Bourbon, the Earles of Eme, Richmond, and Vaudoſme, the Lord Dempier, the Lord Admirall of France, the Marſhall Bouciquale, and others. The middle Battaile, wherein were more men at Arms, was commanded by the Dukes of Barre, and Alanſon, and by the Earles of Fawmont, Salings, Blamont Grantpee, and Ruſcy. In the Rereward, were all the remainder of the French forces, guided by the Earles of Marle, Dampmartin, Faucombridge, and the Lord Lowrey, Captaine of Ardy. The Frenchmen thus ordered, being ſix times, ſome ſay ten times as many as the Engliſh, (who were not above nine thouſand) thought of nothing, but of the booty they ſhould get: In the meane time king Henry having made choice of a piece of ground halfe feneed on his back with the Village, wherein they had reſted the night before, on both ſides having ſtrong hedges and ditches, begun there to order his battell; but firſt he appointed an ambuſh of two hundred Archers, which upon a watch-word given, ſhould diſcharge their whole flight upon the flanke of the Enemies horſe: The Vauntguard conſiſting of Archers only, was conducted by the Duke of Yorke; who out of an heroicke courage made ſuite for that place, with whom were joyned the Lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fanhope. The maine Battaile was led by the king himſelfe, which conſiſted of Bill-men, and ſome Bow-men; with him were the Duke of Glocester his Brother, the Earle Marſhall, Oxford, and Suffolke. The Rereward was led by Thomas Duke of Exeter, the kings Uncle, conſiſting of all ſorts of weapons; the horſemen as wings guarded the companies on both ſides. The king to prevent the fury of the French Cavallery, by the direction of the Duke of Yorke, appointed divers ſtakes ſtudded with iron at both ends, of ſix foot long, to be pitched behinde the Archers, and appointed Pyoners to attend to remove them, as they ſhould be directed: Theſe things thus ordered, publique Prayers were humbly made, and the on-ſet was preſently given by the French horſemen; whereupon upon Sir Walter Orpington, according to direction, cauſed the Bow-men behind the hedges, to let flie their arrowes; which ſo galled the French horſes, that either they caſt their Riders, or through their unruline ſſe ſo opened their Ranks, that the right wing of the Engliſh horſe had way to come in upon the French foot; & withall, the French horſe diſorderly retiring, they were miſerably troden down & diſtranked by their own company. Upon which, the King with his Main-battell came on with ſuch reſolution, that himſelfe in perſon charged the Duke of Alanſon, by whom he was valiantly unhorſed; but afterward, having firſt ſlaine two of the Dukes men, he charged the Duke againe, and with his ſword beat him from his horſe; whom the Kings Guard, notwithſtanding the King cryed out to the contrary, flew outright: and with his fall, the maine-battell of the French firſt gave ground, then turned their backs, and laſtly caſt away their weapons and fled. But then certaine of the French-horſemen that firſt ran away, led on by Robert Bondile and the Captain of Agincourt, meaning to wipe away the blot of running away from ſouldiers, by fighting with boyes, ſet upon the Pages and Laundreſſes that were left in the Campe; who gave ſuch a lamentable ſhreeke, that king Henry verily thought ſome freſh forces had been come: whereupon he cauſed all the arrowes that were ſticking in the field, to be gathered, and the ſtakes to be plucked up, and made ready to be againe uſed; amongſt which the Duke of Yorke body was found, miſerably hacked and defaced: the ſight whereof, together with danger of a ſecond Charge, made king Henry give order, the Priſoners ſhould be all ſlaine, except onely ſome principall men, whom he cauſed to be bound back to back, and ſo left. For which fact, though done in cold blood, yet the King could not juſtly be taxed with cruelty, ſeeing the number of the priſoners was more than of his own ſouldiers; and nothing could give aſſurance of ſafety, but their ſlaughter. But all was not yet done: for the Earles of Marle and Faucombridge, with ſixe hundred men at Armes, who had ſtood ſtill all day, began now to ſtir, and gave a brave Charge upon King Henries Army: but being but few, and their horſes galled with the ſtakes, they had onely the honour to dye bravely; and indeed, they ſlew more of the Engliſh, than the whole Army had done before. And now at laſt, the King being ſatisfied by the Scouts, that no Enemy was more to be ſeen, he aſked what the place was called? and being told, Agincourt; Well then (ſaid he) this ſhall be from henceforth called the Battell of Agincourt: and preſently he cauſed the whole Army, in their array as they were, to give God thankes; cauſing the Clergie there preſent, to ſing the Pſalme of David, In exitu Iſrael de Ægypto; and made Proclamation, that every one, at the verſe, Non nobis Domine, ſed nomini tuo da gloriam, ſhould kneele downe, and the horſe-men bow their bodies: and then ſinging Te Deum and other holy Hymnes, they marched to the Enemies Camp, where the ſouldiers had liberty given them to take the ſpoyle.

A great Victory no doubt, but yet a Victory by which the Engliſh gained not one foote of ground in France, more then they had before; and which Monſhelet attributeth not ſo much to the valour of the Engliſh, as to the indiſcretion of the French, who had ſo ſtreightned the vantguard of their Army, and pent them up ſo cloſe together, that they had not roome to draw out their ſwords; ſo true is that ſaying, Quos Deus vult perdere, dementat. The next day after the Battayle French Heraulds came to aske leave to bury their dead, and had it; and the Engliſh Heraulds, appointed to make ſearch, made returne that there were ſlayn of the French above ten thouſand, whereof a hundred twenty ſix were of the Nobility bearing Banners, of Knights and Gentlemen of Coat-Armour, ſeven thouſand eight hundred ſeventy foure, whereof five hundred were knighted the night before the Battell: & of common ſouldiers, about ſixteen hundred. Amongſt the ſlain of the Nobility, were Charles le Brets High Conſtable, Jaques of Chatillon Admiral of France, the great Maſter of France, the Maſter of the Croſſebowes, the Dukes of Alanſon, Brabant, and Barre; the Earles of Nevers, Marle, Vaudemont, Beaumont, Grantpee, Rouſcy, Faucombridge, Foys, and Leſtreuck: There was taken Priſoners, Charles Duke of Orleance, John Duke of Bourbon, the Lords Dauvert, Foſſeux, Humiers, Roy, Cowny, Fraucourt, Noeſl, Bonciquall; to the number in all of fifteen hundred. On the Engliſh part were slaine, Edward Duke of York, and the Earle of Suffolk, and not full six hundred in all; but (saith Coxton) not above six and twenty in all; and Paulus Æmilius saith, besides the two Lords, onely two Knights, and but ten private souldiers in all: a Miracle rather then a Victory. But not onely K. Henry was the death of the French Lords before-named, in the field with his sword; but of another great Prince, at home, with his Victory; for Lewis the Dolphin, eldest sonne of Charles the sixth, king of France, presently upon it, without any other cause apparent, fell sick and dyed. Yet king Henry, to make his enemies the better contented with their overthrow, and to take away the envy of his Victory; at his returne into England with his Prisoners, which was on the six of November following, he presently gave straight order, that no Ballad or Song should be made or sung, more then of Thanksgiving to God for his happy Victory and safe Returne; but without words of either disgracing the Freuch, or extolling the English. At his entrance into London, the City presented him with a thousand pounds, and two Basons of Gold worth five hundred pounds more. The bodies of the Duke of Torke and the Earle of Suffolke were brought into England, and the Dukes buried at Fodringhey in Northamptonshire, the Earles at New-Elme in Oxfordshire.

About this time, the Emperour Sigismond Cosin-german to king Henry, having been first in France, came accompanid with the Archbishop of Rheames, Ambassador from the French king, into England; for whom there were thirty great ships sent from the King to waft him over: but approaching to land at Dover, the Duke of Glocester, with a company of Gentlemen, having their swords drawn, stept up to the knees in water, saying to him, That if he came as the Kings friend, he should be welcome; but if as claiming any jurisdiction, they would resist him: whereupon the Emperour renounceth all Imperiall Authority; and is thereupon admitted to land, and received with as much honour as could be done him; and afterward, together with Albert Duke of Holland, who was lately likewise arrived at Winchester, is elected Companion of the Order of the Garter, and sate in their Cells at the solemnity of the Feast. A principall cause of the Emperors comming, was to mediate a Peace between England and France, wherein he had brought king Henry to a good degree of inclination; till newes came of the besieging of Harflew by the French, and of the Earle of Armiñacks setting upon the Duke of Exceter, being Governour there: and then he presently grew so averse from Peace, that he would hearken no more to any Treaty of it; Not that he misliked they should treat of Peace with their swords in their hands, as all wise men would doe; but that to treat of Peace, and in the time of the Treaty to doe acts of Hostility, was an affront to all honesty, and not to be tolerated with any patience.

And now the Earle of Armiñack having set downe before the Towne, the Vice-Admirall of France brought up the whole Navy of the French, with intent whilst the Earle should assaile it by land, to have entred the Towne by the waters side: but of this purpose, the valour and diligence of the Duke of Exceter prevented them. Assoone as king Henry had intelligence hereof, he would presently have gone himself; but being disswaded by the Emperor, he sent his brother the Duke of Bedford, with the Earles of March, Oxford, Huntington, Warwick, Arundell, Salisbury, Devonshire, and divers others, with two hundred Saile, to the rescue of Harflew; who upon the Feast of the Assumption of our Lady, came to the mouth of the River Seyne: whereupon, Norbon the French Admirall set forward, and got the mouth of the Haven: and here began a Fight, which was resolutely maintained on both sides, uneill the English having sunke five hundred Vessels one and other of the French, and taken three great Carricks of Genoua, wonne the harbour, and at last, though with some oppositon made by their Gallies, relieved Harflew, and made the Earle of Armiñack glad to raise his Siege. Upon the news hereof, the Emperor desisted from mediating any further for Peace with France; and entring into a League defensive and offensive with king Henry, wherein onely the Pope was excepted, on the 19 of October he departed towards Germany, whom king Henry accompanied to Callis; whither the Duke of Burgundy came, to confirme the League concluded on on before by the Earle of Warwick and him, concerning Flanders and Arthois only. In the meane time the French had hyred divers Carracks and other great ships of the Genouaes and Italians, which joyning with the french-fleete, lay at the mouth of the River of Seyne, under the command of Jaques Bastard of Bourbon; to hinder all succors from comming to Harflew; but John Earle of Huntington (sonne to the Duke of Exeter beheaded at Cicester) being sent to scoure the coasts, encountred with him, and after a long fight tooke him Prisoner, and three of his great Carricks, with all the money for the halfe yeers pay of the fleete, and sinking three other of his Carricks, and dispersing the rest, cleered the mouth of the River and then returned to the king at Southampton. And now upon the twenty third of July, in the fourth yeere of his Reigne, the king himselfe, with the Dukes of Clarence and Glocester, the Earles of Huntington, Warwick, Devonshire, Salisbury, Suffolke and Somerset, the Lords Rosse, Willoughby, Fits-hugh, Clynton, Scroope, Matrevers, Bourchier, Ferrers of Groby, Ferrers of Chartley, Fanhope, Grey of Codnor, Sir Gilbert Umphreville, Sir Gylbert Talbot, and an Army consisting of twenty five thousand five hundred twenty eight fighting men, besides a thousand Artificers and Pyoners, tooke shipping at Portsmouth, and upon the first of August landed in Normandy neere to the Castle of Tonque, which hee presently besieged, and upon the ninth of August had it yeelded to him, at which time the Earle of Salisbury tooke the Castle of Alberoillers which the king gave him, to him and his heires, being the first land given by the king in France.

At the winning of Tonque, the king made eight and twenty Knights; and from thence marched with his Army to Caen; where to prevent the Citizens from sallying out, he cast up a Mount; and then making many assaults, but finding them to doe little good, he caused his Pyoners to undermine the walls: which being done, upon the fourth of September he offered the Besieged their lives, if they would submit: which they refusing, he thereupon made a shew of a generall assault, whilst many of his men entred the City under the foundation, of whom the Duke of Clarence with his Company was the first: and they comming upon the backs of those that defended the walls, easily overcame them; and then the whole Army entred without resistance. The next day, the King caused all the principall men of the Towne to come before him at their Senate house; where some of them, for their stubborne refusing the grace he had offered them, were adjudged to death, and the rest fined: the spoyl of the Town was distributed amongst the souldiers. The Captaine of the Castle stood out a while; but being advertised that the king had sworne to shew no mercy, if he did not surrender; he gave twelve Hostages, that if it were not relieved before the twentieth of September, he would then give it up; which not comming, he performed: and so the king had possession both of Caen and the Castle.

And now Charles the new Dolphin, being but seventeene yeeres of age and bare of money, had got into his possession all the jewels, plate and money of the Queen his mother; which so incensed her against him, that to doe him a spight, she placed the Duke of Burgundy in chiefe authority about the king, who by reason of his infirmity was unable himselfe to manage the State; and the Duke having now the sword in his hands, meant first to represse the growing boldnesse of the Dolphyn, and afterward to repell the common Enemy: and the Dolphyn likewise, envying the Dukes advancement above him, meant first to take down his swelling greatnes, and afterward to fall upon the forreigne adversary; and thus while private respects were preferred before publique, whilest the Duke and the Dolphyn had their first intentions against one another, not looking after king Henry, but in the second place, after their owne turnes served, an easie way was left for king Henries proceedings, and hee went on at his pleasure with small opposition. Hee sent the Duke of Clarence, who tooke in the City of Bayeux, as likewise the Duke of Glocester the City of Lyseux; whilst himselfe remayning still at Caen, put out of the city the natives that were impotent or yong infants to the number of fifteen hundred, & in their places put English people, and finding a great masse of money and plate, deposited posited by the Citizens in the Caſtle, he cauſed the ſame, upon proofe, to bee reſpectively delivered to the right owners, upon condition they would acknowledge him for their Soveraigne; which moderate and juſt dealing wonne him more hearts then the force of his Armes had wonne him knees, ſpecially with the Normans, who are eaſier to bee drawn with gentleneſſe and love, then forced by violence and compulſion. From hence the king marched the firſt of October to Corfye Caſtle, which within three dayes yeelded. The fourth of October he came to Argenton, which not relieved by a day agreed upon, was likewiſe ſurrendred. The Towne of Alanſon endured eight daies ſiege, but in the end did as other their neighbour Townes had done. From Alanſon the Earle of Salisbury was ſent to Faleys, to view the ſtrength thereof, whom the king preſently followed, where the beſieged concluded, if it were not relieved before the ſecond of January, then to yeelde up the Towne: No reliefe comming, the Towne was yeelded up, and ſoone after upon the like termes, the Caſtle. From hence the king returned to Caen, to put in execution a Proclamation he had formerly made; That if the inhabitants of Normandy that were fled, returned not by a day aſſigned, hee would then grant their Lands to his ſouldiers: and thereupon he gave to the duke of Clarence during life, the Vicounties of Auge, Orver and Pontiue, with all the Lands of thoſe that were not returned according to the Proclamation. All the Lent the king lay at Bayeux, whileſt his Navy ſtill kept the Seas, and daily tooke many French ſhips, but upon the ſixteenth of July ſuch a Tempeſt took them, that they were driven to fall in with Southampton, and yet, with all their diligence, could not ſo ſave themſelves, but that two Ballingers, and two great Carricks laden with merchandize, were in the very Haven drowned. In the meane time the Earle of VVarwick and the Lord Talbot beſieged the ſtrong Caſtle of Dampfront: The Duke of Clarence tooke Courton and Burney; and many other being taken, as Chamboits, Becheloupe, Harcourt, Fantgernon, Creuecer, Anvylliers, Bagles, in all of them he placed Captaines and Garriſons, and particularly in Freſay, Sir Robert Brent, lately made Viſcount. The Duke of Glouceſter alſo, with the Earle of March, and the Lord of Codnor, tooke in all the Iſle of Conſtantine, except Cherebourg, and then returned to the king, but was ſent back to take in that City alſo: which after ſome time, when no reliefe came, was, together with the Caſtle, likewiſe ſurrendred; although by this time the Duke of Burgundie and the Dolphyn, by mediation of the Pope, were reconciled, and began to joyne theie Forces to make reſiſtance. And now the Duke of Exeter the kings Uncle, with a ſupply of fifteene thouſand men out of England, came to the king, who preſently took in the City of Eureux; and the Earle of Ryme, the ſtrong Caſtle of Milley le Veſco.

The next thing attempted, was the ſiege of Roan, a Citie ſtrongly fortified, both with walls and ditches, and to which there was no convenient paſſage, but by the Citie of Lovier; to this Citie therefore he firſt layes ſiege, which when no reliefe came within a time agreed on, was ſurrendred; and yet there was another impediment to be removed, a ſtone-bridge, which hindred the approach to Roan, being exceeding ſtrongly guarded: For this, King Henry deviſed floats of wicker, covered with beaſts hides, by which the Duke of Clarence with his quarter paſſed the River, and then laid ſiege to the Towne on that ſide; and for the other ſide, he had other deviſes made with hogſheads and pipes, faſtned to ſirrepoles and Barges, with which he paſſed his men over at pleaſure; and in the meane time he cauſed divers of his Souldiers that could ſwimme, to make ſhew of paſſing the River three miles off another way; with which the French-men being deluded, drew all their forces thither, and by this meanes the Fort being left unfurniſhed of ſufficient guard, was preſently forced to ſurrender, and the Souldiers were taken to the Kings grace; The bridge being thus gained, the Duke of Exeter was ſent, and with him Windſor the Herald, to ſummon the Citizens to ſurrender the Towne; who not only gave proud anſwers, but alſo made a ſallye forth, though with the loſſe of thirty of their men. Upon this obſtinacie of theirs, the King preſently orders his ſiege; his own quarter was the Charteux, the Duke of Clarence at St. Gervays, the Duke of Exeter at at Port St. Dennis, and every great Commander had his quarter aſſigned, ſo as the Citie was begirt round, and a great chaine of iron ſet upon piles, and a ſtrong wooden bridge for paſſage from one Campe to the other, was made over the River. At this time the Earle of Kilmayne with ſixteen hundred Iriſh came to the King, and had their quarter aſſigned them, who behaved themſelves with great valour: The Kings Coſen Germane the King of Portugall, ſent likewiſe a Navie of Ships to the mouth of the River of Seyne, which ſtopped all paſſage of ſuccour to Roan; many policies and practices were uſed againſt the Citie, but none prevailed, till famine forced it; for there being in Roan 210000 perſons at the begining of the Siege, and the Siege continuing long, it grew to that extremity, that the Citizens dranke no thing but vinegar and water, and had little to eate, but Rats and Mice, Cats and dogs, and ſuch like: Great numbers of the poorer ſort were thruſt out of the Citie, who not ſuffered to paſſe the Engliſh Army, miſerably periſhed; onely upon Chriſtmas-day, in honor of Chriſts birth, the King relieved and ſuffered to paſſe as many as were at firſt put out, but not others that were put out the ſecond time, but ſuffered them to periſh.

In this diſtreſſe, a Parley is required by the Citizens; who notwithſtanding their miſery, yet ſtood upon ſuch high termes, that nothing was concluded, only a truce for eight dayes was granted them; the eight dayes ended, and nothing yet agreed upon amongſt themſelves, they crave one day longer, and neither in that day could any thing be agreed on; then they crave four dayes more, in which the multitude and common people ſo preſſed the Magiſtrates and Governours of the Citie, that on the fourth day, being about the nineteenth of January, the Citie was ſurrendred, and the Inhabitants themſelves, and all their goods were yielded to the Kings mercy; the Duke of Exeter was appointed to take poſſeſſion, who accordingly entred with his Souldiers. The next day after, being Friday the twentieth of January, the King himſelfe made his entry, with four Dukes, ten Earles, eight Biſhops, ſixteen Barons, and others, and was by the Clergie conducted to our Lady Church; where after publique thanksgiving, he tooke Homage and fealty of the Burgeſſes and Inhabitants; making Proclamation, that all that would come and acknowledge him to be their Soveraigne, ſhould enjoy the benefit of his Protection, and retaine their poſſeſſions, whereupon many came in, and many Townes were ſurrendred. In this time of the Kings lying at Roani, the Earle of Salisbury tooke in Hunſtevy, Munſter de Villiers, Ewe, and Newcaſtle; the Duke of Clarence tooke Vernon, and Naunt; and the Earle of Warwicke la Roche Guyon.

And now the Duke of Burgundie ſeeing the great ſucceſſes of King Henry, could thinke of no better way for his own ſafety, then to make a reconciliation betweene the two Kings; to which end, Ambaſſadors are ſent to procure their meeting; at which time, King Henry for their ſervice already performed, and in hope of more hereafter, made the valiant Gaſcoigne Captaine le Beuff, Earle of Longueville, Sir John Grey Earle of Tankeville, and the Lord Bourchier Earle of Ewe. Upon the laſt of May, King Henry accompanied with the Dukes of Clarence, Glocester, and Exeter; his Uncle Beaufort, the Biſhop of Winchester, with the Earles of March, and Salisbury, and a thouſand men at Armes, entred the place appointed for the meeting of the two Kings. The French Queene (her Husband being taken with his pleurizie) with the Duke of Burgoigne, and the Earle of St. Paul, and a company of Ladies; amongſt whom, as a bait to entangle the Kings affection, was the kings Daughter, the beautifull Lady Katherine; with whoſe ſight, though the King was maſt vellouſly taken, yet he made no ſhew thereof, till other things ſhould be agreed upon; but the Dolphin having made means to the Duke of Burgoigne to hinder all agreement, nothing was effected; whereupon at their parting, the King told the Duke, that he would have both the Lady, and all his other Demands; or elſe drive the King of France out of his kingdome, and him out of his Dukedome: Upon this, the Duke thought it beſt to agree with the Dolphin, and upon the ſixth of July, Articles of their reconcilement are ſigned and ſealed; In the meane time, the Earle of Longueville ſurprized the Towne of Ponthoiſe, but had ſcarce beene able to make good the ſurprize, if the Duke of Clarence had not come to his ſuccour; from thence the Duke marched to Paris, and there ſtayed two dayes, but perceiving no ſhew of ſallye to be made, he returned to Ponthoyſe, whither the King himſelfe came; and from thence marching on, tooke in the Caſtle of Vanyon Villeirs; and on the laſt of Auguſt, the Caſtles of Gyſors, and Galyard, and Dumall; ſo that now all Normandy (Mount St. Michael only excepted) was reduced to the poſſeſſion of the King of England, which had beene wrongfully detained from him, ever ſince the yeare 1207.

The Dolphin all this while, though having outwardly made a reconcilement with the Duke of Burgoigne, yet inwardly bearing a ſpleene againſt him, intended nothing ſo much as his deſtruction; which to effect, he procured a meeting betweene the Duke and him, and all the Peers of the Realm at Mountſtrew; where the Duke though humbling himſelfe in reverence to the Dolphin on his knee, was moſt barbarouſly murthered; which act, was ſo much the leſſe to be pitied in the Duke, by how much he in the like kinde, upon the like enterview, had cauſed Lewis the Duke of Orleance to be murthered. But though this barbarous act might juſtly incenſe Philip Earle of Carolois the Duke of Burgoignes heire to ſeeke revenge; yet as a wiſe and and politicke Prince, he forbore for the preſent to make ſhew of choller or diſtemperature, and conſidering with himſelfe, that difference betweene the Dolphin and him, would but give King Henry the greater advantage, he endeavoured to propoſe an overture of peace betweene the two Kings; And to that end Ambaſſadors are ſent from the King of France, and the yong Duke of Burgoigne, whom the King kindly entertained, but ſeemed to intimate unto them, that hee could give no great credit to their propoſitions, unleſſe the Lady Katherine would joyne in them, whoſe innocence he knew would never abuſe him. Whileſt theſe things are in agitation, the Earle of Salisbury tooke in Freſney, and the Earls Marſhall and Huntington entred into Mayn, who approaching Ments, were encountred by the forces of the Dolphin, whereof they ſlew five thouſand, and tooke two hundred priſoners; for which, newes being brought to Roan, whither King Henry was come to ſolemnize the Feaſt of Chriſts Birth, thankſgiving to God were publickly made; and in the inſtant thereof, arrived other Ambaſſadors from the King and Queene of France, and a letter from the Lady Katherine to King Henry, was ſecretly by the Biſhop of Arras delivered; The concluſion of all was, that the king of England ſhould ſpeed himſelfe to Troyes, there to be eſpouſed to the Lady Katherine, and to have aſſurance of the Crowne of France, after the deceaſe of the preſent king Charles: Whereupon, with a Guard of fifteen thouſand choice Souldiers, accompanied with the Duke of Clarence and Glocester, the Earls of Warwicke, Saliſbury, Huntington, Longuevile, Tankerville and Ewe, the king of England came to Troys in Champaign, upon the eighteenth day of May, where he was met by the Duke of Burgoigne, and divers of the French Nobility, who attended him to the Pallace, where the Queen with her Daughters, the Dutcheſſe of Burgoigne, and the Lady Katherine gave him Princely entertainment; and after ſome intercourſe of complement between the Princes and the Ladies, K. Henry tendred to the Lady Katherine a Ring of great value, which ſhe (not without ſome bluſhing) received; and afterward, upon the twentieth day of May, ſhe was affianced to him in St. Peters Church, and on the third of June following, the marriage was ſolemnized; and therewithall king Henry was publiſhed to be the only Regent of the Realme, and Heire apparent to the Crown of France; the Articles whereof, with all convenient expedition were Proclaimed both in England and in France, and the two kings, and all their Nobles, and other Subjects of account, were ſworne to obſerve them; and in particular the Duke of Burgoigne.

And thus was the Salique Law violated, and the heire Male put by his Suceſſion in the Crowne, which the Genius of France will not long endure, a while it muſt; and therefore the maine endeavour of both kings now is, to keep him down, whom they had put downe; and thereupon, on the fourth day of June, king Henry with the French king, James king of Scots, who was newly arrived, the Duke of Burgoigne, goigne, the Prince of Orenge, one and twenty Earles, five and forty Barons, with many Knights and Gentlemen, and an Army conſiſting of French, Engliſh, Scotiſh, Iriſh, and Dutch, to the number of ſix hundred thouſand, marched towards the Dolphin; and upon the ſeventh day, laid ſiege to the Towne of Sens, which ſided with the Dolphin, which after foure dayes ſiege was yielded up. From thence they removed, having the Duke of Bedford in their company, who was newly come out of England, with large ſupplies of men and money to Monſtreau, which was taken by Eſcalado, onely the Caſtle held out ſtill; during the ſiege whereof, king Henry created an Officer of Armes, to be king of Heralds over the Engliſhmen, and intitled him Garter; whom he ſent with offers of mercy to the Caſtle, but was by the Captaine thereof reproachfully upbraided: for puniſhment of which his preſumption, a Gibbet was erected, and in view of Mounſieur Guitry the ſaid Captaine, twelve of his friends were executed: whereupon thoſe of the Caſtle treated for peace; but the king, in eight dayes together, would not grant ſo much as a parley; ſo that after ſix weekes ſiege, they were enforced (their lives ſaved) ſimply to yield. From thence the king marched to Melun upon Seine, and beſieged it the thirtieth of July; the Captaine whereof was Barbaſon a Gaſcoigne, no leſſe politicke than valiant, who countermined ſome, and ſtopt other Mines made by the Engliſh, and fought hand to hand in the Barriers with king Henry; yet at laſt, through Famine and Peſtilence was forced to yeild; but being ſuſpected to have had a hand in the murther of the Duke of Burgoigne, he was ſent priſoner to Paris; and preſently thereupon, both the kings with their Queens, the Duke of Burgoigne and his Dutcheſſe, with a Royall Traine came thither; where the French king was lodged in the Houſe of S. Paul, and the king of England in the Caſtle of Louvre. And here the three States of France anew under their hands and Seals in moſt authenticke manner Ratified the former Articles of king Henries Succeſſion in the Crowne of France; the Inſtruments whereof were delivered to the king of England, who ſent them to be kept in his Treaſury at Weſtminſter.

And now King Henry began to exerciſe his Regency, and as a badge of his Authority; he cauſed a new Coyne which was called a Salute, to be made, whereon the Armes of France and England were quarterly ſtamped; he placed and diſplaced divers Officers, and appointed the Duke of Exeter with five hundred men, to the Guard of Paris: He awarded out Proceſſe againſt the Dolphin, to appeare at the Marble-Table at Paris, which he not obeying, Sentence was denounced againſt him, as guilty of the murther of the Duke of Burgoigne; and by the ſentence of the Parliament, he was baniſhed the Realme.

After this, the King making Thomas Duke of Clarence his Lievetenant Generall of France and Normandy, on the 6th of January, with his beloved Queen Katherine he left Paris, and went to Amyens; and from thence to Callis, and thence landing at Dover, came to Canterbury, and afterward through London to Weſtminſter; where the Queene upon St. Matthews day, the fourth of February was Crowned; the King of Scots ſitting at dinner in his State, but on the left hand of the Queen, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Kings Uncle the Biſhop of Wincheſter being on the right hand; All were ſerved with covered meſſes of ſilver, but all the Feaſt was Fiſh, in obſervation of the Lent ſeaſon.

After this, the king tooke his Progreſſe through the Land, hearing the complaints of his poore Subjects, and taking order for the adminiſtring of Juſtice to high and low; and then met the Queen at Leiceſter, where they kept their Eaſter.

In the meane time, the Duke of Clarence making a Road into Anjou, came to the Citie of Ampers, where he knighted Sir William Boſſe, Sir Henry Goddard, Sir Rowland Vyder, Sir Thomas Beauford his naturall Son; and returning home laden with prey, was advertiſed that the Duke of Alanſon intended to intercept his paſſage; whereupon, he ſent the Scout-maſter, Andrew Fogoſa a Lombard, to diſcover the face of the Enemy; who being corrupted, brought report that their number was but ſmall, and thoſe but ill ordered, that if he preſently charged, there could be no reſiſtance. The Dukes credulity cauſed him to draw all his horſes together, and leaving his bowes and bills behinde which were his chiefeſt ſtrength, with his horſe only he makes towards the Enemy; but the Traitor leading to a ſtraight, where by his appointment an ambuſh was layd, that the Duke could neither retreat, nor flee; he ſoone perceived the Treachery, but finding no remedy, he manfully ſet ſpurre to his horſe, and charged upon the Enemy; but over-layd with multitude, and wearied with fight, was himſelfe, with the Earle of Tankeville, the Lord Roſſe, the Earle of Angus, Sir John Lumley, and Sir John Vereud, and above two thouſand Engliſh ſlaine; The Earls of Somerſet, Suffolke and Pearch, Sir John Berkley, Sir Ralph Neuill, Sir William Bowes, and 60 Gentlemen were taken priſoners: The body of the Duke of Clarence, was by Sir John Beauford his baſe Son, (the D. dying without other iſſue) convey'd to England, and buried at Canterbury beſides his Father: and this diſaſter happened upon Eaſter-Eve. The King was at Beverley when he heard of his brothers death, and preſently thereupon, diſpatched away Edmund Earle of Mortaigne into Normandy, making him Lievetenant thereof; and then calls his high Court of Parliament to Weſtminſter, requiring ayd by money to revenge his brothers death, which was readily granted; and the king thus provided, ſent his brother the Duke of Bedford with an Army to Callis, conſiſting of foure thouſand men at Arms, and foure and twenty thouſand Archers, whom about the middle of May he followeth himſelfe, and ſafely arriving at Callis, haſted to relieve Charters, which the Dolphin with ſeven thouſand men had beſieged; but hearing of the kings coming, was retired to Tours. The king of Scots, with the Duke of Glocester, about the eighth of July beſieged Dreux; which agreed, if it were not relieved by the twentieth of that moneth, then to ſurrender it; no reliefe comming, it was ſurrendred. The king purſued the Dolphin from place to place, but could not overtake him, but in the way, ſurprized the Towne of Bongency, whereall that craved it, he tooke to mercy, as likewiſe he did at Rongemont; from thence he went to Orleance, and from thence to Vignes St. Ton, and from thence to Paris; where having fitted himſelfe with ſupplies, he went and ſate downe before Meaux in Brye, which after ſome oppoſition, he alſo tooke; and thereby had poſſeſſion of all the Forreſſes in the Iſle of France, in Lomaus, in Brye, and in Champaigne.

Upon St. Nicholas day, in the yeare 1422, Queen Katherine was brought to bed of a Son at Windſor, who was by the Duke of Bedford, and Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, and the Counteſſe of Holland Chriſtned by the name of Henry; whereof, when the king had notice, out of a Propheticke rapture he ſayd; Good Lord, I Henry of Monmouth ſhall ſmall time Reigne and much get, and Henry borne at Windſor, ſhall long time Reigne and loſe all, but Gods will be done.

About this time the Dolphin layd ſiege to Coſney, which the king was inrentive to relieve, as being a Town of the Duke of Burgoignes; and therefore tendredit more than if it had beene his owne; and making over-haſty journeys, he over-heat himſelfe with travell; and comming to Senlys, found himſelfe ſo ill at eaſe, that he was forced to remaine there, and to ſend his brother the Duke of Bedford to proſecute his deſigne, which the Duke performed, and the Dolphin upon his approach, retired into Berry; whereof, in mockage he was after called the king of Berry. But the kings Feaver and flux increaſing, he was removed to Boys de Vincens; where growing worſe and worſe, within a few dayes he dyed. But ſomewhat before his departure, he had made his Brother the Duke of Bedford Lievetenant Generall of Normandy, and Regent of the Kingdome of Fraunce, and his Brother the Duke of Glocester, he had made Protector of England, and of his Sons Perſon: Exhorting all to be true and faithfull to the Duke of Burgoigne, to be at unitie amongſt themſelves, to be loyall to their young Prince, to be ſerviceable to his dearly beloved Queene, to hold and preſerve what he by his valour, and Gods aſſiſtance had wonne; and never to conclude contract of amitie with the Dolphin, or Duke of Alanſon, untill they had ſubmitted themſelves to the kings Grace. And ſo giving God thanks for all his favors and bleſſings beſtowed upon him, in the midſt of ſaying a Pſalme of David, he departed this life; who might juſtly have prayed God with David, Take me not away in the midſt of my dayes, for he dyed about the age of five or ſix and thirty years, which which in Davids account is the midſt of the number of the dayes of mans life: but though he dyed in the midſt of his dayes, yet he dyed in the fulneſſe of his Glory; and of whom it may be ſaid, ---Jamq; arce potitus, Ridet anhelantes duri ad faſtigia montis. When he had Reigned nine yeares and five moneths.

Of his Taxations.

IN his firſt yeere an incredible ſum of money was given him by the Clergy, to divert him from a motion propounded to take away their Temporalties. And in the ſame yeere a Subſidie was granted him both by the Clergy and the Laity. In his fourth yeere was granted him, towards his warres in France, two whole Tenths of the Clergy, and a fifteenth of the Laity; which being farre too ſhort to defray his great charge, he was forced to pawne his Crowne to the Biſhop of Beauford his Uncle for a great ſum of money, as alſo certain Jewels to the Lord Major of London, for ten thouſand markes. In his ninth yeere in a Parliament at Weſtminſter, for revenge of the Duke of Clarence death, two tenths of the Clergy, and one fifteenth by the Laity, which becauſe the haſte of the buſineſſe could not ſtay the uſuall courſe of collection, the Biſhop of Wincheſter brought in preſently twenty thouſand pounds, to receive it againe when the Subſidie ſhould be gathered. The ſame yeere alſo, the Duke of Bedford in the kings abſence called a Parliament, wherein was granted towards his warres, one fifteenth to be paid in ſuch money as was at that time current. Theſe are all the Subſidies that were given him, notwithſtanding his many and great atchievements, by which it appeares what great matters a moderate Prince may doe, and yet not grieve his ſubjects with Taxations.

Of Lawes and Ordinances made by him, or in his time.

HE ordained the king of Heralds over the Engliſh, which is called Garter.

In his ninth yeare, in a Parliament holden at Weſtminſter, It was ordained, that no man ſhould offer Gold in payment, unleſſe it were weight; and thereupon were appointed ballances and weights.

An act made in the thirteenth yeare of king Richard the Second, which diſabled the Alien Religious to enjoy any Benefices within England, was in the beginning of this kings Reigne put in execution: and further, this king excluded alſo the French from all preferments Eccleſiaſticall; and thoſe Priors Aliens Conventuall, who had inſtitution and induction, were bound to put in ſecurity, not to diſcloſe or cauſe to be diſcloſed, the Counſell and ſecrets of the Realme.

Affaires of the Church in his time.

IN the beginning of his Reigne, the Wickliffs increaſed greatly, of whom Sir John Oldcaſtle was a Chiefe, who by mariage of a kinſwoman of the Lord Cobhams of Cooling in Kent, obtained that Title: This knight, being very valorous, and in great favour with the king, was in a Synod at London accuſed for maintaining of Wickliffs doctrine: whereof the king being informed, ſent for him, and inſtantly dealt with him to ſubmit himſelfe to the cenſure of the Church: But Sir John Oldcaſtle told the King, that he owed his ſubjection onely to his Majeſtie; and as for others, he would ſtand for the truth againſt them, to the uttermoſt of his life. Upon this, he was ſerved by Proceſſe, to appeare in the Archbiſhops Court; and not appearing, was condemned of Contumacy, and afterwards in a Synod at Rocheſter, was by the Archbiſhop pronounced to be an Heretick; who then enacted that Decree, That the Holy Scriptures ought not to be tranſlated into the Engliſh tongue: But marke the judgement that fell upon his owne tongue; whoſe roote and blade ſhortly after (as is recorded) grew ſo bigge in his mouth and throat, that he could neither ſpeake, nor ſwallow downe meat, but in horrour lay languiſhing, till at laſt ſtarved by famine, he ſo dyed. In the meane time, Sir John Oldcaſtle wrote his Beliefe, and presented it himselfe to the King; which the King would in no wise receive, but suffered him, in his presence, and Privy chamber, to be summoned; who appearing before the Archbishop, after divers examinations, he was condemned of Heresie, and committed to the Tower of London, from whence shortly after he escaped, and got into Wales. The king, by his Proclamation, promised a thousand Marks to any that should bring him in: but so much was his doctrine generally favoured, that the kings offer was not much regarded; but he continued foure yeares after undiscovered: At last he was taken in the borders of Wales, within a Lordship belonging to the Lord Powes, who brought him to London, before the Duke of Bedford Regent of the Realme; where in the end he was condemned, and finally was drawn from the Tower to S. Giles field, and there hanged in a chaine by the middle, and after consumed with fire, the gallowes and all. At the time of his first conviction, foure yeares before, it was rumour'd, that twenty thousand men in armes were assembled in S. Giles field: whereupon, the king, at midnight, himselfe in person went thither, where he found many indeed, who upon examination confessed, that they came to meet their Captaine Sir John Oldcastle, but without any intent against the king: yet was Sir Roger Acton, and eight and twenty others of them apprehended, and executed in Smithfield; and all the Prisons in and about London were filled with them.

In his third yeare, the order of Church service throughout England, was changed from the use of Pauls to the use of Salisbury, to the great disliking of many in those dayes.

In his fourth yeare, a Councell was holden at Constance, whither he sent Ambassadors, the Earle of Warwick, the Bishops of Salisbury, Bath, and Hereford; the Abbot of Westminster, and the Prior of Worcester: In which Councell it was decreed, that England should have the title of the English Nation, and should be accounted one of the five principall Nations in ranke before Spaine; which often before had been moved, but never granted till then. And herein were all Wickliffs positions condemned: also John Husse, and Hierome of Prague (notwithstanding the Emperours safe-conduct) were both of them burned. In this Councell, the Schisme of Anti-popes, which had continued the space of nine and twenty yeares, was reformed: Benedict the 13. had been elected by the Spaniard; Gregory the 12. by the French; John the 24. by the Italians: And now in this Councell, begun in February 1414, and continued above three yeares; wherein were assembled, besides the Emperour, the Pope, and the Palsgrave of Rheine, foure Patriarks, twenty seven Cardinals, seven and forty Archbishops, one hundred and threescore Bishops, Princes and Barons with their attendants, above thirty thousand; The foresaid elected Popes were all put down, or else resigned, and in the place, as legitimate Pope, was elected Otho Lolonna, by the name of Martin the fifth.

In this yeare also, fell out an Accident, which shews the strict observance of Ecclesiasticall censures in those dayes. The wives of the Lord Strange, and Sir John Trussell of Warmington in Chesshire, striving for place at a Sermon in S. Dunstans Church in the East, their husbands being present, fell themselves to striving in their wives behalfe, and great part-taking there was on both sides, some slaine, and many wounded: The delinquents were committed to the Counter, the Church suspended, and upon examination, the Lord Strange being found guilty, was by the Archbishop of Canterbury adjudged to this Penance, which was accordingly performed: The Parson of S. Dunstans went before, after whom followed all the Lords servants in their shirts; after them went the Lord himselfe, bare-headed, with a waxe taper in his hand; then followed the Lady, bare-footed; and then last came the Archdeacon Reynold Remwood: in which order they went from Pauls where the sentence was given, to S. Dunstans Church, where at the rehallowing thereof, the Lady filled all the Vesse'ls with water, and according to the sentence, offered to the Altar an ornament of the value of ten pounds; and the Lord, a Pixe of silver, of five pounds. A Penance, no doubt, which the Lord and the Lady would have redeemed with a great deale of money, if the discipline of the Church had in those dayes allowed it:

it: but it seemes, the commutation of Penance was not as yet come in use.

In his ninth yeare, in a Parliament at Leicester, a hundred and ten Priories alient were suppressed, because they spoke ill of his Conquests in France; and their possessions were given to the King: but by him, and King Henry the sixth, were afterward given to other Monasteries, and Colledges of learned men.

Works of Piety by him, or others in his time.

THis King re-edified his Royall Manour, which was then called Sheene, now Richmond, and founded two Monasteries not farre from it; the one of Carthusians, which he named Bethelem; the other of Religious men and women of the Order of S. Bridget, which he named Syon: He also founded the Brotherhood of Saint Giles without Cripplegate in London. In the second yeare of his Reigne, Moore-gate neere to Colemanstreet was first made, by Thomas Fawkener Major of London, who caused also the ditches of the City to be cleansed, and a common Privy that was on the Moore without the wall, to be taken downe, and another to be made within the City upon Wallbrooke, into the which brooke he caused the water of the City to be turned by grates of iron in divers places. In his sixth yeare, William of Sevenoak Major of London, founded in the Town of Sevenoak a Free schoole and thirteen Almshouses. This man was found at Sevenoak in Kent, a new-borne infant of unknown Parents, but by charitable people was Christned and brought up, bound prentise in London, and came at last to be Major of the City. Also Robert Chichely Major of London gave liberally to the Almshouses founded by his brother Henry Chicheley Archbishop of Canterbury, at Higham-Ferrers in Northamptonshire, where they were born. But Henry Chicheley the Archbishop founded two Colledges in Oxford, one called Bernard Colledge, renewed by Sir Thomas White, and named S. Johns Colledge; the other called All-Soules, which continueth at this day as he left it. Also John Kempe Archbishop of Canterbury, converted the Parish-Church of Wy in Kent where he was borne, into a Colledge of Secular Priests.

Casualties happening in his time.

IN the fift yeere of his Reigne a great part of the City of Norwich was burnt, with all the house of the Friers Preachers, and two fryers of that Order. In his third yeere, on the feast of the Purification, seaven Dolphins came up the River of Themes, whereof foure were taken.

Of his Wife and issue.

HE married Catherine the daughter of king Charles the sixth of France, who was his Queene two yeeres and about three moneths, married at Troyes in Champaigne the third day of June 1420. and afterward February the foureteenth crowned at Westminster: Shee surviving king Henry, was re-married to Owen Tewdor an Esquire of Wales, who pretended to be discended from Cadwallader the ancient king of Wales, though some write him to be the sonne of a Brewer, whose meanesse of estate was recompensed by the delicacy of his personage; so absolute in all the lineaments of his body, that the only contemplation of it might well make her forget all other circumstances; by him she had three sonnes, Edmond, Jasper, and Owen, and a daughter that lived but a while. Her sonne Owen tooke the habit of Religion at Westminster, the other two were by king Henry the sixt (their halfe brother) advanced in honor: Edmond was created Earle of Richmond, and marrying the sole heyre of John Beaufort Duke of Somerset, was Father, by her, unto Henry the seaventh, king of England, the only heyre of the house of Lancaster. Jasper her second sonne was first created Earle of Pembroke, and after Duke of Bedford, but dyed without lawfull issue. This Queene, either for devotion or her owne safety, tooke into the Monastery of Bermondsey in Southwarke, who dying the second of January 1436. she was buried in our Ladies Chappell within St. Peters Church at Weſtminſter, whoſe corps taken up in the Reigne of king Henry the ſeaventh, her Grand-childe (when he laid the foundation of that admirable ſtructure) and her Coffin placed by king Henry her huſbands Tombe, hath ever ſince ſo remained, and never ſince re-buried, where it ſtandeth (the cover being looſe) to bee ſeene and handled of any that will. By her king Henry had only one ſon, named Henry, who ſuccceded him in the Kingdom.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

HE was tall of ſtature, leane of body, and his bones ſmall but ſtrongly made, ſomewhat long necked, black haired, and very beautifull of face, ſwift in running, ſo as hee with two of his Lords, without bow or other engine, would take a wilde Buck or Doe in a large Parke: Hee delighted in ſongs and muſicall inſtruments, inſomuch that in his Chappell amongſt his private prayers, he uſed certaine Pſalmes of David, tranſlated into Engliſh meeter by John Lydgate Monke of Bury. And indeed it may be truly ſaid of him as was ſaid of Æneas: Quo juſtior alter; Nec pietate fuit, nec bello major & armis, for he ſeldom fought battell where he got not the victory, and never got victory whereof he gave not the glory to God, with publique Thankſgiving. He was a better man, a King then a Subject; for till then he was not in his right Orbe, and therfore no mervaile if he were ſomthing exorbitant. He was of a mercifull diſpoſition, but not to the prejudice of wiſedom; as thinking wiſe cruelty to be better then fooliſh pitty. He was no leſſe politick then valiant, for he never fought battell, nor wonne Town, wherein hee prevailed not ſmuch by ſtratagem as by force. He was ſo temperate in his dyet, and ſo free from vain-glory, that we may truly ſay, he had ſomething in him of Cæſar which Alexander the Great had not, that he would not bee drunke; and ſomthing of Alexander the Great, which Cæſar had not, that he would not be flattered. He was indeede a great affector of Glory, but not of glory the blaſt of mens mouthes, but of the Glory that fills the ſailes of Time. He dyed of full yeeres, though not full of yeeres: if he had lived longer he might have gone over the ſame againe, but could not have gone further. If his love were great to Military men, it was not ſmall to Clergy men, inſomuch as by many he was called the Prince of Prieſts.

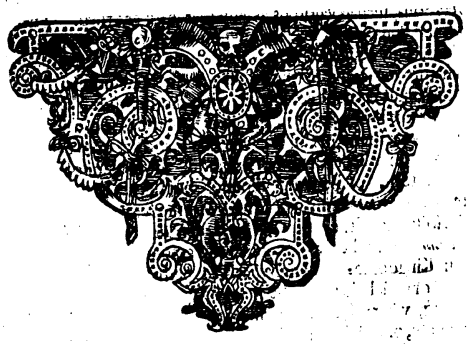

Of his Death and Burieall.

SOme ſay he was poyſoned, which Polydore Virgill ſaith was much ſuſpected: The Scots write that he died of the diſeaſe called St. Fiacre, which is a Palſie and a Crampe: Enguerant ſaith that he died of St. Anthonies fire: But Peter Baſſet Eſquire, who at the time of his death was his Chamberlaine, affirmeth that hee died of a Pleuriſie, which at that time was a ſickneſſe ſtrange and but little known. Being dead his body was embalmed and cloſed in lead; and laid in a Chariot-Royall richly apparelled in cloath of Gold, was conveyed from Boys de Vincennes to Paris, and ſo to Roan, to Abbeville, to Calys, to Dover, and from thence through London to Weſtminſter, where it was interred next beneath King Edward the Confeſſor; upon whoſe Tombe Queene Katherine cauſed a Royall picture to be layed, covered all over with ſilver plate gilt, but the head thereof altogether of maſſie ſilver; all which at that Abbies ſuppreſſion were ſacrilegiouſly broken off and transferred to prophaner uſes. Hee dyed the laſt day of Auguſt, in the yeere one thouſand foure hundred twenty two, when he had reigned nine yeeres and five Moneths, lived eight and thirty yeeres.

Of men of Note in his time.

MEN of valour in his time were ſo frequent, that we may know it to be a true ſaying, Regis ad exemplum, and men of learning likewiſe in ſuch numbers, that we we may know the Prince to have been their Patron. Firſt Alayn de Lyn, a Carmelite Frier in that Towne, who wrote many Treatiſes; Then Thomas Otterborne a Franciſcan frier who wrote an Hiſtory of England; Then John Segward, who kept a Schoole in Norwich, and wrote ſundry Treatiſes, reproving as well the Monkes and Prieſts as Poets for writing of filthy verſes. Robert Raſe a Carmelite frier in Norwich; who writing many Treatiſes, yet ſaid nothing againſt the Wickleſſits. Richard Conſter borne in Nofolke, a man of great holineſſe of life, favoring (though ſecretly) the doctrine of Wickliffe; William Wallis a Black frier in Lin, who made a booke of Moralizations upon Ovids Metamorphoſis; William Taylor a Prieſt and a Maſter of Art in Oxford, a ſtedfaſt follower of Wickliffes doctrine, and burnt for the ſame at Smithfield in London the laſt yeere of this kings reigne. Bartholomew Florarius, called ſo of a Treatiſe which he wrote called Florarium, who writ alſo another Treatiſe of Abſtinence, wherein he reproveth the corrupt manners of the Clergie, and the profeſſion of the Friers Mendicants. Alſo Titus Livius de Forô Livienſis an Italian borne, but ſeeing he has reſiant here, and wrote the life of this King, it is not unfit to make mention of him in this place: alſo many others.

THE REIGNE OF KING HENRY THE SIXTH.

THere had beene a Race of Princes, of which for three generations together, it might be rightly sayd; Pulcherrima proles; Magnanimi Heroes nati melioribus Annis. For King Edward the Third had many Sons, not inferior in valour to the many Sons of King Priamus, not excepting his valiant Son Hector, having so equall a match for him, as Edward the blacke Prince, who wanted but an Homer, to have been an Achilles. Then John of Gaunt likewise had divers Sons, men as valorous as any that Age afforded. Then Henry the Fourth had foure Sons, of so heroicall disposition all, that you might know them all to be his Sons, only King Henry the Fifth to be his eldest. And now that in him the heroicall nature was come to the height, it degenerated againe in King Henry the Sixth, which must needs be attributed to the mothers side; who though in her selfe she were a Princesse of a noble spirit, yet being the issue of a crazie father, what marvell, if she proved the mother of a crazie issue! and yet even this issue of hers, a Prince no doubt, of excellent parts in their kinde, though not of parts kindly for a Prince; in a private man praise-worthy enough, but the sword of a King required a harder mettall than the soft temper of King Henry the sixth was made of: and in him we may see the fulfilling of the Text; Va genti cujus Rex est puer; Woe to that Nation whose King is a Childe; for he was not above eight moneths old, when he succeeded his father in the Kingdome; although that Text perhaps is not meant so much of a child in years, for which there may be helps by good Protectors; as of a childe in abilities of ruling, whereof, though possibly there may, yet probably there can be no sufficient supply, of which, in this King we have a pregnant example; for as long as he continued a childe in yeares, so long his Kingdomes were kept flourishing by the Providence of his carefull Uncles; but assoone as he left being a Childe in years, and yet continued a childe in ability of Ruling, then presently began all things In pejus ruere, & retro sublapsa referri, all things went to wracke both in France and England. And thus much was necessary to be sayd by way of a Preface to that great fall as it were of Nilus, in King Henry the Sixth.

Henry called of Windsor, because borne there, the only childe of King Henry the Fifth, as yet scarce nine moneths old, succeeded his Father, and was Proclaimed King of England on the last of August, in the yeare 1422; by reason of whose infancie, King Henry his Father had before by his Will appointed, and now the Lords by their consent confirmed, the Regency of France to John Duke of Bedford, the Government of England, to Humphry Duke of Glocester, the Guard of his Person to Thomas Duke of Exeter, and Henry Beauford Bishop of Winchester, and Lord Chan-

Chancellor, wherein it was wisely provided that one man should not rule all, lest it should prove a spurre to aspiring; and withall stay them from envying one another, when many were alike placed in the highest forme of authority: and indeed they all carried themselves so uprightly and carefully in their places, that it well appeared the trust reposed in them by the dying King, had made a strong impression of love and loyalty towards his Son.

The Duke of Bedford Regent of France, was to keepe that by the sword, which King Henry the Fifth by his sword had gotten, wherein he had many and great assistants, specially the two terrours of France, Thomas Montacute Earle of Salisbury, and John Lord Talbot; and amongst the French themselves, the Duke of Burgoigne, a friend no lesse powerfull, than firme unto him. The Dolphin also (now crowned king at Poytiers, and called Charles the seventh of France, his father being newly dead, within little more than a moneth after king Henry) had likewise great assistants, the Duke of Alanson, and many other Peers of France, and of the Scots many, and some perhaps of the English that tooke part with him; by meanes whereof, the game of Fortune was a long time played betweene them with great variety. The first act of the Duke of Bedfords Regency, was an Oration which he made to the French in Paris, which wrought this good effect; that king Henry is Proclaimed king of England and of France, and such French Lords as were present did their Homages, and tooke their oathes to be true unto him. The first act of hostility was performed by the new king of France, who sends the Lord Granvile to Pont Meulan, who surprized it, putting all the English Souldiers to the sword; but the Regent sending thither Thomas Montacute Earle of Salisbury, so strongly beleaguered it, that the Lord Granvile not only surrendred it, but swore allegiance (though he kept it not) to the king of England. From thence the Earle marched to Seyne, which hee tooke by assault, and put all the Souldiers (except the Captain Sir William Maryn) to the sword.

At this time the Regent, the Duke of Burgoigne, John Duke of Brittaine, and his brother in law the Earle of Richmond, (who revolted afterward to the new king of France, and was by him made Constable of France) met at Amyens; and there not only renewed the old League, but further enlarged it; to be offensive and defensive respectively: and to make the friendship the more firme, the Regent married Anne the Sister of the Duke of Burgoigne at Troys. In this meane time the Parisians taking advantage of the Regents absence, conspired to have let in the new king into Paris; but the day before the night appointed for his admission, the Regent with his power entred, apprehended the Conspirators, and put them to publicke execution. That done, he furnished all the Forts and places of strength with Englishmen, and sent Sir John Falstaffe, who tooke in Pacye, and Coursay, two strong Castles; whil'st himselfe with his forces tooke in Troynels, and Brey upon Seyne.

The Constable of France the meane while with the new kings forces, layd siege to Crevant in Burgoigne; but the Regent sent thither the Earle of Salisbury, who set upon the French, and after a long fight, putting them to flight, slew about 1800 knights and gentlemen of note, and three thousand common Souldiers, Scots, and French, tooke prisoners the Constable himselfe, the Earle of Ventadour, Sir Alexander Alerdyn, Sir Lewis Ferigny, and two and twenty hundred Gentlemen. Of the English part, were slaine Sir John Gray, Sir William Hall, Sir Gilbert Halsall, Richard ap Maddocke, and one and twenty hundred Souldiers. From thence the Earle led his forces to Montaguillon, and sate downe before it, which after five moneths Siege he took, whil'st the Duke of Suffolke took in the two strong Castles of Cowcye, and le Roche.

Whil'st these things are done in France; in England the Protectour Ransomed and inlarged the young king of Scots, James the first; (who by the space of eighteene yeares had been kept a Prisoner) which he did out of opinion, that he might withdraw the Scots out of France, taking Homage and fealty of him for the Crown of Scotland, in these words; I James Steward, King of Scots, shall be true and faithfull to you Lord Henry, King of England and France, the Superiour Lord of Scotland: and and to you I make my fidelitie for the ſayd Kingdome, which I hold and claime of you, and ſhall do you ſervice for the ſame, ſo God me helpe, and theſe holy Evangeliſts; and therewithall, with conſent of all the Nobility, the Protector gave him to Wife, Jane Daughter to the deceaſed Duke of Somerſet, and Coſen Germane to the King, with a large Dowry, and married them at St. Mary-Overys in Southwarke; yet all this curteſie could not keep him afterward from being unfaithfull, and unthankfull.

And now the Protector ſent over to the Regent ten thouſand wel furniſhed Souldiers, with which freſh ſuccour he wonne many Townes and places of ſtrength; which the French ſeeing, and finding themſelves too weak by plaine force to withſtand the Engliſh, they ſought by ſubtilty to compaſſe their ends; and firſt, they worke upon the inconſtancie of the Duke of Brittaine, and his brother Arthur, by King Henry the fifth created Earle of Tewry, whom by gifts and promiſes they ſuborned, perfidiouſly to deliver over into their poſſeſſion, the Caſtles of Crotoy, and Ternay; but the Engliſh before the French Gartiſons were ſetled, fell upon Crotoye and recovered it; and that done, the Regent beſieged Ternay, and by ſecret mining, and violent Batteries ſo ſhooke the Walls, that they agreed to yeild it up, if not relieved by a certaine time: whereupon the Duke of Alanſon, with ſixteene thouſand French came to the reſcue, but perceiving the Engliſh to be prepared to receive them, he wheeled about to Vernoyle, and ſwore to the Townſmen that hee had put the Regent to flight, and reſcued Ternay; which they believing, rendred up Vernoyle to him: but the Regent followed him thither, when by the encouragement of ſome freſh Companies of Scots come to his ſuccour, he came to a battell in the field, where the Engliſh, with the loſſe of two thouſand one hundred common Souldiers, and two of the Nobility, the Lord Dudley, and the Lord Charleton, got the honor of the day, and ſlew of their enemies, five Earles, two Viſcounts, twenty Barons, and above ſeven thouſand other of the French, beſides two thouſand ſeven hundred Scots lately arrived, and tooke Priſoners the Duke of Alanſon himſelfe, the Lord of Hernys, and divers other French, and Sir John Tournbull, and two hundred Gentlemen, beſides common Souldiers. This battell was fought the eight and twentieth day of Auguſt, in the yeare 1424, and thereupon Vernoyle was preſently redelivered. After this, the Earle of Salisbury with ten thouſand men, taketh in the ſtrong Towne of Maunts, the Towne of St. Suſan, the Fort St. Bernard, and others; from thence he went to Anjou, where he performed ſuch heroicke Acts, that his very name grew terrible in all France; as for inſtance, the new High-Conſtable perfidious Richmond, with forty thouſand men layd Siege to the good Town of St. James in Benyon, the Garriſon whereof conſiſted but of ſix hundred Engliſh, who being driven to ſome extremity, ſallied forth, crying Saint George, a Salisbury; which word of Salisbury ſo frighted the French, thinking hee had been come to reſcue them, that caſting away their weapons, they ran all away, ſaving ſome few that yielded themſelves priſoners, leaving all their Tents, fourteen Peeces of Ordnance, forty Barrels of Powder, three hundred Pipes of Wine, much Armour, and ſome treaſure behinde them. After which, other Caſtles, as that of Beamont, of Vicount, Tenney, Gilly, Oſce, Ruſey, Voſicke, and many more were taken in by Sir John Montgomery, and Sir John Falſtaffe; ſo as once againe the French are glad to betake themſelves to their old courſe of fraud; they compounded with a Gaſcoigne Captaine for delivery of Alanſon to them; whereof the Regent having notice, he ſent the Lord Willoughby, and Sir John Falſtaffe to prevent it, who encountering with Charles de Villiers, that with two hundred horſe, and three hundred foot, was come to the place appointed for entry, tooke and ſlew them all, except ſome few horſe, which ſaved themſelves by flying. After which, the Earle of Salisbury tooke in and demoliſhed above forty Caſtles and ſtrong Piles, for which there was publique thankſgiving to God in London.

Whil'ſt theſe things were done in France, an unkinde variance fell out betweene the Protector, and his brother the Biſhop of Winchester, Lord Chancellor: for appeaſing whereof, the Regent having ſubſtituted the Earle of Warwick Lieutenant Generall in his abſence, came into England, where in a Parliament he compounded all all differences between them: in honour whereof, king Henry kept a ſolemne feaſt; at which time the Regent dubbed the King knight, not yet above foure yeares old; and then the King preſently inveſted with that dignity many of his ſervants: and Edmund Mortimer the laſt Earle of March, at this time dying, his Inheritance deſcended to Richard Plantagenet ſonne and heire to Richard Earle of Cambridge beheaded at Southampton, who was now created Duke of York, & was afterward father to king Edward the fourth: and at this time alſo, John Mowbray ſonne and heire to Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, baniſhed before by king Richard the ſecond; was reſtored to the Title of Duke of Norfolk. And now, all things peaceably ſetled in England, the Regent, with the Biſhop of Winchester, returned into France; where, at the interceſſion of the Duke of Burgoigne, the Duke of Alanſon was ranſomed; for two hundred thouſand Crownes: and the Biſhop of Winchester returned to Callice, where he was inveſted with the dignity and Hat of a Cardinall, which his brother the Regent put upon his head.

About this time, the Duke of Glocester, Protector, tooke ſome blemiſh in his honour, by marying another mans wife, Jaqueline Counteſſe of Haynault, Holland and Zealand, who was maried before to John Duke of Brabant yet living; and had lived with him ten moneths as his lawfull wife, but at that time upon ſome diſcontent gone from him, intending to be divorced: at which injury offered to the Duke of Brabant, the Duke of Burgoigne, being his Coſin, tooke ſo great offence, that firſt by friendly letters he admoniſhed the Duke of Glocester of it, and that not prevailing, they grew to termes of challenge, and a Combat between them was appointed; but in the meane time, the Lady betrayed, was caried to the Duke of Burgoigne, who conveyed her to Gaunt; from whence, by friendſhip of a Burgonian knight, in mans apparell ſhe eſcaped into Holland, and there made a defenſive warre againſt her huſband the Duke of Brabant, and the Duke of Burgoigne. To her ayd, the Duke of Glocester ſent the Lord Fitzwater, with a Power of a thouſand men: but ſhe being diſcomfited by the Duke of Brabant, and the Pope alſo pronouncing the firſt mariage legall, the Duke of Glocester deſerted her, and then tooke for a ſecond wife Eleanor daughter of the Lord Cobham of Sterborough, his old miſtreſſe: and the Lady Jaqueline, after the death of John Duke of Brabant, maried a meane Gentleman, whom the Duke of Burgoigne impriſoned, and brought herſelfe to live in much trouble.

And now in France, the Conſtable with forty thouſand men beſieged the Town of S. James de Beuuron; and having made a breach fit for aſſault, whilſt his Captaines ſtood ſtreining of courteſie, which of them ſhould firſt enter, Sir Nicolas Burdet with all his forces ſallied forth, crying aloud, A Salisbury, a Suffolk; whoſe names ſtruck ſuch a terrour into the beſiegers, that they ſtood like men amazed, of whom ſixhundred were ſlaine, two hundred drowned in the ditches, fifty taken priſoners, with eighteen Standards, and the Conſtable was glad to quit the place, and give over the Siege.

At the ſame time alſo, the Earle of Warwick and the L. Scales, with ſeven thouſand beſieged Ponterſon many weekes together; but Proviſion waxing ſcant, the Lord Scales with three thouſand men went a forraging into the Enemies Country; and in his returne with plenty of proviſion, was encountred with ſix thouſand French, of whom he ſlew many hundreds, tooke above a thouſand priſoners, and then returned ſafe into the Campe.

About this time alſo, Sir John Falſtaffe beſieged the ſtrong Towne of Gravile, which after twelve dayes, offered to render it ſelfe by a day, if it were not relieved. The offer was taken, and Pledges delivered: but before the day came, they within the Towne had victualled and manned the place, and thereupon neglecting their Pledges, refuſed to render the Caſtle according to agreement: whereupon the Pledges were brought before the ſight of them within the Caſtle, and there openly put to death.

And now a conſpiracy of the Clergie and Magiſtrates in Maunts ſo prevailed, that the Marſhals of France with five hundred men, about midnight came to the Townwalls; walls; where the Guard of the Engliſh, by thoſe that ſeemed their friends, were ſuddenly maſſacred, and ſetting open the Gates, made way for the Enemy to enter: whereupon, the Alarum given, the Earle of Suffolk with the ſurviving Engliſh withdrew to the Caſtle, wherein they were ſharply aſſayled by the French, who yet had more minde to ranſack houſes, and to make good cheere: whereof the Lord Talbot having intelligence by Captaine Goſſe, whom he had ſent to diſcover the ſtate of the French, he ſecretly gave notice to the Earle of Suffolk, who thereupon ſallied forth of the Caſtle at a time when the Lord Talbot was ready with his Troopes, and on both ſides crying, St. George, a Talbot, they fell upon the careleſſe French, who loſt foure hundred of their beſt men, the reſt were all taken, the Town re-gained, and the Conſpiratours, thirty Citizens, twenty Prieſts, and fifteen Friers, condemned and put to execution.

Whilſt theſe things went on proſperouſly in France, a great diſaſter fell out in England; for the right Noble Thomas Beauford (ſonne of John of Gaunt, and Katherine Swinford) Duke of Exeter, and Guardian of the King, makes king Henry his heire, and at Eaſt-Greenwich in Kent ended his life; whoſe place was preſently ſupplyed by the Earle of Warwick, and the Earles place in France, by the Earle of Salisbury; who thereupon with five thouſand men came to Orleance, and beſieged the City, and won from the French the great fort. But here happened another great diſaſter: for from an high tower in this fort, the Beſiegers obſerved the paſſages of the Townſmen; when the Noble Earle of Salisbury, intending to informe himſelfe of the ſtate of the Towne, unfortunately looking out at a window of the fort, with Sir Thomas Gargrave; a great ſhot from the Town ſtriking the barres of the window, the ſplinters thereof were driven into his head and face; of which wounds, within eight dayes he died. This was now a ſecond weakning to the Engliſh party: but in his place the Earle of Suffolk ſucceeded; to whom the Regent ſendeth Sir John Falſtaffe with freſh ſupplies, whom the Lord de la Brets, nine thouſand ſtrong, endeavours to intercept: but Sir John reſolving to abide the charge, placeth his cariages behind, the horſe next, and the foot before, lining his bowes with bill-men, and pitching ſtakes behind the Archers, who having diſcharged their firſt volley, retired behind the ſtakes: on which the French, forgetting their former defeats by that courſe, ran and goared their horſes; by which their Vaward being diſordered, the Battaile made a ſtand: which Sir John perceiving, cryeth out, St. George! They flie! at which words they fled indeed, and loſt two thouſand five hundred of their men, with the Lords de la Brets, and William Steward; eleven hundred were taken Priſoners: with whom, and a rich booty, they came to the Campe before Orleance. Hereof the beſieged having notice, they offered to ſubmit themſelves to the Duke of Burgoigne, who was contented to receive them, ſo as the Regent would conſent: But the Regent conſented not; and therefore in the meane time, the beſieged made meanes to the Duke of Alanſon, who furniſhed the Towne with freſh Forces and Proviſion; which put ſuch ſpirits into the Citizens, that they made a ſally out, ſlew ſix hundred Engliſh, and adventured upon the Baſtile, where the Lord Talbot commanded, who repelled them with great ſlaughter of their men; but yet the next day the Earle of Suffolk gave over his ſiege, and diſperſed his Army into their Garriſons.

And now the wheele of Fortune began to turn to the French againſt the Engliſh, which once ſet a going, was not eaſie to be ſtayed. And firſt, the Duke of Alanſon tooke by aſſault the Towne of Jargeux, and in it the Earle of Suffolk and one of his brothers, and ſlew Sir Alexander Pole another of his brothers, and many other Priſoners in cold blood, by reaſon of a contention amongſt the French, to whom the Priſoners ſhould belong. Preſently upon this, another great blow was given the Engliſh: for the Lords Talbot, Scales, and Hungerford, going to fortifie the Town of S. Meum, were encountred by the ſaid Duke of Alanſon, and Arthur of Britaine, with three and twenty thouſand men: with whom the Engliſh Lords interchanged ſome blowes; but oppreſſed with multitude, were all three taken priſoners, all ſore woumded, twelve hundred of their company ſlaine, and the reſt hardly eſcaping to to Meum, where they fortified themſelves the beſt they could againſt future aſſaults.

Theſe were great blowes given to the Engliſh fortune in France; Salisbury ſlaine, and now Talbot taken priſoner: which though they made her a little to totter, yet there muſt be greater blowes given before ſhe will fall. And indeed, theſe diſaſters were ſeconded by the perfidous ſurrender of many Townes and ſtrong Holds to the French king; who now encouraged by theſe ſucceſſes, marcheth into Champaigne, where by compoſition he tooke Troyes the chiefe City of that Province; Chaltons rebelleth, and enforceth their Captaine to yield it up: by whoſe example the Citizens of Rhemes doe the like, where the French king is anew Proclaimed, and with accuſtomed ceremonies Anointed and Crowned; whereupon many Townes ſubmit themſelves to him, and revolt from the Engliſh. Upon this, the Duke of Bedford (to make the French know, that all the Engliſh ſtrength conſiſted not in onely Salisbury and Talbot) with ten thouſand Engliſh, beſides Normans, marched out of Paris, and ſent letters of defiance to the French king, affirming, that deceitfully and by unjuſt meanes he had ſtolne many Cities and places of importance belonging to the Crown of England; which he was come to juſtifie by battell, if he would appoint a time and place. To which the King of France making a ſlight anſwer, the Regent marcheth apace towards him, and as faſt the King of France marcheth away: The Regent followed him, but could not overtake him, till he came neere Senlys: there both the Armies encamped and embattelled, yet only ſome light ſkirmiſhes paſſed between them; and a night or two after, the French king fled with his Army to Bray: which the Duke thinking to be but a plot to draw him further off from Paris, of whoſe fidelity he had no great aſſurance, followed him no further, but returned thither. At which time, the Regents brother the Cardinall, having prepared forces to aſſiſt Pope Martin in Bohemia, the Regent borrowed them of him for a preſent expedition, and with them marched into Champaigne, where he found the French king encamped upon the Mount Pihall; whoſe number being twice as many as the Regents, yet by no provocations could he be drawn to battell, but ſecretly fled to Criſpis; whereupon the Regent alſo returned to Paris.

Whilſt theſe things are done in France, In England, upon St. Leonards day the 6. of November 1429, King Henry not yet eight yeers old, was with great ſolemnity Crowned at Weſtminſter: at whoſe Coronation were made ſix and thirty Knights of the Bathe, and after the ſolemnity, a feaſt; and if any man deſire to know ſo much Cookery, hee may read in Fabian, all the diſhes of meate that were ſerved at that feaſt.

About this time, in France, a ſtrange Impoſtor ariſeth; a maid called la Pucelle, taking upon her to be ſent from God, for the good of France, and to expell the Engliſh: and ſome good indeed ſhe did; for by her ſubtle working, the King was received into Champaigne, and many Townes were rendred to him; whil'ſt the Lord Longuevile tooke by ſurprize the Caſtle of Aumarle, and ſlew all the Engliſh that were in it. But all theſe were but petty acqueſts to the king of France: there is a knot of friendſhip between the Dukes of Bedford and Burgoigne, which muſt be broken; or he will never be able to compaſſe his deſignes. He therefore labours by all meanes poſſible to diſunite them; wherein he ſo little prevailed, that the Duke of Burgoigne acquaints the Regent with all the practiſes; who thereupon, with many thanks, exhorteth him to continue firme, of which he ſhould never have cauſe to repent him: And becauſe Normandy was a principall part of the Engliſh ſtrength in France, he goeth thither, and by many reaſons perſwades them, as their Anceſtors had alwayes been, to be faithfull to the Crown of England.

In this time of the Regents abſence from Paris, the King of France drew all his forces thither, uſing all meanes poſſible, by Eſcalado, Battery, and burning the gates, to enter the City; but was ſo withſtood by the vigilancy of the Citizens, that he was glad to ſound Retreat, leaving his ſlaine and maimed ſouldiers behind him, all but the Pucelle, who being hurt in the legge, and almoſt ſtifled with myre in the ditch, was by a ſervant of the Duke of Alanſon drawne up, and conveyed after the King to Berry, who by the way received the ſubmiſſion of the Inhabitants of Laigny.

Some other ſervices were performed on both ſides, by the Duke of Suffolk and Sir Thomas Kyriell, for the Engliſh; by the Baſtard of Orleance and Sir Stephen le Hyr, for the French; but of no great importance: till at laſt, the Pucelle (who a little before had cauſed an Engliſh Captaines head to be cut off, becauſe he would not humble himſelfe to her upon his knee) was by Sir John of Lutzemburgh taken, and preſented to the Duke of Burgoigne, who ſent her to the Regent, and he to the Biſhop of the Dioceſſe, who judicially proceeding againſt her as a Sorcereſſe, and deceiver of the King and his ſubjects, ſhe was (after many delayes of promiſe to diſcover ſecret practiſes, and laſtly of her feigning to bee with childe) publickly burnt at Roan.

And now, the Regent finding how much the Crowning of the French king had furthered his deſignes, he made account the like effect would follow the Crowning of King Henry in France: whereupon he is ſent for to come over; and comming to Paris, was, by his Uncle the Biſhop of Winchester and Cardinall of Enſebius, not yet above nine yeares oid, with all uſuall ceremonies Crowned King of France, receiving the oaths of Homage and Fealty of all the French Nobility that were preſent, and of all the Inhabitants of Paris, and of the places adjacent. Upon this, Pope Eugenius laboured a Reconcilement between the two Kings, but could effect nothing, but onely a Truce for ſix yeeres: which agreed upon, King Henry returns into England, and landeth at Dover, the eleventh of February. But the ſix-yeares-Truce was ſcarce openly Proclaimed, when the French had cunningly poſſeſſed themſelves of divers Caſtles and places of ſtrength, juſtifying their actions, affirming, That what was politickly obtained without blowes, was no infringement of the Truce: and afterwards they perfidiouſly conveyed two hundred men into the Caſtle of Roan, with intent to have ſurprized it; but being diſcovered, they were all taken, and either ranſomed, or put to execution. Upon this, the Regent (whoſe wife, the Siſter of the Duke of Burgoigne, being lately dead, and he maried againe to Jaqueline the Earle of S. Pauls daughter, with whom he went over into England) returned againe to Paris; to whom the Lord Talbot, having now paid his ranſome, commeth, bringing with him ſeven hundred tryed ſouldiers; and with them the Regent takes the field, where the French Army lay; but the French ſlunk away in the dark, as not daring to abide the hazard of a battell.

About this time, the Duke of Bourbon, taken at the battell of Agincourt, after eighteen yeares impriſonment, paying eighteen thouſand pounds for his Ranſome, the ſame day he was enlarged, dyed at London.

And now a very great effect was produced out of a very ſmall cauſe: There had been ſparks of unkindneſſe between the two great Dukes of Bedford and Burgoign, which brake out into a flame upon this occaſion: A time and place was appointed, where they ſhould meet to compound ſome differences that were between them; The place agreed upon, was St. Omers, a Town in Burgoigne: When the time came, they ſtood upon this nice point, Which of them ſhould firſt come to the place; as thinking that he which did ſo, ſhould thereby acknowledge himſelfe to be the meaner perſon. The Duke of Bedford thought he had no reaſon to doe it, ſeeing he was Regent of France, and therefore ſuperiour to any ſubjeſt in the Kingdome: And the Duke of Burgoigne thought he had no reaſon to doe it, ſeeing it was to be done in his own Dominions, where he was himſelfe the Soveraigne Lord. Upon this nice point they parted without meeting; and the unkindneſſe grew afterward to ſo great hatred, that the Duke of Burgoigne choſe rather to be friends with him that had murthered his father, than ever to have any more commerce with the Duke of Bedford. Thus was one great branch of aſſiſtance lopt off from the Engliſh, which had been a great meanes before to make it flouriſh: and it was not ſo much, that the aſſiſtance was taken from the Engliſh, as that it was added to the French; for after this, the Duke of Burgoigne brought more aſſiſtance to the new king of France, than ever he had done before to the King of England. By which we may ſee, when the Divine Providence hath a worke to effect, what ſlight occaſions it oftentimes takes to effect the worke.

Great

Great blowes had been given before in France, to the Engliſh fortune by the enemie, but now a blow was given to it by Deſtiny, which made the Enemyes blowes the more incurable; for now the wiſe, valiant, faithfull Regent of France, Duke of Bedford, Anjou, and Alanſon, Earle of Mayne, Harcourt, Drieux, Richmond, and Carlile, and Viſcount Beamont; upon the fourteenth of September 1435, ended his life at Paris, which was in a manner the ending the life of the Engliſh fortune in France: all former blowes had beene upon inferior members, but this was a blow upon the head, and therefore mortall, and indeed the Engliſh fortune in France, never after lifted up its head, but very weakely. He was buried in our Ladies Church at Roan, whereat the Nobility of Normandy much repined, who would have had their owne Territory honored with his Sepulchre: yet ſee the levity of theſe men, who a few years after, in the Reigne of Lewis the Son of Charles, would have had his Monument to have beene demoliſhed, as being diſhonorable, ſuch an Arch enemie to France, ſhould be interred in the Metropolitan Citie of that Province: But Lewis anſwered, God forbid, I ſhould give way to ſo diſhonorable an act, to diſquiet his dead bones, who living would have diſquieted us all, and it favours of too much baſeneſſe to inſult upon a dead Lyon.

But yet in theſe diſaſters, there might have beene ſome reparation by a good Succeſſor, had not Envy and Ambition bred diſturbance; the Duke of Somerſet deſired the Succeſſion, but the Duke of Yorke obtained it; which bred ſuch an envy in the Duke of Somerſet towards him, that he laboured nothing ſo much as to croſſe his deſignes, and was a means to hinder the Duke of Yorke going to his charge ſo long, that the Pariſians had time to thinke of freeing themſelves from the Engliſh ſervitude; and thereupon the Citie after it had remained ſeventeen yeares in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, yeilds to the Conſtable, and upon compoſition expels all the Engliſh; and which was worſe, many other Towns followed this example of Paris, for what Town would not willingly do as Paris did, the epitome as it were of all France? and which they ſtick not to call Le Monde de Paris, as though there were upon earth no other world but Paris. Even the Normans, who had alwaies been moſt firm to the Engliſh, yet had run the ſame courſe, if the Lord Talbot had not kept them in awe, with the ſlaughter of five thouſand of them that way inclined. And now after theſe great loſſes, we muſt be content to play ſmaller game, caſt at Caſtles and Forts, and ſome ſmall Towns, like the ſtrugling of dying men, doing acts of life, till there be no more life remaining; And this was now our caſe in France. The new Regent with eight thouſand Souldiers arrived at Harflew, and from thence marcheth to Roan, where he wonne the reputation of juſtice and uprightneſſe, notwithſtanding all the calumniations of the Duke of Somerſet: when the revolted Duke of Burgoigne pretending title to the Town of Callis, approacheth it with an Army of forty thouſand men, takes the poore Baſtile of Oye, and ſlaughters and hangs many of the defendants. The Picards beſieged the Caſtle of St. Marke, tooke it, and demoliſhed it; from thence they begirt Callis with a ſiege, but were repelled: Then the Duke of Burgoigne ſent the Lord Croy to beſiege the Caſtle of Guyſnes, but were repelled there alſo: In the meane time Pembroke the Herald brought a defiance to the Duke of Burgoigne from the Duke of Glocester the Protector, that he would give him battell if he would abide it; to whom the Duke of Burgoigne anſwered, he ſhould be ſure to finde him where he now was: Whereupon he calleth a Councell, and whilſt they are debating what is beſt to be done, the Callickens make a ſallye, take the Baſtile which they had builded, by force, and ſlew eight ſcore of the Burgoignons, which ſo terrified them, that they upbraid the Duke of Burgoigne, and make both him, and the Lord Croy to quit their quarters, and in ſuch haſte to be gone, that they left a great part of their beſt Ordnance, and all their Proviſion for the reliefe and helpe of the beſieged; and it ſeemes they had reaſon ſo to do, for the next day being the ſeven and twentieth of July, the Duke of Glocester landed at Callis, with five and twenty thouſand good fighting men, who finding the enemy recoiled, forraged all the Countrey thereabout, and for the ſpace of ſixe weekes harrowed all the parts of Flanders, Arthois, and Hainault; and then returning by St. Omers, Arde, and Guyſnes, arrived at Callis.

And

And now we muſt look a little home, for the D. of Yorke returning into, England findes the Caſtle of Rokeborough beſieged by the King of Scots, with thirty thouſand men; but he hearing of the Earle of Northumberlands approach, and the Dukes returne, incontinently fled. And now againe to France, where the Towne of Harfleu was ſold to the French, but the Duke of Somerſet, and the Lord Talbot beſetting it both by ſea and land; theugh the Earle of Ewe, and the Baſtard of Orleance and Bourbon, with foure thouſand men came to relieve it, yet upon compoſition, it was ſurrendred.

And here we may have leave to ſpeake of a private matter; for about this time the Dutcheſſe of Bedford married Sir Richard Woodvile, a gallant young Gentleman, but of ſmall meanes, which though it offended her friends, yet it ſeems offended not God, who made her mother of many children by him; and amongſt the reſt, of the Lady Elizabeth, afterwards married to King Edward the fourth. Alſo about this time James King of Scots, who before had beene eighteene years Priſoner in England, and afterward releaſed, with a wife of a noble houſe, a great Dowre, and many honorable Preſents, yet proved ungratefull, was murthered in his bed-chamber by night, whoſe murtherers being found out, were cruelly tortured. And now againe to France; when the Duke of Burgoigne could neither by force nor policie take Callice, he attempted a ridiculous practiſe, to cut a ditch that ſhould drown both the Town and Country; but after much labour and expence, his deſigne like a vapour vaniſhed into ayre. The Lord Talbot beſieged Taukerville, and after foure moneths ſiege, hath it rendred to him: In revenge whereof, the French King in his owne perſon layes ſiege to Monſtreau; which whil'ſt the Duke of Yorke was providing to reſcue, he was diſcharged of his office, done of purpoſe by his enemies, to lay a blot upon him: A lamentable thing in a State, when private envy ſhall be ſuffered to undermine the publique ſafety; and by this meanes Sir Thomas Gerard had the more opportunity to ſell the Towne, for which, if he were a gainer in money, he was yet a loſer in reputation, and hated both of French and Engliſh, in much diſcontent dyed. Arthur Conſtable of France, and John Duke of Alanſon beſieged the Towne of Auranches, but were with diſhonor repelled by the Lord Talbot: After this, Le Hyre ſent Letters to them, that he had a promiſe from divers Burgers of Roan to let them in at any time appointed, againſt which time they came to Ryze, within foure leagues of Roan; but the Lord Talbot having notice hereof, marched covertly to Roan, and from thence before day to Ryze, where he ſurprizeth the French, takes the Lord Fountaines, Sir Allan Geron, and many others, and with a rich booty returneth to Roan. The ſixt day of November, in the ſixteenth year of the Kings Reign, the Earle of Warwicke having oftentimes been aboord, and ſtill beaten back by tempeſt, landed at Harfleu with a thouſand freſh Souldiers, and from thence came to Roan; but in the meane time the Duke of Burgoigne ſeeing no new Regent yet come, beſiegeth the Towne of Crotoy, to the reliefe whereof, the new Regent now come, ſent the Lord Talbot with five thouſand men, whoſe approach the Duke not enduring, retired to Abbeuyle, leaving onely foure hundred, with whom hee had manned the Baſtyle by him there erected, which was ſoone gained, and all the ſouldiers either taken or ſlaine. And here the valiant Talbot ſent word to the Duke, that if he would ſave his Countrey from vaſtation, he ſhould come to a battell; but the Duke not liking the match, conveighs himſelfe to Amyens: Twenty dayes together did the Lord Talbot with fire and ſword paſſe through Piccardie, and Arthois without oppoſition, and then returned: Sir Thomas Kyriell ſeized upon the Dukes Carriages and Ordnance; and having left in Crotoy victuall enough for ſix hundred men for a whole yeare, he brought the reſt to the Earle of Warwicke. And now Henry Earle of Mortaigne, Son to Edmund Duke of Somerſet, arrived with two hundred Archers, and three hundred Spears, took the Caſtle of St. Anyon, wherein were three hundred Scots and French; the Scots he ſlew all, and hanged the French, becauſe they had ſworn fealty to England, and broke it; he tooke likewiſe the Caſtle of Algarche, and by means of an ambuſh, taketh the Lord Camerois, comming to the reſcue thereof. On the other ſide, the Towns of Neux in Brye, and Suſan were ſold and and delivered to the French by the treacherous Burgers. In June, the Earle of Huntington with two thouſand Archers, and foure thouſand Speares was ſent into Gaſcoigne, whither the Earle of Danois was lately come to buy Towns and Caſtles, but the Earle of Huntington upon his comming thither, changed all the Captains and Officers, whereby he prevented all ſuch bargains; and ſo farre had bribery ſpread it ſelfe at this time, that even in Normandy, the Engliſh Captaines had but ſmall confidence in the Natives, and not much in ſome of their owne Nation; whereupon Sir Richard Woodvile, Sir William Chamberlaine, and ſir William Peto were ſent thither to ſtop the current of that corruption.

At this time, the Councell of France procured a reconcilement between the king and the Dolphin, who had beene long in jealouſies and diſſention; which if it had not beene done, the kingdome had beene torne with Factions, and never beene able to ſubſiſt.

And now in a great froſt and ſnow, the Engliſh under the conduct of Sir John Clifford, having covered their Armour with white ſhirts, and their heads with white Almain ſkulls, came to Ponthois by night, and undiſcovered paſt the ditches, ſcaled the walls, ſlew the Guards, and tooke the Towne; but this good lucke was accompanied with a bad of more importance, for preſently upon it, the Earle of Warwicke dyed in the Caſtle of Roan, and conveyed into England, was buried in his Caſtle of Warwicke. To reduce Ponthois, the French King in perſon layeth ſiege unto it; when Richard Duke of Yorke being the ſecond time made Regent, having with him the Earle of Oxford, and the Earle of Ewe, levyes a power to raiſe the Siege; and arriving there, ſends word to the King, that the next morning he would give him battell; but the King liked not his bidding, but leaving his Ordnance, at midnight ſtole away to Poyſſy; thither alſo the Regent followes him, but with no provocations could draw him to fight.

About this time, a treaty for Peace between the two Kings is appointed to be held at Callis, by the mediation of the Dutcheſſe of Burgoigne, a Portugall Lady; Commiſſioners meet of both ſides, but nothing concluded, only the Duke of Orleance who had been priſoner to the Engliſh five and twenty years, is by the Dutcheſſe mediation, ranſomed with three hundred thouſand Crowns of the Duke of Burgoignes money. The Lord Willoughby beſiegeth Deepe, which the Dolphin with ſixteene thouſand men commeth to raiſe; and there young Talbot is taken priſoner, with Sir John Peto, and ſir John Repley, but are ſhortly after redeemed by exchange. And now another weakning happened to the Engliſh party, the Earle of St. Paul forſakes them, and is reconciled to the King of France. The Engliſh lay ſiege to Tartua, for the raiſing whereof, the French King marcheth thither with 60000 men, relieveth the Towne, and then marcheth to Saveryne, which he taketh in, and in it, Sir John Rampſton; after which, he tooke in Arques, but then the Engliſh cutting off all convoyes of victualls from comming to him, he is forced to returne; after whoſe departure, the Engliſh recover all that he had taken; and to boot, take his Lieutenant priſoner, ſlaying or hanging all his Souldiers. In this meane while the Lord Talbot taketh in Conquet, and driveth the Baſtard of Orleance from the ſiege of Goglierde; but the French in the Caſtle of Cornhill detained many Engliſh priſoners; for redeeming of whom, Sir Francis the Aragoniſt uſed this ſtratagem; he apparelled halfe a dozen luſty fellowes like Peaſants, carrying baskets with corne and victualls, and ſends them to the Caſtle, while he with his company lyes in ambuſh, in a Valley neere the Caſtle; the ſix unſuſpected are admitted, and comming to the Captaines chamber, ſeize upon him, and withall give the ſigne to the ambuſh, who comming readily on, entred the Caſtle, put the Souldiers to the ſword, ſet the priſoners at liberty, burnt downe the Caſtle, and with the booty and Captaine of the Caſtle, returned to Roan.

Whil'ſt theſe alternations paſſed in France, a more unnaturall paſſed in England, the Uncle riſeth againſt the Nephew, the Nephew againſt the Uncle; The Duke of Glocester Articles againſt the Cardinall, charging him with affecting Prehemi-nence, to the derogation of the Kings Prerogative, and contempt of his Lawes; which which Articles are delivered to the King, and by him to his Councell, who being moſt of the Clergie, durſt not meddle in them, for offending the Cardinall. On the other ſide, the Cardinall finding nothing whereof directly to accuſe the Duke of Glocester himſelfe, accuſeth his other ſelfe, the Lady Eleanor Cobham the Dukes wife, of Treaſon, for attempting by ſorcery and witchcraft the death of the King, and advancement of her huſband to the Crown: for which, though acquited of the Treaſon, ſhe is adjudged to open Penance, namely, to goe with a wax taper in her hand, hoodleſſe (ſave a kerchiffe) through London, divers dayes together, and after to remaine in perpetuall impriſonment in the Iſle of Man. The crime objected againſt her, was procuring Thomas Southwell, John Hunne Prieſts, Roger Bollingbroke a ſuppoſed Necromancer, and Margery Jourdan called the Witch of Eye in Suffolke, to deviſe a picture of waxe in proportion of the king, in ſuch ſort by ſorcery, that as the picture conſumed, ſo the kings body ſhould conſume: for which they were all condemned; the witch was burnt in Smithfield; Bollingbrooke was hanged, conſtantly affirming upon his death, that neither the Dutcheſſe, nor any other from her, did ever require more of him, than onely to know by his art, how long the king ſhould live: John Hunne had his pardon; and Southwell dyed the night before he ſhould have been executed.

About this time, the Counteſſe of Cominges being dead, the king of France and the Earle of Arminiack are Competitors for the Inheritance: The Earle takes poſſeſſion; but fearing the King of France his greatneſſe, makes offer of his daughter in mariage to the King of England, with a large portion in money, and beſides, to deliver full poſſeſſion of all ſuch Townes and Caſtles as were by him or his Anceſtors detained in Aquitaine, and had been formerly by the Progenitors of the King of England, conquered. The Ambaſſadors for this buſineſſe, were by King Henry graciouſly heard, and honorably returned: after whom were ſent Sir Edward Hall, Sir Robert Roſe and others, to conclude all things, and the young Lady is by Proxy affianced to king Henry. But the king of France not liking the proceeding of the match, ſendeth the Dolphin with a puiſſant Army, who tooke the Earle, with his youngeſt ſonne, and both his daughters, and gained the Counties of Arminiack, Lowverne, Rouergne, Moulleſſenois, with the Cities of Severae and Cadeack, chaſing the Baſtard of Arminiack out of the Country; by meanes whereof, the mariage was then deferred, and left in ſuſpenſe.

In this diſtraction of Chriſtendome, many Princes, the kings of Spaine, Denmark, and Hungary, became Mediators for a Peace between the two kings of France and England: Ambaſſadors of both ſides are ſent, many meetings were had, many motions made, but in concluſion, onely a Truce for eighteen moneths is agreed upon. In the meane time, the Earle of Suffolk one of the Commiſſioners for the Peace, takes upon him beyond his Commiſſion, and without acquainting his fellowes, to treat of a mariage between the king of England, and a kinſwoman of the king of France, Neece to the French Queene, daughter to Reyner Duke of Anjou, ſtiling himſelfe king of Sicilie and Naples: In which buſineſſe he was ſo intentive, that it brought an aſperſion upon him of being bribed: but howſoever, an Enterview betwixt the two kings is appointed, without any warrant of king Henries part, to be between Chartres and Roan. The Commiſſioners returne; the Earle of Suffolk ſets forth the beauty of the propoſed Bride, and the great benefits that would redound to the kingdome by this match. The king was eaſily induced to credit the relation; but divers of the kings Councell, eſpecially the Duke of Glocester, oppoſed it; partly for the meanneſſe of the match, her father being onely a Titular Prince, and withall but poore, unable to give any portion at all; and partly, for the wrong which ſhould hereby be offered to the Duke of Arminiacks daughter, to whom the king had been in ſolemne manner publickly affianced. But Reaſons could not prevaile againſt favour: the Earle of Suffolks affirmation muſt not be undervalued. And hereupon, a new creation of Lords firſt made; (John Beaufort Earle of Somerſet, made Duke of Somerſet; John Lord Talbot made Earle of Shrewsbury; John Holland Earle of Huntington, made Duke of Exeter; Humfry Earle of Stafford, made Duke of Buckingham; Henry Henry Beauchampe Earle of Warwick, made Duke of Warwick; Edmund Beaufo. Earle of Dorſet, made Marqueſſe Dorſet; and William de la Poole Earle of Suffolke, made Marqueſſe of Suffolke:) this new Marqueſſe honorably accompanied, is ſent into France to fetch the Lady Margaret the propoſed Bride; who ſhortly after is married at Southwick in Hampſhire, and crowned Queen of England at Weſtminſter, on the 30 day of May 1444, in the three and twentieth yeare of king Henries Reigne. And now in ſtead of benefits by this mariage, there preſently followed great inconveniences: for firſt, in exchange of her perſon, the Dutchy of Anjou, the City of Mauns, with the whole County of Mayne, (the beſt props of the Dutchy of Normandy) are agreed to be ſurrendred into the hands of the French: and then the Duke of Arminiack, to revenge the injury offred to his daughter, is a meanes to expell the Engliſh out of all Aquitaine.

At this time, the Duke of Somerſets ſpleen againſt the Duke of Yorke, not onely is revived, but is growne ſtronger; for the Duke of Yorke, who was now after the death of the Earle of Warwick, made the ſecond time Regent of France, is ſo undermined by him, through aſſiſtance of the new Marqueſſe of Suffolke, who bore now all the ſway with the King and Queen; that not onely he ſupplanted him in his place, but planted himſelfe in it, to the great heart-burning of the Duke of York and his friends; but he wiſely diſſembled his anger, and for the preſent paſſed it over. And now is no man in grace, but the new Marqueſſe of Suffolk; all favours from the King and Queene muſt paſſe by him, and the extent of his power over-reacheth all the Councell: He gets of the King the wardſhip of the body and lands of the Counteſſe of Warwick, and of the Lady Margaret, ſole daughter and heire of John Duke of Somerſet, afterward mother to king Henry the ſeventh. And now, the kings weakneſſe in judgement growes every day more apparent then other, whil'ſt governed by no counſell, but of his Queen; and ſhe by no counſell but her owne will, and the new Marqueſſe of Suffolke. King Henry is himſelf the leaſt part of the king, and ſerves but to countenance the devices of others, whereof he little underſtands the drift; and which, proving ill, the blame muſt be his; if well, the benefit and honour, others. For by inſtigation of the Queene, he ſuffers the Duke of Glocester, for his care of the Common-wealth called the good Duke, to be excluded not onely from Command, but from the Counſell-Table; and permits Informers, ſet on by the Marqueſſe of Suffolke, the Duke of Buckingham, the Cardinall Biſhop of Winchester, and the Archbiſhop of Yorke, to come againſt him; who lay to his charge, that he had cauſed divers perſons to be executed contrary to Law: wherein though he juſtified himſelfe, yet no juſtification would be heard; but to avoyd tumultuary part-taking, it was concluded, he ſhould be privately convicted and condemned: and to this end, a Parliament by the procurement of his enemies, unwitting to the king, is called at Bury; to which the Duke of Glocester reſorting, is, on the ſecond day of the Seſſion, by the Lord Beamont L. High Conſtable (aberted by the Duke of Buckingham) arreſted and put in Ward, all his followers ſequeſtred from him, whereof two and thirty are committed to ſeverall priſons; and the next day after his impriſonment, he is found in his bed, murthered; yet ſhewed the ſame day, as though he had dyed of an Impoſthume; though all that ſaw his body, ſaw plainly that he dyed of a violent and unnaturall cauſe: ſome ſay, ſtrangled; ſome, that a hot ſpit was put up at his fundament; and ſome, that he was ſtifled between two feather-beds. His corps the ſame day was conveyed to St. Albans, and there buried. Five of his meniall ſervants, Sir Roger Chamberlaine knight, Middleton, Herbert, Arthis, Eſquires, and John Needham Gentleman, were condemned to be hanged, drawne, and quartered; and hanged they were at Tiburne, let downe quick, ſtript naked, marked with a knife to be quartered; but then the Marqueſſe of Suffolk, to make a ſhew as though he had no hand in the buſineſſe, brought their Pardon, and delivered it at the place of Execution, and ſo their lives were ſaved. This no unmemorable thing which Sir Thomas Moore writes of the pregnancy of this Duke of Glocester: It happened, the King comming one time in Progreſſe to St. Albans, a Begger borne blinde, as he ſaid, at the Shrine of St. Alban obtained his ſight: which miracle being being noised in the Towne, the Duke of Gloucester being there with the King, desired to see him, whom being brought unto him, he asked if he were borne blinde, who told him, yes truly; and can you now see (saith the Earle) yes I thanke God, and S*t. Albon*, saith the begger; then tell me saith the Earl, what colour is my gown? the begger readily told him the colour; and what colour saith the Earle is such a mans gowne? the begger likewise told him presently, and so of diversothers. Then saith the Earle, go you counterfeit knave, if you had been borne blinde, and could never see till now, how come you so suddenly to know this difference of colours? and thereupon, instead of an Almes, caused him to be set in the Stocks. But in the death of this Duke, the Queene who had a speciall hand in it, was either not so intelligent, or not so provident as she might havebeene; for as long as he had lived, his Primogeniture would have kept backe the Duke of Yorkes claime to the Crown, being but discended from the fifth Sonne of Edward the third, where this Duke Humphrey was discended from the fourth. And here were the first seeds sowne betweene the two houses of Lancaster, whose badge was the Red-rose, and Yorke, whose badge was the White-rose. And now upon the death of this Duke of Gloucester, the Duke of York began amongst his familiars privily to whisper his right and title to the Crown; but so politickly carried his intent, that all things were provided to further his project, before his purpose was any whit discovered.

And in this time the rich Cardinall and Bishop of Winchester dyes, who lying on his death bed, as Doctor John Baker his privie Counsellor and his Chaplain writeth, used such like words; why should I dye, saith he, having so much riches? If the whole Realme would save my life, I am able either by policy to get it, or by money to buy it: Fie, will not death be hired? will money do nothing? and other words to such purpose. But he being dead, there succeeded in his Bishopricke a more deserving Prelate, William Wanflete, called so of the place in Lincolneshire where he was borne, though his name was Patterne, of the worshipfull family whereof hee was discended. And now to the end the Marqueese of Suffolke might not come behinde them in dignity, whom he went before in power, he is about this time made Duke of Suffolke.

In France about this time a victory was gotten, which proved no better than an overthrow; Before the Truce was expired, Sir Francis Surgeus an Aragonois, a man thought worthy to be admitted into the honorable Order of the Garter; taking advantage of the security of the French Garrisons, suddenly surprizeth a Frontier Towne called Fougiers, belonging to the Duke of Brittaine; the Duke advertiseth the French King thereof, who by his Ambassadors complaines both to the King of England, and to the Duke of Somerset then Regent in France: Answer was made, it was the fault of the Aragonois, who did it without warrant from either the King, or the Councell; nevertheless Commissioners are appointed to meet at Louviers, to treate of some course for satisfaction; but in the time of the Treaty, newes is brought to the Regent, that the French by a stratagem of a Carter that with a load of Hey comming over the Draw-bridge, caused the Axletree to breake; and whilst the Porter was ready to helpe the Carter, the Porters braines were beaten out, the Towne of Ardes surprized, and the Lord Fawconbridge Captaine thereof was taken prisoner. Restitution being required by the English, answer is made them in their owne language, it was done without warrant from either the French King, or any of his Councell, so it was but one for another; and from thence forward the Truce is broken of both sides, and all things grow worse and worse. The French King by composition taketh Louviers, Gerbury, and Vernoyle, whil'st the Regent stands demurring what were best to be done; If he command, not obeyed, If he counsell, not followed, as it happens to men once blemished in Reputation, to have an ill construction made of all their actions; by which means the French go on without resistance, get Constance, Guisard, Gatiard, St. Loe, Festampe, and many other pieces in Normandy; upon notice whereof, Maukesson in Guyen surrenders to the Earle of Foix, and by their example the City of Roan it selfe takes composition to surrender, where the E. of Shrewsbury, and the Lord Butler, heire to the E. of Ormond, were kept pledges pledges till it was performed. It is true, succours were provided to be sent out of England, under the conduct of the Duke of Yorke; but a Rebellion happening in Ireland, which was thought of more importance to be speedily suppressed, diverted him and his forces thither, where not only he suppressed the Rebels, but so wonne the hearts of that people, that it was no small furtherance to his proceedings afterward. A fresh supply indeed of fifteene hundred men, under the command of sir Thomas Kyriell is sent over; but what could a handfull of men do against such multitudes as opposed them? for he marching with the rest of the Army towards Baugeux, was encountred by the Earle of Clermont, with seven thousand French and Scots, whom yet at first he made to recoyle, till the Constable of France with foure hundred men at Armes, and eight hundred Archers came to the rescue, and then fresh men comming upon them that were already tyred, the English lost three thousand and above seven hundred, besides divers that were taken prisoners. After this losse of men, followes presently a losse of Towns; Harfleet is assaulted, and though valiantly for a while defended by Sir Robert Curson, yet surrendred at last upon composition: Then the French King with an Army royall besiegeth Caen in Normandy, a Towne belonging to the Duke of Yorke, defended in his absence by his Lievtenant Sir David Hall; but the Duke of Somerset being Regent, in commiseration of his Dutchesse being in the Towne, notwithstanding the stout opposition of Sir David Hall, surrenders it upon composition to the French; whereof Sir David giving notice to the Duke of Yorke, it bred such a deadly quarrell between the two Dukes, that they were never after throughly reconciled. And thus is all Normandy recovered from the English, after it had been in their possession a hundred years; and finally, all France is reduced to the obedience of Charles the French King.

And now hereafter there will be little to do abroad, but there will be the more to do at home, and more bloud will be shed in England by civill dissentions, then was shed before in all the Wars of France. This losse of Normandy and other parts in France, is imputed much to the Duke of Somerset, at that time Regent; but the Duke of Suffolke must beare a great part of the blame, partly for having beene the cause of the surrender of Anjou and Mayne, and the chiefe procurer of the Duke of Glocesters death, and partly for having wilfully wasted the Kings treasure, and been a meanes to remove the ablest men from the Councell Boord; of all which aspersions the Queen takes notice, and knowing how far they trenched upon the Dukes destruction, and her own; She so wrought, that the Parliament assembled at the Black-Friers, is adjourned to Leicester, and from thence to Westminster; but though all meanes were used to stop these accusations against the Duke, yet the lower House would not be taken off, but exhibited their Bill of Grievances against him: That he had traiterously incited the Bastard of Orleance, the Lord Presigny and others to levy warre against the King, to the end that thereby the King might be destroyed; and his Son John, who had married Margaret Daughter and sole Heire of John Duke of Somerset, whose title to the Crowne the sayd Duke had often declared, in case king Henry should dye without issue, might come to be King; That through his treachery the French King had gotten possession of the Dutchie of Normandy, and had taken prisoners the valiant Earle of Shrewsbury, the Lord Fawconbridge and others: but to these accusations, he peremptorily affirmed himselfe not guilty, so much as in thought. Then were further allegations made against him, that being with others sent Ambassador into France, he had transcended his Commission, and without privity of his fellow Commissioners, had presumed to promise the surrender of Anjou, and the delivery of the County of Maunts to Duke Rayner, which accordingly was performed, to the great dishonour of the King, and detriment of the Crowne; That he had traiterously acquainted the French King with all the affaires of State, and passages of secrecie, by which the enemy, was throughly instructed in all the designes of the King and Councell: That he had received rewards from the French king, to divert and disappoint all succours sent to the kings friends in France. Upon these and divers other accusations brought against him, to bleare the peoples eyes, he is committed to the Tower; but the Parliament was no sooner dissolved, but

but he was set at liberty; which so incensed the common people, that they made an Insurrection; and under the leading of a desperate fellow, styling himselfe Blewbeard, they committed many outrages; but by the diligence of the Gentlemen of the Country, the Captain was apprehended, and the Rebellion ceased. And now another Parliament is called, where great care is taken in chusing of Burgesses, presuming thereby to stop any further proceeding against the Duke of Suffolke; but his personall appearance at the Parliament gave such a generall distaste to the House, though he came in the company of the king and Queene, that they forbore not to begin the Assembly, with Petitioning the king, for punishment to be inflicted upon such as had plotted or consented to the resignation of Anjou, and Mayne, whereof by name they instanced in the Duke of Suffolke, John Bishop of Salisbury, Sir James Fynes, Lord Say and others. This Petition was seconded by the Lords of the upper House: whereupon, to give some satisfaction to the Houses, the Lord Say Lord Treasurer, is sequestred from his place, the Dukes Officers are all discarded, and himselfe formally banished for five yeares; but with an intent after the multitude had put out of minde their hatred against him, to have revoked him: but God did otherwise dispose of him; for when he was shipped in Suffolke, with intent to have passed over into France; he was met by an Englishman of War, taken and carried to Dover sands, and there had his head chopt off, on the side of the long-boate, which together with the body was left there on the sands, as a pledge of some satisfaction for the death of Duke Humphry.

Whilst these things are done in England, the Duke of Yorke in Ireland began to make his way to the Crowne; as descended from Philippe daughter and heire of George Duke of Clarence, elder brother to John of Gaunt, great Grandfather to the present king Henry the sixth. And for a beginning, it is privately whispered, that king Henry was of a weake capacity, and easily abused; the Queene of a malignant spirit, and bloudily ambitious; the Privie Councell, if wise enough, yet not honest enough, regarding more their private profit, then the publique good, that through their delinquencies all France was lost, and that God would not blesse the usurped possession of king Henry: with these suggestions the Kentishmen seemed to be taken; which being observed by an instrument of the Duke of Yorke, called Mortimer, he takes his time, and tells the multitude, that if they will be ruled by him, he will put them in a course to worke a generall Reformation, and free them for ever from those insupportable burthens of taxations, so often, upon every slight occasion obtruded upon them. These promises of Reformation and freedome from impositions, so wrought with the people, that they drew to a head; and make Mortimer, otherwise Jacke Cade their leader, who stiling himselfe Captaine Mend-all, marcheth with no great number, but those well ordered, to Black-heath, where betweene Eltham and Greenwich, he lay by the space of a moneth, exercising his men, and sending for whom he pleased, and for what he pleased: Then he presents to the Parliament the complaints of the Commons: That the Queenes favorites share amongst them the Revenews of the Crowne, whereby the king is enforced for the supportation of his present estate, to taxe and burthen the Commons, to their utter undoing, and to the generall impoverishment of the kingdome: That the Commons have their commodities daily taken from them, for the purveyance of the kings Houshold, for which they are not payd, nor any assurance for payment thereof given, but onely Court promises: That upon the apprehension of any man for treason or felony, the kings meniall servants, before conviction, begge the goods and lands of the impeached, whereupon indirect and unlawfull proceedings are used by subornation of witnesses, embracery of jurors, and great mens letters to the Judges; whereby Justice is perverted, and the innocent after attainted, if not executed, yet at least imprisoned to their undoing: That the Commons have no legall proceedings in their Law-suits, so as the rightfull owners of Inheritance, dare not (if opposed by any Courtier) maintaine their Titles, or attempt the recovery of their interest, how in passing their Accompts, by new extorted Fees, and by being enforced to procure a late a late invented Writ of Quorum nomina for allowance of the Barons of the Cinque-Ports, and their suing out their Quietus at their own charge, without allowance from the King: That the Bayliffs of Sheriffes under colour of the green waxe out of the Exchequer, doe levy greater summes than are by the Record justifiable, yet maintained: That they cannot have the freedome of electing knights and Burgesses for the Parliament; but by letters from the Favorites of the Court, to their friends and Retainers; the Knights and Burgesses are commonly chosen: That they are too much troubled with too often comming to attend the generall Sessions, being enforced in many places to make five dayes journey to the place where they are kept. These and some other, were the complaints of the Commons; but the Captaine for his owne particular (after protestation made to live and dye in the quarrell of the King) required, that his Majesty would be pleased to receive again into favor, the truly noble Prince the Duke of Yorke, and with him the Right Honorable the Dukes of Exeter, Buckingham, and Norfolke, and the ancient Noblemen of the Realm; by the undue practises of Suffolke, and his complices, commanded from his presence, and that all their opposites might be banished the Court; and put from their Offices: That there might be a generall amotion of corrupt Officers, an abolition of the Greene waxe, and other instruments of Extortion out of the Exchequer; a qualification of the rigour of proceeding in the Kings-Bench; an inhibition of unequall purveyance of provision for the Kings houshold, and a present execution of the Promoters, Slegge, Cromer, Isell, and East, whom he pretended by wrongfull information to have abused the king, and wronged his Subjects. These Petitions are sent from the Lower-House to the Upper, and from thence committed to the Lords of the kings Privy Councell; who having examined the particulars, explode them as frivolous, and the Authors thereof to be presumptuous Rebels. Whereupon the king is solicited by his Privy Councell, to prosecute them by force rather than intreaty; which advise is seconded by the Queene as conceiving they secretly aymed at her: and hereupon the king drawes his Forces to Greenwich, and appointeth divers Lords to assaile the Rebels; but the Lords could get no followers to fight against them who sought only for reformation of abuses; and for punishment of such Traitors as the Lord Say the kings Chamberlane was: whereupon the Lord Say is presently committed to the Tower, the king and Queene retire to London, from whence within two dayes, the king being now fifteen thousand strong, marcheth in Person towards Captain Mend-all, who politickly withdraweth his forces into Sevenoake wood; upon notice wherof, the king retireth again to London, but the Queen longing for dispatch, sends the two *Stafford*s, Sir Humphrey, and William, with many hot-spurs of the Court to follow the Rebels, who were soone cooled; for they found Captain Mend-all in good order, ready to receive them, and in the first encounter, slew Sir Humphry, and afterwards his brother, and put all the rest to flight; the k. Forces being at Blackheath, could neither by threats nor intreaties be gotten to go to the rescue, but rather wished the Queen and her favorites in the Staffords case, or that the Duke of Yorke were in England, to ayd his Cosen Mortimer, (now first acknowledged to be of his kindred) and many of them stole away to the Rebels, whose number from Sussex and Surrey daily encreased, whom yet their Captain restraineth from forraging or taking away any thing by force, and so returneth againe to Blackheath, where the kings Army lay the night before, but was now fallen down to Greenwich. And now the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Buckingham are sent to expostulate with the Rebels about their demands; to whom Jacke Cade gave very good language, but directly affirming no cessation from Arms, unlesse the king in Person would heare the grievances of the Subject, and passe his Princely word for reformation of their wrongs. This resolution of his made known to the king, who was not sure of his own Souldiers faith, made him march presently away to Killingworth Castle in Warwickeshire, where he fortified himselfe, as expecting a siege, having left the Lord Scales onely to Guard the Tower. Jacke Cade taking advantage of the kings departure, commeth to Southwarke, where hee quarters his men, streightly charging them to commit no outrage, nor do wrong to any; which was duly obſerved. The next morning he marcheth to London-bridge, where he cauſed his men to cut the ropes of the Drawbridge, no reſiſtance being made againſt him; and ſo in good order marcheth up by London-ſtone, upon which he ſtrooke his ſword, ſaying, Now is Mortimer Lord of London. The Major of London, Sir Thomas Chalton, ſtanding upon the threſhold of his doore, bade him take heed he attempted nothing againſt the quiet of the City: To whom he made anſwer, Let the world take notice of our honeſt intention by our actions. And indeed this orderly cariage of himſelfe and his company, wonne him a good opinion amongſt the common ſort of people: And now aſſuming to himſelfe the place of Chiefe, he ſendeth out his letters of ſafe-conduct, to ſuch whom he pleaſed to make uſe of: amongſt other, he wrote this letter to Thomas Cock Draper of London.

By this our writing enſealed; we grant, that Thomas Cock of London Draper, ſhall ſafely come into our preſence, and avoyd from us againe at his pleaſure, with all other perſons comming in his company. Subſcribed thus:

His Majeſties loyall Subject, John Mortimer, Captaine Mend-all.

Upon Cocks admiſſion, he had private conference with three other that came with him; to whom, at their departure, he gave theſe inſtructions in writing: You ſhall charge all Lombards and Merchant-ſtrangers, Genoua's, Venetians, Florentines, and others, this day to draw themſelves together, and to ordaine for us the Captain, twelve Harneſſe compleat of the beſt faſhion, foure and twenty Brigandines, twelve Battell-axes, twelve Glaves, ſixe horſes with ſaddle and bridle compleatly furniſhed, and a thouſand marks in ready money: and if they ſhall faile herein, we ſhall ſtrike off the heads of as many as we can get. But they failed not, but ſent him what he had demanded: who thereupon the next morning, being the third of July, returnes to London; and preſently ſends to the Lord Scales, to bring his Priſoner the Lord Say to the Guildhall, whither he had called the Lord Major with his brethren; before whom he cauſed the Lord Say to be arraigned, who craving to be tryed by his Peeres, was forthwith taken from his keeper, caried to the Standard in Cheap, and there had his head chopt off, which being pitched upon a Pike, was borne before him to Mile-end, whither he went to have conference with the Rebels of Eſſex; and by the way meeting with Sir James Cromer High-ſheriffe of Kent, who had lately maried the Lord Sayes daughter, he cauſed his head alſo to be ſtrucken off, and caried likewiſe before him in deriſion. The next morning he came againe to London; where, after publick execution done upon ſome of his fellowes, and particularly upon a petty Captaine of his, named Parke, that had done things contrary to his Proclamation; upon a diſpleaſure taken againſt Alderman Malpas, he ſent and ſeized upon all his wares and goods, and fined Alderman Horne in five hundred marks: whereupon, the Citizens finding him to grow every day more inſolent than other, they ſend to the Lord Scales for aſſiſtance, who ſendeth Matthew Gough an old ſouldier to them, with ſome forces and furnitures out of the Tower; who preſently make a ſtand at the Bridge, where Cade notwithſtanding forceth his paſſage, and then began to ſet fire on houſes where many aged and impotent people miſerably periſhed; Captaine Gough Alderman, Sutton and Robert Hayſon, valiantly fighting, were ſlaine: yet upon a freſh ſupply, the Londoners recovered the bridge againe, and drove the Rebels beyond the Stoope in South-warke; at which time, both ſides being weary, agreed of a Truce, till the next day. After the Retreat, Cade finding he had loſt many of his beſt men, was driven for ſupply, to ſet at liberty all the Priſoners in Southwarke, aſwell Felons as Debtors: when now his company entring into conſideration of their danger, and of the deſperate ſervices their Captaine had brought them to, began to diſcover by their countenances their willingneſſe to leave this courſe: whereof the Archbiſhop of Canterbury having notice, he with the Biſhop of Winchester came from the Tower by water to Southwarke, and there ſhewed the Kings Generall-Pardon under the Great Seal of England; which was ſo welcome to the Rebells, that without taking leave of their Captaine, they withdrew themſelves that night to their ſeverall habitations. Jack Cade with ſome few followers bent his journey journey to Quinborough Caſtle, where being denyed entrance, he diſguiſed himſelfe, and privily fled: but upon Proclamation, with promiſe of a thouſand markes to any that ſhould bring him dead or alive; he was afterward, by one Alexander Eden Gentleman, attached; and making reſiſtance, in a Garden at Hothfield in Suſſex, was there ſlaine; his body was brought to London, beheaded and quartered, his head ſet upon London bridge, his quarters diſperſed in divers places in Kent. Upon the news whereof, the King ſends Commiſſioners into Kent, to enquire of the abettours of this Rebellion: whither he followeth himſelfe in perſon, and though five hundred were found guilty, yet eight onely were executed. Though London were the cheife ſtage of this Rebelion, yet other Countries were not free; eſpecially Wiltſhire, for the Rebels there, upon the nine and twentieth day of June, drew William Ayſhe Biſhop of Salisbury, from the High Altar, where he was ſaying Maſſe in Edington Church, to the top of the hill; and there in his Prieſtly roabes, moſt inhumanely murthered him.

This Inſurrection was not unknown to the King of France, who taking advantage thereof, ſeizeth upon all places which the Engliſh had in France, leaving them nothing but only Callice, and the Caſtles of Hames and Guiſnes; and this was the iſſue of the Duke of Somerſets Regency in France: whereupon comming into England, at a Parliament holden at Weſtminſter, the ſixth of November, in the nine and twentieth yeer of the Kings raigne, he was put under Arreſt; upon notice whereof, the Commons of London deſpoiled his houſe at Blackfriers, and ceaſed not, till Proclamation was made to inhibite them: for diſobeying whereof, there was one man beheaded, at the Standard in Cheape.

At this time, the Duke of Yorke, under pretence of comming to the Parliament, comes out of Ireland; and at London had private conference with John Duke of Norfolk, Richard Earle of Saliſbury, the Earle of Devonſhire and other his aſſured friends; where it was reſolved, to keep the cheife purpoſe, (the claime to the Crown) ſecret; and onely to make ſhew, that his endeavours were but to remove ill Counſellours from the King; of whom they inſtanced in the Duke of Somerſet as cheife; and hereof, the Duke ſent divers letters to the King, complaining of the wrongs the Duke of Somerſet had done him, but withall making Proteſtation of his own loyalty. To which the King maketh anſwer, that he would take his complaint into conſideration, but ſomewhat blames him for the death of the Biſhop of Cheſter, by his means ſuſpected to be ſlaughtered, and for dangerous ſpeeches uttered by his ſervants, tending to Rebellion: concluding, that notwithſtanding any thing ſaid or done to the contrary, he took and eſteemed him a faithfull ſubject, and a loving kinſman. But the Duke of York, not herewith ſatisfied, departeth into Wales, and there leviith men, making his colour for the good of the Common wealth: and the removing of bad Counſellours. The King advertiſed hereof, preſently raiſeth an Army; and with the Duke of Somerſet (now enlarged) marcheth towards Wales: while the Duke of Yorke, having notice which way the King came, by another way marcheth toward London; but being told, the Londoners would not admit him entrance; he paſſed the river Thames at Knightbridge, marched into Kent, and encamped at Burnt-heath. The King in his purſuite, came to Blacke-heathe, and there pitched his Tents, from whence he ſent the Biſhops of Winchester and Ely, the Lord Rivers, and Richard Andrews Keeper of the Privy Seale, to know the cauſe of this commotion, and to make offer of reconcilement, if the Dukes Demands were not unreaſonable. The Duke made Anſwer, that nothing was intended againſt the Kings perſon, his Crown or Dignity: All that was ſought, was to remove ill Counſellours from about the King, but eſpecially Edmund Duke of Somerſet; whom if the King would be pleaſed to commit to ward, till his legall tryall might be had in Parliament, he would then not onely diſmiſſe his army, but come unto his preſence as a loyall ſubject. Hereupon the Duke of Somerſet is committed to priſon: The Duke of Yorke diſmiſſeth his army, and commeth in perſon to the King: in whoſe preſence, (contrary to his expectation) he found the Duke of Somerſet, which ſo moved him, that he could not hold, but preſently charged him with Treason: which the Duke of Somerset, not onely denieth, but recriminateth the Duke of Yorke, to have conspired the kings death, and the usurpation of the Crown: whereupon, the king removeth to London, the Duke of Yorke as a prisoner ryding before him, and the Duke of Somerset at liberty, which was not a little mervailed at by many. And now the king calleth a Councell at Westminster, where the two Dukes are earnest in accusing each other; but while the Counsell are debating of the matter, there comes a flash of lightning out of France, which diverted them; for the Earl of Kendall, and the L' Espar, came Embassadours from Burdeaux, offering their obedience to the Crown of England, if they might but be assured to be defended by it: but withall, at the same time there came a report, that Edward Earle of March, sonne and heire to the Duke of Yorke, with a great power was marching towards London. Here was matter for a double consultation: and for this latter, it was resolved on, that the Duke of York, should in the presence of the king and his Nobility, at the high Altar in Pauls, take his Oath of submission and Allegiance to king Henry: which he accordingly did, and then had liberty to depart to his Castle of Wigmore. And for the former, the Earle of Shrewsbury with about three thousand men was sent into Gascoigne, who ariving in the Isle of Medre, passed forth with his power, and took Fronsack and other pieces, but having received in the night instructions from Burdeaux of certaine conspiratours, he makes all the speed he can thither; and was entred the Town before the French had notice of his comming: so that many of them were slaine by the Lord L' Espar in their beds. Shortly after there arrived, the Earle of Shrewsbury's sonne, Sir John Talbot, with the bastard of Somerset, and two and twenty hundred men, by whose means Burdeaux is well manned with English: in which time the Earle was not idle, but went from place to place, to receive the offered submission of all places where he came: and having taken Chatillon, he strongly fortified it, whereupon the French king raiseth an army, and besiegeth Chatillon, to the rescue whereof, the Earle maketh all possible speed with eight hundred horse, appointing the Earle of Kendall, and the Lord L' Espar to follow with the foot: In his way he surprized a Tower the French had taken, and put all within it to the sword; and meeting five hundred French men, that had been forraging; many of them he slew, and the rest he chased to their Campe. Upon whose approach, the French left the siege, and retyred to a place which they had formerly fortified; whither the Earle followeth them, and resolutely chargeth them so home, that he got the entry of the Campe: where being shot through the thigh with an Harquebuse, and his horse slaine under him; his sonne desirous to relieve his father, lost his own life, and therein was accompanied with his bastard brother Henry Talbot, Sir Edward Hall, and thirty other Gentlemen of name. The Lord Molins with threescore other were taken prisoners, the rest fled to Burdeaux, but in the way a thousand of them were slaine. And thus on the last day of July, in the yeer 1453. at Chatillon, the most valourous Earle of Shrewsbury, the first of that name, after foure and twenty yeers service beyond the seas, ended his life, and was buried at Roan in Normandie; with this Inscription upon his Tombe: Here lyeth the right Noble knight John Talbot Earle of Shrewsbury, Wesford, Waterford, and Valence, Lord Talbot of Goodrich and Orchenfield, Lord Strange of Blackmere, Lord Verdon of Alton, Lord Cromwell of Wink field, Lord Lovetoft of Worsoppe, Lord Furnivall of Sheffield, knight of the Noble Orders of St. George, St. Michael, and the golden fleece, great Marshall to King Henry the fifth, of his Realme of France. The Earle of Kendall, the Lords Montferat, Rosaine and Dangledas entred the Castle of Chatillon, and made it good against the French the space of ten dayes; but then having no hope of succour, they delivered it, upon composition to have liberty to depart to Burdeaux: and now the Gascoignes were as ready to open their gates to the French, as they were before to the English, by means whereof, in short time, the French recovered againe all Gascoigne except Burdeaux, and that also at length, upon condition that both garrisons and inhabitants with all their substance, might safely depart for England or Callice, and that the Lords L' Espar and Durant, with thirty others, upon paine of death should never after be found in the Territories of France.

At this time upon St. Bartholomews day, an ancient custome being, that the Major of London, and the Sheriffs should be present in giving prizes to the best wrestlers; it happened that at the wrestling place neere Moore-fields, the Prior of S. Johns was there to see the sports, when a servant of his, not brooking the disgrace to be foyled before his Master, against the custome of the place would have wrestled againe, which the Major denyed, whereupon the Prior fetcht Bowmen from Clarkenwell, to resist the Major, and some slaughter was committed, the Majors Cap was shot through with an Arrow, he nevertheless would have had the sport goe on; but no wrestlers came, yet the Major Sr. John Norman told his brethren, he would stay awhile, to make try all of the Citizens respect towards him: which he had no sooner said, but the Citizens with Banners displayed came in great numbers to him, and fetcht him home in great triumph. Upon the neck of this, began the quarrell in Holborne, between the Gentlemen of the Inns of Chancery and some Citizens, in appeasing whereof, the Queens Attorney and three more were slaine.

And now the Duke of Yorke, by all means laboureth to stirre up the hatred of the Commons against the Duke of Somerset, repeating often, what dishonour England sustained by Somersets giving up the strong Towns of Normandy, and how he abuseth the Kings and Queens favour to his own gaine, and the Commons grievance, then he addresseth himselfe to those of the Nobility that could not well brook his too much commanding over the Kings and Queens affection: amongst others he fasteneth upon the two Nevils, both Richards, the father and the sonne, the one Earle of Salisbury, the other of Warwick; with whom he deales so effectually, that an indissoluble knot of friendship is knit betwixt them; by whose assistance, (the King lying dangerously sick at Claringdon) the Duke of Somerset is arrested in the Queens great Chamber, and sent to the Tower; and in a Parliament now convoked, appeached of Treason, and many heynous crymes objected against him: whereupon, the King though weake is brought to London, of purpose to dissolve the Parliament, and that dissolved, the Duke of Somerset is presently set at liberty againe, and not only so, but is made Captaine of Callice and Guisnes, the onely remainder the English had in France. Upon this, the Duke of Yorke and his party, with a great power march towards London: against whom, the King attended with the Duke of Somerset, the Duke of Buckingham and his sonne, both named Humfry, Henry Earle of Northumberland, James Earle of Wiltshire, Jasper Earle of Pembrooke, and two thousand men, marcheth forwards; at S. Albans both armies meet: the Duke in the morning sends a letter to the King, protesting his fidelity and synderity; onely he desires, the Duke of Somerset may be delivered, to stand or fall by the Judgement of his Peers; and this he would have, or dye in the pursuite. The King for answer, Commands him to disband, and submit to his mercy; and not expect, that he will deliver any in his Army, who have shewed their loves in standing to him. Herewith the Duke acquaints his friends, who hereupon fall every one to his quarter: The Earle of Warwick fell upon the Lord Cliffords quarter, where the Duke of Somerset, hasting to the rescue, was slaine, and with him the Earle of Northumberland, Humfry Earle of Stafford, the Lord Clifford, and about five thousand others, besides many that were hurt; the King himselfe shot in the neck with an arrow; the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Scales, in the faces; the Earle of Dorset so hurt, that he was faine to be carryed home in a Cart: The Kings army had been increased after his comming forth, to eight thousand; but now they are all dispersed or slaine, and the King unguarded, is left in a poore thatcht house; whither, to be freed from the danger of arrows, he had withdrawn himselfe. The Duke of Yorke having notice where the King was, goes with Warwick and Salisbury, who all three upon their knees present themselves before him, making humble petition to him, for pardon of what was past: and now, seeing the common Enemy was slaine, they had what they aymed at. To whom the King throughly affrighted, said: Let there be no more killing then, and I will doe what you will have me. This first battell of S. Albans was fought upon the three & twentieth day of May, in the three & thirtieth year of King Henries raigne. The bodies of the Duke of Somerset, the Earle of Northumberland and and the Lord Clifford, were buried in the Chappell there: And now the Duke of York, in the kings name, commands a surceasse from further hostility: and in all reverent manner conveyeth the king to London; where they keep the feast of Pentecost together; at which time, a Parliament is summoned to begin at Westminster, the ninth day of July; and therein it is enacted, that the Duke of Gloucester should be declared publikely a loyall Subject, and that none should misreport or dispute the actions of the Duke of York, or of any in his company: and moreover, the Duke of York is made Protector of the kings Person, and of the Realme, the Earle of Salisbury is made Lord Chancellor, and the Earle of Warwicke Captain of Callis, wherein they all carried themselves with unblameable demeanour.

In this meane time, the Queene not well pleased with these proceedings, seekes all means to incite the Lords of her party, and they as much seeke to incite her to make opposition; she puts the Duke of Buckingham in minde that these Traitours had slaine his hopefull Son at S. Albans; she tells the now Duke of Somerset, that by them his deare Father lost his life: And they againe put the Queen in minde of the unsufferable indignity done to her, in making her Husband only a king in name, setting a Tutor over him, as though he were a childe, whil'st the Duke of York and his complices manage all: Upon which incitation, all the enemies of the Yorkshire Faction are assembled by the Queene at Greenwich; where it is debated of some course to be taken for restoring the king to his former liberty and Government; at length it is concluded, that the duke of York should be commanded to give over his place of Protectorship, for that the king was of yeares and discretion sufficient to Rule of himselfe without a Guardian, and the Earle of Salisbury to surrender his place of being Lord Chancellor, for that the great Seal was never delivered him, seeing that which was now used, was made since the kings restraint, and therefore not sufficient; to which conclusion of theirs, the king easie to be wrought upon, yields his consent, and thereupon they are both discharged from their Offices, and summoned to appeare at the Councell Table at Greenwich; but the Lords were wiser than to put themselves into their hands, and therefore make answer, that none had power to displace them, nor to command their appearance in any place, but in Parliament, and so they continued about London, placing and displacing whom they pleased, and by their triumvirat authority, tooke John Holland Earle of Exeter out of Sanctuary, and sent him prisoner to Pomfret Castle. These proceedings gave occasion to the licentious multitude to raise commotions, and the Prentices of London upon a very slight occasion, fall upon out-landish Merchants, rifle and robbe their houses; and the Major assembling a company of substantiall Citizens to suppresse them, the Ring-leader of the disorder flyes to Sanctuary; Commissioners are sent to enquire and punish the offence, but when the Major and Commissioners were set, tydings came that the Commons were up in Arms; whereupon the Commissioners left the busines to be proceeded in by the Major, who so discreetly ordered the matter, that many of the offenders were punished, some by death, others by fine, and all things were quieted and appeased.

At this time the French having little to do against the English in France, would needs be doing something against them in England: They set out two Fleets, one under the conduct of William Lord Pomyers, the other of Sir Peter Bressy; the Lord fell upon Fulsey in the West-Country, the knight upon Sandwich in Kent, where some hurt they did, but not of importance to countervaile their Voyage.

And now the Queen finding the little respect the Londoners bore to her party or the kings, perswades the king, as for his health and recreation, to make a Progresse into Warwickeshire, which he did, by the way hunting and hawking, and the Queen making show of minding nothing but pastimes; and this she did, with a purpose she easier to entrap the three Lords, of York, Salisbury, and Warwicke, to whom shee writ most loving letters, earnestly inviting them to be at Coventry by an houre appointed; which they, not doubting any fraud, intended to have done, but hearing by the way of the mischiefe plotted against them, they caused their Retinue to goe on-ward the way to the Court, as though themselves were comming after; but they provided provided otherwise for their safety, the duke of York with a Groome and a Page getting him to Wigmore Castle, the Earle of Salisbury to his Castle of Middleham in the North, and the Earle of Warwicke to the Sea side, and so to Callis; but before they parted, they agreed upon an Alphaber, by which they might have entercourse of letters, yet their intentions kept undiscovered.

The king unwitting of this mischiefe intended against the duke of York and his friends, returneth to London, where he calleth a Councell; and therein of his owne accord desireth that some course might be invented for a perfect reconcilement of all parties; promising upon his salvation (an asseveration not usuall with him) so to entertaine the duke of York and his friends, that all discontents should be removed, and a perfect amity on all parts established: to which end messengers are dispatched to the duke of York, and all other of his party, commanding them upon urgent affairs of the Realm, and upon Royall promise of safe conduct, to repaire to his Court at London, at a day appointed. The duke of York accordingly came, and with 400 men well apparelled, lodged at his house called Baynards Castle; The Earle of Salisbury with 500 men, lodged likewise at his house called the Herbour; The duke of Exeter (lately released) and the Duke of Somerset with 800 men, were lodged within Temple-Barre; The Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Egremont, and the Lord Clifford, with 1500 men, were lodged in Holborne; The Earle of Warwicke with 600 in red jackets with ragged staves embroydered behinde and before, were lodged at the Gray Friers in London. Upon the seventeenth of March the King and the Queen came to London, and were lodged at the Bishops Pallace; the Major having five hundred well appointed men in readinesse, rode with a competent number all day long round the Citie, for preservation of the Kings Peace: The Lords lodging within the Citie, held their Councell at Black-Friers; the other, at the Chapter house at Westminster: Between both, the Reverend Archbishop of Canterbury, the Son of Henry Bourchier Earle of Essex, with some other of the most able Prelates interceded so, that by their mediation it was at last concluded, that all wrongs and misdemeanours on every side should be forgotten and forgiven, that each side should be friends to the other, and both be obedient to the commands of the king. Besides this in generall, there were some particular Articles to be performed by the Duke of York, the Earles of Salisbury, and Warwicke, which afterward was ratified under the great Seale of England, the 24 day of March, in the 36 yeare of the Reigne of king Henry the Sixth. Upon the publication whereof, a solemne Procession was made in Pauls Church, at which the king was present with his Crown on his head; before him, hand in hand went the Duke of Somerset, and the Earle of Salisbury, the Duke of Exeter, and the Earle of Warwicke, and so one of the one, and another of the other part, till they were all Marshalled; behinde the king came the Queen, the Duke of York leading her by the hand, who in going made shew of favorable countenance towards him: Divine Service ended, they returne to the Court, in all outward appearance truly reconciled; but all was dissembled, as will presently appeare; for presently upon this, an affray fell out betweene a servant of the Earle of Warwicke, and a Courtier, who in the encounter is dangerously wounded, the Earles man flyeth; the kings servants seeing their fellow hurt, and the offender escaped, watch the Earles comming from the Councell Table, and assaile him; many are hurt, but the Earle getteth a Wherry, and so escapes to London; the Queen incontinently commands the Earle to be committed to the Tower, but hee foreseeing the danger, posts to Yorkshire, where he acquaints the Duke of York, and his father the Earle of Salisbury of all the occurrence, with the palpable discovery of the Queens canker'd disposition, advising them to stand upon their Guard, and to provide against the approaching storme. Himselfe speeds to Callis, and being then Lord Admirall, takes with him all the kings ships that were in readinesse, and scouring the Seas, meets with five great Carricks, three of Genoua, and two of Spaine; and after two dayes fight, takes two of them, with which hee returned to Callis where he unloaded their fraight, and found it worth ten thousand pounds in Staple commodities, besides the Ships and Prisoners.

In the meane time, the Earle of Salisbury with about five thousand men marcheth through Lanceſhire, to paſſe that way to the king, with a purpoſe to acquaint him with the affront offered to his Son, and the inveterate malice diſcovered in the Queen againſt him: The Queene with the Dukes of Buckingham and Somerſet, hearing of his comming, gave order to the Lord Audley to uſe means to apprehend him; who thereupon levyeth ten thouſand men in Cheſhire and Shropſhire, and with them about a mile from Dreyton, in a plaine called Blorebeath he attended the Earle, there being but a ſmall brooke of no great depth between them. Early in the morning the Earle made a ſeeming Retreat, which the Lord Talbot obſerving, preſently cauſeth his Troops to paſſe the River, but before they could be reduced againe into order, the Earle with his whole ſtrength falls upon them, and with the ſlaughter of the Lord Audley, and moſt of them that had paſſed the River, he diſcomfited the reſt, and ſlew about 24. hundred of them; Sir John and ſir Thomas Nevill knights the Earls Sons were ſorely wounded, who with Sir Thomas Harrington travelling into the North Country, were apprehended and ſent as Priſoners towards Cheſter, but upon a meſſage from the Marchmen were preſently releaſed.

And now the Duke of Yorke thinking fit no longer to conceale his deſigne, makes preparation to take the Field, the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick do the like; and amongſt others of approved valour, whom the Earle of Warwicke had brought from Callis with him, were two principall noted men, John Blunt, and Andrew Trollope. Likewiſe the King, with the Dukes of Somerſet, and Exeter, drawes his Forces to Worceſter, from whence Richard Beauchamp Biſhop of Salisbury, is ſent to offer the Yorkiſts a full and generall Pardon, if they would lay down Arms, and become loyall Subjects. Whereunto they anſwered, that there was no truſt to the Kings Pardons, as long as the Queen had a Predominant power; but if they might have aſſurance of ſafety, they would expreſſe their loyalty, and humbly render themſelves at his ſervice. Hereupon the King advanceth neerer, and approaching the Lords Armie, cauſed Proclamation to be made, that whoſoever would abandon the Duke of Yorke, ſhould be received to mercy, and have Pardon. Upon this, the night following, Andrew Trolloppe, with all the Callicians ſubmit to the King, and by him are all the counſells of the Duke of Yorke diſcovered; which ſo much diſcouraged him, that he with his young Son, the Earle of Rutland, fled firſt into Wales, and then into Ireland: The Earles of March, Salisbury, and Warwicke got into Devonſhire, where by the means of John Dynham Eſquire (the ſame man that afterward by king Henry the Seventh was made Lord Treaſurer of England) they were ſhipt from Exmouth, to Gernſey, and ſo to Callis. All the common ſouldiers the king Pardons, onely makes exemplary puniſhment of ſome few Captains, ſends the Dutcheſſe of Yorke, and her two younger children, to the Dutcheſſe of Buckingham her Siſter to be ſafely kept; and then having ſpoiled the Town and Caſtle of Ludlow, he diſmiſſt his Armie. And now a Parliament is called at Coventry, wherein the Duke of Yorke, Edward Earle of March his Son, Richard Earle of Salisbury, Richard Earle of Warwicke, John Lord Clifford, and many other the confederates of the Duke of York, are convict of Treaſon, and all their lands and goods ſeized on to the kings uſe. Henry D. of Somerſet by the Queens means is made Captain of Callis, whither comming to take poſſeſſion, he was, by reaſon of Ordnance ſhot at him from Rice-banke forced to Retire; which the Queen hearing, was ſo incenſed, that in great paſſion ſhe gave order to make ready all the kings Ships lying at Sandwich, to give aſſiſtance to the Duke of Somerſet: but the forementioned John Dynham, out of love to the Earle of March, boorded thoſe ſhips in the harbour, and tooke the Lord Rivers deſigned Admirall for that ſervice, and carried both him and the Ships to Callice, from whence the Earle ſayled to Ireland, to the Duke of Yorke, who having conferred and concluded what courſe to take, he returned to Callice, the new Admirall the Duke of Exeter not daring to ſtop his courſe. Sir Simon Montford was appointed to guard the Cinque Ports, having divers ſhips under his command to barre the Earle of Warwickes entrance; but the Earle by his eſpyalls having perfect intelligence of all paſſages, fell ſodainly upon Sir Simon before his ſhips were ready, tooke him priſoner, ranſackt ranſackt the Town of Sandwich, & carried his priſoner and the ſhips to Callice: By the way he underſtood how much the kentiſhmen deſired his return and longed for his comming; whereupon he came the ſecond time to Sandwich, to whom preſently reſorted the Lord Cobham and very many Gentlemen of the Country: ſo as now his armywas five and twenty thouſand ſtrong; with which he marched towards London, againſt whom the Lord Scales was appointed to goe, and with ſome convenient troopes to aſſure London: but the Major directly refuſed to admit him; whereupon he reſorted to the Tower, from whence afterwards he did the Londoners no ſmall diſpleaſure. The Earle of Warwick having notice, that his father the Earle of Salisbury was upon march to meet him: paſſeth over his men; and without impeachment, joyned with him and his friends neer Exeter.

The King with the Dukes of Somerſet and Buckingham with a great Army marcheth towards them, and neer to the Town of Northampton both Armies meet: The Earle of March with the advice of the Earle of Warwick prepares for the fight: The Queen (the King more intentive to devotion then fighting) did the like, the fight continued about two houres, wherein were ſlaine of both ſides above ten thouſand men; but upon the fall of Humfry Duke of Buckingham, the Kings ſide was diſcomfited, and John Talbot Earle of Shrewſbury, Thomas L. Egremont, John L. Beaumont and ſome other of account were ſlaine: The Queen with the Duke of Somerſet, taking with them the young Prince, fled to the Biſhoprick of Durham: The King himſelfe was taken, and as a priſoner conveyed to London: where the Tower is yeelded to the Earle of Warwick; The Lord Scales in diſguiſed apparell endeavouring to eſcape, is taken by the water-men, and by them beheaded, and his Corpes careleſſly left upon the ſands. Thomas Thorpe one of the Barons of the Exchequer, in the habit of a Monke, his Crown ſhorne, purpoſing to flie to the Queen, is taken and committed priſoner to the Tower, and after by the Commons beheaded at Highgate. The Duke of Yorke being advertiſed of this good ſucceſſe, leaveth Ireland and poſts to London, where in the kings name he ſummoneth a Parliament, which being aſſembled, he in the preſence of the Lords in the upper Houſe, placeth himſelfe in the Imperiall Seate, and with great boldneſſe layes open his rightfull claime to the Crowne of England, as being the Sonne and heire of Anne daughter and heire of Roger Mortimer Earle of March, Sonne and heire of Philip the ſole daughter and heire of Lyonel Duke of Clarence, the third ſonne of Edward the third, and elder brother of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, Father of the uſurper Henry the Fourth, Grandfather to Henry the Fifth, who was Father to him that at this time untruly ſtileth himſelfe king Henry the ſixth. And after relating the many miſeries that had befallen the Realme ſince the time of this Uſurpation, he concluded, that he would not expect nor deſire poſſeſſion of the Crown, except his diſcent were undiſputable, and his title without exception. This being a buſineſſe of importance, required deliberation: but in concluſion, the Duke having before hand prepared the Lords Spirituall, and few of the Nobility being preſent, that were not of his part, the Burgeſſes were eaſily perſwaded: and it was generally reſolved, and enacted accordingly, that king Henry during his life, ſhould reteine the name and honour of a king; that the Duke of Yorke ſhould be Proclaimed heire apparent to the Crown, and Protectour of the kings Perſon, his lands and dominions; and that if at any time, any of king Henries friends, allies or favourites, in his behalfe ſhould attempt the diſanulling of this Act, that then the Duke ſhould have preſent poſſeſſion of the Crown. It is not unworthy the noting, that while the Earle of March was declaring his title in the upper houſe, it happened in the nether houſe, that a Crowne which hung in the middle of the houſe, to garniſh a branch to ſet lights upon, without touch or winde, fell ſuddenly down: as likewiſe at the ſame time, fell down the Crown which ſtood on the top of Dover Caſtle: a ſigne as ſome thought, that the Crowne of the Realme ſhould be changed. Aſſoone as the Parliament was diſſolved; the Duke diſpatcheth letters into Scotland, requiring in the kings name, the Queen, the Dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, and all other of the Nobility, that remained in that kingdome, with all ſpeed to repaire to his preſence in London: but they had other worke in hand; hand; for having goten together of Englifh and Scots, to the number of eighteen thouſand, they came marching into England, againſt whom went the Duke of Yorke, with his younger ſonne the Earle of Rutland, and the Earle of Salisbury, (leaving the king in the cuſtody of the Duke of Norfolke and the Earle of Warwick,) and approaching neer the Queens Army, he was certified by his ſcouts, that the Enemie farre exceeded his power, both in number and in all warlike preparation, (he not having in his Army above five thouſand men) and thereupon the Earle of Salisbury adviſed him to retyre, and to attend the comming of the Earle of March, who was gone into Wales to raiſe the March men; but the pride of his former victory made him deafe to all Counſell of declining the battell; and ſo haſtened on by his deſtiny, from Sandall Caſtle he marched on to Wakefield greene; where the Lord Clifford on the one ſide, and the Earle of Wiltſhire on the other were placed in ambuſcado; The Duke of Yorke ſuppoſing that the Duke of Somerſet who led the battell, had no more forces then what were with him, undauntedly marcheth towards him: but being entred within their danger, the ambuſhes on both ſides brake out upon him, and ſlew him, with three thouſand of his men, the reſt fled; the Earle of Salisbury is taken priſoner; and harmleſſe Rutland, not above twelve yeers old, who came thither but to ſee faſhions, is made a ſacrifice for his Fathers tranſgreſſion, who kneeling upon his knees, with tears begging life, is unmercifully ſtabbed to the heart by the Lord Clifford, in part of revenge (as he ſwore) of his Fathers death; and the Queen moſt unwomanly in cold blood, cauſed the Earle of Salisbury, and as many as were taken priſoners, to be beheaded at Pomfret Caſtle, and to have their heads placed on poles about the walls of Yorke. Thus dyed Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke, who had taken to wife Cicely daughter of Ralph Nevyll, the firſt Earle of Weſtmerland, by whom he had iſſue, eight ſonnes and foure daughters; his eldeſt ſonne Henry dyed young, his ſecond ſon Edward was afterward king of England; his third Edmund Earle of Rutland, was ſlaine with his father; John, Thomas and William died young, his ſeventh ſonne George, was after Duke of Clarence, his youngeſt ſonne Richard, ſirnamed Crouchback, was after king of England. Anne his eldeſt daughter was married to Henry Holland Duke of Exeter, his ſecond daughter Elizabeth was married to John de la Poole Earle of Suffolk, his third Margaret to Charles Duke of Burgoigne, his fourth Vrſula dyed young. This Duke being dead, had his head crowned with a paper Crown, together with many circumſtances of diſgracing him: but this act of ſpight was fully afterwards recompenſed upon their heads that did it.

The Earle of March hearing of his fathers death, laboured now ſo much the more earneſtly, in that he laboured for himſelfe; and parting from Shrewsbury, whoſe Inhabitants were moſt firme unto him, he increaſed his army to the number of three and twenty thouſand, and preſently took the field; and having advertiſment, that Jaſper Earle of Pembrooke, with the Earle of Ormond and Wiltſhire followed after him with a great power of Welſh and Iriſh; he ſuddenly marcheth back againe, and in a plaine neer Mortimers Croſſe, on Candlemas day in the morning gave them battell, wherewith the ſlaughter of three thouſand and eight hundred, he put the Earles to flight. Owen Tewther who had married Queen Catherine, Mother to king Henry the ſixth, and divers Welſh Gentlemen were taken, and at Hereford beheaded. Before the battell, it is ſaid, the Sunne appeared to the Earle of March like three ſunnes, and ſuddenly it joyned all together in one; for which cauſe, ſome imagine, that he gave the ſunne in its full brightnes, for his badge or Cogniſance.

The Queen in the mean time encouraged by the death of the Duke of Yorke, with a power of Northern men marcheth towards London: but when her ſouldiers were once South of Trent, as if that river were the utmoſt limit of their good behaviour, they fell to forrage the Country in moſt babarous manner: Approaching S. Albans, they were advertiſed that the Duke of Norfolke and the Earle of Warwick were ready to give them battell; whereupon the Queens Vaward haſteth to paſſe through St. Albans; but being not ſuffered to paſſe, they encountred with their Enemies in the field called Barnard heath; who perceiving the maine battaile to ſtand ſtill, and not to move; which was done by the treachery of Lovelace, who with the kentiſh men had had the leading of it: they ſoone made the Southerne men to turne their backs and fly; upon whoſe flight, the reſt in doubt of each others well meaning, ſhifted away; and the Lords about the King perceiving the danger, withdrew themſelves: Only the Lord Bonvile comming in a complemental manner to the King, and ſaying it grieved him to leave his Majeſty, but that neceſſity for ſafeguard of his life, enforced it; was importuned, and Sir Thomas Kyriell a knight of Kent likewiſe, by the king to ſtay; he paſſing his Royall word, that their ſtay ſhould bee no danger to them; upon which promiſe they ſtayed, but to their coſt: for the Queen hearing that the Commons had beheaded Baron Thorpe at High-gate; ſhe in revenge thereof, cauſed both their heads to be ſtricken off at S. Albans: ſo as there were ſlaughtered at this battaile the full number of three and twenty hundred, but no man of name, but onely Sir John Grey, who the ſame day was made knight, with twelve other at the village of Colney.

And now the King was adviſed, to ſend one Thomas Hoe, (that had been a Barriſter) to the Victors, to tell them; that he would gladly come to them, if with conveyance it might be done: whereupon the Earle of Northumberland, appointed divers Lords to attend him to the L. Cliffords Tent, where the Queen and the young Prince met to their great joy: but it was now obſerved, as it were in the deſtiny of King Henry, that although he were a moſt Pious man, yet no enterpriſe of waire did ever proſper, where he was preſent; that we may know the proſperity of the world to be no inſeparable companion to men of Piety. At the Queens requeſt, the king honored with knighthood thirty gentlemen, who the day before had fought againſt the part where he was; the Prince likewiſe was by him dubbed knight, and then they went to the Abby, where they were received with Anthems, and withall an humble petition, to be protected from the outrage of the looſe ſouldiers, which was promiſed, and Proclamation made to that purpoſe, but to ſmall purpoſe; for the Northern men ſaid, It was their bargaine to have all the ſpoyle in every place, after they had paſſed Trent: and ſo they robbed and ſpoiled whatſoever they could come at. The Londoners hearing of this diſorder, were reſolved, ſeeing there was no more aſſurance in the Kings promiſe, to keep the Northern men out of their gates; inſomuch that when they were ſent to, to ſend over to the Campe certaine Cart-loads of Lenton proviſion; which the Major accordingly provided: the Commons roſe about Cripplegate, and by ſtrong hand kept the Carts from going out of the City. Hereupon, the Major ſends the Recorder to the Kings Counſell, and withall intreats the Dutcheſſe of Bedford, and the Lady Scales; to intercede for him to the Queen; and to excuſe his not uſing force, conſidering how dangerous it might be in theſe doubtfull times, to ſtirre their fury, that would not eaſily be alayed. It was well adviſed to ſend women to intreate a woman, for by this means they prevailed, that ſome of the Lords of the Counſell, with a guard of foure hundred good ſouldiers, were appointed to goe for London, to enquire and certifie of theſe things: when ſuddenly news was brought, that the Earle of March with a great Army was marching towards them: for the Earle of Warwicke having gathered together his ſcattered troops, and joyned with the Earle of March, they haſted towards London, and were joyfully received upon the eight and twentieth day of February; and upon Sunday, the ſecond of March, the Earle of Warwick muſtred all his army in S. John's field, and having caſt them into a ring, read unto them the agreement of the laſt Parliament, and then demanded, whether they would have King Henry to raign ſtill? who all cryed, no, no: then he aſked them, whether they would have the Earle of March eldeſt ſonne of the Duke of Yorke (by that Parliament proclaimed King) to raigne over them? who with a great clamor cryed, yea, yea: Then went there certaine Captaines, and others of the City, to the Earle of March at Baynards Caſtle, to acquaint him with what was paſſed; who at firſt ſeemed to excuſe himſelfe, as unable to execute ſo great a charge: but animated by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhops of London and Exeter, and the Earle of Warwick, he at laſt conſented to take it upon him; and thereupon, the next morning he went in Proceſſion at Pauls, and offered there, and after Te Deum ſung, he was in great ſtate conveyed to Weſtminſter, and there in the great Hall, seated in the Kings seat, with the Scepter of St. Edward in his hand; and then again the people, of whom there was a great concourse, were aloud demanded, if they would acknowledge him to be their King? to which with great willingneſſe they all cried, yea, yea. Then taking homage of divers Noblemen there preſent, he was with Proceſſion and great ſolemnity conveyed to the Abbey, and placed in the Quire as King, whil'ſt Te Deum was ſinging: That done, he offered at St. Edwards Shrine, and then returned by water to Pauls, and was lodged in the Biſhops Pallace; and upon the fourth of March he was generally Proclaimed King, by the name of Edward the Fourth. And here in the courſe of all Writers, ends the Reigne of King Henry the Sixth; that it may be truly ſayd, never any came to be King ſo ſoone after his birth, nor left to be King ſo long before his death; for he came to be King at eight moneths old, and he left to be King, living twelve years after. There was indeed in that ſpace of time, a certaine Viciſſitude, ſometimes a King, and ſometimes no King; the paſſages wher of muſt be related in the following Kings Reigne.

Of his Taxations.

IN the firſt yeare of his Reigne, a Parliament was holden at London, where the Queen Mother, with the young king in her lap came and ſate amongſt the Lords; and there was then granted a Subſidie of five Nobles upon every ſacke of woll that ſhould paſſe out of the Land, for three years, but if carried out by Merchant ſtrangers, then to pay three and forty ſhillings for every ſacke. In the third year of his Reigne, a Parliament was holden at Weſtminſter, wherein was granted a Subſidie of twelve pence in the pound of all Merchandize comming in, or paſſing out of the Realme, and three ſhillings of a Tonne of Wine, for the terme of three years. In his ſixth year in a Parliament at Weſtminſter was granted a Subſidie, of every Tonne of Wine three ſhillings; and of other Merchandize except Wooll, Fell, and Cloth, twelve pence in the pound: Alſo of every Pariſh through the Realme (except Cities and Boroughes) the Benefice being in value ten Markes; Tenne of that Pariſh ſhall pay ſixe ſhillings eight pence; and of every Benefice of the value of ten pounds, ten Pariſhioners ſhould pay thirteen ſhillings foure pence, and ſo rateably of every Benefice, from the loweſt to the higheſt. And for the Inhabitants of Cities and Boroughes, every man being worth twenty ſhillings above his houſhold ſtuffe, and the apparell of him and his wife, ſhould pay foure pence, and ſo after that rate to the richeſt.

Of Lawes and Ordinances in his time.

IN this kings time, the Lord Major of London firſt began to go by water to London, where before they uſed to go by land. Alſo in this Kings Reigne the Art of Printing was firſt found at Mogunce in Germany, by a knight called John Cuttenbergen, and brought into England by William Caxton of London Mercer, who firſt practiſed the ſame in the Abbey at Weſtminſter, in the yeare 1471. In the 23 yeare of his Reigne, in a Parliament then holden, it was Enacted, that when Wheat was ſold for ſix ſhillings eight pence the quarter, Rye for foure ſhillings, and Barley for three ſhillings; It ſhould be lawfull for any man to carry the ſayd kindes of Corn, into the parts beyond the Sea without licenſe, ſo it were not to the kings enemies or Rebels; which Act was afterward confirmed by king Edward the Fourth.

Affaires of the Church in his time.

A Great Schiſme was in the Church in this kings time by reaſon of Anti-popes; for remedy whereof, a Councell is called at Conſtance, to which the Emperors of Conſtantinople and Trabizond ſend their Ambaſſadors. In this Councell John the three and twentieth is convented, condemned, depoſed, and impriſoned: Gregory the twelveth, and Benedict the thirteenth are deprived, and Otho Colonna, by the

the name of Martin the fifth, is choſen Pope. During theſe conſulions in the Weſterne Church, the Chriſtians in the Eaſterne Church are utterly ruinated: The Emperor ſmothered to death in a preaſe of people, and the great City of Conſtantinople wonne by the Turke, made ever ſince the ſeate of his Empire. In the ſixe and thirtieth yeare of this king, Reynold Peacocke Biſhop of Chicheſter, who had laboured many yeares in Tranſlating the holy Scripture into Engliſh, was accuſed and convicted, for holding and publiſhing certaine opinions at that time held Hereticall; which at laſt, openly at Pauls Croſſe he revoked; That he had held there was no neceſſity to believe that Chriſt deſcended into Hell; alſo, no neceſſity to believe in the communion of Saints, or that the Univerſall Church cannot erre in matters of Faith, or that it is neceſſary to believe and hold whatſoever a Generall Councell ſhall determine: Alſo that he had held, that ſpirituall perſons ought to have no Temporall Poſſeſſions, and that perſonall Tythes were not due by Gods Law: theſe Points he openly renounced, but was notwithſtanding deprived of his Biſhopricke; only a certaine Penſion was aſſigned him to live on in an Abbey, where ſoone after he dyed.

Workes of Piety done by him, or others in his time.

THe king himſelfe Founded two famous Colledges, the one in Cambridge, to our Lady and St. Nicholas, called the Colledge Royall, or the kings Colledge; the other of Eaton beſides Windſor, called of our bleſſed Lady; to the maintenance whereof, he gave 2400 pounds by yeare. In the 28 year of his Reigne, his Queen Margaret began the Foundation of Queens Colledge in Cambridge. In the time of his Reigne alſo, Henry Chicheley Archbiſhop of Canterbury Founded two Colledges in Oxford; one called All-Soules Colledge, the other Bernard Colledge. In his time alſo, Humphry Duke of Gloceſter (but others ſay, Thomas Kempe Archbiſhop of Canterbury) built the Divinity School in Oxford; alſo the ſayd Archbiſhop built Pauls Croſſe in forme as now it ſtandeth; and William Waynflete Biſhop of Vvincheſter, and Lord Chancellor of England Founded Mary Magdalen Colledge in Oxford. In his ſeventeenth yeare, Ralph Lord Cromwell, builded the Colledge of Tatſhall in Lincolnſhire. Alſo this yeare, Vvilliam Eaſtfield Major of London, cauſed to be builded at his own charge the Water-Conduict in Fleetſtreet. In his ninth year, John Vvells Major of London, cauſed the Condnict commonly called the Standard in Cheape, to be builded. In his firſt yeare, the Weſt Gate of London, ſometime called Chamberlaine gate, and now Newgate, was begun to be new builded by the Executors of Sir Richard Vvhittington Lord Major of London. In his fifth yeare, John Reynwell Major of London, gave certaine lands to the Citie of London, for which the Citie is bound to pay for ever, all Fifteens that ſhall be granted to the King, (ſo as it paſſe not three Fifteens in one year) for three Wards in London; namely, Dowgate-Ward, Billingſgate-Ward, and Aldgate. Alſo this yeare, the Tower at the Drawbridge of London was begun by the ſame Major. In his foure and twentieth yeare, Simon Eyre Lord Major of London builded the Leaden-Hall in London, to be a Storehouſe for Graine and Fewell for the poore of the Citie, and a faire Chappell at the Eaſt end of the ſame, leaving in ſtocke a thouſand pounds, which afterward King Edward the Fourth borrowed and never paid it again. Alſo in this kings time, William de la Poole Duke of Suffolke, and Alice his wife, Daughter to Thomas Chaucer, Son of Geoffry Chaucer the famous Poet; tranſlated and encreaſed the Mannour place of Ewelme in Oxfordſhire, and builded new the Pariſh Church of Ewelme, and an Hoſpitall or Almeſhouſe for two Prieſts, and thirteene poore men, to which he gave three Manours, Ramruge in Hampſhire, Cotocke in Wiltſhire, and Merſh in Buckinghamſhire: They alſo founded the Hoſpirall of Donnington Caſtle.

Of Caſualties happening in his time.

IN his Fifth yeare was ſo unſeaſonable weather, that it rained almoſt continually, from Eaſter to Michaelmaſſe. In his ſeventh yeare, the eight of November, the Duke of Norfolke was like to have been drowned passing through London-Bridge, his Barge being set upon the piles, overwhelmed, so that thirty persons were drowned, and the Duke with others that escaped, were fain to be drawn up with ropes. In his 18 year, all the Lyons in the Tower dyed: Also this year, the 18 day of July, the Postern-Gates of London by East-Smithfield against the Tower of London, sanke by night more than seven foot into the earth. In his two and twentieth year, on New-years day, neer unto Bedford, a very deep water, which ran betwixt the Towns of Swelstone and Harlestwood, stood suddenly still, and divided it selfe, so that by the space of three miles the bottome remained dry; which wonder, many thought to signifie the division of the people, and falling away from the king, which happened shortly after. In the three and thirtieth year of his Reign, besides a great Blazing Starre, there happened a strange sight, a monstrous Cock came out of the Sea, and in the presence of a multitude of people at Portland, made a hideous crowing three times, each time turning about clapping his wings, and beckning towards the North, the South, and the West; as also many prodigious births. In his six and thirtieth year, in a little Town in Bedfordshire, it rained bloud, wherof the red drops appeared in sheets hung out to dry.

Of his Wife and issue.

HE married Margaret Daughter of Rayner Duke of Anjou, and Tisular-king of Jerusalem, Sicilie, and Arragon; by whom he had small Portion, and little strength of Alliance; yet might have been a good match, if they could have changed conditions with one another, that he might have had her active and stirring spirit, and she his softly and milde disposition; She was his wife six and twenty years, and after her husbands depulsion from the Regall Throne, his Forces being vanquished at the Battell of Tewkesberry, in a poore Religious house, where she had fled for safety of her life, was taken prisoner and carried captive to London, where shee remained in durance, till Duke Rayner her Father purchased her liberty, unto whom she returned, and lastly dyed in her native Country. By her, king Henry had issue only one Son named Edward, who when the day was lost at Tewkesberry, sought to escape by flight, but being taken, was brought into the presence of king Edward, whose resolute answers provoked king Edward so much, that he dashed him on the mouth with his Gantlet, and then Richard the Crouchback ran him into the heart with his Dagger; his body was buried amongst the poore persons there slain, in the Monastical Church of the Black-Friers in Tewkesberry.

Of his Death and Buriall.

UPon King Edwards recovering the Crown, he was committed to the Tower; where the 21 of May, in the yeare 1472, he was murthered by the bloudy hand of Richard Duke of Glocester: the day after he was brought to Pauls Church in an open Coffin bare-faced, where he bled; thence carried to the Black-Friers, where he also bled; from thence in a Boat to Chersey Abbey, without Priest or Clerk, torch or taper, saying or singing, and there buried; but afterwards at the appointment of King Edward, was removed to Windsor, and there interred, and a fair Monument made over him.

HEe was tall of stature, spare and slender of body, of a comely countenance, and all parts well proportioned. For endowments of his minde, he had virtues enough to make him a Saint, but not to make him a God, as kings are said to be gods; for of that commanding power there being two parts, Parcere subjectis & debellare superbos, he wanted the latter. He was not sensible of that which the world calls Honour, accounting the greatest honour to consist in humility; His greatest imperfection was, that he had in him too much of the Logge, and too little of the Storke; for he would not move, but as he was moved, and had rather be devoured, than he would devoure. He was not so stupid, not to know prosperity from adversity; but he was so devout, to thinke nothing adverstitie, which was nor a hinderance to Devotion: He was fitter for a Priest than a King, and for a sacrifice than a Priest; and he could not choose but dye a Martyr, who all his life had beene a Confessor. He had one immunity peculiar to himselfe, that no man could ever be revenged of him, seeing he never offered any man injury. By being innocent as a Dove, hee kept his Crown upon his head so long; but if he had been wise as a Serpent, he might have kept it on longer. But all this is not sufficient, if we expresse not in particular his severall vitues: So modest, that when in a Christmas, a shew of women was presented before him with their breasts layd out, he presently departed; saying, fie, fie for shame, for sooth you be to blame. So pittifull, that when he saw the quarter of a Traytor over Cripplegate, he caused it to be taken down; saying, I will not have any Christian so cruelly handled for my sake. So free from swearing, that he never used other oath, but for sooth, and verily: So patient, that to one who strooke him when he was taken prisoner; he onely sayd, for sooth you wrong your selfe more than me, to strike the Lords annointed: So devout, that on principall Holy-dayes he used to weare sackcloth next his skinne: Once for all, let his Confessor be heard speak, who in ten years confession never found that he had done or sayd any thing, for which he might justly be injoyned Pennance. For which causes, King Henry the Seventh would have procured him to be Canonized for a Saint, but that he was prevented by death; or perhaps because the charge would have been too great, the Canonization of a king being much more costly than of a private person.

Of men of Note in his time.

THere were men of valour in this Kings Reigne, of extraordinary eminencie; as first, John Duke of Bedford Regent of France, whom when a French Lord upbraided, that his sword was of lead; he made him answer, and made him feel that it was of steele. Next him was Thomas Montacute Earle of Salisbury, whose very name was a sufficient charme to daunt a whole French Army. Then the next was John Lord Talbot, so great a terror to the French, that when the women would still their children from crying, they would use to say, Talbot comes. Then was Richard Nevill Earle of Warwicke, so much greater than a king; as that which makes, is greater than that it makes, and such a one was he. Many other besides these, not much inferior to these; that we may truly say, there never was a more heroicall King of England than Henry the Fifth; nor ever a King of England that had more heroicall Subjects, than Henry the Sixth. And though Arms and Letters seem to be of different conditions, yet they commonly grow up and flourish together; as in this kings Reigne, were John Leland sirnamed the Elder, who wrote divers Treatises for instruction of Gramarians: William White a Priest of Kent, professing the Doctrine of Wickliffe, for which he suffered Martyrdome by fire: Alexander Carpenter, who wrote a booke called Destructorium vitiorum, against the Prelates of that time: Peter Basset Esquire of the Privy Chamber to king Henry the Fifth, whose life he wrote: John Pole a Priest, who wrote the life of St. Walhoryle an English woman: Also, Thomas Walden, alias Netter, who wrote divers Treatises against the Wickliffists: Peter Clerke a Student in Oxford, and a defender of Wickliffes doctrine; for which he fled, and was put to death beyond Sea: Thomas Walsingham born in Norfolk, a diligent Historiographer: Thomas Ringstead the younger, an excellent Preacher, who wrote divers Treatises: Thomas Rudborn a Monke of Winchester, and an Historiographer: Peter Payne an earnest professor of Wickliffes doctrine, for which he fled into Bohemia: Nicholas Upton a Civilian, who wrote of Heraldry, of colours in Armory, and of the duty of Chivalry: John Capgrave born in Kent, an Augustine Frier, who wrote many excellent Treatises, particularly the Legend of English Saints: Humphry Duke of Glocester, Protector of the Realm, well learned in Astrologie, whereof he he wrote a speciall Treatise, intituled Tabula Directionum: John Whethamstead, otherwise called Frumentarius, Abbot of St. Albans, who wrote divers Treatises; and amongst others, a booke of the Records of things happening whiles he was Abbot, which booke Holinshead had seen, and in some passages of his time followed: Roger Onley accused of Treason, for practising with the Lady Eleanor Cobham by sorcery to make the king away; and therof condemned, and dyed for it: he wrote one Treatise intituled Contra vulgi superstitiones; and another, De sua Innocentia: Henry Walsingham a Carmelite Frier of Norwich, who wrote sundry Treatises in Divinity: John Lidgate a Monke of Bury, who had travelled France and Italy to learne languages, and wrote many workes in Poetry: Thomas Beckington Bishop of Bath, who wrote against the Law Salique of France; Michael Trigurie born in Cornwall, whom for his excellent learning king Henry the Fifth made Governor of the Universitie of Caen in Normandy, after he had conquered it: Reynold Peacocke Bishop of Chichester, who wrote many Treatises touching Christian Religion: Robert Fleming, who wrote a Dictionary in Greeke and Latine, and a worke in verse of sundry kindes: Nicholas Montacute an Historiographer: John Stow a Monke of Norwich, and Doctor of Divinity in Oxford: Nicholas Bungeie, born in a Town of Norfolke, of that name, who wrote an History called Adnationes Chronicorum: Robert Balsacke, who wrote a booke De Re Militari: Thomas Dando a Carmelite Frier of Marleborough, who wrote the life of Alphred king of the West-Saxons: Robert Bale, firnamed the Elder, Recorder of London, who gathered a Chronicle of the Customs, Laws, Foundations, Changes, Offices, Orders, and publique Assemblies of the Citie of London, with other matters touching the perfect discripcion of the same Citie; he wrote other workes also touching the state of the same Citie, and the Acts of King Edward the third.

THE REIGNE OF KING EDWARD THE FOURTH.

EDWARD Earle of March, borne at Roome in Normandy, sonne and heire of Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke, slaine in the battell at Wakefield, succeeded his Father in the Right, but exceeded him in the possession of the Crown of England; and that by vertue of an act of Parliament lately made; wherein the said Duke of York not only was declared heire apparent to the Crown, and appointed Protector of the King and Kingdome; but it was further enacted, that if King Henry, or any in his behalfe, should attempt the disanulling of this Act; that then the said Duke or his heire should have the present Possession: which because his friends attempted to doe, therefore justly doth Edward Earle of March his sonne, by vertue of this act, take possession of the Crown; and is Proclaimed king of England, by the name of Edward the fourth, through the City of London, on the fifth day of March in the yeer 1460. But before he could have leasure to be Crowned, he was forced once againe to try his fortune in the field by battell: For King Henry in the North was raising a new army; against whom King Edward, upon the twelveth of March, marched with his forces from London, and by easie journeyes came to Pomfret Castle, from whence the Lord Fitzwater was sent to guard the passage at Ferribridge, to stop the Enemies approach that way; King Henry likewise advanceth forward, sending his power, under the conduct of the Duke of Somerset, the Earle of Northumberland and the Lord Clifford, whilest himselfe with his Queen and Sonne stay at Yorke. The Lord Clifford very early on Palmsunday, with a troop of Northern men, fals upon those that guarded Ferribridge, and defeated them with the slaughter of the Lord Fitzwater and the bastard of Salisbury. The Earle of Warwicke hearing of this defeate, comes posting to King Edward at Empe, and in his presence killing his horse, Protested his resolution to stand with him to the Death. Upon this Resolution of the Earles, the King made presently Proclamation, that all who were afraid to fight, should at their pleasure depart; but to those that would stay, he promised good reward, adding withall, that if any that stayed, should after turn his back or flee, then he that should kill him, should have double pay. After this, he gave order to the Lord Fawconbridge, and Sir Walter Blunt, to leade on the Vaward; who in their march about Dandingdale, encountred with the Lord Clifford; (who formerly in cold blood had slaughtered the young Earle of Rutland) and he

he being ſtricken into the throate with an arrow (ſome ſay) without a head; and preſently dying: the Lord Nevill Sonne and heire of the Earle of Weſtmerland was alſo ſlaine, with moſt of their companies, and the reſt put to flight. The next day likewiſe (the Duke of Norfolke being dangerouſly ſick, to whom that place was aſſigned) Fauconbridge and Blunt continue the leading of the Vaunt-guard, and on Palm-ſunday, by break of day, they came to a plaine field between Towton & Saxton, from whence they made a full ſurvey of king Henries Army, and certified king Edward, that the Enemy was threeſcore thouſand ſtrong; where his Army was but forty thouſand and ſix hundred: whereupon a ſecond Proclamation was made through the Campe, that no quarter ſhould be kept, nor priſoner taken. The Armies being both in ſight, the Lord Fauconbridge gave direction to the Archers (upon a ſignall by him given) to ſhoote every man a flight-arrow (for that purpoſe provided) and then to fall back three ſtrides, and ſtand. The Northern men in the mean time plyed their bowes, till all their ſheaves were empty; but their arrowes fell ſhort of the Enemy by threeſcore yards, and not onely did no hurt to the Enemy, but did hurt to themſelves; for their arrows being ſpent, and comming to hand-blows, their own arrows ſticking in the ground, galled their ſhins, and pierced their feet. Ten houres the battell continued doubtfull; till the Earle of Northumberland being ſlaine, with the Lord, Beaumont, Grey, Dacres, and Wells, Sir John Nevill, Andrew Trollop, and many other knights and Eſquires; the Earles of Exeter and Somerſet fled, leaving the Conqueſt to King Edward, but the bloodieſt that ever England felt, for there fell that day ſix and thirty thouſand ſeven hundred threeſcore and ſixteen perſons, no priſoner being taken but the Earle of Devonſhire. The battell ended, K. Edward haſtes to York, where he cauſed the heads of his father and other friends, to be taken down and buried with their bodies, ſetting in their places the heads of the Earle of Devonſhire, and three other, there at that time executed. The Earle of Somerſet acquainting King Henry with this overthrow, perſwades him, with his Queen and Son, to flie to Barwick; where leaving the Duke of Somerſet, they flie further for ſuccour to the King of Scots, who comforteth them with promiſe of reliefe, but maketh a ſure bargaine; for in lieu of a penſion to be allowed King Henry during his abode there, the Towne and Caſtle of Barwick were delivered to him. Queen Margaret and her Sonne are ſent into France, who obtained of Lewis the Eleventh her Coſin, that all of King Edwards friends were prohibited Stay or Traffick in the French kings Dominions: but all King Henries friends might live there freely. After this, king Edward comes to London; and upon his entrance to the Tower, makes foure and twenty knights, and the next day foure more; and upon the 28 day of June, in the yeare 1461. he rode from the Tower to Weſtminſter, and was there Crowned in the Abby-Church.

Shortly after, a Parliament is ſummoned, which began at Weſtminſter the fourth of November; In which, all Acts of king Henry the Sixth, prejudiciall to king Edwards Title, are repealed: and therein, John Earle of Oxford, a valiant and wiſe man, (he who in a former Parliament had diſputed the queſtion concerning the precedency of Temporall and Spirituall Barons; a bold attempt in thoſe dayes; and by force of whoſe Arguments, Judgement was given for the Lords Temporall) with his Sonne Aubry de Veer, Sir Thomas Tiddingham knight, William Tyrrell & Walter Montgomery Eſquires, were, without anſwer, couvicted of Treaſon, and beheaded. And to encourage others to well-deſerving, king Edward at this time advanced many in honour: his brother George he created Duke of Clarence; his brother Richard, Duke of Glocester; John Lord Nevill brother to the Earle of Warwicke, he made firſt Viſcount, then Marqueſſe Montacute; Henry Bourchier brother to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, is made Earle of Eſſex; and William Lord Fauconbridge, Earle of Kent. And now their new honours are preſently put into imploiment; the Earls of Eſſex & Kent, accompanied with the Lords Audeley and Clinton, Sir John Howard, Sir Richard Walgrave and others, to the number of ten thouſand, are appointed to ſcowre the Seas, who landing in Britaine, took the town of Conquet, and the Iſle of Ree, and then returned. At this time Henry Duke of Somerſet, Ralph Percy and divers others came came in, and humbly ſubmitted themſelves to king Edwards mercy; who proteſted his propenſion of freely pardoning them, and as many other that would ſubmit themſelves as they did.

All this time King Henry was in Scotland, and Queen Margaret in France; where ſhe obtained of the French King, a company of five hundred men; with whom ſhe ſayled towards Newcaſtle, and landed at Tinmouth, but ſuddenly againe returned, and was herſelfe by tempeſt beaten to Barwick, but her company was driven on the ſhore before Bamburg Caſtle, where they ſet their Ships on fire, and fled to an Iſland called Holy Iſland, but were ſo aſſayled there by the baſtard Ogle and John Manners Eſquire, that many of them were ſlaine, and almoſt foure hundred taken priſoners, onely their Coronell Peter Breſſie happened upon a Fiſherman, who brought him to Barwick to Queen Margaret, and by her was made Captaine of the Caſtle of Alnewick, which he with his French-men kept, till they were reſcued. Shortly after, Queen Margaret having gotten together a great company of Scots, and other of her friends bringing her husband with her, and leaving her Sonne at Barwick, entred Northumberland, tooke the Caſtle of Bamburg, made Captaine thereof Sir Ralph Grey; and then came forward to the Biſhopprick of Durham: whither reſorted to her the lately Reconciled, and now againe revolted Duke of Somerſet; Sir Ralph Percy and divers others, who altogether made a competent army. King Edward hearing hereof, makes preparation both by ſea and land; and firſt he ſends Viſcount Montacute with ſome Companies into Northumberland; whom he in perſon followeth with his whole power: The Viſcount marcheth towards king Henry, and by the way encountreth the Lord Hungerford at Hegley-moore; but he, with Lord Baſſe, upon the firſt charge, ran away, leaving Sir Ralph Percy alone with his own Regiment, who there valiantly fighting, dyed. After this the Viſcount underſtanding that king Henry was encamped in Levels plaine, neer the river of Dowell in Hexamſhire, marcheth thither by night, and ſet upon him in his Campe, whoſe charge the Northern men receive with a deſperate reſolution, but were in the end with great ſlaughter overcome. Henry Beaufort Duke of Somerſet, the Lords Baſſe, Molins, Hungerford, Wentworth, Huſſey, and Sir John Finderne knight, with many others are taken priſoners: king Henry himſelfe by the ſwiftnes of his horſe eſcaped, but very hardly; for one of his Hench-men that followed him was taken, who had on his head king Henries Helmet, or as ſome ſay, his high Cap of Eſtate, called Abacot, garniſhed with two rich Crowns, which was preſented to king Edward at Yorke the fourth of May. The Duke of Somerſet was beheaded preſently at Exam; the other Lords and knights were had to Newcaſtle, and there, after a little reſpite, were likewiſe put to death. Beſides theſe, divers others, to the number of five and twenty, were executed at Yorke and in other places. This Duke of Somerſet was never married, but had a naturall Sonne named Charles Somerſet, who was afterward created Earle of Worceſter. Sir Humfry Nevill, and William Tailbois calling himſelf Earle of Kyme, Sir Ralph Grey, and Richard Tunſtall with divers others that eſcaped from this battell, hid themſelves in ſecret places; but yet not ſo cloſely, but that they were eſpied and taken. The Earle of Kyme was apprehended in Riddeſdale, and brought to Newcaſtle, and there beheaded; Sir Humfry Nevill was taken in Holderneſſe, and at York loſt his head. After this battell, called Exam-field, king Edward came to the City of Durham, and ſent from thence into Northumberland, the Earle of Warwick, the Lord Montacute, the Lords Fauconbridge and Scroope, to recover ſuch Caſtles as his Enemies there held; which they effected; and taking in the Caſtle of Dunſtanburg, they found in it John Gois ſervant to the Duke of Somerſet, who was brought to Yorke and there beheaded: and taking in the Caſtle of Bamburg, they found in it Sir Ralph Grey, whom becauſe he had ſworn to be true to king Edward, and was now revolted to king Henry; they degraded from his Order of knight-hood at Doncaſter, by cutting of his gilt Spurs, renting his Coate of Arms, and breaking his ſword over his head, and then beheaded him.

In this mean time, king Henry (upon what occaſion, no man knows; but onely led by the left hand of deſtiny) ventring in diſguiſe to come into England, and ſhifring ting from place to place, was at length discovered, and taken by one Cantlow, or as others say, by Thomas Talbot sonne to Sir Edward Talbot of Bashall, who deceived him being at his dinner at Waddington Hall in Lincolnshire, and brought him towards London, with his legs tyed under the horse belly; in whose company were also taken Doctor Manning Deane of Windsor, D. Bedle, and one Elkrton, whom the Earle of Warwicke met by the way, and brought them all to the Tower of London; whilst the distressed Queen with her sonne once again is driven to fly for shelter into France, whither the new Duke of Somerset and his brother John sayled also, where they lived in great misery; and the Earle of Pembrooke went from Country to Country little better then a Vagabond.

At this time, king Edward, to reward his followers, distributeth the Lands and Possessions of those that held with king Henry amongst them, but first made Proclamation that whosoever of the contrary faction would come in and submit, should be received to grace and restored to their Patrimonies.

In the fourth year of king Edward, in Michaelmas Tearm were made eight Serjeants at Law, Thomas Young, Nicholas Geney, Richard Neale, Thomas Brian, Richard Pigot, John Catesby and Guy Fairfax; who held their feast in the Bishop of Elyes place in Holborn, where the Lord Grey of Ruthin then Lord Treasurer of England, was placed before the Lord Major of London, being invited to the feast, which gave such a distaste to the Major, that he presently departed with the Aldermen and Sheriffs, without tasting of their feast: and it was Registred to be a president in time to come.

And now king Edward no lesse intentive to perform the Office of a king in peace, then he had been before of a Captaine in warre, considering with himselfe that seditious and civill dissensions must needs breed disorders in a state, and that disorders bred by troubled times, are not like troubled waters, that will in time settle of themselves and recover clearnesse; but are rather like weeds, which once springing up and let alone, will in time over run the whole ground where they grow: He like a good Gardener seeks to weed them out before they grow too rank, and endeavours to make a generall reformation of abuses; and to that end in Michaelmas Term in the second yeare of his Reigne, Three daies together he sate publikely with his Judges in Westminster-hall on the Kings Bench, to acquaint himselfe with the Orders of that Court, and to observe what needed Reformation in it, either at Bench or at Barre: as likewise he ordered the officers of his Exchequer, to take more moderate Fees; and to be more intentive to the benefit of the Subject, than to their own unjust gaine: He also daily frequented the Councell Table; which he furnished for the most part, with such as were gracious amongst the Citizens, whom he imployes about references and businesses of private consequence; whilest mysteries of State were intimated only to such whom he selected to be of his more private Cabinet Counsaile; by whom, he being now of the age of three and twenty years, was advised that it was now time to provide for posterity, by taking a wife, and to provide also for the present time, by taking a fit wife, which they conceived to be no where so fitly found as in France; both thereby to bury old grudges between the two Nations, and also to avert assistance from Queen Margaret, the onely disturber of the State; and this being concluded, it onely remained to make choice of a fit man for that imployment, for which none was thought so fit as Richard Nevill Earle of Warwick; he therefore is presently sent into France, to treate of a Marriage to be had between king Edward and the Lady Bona, daughter to Lewis Duke of Savoy, and Sister to the Lady Carlote then Queen of France: a Lady, no lesse for beauty and vertuous qualities, then for Nobility of blood, worthy to be a Queen. The Proposition is in France readily embraced, and willingly assented unto on all parts. But in the mean time king Edward being hunting in Witchwood Forrest besides Stonystratford; he chanced to come to the Manour of Grafton, where the Dutchesse of Bedford then lay, and where her daughter by Sir Richard Woodvile, the Lady Elizabeth Gray widdow of Sir John Gray of Groby, slaine at the last battell of St. Albans; became a suitour to him for some lands which her husband had given her in joynture; with with whose beauty and gracefull behaviour, king Edward was so taken, that hee presently became a Suitor to her; and when he could not obtaine his suit by termes of wanton love, he was forced to seeke it by terms of Marriage.

And here we may well thinke there was no small conflict in King Edwards minde, between the two great commanders, Love and Honor, which of them should bee most potent; Honor put him in minde, that it was against his Law to take to wife a meaner person than himselfe; but Love would take no notice of any difference of degrees, but tooke it for his Prerogative to make all persons equall; Honour perswaded him that it stood him much upon to make good the Ambassage, in which he had sent the Earle of Warwicke to a great Prince; but Love perswaded him that it stood him more upon, to make good the Ambassage sent to himself from a greater Prince: In conclusion, it appeared to be true which one observes, Improbe amor quid non mortalia pectora cogis? what is it that love will not make a man to do? Whether it be, that love brings upon the minde a forgetfulnesse of all circumstances but such as tend to its own satisfaction; or whether it be that love is amongst passions, as oyle amongst liquors, which will alwayes be supreme and at the top; Honour may be honoured, but love will be obeyed: And therefore king Edward, though he knew no Superior upon Earth, yet he obeys the summons of Love; and upon the first day of May, marries the sayd Lady Gray at Grafton; the first of our kings since the Conquest that married his Subject: At which marriage none was present but the Durchesse of Bedford, the Priest, two Gentlewoman, & a yong man to helpe the Priest at Masse: the yeare after, with great solemnity she was Crowned Queen at Westminster. It is not unworthy the relating the Speech which king Edward had with his Mother, who sought to crosse this match: Where you say "(saith he) that she is a widdow, and hath already children; by Gods blessed Lady, "I am a Batchelour, and have some too, and so each of us hath a proofe, that neither of us is like to be barren; And as for your objection of Bigamy, (for his "mother had charged him with being contracted to the Lady Elizabeth Lucie) Let "the Bishop (saith he) lay it to my charge when I come to take Orders, for I understand it is forbidden a Priest, but I never wist it was forbidden a Prince. Upon this marriage, the Queens Father was created Earle Rivers, and made High-Constable of England; her brother the Lord Anthony, was married to the sole Heire of the Lord Scales, and by her had that Barony; her Son sir Thomas Gray was created Marquesse Dorset, and married Cicelie, heire to the Lord Bonvile. It may be thought a happy fortune for this Lady to be thus matched; but let all things be considered, and the miseries accruing to her by it, will be found equivalent, if not over-weighing all the benefits: For first, by this match she drew upon her selfe the envy of many, and was cause that her Husband fled the Realm, and her selfe in his absence glad to take Sanctuary, and in that place to be delivered of a Prince, in a most unprincely manner. After which, surviving her husband, she lived to see her two Sonnes most cruelly murthered; and for a conclusion of all, she lived to see her selfe confined to the Monastery of Berdmondsey in Southwarke, and all her goods confiscate by her own Son in Law.

And now the Earle of Warwicke at his return, found that knot tyed in England, which he had laboured to tye in France: His Ambassage frustrated, the Lady Bona deluded, the king of France abused, and himselfe made a stale, and the disgracefull instrument of all this; which although he resented in a high degree, yet he had not been a Courtier so long, but in that time he had sufficiently learned the Art of dissembling; he passed it over lightly for the present, but yet carried it in his minde, till a fit opportunity; and thereupon procures leave to retire himselfe to his Castle of Warwicke.

King Edward in the meane time, having just cause to suspect hee had made the French his enemies, seeks to make other Princes his friends: He enters into a League with John king of Aragon; to whom he sent for a Present a score of Cotsall Ews, and five Rams, a small Present in shew, but great in the event; for it proved of more benefit to Spain, and of more detriment to England than could at first sight have been imagined. And to ſecure himſelfe at home, he tooke truce with the king of Scots for fifteen years. And where he had married before his two Siſters, Anne the eldeſt to Henry Holland Earle of Exeter; and Elizabeth to John de la Poole Duke of Suffolke; he now matched Margaret his third Siſter, to Charles Duke of Burgoigne; which proved a greater aſſiſtance to him, than that which he had loſt in France.

By this time the Earle of Warwickes ſpleen began ſo to ſwell within him, that hee could no longer containe it; and having with much adoe drawne to his party his two brothers, the Archbiſhop of Yorke, and the Marqueſſe Montacute; he ſeeks alſo to draw in the kings two brothers, the Duke of Clarence, and the Duke of Gloceſter; but he found Gloceſter ſo reſerved, that he durſt not cloſe with him; the Duke of Clarence he found more open, and to him he addreſſeth himſelfe, complaining of the diſgrace he had ſuſtained by the king, in his employment into France, and other wrongs: to whom the Duke preſently made anſwer, in as great complaint of his brothers unkindneſſe to himſelf; ſaying, he had married his Wives brother Anthony to the heire of the Lord Scales, and her Son Thomas to the heire of the Lord Bonvile, but could finde no match of preferment for him being his own brother: And upon this agreement in complaints, they agree to joyne againſt king Edward; and to make the knot the firmer, the Duke of Clarence takes to wife Iſabel the Earle of Warwicks Daughter, and with her hath aſſured unto him halfe of the Lands the Earl held in right of his Wife, the Lady Anne, Daughter of Richard Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke deceaſed. Upon this marriage, the Earle of Warwicke diſcovered to him what hitherto he had concealed; concerning his project for the reſtoring of k. Henry, to which Clarence gave approbation, with promiſe to aſſiſt him in it to his uttermoſt.

At this time, Sir Thomas Cooke late Major of London, was by one Hawkins appeached of Treaſon, for the which he was ſent to the Tower, and his place in London ſeized by the Lord Rivers. The caſe was this; the ſayd Hawkins came to Sir Thomas, requeſting him to lend a thouſand Marks upon good ſurety; who anſwered, he would firſt know for whom it ſhould be, and for what intent; and underſtanding it ſhould be for the uſe of Queen Margaret, he refuſed to lend a penny. The matter reſted two or three years, till the ſayd Hawkins was layd in the Tower, and brought to the Brake, called the Duke of Exeters Daughter; by means of which paine, hee confeſſed amongſt other things, the motion he had made to Sir Thomas Cooke, and accuſed himſelfe ſo farre, that hee was put death. Sir Thomas Cooke lying in the Tower from Whitſuntide till Michaelmas, had his place in Eſſex named Gyddiball, ſpoyled: his Deere in his Parke deſtroyed; and though arraigned upon life and death, he were acquitted of the Indictment; yet could not be delivered till he had payd eight thouſand pounds to the king, and eight hundred to the Queen.

And now the Earle of Warwicke ſendeth to his brothers the Archbiſhop and the Marqueſſe, to prepare all things ready to ſet on foot the intended revolt from king Edward, and to procure ſome rebellious commotion in the North, whil'ſt he and his new Son in law would provide to goe forward with the worke; which they accordingly did in Yorkeſhire, an occaſion being taken for the breach of an ancient cuſtome there, to give to the poore people of St. Leonards in the City of Yorke, certain quantities of Corn and Grain. This commotion the Archbiſhop and the Marqueſſe underhand fomented; yet to colour the matter, the Marqueſſe oppoſed the Rebels, and cut off the head of Robert Huldorne their Captain; but his head being cut off, the Rebels got them other Captains; Henry, Son and heir to the Lord Fitzhugh, and ſir Henry Nevill Son to the Lord Latimer; the one the Nephew, the other a Cozen-germane to the Earle of Warwicke, with whom they joyne the valiant Captaine Sir John Conyers: Theſe when they could not enter Yorke, came marching towards London, all the way exclaiming againſt king Edward as an unjuſt Prince, and an uſurper. King Edward hearing of this commotion, ſends Sir William Herbert, whom of a meane Gentleman, two years before, he had made Earle of Pembrooke, and his brother ſir Richard Herbert, together with the Lord Stafford of Southwick to ſuppreſſe the Rebels; and they with an Army of ſeven thouſand, moſt Welchmen, march towards them; but the Lord Stafford being put from his Inne where he uſed to lodge, by the Earle of Pembrooke, tooke ſuch a diſtaſte at it, that he withdrew his Archers, and gave over the buſineſſe; yet the Earle of Pembrooke though thus forſaken, with his own Regiment encountred the Rebels, ſlew Sir Henry Nevill, and divers others; when being upon the point of victory, one John Clapham a ſervant of the Earle of Warwicke, comming in with five hundred raſcally fellows, and crying aloud, a Warwicke, a Warwicke; the Welchmen ſuppoſing the Earle had beene come, turned preſently their backs and fled; five thouſand of them were ſlain, the Earle of Pembrooke himſelfe, and his much lamented brother Sir Richard Herbert, a moſt goodly perſonage, were taken priſoners, brought to Banbury, where both of them, with ten other Gentlemen were put to death. And now the Northamptonſhire men joyning with the Rebels, in this fury, made them a Captain named Robert Hilliard, but they named him Robin of Riddeſdale, & ſuddenly came to Grafton, where they tooke the Earle Rivers father to the Queen, and his ſonne Sir John Woodvile; brought them to Northampton, and there without Judgement beheaded them. King Edward advertiſed of theſe miſchances, wrote to the Sheriffs of Somerſet-ſhire and Dorſet-ſhire to apprehend the Lord Stafford of Southwick, (who had treacherouſly forſaken the Earle of Pembrooke) and if they could take him, to put him to death; who being ſoon after found in a Village within Brentmarſh, was brought to Bridgewater, and there beheaded. After this battell fought at Hedgecote, commonly called Banbury field, the Northern men reſorted to Warwick, where the Earl with great joy received them; and hearing that king Edward with a great army was comming thither, he ſent for his ſonne in Law the Duke of Clarence, with all ſpeed to repaire unto him; who joyning together, and uſing means cunningly, by having ſome communication of Peace, to make the king ſecure, and to take little heed of himſelfe, they took advantage of his ſecurity, and in the dead of night ſet on his Campe, and killing the watch; before the king was aware, at a place called Wolney foure miles from Barwick, they took him priſoner in his bed, and preſently conveyed him to Middleham Caſtle in Yorkeſhire, to be there in ſafe cuſtody with the Archbiſhop of Yorke. And now they had the Prey in their hand, if they had as well looked to keep it, as they had done to get it: but king Edward, whether bribing his Keepers, or otherwiſe winning them by faire promiſes, got ſo much liberty, ſometimes for his recreation to goe a hunting; by which he cauſed Sir William Stanley, Sir Thomas of Burgh and divers of his friends, at a certaine time to meet him, who took him from his Keepers, and ſet him againe at liberty: whil'ſt the Earle of Warwicke nothing doubting his brother the Archbiſhops care in ſafe keeping him, & thinking the brunt of the warres to be now paſt, diſmiſt his Army, and intended only to finde out King Henry, who was kept a priſoner, but few men knew where.

King Edward being now at liberty, poſteth to York, and from thence to Lancaſter; where his Chamberlaine the Lord Haſtings had raiſed ſome forces, with which he marcheth to London, and is there joyfully received: The Earle of Warwick likewiſe ſeuds to his friends, and makes preparation for a new army; whil'ſt in the mean time, by mediation of divers Lords, an enterview in Weſtminſter-hall is agreed upon; and ſolemn Oath taken on both ſides for ſafety, between King Edward, the Duke of Clarence, and the Earle of Warwicke; but each party ſtanding ſtrictly upon terms tending to their own ends; they parted as great Enemies as they met: and ſo from thence the K. went to Canterbury, the Duke and the E. to Lincolne: whither they had preappointed their forces to repaire, under the Conduct of Sir Robert Wels, Son & heir of the L. Wels, a man of great valour and experience in the wars: K. Edward, to take off ſo able a man from the Earles part, ſends for his Father the L. Wels to come unto him; who taking with him, his Son in Law Sir Thomas Dymock, and comming to attend the Kings pleaſure, was told by his friends how wonderfully the King was incenſed againſt them: whereupon for their ſafety, they take Sanctuary at Weſtminſter. But upon the Kings Princely word, they come unto him, who commandeth the Lord Wells to write to his Sonne, to deſiſt from adhering to the Earle of Warwicke, which the Lord Wells accordingly did: but Sir Robert Wells notwithſtanding his Fathers letters, continuing firme to the Earle ſtill, ſo much incenſed

King Edward, that he caused both his Father and Sir Thomas Dymock to be beheaded. He supposed perhaps, that the Lord Wills was himself underhand a friend to the Earl, and had not dealt sincerely with him, in procuring his Sonne to leave that party. But now Sir Robert Wells seeing the King drawn neer to Stamford, where he had pitched his Tents, and hearing of his Fathers beheading, was much distracted what to doe: to decline battell with the King, he thought would shew too much feare; and to give him battell before the Earle of Warwicke were come with his forces, would shew too much boldnesse; But his Veines were so filled with a desire of revenging his Fathers death, that he thought he could never shew boldnesse enough; and thereupon encountring with the Kings Army, farre greater then his own, oppressed with multitude was taken prisoner; together with Sir Thomas de Laud and divers others; who presently in the place were put to execution: as soone as Sir Robert Wells was taken, the Lincolneshire men to make themselves the lighter to run away, threw off their Coates, for which cause, this battell was afterward called Lose-coate-field, in which, it is reported, were slaine above ten thousand men.

The Earle of Warwick hearing of this Defeate, and not having present means to raise an army sufficient to oppose king Edward; when he could by no means draw the Lord Stanley to his party, he determined to sayle into France, and hiring ships at Dartmouth in Devonshire, he with his sonne in Law the Duke of Clarence, and their wives, took to Sea; and thinking to land at Callice, of which Towne he himselfe was Captaine, he was by the Lord Fauconbere a Gascoigne, whom he had left his Deputy there, repelled; and with so great inhumanity, that the Dutchesse of Clarence who was then in labour, was faine to be delivered in the ship, (all the courtesie in that distresse shewed, was only to send a flaggon or two of wine,) which fact of Fauconbere when king Edward heard of, he was so well pleased with it, that he presently sent him a Patent to be Captaine of the Town himself: and the Duke of Burgoigne for the same service, sent unto him Philip de Comines (who hath written the History of these times) with a grant of one thousand Crowns pension during his life. Never man was beter paid for one act of dissembling; for the truth was, Pre amore exclusit foras, it was out of his love, that he suffered him not to enter the Town, for he knew there were many great ones in it so addicted to king Edward, and so maliciously bent against the Earle, that if he or any of his company should have come, they would in all likelihood have done them some mischiefe: And hereof he made a good proofe soon after: for when the Earle took to sea again, the Lord Fauconbere sent him word, he should take heed where he landed; for that the Duke of Burgoigne lay in waite to take him; which advertisement did the Earle more good, then the keeping him out of Callice did him hurt. The Earle upon this advertisement, landed at Diepe in Normandie, where of when king Lewis heard, he sent and invited him to come to his Court at Amboise, where he received him with no lesse honour, than if he had been a king. In the mean time king Edward made enquiry for all such as were ayders to the Earle of Warwick, of whom some were apprehended as guilty, some fled to Sanctuary, and some submitted to the kings mercy; as John Marquesse Montacute, whom he courteously received. Queen Margaret, who at this time sojourned with Duke Rayner her father, hearing of the Earle of Warwicks arrivall, with her Son Prince Edward, came to Amboise, and with her also came Jasper Earle of Pembroke, and John Earl of Oxford, lately escaped out of prison and fled into France, between whom a new Combination is made; and for a foundation of firme amitie, king Henries sonne Prince Edward, marries Anne the Earle of Warwicks second daughter: after which marriage, the Duke of Clarence and the Earles took a solemn Oath, never to leave the warre till either king Henry or his sonne Prince Edward were restored to the Crown. But notwithstanding this Oath, this marriage put new thoughts into the Duke of Clarence his minde, casting with himselfe that the issue of it could be no lesse then the utter extirpation of the house of Yorke: whereupon, making faire shew still to his Father in Law the Earle of Warwicke, he underhand fals off, and secretly gives advertisement to his brother king Edward of all their proceedings. And now the Earle of Warwicke having been six months in France; in this time he had procured procured from the king of France, both ships, and men, and money, and receiving letters out of England, that many Lords and others were ready to adventure their lives in his quarrell, if he would come, (for the people generally held him in such admiration, that they thought the Sunne was taken from the world, when he was absent: and this in great part for his great Hospitality; who it is said, did spend six Oxen at a breakfast) he with the Earles of Oxford and Pembroke took to Sea, and though the Duke of Burgoigne had a Fleet at Sea, to intercept him; yet his Fleet being by tempest scattered, and king Edward trusting to that Fleet, having provided no other; the Earle had a quiet passage to land at Dartmouth in Devonshire, where being landed, he made Proclamation in king Henry the sixths name, that all good Subjects should prepare to fight against king Edward, who contrary to Right had usurped the Crown: Upon which Proclamation, it is scarce to be believed, how many thousands of men resorted to him; with which forces, he made towards London: upon notice of whose approach, on the Sunday next after Michaelmas day, one Doctor Goddard a Chaplaine of His, preaching at Pauls Crosse, did so set forth his Earles pious intention, that many of his auditory were moved to favour the Earles proceeding: insomuch, that the Marquesse Montacute, who had in king Edwards behalf, levied six thousand men about London, found them all itchinable to goe with him to the Earle of Warwick, and accordingly went and joyned with him. King Edward hearing of the great flocking of people to the Earle, sent forth letters into all parts of the Realme for raysing an army; but few came, and those few, with no great good will: which when he perceived, he began to doubt his case; and thereupon accompanied with the Duke of Glocester his brother, the L. Hastings his Chamberlaine, (who having married the Earle of Warwicks sister, yet continued ever true to king Edward) and the Lord Scales brother to the Queen; he departed into Lincolneshire, and coming to Lyn, he found there an English ship, and two Hulks of Holland ready to make sayle: whereupon he, with the forenamed Lords, and about seven or eight hundred persons entred the Ship, having no provision with him but only the apparell they wore; and so bare of money, that he was faine to reward the Master of his Ship with one of his Garments: and thus making course towards the Duke of Burgoignes Country, they were presently chased by eight great Ships of Easterlings, open Enemies both to England and France; which drove him before a Towne in the Country called Alqueware, belonging to the Duke of Burgoigne: where by chance, the Lord Gruuture Governour of that Country, at that time was, who defended them from the Easterlings, and brought them to the Hage in Holland, where they had all things ministred to them, by order from the Duke of Burgoigne.

At this time, upon news of the Earle of Warwicks approach, Queen Elizabeth forsaketh the Tower, and secretly taketh sanctuary at Westminster, where in great penury forsaken of all her friends, she was brought a bed of a sonne called Edward, who like a poore mans childe was Christened; the Godfathers being the Abbot and Prior of Westminster, and the Lady Scroope Godmother.

And now the Earle of Warwicke entring the Tower, removes king Henry out of his hold of durance, where he had been almost nine years, into his own lodging, where he was served according to his Estate; which the Earle did more congratulate, then the king himselfe. Upon this sixth day of October, king Henry accompanied with the Archbishop of Yorke, the Prior of S. Johns, the Bishop of London, the Duke of Clarence, the Earle of Warwicke and other Noblemen, apparelled in a long gown of blew Velvet, was conducted through London, to the Bishops Palace, where he rested till the thirteenth of that moneth, on which day he went in solemne procession about Pauls Church, wearing his Imperiall Crown; the Earle of Warwick bearing up his trayne; and the Earle of Oxford the sword before him. The next day, in all usuall places about London, king Edward was Proclaimed an Usurper, and all his partakers Traytors to God and the king; whereof John Lord Tiptoft Earle of Worcester, as a partaker with king Edward, was made the first example. This Lord had been Lieutenant for King Edward in Ireland, where having done something for which he fled, he was afterward found on the top of a high Tree, in the Forrest of of Wykebridge, in the County of Huntingdon, and being there taken, was brought to London, Attainted, and beheaded on the Tower-hill, and after buried at the Blackfriers.

About this time happened an accident not unworthy to be related: Sir William Hankeford knight, one of the chiefe Iudges at the Law; who dwelt at Annery in Deuonshire, a man of great possessions, and having no sonne, the Lord Fitzwarren, Sir Iohn Seintleger, and Sir William Bonuile married his daughters, and were his heires: This man grew into such a degree of Melancholy, that one day he called to him the Keeper of his Park, charging him with negligence, in suffering his Deere to be stolne; and thereupon commanded him, that if he met any man in his circuit in the night-time, that would not stand or speak, he should not spare to kill him whatsoever he were. The knight having thus layd his foundation, and meaning to end his dolefull dayes, in a certaine darke night secretly conveyd himselfe out of his house, and walked alone in his Park. The Keeper in his night-walk hearing one stirring, and comming towards him, asked, who was there? but no answer being made, he willed him to stand; which when he would not doe, the Keeper shot and killed him, and comming to see who he was, found him to be his Master.

On the twentieth day of November, a Parliament is held at Westminster, wherein King Edward and all his partakers are attainted of high Treason, and all their Lands and Goods seized on to King Henries use. George Plantagenet Duke of Clarence, is by authority of this Parliament, adiudged heire to Richard Duke of Yorke his father, and that Dutchy setled upon him and his heires, notwithstanding the Primogeniture of Edward: upon him also was entailed the Crown of England, in case heires males of the body of King Henry failed. Iasper Earle of Pembrooke, and Iohn Earle of Oxford, are fully restored to their Lands and Honours and Warwick and Clarence are made Governours of the King and kingdome. To this Parliament came the Marquesse Montacute, excusing himselfe, that for feare of death he had taken King Edwards part, which excuse was accepted. Queen Margaret is sent for into France, but by reason of contrary windes was kept back all that Winter.

About this time, Iasper Earle of Pembrooke going into Wales to view his lands in Pembrookeshire, found there the Lord Henry, borne of Margaret the onely daughter and heire of Iohn the first Duke of Somerset, not being then full ten years of age, kept in manner like a captive, but honourably brought up by the Lady Herbert; him he brings with him to London, and presents him to King Henry; whom when the King had a good while beheld, he said to the Lords about him: Loe, this is he, to whom both we and our adversaries, leaving the possession of all things, shall hereafter give place. Which if it be true, It shews a very Propheticall Spirit to have been in King Henry; that could so long before foreseen a thing so unlikely to happen: for this was he, that was afterward King Henry the Seventh, before whom at that time there were many lives in being, of both the house of Yorke and Lancaster.

Shortly after this, by the Duke of Burgoignes means, King Edward is furnished with eighteen tall ships, two thousand Dutchmen, and fifty thousand florens of gold; and thus furnished, he took to Sea, and landed at Ravenspurre in Yorkeshire, where he found but cold entertainment; never theleſſe he made a wary march to Yorke, where likewise he found no great expression of welcome, so as he was forced to change his pretence, swearing deeply and receiving the Sacrament upon it, that he came not to disturbe King Henry, but only to recover his own inheritance; and for the more shew thereof, wearing an Estriche feather, Prince Edwards livery; which opposition seemed so reasonable, that many who resisted him before, were as ready to assist him now: and if he be blamed for breaking his Oath; it must be considered, It was Regni causa, to recover his Kingdome, which perhaps was the Inheritance he meant, when he took his Oath, that he intended nothing, but to recover his Inheritance: and so he brake not his Oath neither. From Yorke he marched towards Wakefield and Sendall, leaving the Castle of Pomfret upon his left hand, where the Marquesse Montacute with his Army lay, but did not offer to stop him: From Wakefield he came to Doncaster, and from thence to Nottingham, where there came to him him Sir William Parre and Sir James Harrington with six hundred men; also Sir Thomas Burgh and Thomas Montgomery with their aydes, who caused him to make Proclamation in his own name: affirming they would serve no man but a King. From Nottingham he came to Leicester, where three thousand able men, and well armed came unto him: From Leicester he came before the wals of Coventry; into which City the Earle of Warwick had withdrawn himselfe, keeping himselfe close therein, with his people, being about six or seven thousand men; three dayes together king Edward provoked him to come forth to battell; but he stayed for more forces, and would not doe it: whereupon King Edward marched forward to Warwicke eight miles from Coventry, thinking thither at least he should have drawne the Earle of Warwicke, but neither would that doe it: Indeed the Earle looked for the comming of the Duke of Clarence, with twelve thousand men to joyn with him, but that expectation proved vaine, for the Duke was now fully reconciled to his Brother King Edward, and brought all his forces to joyn with him; onely he sought to make amity between King Edward and the Earle: but though King Edward offered generall Pardon, and other faire conditions; yet none would please the Earle, without restoring of King Henry. But now to repaire the defection of the Duke of Clarence, there came to the Earle of Warwick at Coventry; the Earle of Oxford, the Duke of Exceter, and the Marquesse Montacute, by whose comming that side was not a little strengthened; yet all this ayde would not make the Earle of Warwick to come to battell: whereupon King Edward marched forward towards London: Both sides seek to make London their friend; the Earle of Warwicke sends to his brother the Archbishop of York to labour in it; who thereupon caused king Henry to mount on horseback, and to ride from Pauls through Cheape down Walbrooke, supposing that this shewing of the king, would have allured the Citizens to assist him: but this device prevailed little, brought not in above seven or eight thousand men, a small proportion to withstand king Edward; and when the Archbishop of York saw this backwardnes in the Citizens, or rather indeed an inclination to king Edward, he secretly sent to him, to receive him into grace; which upon Promise to continue faithfull hereafter, he obtained. The eleventh of April in the year 1471, and the eleventh of his Reigne, king Edward made his entry into the City of London, ryding first to Pauls Church, and from thence to the Bishops Palace, where the Archbishop of York presented himselfe unto him, and having king Henry by the hand, delivered him to king Edward (six moneths after his readeption of the Crown) and then king Edward being seized of his person, went from Pauls to Westminster, and there gave God most hearty thanks for his safe return. The reasons alleadged here by Philip Comines for the Citizens receiving of king Edward, seeme scarce worthy of so good an Authour: one cause (saith he) was, because king Edward being extreamly indebted in the City, if they had not received him, they should have lost their debt; another, because he had won the love of many Citizens wives, who importuned their husbands to receive him.

The Earle of Warwicke having intelligence that king Edward was received into London, and king Henry delivered into his hands; marched out and encamped at St. Albans, and after some refreshing of his Army, removed towards Barnet, and in a large plaine there, called Gladmore heath, pitched his Campe; which king Edward hearing, on Easter Eve the thirteenth of April, he marched forth, and came that evening to Barnet, where he would not suffer a man of his Army to stay in the town, but commanded them all to the field, and lodged with his Army more neer to the Enemy then he was aware, by reason of a Myst, (raised some say, by one Bungey a Conjurer) which made it so darke, that it could not be well observed where they were encamped. In taking his ground, he caused his people to keep as much silence as was possible, thereby to keep the enemy from knowing of their approach. Great Artillery they had on both parts, but the Earle more then the King; and therefore in the night time, they shot from his Campe almost continually, but did little hurt, because they still overshot them, as lying neerer then was conceived. On Easter-day, early in the Morning, both Armies are ordered for battaile; The Earle of War- wick appointed the Command of the Right wing, which consisted of Horse, to his brother the Marquesse Montacute, and the Earle of Oxford; The Left wing consisting likewise of horse, was led by himselfe and the Duke of Exceter; and the main Battell consisting of Bills and Bows, was conducted by the Duke of Somerset. On the kings part, the Vaward was commanded by the Duke of Glocester; the battell (in which was king Henry) was led by king Edward himself; and the Lord Hastings brought on the Reere. After exhortations for encouragement of their Souldiers, the fight began; which with great valour was maintained by the space of six houres, without any apparent disadvantage on either side; onely the Earles Vaward, by the valiancy of the Earle of Oxford, seemed somewhat to over-match the kings; which made some flying towards London to carry news, that the Earle of Warwick had wonne the field; and he had perhaps done so indeed, but for a strange misfortune which happened to the Earle of Oxford and his men; for they having a Starre with streams on their liveries, as king Edwards men had the Sunne, the Earle of Warwicks men, by reason of the Myst, not well discerning the badges so like, shot at the Earle of Oxfords men, that were on their part: whereupon the Earle of Oxford cryed, Treason! and fled with eight hundred men. At length after great slaughter made on both sides, king Edward having the greater number of men, (as some write, though other say the contrary) caused a new power of fresh men (which he had kept of purpose) to come on: which the Earle of Warwick observing, being a man of an invincible courage, nothing dismaied, rushed into the midst of his enemies, where he adventured so farre, that amongst the preasse he was stricken down and slaine. (Though some write, that the Earle seeing the desperate estate of his Army, leapt on a horse to fly; and comming to a Wood where was no passage, one of king Edwards men came to him, killed him, and spoyled him to the naked skin.) The Marquesse Montacute, thinking to succour his brother, lost likewise his life, and left the Victory to king Edward. On both sides were slaine, as Hall saith, ten thousand at the least; Fabian saith, but fifteen huudred, but then he means onely of the kings side. Upon the kings part were slaine the Lord Cromwell, the Lord Say, the Lord Montjoyes Sonne and heire, Sir Humfry Bourchier sonne and heire to the Lord Berners, and divers other knights and gentlemen. On the Earls part were slaine, the Earle himselfe, the Marquesse Montacute, and three and twenty knights, of whom Sir William Tyrrell was one. The Duke of Somerset, and the Earle of Oxford fled into Wales, to Jasper Earle of Pembroke. The Duke of Exceter being strucken down, and so wounded that he was left for dead, amongst other the dead bodies, because he was not known; but comming to himselfe, he got up, and escaped to Westminster, and there took Sanctuary. The dead bodies of the Earle and Marquesse were brought to London in a Coffin, and by the space of three dayes lay open-faced in the Cathedrall Church of St. Paul, and then buried with their Ancestours, in the Priory of Bissam. This Earle of Warwick was Richard Nevill, sonne and heire of Richard Nevill Earle of Salisbury, who married the daughter of Richard Beauchamp the sixth Earle of Warwick, and in her right was Earle of Warwick, in his own, of Salisbury: he was also Lord Monthermer, great Chamberlaine, and high Admirall of England, Lord Warden of the North Marches towards Scotland, and high Steward of the Dutchy of Lancaster: he had issue two Daughters, Isabell married to George Duke of Clarence; and Anne, first married to Prince Edward king Henry the sixths Sonne, and after to Richard Duke of Glocester.

Wee may here observe a Constellation of disastrous influences, concurring all to the overthrow of this great Warwicke; whereof, if any one had been missing, the wheele of his fortune had perhaps not turned: For if the City of Yorke had not too credulously believed king Edwards Oath, not to disturbe king Henry; or if the Marquesse Montacute had stopped (as he might) his passage at Pomfret; or if the Duke of Clarence had not at the very point of the battell at St. Albans, deserted his party and joyned with king Edward; or if Queen Margaret had not by tempest been kept from comming into England in time; or if the Londoners had not been retrograde and deceived his expectation, he had never perhaps been overthrown as he was: But Fataviam invenient; destiny will finde waies that were never thought of, will make way where it findes none; and that which is ordained in heaven, shall be effected by means of which Earth can take no notice.

Queen Margaret, when it was too late, accompanied with John Longstrother Prior of Saint Johns, and the Lord Wenlock, with divers Knights and Esquires tooke shipping at Harflew, the foure and twentieth of March, but by tempest was kept back till the thirteenth of April; and then with her sonne Prince Edward, shee landed at Weymouth, and from thence went to an Abby hard by called Cerne, and then to Bewly in Hampshire, whither there came unto her Edmund Duke of Somerset, and Thomas Courtney Earle of Devonshire, with divers others; amongst whom, it is resolved once more to try their fortune in the field; but then the Queen would have had her sonne Prince Edward to be sent into France, there to remaine in safety, till the next battell were tryed; but they being of a contrary minde, and specially the Duke of Somerset, shee at length consented, though afterward she repented it. From Bewly she with her sonne and the Earle of Somerset passeth on to Bristow, intending with what power they could raise in Glocestershire, to march into Wales, to joyn with Jasper Earle of Pembrooke, who was there making preparation of more forces. King Edward hearing of these things, resolves to crosse this Conjunction, and followes Queen Margaret with a great Power so close, that neere Tewkesbury in Glocestershire he overtakes her forces, who resolutely turn and make head against him; where Somerset, on the Queens part, leading the Vaunt-guard, performed the part of a valiant Commander; but finding his souldiers through wearines begin to faint, and that the Lord Wenlock, who had the conduct of the battaile on the Queens part, moved no, the rode unto him, and upbrayding him with cowardise or treachery, never staid, but with his Pollaxe beat out his brains; and now before he could bring in his men to the rescue, their Vaward was routed, and John Earle of Devonshire, with above three thousand of the Queens part were slaine: The Queen her selfe, John Beaufort the Duke of Somersets brother, the Prior of Saint Johns, Sir Gervis Clifton and divers others were taken prisoners; all which except the Queen, were the next day beheaded. At which time Sir Richard Crofts presented to king Edward king Henries Son Edward, whom he had taken prisoner; to whom king Edward at first shewed no uncourteous countenance; but demanding of him, how he durst so presumptuously enter into his Realm with Arms? and he answering, though truly, yet unseasonably, To recover my Fathers Kingdome and Heritage; King Edward with his hand thrust him from him, or (as some say) strooke him with his Gantlet, and then presently George Duke of Clarence, Richard Duke of Glocester, Thomas Grey Marquesse Dorset, and William Lord Hastings standing by, fell upon him in the place, and murdred him. His body was homely interred with other ordinary Corpses, in the Church of the Monastery of the Black-fryers in Tewkesbury. After the Victory thus obtained, king Edward repaired to the Abbey Church of Tewkesbury, to give God thankes for his good successe; and finding there a great number of his enemies, that were fled thither to save themselves, he gave them all free Pardon; onely Edmund Duke of Somerset, John Longstrother Pryor of Saint Johns, Sir Thomas Tresham, Sir Gervis Clifton and divers other Knights and Esquires, who were apprehended there, and brought before the Duke of Glocester, sitting that day as Constable of England, and the Duke of Norfolk as Marshall, were all arraigned, condemned and judged to Dye, and accordingly upon the Tuesday being the seventh of May, they were all, and twelve other knights more, on a Scaffold set up in the middle of the Town, beheaded, but not dismembred, and permitted to be buried. The same day Queen Margaret was found in a poore house of Religion, not farre from thence, into which she was fled for safeguard of her life; but she was after brought to London, and there kept a Prisoner, till her Father ransomed her with great summes of money. This was the last pitcht battell that was fought in England, in king Edward the fourths dayes, which happened on the fourth of May, being Saturday, in the Eleventh yeere of his reigne, and in the yeere of our Lord 1471.

King Edward being assured, that as long as any partakers of king Henry lived and were were at liberty, he should never be free from plots against his life; sent Roger Vaughan, a Gentleman much reckoned of in his own Country, to entrape Jasper Earle of Pembrooke, who had escaped from the last encounter: but he having notice of the plot before, prevented it by striking off Vaughans head.

After these great Clouds were thus dispersed, there arose a little Cloud, which gave the Realme, at least the City of London no small disquier. For now, Thomas bastard Fauconbridge, who had been imployed by the Earle of Warwick to scowre the Seas, hearing of these defeats; having enriched himselfe by Piracy, gathered together an Army of seventeen thousand men, and comming to London, imperiously commanded admission into the City, and releasement of King Henry out of prison: but being denyed entrance, and hearing that king Edward with a great power was comming towards him, he brings up his shipping to Saint Katherines, and taking with him his most desperate men, with them he marcheth to Kingston-bridge, but finding that bridge broken down, and all the places of passage guarded, he withdrew his forces into Saint Georges field, from whence he prepared to assault the City of London; for the effecting whereof, he landed all his ship Ordinance, and planted them all alongst the Banks-side, with which he battered down many houses, and much annoyed the City; but the Citizens on the other side, lodged their great Artillery against their Adversaries, with which they so galled them, that they durst not abide in any place alongst the water side, but were driven even from their own Ordinance: Then he appointed his men to set fire on the bridge, and withall caused three thousand to passe over the Thames, and some of them to assault Aldgate, and some Bishopsgate, but were in all places, by the industry of the Citizens repelled, and chiefely by Robert Basset and Ralph Jocelyne Aldermen: Upon this he retyred to Black-heath and there encamped by the space of three dayes; but then hearing that king Edward was comming with a great Army, he got him to his ship, but the rest fled some one way, some another. The one and twentieth of May, the king comming to London, thanked the Citizens for their pains and care, and dubbed the Major, the Recorder Fitzwicke, and Basset and Jocelyne Aldermen, Knights.

And now the time was come for king Henry to be delivered out of all his troubles; for the bloody Duke of Glocester entring the Tower, where he found king Henry, nothing at all troubled with all his Crosses, struck him into the heart with his Dagger and there slew him. And now we have had within the space of half a yeer, one Parliament Proclaming king Edward an Usurper, and king Henry a lawfull king; and another Proclaming king Edward a lawfull king, & king Henry an Usurper: that we may know in humane affairs, there is nothing certaine, but uncertainty; nothing stable, but instability.

King Edward presently after the interment of king Henry, drawes his forces towards Sandwich in Kent, where some of the followers of Fauconbridge, to the number of eight or nine hundred, had in the Castle there strongly fortified themselves, but upon their asking Pardon and submitting themselves to the king, with promise to be faithfull Subjects ever after, they had their Pardon granted them, and then they delivered up both Castle and Ships to the number of thirteen, to the kings use. But how this Compositon was observed, may be imagined; when Fauconbridge who was comprised in the same Pardon, was afterward taken and executed at Southampton. Spicing and Quintine the Captaines that assailed Aldgate and Bishopsgate, and were in Sandwich Castle, at the surrender thereof; were presently beheaded at Canterbury, and their heads placed on poles, upon those gates: and by a Commission of Oyer and Terminer, many both in Essex and Kent, were arraigned and condemned for this Rebellion, and more fined.

And now king Edward, desiring to be secured from all suspected persons, sent the Archbishop of Yorke, brother to the Earle of Warwick, over to Guisnes, there to be kept in safe custody; and there he remained a long time, till at length by friendship he was delivered, and shortly after dyed. Likewise John Earle of Oxford, who after Barnet Field yeelded himselfe to king Edward, had his life pardoned; but yet was sent over sea to the Castle of Hammes, where for the space of twelve years he was was shut up in strong prison, and narrowly looked too. As for the Earles of Pembrooke and Richmond, who were fled out of the Realme, to the Duke of Britaine, king Edward sent to the Duke, requiring to have them delivered up unto him, upon promise of great rewards; to which the Duke made answer, that he could not with his honour deliver them up, whom he had taken into his Protection; but that for king Edwards sake, he would take such care of them, that he should need to take no care for them; and to that end, he sequestred their own servants from them, and appointed Britaines to attend upon them.

It was now the thirteenth year of king Edwards reigne; in which a Parliament was called at Westminster: wherein all acts formerly made by him, are confirmed or revived; and all their Lands and Goods confiscated, that had taken part against him and were fled and all their lands and goods restored to such as had taken part with him.

King Edward being destin'd to be alwayes in troubles; now that he had quietnesse at home, was drawn into new broyles abroad; for the Duke of Burgoigne at this time having warres with France, thought he could no way make a better harvest to himselfe, then by sowing seeds of dissention between France and England; and to this end, he sends Ambassadours to king Edward, to sollicite him to set on foot his Title to the Crown of France; making great offers, with Protestation to assist him in it, both with Purse and Person. This proposition being seriously debated by the Kings Privy Counsell, is at last approved of, as being both lawfull and behovefull, for the honour of the King, and good of the kingdome. Onely means to beare the charges of the warre, were wanting; to supply which by a Parliamentary course, would ask too much time: a new course therefore is devised, to procure mony from the Subject by way of Benevolence; and this course was taken.

About this time, Henry Holland Duke of Exceter and Earle of Huntington, disinherited by Act of Parliament, in the fourth yeer of this King, (though he had married King Edwards Sister; yet grew to so great misery, that passing over into Flanders, he was there forced all ragged and bare-foot to beg his bread:) was found dead, and stript naked, between Dover and Callice: but how he came to his death, no enquiry could bring to light.

Provision for this French expedition being throughly made; and order taken for the quiet government of the kingdome in his absence, and the stop of incursions, if any by the Scots should be made: King Edward with an Army of fifteen hundred men at arms, all of the Nobility and Gentry, fifteen thousand Archers on horseback, eight thousand Common souldiers, and three thousand Pioners, came down to Dover, whither the Duke of Burgoigne had sent five hundred flat bottom'd boates, to transport the Horse to Callice; yet for all that helpe, it was two and twenty dayes before the kings forces were all past over. Before the kings departure from Dover, (to the end he might not seem to surprize him) he sent an Herauld named Guyter, a Norman by birth, with a letter of Defiance to the French king, (so well written, saith Comines, that he thought it not of any English mans enditing; as though Englishmen could not endite as well as the French.) Requiring him to yeeld unto him the Crown of France, his unquestionable Inheritance; which if he should dare to deny, he would then endeavor to recover it by the Sword. This letter the French king read, & thereupon withdrawing himselfe, caused the Herauld to be brought to his presence, to whom in private he gave this answer: That the Duke of Burgoigne and the Earle of Saint Paul the Constable; (by whose instigation, he knew the king of England was drawn to this Designe) would but delude him, for that they were Dissemblers and Impostors; and therfore said, It would conduce more to the honor of the king of England to continue in League with him, though an old Adversary; then to hazard the fortune of the warres, upon the promised assistance of new-come Deceivers: and so commend me (saith he) to the king thy Master, and say what I have told thee; and then with an honourable reward of three hundred Crowns, dismist him: The Herauld promised to doe all that in him lay, and (beyond his Commission) shewed the French king wayes, (by working upon the Lords Howard and Stanley) by which he might enter into a Treaty for Peace, which he doubted not, would fort to a good Conclusion. The French king glad to hear it, gave the Herauld, besides the other reward, a piece of Crimson Velvet of thirty yards long; and withall sent to king Edward the goodlieſt Horſe he had in his Stable, as alſo an Aſſe, a Wolph, and a wilde Bore, beaſts at that time rare in England: and then the Herauld returning to Calice, delivered to king Edward the French kings anſwer.

And now to make good the French kings allegation to the Herauld; the Duke of Burgoigne, who had promiſed in the word of a Prince, to bring to Calice by this time, two thouſand Launces and foure thouſand Stradiots or light horſe, failed to come: whereupon the Lord Scales is by king Edward ſent to the Duke, to put him in minde of his promiſe, and to haſten his comming with his promiſed forces: But the journey was to little purpoſe; onely it occaſioned the Duke with a ſmall troop of horſe to come to the king, formally to excuſe himſelfe for having been ſo backward; but the cauſe (he ſaid) was, for that having been imbroiled in the ſiege of Nuz, he could not depart thence without infinite diſgrace, if neither compoſition nor ſubmiſſion were enforced; which now notwithſtanding, becauſe he would not too much trepaſſe upon his patience, he was enforced to doe, by the obſtinacy of the beſieged: but promiſed to ſupply all defects, both with his preſence and power, and that ſpeedily. The Conſtable likewiſe by his letter perſwades the king of England to proceede in the action, and not to doubt both from the Duke and himſelf, to be ſufficiently every way accommodated.

King Edward thus encouraged, paſſeth on, but in his way found no performance of promiſes, either on the Dukes or Conſtables part; for the Duke did not accommodate the ſouldiers at their comming to Peronne, with victuals or lodging in ſuch manner as was requiſite and expected; and the Conſtable inſtead of ſurrendring up Saint Quintins according to agreement, made a ſally out upon ſuch as were ſent from the king of England to take poſſeſſion, and plaid upon them with his great Ordinance, whereupon k. Edward began to ſuſpect the truth of the French k. deſcription of the Dukes and Conſtables conditions; and from thence forward ſtood upon his own guard, and gave no further credit to their Proteſtations, which the Duke of Burgoigne reſenting, pretended occaſions for the haſting forward his forces, & promiſing ſpeedy return together with them, taketh his leave and departeth, which did not a little increaſe the kings ſuſpition.

The French king having intelligence of the Duke of Burgoignes departure, forecaſting the danger, if they ſhould unite their forces; reſolved with himſelfe, to ſay what might be done to mediate a Peace in the Dukes abſence; and yet ſo to treate, that if it took not effect, he might diſclaime the knowledge of the overture: whereupon he privately diſpatcheth a meſſenger, in ſhew an Herauld; but was indeede a fellow of no office or eſtimation, and not known to any of the Kings houſhold, but to Philibert the Maſter of the Horſe, who only was acquainted with the plot and party. This counterfeit Purſuivant at Arms, with a coate made of a Trumpets Banner-rowle, addreſſed himſelf to the king of England, and upon admiſſion to his preſence, inſinuates the French Kings deſire, which was, to have Commiſſioners on both parts aſſigned, to conferre of the means to reconcile the differences between the two Kings, or at leaſt to conclude a ceſſation from arms for ſome time: And ſo well this Meſſenger delivered his errand, that it was credited, and the kings requeſt granted; and thereupon letters of ſafe conduct, are ſent of both ſides, for ſuch Commiſſioners as to this purpoſe ſhould meet at Amyens. For king Edward, came the Lord Howard, Sir Anthony Wentleger, and Doctor Morton, after made Lord Chancelour of England. For king Lewis, came the Admirall of France, the Lord Saint Pierr, and Hebert biſhop of Eureux. After long Conference, Articles of Peace were concluded of to this effect: That the French king ſhould pay preſently to the king of England, threeſcore and fifteen thouſand Crowns, and from thence forth, annually, fifty thouſand Crowns, during the life of king Edward: That within one yeare, the French king ſhould ſend for the Lady Elizabeth the king of Englands daughter, and joyn her in marriage to the Dolphin: That the Lord Howard, and Sir John Cheyney Maſter of the Horſe, Horſe, ſhould remaine in hoſtage there, till the Engliſh army had quitted France, and a generall peace for nine yeers; wherein the Dukes of Burgoigne and Brittaine, are included, if they will accept thereof: This Concluſion was the more eaſily compaſſed by the king of France his following the Heraulds Counſell; for he diſtributed fifteen thouſand Crowns amongſt king Edwards Counſellours and Favorites, two thouſand Crowns to the Lord Haſtings the kings Chamberlaine, and to the Lord Howard, Sir John Cheyney, Sir Anthony Wentleger, and Montgomery, the reſidue; beſides great ſtore of Plate and Jewels, diſtributed amongſt inferiour Officers of the Court. The Duke of Glocester onely oppoſed this accord, as not ſuiting with his deſigne; Nevertheleſſe it proceeded, and notice thereof is preſently ſent to the Duke of Burgoigne; who thereupon onely with fifteen horſe, comes poſting to the Engliſh Campe, whom king Edward perſwades to enter into the peace, according to the reſervation; but he in a great chafe, reprocacheth king Edward for entring into it himſelfe; ſaying, that his predeceſſours had by many brave exploits gotten fame and reputation upon the French; and now he had brought his ſouldiers onely to ſhew them the Country, and returne as they came; adding withall, that to make it appeare he was able without helpe of the Engliſh to ſubſiſt of himſelfe, he utterly diſclaimed any benefit by that Truce, untill three months after the Engliſh were returned to their own Country; and ſo in a great ſnuffe returned home.

For the better Confirmation of what was agreed upon between the two kings, an enterview is deſired; but before the ſame is effectuated, the French king ſends to the Engliſh army an hundred Tonne of Gaſcoigne wine, to be drunke out amongſt the private ſouldiers, and therewithall, free licence for Commanders and Gentlemen to recreate themſelves in Amyens, where they were lovingly entertained by the Burgers of the Town, by the kings expreſſe command. The place of enterview of theſe two kings is agreed on to be at Picquency, a Town three miles diſtant from Amyens, ſeated in a bottome, through which the river of Some runneth, over which a ſtrong bridge was built, and in the midſt thereof a grate made overthwart with barres, no wider under than a man might well thruſt in his arme; covered with boardes over head, to avoid the rain: foure of the Bed-chamber on both ſides, are appointed to ſearch the roome, to prevent traps or inſtruments of treachery: and being by them certified that all was cleere, the kings advance themſelves. King Edward being come in ſight of the place, made a ſtand; being told, that the circumſtance of comming firſt to the place, was a matter of great diſparagement in point of State: but the French king more regarding ſubſtance then circumſtance, gave the king of England the advantage to come at his pleaſure, and went firſt to the barre appointed for conference, and there did attend king Edwards leaſure. He had in his Company, John Duke of Alanson, with his brother the Cardinall, and eight hundred men at Arms. King Edward had with him, his brother the Duke of Clarence, the Earle of Northumberland, the Lords Chamberlaine and Chancellour, and at his backe his whole Army in battell. The kings lovingly ſalute each other, and complements of courteſie reciprocally paſſe: which finiſhed, They with their Noblemen there preſent, take an oath upon the holy Evangeliſts, in all to their power, to obſerve the Articles of Peace agreed on. After which, In private the French king importunes king Edward, that the Duke of Brittaine might be left out of theſe Articles: but after much ſuing to that purpoſe, king Edward gave his reſolute anſwer, that if king Lewis affected the friendſhip of England, he ſhould not moleſt the Duke of Brittaine: for that he was reſolved, at any time to come in perſon to relieve him, if he were diſturbed. King Edward pretended the many kindneſſes he had formerly received of the Duke of Brittaine: but it was conceived, that the deſire of compaſſing the caſtles of Guerand and Penthroke, now in the Duke of Brittaines Country, were the greateſt motives of his ſtanding ſo firmely for him. The money to be payd to king Edward by the Articles, is accordingly payd; and thereupon the French Hoſtages are delivered, and the Engliſh Army retires to Calice, and from thence is tranſported into England: and then the Engliſh Hoſtages are likewiſe delivered. This Peace was ſaid to be made only by the holy Ghoſt, becauſe on the day of meeting, a white Dove came came and ſate upon the king of Englands Tent: though the Dukes of Glocester and Burgoigne thought it was made by no good ſpirit.

King Edward being returned into England, had his minde running ſtill upon the danger that might grow from the Earle of Richmond: he therefore diſpatched D. Stillington and two other his Ambaſſadors to the Duke of Britaine, to ſend him over to him, under this ſubtle pretence, that he meant to match him in mariage with the Lady Cicille his younger daughter; and withall, ſent alſo no ſmall ſtore of Angels to ſpeake for him: which ſo prevailed with the Duke, that he delivered the Earle of Richmond to the Ambaſſadors, who conducted him thence to Saint Malos, where whil'ſt they ſtayed for a winde, the young Earle, by the cunning plotting of Peter Landois the Dukes Treaſurer (more out of ſcorne that he was not gratified by the Engliſh Ambaſſadour to the proportion of his place, than for any love to the Earle) eſcapes into Sanctuary; from whence neither prayers nor promiſes could get him out: Nevertheleſſe, upon Peter Landois his promiſe he ſhould be ſafely kept there, the Ambaſſadors departed, and returned home, acquainted K. Edward with the Duke of Burgoignes courteſie in delivering him, and their own negligence in ſuffering him to eſcape, onely making amends with the promiſe of Peter Landois; which might be to K. Edward ſome contentment, but was no ſatisfaction.

At Chriſtmas following, being the ſixteenth yeere of his Reigne, he created his eldeſt ſonne Edward, Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Cheſter: his ſecond ſonne he made Duke of Yorke; giving the order of knighthood to the ſonne and heire of the Earle of Lincolne, and many others. He created alſo foure and twenty knights of the Bath, whereof Brian Chiefe Juſtice, and Littleton a Judge of the Common Pleas, were two.

About this time, there were two examples of ſeverity ſeene; not unworthy the relating, if but onely to make us ſee how dangerous a thing it is Ludere cum ſanctis, to ſpeake words that may be taken as reflecting upon the king. The firſt was of one Walter Walker, a wealthy Citizen, dwelling at the ſigne of the Crown in Cheapſide: This man one day when his childe cryed, bid him be quiet, and he would make him heire of the Crowne: which words being ſubject to interpretation, he was called in queſtion about them, arraigned, condemned, and put to death. The other was of Thomas Burdet of Arrow in Warwickſhire Eſquire: It happened that K. Edward hunted in his Parke, he being from home; and there killed a white Buck, whereof Mr. Burdet made ſpeciall account: ſo as comming home, and finding that Buck killed, he wiſhed it hornes and all in his belly that had counſelled the king to kill it: and becauſe none counſelled the King to kill it but himſelfe; it was thought thoſe words were not ſpoken without a malignant reflecting upon the King: and thereupon Burdet was arraigned and condemned, drawne to Tiburne, and there beheaded: though Markham then Chiefe Juſtice, choſe rather to loſe his place, than aſſent to the Judgement.

And now began ambition to boyle in Richard Duke of Glocester; whereof the firſt heate fell upon his brother the Duke of Clarence, how to rid him out of the way; to which end, he ſeeks to raiſe jealouſies in King Edwards head againſt him, telling him, that ſome of Clarences his followers were Sorcerers and Necromancers, and had given forth ſpeeches, that one whoſe name begun with G. ſhould diſinherit his Children and get the Crown: and for a colour of this ſuggeſtion, one of the Duke of Clarence his ſervants, who came with him out of Ireland, from Dublin, where the Duke was born; is in his Maſters abſence, by the procurement underhand of the Duke of Glocester, indicted, arraigned, condemned and executed at Tyburne for a Conjurer, and all within the ſpace of two dayes: and the Duke of Glocester, to make ſhew that he had no hand in this fellows death, ſet on the Duke of Clarence to complaine of it to King Edward, and in the mean time finds matter, at leaſt colour of matter, to make him be committed to the Tower; and then againe, to make ſhew he had no hand in his impriſonment, bids him be of good cheere, for it ſhould not be long ere he would ſee him releaſed: and he kept his word; for not long after, by his procurement, he was drowned in a But of Malmeſey, (and this was his releaſement) and then then laid in his bed, to make the people believe that he died of diſcontent; whoſe death, King Edward though perhaps conſenting to it, ſo much reſented, that afterwards when he was ſued unto for any mans Pardon, he would ſighing break out into ſuch words: Oh unfortunate brother! for whoſe life not one man would open his mouth. Being dead, he was buried at Tewkesbury in Glocesterſhire, by the body of his Dutcheſſe, who great with childe, dyed of Poyſon a little before.

It was now the two and twentieth yeere of King Edwards Reigne, when James King of Scotland ſent Ambaſſadors to treate of a Mariage between his eldeſt ſonne James Duke of Rothſay, and Cicely king Edwards ſecond daughter. This overture for a March, was by the king and his Councell readily imbraced, and a great part of the Portion was delivered to the Scots, with this Proviſo, That if the mariage did not proceed, the Provoſt and Merchants of Edenbourgh ſhould be bound to repay it againe. But the Scotiſh king, who had other fantaſies in his head, and would take counſell of none but his owne will, and diverted alſo perhaps by the king of France; not onely dallyed the proceeding in the match, but affronted thoſe of the Nobility that perſwaded him to it; in ſo much that his Brother the Duke of Albany was enforced to abandon the Country, and to flie for refuge into England: by whom king Edward being informed of king James his fickle diſpoſition, was ſo much incenſed, that under the conduct of the Duke of Glocester, accompanied with the Duke of Albany, he ſent an Army of twenty thouſand againſt Scotland; who in their way took in Barwick, and beſieged the Caſtle; which being reſolutely defended by the Earle Bothwell, the Duke left the Lord Stanley to continue the ſiege, whil'ſt he, with the reſt of the Army, marched towards Edenbourgh; where within the Caſtle of Mynes, king James had immur'd himſelfe. But the Nobility of Scotland, ſeeing the danger they were in, endeavoured by humble ſubmiſſion, to procure a peace, at leaſt a ceſſation from war; which with much importunity they obtained, upon theſe Conditions: That full ſatisfaction ſhould be preſently given, for all dammages ſuſtained by the late incurſions: That the Duke of Albany ſhould be fully reſtored to grace and place, with an abolition of all diſcontents between his brother king James and him: That the Caſtle of Barwicke, (which had been now out of the Poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, one and twenty yeers) ſhould immediately be ſurrendred into the Generals hands; and from thence no reduction of that or the Town attempted: That all ſuch ſummes of money as upon the propoſition of the marriage, had been delivered, ſhould be repaid. All which, except the firſt Article, were accordingly performed.

When this buſines with Scotland was indifferently accomodated; King Edward receives intelligence from his Ambaſſadour-Leidger in France, that the French King not only denied the payment of the annuall Tribute of fifty thouſand crowns, agreed upon and ſworn to upon the ratification of the late concluded Peace; but had alſo married the Dolphin of France to the Lady Margaret, daughter of Maximilian Sonne of the Emperour; which ſo much incenſed K. Edward, that he reſolves to revenge it; and by the adviſe of his Counſell, open warre was preſently Proclaimed againſt France: but whil'ſt King Edward is making preparation, and intentive to the buſines, he is attached by the hand of death; and upon the ninth of April, in the yeer 1483, at Weſtminſter ended this mortall life.

Of his Taxations.

IN his ſecond yeer, he ſent his Privy Seale through England, to move men to give him a certaine ſumme of money towards reſiſting the Scots, which was granted and given liberally. In his ſeventh yeer, in a Parliament at Weſtminſter, were reſumed all manner of gifts, which the King had given, from the firſt day he tooke poſſeſſion of the Realm, to that time. In his eighth yeer, at a Parliament, were granted two Fifteens and a Demy. In his thirteenth yeer, a Parliament was holden, wherein, a Subſidie was granted; and the yeer following, towards warre to be undertaken in France, a new way of raiſing money is deviſed, called a Benevolence, by which great great summes of money were gotten of the Subject: and it is not unworthy the relating, what an old rich Widdow at this time did; whom King Edward, amongst others having called before him, merrily asked, what she would willingly give him towards his great charges? By my troth (quoth shee) for thy lovely countenance, thou shalt have even twenty pounds. The King looking scarce for half that summe, thanked her, and lovingly kist her; which so wrought with the old widdow, that she presently swore, he should have twenty pound more, and payd it willingly. Not long before his death, he was by ill Counsellours put upon a distastefull course for raysing of mony; which was, by fining men for delinquencies against Penall Statutes: by which course some money was gathered; but before it came to full execution, he dying, that also dyed with him.

Of his Lawes and Ordinances.

IN his fourth yeer, he newly devised the Coyne both of Gold and Silver, as at this day it is; the Gold, he named Royals and Nobles; the Silver, Groats and half Groats: the new Groate weighing scantly three pence; and the Noble of six shillings eight pence, appointed to goe for eight shillings foure pence. In his fifth yeer, it was Proclamed in England, that the Beakes or Pykes of Shooes and Boots, should not passe two Inches, upon paine of Cursing by the Clergie, and forfeiting twenty shillings, to be paid one noble to the King, another to the Cordwayners of London, and the third to the Chamber of London; and for other Countries and Towns the like order was taken. Before this time, and since the yeer 1382. the Pykes of Shooes and Bootes were of such length, that they were faine to be tyed up to the Knees with chaines of Silver and gilt, or at least with silken laces.

Affaires of the Church in his time.

IN this Kings time, the Jubile which was before but every fiftieth yeer, was by Pope Sixtus the fourth, brought to be every five and twenty yeer. Also, where before this time, the Scottish Bishops had no Merropolitane, but the Bishop of Yorke was Metropolitane and Primate of Scotland; now in this Kings time, Pope Sixtus appointed the Bishop of Saint Andrews to be Metropolitane of Scotland, who had twelve Bishops under his obedience.

Of Workes of Piety done in his time.

THIS King laid the foundation of the new Chappell at Windsor, and his Queen Elizabeth founded the Queens Colledge in Cambridge, and endowed it with large Possessions. About his fifteenth yeere, Doctor Woodlarke Provost of Kings Colledge in Cambridge, Founded Katherine-hall there. In his seventeenth yeer, the Wall of the City of London, from Cripplegate to Bishopsgate, was builded at the charges of the Citizens, also Bishopsgate it selfe was new built by the Merchants Almans of the Styliard. Also in this yeere dyed Sir John Crosby Knight, late Major of London, who gave to the repairing of the Parish-Church of St. Helens in Bishopsgate-street, where he was buried, 500 Marks: to the repairing of the parish Church of Hesworth in Middlesex, forty pounds: to the repairing of London-wall, an hundred pounds: to the repairing of Rochester-bridge, ten pounds: to the Wardens and Commonalty of the Grocers in London, two large Pots of silver chased halfe gilt, and other Legacies. About this time also, Richard Rawson one of the Sheriffs of London, caused an house to be builded in the Church-yard of St. Mary-Hospitall without Bishopsgate, where the Major and Aldermen use to sit and heare the Sermons in Easter-holy-daies. In his nintereenth yeere, William Tailour Major of London, gave to the City certaine Tenements; for the which the City is bound to pay for ever, at every Fifteene granted to the King, for all such as shall dwell in Cordwainers-street-ward, sessed at twelve-pence apiece, or under. And about the same time, one Thomas Ilam Sheriffe Sheriffe of London, builded at his own costs the great Conduit in Cheapside. In his three and twentieth yeere, Edmund Shaw Goldsmith, who had been Major of London, at his own costs re-edified Cripplegate in London, which gate in old time had been a Prison.

Of Casualties happening in his time.

IN his third yeare, the Minster of Yorke, and the Steeple of Christs Church in Norwich were burnt. In his seventeenth yeere, so great a Pestilence reigned in England, that it swept away more people in foure moneths, than the Warres had done in fifteen yeeres past. Also in his nintereenth yeere was another Pestilence; which beginning in the later end of September, continued till the beginning of November twelve-moneth following, in which space of time innumerable people dyed.

KIng Edward had been contracted to Eleanor daughter of John Talbot Earle of Shrewsbury, maried after to Sir Thomas Butler Baron of Sudely: but he maried Elizabeth the widdow of Sir John Grey, daughter of Richard Woodvile by his wife Jaqueline Dutchesse of Bedford: she lived his wife eighteene yeeres and eleven moneths; by whom he had three sonnes and seven daughters. Edward his eldest sonne, borne in the Sanctuary at Westminster: Richard his second sonne, borne at Shrewsbury: George his third sonne, borne also at Shrewsbury, but dyed a childe. Elizabeth his eldest daughter, promised in mariage to Charles Dolphin of France; but maried afterward to King Henry the Seventh: Cicely his second daughter, promised in mariage to James Duke of Rothsay, Prince of Scotland; but was maried afterward to John Viscount Wells, whom she outlived, and was againe re-maried, but by neither husband had any issue: she lyeth buried at Quarene in the Isle of Wight. Anne his third daughter was maried to Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke, Earle Marshall, and High Treasurer of England; by whom she had two sonnes, both dying without issue: she lyeth buried at Framingham in Norfolk. Bridget his fourth daughter, borne at Eltham in Kent, became a Nunne in the Nunnery of Dartford in Kent, which king Edward had founded. Mary his fifth daughter, was promised in mariage to the King of Denmarke, but dyed in the Tower of Greenwich, before it could be solemnized: she lyeth buried at Windsor. Margaret his sixth daughter, dyed an Infant. Katherine his seventh daughter, was maried to William Courtney Earle of Devonshire; to whom she bare Lord Henry, who by King Henry the eighth was created Marquesse of Exeter.

Concubines he had many, but three specially; and would use to say, that he had three Concubines, who in their severall properties excelled: One, the merriest; another, the wyliest; the third, the holyest harlot in his Realme; as one whom no man could lightly get out of the Church to any place, unlesse it were to his bed: The other two were greater personages than are fit to be named: but the merriest was Shores wife; in whom therefore he tooke speciall pleasure: This woman was borne in London, worshipfully descended. and well maried: but when the King had abused her, anon her husband (as he was an honest man, and did know his good, not presuming to touch a Kings Concubine) left her up to him altogether.

By these he had naturall issue; Arthur sirnamed Plantagenet, (whose mother, as is supposed, was the Lady Elizabeth Lucy) created Viscount Lisle, by King Henry the Eight, at Bridewell in London: And Elizabeth, who was maried to Sir Thomas Lumley knight; to whom she bare Richard, afterward Lord Lumley, from whom the late Lord Lumley did descend.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was (saith Comines) the goodliest Personage that ever mine eyes beheld; exceeding tall of stature, faire of complexion, and of most Princely presence:

and we may truly say, he was of full age before he came to one and twenty; for being but eighteen yeeres old when his Father dyed, he sued out his livery presently: so as he began the race of his fortune just like Augustus Cæsar, each of them at the same age succeeding an Ancestour after a violent death; and each of them left to set on a roofe, where but onely a foundation was laid before. For his conditions, he was of an erected composure both of body and minde, but something sagging on the Flesh-ward side; and never any man that did marry for Love, did so little love Marriage; for he tooke as much pleasure in other mens wives as in his owne. He was never more confident, than when he was in danger; nor ever more doubtfull, than when he was secure. Of the foure Cardinall vertues, Fortitude and Prudence were in him naturall; Temperance and Justice, but to serve his turne. He was politick even to irreligion; for to compasse his ends, he would not stick to sweare what he never meant. Yet he was Religious beyond Policy; for before Battailes, he used to make his Prayers to God; after Victories, to give him Thanks. He was farre from being proud, yet very ambitious; and could use familiarity, and yet reteine Majestie. He was a great Briber; and what he could not get by force, he would by Rewards; as much as what he could not get by Battery, he would by Mines. He was too credulous of Reports, which made him be in errour, sometimes to the hurt of himselfe, oftentimes of others. He had made the White Rose to flourish as long as Henry the Fourth made the Red, if he had not made it change colour with too much blood. He had been fortunate in his children, if he had not been unfortunate in a brother: but he was well enough served, that would thinke a Wolfe could ever be a good Shepheard. He had an excellent art in improving his favours; for he could doe as much with a small courtesie, as other men with a great benefit: And that which was more, he could make advantage of disadvantages; for he got the love of the Londoners by owing them money; and the good will of the Citizens by lying with their wives.

Of his Death and Buriall.

WHether it began from his minde, being extreamely troubled with the injurious dealing of the King of France; or from his body, by intemperance of dyet, to which he was much given; he fell into a sickneſſe, (some say a Catarche, some a Feaver) but into a sickneſſe whereof he dyed. In the time of which sickneſſe, & at the very point of his death, Sir Thomas Moore makes him to make a speech to his Lords; which I might thinke to be the speech of a sick man, if it were not so sound, and of a weake man, if it were not so long: but it seemes, Sir Thomas Moore delivers rather what was fit for him to say, than what he sayd; the Contents being onely, to exhort his Lords, whom he knew to be at variance, to be in love and concord amongst themselves; for that, the welfare of his children, whom he must now leave to their care, could not otherwise be preserved but by their agreement. And having spoken to this purpose as much as his weaknes would suffer him, he found himselfe sleepy; and turning on one side, he fell into his long sleep, the ninth of April, in the yeere 1483. when he had lived one and forty yeeres, Reigned two and twenty and one moneth; and was buried at Windsor, in the new Chappell, whose foundation himselfe had laid.

Of men of Note in his time.

MEN of valour in his time were many, but himselfe the chiefest, the rest may be observed in reading his story. For men of letters, we may have leave at this time to speake of some strangers, having been men of extraordinary fame; as Johannes de Monte Regio, Purbachius and Blanchinus, all great Astronomers; Ludovicus Pontanus, Paulus Castrensis, and Anthonius Rossellanus, all great Lawyers; Servisanus, Savanarola, and Barzizius, all great Phisitians; Bessarion and Cusanus, both great Cardinalls; Argyropole, Philelphus, Datus, Leonardus Aretinus, and Poggius, all great men in humane literature. And of our own Countrimen; John Harding an Esquire, borne in the North parts, who wrote a Chronicle in English verse, and among other speciall points therein touched, hath gathered all the Submissions and Homages made by the Scottish kings, even from the dayes of King Athelstan: whereby it may evidently appeare, how the Scottish kingdome, even in manner, from the first Establishing thereof here in Britaine, hath been appertaining unto the Kings of England, and holden of them as their chiefe and superiour Lords. Julian Berners, a Gentlewoman of excellent gifts, who wrote certaine Treatises of Hawking and Hunting, also a book of the Lawes of Armes, and knowledge pertaining to Heralds. John Fortescue a Judge, and Chancellour of England, who wrote divers Treatises concerning the Law and Politick Government. Rochus Charterhouse-Monk born in London, who wrote divers Epigrams. Walter Hunt a Carmelite Fryer, who for his excellent learning, was sent from the whole body of the Realme, to the Generall Counsell holden first at Ferrara, and after at Florence; by Pope Eugenius the fourth; where (among others) he disputed with the Grekes in defence of the Order and Ceremonies of the Latine Church. William Caxton, who wrote a Chronicle called Fructus Temporum, and an Appendix unto Trevisa, besides divers other bookes and translations. John Milverton, a Carmelite Frier of Bristow, and provinciall of his Order, who because he defended such of his Order as preached against endowments of the Church with Temporall possessions, was committed to prison in the Castle of Saint Angelo in Rome, where he continued three yeers. David Morgan a Welshman, who wrote of the Antiquities of Wales, and a description of the Country. John Tiptoft, a nobleman born, who wrote divers Treatises, but lost his head in the yeer 1471. Robert Hugon born in Norfolk, who wrote certaine vaine Propheſies. Thomas Norton born in Bristow, an Alchymist. Scogan a learned Gentleman, and a Student for a time in Oxford, who for his pleasant wit and merry conceits, was called to Court. But most worthy of all to be remembred, Thomas Littleton a reverend Judge of the Common Pleas, who brought a great part of the Law into a Method, which lay before confusedly dispersed, and his book called Littletons Tenures.

THE REIGNE OF KING EDWARD THE FIFTH.

KING Edward the Fourth being dead, his eldest Sonne Edward, scarce yet eleven yeers old, succeeded in the kingdome, but not in the Crowne; for he was Proclaimed king, but never Crowned: and indeed it may not so properly be called the Reigne of Edward the fifth, as the Tyranny of Richard the Third, for from the time of king Edwards death, though not in Name, yet in effect he not onely ruled as king, but raged as a Tyrant. Prince Edward when his Father dyed, was at Ludlow in Wales, where he had lived some time before, the better by his presence, to keep the Welsh in awe; He had about him of his Mothers kindred many; but Sir Anthony Woodvile, the Earle Rivers his Uncle, was appointed his chiefe Counsellour and directour. The Duke of Glocester was at this time in the North, but had word presently sent him, from the Lord Hastings Lord Chamberlaine, of his brother king Edwards death; who acquainted him withall, that by his Will, he had committed the young king, his Queen and other children, to his care and government; and thereupon putting him in minde, how necessary it was for him speedily to repaire to London: But the Duke of Glocester needed no spurre to set him forward, who was already in a full carriere; for he had long before projected in his minde, how he might come to atraine the Crown; and now he thought the way was made him. For as it is said, the very night in which king Edward dyed, one Miffelbrooke, long ere morning, came in great haste to the house of one Potter dwelling in Red-crosse-streete without Cripplegate; where he shewed unto Potter, that king Edward was departed: to whom Potter answered, By my troth man, then will my Master the Duke of Glocester be king: what cause he had so to thinke, is hard to say; but surely it is not likely he spake it of nought. And now the young king was comming up to London with a strong guard, partly to make a first expression of his greatnesse, and partly to oppose any disorders that might be offered. But the Duke of Glocester finding this proceeding like to be a rub in his way, at least not fit for his designes, he presently fals to undermining; writes most loving letters to the Queen, protesting all humble and faithfull service to the king and her, but withall perswading her, that this great guard about the king might be presenly dismissed; which did but minister matter of suspition, and would be apt to breed new jealousies in them who were now throughly reconciled. The Queen of a nature easie to be wrought upon, gives credit to his glozing letters; and thereupon upon sends in all haste to her Sonne, and to her brother the Lord Rivers; requiring them by all meanes, for some causes to her known, to dismisse their guard, (not considering by whose advice she writ them; which if she had done, they would never have done) but now upon her letters, they presently did; and came forward with only a sober company. And now is Glocester as first not done, but he knowing that the worke yet behinde was too great to be done by himselfe alone, gets the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Hastings, two of the greatest men of power at that time in the kingdome, to joyn with him in opinion, that it was not fit the Queens kindred should be so wholly about the king, and others of better blood and neer to be estranged from him; and therefore by all means, first endeavour to remove them: to which the Duke of Buckingham is easily wrought, upon a promise to have the Earledome of Hartford conferred upon him: and the Lord Hastings not hardly, upon a hope by this means to cut off many, whom in king Edwards daies he had justly offended. And now another great worke was done; It remaines in the next place, to put it in execution, which was presently thus effected: The young king had been at Northampton, and from thence was gone to Stonystratford, whither the two Dukes of Glocester and Buckingham arrived; but pretending the Town to be too little for the entertainment of their Companies, they went back to Northampton, and alighted at the same Inne where the Earle Rivers had taken up his lodging for that night, intending the next morning early to overtake the king. Upon this their accidentall meeting, great shews of courtesie passed between them; and supper ended, the Dukes pretending wearines, retire to their lodgings, the Earle to his, but the Dukes being entred into their Chambers, enter into consultation with their private friends, in which they spent a great part of the night, and then secretly get the keyes of the Inne gates, suffering none to passe either in or out; whereof the Earle having notice by his Host, though he suspected the worst, yet letting a good countenance upon the matter, and trusting to his own Innocency, he boldly went to the Duke of Glocesters Chamber, where he found the Duke of Buckingham and the rest closely set in counsell; with whom he expostulates the reason of this course, to imprison him in his Inne against his will? but they in stead of answer, command presently to lay hands on him, charging him with many crimes, whereof themselves were onely guilty: And then taking order for his safe imprisonment, they speedily took horse, and came to Stonistratford, at such time as the king was taking horse, whom in all reverent manner they saluted: but presently in the kings presence, a quarrell is picked against the Lord Richard Grey, the kings halfe-brother: The Duke of Buckingham making relation to the king, that he and the Marquesse his brother, with the Earle Rivers the Queens brother, had endeavoured and almost effected to draw to themselves the whole mannaging the affaires of the kingdome, and to set variance between the Peeres of the Realme: and particularly, that the Lord Marquesse without any warrant, had taken out of the Tower of London both Treasure and Armour, to a great quantity; but to what purpose, though they were ignorant, yet there was just cause to suspect it was to no good end: And therefore it was thought expedient by the advise of the Nobility, to arrest him at Northampton, to have him forth-comming to make his answer for these and many other his over-bold actions; The king unable to sound the depth of these plots, mildly said unto him: What my brother Marquesse hath done, I cannot say; but for my Uncle and his other here, I dare answer, that they are innocent of any unlawfull practises either against me or you. Oh (saith the Duke of Buckingham) that hath been their cunning, to keep their treachery from your Graces knowledge: and thereupon hastily in the kings presence, they arrested the Lord Richard, Sir Thomas Vaughan, Sir Richard Hall, and brought the king and all his company back to Northampton, putting away all his old servants, and placing in their rooms creatures of their own, whom they had power to command. At which dealing, the young king wept, but it booted nothing; and to colour the matter, the Duke of Glocester at dinner, sent a dish from his own table to the Lord Rivers, bidding him be of good cheer, for all should be well: but the Lord Rivers thanking the Duke, prayed the Messenger to carry it to the Lord Richard, with the same message for his comfort, as one to whom such adversity was strange; but as for himselfe, he had all his dayes been acquainted with it, and therefore could the better beare it. But for all this comfortable courtesie of the Duke of Glocester, he sent the Lord Rivers, and the Lord Richard, with Sir Thomas Vaughan into the North Country, into divers places to prison, and afterward to Pomfret, where in Conclusion they were all beheaded.

And now the Duke of Glocester having thus gotten the custody of the King, set forwards toward London, giving out by the way, that the Marquesse and the Queens kindred had plotted the destruction of the king, and of all the antient Nobility of the Realme, and to alter the Government of the Commonwealth; and that they were onely imprisoned to be brought to their tryall according to Law: and the better to settle these suggestions in the apprehension of the Vulgar, they brought along with them divers Carts laden with Armour, (of their own providing) with Dryfats and great Chests, wherein they reported to be treasure for the payment of souldiers; with which they so possest the common people, that all was believed for truth which was thus rumored: But the finest devise of all was, to have five of the Duke of Glocesters instruments manacled and pinioned like Traytors; and these in every place where the King lodged, to be dispersed and given out to be men of great birth, drawn into this vile plot of Treason by the Queens brother; who must seem to be penitent for their offence, and to confesse their own guilt: and this devise continued acting till the king came to London, where their visards were pull'd off, and the disguise was soon discovered.

The Queen in the mean time having intelligence of these dolefull accidents, and fearing there were worse to follow, with her second Son and five Daughters takes Sanctuary at Westminster: and the young king hearing of these things, with teares and sighes expressed his griefe; but the Dukes making Protestation of their fidelity, and care of his safety, seemed onely to mervaile why he should be melancholy.

At this time a messenger came from the Lord Chamberlaine, to the Archbishop of Yorke Lord Chancellour of England, to signifie to him, that there was no feare of any thing, for that he assured him all should be well. Well (quoth the Archbishop) be it as well as it will; I assure him, It will never be so well as we have seen it. And thereupon, presently after the messengers departure, he calleth up his servants (being then in the night) and taking the great Seale with him, came before day to the Queen, whom he found sitting alone aloe on the Rushes, all desolate and dismaied; whom he comforted the best he could, assuring her that if they Crowned any king but her Sonne whom they had with them, he would presently after Crown his brother whom she had with her; and therewithall delivering to her the great Seale, departed: but soon after, bethinking himselfe better, he thought he had done too rashly, to deliver the great Seale to the Queen; and therefore sent for it againe, and had it delivered him; yet shortly after reproved for delivering it, by the Counsell Table, he had it taken from him, which was then delivered to Doctor Russell Bishop of Lincolne, the most learned man of that time.

And now the Duke of Glocester so respectively carries himselfe towards the King, with so much shew of care and faithfulnes, that by a generall consent of the Counsell he is appointed and established Protectour of the king and kingdome; and by this means he hath the king in his custody: It remains now how to get his brother the Duke of Yorke, for without having both, he were as good (as to his purpose) have neither: and to effect this, he makes the Effect to become a Cause: for where by his undue dealings he had made the king Melancholy, he now makes that Melancholy a cause to require his brothers company to make him merry; and therefore wishes some course may be taken, either by perswasion or otherwise, to procure the Queen to send the Duke of Yorke to keep his brother the king company: Here the Archbishop of Yorke the Lord Cardinall, the man thought most fit to be sent in this imployment, riseth up and saith, He would doe his best endeavour to perswade her; but if he could not, he then thought it was not to be attempted against her will, for that it would turn to the high displeasure of God, if the priviledge of that holy place should now be broken, which had so many yeers inviolably been kept, which both Kings and Popes so good had granted, so many had confirmed, and which hoping grew more then five hundred yeers agoe, by Saint Peter in his own person, accompanied with great numbers of Angels, by night so specially hallowed and dedicated to God; and for proof whereof, there is yet in the Abby Saint Peters Cope to show: that from that time hitherward, there never was so undevout a King that durst violate the sacred place, nor so holy a Bishop that durst presume to Consecrate it: and therefore (saith he) God forbid, that any man for any earthly thing, should enterprise to breake the Immunity and liberty of that sacred Sanctuary; and I trust with Gods grace, we shall not need it, at least my endeavours shall not be wanting; if the Mothers dread and womanish feare be not the let. Womanish feare, nay womanish frowardnes (quoth the Duke of Buckingham) for I dare take it upon my Soule, she well knoweth there is no need of any feare, either for her Sonne or for herselfe: and prosecuting his discourse, declareth at large, that as there was no just cause for the Queen to keep her Sonne, so there was great cause for them to require him; and that for breach of Sanctuary in this case there could be none; for that he had often heard of Sanctuary men, but never heard of Sanctuary children. And to this purpose having spoken much, It was all assented to by the Lords that were present, and with this instruction is the Archbishop (upon whom the Queen specially relyed) sent unto her; who after humble salutations, acquaints her with his message, earnestly perswading her not to oppose the Lord Protectours request, and giving her many reasons, first that she ought not, and then that she could not keep him in Sanctuary: she answered all his reasons, though with great mildeneſſe, yet with great eatnestnes; so as the Archbishop finding little hope to prevaile with her by perswasion, turns the tenour of his speech another way; telling her plainly, that if she did not consent to send her Sonne, he doubted some sharper course would speedily be taken. This warning sank so deep into the Queens minde, that after a little pausing, taking her Sonne by the hand, she said, My Lord Archbishop, here he is, for my own part I will never deliver him; but if you will needs have him, Take him, and at your hands I will require him; and therewith weeping bitterly, Deer childe (saith she) let me kisse thee before we part, God knows whether ever we shall meet againe; and so the childe weeping as fast as she, went along with the Archbishop to the Starchamber, where the Lord Protectour and other Lords had staid all the while looking for his comming back: and as soone as he was entred the roome, the Protectour spying the childe, riseth up and embraceth him saying, Deere Nephew, Now welcome with all my heart: next to my Soveraigne Lord your brother, nothing gives me so much contentment as your Presence: and we may believe him, he spake as he thought; for now he had the prey which he so much desired. A few dayes after, pretending to have them lodged in a place of more security, untill the distempers of the Commonwealth might better be quieted; he caused them in great pompe and state to be conveyed through London to the Tower, there at pleasure to remaine, till the time of Coronation; whereof there was great shew of preparation made.

But now the great work is to be done; the Princes are to be made away: and how to have it done, Hoc opus, hic labor est: there must be potent Instruments; and none so potent as the Duke of Buckingham; and he, by a match to be concluded betwixt their children, and an equall partition of the Treasure of the Realme betwixt them two; not onely is drawne to condiscend, but is most forward to contrive and plot stratagems to effect it. The first rub in the way was the Lord Hastings; who being found so firm to his old Masters King Edwards sons, that nothing could remove him, it was fit to remove him out of the way; which was done in this manner: All the Lords of the Privy Councell, in the Protectors name, are convoked to the Tower; where sitting preparations for the Coronation of the young King are proposed; untill the Protectour came in; who taking his chaire, very affably saluted them, merrily jesting with some, and more than ordinarily pleasant with them all: when after a little talke, he said to the Bishop of Ely; My Lord, I heare you have very good Strawberries at your Garden in Holborne; I pray let us have a messe of them. Most gladly (said the Bishop) and presently sent for some: and then the Protectour rising up, prayed the Lords to spare his absence a little; and so departed. Within the space of an houre he returned, but so changed in countenance, and with such inward perturbations, which with sighings and other passionate gestures he expressed so, that it made them all to mervaile. After long silence (the better to prepare them to the more attention) he confusedly interrogates: What they deserved that nefariously had practised his destruction? This unexpected interrogation strooke such amazement amongst the Lords, that they all sate gazing on one another, and were, as it were, stricken dumbe: At length the Lord Hastings, by Buckingham's instigation, as one presuming of his intimacy with the Protector, boldly answered, That they deserved the punishment of Traytors; which all the rest by their silence approved: whereat the Protectour riseth up, and with a sterne looke upon the Lord Hastings, replyed: Why it is the old sorceresse my brothers widow, and her partner that common Strumpet Jane Shore, that have by incantation conspired to bereave me of my life; and though by Gods grace I have escaped the end of their malice, yet see the mischiefe they have done me; for behold (and then he bared his left arme to the elbow, and shewed it) how they have caused this deare limbe of mine to wither, and grow useless; and so should all my body have been served, if they might have had their will a little longer. Those to whom the Queenes religious courses were not unknown, and who knew his withered arme to have been such from his birth, sate gazing one upon another, not knowing what to thinke or say; untill the Lord Hastings, thinking thereby to leave all blame upon the Queen, and excuse his Paramour Mistris Shore, (whom ever since the death of King Edward, he had entertained for his bed-fellow, and had but that morning parted from her) with a sober looke submissely said, If the Queene have conspired---: which word was no sooner out of the Lord Hastings mouth, when the Protectour clapping his hand upon the boord, and frowningly looking upon him, said: Tellest thou me of If & And? I tell thee, They, and none but they have done it; and thou thy selfe art partaker of the villany. Who I my Lord, quoth he? yea Thou traytor, quoth the Protectour; and therewith, upon a watch-word given, those prepared before for that purpose, in the outer Chamber, cryed, Treason, Treason! when presently a great number of men in arms came rushing in as it were to guard the Protectour; one of which with a Pollax strook a maine blow at the Lord Stanley and wounded him on the head; and had slain him outright, if he had not avoided the stroake by slipping backward, and falling down to the ground. Forthwith the Protectour arrested the Lord Hastings of high Treason; and wisht him to make haste to be Confessed, for he swore by S. Paul (his usuall Oath) that he would not touch bread nor drinke till his head were off. It booted not to ask, why? for he knew the Protectours actions were not to be examined. So he was led forth unto the Greene before the Chappell within the Tower, where his head was laid downe upon a long logge of Tymber, and there strucken off. His body afterward with his head were interred at Windsor, beside the body of King Edward. In this mans death we may see how inevitable the blowes of Destiny are: for the very night before his death, the Lord Stanley sent a secret messenger to him at midnight, in all the haste, to acquaint him with a Dreame hee had, in which he thought that a Bore with his tusks so goared them both by the heads, that the blood ran about their shoulders: and for-as-much as the Protectour gave the Bore for his Cognisance, this Dreame made so fearefull an impression in his heart, that he was throughly resolved to stay no longer; and had made his horse ready, requiring the Lord Hastings to goe with him, and that presently, to be out of danger, before it should be day. But the Lord Hastings answered the messenger: Good Lord! leaneth your Master so much to such trifles, to put such faith in dreames, which either his owne feare fantasieth, or else doe rise in the nights rest, by reason of the dayes thoughts: Goe back therefore to thy Master, and commend me to him, and pray him to be merry, and have no feare; for I assure him, I am as sure of the man he wotteth of, as of my own hand. The man he meant, was one Catesby, well learned in the Lawes of the Land; who by his favour was growne into good authority in Leicestershire, shire, where the Lord Hastings Estate lay. Of this man he made himselfe so sure, that he thought nothing could be plotted against him, which he would not presently reveale unto him. But this man deceived him; and was growne so inward with the Protectour, that being set by the Protectour to draw him to be a party in his designes, and finding he could not doe it, was himselfe the first mover to rid him out of the way. Another warning the Lord Hastings had: the same morning in which he was beheaded, his horse twice or thrice stumbled with him, almost to falling; which though it often happen to such to whom no mischance is toward, yet hath it of old beene observed as a token foregoing some great misfortune. Also at the Tower-wharfe, neere to the place where his head soone after was strucken off, he met with one Hastings a Pursuivant of his own name; to whom he said: Ah Hastings, dost thou remember I met thee here once with a heavy heart! Yea my Lord, saith he, I remember it well; and God be thanked, that time is past. In faith, man, said the Lord Hastings, I never stood in so great dread of my life, as I did when thou and I met here: and loe how the world is changed! now stand my Enemies in the danger, as thou mayest hap to heare hereafter; (for the Enemies he meant were the Lord Rivers, and other of the Queens kindred, who that very day were beheaded at Pomfret) and I never so merry, nor in so good surety as now I am. That we may know, there is not a greater Omen or signe of ill fortune, than to presume of good. And indeed, such is the uncertainty of our estate in this life, that we seldome know when we are in a Tempest at Sea, nor when we are in a Calm on shore; thinking our selves oftentimes most safe, when we are most in danger; and oftentimes to be in danger, when we are most safe: He onely is in the true Haven, that can say as Christ teacheth us, Thy will be done in Earth as it is in Heaven.

But this Lord being thus put to death; the Lord Protectour, to colour the matter, immediately after dinner, in all haste sent for many substantiall Citizens; at whose comming, himselfe with the Duke of Buckingham stood harnessed in old rusty Brigandines, to make a shew they were forced by the sudden danger to take such as they could first come by: and withall, a Herald of Armes is sent with a Proclamation in the Kings name, signifying, that the Lord Hastings with some others had conspired the same day to have slaine the Lord Protector and the Duke of Buckingham, as they sate in Counsell; and after to have taken upon them to rule the King and Kingdome at their own pleasures. Now was this Proclamation made within two houres after the Lord Hastings was beheaded; and was so curiously indited, and so fo faire written in Parchment, and withall so long, that every childe might perceive it was prepared before: which made one that was Schoolemaster of Pauls, standing by when the Proclamation was read, to say, Here is a gay goodly Cast, foule cast away for haste: To whom a Merchant answered, It was written by Prophesie. And now by and by, as it were in revenge of her offence, the Protectour sent the Sheriffs of London into the house of Shores wife, and spoyled her of all her goods, above the value of three thousand markes; and then conveying her through London to the Tower, there left her Prisoner: where he laid to her charge, that she went about to bewitch him, and was of counsell with the Lord Hastings to destroy him. In conclusion, she was laid into Ludgate, and by the Bishop of London put to open Penance for incontinency; going before the Crosse in Procession, upon a Sunday, with a Taper in her hand: in which, although she were out of all array, save her kirtle only; yet went she so faire and lovely, and withall so womanly and demurely, that many who hated her course of life, yet pittied her course usage, and were not a little grieved to see her misery. And indeed, this may be said in her behalfe: that being in extraordinary favour with King Edward, yet she never used it to the hurt of any, but to the reliefe of many: and was ever a Mediatour, an Oppressour never.

Now it was so contrived by the Protectour, that the very day in which the Lord Hastings was beheaded at London, and about the very same houre, there were beheaded at Pomfret, the Lord Rivers and the other Lords and Knights that were taken from the King at Northampton and Stonistratford; which was done in the presence, and by the order of Sir Richard Ratcliffe knight, whose service the Protec-ctour specially used in that businesse; who bringing them to the Scaffold, and not suffering them to declare their innocency, lest their words might have inclined men to hate the Protectour, caused them hastily without Judgement or Order of Processe to be beheaded.

When these were thus rid out of the way, then thought the Protectour that now was the time to put himselfe in possession of the Crown: but all the study was, by what means this matter being so heinous in it selfe, might be broken to the people, in such wise, as that it might be well taken: for which purpose, It was thought fit to call to this Counsell Edmund Shaw knight the then Major of London; who upon promise of advancement, should frame the peoples inclination to it. And because Spirituall men are best hearkened to for matters of Conscience, some of them were used also; amongst whom, choice was made of John Shaw Clerk, brother to the Major, Fryer Penker, Provinciall of the Order of the Augustine Fryers: both great Preachers, both of more learning then vertue, of more fame then learning. These two were appointed to preach, the one at Pauls Crosse, the other at the Stittle, in praise of the Protectour: Penker in his Sermon so lost his voice, that he was faine to leave off and come downe in the midst: Shaw by his Sermon lost his reputation, and soon after his life, for he never after durst come abroad, for very shame of the world.

But now was all the labour and study, to finde out some convenient pretext, for which the people should be content to have the Prince deposed, and the Protectour be received for King; to which purpose many things were devised; the cheife was to alleadge bastardy either in King Edward himselfe, or in his children, or in both. To lay bastardy to King Edward, sounded openly to the reproach of the Protectours own Mother, who was Mother to them both; he would therefore that point should more favourably be handled: but the other point concerning the bastardy of his children, he would have enforced to the uttermost: The ground whereof was, that King Edward had been formerly contracted to the Lady Elizabeth Lucie, by whom he had a childe, though the said Lady, having been examined about it, confessed plainly, they were never affured. Yet upon this pretext, Doctor Shaw taking for his Text, Bastard Plants shall take no deep roote; in his Sermon declared, that King Edward was never lawfully married to the Queen, but was before God, husband to the Lady Elizabeth Lucie, and so his children bastards. And besides that, neither King Edward himselfe, nor the Duke of Clarence were reckoned very sure for the children of the noble Duke Richard, as those that by their favours more resembled other known men; but the Lord Protectour (saith he) is the fathers own figure, his own countenance, the very print of his visage, the plaine expresse likenes of that noble Duke. Now, It was before devised, that just at the speaking of these words, the Protectour should have come, to the end that these words meeting with his presence, might be taken among the hearers, as though the Holy Ghost had put them in the Preachers mouth, and so should move the people even then to cry, King Richard, King Richard! that it might be after said, he was specially chosen by God, and in a manner by Miracle: but this devise failed; for whither by the Protectours slacknes in comming, or the Doctors haste in Preaching, he had passed those words, and was gone to cleane another matter, before the Protectour came; so as afterward seeing him come, he was faine to leave the matter, he had in hand, and out of all order and frame begin to repeate those words againe: This is the very noble Prince, the Fathers own figure, his own countenance, the very print of his visage, the plaine expresse likenes of that noble Duke. While these words were in speaking, the Protectour accompanied with the Duke of Buckingham, passed through the people into the place where the Doctors sit; and there sate to heare the Sermon: but the people were so farre from crying King Richard, that they cryed shame on the Preacher, for abusing his sacred function with so shamefull a Sermon.

The Tuesday following this Sermon, the Duke of Buckingham with divers Lords and Knights came to the Guildhall in London; and there before the Major and whole assembly of Citizens, made a very solemne and long Oration, wherein he recited many grievances of the late King Edwards Government, his many unnecessary Taxations tions and unjust severities; thereby to bring his children into hatred: and then remembred them of the late Sermon made at Pauls Crosse, by a learned Doctor; who clearly shewed the bastardy of King Edwards children; and that Richard Duke of Glocester was the onely rightfull and indubitate heire to the Crowne of England: which the Lords of the Kingdome having taken into their consideration, had thereupon agreed to accept him for their King; and now himselfe was come to acquaint them with it, and to require their consents. Which Oration ended, all men stood wondring at the motion, but no man offered to speak a word. At which the Duke marvelling, as supposing the Major had prepared them before; he asked the Major privately, what this silence meant? who answered, that perhaps they had not heard or understood what it was he said. Whereupon the Duke with a more audible voice repeated the same matter againe, in a more earnest and plain expression; yet neither did that move them to shew any inclination to the motion. Then the Duke whispering with the Major, It was thought, that the Citizens being used to have such motions made them by their Recorder, they would better it from him; and thereupon the Recorder is commanded to move them in it: but the Recorder (called Fitzwilliams) being an honest man and newly come to his place, repeated onely as neere as he could the words of the Duke, but added nothing of his own; so as neither did this move the people to breake their silence. At last, the Duke seeing their resolved sullennesse, told them plainly, that all the Nobility and Commons of the Realme were agreed to choose the Protectour for their King, as the true and undoubted heire; so as he needed not to have moved them to it, but onely for the great respect they all bare to this honourable City; and therefore required them plainly to speak their mindes, whether they would joyn with them in this choice or no. At this, certaine servants of the Dukes, and other of their procuring, standing at the lower end of the Hall, cast up their Caps, and cryed aloud, King Richard, King Richard; whereat, though the whole multitude of Citizens marvelled what they meant; yet the Duke taking advantage of it, as of an unanimous consent: A goodly cry (saith he) and thanked them all for their universall approbation; promising he would acquaint the Protectour with the great love they shewed toward him: and then requiring the Major and chiefe Citizens to meet him the next morning at Baynards Castle, where the Protectour then lay; there to joyn with him, in Petitioning the Protectour to accept of this their freely profered subjection; he tooke his leave and so departed.

The next morning according to appointment, they all meet at Baynards Castle; where the Duke of Buckingham sends up word to the L. Protectour, that himself with the L. Major & his Brethren, were come to present a Supplication to him, concerning a busines of great importance: but the Protectour though (preacquainted with all passages, yet) made it strange what their Supplication should be; and answered, that though he suspected nothing which the Duke of Buckingham presented to him; yet he desired at least some some slight intimation to what it might tend. To this it was answered, that the busines they came about was to be made known to himself in Person; and therefore humbly besought him of admission in his presence: Upon this, as if not yet well assured of their well meaning towards him; he appeares unto them in an upper Gallery, making semblance as though he would prevent all danger, by standing something aloofe and in his Fort: To whom the Duke of Buckingham, in behalfe of the Major and Nobility there present; in most respective and reverent manner makes request, that his Grace would pardon what he should deliver to him: and much circumstance he used, before he would discover their cause of comming: but though long first, yet at last, he told it: That in respect of the urgent necessities of the Common-wealth, they all humbly intreated him to take upon him the Government of the Kingdome, as in his own Right, to whom they all tendred their Allegiance. At which words, the Protectour starting back, as if he had heard something most unpleasing to him, passionately answered: I little thought, good Cozen, that you of all men would have moved me to a matter which of all things in the world I most decline: Farre be it from to accept of that, which without apparent wrong to my deare deceased brothers sweet children, and my own upright Conscience, I cannot well approve of. And then being about to proceede in his premeditated dissimulation; the Duke in a seeming abrupt passion, kneeling upon his knee, sayd; Your Grace was pleased to give me free liberty to deliver unto you, in the name of this worthy assembly, the tender of their dutifull obedience to you: but I must further adde, that it is unanimously resolved on, that your late brother King Edwards children, as being generally known to be Illegitimate, shall never be admitted to the Crown of England; and therefore if your Grace shall neither regard your selfe, nor us so much, as to accept it, we are directly determined to conferre it upon some other of the House of Lancaster, that will be more sensible of his own and our good. These words wrought so powerfully upon the Protectours passions; that with some change of Countenance, and not without a seeming reluctation, he said; Since I perceive the whole Realme is so resolved, by no means to admit my deer Nephews, being but children, to Reigne over you; and seeing the Right of succession belongs justly to me, as the indubitate Heire of Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke, my Illustrious Father: Wee are contented to condiscend to your importunities, and to accept of the Royall Government of the Kingdome, and will to the uttermost of my power endeavour to procure and maintain the welfare thereof. And having so said, he came downe from his Gallery, and very formally saluted them all: which so pleased the giddy multitude, that presently they fell to acclamations, Long live King Richard our dread Soveraigne Lord! and then every man departed.

THE REIGNE OF KING RICHARD THE THIRD.

IT was now the eighteenth day of June, in the yeer 1483. when Richard Duke of Glocester tooke upon him the Crown: so as the imaginary Raigne of Edward the fifth, continued but just tenne weeks. The next day, King Richard with a great traine went to Westminster-hall, and placed himselfe in the Court of the Kings Bench, saying, he would take the Crown upon him in that place where the King himselfe sitteth and ministreth the Law; because he considered that it is the chiefest duty of a King to administer the Laws: And here to get the love of the people by a feigned clemency; he sent for one Fogge out of Sanctuary, who for fear of his displeasure was fled thither; and there in the sight of all the people, caused him to kisse his hand.

After his return home, he tooke to wife the Lady Anne, youngest daughter of the great Warwicke, and the relict of Prince Edward, sonne of Henry the sixth; though that could not be ignorant, that he had been the Author both of her husbands and fathers death. But womens affections are Eccentrick to common apprehension; where of the two Poles are Passion and Inconstancy.

Against his Coronation he had sent for five thousand men out of the North; and they being come under the leading of Robin of Riddesdale, upon the fourth of July together with his new bride, he went from Baynards Castle to the Tower by water, where he created Edward his Sonne a childe of ten yeers old, Prince of Wales; John Lord Howard Duke of Norfolke, his Sonne Sir Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey, William Lord Berckley Earle of Nottingham, Francis Lord Lovell Viscount Lovell, and his Chamberlane, and the Lord Stanley (who had been committed prisoner to the Tower, in regard his Sonne the Lord Strange was reported to have levied forces in Lancashire) not only that day was released out of prison, but was made Lord Steward of his Household. The Archbishop of Yorke was likewise then delivered, but Morton Bishop of Ely (as one that could not be drawne to the disinheriting of King Edwards children) was committed to the Duke of Buckingham, who sent him to his Castle of Brecknock in Wales, there to be in custody. The same night were made Fourteen knights of the Bath, Edmund the Duke of Suffolkes sonne, George

Grey

Grey the Earle of Kents sonne, William the Lord Zouches sonne, Henry Abergeven, Christopher Willoughby, Henry Babington, Thomas Arundell, Thomas Boteign, Gervis Clifton, William Bey, Edmund Bedingfield, William Enderby, Thomas Lewkenor, Thomas of Ormond, John Browne, and William Berckley. The next day, being the fifth of July, the King rode through the City of London to Westminster, being accompanied with the Dukes of Norfolk, Buckingham, and Suffolk; the Earles of Northumberland, Arundell, Kent, Surrey, Wiltshire, Huntington, Nottingham, Warwick, and Lincolne, the Viscounts Lisle and Lovell; the Lords Stanley, Audley, Dacres, Ferrers of Chartley, Powis, Scroope of Upsale, Scroope of Bolton, Gray of Codnor, Grey of Wilton, Stanley, Cobham, Morley, Burgevenny, Zouch, Ferrers of Croby, Wells, Lumley, Matrevers, Herbert and Beckham, and foureſcore Knights. On the morrow, being the ſixth of July, the King with Queene Anne his wife, came downe out of the White-Hall, into the Great Hall at Weſtminſter, and went directly to the Kings Bench, and from thence, going upon Ray-cloath, bare-footed, went unto St. Edwards ſhrine, all his Nobility going with him, every Lord in his degree. The Biſhop of Rocheſter bore the Croſſe before the Cardinall: Then followed the Earle of Huntington, bearing a paire of gilt-ſpurres, ſignifying Knighthood: Then followed the Earle of Radford, bearing St. Edwards ſtaffe, for a Relique: After him came the Earle of Northumberland bare-headed, with the pointleſſe ſword naked in his hand, ſignifying Mercy: The Lord Stanley bare the Mace of the Conſtableſhip: The Earle of Kent bare the ſecond ſword, on the right hand of the King, naked, with a point, which ſignifyed Juſtice to the Temporalty: The Lord Lovell bore the third ſword on the Kings left hand, with a point, which ſignifyed Juſtice to the Clergie: The Duke of Suffolk followed with the Scepter in his hand, which ſignified Peace: The Earle of Lincolne bore the Ball and Croſſe, which ſignified Monarchy: The Earle of Surrey bore the fourth ſword before the King, in a rich ſcabbard, which is called the ſword of Eſtate: Then went three together, in the midſt went Garter king of Armes, in his rich Coat, and on his right hand went the Major of London, bearing a Mace, and on his left hand went the Gentleman-Uſher of the Privy Chamber: Then followed the Duke of Norfolk, bearing the kings Crown between his hands: Then followed king Richard in his roabes of Purple-velvet, and over his head a Canopy, borne by foure Barons of the Cinque-Ports, and on each ſide of the king went a Biſhop; on one ſide, the Biſhop of Bath, on the other, of Durham: Then followed the Duke of Buckingham, bearing the kings traine, with a white ſtaffe in his hand, ſignifying the office of High Steward of England. Then followed the Queenes traine, before whom was borne the Scepter, the Ivory rod, with the Dove, (ſignifying innocency) and the Crown: herſelfe apparelled in roabes like the kings, under a rich Canopy, at every corner thereof a bell of gold: On her head ſhe wore a circlet, ſet full of precious ſtones, the Counteſſe of Richmond bearing her traine, the Dutcheſſes of Norfolk and Suffolk in their Coronets, attending, with twenty Ladies of Eſtate moſt richly arrived. In this order they paſſed the Palace into the Abbey: and going up to the High Altar, there ſhifted their roabes, and having other roabes open in divers places from the middle upward, were both of them Anoynted and Crowned: and then after the Sacrament received, (having the hoſt divided betwixt them) they both offered at St. Edwards ſhrine, where the king left St. Edwards Crowne, wherewith he had been Crowned, and put on his owne: and this done, in the ſame order and ſtate as they came, they returned to Weſtminſter-hall, and there held a moſt Princely feaſt: at the ſecond courſe whereof, there came into the Hall Sir Robert Dymock, the kings Champion, making Proclamation, that whoſoever would ſay that king Richard was not lawfull king of England, he was there ready to prove it againſt him; and thereupon threw down his Gantlet: and then all the Hall cryed, king Richard, king Richard. And thus with ſome other Ceremonies, the Coronation ended; and the king and Queen returned to their lodgings.

Preſently after this, king Richard ſent a ſolemne Ambaſſage to Lewis king of France, to conclude a League and Amity with him: but the French king ſo abhorred him and his cruelty, that hee would not ſo much as ſee, or heare his Ambaſſadors; but ſent them away with ſhame, in diſgrace of their Maſter. About this time, with his Queen, he made a Progreſſe to Gloceſter, under colour to viſit the places of his old Honour, but indeed, to be out of the way, having a ſpeciall deſire to be acted: for though he had ſatisfied his Ambition, by depriving his two Nephews of their livelihoods; yet it ſatisfied not his Feare, if he deprived them not alſo of their lives. For effecting whereof, his old friend the Duke of Buckingham was no fit inſtrument; it muſt be one of a baſer metall: and to finde out one, he conceded not goe farre; For upon inquiry, he was told of two that lay in the next Chamber to him; Sir Thomas and Sir James Tyrrell; two brothers, like Garland to Eſau, not more neere in blood, than different in conditions; of equall goodneſſe of perſonage both, but not of equall goodneſſe of minde; Sir Thomas a man of an honeſt and ſober diſpoſition, but Sir James of a turbulent ſpirit, and one that gaping after preferment, would not ſtick to make a fortune out of any villany. Being told of this man, as he was ſitting at the cloſe-ſtoole, he preſently roſe and went to him: where being met, the match is ſoon made up betweene them; for he found Sir James more ready to undertake the work, than he was himſelfe to ſet him about it. It onely remained, to procure him free paſſage to the place where the deede was to be done: for King Richard had formerly ſent a truſty Privado of his, named John Greene, to Sir Robert Brackenbury then Lieutenant of the Tower; thinking that he, having been raiſed by him, would not have refuſed to doe the deed himſelfe; but when he heard how averſe he was from it, Good Lord (ſaith he) whom may man truſt? Once he ſaw plainly, that whilſt he was Lieutenant, there was no poſſibility to effect it. To remove therefore this Rub, he ſends his Letters Mandatory to Brackenbury, to deliver preſently the keyes of the Tower to Sir James Tyrrell: who being now Lieutenant for the time, and having the two innocent Princes under his cuſtodie; gets two other, as very villaines as himſelfe; the one called Miles Forreſt, the other James Dighton his horſe-keeper, a bigge ſturdy knave: and both he makes his under-agents; who comming into the childrens chamber in the night, (for they were ſuffered to have none about them, but one Black-Will, or William Slaughter, a bloody raſcall) they ſuddenly lapped them up in their clothes, and tooking down by force the featherbed and pillowes hard unto their mouths, ſo ſtifled them, that their breath failing, they gave up their innocent ſoules to God: whom when the murtherers perceived, firſt by their ſtrugling with the paines of death, and then by their long lying ſtill, to be throughly dead; they laid their bodies out upon the bed, and then ſetched Sir James to ſee them; who preſently cauſed their bodies to be buried under the ſtaires, under a heap of ſtones: from whence they were afterward removed to a place of Chriſtian buriall, by a Prieſt of Sir Robert Brackenburies; who dying within a few dayes after, and none knowing the place but himſelfe, was cauſe that it hath not been known to this day; and gave occaſion afterwards to the Impoſture of Perkin Warbeck, in King Henry the Seventh's Raign. Some report, that king Richard cauſed their bodies to be taken up, and cloſed them in lead, and then to be put in a Coffin full of holes, hooked at the ends with Iron; and ſo caſt into a place called the Black Deepes, at the Thames mouth; to be ſure they ſhould never riſe up, nor be ſeen againe. And now ſee the Divine revenge upon the actors of this execrable murther: Miles Forreſt, at St. Martins le Grand, peece-meale rotted away: Dighton lived at Callice a long time after; but deteſted of all men, dyed in great miſery: Sir James Tyrrell was beheaded afterward on the Tower-hill for Treaſon: and king Richard himſelfe, after this abhominable fact done, never had quiet minde; troubled with fearfull dreames, and would ſometimes in the night ſtart out of his bed, and run about the Chamber in great fright, as if all the Furies of Hell were hanging about him: that it was verefied in him, Ultrix Tiſiphone vocat agmina ſæva ſororum.

Confederacies in evill are ſeldome long-lived, and commonly end in a reciprocall diſſolution: and ſo was it now with king Richard and the Duke of Buckingham: They had confederated together to the deſtruction of many; and now their confederacy diſſolves in both their ruines: but what the cauſe was of their diſſolving, is not

not so certaine: whether it were that the Duke thought not himselfe so well rewarded, as his great services had deserved; or whether it were, that King Richard thought not himselfe absolute King, as long as the Duke, by whose means he came to be King, was in such a height of greatnesse; or whether it were (as was rather thought) that the Duke being a man ambitious and of an aspiring spirit, thought he had himselfe been the meanes to bring King Richard to the Crown; yet when the Crown was put upon his head, so envied at it, that he turned his head another way, as not enduring the sight; and for the same cause, was willing not to have been present at the Coronation, pretending sickness in excuse of his absence; but that King Richard sent him a sharpe Message, requiring him to come or he would fetch him: whereupon the Duke went, but with so ill a minde, that he bore it in minde ever after. Whatsoever it was, certaine it is, that presently after the Coronation, there grew great jealousies between them; and the Duke retired himselfe to his Castle at Brecknock, where he had the Bishop of Ely in custody. And here we may observe the unsearchable depth of the divine Providence; the bottome whereof, the soundest judgement of Man can never sound, as working effects by contrary causes: for where King Richard had committed the Bishop to the Duke, as to one that would have a most watchfull eye over him; This which the King did for the Bishops greater punishment, proved a means afterward of the Bishops greater advancement, and a means at the present of King Richards ruine. For the Duke being returned home, and having his head so full of thoughts, that of necessity it required vent; for his own recreation, would sometimes fall in talke with the Bishop; with whose discourse (as he was a man of great wit and solid judgement) the Duke was so taken, that he grew to delight in nothing more then to be conferring with him. One time it happened, that the Duke had opened his minde something freely to him; and the Bishop following him in his own way, and cunningly working upon that humour of the Duke, which he found most working in the Duke; which he conceived to grow out of envy to king Richard: he said to this purpose; My Lord, you know I followed first the part of king Henry the sixth, and if I could have had my wish, his Sonne should have had the Crown, and not king Edward: But after that God had ordained king Edward to Reigne; I was never so mad, that I would with a dead man strive against the quick. And so was I to king Edward also a faithfull Chaplaine, and glad would have been that his childe had succeeded him: How be it, if the secret Judgement of God have otherwise provided; I purpose not to labour to set up that which God pulleth down. And as for the Lord Protectour, and now King; and even there he left: saying, he had already meddled too much with the world; and would from that day meddle with his Books and his Beads, and no further. Then longed the Duke exceedingly to heare what he would have said; because he ended with the king, and there suddenly stopped: and thereupon intreated him to be bold to say whatsoever he thought; whereof he faithfully promised there should never come hurt, and peradventure more good then he would thinke; and withall, that himselfe intended to use his secret Counsell; which (he said) was the only cause for the which he had procured of the king to have him in his custody. The Bishop humbly thanked him, and said: In good faith my Lord, I love not to talke much of Princes, as a thing not all out of perill, though the word be without fault, for so much as it shall not be taken as the party meant it, but as it pleaseth the Prince to construe it. And ever I thinke on Æsops Tale, that when the Lyon had proclaimed on paine of death, that no horned beast should abide in a certaine Wood; one that had in his forehead a bunch of flesh, fled away a geart pace: the Fox that saw him ran so fast, asked him whither he made all that haste? who answered, in faith I neither wot nor reck, so I were once hence, because of the Proclaimation made of horned beasts: why foole, (quoth the Fox) thou mayest abide well enough, the Lyon meant it not by thee, for it is no horn that is in thy head: No mary (quoth he) that wote I well enough; but what if he call it a horne, where am I then? The Duke laughed at the Tale, and said; My Lord, I warrant you, neither the Lyon nor the Bore shall picke any matter at any thing here spoken; for it shall never come neere their eare. Then said the Bishop, In good faith Sir, if it did, the thing I was about (truly taken as well as a fore God I meant it, could deserve but thank; and yet taken as I ween it would, might happen to turne me to little good, and you to lesse. Then longed the Duke much more, to heare what it was: whereupon the Bishop said, My Lord, as for the late Protectour, sith he is now king in Possession, I purpose not to dispute his title; but for the weale of the Realme, I could wish he had in him those excellent virtues which God hath planted in the person of your Grace: and there left again. The Duke somewhat marvelling at his sudden pause, said, My L. I cannot but more your sudden stopping in your speech, so as your words come not to any direct sentence, whereby I may have knowledge, either what your inward intent is now toward the king, or what your affection is toward me: I therfore intreate you to use no more such obscurity, but plainly to disclose your minde unto me, who upon mine honor will be as secret in the case, as the deafe and dumb person is to the finger, or the Tree to the Hunter. The Bp. then upon confidence of the D. promise, said, my Lord, I plainly perceive, the kingdome being in the case as it is, under such a King as now we have, must needs decay and be brought to confusion; but one hope I have, that when I consider and daily behold your noble Personage; your Justice, your ardent love towards your Country, and in like manner the great love of your Country towards you; I must needs thinke this Realme fortunate, that hath such a Prince in store, meet and apt to be a Governour; in whose person consisteth the very undoubted Image of true honour. And then taxing the present king with many cruelties and oppressions, he concluded, saying: And now my Lord, if either you love God, your Linage, or your native Country, you must your self take upon you the Crown and Imperiall Diadem of this Realme; but if your selfe will refuse to take it upon you, I then adjure you, by the faith you owe to God, and by the love you beare to your native Country, to devise some way, how the Realme may by your Princely policy be reduced to some convenient Regiment, under some good governour by you to be appointed: And if you could devise to set up againe the Linage of Lancaster; or advance the eldest daughter of King Edward to some puissant Prince: not onely the new Crowned king should little enjoy the glory of his dignity, but all Civill Warre should cease, and Peace and Profit should againe flourish. When the Bishop had ended his saying, the Duke sighed, and spake not of a good while; which sore abashed the Bishop, and made him change colour: which the Duke perceiving, he said; Be not afrayd my Lord, all promises shall be kept: so for that time they parted. The next day, the Duke sent for the Bishop, and having rehearsed unto him the Communication had between them the day before, he went on and said: My Lord of Ely, since I perceive your true heart and sincere affection toward me; I will now discover unto you, all that hath passed my own imaginations. After I had found the dissimulation and falsenesse of king Richard, and specially after I was informed of the murther of the two young Princes, to which (God be my Judge) I never condiscended; I so much abhorred the sight, and much more the company of him, that I could no longer abide in his Court; but feigning a cause to depart, I tooke my leave of him (he thinking nothing lesse, then that I was displeased) and so returned to Brecknok to you; but in that returning, whether it were by inspiration, or else through some melancholike disposition, I had divers imaginations how to deprive this unnaturall and bloody Butcher of his Royall seat and dignity. First, I fantasied, that if I list to take upon me the Crown, Now was the time, when this Tyrant was abhorred and detested of all men; and knowing not of any that could pretend Title before me: In this imagination I rested two dayes at Tewkesbury; in my journey from thence, I mused and thought, that it was not best nor convenient to take upon me as a Conquerour, for then I was sure that all men and specially the Nobility would oppose me; but at last there sprung up a branch in my head, which I surely thought would have brought forth faire flowers, but they turned indeed to dry weeds: For I suddenly remembred that the Lord Edmund Duke of Somerset, my Grandfather, was with king Henry the sixth, in two or three degrees of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster; so that I thought certainely, my Mother being eldeſt Daughter to Duke Edmund, that I was next heire to king Henry the ſixth, of the Houſe of Lancaſter: This Title pleaſed well ſuch as I made of my Counſell, and much more it elevated my ambitious intent; but while I was in a maze, whether I were beſt ſuddenly to ſet this title open amongſt the Common people, or elſe keep it ſecret a while, ſee what chanced: As I rode between Worceſter and Bridgenorth, I met with the Lady Margaret Counteſſe of Richmond, now wife to the Lord Stanley, who is the daughter and ſole heire to John Duke of Somerſet my Grandfathers elder brother, (which was as cleane out of my minde, as if I had never ſeen her) ſo that ſhe and her ſonne the Earle of Richmond have both of them Titles before mine, and then I cleerly ſaw how I was deceived: whereupon I determined, utterly to relinquiſh all ſuch fantaſticall imaginations concerning the obrayning the Crown my ſelfe, and found there could be no better way to ſettle it in a true eſtabliſhment, then that the Earle of Richmond, very heire of the houſe of Lancaſter, ſhould take to wife the Lady Elizabeth, eldeſt Daughter to king Edward, the very heir of the houſe of York; that ſo the two Roſes may be united in one: & now (ſaith the Duke) I have told you my very minde. When the Duke had ſaid this, the Biſhop was not a little glad, for this was the marke he had himſelfe aymed at: and thereupon, after ſome complements of extolling his device, he ſaid: Since by your Graces incomparable wiſdome, this noble conjunction is now moved; It is in the next place neceſſary to conſider, what friends we ſhall firſt make privy of this intention. By my truth (quoth the Duke) we will begin with the Counteſſe of Richmond the Earles Mother; who knoweth where he is, either in captivity or at large in Britaine. And thus was the foundation laid of a league, by theſe two great men; by which the death of the two young Princes was fully revenged: and it was not talkt of onely, but preſently put in execution; for now is Reynold Bray imployed by the Biſhop, to his Miſtreſſe the Dutcheſſe of Richmond; Doctor Lewis the Dutcheſſes Phiſitian was imployed by her to the Queen Elizabeth; Hugh Conway and Thomas Rame were imployed to the Earle of Richmond; to acquaint them, but in moſt ſecret manner, with the intended plot, and to procure their promiſes to the propounded marriage; which was no hard matter, to make them all willing to their own wiſhes. This done, Inſtruments are imployed, to draw in parties to the confederacy; Bray by his credit drew in Sir Gyles Daubeny, Sir John Cheyney, Richard Guildford, Thomas Rame and others; Urſwick likewiſe drew in Hugh Conway, Thomas Colepepper, Thomas Roper with ſome others; Doctor Lewis drew in Edward Courtney and his brother Peter Biſhop of Exceter. It is memorable, that Thomas Conway being ſent moſt part by Sea, and Thomas Rame moſt part by Land; yet came to the Earle of Richmond in Brittaine, within the ſpace of little more then an houre; upon whoſe information of the plot, the Earle acquaints the Duke of Brittaine with it, who, though by Hutton King Richards Ambaſſadour, he had by many great offers been ſollicited to detaine him in priſon; yet he both readily promiſed and really performed both his advice and ayde to the Earles proceedings. In this meane time Biſhop Morton, not without aſking the Dukes leave, though without obtaining it, ſecretly in diſguiſe, gets him into his Iſle of Ely; and there having done the Earle good Offices by procuring of friends, he thence paſſeth into Brittaine to him; from whence he returned no more, till afterward the Earle being king, ſent for him home and made him Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

But though all theſe things were carried cloſely, and Oath taken by all for ſecreſie, yet came it to King Richards knowledge; who notwithſtanding diſſembling it, ſends for the Duke of Buckingham to come unto him; and he putting off his comming with pretended excuſes, is at laſt peremptorily ſent for to come upon his Allegiance: when he returned this reſolute anſwer, that he owed no Allegiance to ſuch a perjur'd inhumane Butcher of his owne Fleſh and Blood: and ſo from that time, preparation for Arms is made on both ſides. The Duke had gotten a good power of Welſhmen; and the Marqueſſe Dorſet having gotten out of Sanctuary, was labouring in Yorkeſhire to raiſe forces; the like did the two Courtneys in Devonſhire and Cornwall, and Guilford and Rame in Kent. King Richard ſetting forward with his his forces; the Duke of Buckingham doth the like, intending at Gloceſter to have paſſed Severn; and ſo to have joyned with the two Courtneys; but ſuch abundance of raine at that time fell, that the Severn was broken out, and impoſſible to be paſſed over; which the Welſhmen ſeeing, and taking it for an ill ſigne, they ſecretly ſlipt away: ſo as the Duke left well neer alone, without either Page or ſo much as a Footman; repaired to the houſe of one Humfry Banniſter neere to Shrewsbury; who having been raiſed by him, and his father before him; he thought himſelfe ſafe under his roofe: but Banniſter, upon Proclamation made by king Richard, that whoſoever could apprehend the Duke, ſhould have a thouſand pound for his labour; like an ungratefull and perfidious wretch, diſcovered him to John Mitton High Sheriffe of Shropſhire, who took him in a pilled black Cloak, as he was walking in an Orchard behinde the houſe; and carried him to Shrewsbury, where king Richard then lay; and there without Arraignment or Legall proceeding, was in the Market place beheaded. Whether Banniſter received the Proclaimed reward from the hand of the King, is uncertaine; but certaine it is, that he received the reward of a Villaine from the hand of Divine Juſtice; for himſelf was afterward hanged for man-ſlaughter, his eldeſt daughter was deflowred by one of his Carters, or as ſome ſay, ſtricken with a foule Leproſie; his eldeſt Sonne in a deſperate Lunacy murthered himſelfe, and was found to have done ſo, by the Coroners inqueſt; and his younger Sonne in a ſmall puddle was ſtrangled and drowned.

Upon this diſaſter of the Duke of Buckingham, his complices ſhifted for themſelves; ſome taking Sanctuary, ſome keeping themſelves in unknown places, but many convayed themſelves into Brittaine to the Earle of Richmond; of whom the Marqueſſe Dorſet, John Lord Wells, the Biſhop of Exceter and his brother Sir John Fitzher, Sir Edward Woodvile brother to Queen Elizabeth, Sir Robert Willoughby, Sir Giles Daubeney, Sir Thomas Arundell, Sir John Cheyney and his two brethren, Sir William Brandon and his brother Thomas, Sir Richard Edgecombe, Hollowell and Poynings Captaines, were the chiefe. Whil'ſt theſe things are in doing, king Richard receives intelligence from Hutton his Ambaſſadour leiger in Britaine; that the Duke not onely refuſeth to reſtraine the Earle of Richmond, but intendeth alſo to give him aſſiſtance: whereupon the king tooke preſent order for preparing his Navy to ſtop the Earles landing in any Port of England.

Upon the twelveth day of October in the yeer 1484. The Earle of Richmond with forty Ships, and five thouſand waged Brittain tooks, to ſea; but that Evening, by tempeſt of weather, his whole Fleet was diſperſed, ſo as only the Ship wherein the Earle himſelfe was, with one little Barke, was driven upon the Coaſt of Cornwall; where diſcovering upon the ſhore great ſtore of Armed Souldiers to reſiſt his landing; he hoyſed ſayle, and returning toward France, arrived in Normandy; from whence ſending Meſſengers to Charles the Eighth King of France, he was by him not onely kindely invited to come to his Court, but was ayded alſo with good ſummes of money to beare his charges. After this, the Earle returning into Brittaine, received there the news of the Duke of Buckinghams death, and the diſperſing of the Confederates forces; with which though he was at firſt much troubled, yet was he as much comforted afterward, when he ſaw the Marqueſſe Dorſet and thoſe other Lords and Captaines come unto him: ſoon after whoſe comming, upon Chriſtmaſſe day before the high Altar in the great Church of Rheims, the Earle of Richmond gave Oath, to marry the Lady Elizabeth, as ſoone as he ſhould be quietly ſetled in the Government of England: and thereupon all the Lords and Knights there preſent, did him homage, and in the ſame place, each to other Religiouſly Vowed, taking the Sacrament upon it; never to ceaſe proſecuting warre againſt king Richard, till either his Depoſition or Deſtruction.

King Richard being informed of theſe things, makes diligent enquiry after all ſuch as might be ſuſpected to be favourers of Richmonds aſſociation; of whom Sir George Brown, and Sir Roger Clifford with foure other Gentlemen are apprehended and executed at London: Sir Thomas Sentleger, who married Anne the Duke of Exceters widdow, this kings own ſiſter, and Thomas Rame Eſquire were executed at Exeter.

ceter. Thomas Marqueſſe Dorſet, and all ſuch as were with the Earle of Richmond were at a Parliament then holden attainted of Treaſon, and all their Goods and Lands ſeized on to the kings uſe: Beſides theſe, a poore Gentleman called Collingborne, for making a ſmall ryme of three of his wicked Counſellours; the Lord Lovell, Sir Robert Ratcliffe, and Sir William Catesby: which ryme was thus framed: The Cat, the Rat, and Lovell the Dog; rule all England under a Hog: was put to death, and his body divided into foure quarters.

At this time, a Truce is concluded betwixt England and Scotland, for three yeares, and for a ſterling a firmer Amity between the two kingdomes, a marriage is treated of between the Duke of Rothſay, eldeſt Sonne to the king of Scots; and the Lady Anne de la Poole, daughter to John Duke of Suffolk, by Anne ſiſter to king Richard, which ſiſter he ſo much favoured, that after the death of his own ſonne, who dyed ſome time before; he cauſed John Earle of Lincolne, her ſonne and his Nephew, to be proclaimed Heire apparent to the Crown of England.

And now King Richard, to take away the Roote of his feare, once againe ſent Ambaſſadors to the Duke of Britaine, with order (beſides the great gifts they caried with them) to make offer, that king Richard ſhould yeerly pay and anſwer the Duke of all the Revenues and Profits of all lands and poſſeſſions, as well belonging to the Earle of Richmond, as of any other Nobleman or Gentleman that were in his company; if he after that time would keep them in continuall priſon, and reſtraine them from liberty. But the Duke of Britaine being at that time fallen into ſuch infirmity, that the Ambaſſadors could have no audience; they addreſſed themſelves to Peter Landois, the Dukes chief Treaſurer: and he taken with this golden hook, faithfully promiſed to ſatisfie their Requeſt, and had done ſo indeed, but that B. Morton, ſojourning then in Flanders, had by his friends Intelligence of his purpoſe, and preſently informed the E. thereof. The E. was then at Vannes, who, upon the Bps. information, taking with him only five ſervants, as though he went but to viſit ſome friend, when he was five miles forward on his way, ſuddenly turned into a Wood adjoyning; and there changing apparell with one of his ſervants, followed after as their attendant; and never reſted, till by wayes unknown he came to his company abiding at Angiers: yet was not his departure ſo ſecret nor ſo ſudden, but that Peter Landois had notice of it; who ſending Poſts after him, was ſo neer overtaking him, that he was ſcarce entred one houre into France, when the Poſts arrived at the Confines, and then durſt goe no further. In the mean time, Sir Edward Woodvile and Captaine Fynings, who with their companies were left behinde in Vannes, had been in danger of Peter Landois his malice; but that the Duke being informed by the Chancellour of their caſe, not only protected them, but furniſhed them with all neceſſaries for their journey to the Earle: and was ſo incenſed againſt Landois for this action of his, that for this and ſome other over-bold preſumptions, he was afterward hanged.

The Earle having paſſed this danger in Britaine, and being arrived in France, addreſſeth himſelfe to the French king, imploring his ayde; and hath it promiſed and performed: and in this time John Vere Earle of Oxford, who had long time been kept priſoner in the Caſtle of Hammes, ſo farre prevailed with James Blunt Captaine of the Fortreſſe, and Sir John Forteſcue Porter of the Town of Calice; that not onely they ſuffered him to be at liberty, but accompanied him alſo to the Earle of Richmond, to whom Captain Blunt gave aſſurance that the Fortreſſe remained wholly at his devotion. At this time alſo there reſorted to the Earle, divers young Gentlemen that were Students in the Univerſity of Paris, profering him their ſervice; amongſt whom was Richard Fox, at that time famous for his learning; with whom afterward the Earle adviſed in all his affaires, made him one of his moſt Privy Counſell, and at laſt Biſhop of Winchester.

But now king Richard having been diſappointed of his deſigne in Britaine, hath another way in his head, to diſapoint the Earle of Richmond of his marriage with the Daughter of Queen Elizabeth: and to this end, he ſent to the Queen, (being ſtill in Sanctuary) divers meſſengers, who ſhould firſt excuſe and purge him of all things formerly attempted and done againſt her; and then ſhould largely promiſe promotions tions innumerable, not onely to her ſelfe, but alſo to her ſonne Lord Thomas Marqueſſe Dorſet; by force of which promiſes, the meſſengers ſo prevailed with her, that not onely ſhe began to relent, but at laſt was content to ſubmit her ſelfe wholly to the kings pleaſure. And thereupon putting in oblivion the murther of her innocent Children, the butchering of her own Brother and Sonne, the infamy of her royall Huſband, the aſperſion of Adultery caſt upon her ſelfe, the imputation of Baſtardy laid to her Daughters, forgetting alſo her Oath made to the Earle of Richmonds Mother, ſeduced by flattering words, ſhe firſt delivered into king Richards hands her five Daughters, and after ſent letters to the Marqueſſe her Sonne, being then at Paris with the Earle of Richmond; willing him by any means to leave the Earle, and with all ſpeed to repaire into England; where for him were provided great Honours and Promotions: Aſſuring him further, that all offences on both parts were forgotten and forgiven; and both he and ſhe incorporated in the kings favour. If we wonder at this credulity in the Queen, we may conceive ſhe was moved with the two great motives of Feare and hope; ſhe feared (no doubt) that if ſhe denyed the kings requeſt, he would preſently take ſome ſharpe courſe both againſt her and her Daughters; and ſhe hoped that if ſhe yeelded to his requeſt, he would undoubtedly performe his promiſe, ſeeing it was as eaſie for him to keep it as to breake it.

But now king Richards purpoſe being to marry one of his brother king Edwards daughters: there was one impediment which directly hindred it; that he had a wife living; and how to be rid of her, that he might not bring new aſperſions upon himſelfe, he could not well tell; yet this he reſolved, that be rid of her he would by ſome way or other: but before he would uſe extremity, he would firſt try milder wayes; and firſt he abſteyned both from her bed and company, and complained to divers of her barrenneſſe; which comming to her eare, he hoped might cauſe her to dye with griefe: And when this device failed, he then cauſed a rumour to be ſpread among the people, that ſhe was ſuddenly dead; hoping the very conceite thereof would kill her: when this device alſo failed, (for the Queen hearing of it, and miſtruſting the worſt, with a moſt ſorrowfull countenance came unto him, demanding what ſhe had done, that he ſhould judge her worthy to dye? who anſwered with faire words, bidding her be of good cheere, for (to his knowledge) ſhe ſhould have no other cauſe:) he then made ſure worke; for within few dayes after, whether by poyſon or by what other meanes, it is not certainly known, ſhe departed this life; and with all ſolemnity, not without ſome formall tears of king Richard, was interred in St. Peters Church at Weſtminſter.

King Richard now by his wives death, having made himſelf way to marry another; uſeth all the alluring means he can deviſe, to winne the love of the Lady Elizabeth his Neece; but meaning at laſt to purchaſe his deſire by Rape, if he could not otherwiſe; and had perhaps done it, but that the ſtorms threatned from beyond the ſeas, growing every day more ſtrong then other, forced him to prorouge the execution of his deſires, and look to the prevention of his preſent danger. The Lord Stanley is commanded preſently to levy forces for the kings ayde, as he will juſtifie his integrity to him; but yet is not permitted to goe down into the Country, untill he had left George Lord Strange his eldeſt Son, as a Pledge of his Loyalty, behinde him. And now king Richard being informed (though the information was craftily ſuborned by his Enemies) that the Earle of Richmond was out of hope of any great aſſiſtance from France; diſchargeth the ſhips which he had appointed to guard the ſeas, and likewiſe all the ſouldiers; onely order is given for diligent watching of the Beacons.

At this time, one Morgan Kidwelly, a Student at the Innes of Court, with great hazard of his life, paſſed over to the Earle; Informing him, that King Richard by all means laboured to match himſelf with the Lady Elizabeth: which ſo wrought with the Earle, that he ſaw there was no lingring: and the more, being by him further informed, that Rice ap Thomas and John Savage, two powerfull men in their Countries, were ready with great forces to aſſiſt him: Whereupon not having above

two thousand Mercenaries, and but indifferent shipping to convay him over: about the middle of August he put to sea, and by the advice of the said Kidwelly, steered his course for Wales, and on the seventeenth day after his departure from Harfleu, arrived at Milford Haven; and there landing his forces without trouble or impeachment, from thence marched peacably to Hereford, where by the Inhabitants he was joyfully received. Here he received newes by Captaine Arnold Butler, that the Earle of Pembrooke with all his retinue, was upon the way to joyne with him; also thither came to him Richard Griffith and John Morgan, with a band of brave Welsh men; and the same day, Sir Gilbert Talbot with all the Earle of Shrewsburyes Tenants, (being about two thousand well appointed men) came unto him: with these he marched towards Shrewsbury; at which time word is brought him, that Sir Robert Herbert and Rice ap Thomas, were ready with a great power to stoppe his passage: which somewhat troubled him; that his friends so suddenly should revolt: but it was but a trick of Rice ap Thomas to make his bargaine the surer: for soon after, Rice ap Thomas meets him, and offers him his service, so as the Earle will pledge his faith to performe his promise formerly made; which was, that having once obtained the Crown, he would make Rice sole Governour of Wales: which was now assented to, and afterward performed. At this time the Lord Stanley with five thousand men, had taken up his lodging at the Town of Leicester; but hearing of the Earles march that way, he left Leicester and went to Atherston; not daring to shew himself openly for the Earle; for feare the King should put his Sonne the Lord Strange to death, whom he had left an Hostage with him.

All this time King Richard lay at Nottingham, and was as it were fatally taken with a spirit of security; hearing that the Earle had but small assistance either from France or in England; and therefore slighting him as little able to doe any great matter: but when he heard that part of his own forces was revolted to him, then he began to looke about him, and sends present direction to the Duke of Norfolke, the Earles of Northumberland and Surry, with Sir Thomas Brackenbury Lieutenant of the Tower, with all speed to bring their forces to him at Lutterworth, from whence upon their arrivall, hearing that the Earle was encamped at Lichfield: he marcheth thitherward: At which time, Sir Walter Hungerford and some others, withdrew themselves from King Richards part: and Sir John Savage, Sir Bryan Stanford, and Sir Simon Digby, with their severall Forces, joyned with the Earle.

King Richard tooke the advantage of a large Plaine neere Bosworth, adjoyning to a Hill called Anne Beame; where he encamped: And observing by his Adversaries manner of approach, that they meant to give him battell; He the next morning put his Forces in order: The Vaunt-guard was led by the Duke of Norfolk, which consisted of one thousand two hundred Bow-men, flanked with two hundred Cuyrassiers, under the conduct of the Earle of Surrey: The Battaile King Richard led himselfe, which consisted of a thousand Bill-men, empaled with two thousand Pikes: The Reereward was led by Sir Thomas Brackenbury, consisting of two thousand mingled weapons, with two wings of Horsemen, containing fifteen hundred, all of them cast in to square maniples; expecting the Lord Stanley's comming with two thousand, most of them Horsemen: But the Lord Stanley caried himselfe so warily, that he might neither give cause of suspition to the King, nor yet cause of disadvantage to the Earle: that when, early in the morning, the Earle sent unto him, desiring his present repaire; he answered, that he must looke for no ayde from him, till the Battailes should be joyned; and therefore advised him, with all possible speed to give the Onset. This Answer somewhat staggered the Earle, because his number did but little exceed one halfe of the Kings: Yet to make the best shew he could, by the advice of his Counsell of War, he made his Vaward open and thin; of which John Earle of Oxford had the leading: The Earle himselfe led the Battaile: Sir Gilbert Talbot commanding the Right wing, and Sir John Savage the left: whose souldiers being all alike clad in white Coates and hoods of Frize; by the reflection of the Sun upon them, made them appeare in the view of their Enemies, double the number. The Reereward was governed by the Earle of Pembrooke, which consisted most of

of horse, and some Pikes and Black bills. King Richard to incourage his souldiers, made a solemne speech unto them: but alas! what hope could he have to put them in heart, whose hearts he had lost? or to raise alacrity in others, who had none in himself? For now the remembrance of his fore-passed villanies, and specially a fearfull dreame he had the night before, (wherein it seemed to him he saw divers Images like Devils, which pulled and haled him, not suffering him to take any rest or quiet) so damped his spirits, that although he set a good face upon the matter, yet he could not choose but have a presaging feare that the date of his dayes was not farre from expiring. The Earle of Richmond on the other side, having a cleere conscience in himself, and speaking to men that followed him for love, had the easier means to give them encouragement: which he did with so cheerfull a countenance, as though already he had gotten the victory. After their military exhortations ended, King Richard commanded to give the onset. Between both Armies, there was a great Marish, which the Earle left on his right-hand, that it might be a defence for his souldiers on that side; and besides by so doing, he had the Sunne at his back, and in the faces of the enemy. When king Richard saw that the Earles company was passed this Marish, he commanded with all speed to set upon them. Then were the Arrowes let fly on both sides, and those spent, they came to hand-strokes; at which encounter comes in the the Lord Stanley, and joyns with the Earle. The Earle of Oxford in the mean time, fearing lest his company should be compassed in with the multitude of his enemies, gave charge in every ranke, that no man should goe above ten foot from the Standard: whereupon they knit themselves together, and ceased a while from fighting: which the Enemy seeing, and mistrusting some fraud, they also pausèd and lesr striking. But then the Earle of Oxford, having brought all his Band together, set on the Enemy afresh; which the Enemy perceiving, they placed their men slender and thinne before, but thick and broad behinde; and resolutely againe began the Fight. While these two Vaunt-guards were thus contending, King Richard was informed, that the Earle of Richmond with a small number was not farre off: whereupon he presently makes towards him; and being of an invincible courage, whereof he was now to give the last proofe, he made so furious an assault, that first with his own hands he slew Sir William Brandon, who bore the Earles Standard; next, he unhorst and overthrew Sir John Cheyny, a strong and stout man at Armes; and then assaulted the Earle of Richmond himself, who (though no man would have thought it, yet) for all the Kings fury, held him off at his Launces point, till Sir William Stanley came in with three thousand fresh men; and then oppresst with multitude, King Richard is there slaine. It is said, that when the Battell was at the point to be lost, a swift horse was brought unto him, with which he might have sawed himselfe by flight: but out of his undaunted courage he refused it, saying He would that day make an end of all Battells, or else lose his life. In this Battell, Henry Earle of Northumberland, who led King Richards Reereward, never strook stroke; as likewise many other, who followed King Richard more for Feare than Love: and so King Richard who had deceived many in his time, was at this time deceived by many: which was not unforeseen by some, who caused a Rhyme to be set upon the Duke of Norfolks gate the night before the Battell, which was this:

Jack of Norfolke be not too bold,
For Dickon thy Master is bought and sold.

Yet notwithstanding this warning, the noble Duke continued firme to king Richard; and more considering what he was towards him, then what towards others; followed him to the last, and in his quarrell lost his life. This John Howard was the sonne of Sir Robert Howard knight, and Margaret eldest daughter of Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolke, in whose right he was created Duke of Norfolke by king Richard the Third, in the yeere 1483. having been made a Baron before by king Edward the Fourth. The whole number slain in this battell on king Richards part was not above a thousand persons; whereof of the Nobility, besides the Duke of Norfolke, only Walter Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir Robert Brakenbury Lieutenant of the Tower, and not many Gentlemen more. Sir William Catesby

Catesby, one of the chiefe Counsellours of king Richard, with divers others, were two dayes after beheaded at Leicester. Amongst those that ran away, were Francis Viscount Lovell, Humfry Stafford, and Thomas Stafford his brother, who took Sanctuary in Saint Johns at Glocester. Of Captives and Prisoners there were great number. Henry Earle of Northumberland, who though on king Richards side, intermitted not in the battell; was incontinently taken into favour, and made of the Counsell: But Thomas Howard Earle of Surry, though he submitted himselfe, yet as having been specially familiar with king Richard, was committed to the Tower; where he remained a long time: but at last was delivered and highly promoted. On the Earle of Richmonds part were slaine scarce a hundred persons; (some say, but ten) of whom the principall was Sir William Brandon, the Earles Standard-bearer. This battell was fought at Rodmer, neer Bosworth in Leicestershire, the two and twentieth day of August, in the yeer 1485. having continued little above two houres. Presently after the battell, the Earle knighted in the field, Sir Gilbert Talbot, Sir John Mortimer, Sir William Willoughby, Sir Rice ap Thomas, Sir Robert Poynts, Sir Humfry Stanley, Sir John Turbervile, Sir Hugh Persball, Sir R. Edgecombe, Sir John Bykenill, and Sir Edmund Carew: and then kneeling down, he rendred to Almighty God his hearty Thankes for the victory he had obtained; and commanded all the hurt and maimed persons to be cured: whereat the people rejoycing, clapped their hands and cryed, king Henry, king Henry: which good will and gladnesse of the people when the Lord Stanley saw, he tooke the Crown of king Richard, which was found amongst the spoiles in the field, and set it on the Earles head, as though he had been elected King by the voice of the people. It may not be forgotten, that when king Richard was come to Bosworth, he sent to the Lord Stanley to come presently to his presence; which if he refused to doe, he swore by Christs Passion, that he would strike off his sonnes head before he dined: whereto the Lord Stanley answered, That if he did so, he had more sonnes alive, and he might doe his pleasure; but to come to him, he was not then determined. Which answer when king Richard heard, he commanded the Lord Strange immediately to be beheaded; but being at the very time when both Armies were in sight of each other; his Lords perswaded him, it was now time to fight, and not to put to Execution: and so the Lord Strange escaped.

Of his Taxations.

WEE must not looke for Taxations in kinde, in this kings reigne; for he drew from his Subjects not money so much as blood; and the money he drew was most by blood, which drew on confiscation: whereof, let never any Prince make a president: for where Taxations properly doe but Tondere, these did Deglubere. Yet in his second yeere, he called a Parliament, wherein besides the great confiscations of those that were then attainted, he imposed upon the people a great Tax, which what it was, is not Recorded.

Of his Lawes and Ordinances.

HAving gotten the Crowne by Pestilent courses, he sought to Establish it by wholsome Laws: for in no Kings reigne were better Lawes made, then in the reign of this man. Amongst other of his Laws, It was enacted, that from thence forth, the Commonalty of the Realme should in no wise be charged by any imposition called a Benevolence, nor any such like charge; and that such exactions called a Benevolence, before this time taken, shall be taken for no example to make any such like charge hereafter; but shall be damned and annulled for ever. Many other good Laws were by him made; that we may say, he took the wayes of being a good King, if he had come to be King by wayes that had been good.

Affaires

Affaires of the Church in his time.

IN his time, the troubles of the Temporalty kept the Clergie at quiet; and though there were complayning in the streets, there was none in the Church. One Shores wife might complaine, why shee should doe Penance for offending lightly against onely the seventh Commandement; and king Richard doe none for offending heavily against all the ten; but that perhaps he had gotten some good fellow to be his Confessour.

Workes of Piety done by him.

AS bad as this King was, yet some good workes he did: he founded a Colledge at Middleham beyond Yorke; and a Collegiate Chauntry in London, neere unto the Tower, called our Lady of Barking: He endowed the Queens Colledge in Cambridge, with five hundred Marks of yeerly revenue; and disforested the great field of Whitchwood, which king Edward his brother had inclosed for Deere.

Of Casualties happening in his time.

IN his second yeat, at the time when the Duke of Buckingham meant to passe with his Army over Severn; so great an inundation was of water, that men were drowned in their beds, houses were overturned, children were carried about the fields swimming in Cradles, beasts were drowned on hills: which rage of water continued ten dayes; and is to this day in the Countries thereabout, called the great water, or the Duke of Buckinghams water.

Of his wife and issue.

HEE married Anne the second Daughter of Richard Nevill the great Earle of Warwicke, being the widdow of Edward Prince of Wales, the Sonne of king Henry the sixth: she lived his Wife to the last yeer of his reigne; and then to make way for another, was brought to her end, and layd at rest in the Abbey of Westminster: by her he had onely one Sonne, born at Middleham neer Richmond in the County of Yorke; at foure yeers old, created Earle of Salisbury by his Uncle king Edward the fourth; at ten yeers old, created Prince of Wales by his Father king Richard, but dyed soon after.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

THere never was in any man a greater uniformity of Body and Minde then was in him; both of them equally deformed. Of Body he was but low, crooke-backt, hook-shouldred, splay-footed, and goggle-eyed, his face little and round, his complexion swarfie, his left arm from his birth dry and withered: born a monster in nature, with all his teeth, with haire on his head, and nailes on his fingers and toes. And just such were the qualities of his minde: One quality he had in ordinary, which was, to look fawningly when he plotted, sternly when he executed. Those vices which in other men are Passions, in him were Habits: and his cruelty was not upon occasion, but naturall. If at any time he shewed any virtue, it was but pretence; the truth of his minde was onely lying and falsehood. He was full of countenance and yet not valiant; valour consisting not only in doing, but as well in suffering, which he could not abide. He was politick and yet not wise, Policie looking but to the middle, wisdome to the end: which he did, and did not. And it was not so much ambition that made him desire the Crown, as cruelty, that it might be in his power to kill at his pleasure: and to say the truth, he was scarce of the number of men who consist of flesh and blood, being nothing but blood. One Miracle

 wc

wee may say hee did; which was, that he made the truth of History to exceed the fiction of Poetry, being a greater Harpy than those that were feigned. He would faine have been accounted a good King, but for his life he could not be a good Man; and it is an impossible thing to be one without the other. He left no issue behinde him: and it had been pitty he should, at least in his own Image; One such Monster was enough for many Ages.

Of his Death and Buriall.

BEing slaine in the Battell at Bosworth, as before is related; his body was left naked and despoyled to the very skin, not so much as a clout left about him to cover his privy parts: and taken up, was trussed behinde a Pursuivant at Armes, one Blanch Sengler or White-boare; his head and armes hanging on one side of the horse, and his leggs on the other; and all besprinkled with mire and dirt, he was brought to the Gray-Friers Church within the Towne of Leicester, and there for some time lay a miserable spectacle; and afterward, with small Funerall-pompe, was there interred. But after this, King Henry the Seventh caused a Tombe to be made, and set up over the place where he was buried, with a picture of Alablaster representing his person; which at the suppression of that Monastery was utterly defaced: Since when, his Grave overgrowne with nettles and weeds, is not to be found; onely the Stone-chest wherein his Corps lay, is now made a drinking-trough for horses, at a common Inne in Leicester, and reteineth the onely memory of this Monarchs greatnes. But his body (as is reported) was caried out of the City, and contemptuously bestowed under the end of Bow-bridge, which giveth passage over a branch of Soure, upon the West side of the Towne. Upon this bridge (the like report runneth) stood a stone of some heigth; against which king Richard, as hee passed towards Bosworth, by chance strook his spurre: and against the same stone, as he was brought back, hanging by the horse side, his head was dashed and broken; as a Wise-woman (forsooth) had fore-told, who before his going to battell, being asked of his successe, said, that where his spurre strooke, his head should be broken. But these are but Reports. He had lived seven and thirty yeeres, Reigned two, and two moneths.

Of men of Note in his time.

OF men of Note for wickednesse and villany, enough have been mentioned in the body of the Story: and for men of Valour and Learning, they will fitter be placed in a better Kings Reigne.

THE REIGNE OF KING HENRY THE SEVENTH.

HENRY Earle of Richmond, borne in Pembrooke-Castle, sonne to Edmund Earle of Richmond, by his wife Margaret, sole daughter of John Duke of Somerset, which John was sonne of John Earle of Somerset, sonne of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, by his third wife Katherine Swinford; and by this descent, Heire of the House of Lancaster: having wonne the Battell at Bosworth, against King Richard; is by publick acclamations saluted King of England, on the 22 day of August, in the yeere 1485. and this was his first Title. And now to take away a Root of danger; before his departure from Leicester, he sent Sir Robert Willoughby to the Castle of Sheriffehaton in the County of Yorke, for Edward Plantagenet Earle of Warwick, sonne and heire to George Duke of Clarence, being then of the age of fifteen yeeres, whom King Richard had there kept a prisoner all his time; who was thence conveyed to London, and shut up in the Tower to be kept in safe custodie. In the same Castle also, King Richard had left residing the Lady Elizabeth eldest daughter to King Edward the Fourth: and her now King Henry appoints honorably attended to be brought up to London, and to be delivered to the Queene her mother. This done, he tooke his journey towards London; where at his approaching neere the City, Thomas Hill the Major, Thomas Brittaine and Richard Chester Sheriffs, with other principall Citizens, met him at Shore-ditch, and in great state brought him to the Cathedrall Church of St. Paul, where he offered three Standards: in the one was the Image of St. George; in another was a red fiery Dragon, beaten upon white and greene Sarcenet; in the third was painted a dun Cow, upon yellow Tarterne. After Prayers said, he departed to the Bishops Palace, and there sojourned a season: And in the time of his stay here, he advised with his Councell, and appointed a day for solemnizing his marlage with the Lady Elizabeth: before which time notwithstanding, he went by water to Westminster, and was there with great solemnity Anointed and Crowned King of England, by the whole consent as well of the Commons as of the Nobility, by the name of Henry the Seventh, on the thirtieth day of October, in the yeere 1485: and this was his second Title. And even this was revealed to Cadwalloder last King of the Britaines, seven hundred ninety and seven yeeres past; That his off-spring should Raigne and beare Dominion in this Realme againe.

On the seventeenth day of November following, he called his High Court of Parliament; where, at the first sitting, two scruples appeared: One concerning the Burgesses; for that many had been returned Burgesses and knights of Shires, who by a Parliament in king Richards time, stood Attainted still: and it was thought incongruous, for men to make Lawes, who were themselves out-lawed: For remedy whereof, an Act was presently passed for their restoring; and then they were admitted to sit in the House. The other concerning the King himselfe, who had been Attainted by king Richard: but for this, It was resolved by all the Judges in the Chequer Chamber, that the possession of the Crowne takes away all defects; yet for Honours sake, all Records of his Attainder were taken off the File. And so these scruples thus removed, the Parliament began; wherein were Attainted, first Richard late Duke of Glocester, calling himselfe Richard the Third: Then, his Assistants at the Battell of Bosworth: John late Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Earle of Surrey, Francis Viscount Lovell, Walter Devereux late Lord Ferrers, John Lord Zouch, Robert Harington, Richard Charlton, Richard Ratcliffe, William Berkley of Weley, Robert Middleton, James Harington, Robert Brackenbury, Thomas Pilkington, Walter Hopton, William Catesby, Roger Wake, William Sapcote, Humfry Stafford, William Clerke of Wenlock, Geoffry St. Germaine, Richard Watkins, Herauld at Armes, Richard Revell, Thomas Pulter, John Welsh, John Kendall late Secretary to the late king Richard, John Buck, Andrew Rat, and William Brampton of Burford. But notwithstanding this Attainder, divers of the persons aforesaid, were afterwards not only by King Henry pardoned, but restored also to their lands and livings. As likewise he caused Proclamation to be made, that whosoever would submit themselves, and take Oath to be true subjects, should have their Pardon: whereupon many came out of Sanctuaries and other places; who submitting themselves, were received to mercy.

And now King Henry considering that Pœna & Præmio Respublica continetur; after Punishing for Offences, he proceeds to Rewarding for Service: and first, Jasper Earle of Pembrooke his Unkle, he created Duke of Bedford: Thomas Lord Stanley he created Earle of Derby: the Lord Chandow of Britaine, his speciall friend, he made Earle of Bathe: Sir Giles Daubeney was made Lord Dawbeney: Sir Robert Willoughby was made Lord Brookes: and Edward Stafford eldest sonne to Henry late Duke of Buckingham, he restored to his Dignity and Possessions. Besides, in this Parliament, an Act was made, for setling the Crowne upon the person of king Henry and the heires of his Body successively for ever. And then with all speed he sent and redeemed the Marquesse Dorset, and Sir John Bourchier, whom he had left Hostages in France for money: and called home Morton Bishop of Ely, and Richard Fox; making Morton Archbishop of Canterbury, and Fox Lord Keeper of the Privy Seale, and Bishop of Winchester. Besides these, he made also of his Privy Counsell, Jasper Duke of Bedford, John Earle of Oxford, Thomas Stanley Earle of Derby, John Bishop of Ely, Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlaine of his Household; Sir Robert Willoughby Lord Brooke, Lord Steward of his Household; Giles Lord Dawbeny; John Lord Dynham, after made Lord Treasurer of England; Sir Reginold Bray, Sir John Cheyny, Sir Richard Guildford, Sir Richard Tunstall, Sir Richard Edgecombe, Sir Thomas Lovell, Sir Edmund Peynings, Sir John Risley, with some other.

These things thus done: as well in performance of his Oath, as to make his Crown sit the surer on his head; on the eighteenth day of January, he proceeded to the solemnizing his marriage with the Lady Elizabeth; which gave him a third title: And indeed this conjunction made a wreath of three so indissoluble, that no age since hath ever questioned it: and it is fixt upon a Tree planted so happily by the waters side, and hath at this day so many flourishing branches, that there is good hope it will continue as long as the world continues.

And now whether King Henry doubted any suddaine attempt upon his person, or whether he did it to follow the example of France: in the very beginning of his reigne, he ordained a band of tall personable men to be attending upon him, which was called the Kings guard; which no King before, and all Kings since, have alwaies used: But though he provided a guard for defence of his own body; yet for the bodies of his people he could provide none; for at this time a sickneſſe (of the symptome called the sweating sickneſſe) seized so violently upon them, that within a short time many thousands perished; particularly in London, two Majors successively and six Aldermen within eight dayes dyed: and for this sickneſſe no Physick afforded any cure; till at last, this remedy was found: if a man were taken with the sweat in the day time, that then he should presently lye downe in his cloathes, and so lye still the whole foure and twenty houres: if he were taken in the night, then he should not rise out of his bed for the space of foure and twenty houres; not provoking sweat, nor yet eating or drinking at all, at least but very moderately. In this sickness there was one good circumstance; that though it were violent, yet it lasted not long: for beginning about the one and twentieth of September, it cleered up before the end of October following.

And now all things being set in good order in the South parts, there ariseth a little stirre in the North, but was soon dispersed. For King Henry making a journey into the North parts, to shew himselfe there where he had not yet been; and where the respect to King Richard might have left some opposites: at his comming to Yorke was certified that the Lord Lovell and Humfry Stafford were gone out of Sanctuary in Colchester; but whither, no man knew. The King therefore not much regarding it, went forward to York; and being come thither, it was then plainly told him, that the Lord Lovell with a strong power was at hand, and would presently invade the City. This made the King in a great streight; for neither had he any Army ready; nor if he had men, had he any weapons or Munition for them. Yet in this streight, he commanded the Duke of Bedford with three thousand men to set out against him, but so ill armed, that their armours for the most part were but of tanned leather; who being come neere the Campe of the Rebels, caused Proclamation to be made, that whosoever would submit themselves as loyall Subjects, should have their Pardons, and be received into grace: which Proclamation so prevailed, that it made the Lord Lovell secretly in the night to flye away; and then the Army left without a head, submitted themselves to the Kings mercy. The Lord Lovell fled into Lancashire; and there for a time lurked with Sir Thomas Broughton, a man powerfull in those parts. Humfry Stafford took Sanctuary in a village called Culnham two miles from Abington: but the Sanctuary being judged by the Justices of the Kings Bench, to be no lawfull defence for Traytors; he was taken from thence by force, and convayed to the Tower, afterward to Tyburne, and there hanged. His brother Thomas was pardoned, because it was thought, he was drawn in by his brother Humfry.

In this yeere, John Persivall the Major of London's Carver, waiting at his Table, was chosen one of the Sheriffs of London, only by Sir John Collet's, then Major, drinking to him in a cup of Wine, (as the custome is, to drinke to him whom he fill to name Sheriffe) and forthwith the said Persivall sate downe at the Majors Table, and covered his head, and was afterward Major himselfe.

At this time a mean instrument attemped a great worke; by which we may see, how farre imagination may out-goe reason: One Richard Symond a Priest, a man of base birth though some learning; had a scholler of baser birth, the Sonne of a Shoemaker, (some say a Baker) named Lambert Symnell; but of a pregnant wit, and comely personage: Him he gives out to be Edward Earle of Warwicke, lately (as was sayd) escaped out of prison; Both of them being of like yeers and stature: with this Scholler of his, he sailes into Ireland; and so sers forth the matter: that not only the Lord Thomas Fitz-Gerard Earle of Kildare, and Deputy of Ireland; but many other of the Nobilty gave credit to his words; and as those that affected the house of Yorke, were ready to take his part; and even already saluted the young Symnell King. Withall they sent into Flanders to the Lady Margaret, sister to the late King Edward, and widdow of Charles Duke of Burgoigne, requiring ayde and assistance from her. This Lady being of the house of Yorke, bore an inward grudge against King Henry, being of the house of Lancaster; and therefore though she well understood it was but a coloured matter, yet was willing to take advantage of it: and there-

thereupon promiſed her aſſiſtance. King Henry being advertiſed of theſe things, adviſed with his Counſell; by whom it was agreed, that two things preſently ſhould be done. Firſt, to grant a Pardon to any that would ſubmit themſelves, for any offence whatſoever, though it were for High Treaſon; the next, that the Earle of Warwicke ſhould be openly ſhewed abroad in the City, and other publike places; whereby, the report ſpread abroad of his being in Ireland, might appeare plainly to be falſe. Withall, the Queen Elizabeth, widdow of King Edward the fourth, and Mother to the preſent Queen, was adjudged to forfeit all her Lands and Poſſeſſions, and to live confined in the Abbey of Bermondſey in Southwarke; where in great penſivenes, within a few yeers ſhe died. But for what cauſe this ſeverity was uſed againſt this Queen, is not altogether certaine: To ſay, (as was commonly ſaid) that it was for rendring her ſelfe and her daughters into the hands of king Richard, were manifeſt injuſtice, to puniſh her for doing a thing out of feare, which elſe ſhe ſhould have been compelled to doe by force: and to ſay (as ſome alſo have ſaid) that it was for giving aide underhand to Perkin, were a manifeſt unlikelihood, that ſhe ſhould aide a Counterfeit againſt her own Sonne in Law: we muſt therefore content our ſelves with knowing the bare colourable pretext, and leave the true reaſon as a ſecret of State. But this ſhewing abroad of the true Earle of Warwicke, though it ſatisfied ſome, yet not all: for ſome gave out that it was but a trick of the King, and not the true Warwicke. At leaſt the Earle of Lincolne, ſonne to John de la Poole Duke of Suffolke, and Elizabeth ſiſter to king Edward the fourth, would not omit to take the advantage, though he knew that Symnell was but a Counterfeit. And thereupon, aſſoone as the Parliament was diſſolved, he fled ſecretly into Flanders, to his Aunt the Lady Margaret Dutcheſſe of Burgoigne; between whom it was concluded, that he and the Lord Lovell ſhould goe into Ireland, and there attend upon the Counterfeit Warwicke, and honour him as king: and with the power of the Iriſhmen bring him into England: but it was concluded withall, that if their actions ſucceeded, then the Counterfeit Warwicke ſhould be depoſed, and the true be delivered out of priſon, and anoynted King. And to this purpoſe, the Earle of Lincoln, by the aide of the Lady Margaret, had gotten together two thouſand Almaines, with one Martin Swart a valiant and expert Captaine to be their leader. With this power, the Earle ſayled into Ireland, and at the City of Dublin, cauſed young Lambert the Counterfeit Warwicke, in moſt ſolemne manner, firſt to be Proclaimed, and after to be Crowned king of England: and then with a great number of beggerly and unarmed Iriſhmen, under the Conduct of the Lord Thomas Gerardine Earle of Kildare, they ſayled into England, and landed at a place called the Pile of Fowdray, not farre from Lancaſter; hoping there by the meanes of Sir Thomas Broughton, a powerfull man in that Country, to have their Army both furniſhed and increaſed. King Henry hearing that the Earle of Lincolne was landed at Lancaſter, aſſembled a great Army, Conducted by the Duke of Bedford, and the Earle of Oxford; and with theſe he marched to Nottingham, and there by a little wood called Bowres, he pitched his field; whither there came unto him, the Lord George Talbot Earle of Shrewsbury, the Lord Strange, Sir John Cheyney, and divers other Knights and Gentlemen. In which mean time, the Earle of Lincolne being entred into Yorkeſhire, paſſed quietly on his journy, without doing ſpoile or hurt unto any; truſting thereby to have won the people to come to his aide: but when he perceived few or none to reſort unto him, he then determined to venture a battell with the Army he had already; and thereupon tooke his way from Torke to Newarke upon Trent. King Henry underſtanding which way he took, came the night before the battell to Newarke; and going three miles further, neer to a little Village called Stoke, there waited the approach of the Earle of Lincolne; So the next day they joyned battell; where after a long fight, of at the leaſt three houres; though the Almaines, and ſpecially their Captaine Martin Swart behaved themſelves moſt valiantly; yet their Iriſh, being in a manner but naked men, were at laſt overthrown, foure thouſand ſlaine, and the reſt put to flight; but not one of their Captaines; for the Earle of Lincolne, the Lord Lovell, Sir Thomas Broughton, Martin Swart, and the Lord Gerardine were all found dead in the very very place where they had ſtood fighting; that though they loſt the battell, yet they wonne the reputation of hardy and ſtout ſouldiers. Onely of the Lord Lovell, ſome report, that attempting to ſave himſelfe by flight; in paſſing over the river of Trent, was drowned. On the kings part, though ſome were ſlaine, yet not any man of note. This battell was fought on a Saturday (obſerved as alwayes fortunate to king Henry) being the ſixteenth of June, in the ſecond year of king Henries reigne. The young Lambert, and his Maſter Simond the Prieſt, were both taken; and both had their lives ſaved: Lambert, becauſe but a Childe; Symond, becauſe a Prieſt: yet Symond was kept in priſon, Lambert was taken into the kings kitchin, to turn the ſpit in the turne of his fortune, and at laſt made one of the kings Faulkners.

In the beginning of his third yeer, king Henry having been in Yorkeſhire, to ſettle the mindes of that people: about the midſt of Auguſt, came to Newcaſtle upon Tine, and from thence ſent Ambaſſadours into Scotland, Richard Fox lately before made Biſhop of Exceter, and Sir Richard Edgecombe Comptroller of his Houſe, to conclude a Peace or Truce with James king of Scots: A Peace, by reaſon of the peoples backwardnes, could not be obtained: but a Truce was concluded for the term of ſeven yeers; with a promiſe from the king, that it ſhould be renued before the firſt ſeven yeers ſhould be expired.

At this time, Ambaſſadours came from the king of France, to king Henry; who declared, that their Maſter king Charles was now at warre with Francis Duke of Britaine, for that he ſuccoured the Duke of Orleance and other Rebels againſt the Realme of France; and therefore requeſted, that for the old familiarity that had been between them, he would either aſſiſt him, or not aſſiſt the Duke, but ſtand Neuter. King Henry anſwered, that having received courteſies from them both, he would do his uttermoſt endeavour to make them friends: and to that end, as ſoon as the French Ambaſſadours were departed, he ſent Chriſtopher Urſwick his Chaplain over into France; who ſhould firſt goe to the French king, and after to the Duke of Britaine, to mediate a Peace between them.

In the time of Urſwicks Ambaſſage, king Henry cauſed his Wife the Lady Elizabeth to be Crowned Queen, on Saint Katherines day in November, with all ſolemnity; and at the ſame time delivered the Lord Thomas Marqueſſe Dorſet out of the Tower, and received him againe into his former favour.

Urſwick travelled between the two Princes, to procure a Peace; but they, though making a ſhew to incline to Peace, yet prepared for warre, and offers on neither ſide would be accepted. In which time, Edward Lord Woodvile Uncle to the Queen, made ſuite to the king, for leave to goe over with a power of men, in aide of the Duke of Britaine; which ſute, though the king denied, yet the Lord Woodvile would venture it; and with a power of foure hundred able men, got ſecretly over, and joyned with the Britaines againſt the French. This the French king took ill at king Henries hand; but being informed that it was againſt the kings will, he ſeemed ſatisfied: and a Peace was concluded between France and England, to endure for twelve months. But in concluſion, king Henry finding that the French king dealt not really with him, but only held him on with pretences; he called his high Court of Parliament, requiring their advice what was fit to be done: where it was concluded, that the Duke of Britaine ſhould be aided; and to that end great ſummes of money were by Parliament granted. This Determination of the Parliament, king Henry ſignifies to the French king, hoping, it would have wrought him to ſome terms of Peace. But the king of France little regarding it, proceeded on in his violent courſes againſt the Britaines; ſo as at laſt, on the eight and twentieth day of July, the Britaines gave battell to the French, neer to a Town called Stilhalcyn; having apparelled ſeventeen hundred of the Britains, in Coats with red Croſſes after the Engliſh faſhion, to make the Frenchmen believe they were all Engliſh, although in deed they had no more Engliſh than the foure hundred of the Lord Woodvile. But notwithſtanding this device, the Victory fell to the French; ſo that all the Engliſhmen almoſt were ſlaine, with the Lord Woodvile himſelfe; beſides ſix thouſand Britaines. The Duke of Orleance and the Prince of Orange, who were there on the Britaines part, part, were taken Prisoners. The French lost twelve hundred men; and amongst others that valiant Italian Captaine James Galeot.

This news being brought into England, caused king Henry to make haste to send forth his Army: and thereupon, the Lord Brooke, with Sir John Cheyny, Sir John Middleton, Sir Ralph Hilton, Sir Richard Corbet, Sir Thomas Leighton, Sir Richard Lacon, & Sir Edmund Cornwall, are sent over with all speed into Britaine; having with them eight thousand men, to aide the Duke of Britaine against the French. But while this warre was thus set forward, the Duke of Britaine died; leaving in effect, one only Daughter, the Lady Anne (for the other being the younger, died soon after) and then the chiefe Rulers of Britaine falling at dissention amongst themselves, little regarded the defence of the Country: whereupon the English returned home, within five moneths after their setting forth: and the French king getting the upper hand of the Britaines, and marying the Lady Anne sole daughter of the Duke of Britaine, incorporated that Dutchy to the Crown of France.

In the last Parliament, a Subsidie was granted, for the furnishing out an Army into Britaine; and it was agreed, that every man should be taxed after the rate of his substance, to pay the tenth penny of his goods: which Taxe the most part of Yorkeshire and the Bishoprick of Durham refused to pay: whereof the Collectours complained to Henry E. of Northumberland, President of the North parts. The E. signifies it to the King; and the K. commands him to levy the same, by distresse or otherwise (without sparing of any) as he should think most meet. The rude multitude, hearing of this Command from the King, with great violence set upon the Earle, by the exciting of a simple fellow named John a Chamber; and alledging all the fault to be in the Earle, as chiefe authour of the Taxe; they cruelly murthered both him and divers of his household servants. And to make good their seditious fact, they assembled a great number, and made one Sir John Egremond their Captaine: Declaring, that in defence of their liberties, they would bid the King battell. In this bravery they stood, as long as none opposed them: but when Thomas Earle of Surry appered with an Army, though they skirmished a while, yet they were soon discomfited, and their Ring-leader John a Chamber was taken, and at Yorke on a Gibbet set upon a square paire of Gallows, like an arch Traytour was hanged, and many of his Complices on a lower Gallows; the innocent people for the most part Pardoned. But Sir John Egremond fled into Flanders, to the Lady Margaret Dutchesse of Burgundie; the common and sure refuge for all Rebels against King Henry. After this, the king appointed Sir Richard Tunstall to gather the Subsidie, and would not spare the paiment of a penny. This year, notwithstanding this Taxe, the king borrowed of every Alderman of London two hundred pounds, and of the Chamber nine thousand eighty two pounds seventeen shillings and foure pence, which was paid again at the time with great thankfulnesse; which he did at a time he needed not, to the end perhaps he might doe it another time, when he needed.

At this time, James the third, king of Scotland, having by some errors of Government incurred the hatred of his Nobility and people; laboured with king Henry, as also with the Pope, and the king of France, to make an Accord between him and his people, who had compelled Prince James his Sonne, to be the Titular head of those Armes which they assumed against him. The kings accordingly interposed their mediations by Ambassadours; but could receive no other but this outragious answer, That there was no talking of Peace; unlesse he would resigne his Crowne. Which answer the kings protested against, declaring by their Ambassadors, that they thought it a common injury done to themselves, and that the Example was not sufferable, for Subjects to lift their hands against their Soveraigne. Hereupon it came to a Battell, at Bannocke-borne by Strivelin: where king James, rashly beginning the fight, before his whole Forces were come, was (notwithstanding the contrary commandement of the Prince his sonne) slaine in the Mill of that field, whither he fled, after the Battell ended.

About this time, a Difference fell out which grew to a Warre, between the Emperour Frederick, and some Townes of his in Flanders, especially Gaunt and Bruges: In

In this warre, the Lord Ravenstein a principall person about Maximilian, not onely forsooke the Emperour and his sonne Maximilian his Lord, (corrupted as was thought from France) but made himselfe head of the popular party, seizing upon the Towns of Ipre and Sluce: and not this onely, but forthwith sent to the Lord de Cordes Governour for the French king in Picardie, to ayde him against some Towns in Flanders: To which the Lord de Cordes, willing of any occasion to set foot in Flanders, was easily drawne. But king Henry not liking to have the French so neere his English pale, sent over the Lord Morley with a thousand men, who should joyne with the L. Dawbeney then Deputy of Callice, to resist them. Amongst other acts by them performed, this was chiefe; That the Lord Dawbeney, with the Lord Morley, Sir James Tyrrell Captaine of Guisnes, Sir Henry Willoughby, Sir Gilbert Talbot, and Sir Humfry Talbot Marshall of Callice, and others to the number of two thousand, issued secretly one night out of Callice, and came to Newport, and from thence to Dixmue; where the Lord Dawbeney commanded all men to send back their horses: which the Lord Morley onely refusing to doe, was cause that he onely of all the Captaines was slaine with a Gun: for the rest, after their arrowes discharged, fell prostrate to the ground; by which meanes the Enemies Ordnance overshot them, killing onely the Lord Morley that was on horse-back. Here they slew of the Enemy, to the number of eight thousand; of the English part was slaine the Lord Morley; and not above a hundred more. This Victory so enriched the English, that they who went forth in cloath, came home in silke; and they who went out on foot, returned back on horse-back. Upon this Defeat, the Lord de Cordes lying at Ypre with twenty thousand men, and thinking to be revenged, besieged the Town of Newport; and so strongly assaulted it, that one day his men entred, and set up his Banner upon a Tower of the Towne: when suddenly a Barke arriving with onely fourescore fresh English archers, so terrified them, thinking their number to be farre greater, that the French were glad to leave their Banner behinde them, and give over the assault; and the night following, the Lord de Cordes (who so much longed for Callice, that he would commonly say, he could be content to lie seven yeeres in Hell, so that Callice were in the possession of the French) brake up his siege, and returned to Helding with as much shame, as the English to Callice with honour.

A little before this time, Francis Duke of Britaine dying, left onely one daughter, the Lady Anne, affianced to Maximilian King of the Romans; and in so solemne a manner, that she taking upon her to be the Bride, and being laid in her bed, was contented to permit Maximilians Deputy, in presence of many Noble witnesses, as well men as women, to put his legge, stript naked to the knee, between the spousall sheets; accounting that Ceremony to amount to a Consummation. The King of France likewise had been contracted to the Lady Margaret daughter to the foresaid Maximilian, and had received her to that end: Yet all this notwithstanding, out of a violent desire to joyne the Dutchy of Britaine to the Crowne of France, he disanulled and made void both the Contracts. But to the end he might doe it without opposition of the King of England, he sent Ambassadors, the Lord Francis of Luxemburg, Charles Marignane, and Robert Gaguine, to King Henry; partly to conclude a Peace, but chiefly to procure king Henries good will to make voyd the foresaid contracts: to which though king Henry was not willing to give consent, yet he consented willingly to have a Treaty for Peace: and to that end, sent over Thomas Earle of Ormond, and Thomas Goldenston Prior of Christs Church in Canterbury, to the French King about it. But during this Treaty, and before conditions of Peace could be agreed on, the French King had gotten into his possession the Lady Anne of Britaine, and solemnly maried her. Which under-hand dealing so incensed King Henry, that he presently called his High Court of Parliament, and there declared the just cause he had of War with France, desiring their Benevolence towards the charge thereof; which was as readily granted as desired, and great summes of money were soon collected.

In the yeere 1491, being the sixth yeere of the Kings Reigne, on the sixth of April, the Nobility of the Realme assembled in the Cathedrall Church of St. Paul in in London; where alſo was the Major and Aldermen, and principall Citizens in their liveries: to whom D. Morton Lord Chancellour made an Oration; declaring from his owne letters, that the King of Spaine had wonne the great and rich City and Country of Granado from the Moores, which had been in their poſſeſſion above ſeven hundred yeeres: and having in places of their ſuperſtition, built Churches to the honour of Chriſt, was thereupon intituled the Catholick King. For joy whereof, Te Deum was ſung with great ſolemnity.

In the moneth of May was holden a ſolemne Juſting, at the kings Palace of Sheene, now called Richmond, which continued the ſpace of a moneth; ſometimes within the Palace, and ſometimes without, upon the green before the gate; in which Juſts, Sir James Parker running againſt a Gentleman named Hugh Vaughan, by reaſon of a faulty Helmet, was ſtrucken into the mouth at the firſt courſe; ſo that his tongue was borne to the hinder part of his head, in ſuch ſort that he dyed preſently upon the place.

And now Maximilian having received back his daughter from the king of France, was ſo diſpleaſed, that he preſently ſent an Ambaſſadour, one James Contibald to king Henry, requiring him to take his part in a warre againſt the French king; towards which he promiſed to provide ten thouſand men, with pay for two years: king Henry conſented to it; and having provided himſelfe of a puiſſant Army, on the ſixth day of October, ſayled to Callice; but ſending his Almoner Chriſtopher Urſwicke, and Sir John Roſley to Maximilian, requiring his promiſed forces; they found him altogether unprovided of either men or money: which brought king Henry into a great ſtreight what he ſhould doe: To proceede in the warre with his own forces alone, would be full of hazard; To return home without doing any thing, would bring an imputation upon him amongſt his Subjects; as though he had uſed the pretence of war, but as a trick to get money: at laſt, he reſolved to doe ſomething; and thereupon, went and beſieged Boloigne, having in his Army of chiefe Lords, Jaſper Duke of Bedford, his Lieutenant Generall, Thomas Marqueſſe Dorſet, the Earles of Arundell, Oxford, Suffolke, Shrewsbury, Darby, Kent, Devonſhire and Ormond, ſundry Barons, as Dawbeney, Aburgayny, De la Ware, Zouch, Haſtings, Cobham and others. During his ſiege of Boloigne, (in which there were but few ſlaine, and no man of note, but Sir Iohn Savage, who riding to take view at what place the town might beſt be aſſaulted, was ſet upon by certaine French men, and by them ſlaine) King Henry was ſecretly dealt with by the Lord Cordes Governour of Heynault, on the king of France's behalf, to accept of certaine conditions of Peace. Who thereupon ſent Richard Fox Biſhop of Exceter, and Giles Lord Dawbeney to conclude them; which amongſt other Articles were, That king Henry without quitting his claime to France, ſhould for a Peace to continue during the two kings lives, receive in preſent of Charles king of France, for his charges in that warre, ſeven hundred forty and five thouſand Duckets, which in Engliſh money amounts to one hundred eighty ſix thouſand two hundred and fifty pounds; and five and twenty thouſand crowns yeerly, towards the expenſes he had been at before in aiding the Britaines; which (by the Engliſh, called Tribute) was duly paid, during all the Kings Reigne, and alſo to king Henry his Sonne afterward, longer then it could continue upon any computation of charges. There were alſo aſſigned by the French king unto all king Henries principall Counſellours, great penſions, beſides rich gifts for the preſent. Which whether the king did permit, to ſave his own purſe from Rewards, or to communicate the envy of a buſineſſe that was diſpleaſing to his people, was diverſly interpreted: for certainly, the King had no great fancy to own this Peace; and therefore a little before it was concluded, he had underhand procured ſome of his beſt Captaines and Men of Warre, to adviſe him to a Peace under their hands, in an earneſt manner, in the nature of a Supplication, that he might have it ſhew for juſtifying himſelfe, and to give ſome allay to the diſcontentments of many, who had ſold and engaged their Eſtates, upon the hopes of the warre. After the Peace thus concluded, he went to Callice, where he ſtayed ſome time, and the ſeventeenth of December following came to Weſtminſter, where he kept his Chriſtmaſſe.

Soon

Soon after his return, he elected into the order of the Garter, Alphonſus Duke of Calabria, Sonne and Heire to Ferdinand King of Naples: to whom Chriſtopher Urſwicke the kings Almoner, was ſent to Naples to carry it; which as ſoon as Alphonſus had received, he apparelled himſelfe preſently in the Habit, before a great aſſembly, indeed to ſhew what favour he was in with the king of England.

There had been diſturbance in the Realme before, by a Counterfeit Sonne of the Duke of Clarence; but that device had two maine imperfections: One, that the true Sonne of the Duke was forth-comming, and to be ſhewed openly for convincing the falſe; the other, that though the counterfeit had been the true, yet he could have laid no claim to the Crown, as long as any Daughters of King Edward the fourth were living: Now therefore a device is found, by which thoſe imperfections were both of them amended: for now a Counterfeit was ſet on foot, who pretended to be Richard the younger Sonne of king Edward the fourth; ſo that neither any other could be produced to convince him of being falſe, nor any Daughters of King Edward could hinder his Right for claiming the Crown. This device was firſt forged by Margaret Dutcheſſe of Burgundie; a woman that could never be quiet in her minde, as long as king Henry was quiet in his kingdome; and by this device ſhe hoped, if not to put him cleane out of his ſeat, yet foulely at leaſt to diſturbe him in it; and this was the purpoſe of the Plot: but by what inſtrument it was acted, by what abettours fomented, and what iſſue the device had, are worthy all to be related. The Dutcheſſe having formerly given out, that Richard the younger Sonne of king Edward, was not murthred, but in compaſſion ſpared, and ſent ſecretly away to ſeek his fortune; and having after long ſearch gotten at laſt a fit Boy to perſonate a Prince; keeps him ſecretly a good time with her; in which time ſhe ſo throughly inſtructed him in all Circumſtances, and he afterward put them ſo gracefully in practice, that even thoſe who had ſeen and known the young Prince while he lived, could hardly perceive but that this was he. It is true, though he were not King Edwards Sonne, yet he was his Godſonne; and might perhaps have in him ſome baſe blood of the houſe of Torke. This Perkin Warbeck, (for ſo was the youths name, called Perkin, as a diminutive of Peter) when he ſo perfectly had learned his leſſon, that he was fit to come upon the Stage; ſhe ſent him into Portingall, that comming from a ſtrange Country, it might be thought, he had been driven to wander from one Country to another, for ſafeguard of his life, at leaſt that ſhe of all other might not be ſuſpected. From Portingal ſhe cauſed him to paſſe into Ireland, where the houſe of Torke was ſpecially reſpected, in regard of the great love which Richard Duke of Torke, Father of King Edward the fourth, had wonne amongſt them: by reaſon whereof, this Perkin as eſteemed his Grand-childe, was well entertained by them, and held in great eſtimation. He had not been long in Ireland, when the French king ſent for him; for being at that time at variance with King Henry, hee thought he might make good uſe of Perkin, as a pretender againſt King Henry for the Crown. Perkin being come to Paris, was entertained in a Princely faſhion; and for his more honour, had a guard aſſigned him, over which the Lord Congreſhall was Captaine. He had not been long at Paris, when there reſorted to him Sir George Nevill baſtard, Sir John Taylour, Richard Robinſon, and about a hundred other Engliſh: Amongſt the reſt, one Stephen Fryon, that had been King Henries Secretary for the French Tongue; but diſcontented, fled, and became a chiefe Inſtrument in all Perkins proceedings. But this float of Perkins laſted not long; for as ſoon as Peace was concluded between the two Kings; the King of France diſmiſſed Perkin and would keep him no longer. Then paſſed he ſecretly to his firſt foundreſſe, the Lady Margaret; who at his firſt comming, made a ſhew of ſuſpecting him to be a Counterfeit. But cauſing him in great aſſemblies to be brought before her, as though ſhe had never ſeen him before; and finding him to anſwer directly to all queſtions ſhe put unto him: ſhe openly profeſſed, that ſhe was now ſatisfied, and thought him verily to be her true Nephew; and thereupon aſſigned a guard of thirty perſons, cloathed in Murrey and Blew, and called him the White Roſe of England. Upon report hereof, many in England were inclined to take his part; and Sir Robert

Clifford and Robert Bareley were ſent into Flanders, to acquaint the Dutcheſſe with the peoples reſpect to Perkin: and indeed Sir Robert Clifford, upon ſight and conference with him, wrote letters into England, wherein he affirmed, that he knew him to be true Sonne of king Edward, by his face, and other Lineaments of his body. King Henry hearing of theſe things, ſent certaine eſpials into Flanders, that ſhould feigne themſelves to have fled to Perkin; and by that means the better ſearch out who were of the Conſpiracy with him. Whoſe name being returned to the King, he cauſed them to be apprehended and brought to his Preſence; the chiefe of whom were John Ratcliffe Lord Fitzwater, Sir Simon Montford, and Sir Thomas Tiwyit knights, William Dawbeney, Robert Ratcliffe, Thomas Creſſenor, and Thomas Aſtwood, alſo certaine Prieſts, as William Richford D. of Divinity, Thomas Boyns, D. William Sutton, William Worſeley Dean of Pauls, Robert Layborne, and Richard Leſley, of whom, ſome hearing of it, fled to Sanctuary, others were taken and condemned, as Sir Simon Montford, Robert Ratcliffe, and William Dawbeney, who were all three beheaded. The Lord Fitzwater pardoned of life, was conveyed to Calice, and there laid in hold; where ſeeking to make eſcape by corrupting his Keeper, hee loſt his head. Shortly after, Sir Robert Clifford returning out of Flanders (not as ſome think, ſent a ſpye from the beginning; but rather now at laſt either diſcerning the fraude, or won by rewards) and ſubmitted himſelfe to the kings mercy: diſcovering unto him, as farre as he knew, all that were either open or ſecret abettours of the Conſpiracy; amongſt whom he accuſed Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlaine: his accuſation was this that in Conference between them, Sir William had ſaid, that if he certainly knew; that the young man named Perkin were the Sonne of king Edward the fourth, he would never fight nor beare Armes againſt him. Theſe words being conſidered of, by the Judges, ſeemed to expreſſe a tickle hold of Loyalty; for who could tell how ſoon he might be perſwaded that he knew it? and upon the matter, was to be Loyall to king Henry, but for want of better; and withall it ſtrook upon a ſtring which had alwaies ſounded harſh in king Henries ears, as preferring the Title of Yorke before that of Lancaſter. Sir William being hereupon arraigned; whether truſting to the greatneſſe of his favours, or the ſmalnes of his fault, denied little of that wherewith he was charged, and upon confeſſion was adjudged to dye; and accordingly on the ſixteenth day of February was brought to the Tower-hill, and there beheaded: after whoſe death, Giles Lord Dawbeny was made L. Chamberlaine. This was that Sir William Stanley, who came in to reſcue the Earle of Richmond, when he was in danger of his life; who ſet the Crowne upon his head, and was the cauſe of his being ſaluted King: And could it enter into his breaſt, to put him to death, that had ſaved his life, and done him ſo many great ſervices beſides? But it may be ſaid, It was not the Earle of Richmond that did it, but the King of England; for cerainly, in many caſes, a King is not at liberty to ſhew mercy, ſo much as a private man may. Though there be that affirme, the cauſe of his death was not words onely, but reall acts, as giving ayde to Perkin under-hand by money. And yet it ſeemes, there was ſome conflict in the minde of King Henry, what he ſhould doe in this caſe; for he ſtayed ſix weekes after his Accuſation, before before he brought him to his Arraignment. How-ever it was, the Summer following, the King went in Progreſſe to Latham, to the Earle of Darby, who had maried his mother, and was brother to Sir William Stanley: perhaps to congratulate his own ſafety; perhaps to condole with him his brothers death; but certainly to keepe the Earle from conceiving any ſiniſter opinion of him: For to thinke that Sir William's ſuing to be Earle of Cheſter, (an Honour appointed to the kings ſonne) or his great wealth (for he left in his Caſtle at Holt, in ready money forty thouſand markes, beſides Plate and Jewells) were cauſes that procured or ſet forward his death; are conſiderations very unworthy of ſo juſt a Prince, againſt a Servant of ſo great deſerving.

But in this meane while, Perkin having gotten a Power of idle looſe fellows, tooke to Sea, intending to land in Kent; where though he were repelled, yet ſome of his Souldiers would needs venture to goe on Land; of whom a hundred and ſixty perſons ſons were taken Priſoners, whereof five were Captaines; Mortford, Corbet, Whitehelt, Quinyn and Gemyne: Theſe hundred and ſixty perſons were brought to London, rayled in ropes, like horſes drawing in a Cart, who upon their Araignement, confeſſing their offence, were executed, ſome at London, and ſome in Towns adjoyning to the ſea-coaſt. Perkin finding no entertainment in Kent, ſayled into Ireland, and having ſtayed there a while, and finding them alſo, being a naked people, to bee no compatent aſſiſtants for him, from thence he ſayled into Scotland, where he ſo moved the King of Scots with his fayre words and colourable pretexts (made no doubt before by the Dutceſſe of Burgoigne) that hee received him in great ſtate, and cauſed him to bee called the Duke of Torke: and to perſwade the World that hee thought him ſo indeede, hee gave to him in marriage the Lady Katherine Gourdon, daughter to Alexander Earle Huntley, his own neer kinſwoman; and ſoone after, in Perkins quarrell, entred with a puiſſant Army into England; making Proclamation, that whoſoever would come in and ayde the true Duke of Torke, ſhould bee ſpared; but none comming in, he then uſed all kinde of cruelty, and the whole County of Northumberland was in a manner waſted: whereat Perkin, at his returne, expreſſed much griefe, ſaying It grieved him to the heart to ſee ſuch havock made of his people: To whom the King anſwered, Alas, Alas, you take care for them, who for any thing that appeares are none of yours; for not one of the Countrey came in to his ſuccour. King Henry incenſed with this bold attempt of the king of Scots, called his High Court of Parliament, acquainting them with the neceſſity hee had of a preſent warre to revenge this indignity offered him by the Scots, and thereupon requiring their ayde by money, had a ſubſidie of ſixſcore thouſand pounds readily granted him; and then in all haſte a puiſſant Army is provided, and under the conduct of the Lord Dawbeney ſent into Scotland, but before heearrived there hee was ſuddenly called back, by reaſon of a commotion begun at Cornwall, for payment of the Subſidie lately granted, which though it were not great, yet they grudged to pay it. The Ring-leaders of this commotion were Thomas Flammock, a gentleman learned in the Lawes, and Michael Joſeph a Smith; who laying the blame of this exaction upon John Morton Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Sir Reynold Bray, as being chiefe of the Kings Councell, exhorted the people to take armes; and having aſſembled an Army, they went to Taunton, where they ſlew the Provoſt Peryn, one of the Commiſſioners for the Subſidie, and from thence came to Wells, intending to goe to London where the King then lay, who having revoked the Lord Dawbeney, appointed Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey (after the death of the Lord Dinham, made Lord Treaſurer of England) to have an eye to the Scots, and if they made invaſion, to reſiſt them. In the meane time Iames Twychet Lord Audley confederated himſelfe with the Rebells of Cornwall, and tooke upon him to bee their Leader, who from Wells went to Saliſbury, and from thence to Wincheſter, and ſo to Kent, hoping there to have had great ayde, but found none; for the Earle of Kent, the Lord of Aburgeny, John Brook Lord Cobham, Sir Edmond Poynings, Syr Richard Guildford, Sir Thomas Bourchier, John Peachy and William Scott were ready in Armes to reſiſt them; whereupon the Rebels brought their Army to Black-heath, foure miles diſtant from London, and there in a plaine on the top of a hill encamped themſelves; whereof when the King had knowledge, hee preſently ſent John Earle of Oxford, Henry Bourchier Earle of Eſſex, Edmond de la Poole Earle of Suffolke, Sir Rice ap Thomas and Sir Humfry Stanley to inviron the hill on all ſides, that ſo all hope of flight might bee taken from them; and then ſet forward himſelfe, and encamped in St. Georges fields, where for encouragement he made divers Bannarets. The next day he ſent the Lord Dawbeney to ſet upon the Rebels early in the morning, who firſt got the bridge at Detford Strand, though ſtrongly defended by the Rebels Archers, whoſe arrowes were reported to bee a full cloath-yard in length; but notwithſtanding the Lord Dawbeney comming in with his Company, and the Earles aſſaylng them on every ſide, they were ſoone overcome: In which conflict were ſlaine of the Rebels above two thouſand; taken priſoners a very great number, many of whom the King pardoned, but of the chiefe Authors none: for the Lord Audley was drawne from

New-

Newgate to Tower-hill, in a coate of his owne Armes paynted upon paper, reverſed and all torne; and there, on the foure and twentieth day of June was beheaded. Thomas Flammock and Michael Joſeph were hanged drawn & quartered, and their heads and quarters pitched upon ſtakes, ſet up in London and other places. Of the Kings Army were ſlaine not above three hundred. It is memorable with what comfort Joſeph the black-ſmith cheered up himſelfe at his going to execution, ſaying that yet he hoped by this that his name and memory ſhould be everlaſting: ſo deere even to vulgar ſpirits is perpetuety of Name, though joyned with infamy, what is it then to Noble ſpirits, when it is joyned with Glory?

In the meane time the king of Scots taking advantage of theſe troubles in England, invaded the Frontiers, forraged the Biſhoprick of Durham, and at laſt beſieged the caſtle of Norham, whereof Richard Fox then Biſhop of Durham was owner; who thereupon ſent preſently to the Earle of Surrey, acquainting him with this Invaſion: Whereupon the Earle, taking with him Ralph Earle of Weſtmerland, Thomas Lord Barnes, Ralph Lord Nevill, George Lord Strange, and many other Lords and knights, and an Army of little leſſe then twenty thouſand men, beſides a Navy, whereof the Lord Brooke was Admirall; ſet forward againſt the Scots, and not only forced the Scots to raiſe their ſiege of Norham Caſtle, but followed them alſo into Scotland, where he overthrew and defaced the Caſtle at Cawdeſtraynes, the Tower of Hetherhall, the Tower of Edington, the Tower of Fulden, and at laſt by compoſition tooke the ſtrong Caſtle of Hayton, and raſed it to the ground. At the Earles being at Hayton, the King of Scots ſent to him Marchemont and another Herald, requiring him, at his election, either to fight with him with their whole Armies, or elſe they two to fight in ſingle combat; upon condition, that if the victory fell to the Scotiſh king, the Earle ſhould deliver for his Ranſome the Towne of Barwick: Whereunto the Earle made anſwer, that the Town of Barwick was the King his Maſters, and therefore not for him to diſpoſe of; but for his offer of ſingle combat, he willingly accepted it, and thought himſelfe highly honored by ſuch a match: But King James of Scotland had no meaning to performe either one or other, but privily in the night fled back into Scotland; and then the Earle returned to Barwick. In the meane time, one Peter Hyalas a man of great learning and policie, was ſent Ambaſſadour to the King of Scots, from the King of Spaine, to mediate a Peace between the two kings of of England and Scotland; who finding the King of Scots conformable to his motion, found after the King of England (who was never averſe from Peace upon honourable Conditions) no leſſe enclining to it: and ſo a Truce was concluded for certaine yeeres; upon conditition, that Perkin Warbeck ſhould be ſent out of the Scotiſh Dominions.

About this time, the Lord of Camphyre and others ſent from Philip Archduke of Auſtria and Duke of Burgundy, came to king Henry for a concluſion of Amity, and to procure the Engliſh merchants reſort againe to his Country: for king Henry ſome time before, upon diſpleaſure with the Flemings, but ſpecially with the Lady Margaret, for abetting Perkin Warbeck; not onely had baniſhed all Flemiſh wares and merchandizes out of his Dominions, but had alſo reſtrained all Engliſh merchants from having any traffick in any of their Territories, cauſing the Mart for all Engliſh commodities to be kept at Callice: but now, upon this invitation, and having found it had been a great hinderance to his owne Merchant-adventurers, and thereupon ſome inſurrections had riſen, he willingly condiſcended to their Requeſt; and ſo the Engliſh reſorted againe into the Archdukes Dominions, and were received into Antwerp with generall Proceſſion; ſo glad was that Towne of the Engliſh-mens returne.

In this eleventh yeere of the Kings Reigne, dyed Cicely Dutcheſſe of Yorke, mother to king Edward the fourth, at her Caſtle of Berkhamſtead, being of extreme age; who had lived to ſee three Princes of her body Crowned, and foure Murthered: ſhe was buried at Fodringham by her Huſband.

Shortly after the Truce concluded between England and Scotland, Perkin Warbeck was commanded to depart out of the Scotiſh Dominions: who thereupon with his

his wife and familie, ſayled into Ireland: where underſtanding that the Corniſhmen were ready to renue the warre againe, he thought beſt not to let paſſe ſo faire an occaſion; and thereupon, having with him foure ſmall ſhips, and not above ſixſcore men, he ſailed into Cornwall, and there landed in the moneth of September, and came to a Town called Bodmyn; where with faire words and large promiſes, he ſo prevailed with the people, that he had gotten to him above three thouſand perſons to take his part; and then made Proclamations in the name of King Richard the Fourth, as ſonne to King Edward the Fourth: and by the advice of his three Counſellors, John Heron a bankrupt Mercer, Richard Skelton a Tailour, and John Aſſley a Scrivener, determined to attempt firſt the winning of Exceter; which with great violence he aſſaulted, and the Townſmen with as great valiantnes defended: whereof when the King heard, he ſent the Lord Dawbeny to their reſcue: but before he came, the Lord Edward Courtney Earle of Devonſhire, and the valiant Lord Willian his ſonne, accompanied with Sir Edmund Carew, Sir Thomas Trenchard, Sir William Courtney, Sir Thomas Fulford, Sir John Halewell, Sir John Croker, Walter Courtney, Peter Edgecombe, William St. Maure with others came to their ayde: upon whoſe comming, Perkin left the ſiege, and retired to Taunton; where he muſtered his men, as though he meant to prepare for battell: but finding his number to be much diminiſhed, (for of ſix thouſand which he had at Exceter, many were fled from him, when they ſaw no Great ones to take his part) he began to diſtruſt his caſe; and hearing withall, that the king with a great Power was at hand: about midnight, with threeſcore horſe-men in his company, he departed in poſt from Taunton, and tooke Sanctuary in a Town called Beauly neere to Southampton. When king Henry heard that Perkin was fled, he ſent after him to the Sea-ſide, to ſtop his paſſage and apprehend him: But the meſſengers that were ſent, when they came to St. Michaels Mount, though they found not Perkin, yet there they found his wife the Lady Katharine Gourdon, whom they preſently brought to the king; a beautifull young Lady: to whom, in honour of her birth, and commiſeration of her beauty, the king allowed a competent maintenance, which ſhe enjoyed during the kings life, and many yeeres after. king Henry being come to Exceter, ſtayed there a few dayes, about examination of the Rebellion, and execution of the chiefe Offendours: of whom there being a great multitude, and all of them craving pardon, the king cauſed them all to be aſſembled in the Church-yard of St. Peter, where they all appeared bare-headed in their ſhirts, and halters about their necks: whom the king viewing out of a window made for the purpoſe; after he had paused a while, made a ſpeech unto them, exhorting them to obedience; and then, in hope they would afterward be dutifull Subjects, he pardoned them all: whereat they made a great ſhout, crying all, God ſave king Henry! though ſome of them afterward, like ungratefull wretches, fell into new Rebellions.

All this while Perkin was in Sanctuary: and the King thinking himſelfe in danger as long as he was in ſafety, ſet a Guard about the place, to keepe him for eſcaping; whereby Perkin was ſo reſtrained, that at laſt fee ſubmitted himſelfe to the kings mercy, and was thereupon ſent to the Tower to be there in ſafe cuſtodie. This done, king Henry appointed Thomas Lord Darcy, Sir Amyas Paulet, and Robert Sherborne Deane of Pauls, to be Commiſſioners, for making enquiry of the Offenders, and for aſſeſſing their Fines; which they did with great ſeverity to ſome, with great mildneſſe to others, to all with equity.

It was now the fourteenth yeer of the kings Reigne, when one Sebaſtian Gabato, a Genoua's Sonne, born at Briſtow, perſwaded the king to man and victuall a ſhip at Briſtow, to ſearch for an Iſland, which (he ſaid) he knew to be replenished with rich Commodities; who ſetting forth with three other ſmall ſhips of London Merchants, returned home two yeers after, when he had made a large diſcovery weſtward, and would have gone to Cathay, if the Mariners had not forced him to return: alikewiſe fifty yeares before, one Chriſtopher Columbus a Spaniard, made the firſt diſcovery of America.

Perkin being in the Tower and carefully guarded, yet found meanes to eſcape; and fled fled to the Priory of Sheen neer Richmond; where discovering himselfe to the Pryor of that Monastery, he begged of him for Gods sake, to get the kings Pardon for his life; which the Prior effected: but then was Perkin brought to the Court at Westminster, and was one day set fettered in a paire of Stocks before Westminster-hall, and there stood a whole day; the next day he was set upon a like Scaffold in Cheape-side, and there standing the whole day also, he then read openly his confession, written with his own hand; wherein he declared his Parentage and the place of his Birth, and all the passages of his Life, and by what means he was drawn to make this attempt. After this, he was committed againe to the Tower, and care taken, he should be better looked to than he was before. But all the care notwithstanding, once againe Perkin attempted to escape, and drawing into a Confederacy with him the young Earle of Warwicke; by faire words and large promises so corrupted his keepers, Strangwish, Blewet, Astwood and long Roger, servants to Sir John Digbie Lieutenant of the Tower, that they intended to have slaine their Master, and set Perkin and the Earle of Warwicke at liberty. But this practice was soone discovered, so that Perkin and John a Water, sometime Major of Corke in Ireland, one of Perkins chiefe founders, were on the sixteenth day of November arraigned at Westminster and condemned, and both of them on the two and twentieth day were drawn to Tyburne and there hanged; where Perkin tooke it upon his death, that the Confession he had formerly made, was true: soon after also Blewet and Astwood, two of the Lieutenants men, were in the same place executed. On the one and twentieth day of the same month, Edward Plantagenet Earle of Warwicke was arraigned at Westminster, before the Earle of Oxford, then High Steward of England; not for consenting to breake Prison, but for conspiring with Perkin to raise Sedition and destroy the king, and upon his Confession, had judgement, and on the eight and twentieth day of the same month, in the yeer 1499. was brought to the Scaffold on the Tower-hill, and there beheaded. This Earle of Worwick was the eldest Sonne of the Duke of Clarence, and was the last Heire male of the name of Plantagenet, and had been kept in the Tower from his very Infancy out of all company of Men and sight of Beasts; so as he scarcely knew a Hen from a Goose, nor one beast from another; and therefore could never know how to practice his escape of himselfe, but by Perkins subtlety: for which cause the king favoured him so farre, that he was not buried in the Tower, but at Bisham by his Ancestours. And thus ended the designes of Perkin Warbeck, which had troubled both the Kingdome and the King, the space of seven or eight yeers, a great part of the Kings Raigne.

But in the time of Perkins being in the Tower, another like practice was set on foot; for an Augustine Frier called Patrick, in the County of Suffolk, having a Scholler named Ralph Wilford a Cordwayners Sonne, he caused him to take upon him to be the Earle of Warwicke, lately by great chance gotten out of the Tower; and they going together into Kent; when the Frier perceived some light credit to be given to him, he then stuck not to declare it openly in the Pulpit, desiring all men to assist him. But this practice was soone discovered, and both the Mr. and the Scholler were apprehended & attainted; the Scholler Wilford was hanged on Shrovetuesday at S. Thomas Waterings, and the Frier was condemned to perpetuall Prison: for at that time so much reverence was attributed to holy Orders; that a Priest, though he had commited Treason against the king, yet had his life spared. And this practice was some cause to exasperate the king against the Earle of Warwicke, who though innocent in himselfe, yet was nocent in pretenders: and besides, king Ferdinand of Spaine, with whom at this time there was a Treaty for marriage of his Daughter to Prince Arthur, had written to the king in plaine terms, that he saw no assurance of his Sonnes succession, as long as the Earle of Warwicke lived: and thus all things unfortunately concurred to bring this innocent Prince to his end.

In the fifteenth yeer of his Reigne, partly to avoide the danger of the Plague, then raigning in England; but chiefely to conferre with the Duke of Burgoigne about many important businesses: the King and Queen sayled over to Callice; where at an enterview between him and the Duke, at Saint Peters Church without Callice, the Duke

Duke offered to hold the kings sturrup at his alighting, which the king by no meanes would permit; but descending from horse-back, they embraced with great affection: and after Communication had between them, the King and Queen in the end of June returned into England.

In his seventeenth yeer two great Marriages were solemnized: the Lady Katherine of Spaine was sent by her Father king Ferdinand, with a puissant Army of ships into England; where she arrived at Plimouth, the second day of October; and on the fourteenth of November after, was espoused openly to Prince Arthur, both being clad in white; He of the age of fifteen yeers, shee of eighteen: at night they were laid together in one Bed, where they lay as Man and Wife all that night: when morning appeared, the Prince (as his servants about him reported) called for drinke, which before time he had not used to doe; whereof one of his Chamberlaines asking him the cause, he answered merrily, saying, I have been this night in the middest of Spaine; which is a hot Country, and that makes me so dry: though some write, that a grave Matron was laid in bed between them, to hinder actuall Consummation. The Ladies portion was two hundred thousand Duckets; her joynture, the third part of the Principality of Wales, Cornwall and Chester. At this Marriage was great solemnity and Royall Justings; during which time, there came into London an Earle, a Bishop, and divers other noble personages sent from the king of Scots for a conclusion of a Mariage, (before treated of,) between the Lady Margaret the kings eldest daughter, and him; where the Earle by Proxie, in the name of king James his Master, affied and contracted the said Ladie, which Contract was published at Paules Crosse, the day of the Conversion of Saint Paul; for joy whereof, Te Deum was sung, and great fires were made through the City of London; and if such joy were made when the match was made, what joy should be made now at the issue of the match, when by the Union of those persons is made an Union of these kingdomes; and England and Scotland are but one great Britaine? The Ladies portion was ten thousand pounds, her joynture two thousand pounds a yeer, after king James his death; and in present one thousand. When this match was first propounded at the Counsell Table, some Lords opposed it; objecting, that by this means the Crown of England might happen to come to the Scottish Nation. To which King Henry answered, what if it should? It would not be an accession of England to Scotland, but of Scotland to England: and this answer of the kings passed for an Oracle, and so the match proceeded; and in August following was Consummate at Edinburgh, conducted thither in great State by the Earle of Northumberland.

Prince Arthur after his marriage, was sent againe into Wales, to keep that Country in good order; to whom were appointed for Counsellours, Sir Richard Poole, his kinsman and chiefe Chamberlaine, Sir Henry Vernon, Sir Richard Crofts, Sir David Philips, Sir William Udall, Sir Thomas Englefield, Sir Peter Newton, John Walleston, Henry Marton, and Doctor William Smith President of his Counsell: but within five moneths after his marriage, at his Castle of Ludlow he deceased, and with great solemnity was buried in the Cathedrall Church at Worcester. His Brother Henry Duke of Yorke, was stayed from the title of Prince of Wales, the space of halfe a yeer, till to women it might appeare, whether the Lady Katherine, the Relict of Prince Arthur were with childe, or no. The towardlines in learning of this Prince Arthur is very memorable; who dying before the age of sixteen yeers, was said to have read over all or most of the Latine Authours, besides many other.

And now Prince Arthur being dead, and the Lady Katherine of Spaine left a young widdow; King Henry loath to part with her dowry, but chiefely being desirous to continue the Alliance with Spaine: prevailed with his other Sonne Prince Henry (though with some reluctation, such as could be in those years (for he was scarce twelve years of age)) to be contracted with the Princesse Katherine his brothers widdow; for which marriage, a dispensation by advice of the most learned men at that time in Christendome, was by Pope Julius the second granted, and on the five and twentieth day of June, in the Bishop of Salisburyes house in Fleet-street, the marriage was solemnized.

A little before this time, Edmund de la Poole Earle of Suffolke, Son to John Duke of Suffolke and Lady Elizabeth Sister to king Edward the fourth, had in his fury kill'd a man perſon, and was thereupon indighted of Murther, for which, although he had the kings Pardon, yet becauſe he was brought to the Kings-bench-barre, and there arraigned; he took it for ſo great a blemiſh to his honour, that in great rage he fled into Flanders to his Aunt the Lady Margaret; where having ſtayed a while, when his paſſion was over, he returned againe. But after the marriage between Prince Arthur and the Lady Katherine, whether it were that in that ſolemnity he had run himſelfe in debt, or whether he were drawn to doe ſo by the Lady Margaret, he paſſed over the ſecond time, with his brother Richard, into Flanders. This put the king into ſome doubt of his intention, whereupon he hath recourſe to his uſuall courſe in ſuch caſes, and ſent Sir Robert Curſon Captaine of Hammes Caſtle, to feigne himſelfe one of that Conſpiracy, thereby to learn the depth of their intentions: And to take away all ſuſpition of his employment, the firſt Sunday of November, he cauſed the ſaid Earle and Sir Robert Curſon with five others to be accurſed openly at Pauls Croſſe, as Enemies to him and his Realme. In concluſion, Sir Robert Curſon acquainted the king with divers of that faction; amongſt whom, William Lord Courtney, and William de la Poole, brother to the foreſaid Earle of Suffolke, who were taken but upon ſuſpition, yet held long in priſon: but Sir James Tyrrell (the ſame that had murthered the two young Princes in the Tower) and Sir John Windham, who were proved to be Traytors, were accordingly attainted, and on the ſixth day of May at the Tower-hill beheaded. Whereof when the Earle heard, deſpairing now of any good ſucceſſe, he wandred about all Germany and France, where finding no ſuccour, he ſubmitted himſelfe at laſt to Philip Duke of Auſtria, by whom afterward he was delivered to king Henry, by this occaſion: Ferdinand king of Aragon, by his Wife Iſabella Queen of Caſtile, had onely two Daughters, the eldeſt whereof named Joane, was married to this Philip Duke of Auſtria; the younger, named Katherine, to Arthur Prince of England: and now Queen Iſabella being lately dead, by whoſe death the kingdome of Caſtile deſcended in Right of his Wife, to this Duke Philip; they were ſayling out of Germany into Spaine to take poſſeſſion of the kingdome; but by tempeſt and contrary windes were driven upon the coaſt of England, and landed at Weymouth in Dorſetſhire; where deſiring to refreſh themſelves a little on ſhore, they were invited by Sir Thomas Trenchard (a principall knight of that Country) to his houſe, who preſently ſent word to the king of their arrivall. King Henry glad to have his Court honoured by ſo great a Prince, and perhaps upon hope of a courteſie from him, which afterward he obtained: ſent preſently the Earle of Arundell to waite upon him, till himſelfe might follow; and the Earle went to him in great magnificence, with a gallant troope of three hundred Horſe, and for more State came to him by Torch-light. Upon whoſe Meſſage, though king Philip had many reaſons of haſte on his journey; yet not to give king Henry diſtaſte, and withall to give his Queen the comfort of ſeeing the Lady Katherine her Siſter; he went upon ſpeed to the king at Windſor, while his Queen followed by eaſie journeys. After great magnificence of entertainment, king Henry taking a fit opportunity, and drawing the king of Caſtile into a roome, where they two onely were private; and laying his hand civilly upon his arme, ſaid unto him; Sir, you have been ſaved upon my Coaſt: I hope you will not ſuffer me to wrack upon yours. The king of Caſtile aſking him, what he meant by that ſpeech? I mean it (ſaith the king) by that haire-brain'd fellow the Earle of Suffolke; who being my ſubject, is protected in your Country, and begins to play the foole when all others are weary of it. The king of Caſtile anſwered; I had thought, Sir, your felicity had been above thoſe thoughts; but if it trouble you, I will baniſh him: king Henry replyed, that his deſire was to have him delivered to him: with this, the king of Caſtile a little confuſed ſaid, That can I not doe with my honour: Well then (ſaid the king) the matter is at an end: at laſt the king of Caſtile, who held king Henry in great eſtimation, compoſing his countenance, ſaid, Sir you ſhall have him; but upon your Honour, you ſhall not take his life: I promiſe it upon mine Honour, ſaid ſaid King Henry: and he kept his promiſe; for he was not put to death during all his Reigne; but yet he tooke ſuch order, that in the Reigne of his Sonne K. Henry the Eighth, he had his head cut off. During the king of Caſtiles being here, a Treaty was concluded, and beares date at Windſor; which the Flemings terme Intercurſus malus, for that the Free fiſhing of the Dutch upon the Coaſts and Seas of England, granted in the Treaty of Undecimo, was not by this Treaty confirmed, as all other Articles were. And now, when king Henry had received the king of Caſtile into the Fraternity of the Garter, and had his Sonne Prince Henry admitted to the order of the Golden fleece; and that the Earle of Suffolk was brought over and committed to the Tower; the king of Caſtile departed home.

In this kings time were two Calls of Serjeants at Law: One in his eleventh yeere, in which were called nine Serjeants, Mordant, Higham, Kingeſmill, Coniſby, Butler, Taxely, Frowick, Oxenbridge, and Conſtable; who kept their feaſt at the Biſhop of Ely's Place in Holborne, where the King, the Queen, and all the chiefe Lords dined. The other Call, in his twentieth yeere; in which were called ten Serjeants, Robert Brudnell, William Grevill, Thomas Marow, George Edgore, Lewis Pollard, Guy Palmes, and William Fairfax; who kept their feaſt at the Archbiſhops houſe in Lambeth.

King Henry having gotten as much honour as the Eſtimation of neighbouring Princes could give him, began now to be intentive to getting of wealth; wherein he quickly found Inſtruments fit for his purpoſe, but ſpecially two, Empſon & Dudley both Lawyers; Dudley of a good family, but Empſon the ſon of a Sieve-maker. Theſe two perſons being put in Authority, turned Law and Juſtice into Rapine. For firſt, their manner was, to cauſe divers Subects to be indicted of Crimes, and then preſently to commit them; and not produce them to their anſwer, but ſuffer them to languiſh long in Priſon; and by ſundry artificiall devices and terrors, extort from them great Fines, which they termed Compoſitions and Mitigations. Neither did they (towards the end) obſerve ſo much as the halfe face of Juſtice, in proceeding by Indictment; but ſent forth their Precepts to attach men, and convent them before themſelves and ſome others at their private houſes, and there uſed to ſhuffle up a Summary proceeding by examination, without tryall of Jury; aſſuming to themſelves, to deale both in Pleas of the Crowne, and controverſies Civill. Then did they alſo uſe to enthrall and charge the Subjects lands with Tenures in Capite, by finding falſe Offices; refuſing upon divers pretexts and delayes, to admit men to traverſe thoſe falſe Offices, as by Law they might. Nay the Kings Wards, after they had accompliſhed their full age, could not be ſuffered to have livery of their lands, without paying exceſſive Fines, farre exceeding all reaſonable rates. When men were outlawed in perſonall actions, they would not permit them to purchaſe their Charters of Pardon, except they paid great and intolerable ſummes; ſtanding upon the ſtrict point of Law, which upon Outlawries gives forfeiture of goods. Nay, contrary to all Law and colour, they maintained, the King ought to have the halfe of mens lands and rents during the ſpace of full two yeeres, for a Paine in caſe of Outlawry. They would alſo ruffle with Jurors, and enforce them to finde as they would direct; and if they did not, then convent, impriſon, and fine them. Theſe and many other courſes they had of preying upon the people: but their principall working was upon Penall Statutes; wherein they conſidered not whether the Law were obſolete, or in uſe; and had ever a rabble of Promoters and leading Jurors at their command, ſo as they could have any thing found, either for Fact or Valuation. There remaineth to this day a Report, that King Henry was on a time entertained very ſumptuouſly by the Earle of Oxford, at his Caſtle of Heningham: and at the Kings going away, the Earles ſervants ſtood in their livery-coates with cogniſances, ranged on both ſides, to make the King a lane: Whereupon the King called the Earle to him, and ſaid: My Lord, I have heard much of your Hoſpitality, but I ſee it is greater than is ſpoken; Theſe handſome Gentlemen and Yeomen whom I ſee on both ſides of me, are ſure your Meniall ſervants. At which the Earle ſmiled, and ſaid: It may pleaſe your Grace, that were not for mine eaſe; They are moſt of them my Retainers, and are come to doe me ſervice at ſuch a time as this, and chiefly to ſer-see your Grace. Whereat the King ſtarted a little, and ſaid: By my faith (my Lord) I thanke you for my good cheere; but I may not endure to have my Lawes broken in my ſight: my Attourney muſt ſpeake with you about it. And it is part of the Report, that it coſt the Earle for a compoſition, fifteen thouſand marks. And to ſhew further the Kings extreme diligence: I remember (ſaith Sir Francis Bacon Lord of Virulam in his Hiſtory) to have ſeene long ſince a Booke of Accompt of Empſons, that had the kings hand almoſt to every leafe, by way of ſigning; and was in ſome places poſtilled in the Margent with the kings owne hand likewiſe, where was this Remembrance:

Item, Received of ſuch a one five markes; for the Pardon to be procured; and if the Pardon doe not paſſe, the money to be repayd, except the party be ſome other way ſatisfied.

And over againſt this Memorandum (of the kings owne hand,) Otherwiſe ſatisfied. This (ſaith he) I doe the rather mention, becauſe it ſhewes in the king a Neatneſſe, but yet with a kinde of Juſtneſſe.

In his three and twentieth yeere, there was a ſharpe proſecution againſt Sir William Capell now the ſecond time, for miſgovernment in his Majoralty: The great matter was, that in ſome payments he had taken notice of falſe monies, and did not his diligence to examine who were the Offenders: for which and ſome other things laid to his charge, he was condemned to pay two thouſand pounds; whereof, being a man of ſtomack, he refuſed to pay a farthing; and thereupon was ſent to the Tower, where he remained till the Kings death. Kneſworth likewiſe, that had been lately Major of London, and both his Sheriffs, were for abuſes in their offices queſtioned and impriſoned, and not delivered but upon payment of one thouſand foure hundred pounds. Sir Lawrence Ailmer, who had likewiſe been Major of London, and his two Sheriffs, were put to the Fine of one thouſand pounds; and Sir Lawrence, for refuſing to pay it, was committed to priſon, where hee ſtayed till Empſon himſelfe was committed in his place. By theſe courſes hee accumulated ſo great ſtore of Treaſure, that he left at his death, moſt of it in ſecret places, under his own key and keeping at Richmond, (as is reported) the ſumme of neer eighteen hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. But though by this courſe he got great ſtore of Treaſure, yet by it he loſt the beſt treaſure (the peoples hearts) but that he ſomething qualified it by his laſt Teſtament, commanding that Reſtitution ſhould be made of all ſuch moneys as had unjuſtly been levied by his Officers.

It ſeemes king Henry, after the death of his Queene the Lady Elizabeth, had an inclination to marry againe; and hearing of the great beauty & virtue of the young Queene of Naples, the widow of Ferdinando the younger; he ſent three confident perſons, Francis Marſyn, James Braybrooke, and John Stile, to make two inquiries; one of her perſon and conditions, the other of her Eſtate: Who returning him anſwer, that they found her Beauty and Virtues to be great, but her Eſtate to be onely a certaine Penſion or Exhibition, and not the kingdome of Naples as he expected, he then gave over any further medling in that matter. After this, another Treaty of Mariage was propounded to the king, betweene him and the Lady Margaret Dutcheſſe Dowager of Savoy, onely daughter to Maximilian, and Siſter to the king of Caſtile; a Lady wiſe and of great good fame: In which buſineſſe was imployed, for his firſt piece, the kings then Chaplain, and after the great Prelate, Thomas Wooſey. It was in the end concluded, with ample conditions for the king, but with promiſe de Futuro onely. Which mariage was protracted from time to time, in reſpect of the Infirmity of the king; which held him by fits till he dyed.

He left Executours, Richard Fox Biſhop of Wincheſter, Richard Fitz James Biſhop of London, Thomas Biſhop of Durham, John Biſhop of Rocheſter, Thomas Duke of Norfolk & Treaſurer of England, Edward Earl of Worceſter and Lord Chamberlaine, John F. knight, chiefe Juſtice of the Kings Bench, and Robert R. knight chiefe Juſtice of the Common Pleas. A little before his death, he had concluded a marriage (in which negociation Foxe Biſhop of Wincheſter was imp'oyed) between his younger Daughter the Lady Mary, of the age of ten years; and Charles king of Caſtile, not much much elder: but though concluded, yet not ſolemnized; and ſhe was afterward married to Lewis the French king.

Of his Taxations.

IN his third yeer, there was by Parliament granted toward the maintaining an Army in Britaine; that every man ſhould pay the tenth penny of his Goods: which Tax though at firſt withſtood in Yorkſhire and Durham; yet was afterward levied to the uttermoſt. In his ſeventh yeer, towards his warres in France, a Benevolence was by Parliament granted, by which great ſummes of money were co'lected of the richer ſort only. In his eleventh yeer, a Subſidie of ſixſcore thouſand pounds was granted him by Parliament, towards his wars with Scotland, which cauſed afterward the inſurrection in Cornwall. In his nineteenth yeer a Subſidie was granted him by Parliament. In his one and twentieth yeer, he raiſed great ſummes of money from offenders againſt Penall Statutes: the greateſt, but the unjuſteſt way for raiſing of money, that ever any king of England uſed: and not content with this, he required and had at the ſame time a Benevolence both from the Clergie and Laity. To the Clergie was imployed Richard Fox, then Biſhop of Wincheſter; who aſſembling the Clergie before him, exhorted them to be liberall in their contribution; but the Clergie being of two ſorts, rich and poore, made each of them their ſeverall excuſes: The rich and ſuch as had great livings, ſaid, they were at great charges in keeping hoſpitality and maintaining their families, and therefore deſired to be ſpared: The poorer ſort alledged, that their means were ſmall, and ſcarce able to finde them neceſſaries, and therefore deſired to be forborne. But the Biſhop anſwered them both with a pretty Dilemma, ſaying to the rich, It is true, you live at great charges in hoſpitality, in apparell and other demonſtrations of your wealth; and ſeeing your have ſtore to ſpend in ſuch order, there is no reaſon but for your Princes ſervice you ſhould do it much more, and therefore you muſt pay. To the poorer ſort he ſaid, though your livings be ſmall, yet your frugality is great, and you ſpend not in houſe-keeping and apparell as other doe; therefore be content, for you ſhall pay.

Of his Lawes and Ordinances.

THIS King was the firſt that ordained a company of tall ſtrong men, (naming them Yeomen of the Guard) to be attending about the perſon of the king; to whom he appointed a Livery by which to be known, and a Captaine by whom to be choſen. In his time, the authority of the Star-chamber, which ſubſiſted before by the Common Lawes of the Realme, was confirmed in certaine caſes by Act of Parliament. In his time were made theſe excellent generall Laws: One, that from thenceforth fines ſhould be ſmall, and conclude all ſtrangers rights: Another for admiſſion of poore ſuitours, In forma pauperis, without paying Fee to Counſellour, Atturney or Clerke. Another, that no perſon that did aſſiſt by Armes or otherwiſe the King for the time being, ſhould after be Impeached therefore or Attainted, either by courſe of the Law, or by Act of Parliament; and that if any ſuch Act of Attainder did happen to be made, it ſhould be void and of none effect. Another for the Benevolence, to make the ſummes which any had agreed to pay, and were not brought in, to be leviable by courſe of Law. Another, that Murtherers ſhould be burnt on the Brawn of the left hand, with the letter M. and Theeves with the letter T. ſo that if they offended the ſecond time, they ſhould have no mercy, but be put to death; and this to reach alſo to Clearkes Convict. In his fifth yeer, It was ordained by Parliament, that the Major of London ſhould have Conſervation of the river of Thames, from the bridge of Staines, to the waters of Tendale and Medway. In his ſeventeenth John Shaw Major of London, cauſed his brethren the Aldermen to ride from the Guild-hall to the waters-ſide, when he went to Weſtminſter to be preſented in the Exchequer: he alſo cauſed the kitchins and other houſes of office to be builded at the Guild-hall; where ſince that time, the Majors feaſt hath been kept;

kept, which before, had been in the Grocers or Taylours-hall. In his eighteenth yeer king Henry being himselfe a brother of the Taylours Company, as divers kings before had been, namely, Richard the third, Edward the fourth, Henry the sixth, Henry the fifth, Henry the fourth, and Richard the second; also of Dukes 11. Earles 28. Lords 48. he now gave to them the Name and Title of Merchant Taylours; as a name of worship to endure for ever.

Affaires of the Church in his time.

IN the tenth year of his Raigne, Joane Boughton widdow, was burnt in Smithfield, for holding certain opinions of John Wickliffe. In his seventh yeer, king Henry finding great inconvenience by the priviledge of Sanctuaries; wrote to Pope Alexander, desiring him by his authority, to adjudge all English men being fled to Sanctuary for the offence of Treason, to be Enemies to the Christian Faith; and to prohibite the priviledge of Sanctuary to all such as once had enjoyed it before: which request the Pope granted, to the great contentment of the king, and quiet of the Realme. In his sixteenth yeere being the yeer 1500. a Jubilee in Rome was celebrated; whereof Alexander the then Pope, by his messenger Gaspar Pont a Spaniard, gave notice to the king: offering withall, that those who could not come to Rome, should notwithstanding at a certaine price have Pardons, and as full a benefit of the Jubilee, as if they came; and to the end the king should not hinder his purpose, both offered part of his gaines to the king, and also promised to bestow it upon a warre against the Turke; by which course he gathered great summes, for which he had other use, than to spend it so idly. In the two and twentieth yeer of this king, Pope Alexander the sixth dyed of Poyson, by this accident: He went to supper in a Vineyard neer the Vatican, where his sonne Valentinois meaning to poyson Adrian Cardinall of Cornetto, sent thither certaine flaggons of Wine, infected with poyson, and delivered them to a servant of his, who knew nothing of the matter; commanding him, that none should touch them, but by his appointment: It happened, the Pope comming in something before supper, and being very dry through the immoderate heat of the season, called for drinke, his own provision being not yet come: The servant that had the poysoned wine in keeping; thinking it to be committed to him, as a speciall wine, brought of it to the Pope; and while he was drinking, his sonne Valentinois came in, and dranke also of the same; whereby they were both poysoned, but the Pope onely overcome of the poyson, died; his sonne by the strength of youth bare it out, though with long languishing.

Workes of Piety and other structures by him, and others.

THIS King magnificently enlarged Greenwich, which Humfry Duke of Glocester had formerly builded, calling it Placentia. In his sixteenth yeer, he new builded his Manour of Sheen, and named it Richmond: He also new builded Baynards Castle in London. In his two and twentieth yeer, he finished the goodly Hospitall of the Savoy neere to Charing-crosse, to which he gave lands for the relieving of two hundred poore people: This was first called Savoy place, built by Peter Earle of Savoy Father to Boniface Archbishop of Canterbury, about the nine and twentieth yeer of Henry the third, who made the said Peter Earle of Richmond. The house belonged since to the Duke of Lancaster; and at this time was converted to an Hospitall, reteyning still the first name of the Savoy. In this Kings time, John Morton being Bishop of Ely, bestowed great cost upon his house at Hatfield in Hartfordshire, now the house of the Right Honourable the Earle of Salisbury; and at Wesbich Castle in Cambridgeshire, a house belonging to that See; all the Brick building was of his charge: Being afterward Bishop of Canterbury, he bestowed great sums in repairing and augmenting his houses at Maidstone, Alington-Parke, Charing, Ford, Lambeth, and specially at Knoll in Kent, where he dyed. King Henry also builded three houses of Franciscan Friers, which are called observants; one at Richmond, another at Greenwich, a third at Newark; and three other of Franciscan Friers, which are called Conventuals, one at Canterbury, another at Newcastle, and a third at Southampton. And drawing neer his end, he did these workes of charity: He granted a generall Pardon to all men, for any offence commited against any of his Lawes, Theeves and Murtherers only excepted: He paid also all Fees of all Prisoners in all Goales in and about London, abiding there for that cause only: He paid also the Debts of all such persons as lay in the Counters or Lud-gate for forty shillings or under, and some also for ten pounds. In his eighteenth yeer, the Chappell of our Lady, above the East-side of the high Altar at Westminster Church, with a Tavern called the White-rose neer adjoyning, was taken down; in which place a most beautifull Chappell was then presently begun to be builded, by King Henry; the charges whereof amounted to the summe of fourteene thousand pounds (as Stow witnesseth.) In his second yeer, the great Conduite in Cheape-side, at the charges of Thomas Ilam Alderman of London, was new made; and the Crosse also in Cheape was new builded, toward the charges whereof, Thomas Fisher Mercer gave five hundred Markes. In his seventh yeer, the Conduite in Grace-street was begun to be builded by the Executors of Sir Thomas Hill Grocer, late Major of London. Also this yeer, Hugh Clopton Major of London builded the great bridge of Stratford upon Avon, as likewise a faire Chappell toward the South end of that Town; and neer unto the same, a pretty house of Brick and Timber, where he lay and ended his life: He glazed also the Chancell of the Parish Church in that Town; and made a Way of foure miles long, three miles from Alisbury towards London, and one mile beyond Alisbury. In his tenth yeer, John Tate Major of London, builded the Church of Saint Anthonies, with a Free-schoole, and certain Almeshouses for poore men. In his time, his Mother the Lady Margaret Countesse of Richmond, builded two Colledges in Cambridge, one called Christs Colledge, the other St. Johns; and endowed them with large possessions, for the maintenance of learning. Richard Fox Bishop of Winchester founded Corpus Christi Colledge in Oxford; and William Smith Bishop of Lincolne, Brazen-nose Colledge: He also builded at Liechfield an Hospitall, for a Master, two Priests, and ten poore men, as likewise a Free-schoole, with a Shoole-master and an Usher. Anne Audley gave a hundred Marks towards the building of the Church in Chester. In his time also John Alcock Bishop of Ely, builded Jesus Colledge in Cambridge: and in his two and twentieth year, Thomas Knesworth Major of London, builded the Conduite at Bishopsgate at his own charge; and gave to the Fishmongers certaine Tenements; for which they are bound to allow to foure Schollers, two at Oxford, and two at Cambridge, to each of them foure pounds a yeer: also to poore people and Prisoners in Ludgate something yeerly. In his twentieth yeer, Sir William Capell Major of London, caused all Hounsditch to be paved over; which till that time, had been very noysome to all travellers that way. In his fourteenth yeer, all the Gardens without Moorgate (which had continued time out of minde) were destroyed; and of them was made a plaine field, for Archers to shoot in. In this Kings time also, Thomas Savage Archbishop of Yorke, repaired the Castle of Cawood, and the Manour of Scroby, and founded the Chappell at Macles field in Cheshire, where he was borne. Also in his time, Stephen Genninges Major of London, founded a free Grammer Schoole at Wolverhampton in Staffordshire where he was borne; and gave lands sufficient for a Master and an Usher, leaving the oversight to the Merchant-Taylours in London. This Town of Wolverhampton, commonly so called, is originally and rightly called Wulfruna-hampton, upon this occasion: The Town was anciently called Hampton, to which a noble woman named Wilfrune, a widdow, sometime wife of Athelm Duke of Northampton; obtained of King Ethelred, to give lands to the Church there, which she had founded; and thereupon the Town tooke the addition of the said Wilfrune. In this Kings time also, John Collet Deane of Pauls, founded Pauls Schoole in the Church-yard there.

Casualties

Casualties happening in his time.

IN his first yeere happened the Sickneſſe called the Sweating-ſickneſſe, which though it continued not long, yet tooke away many thouſands: and in his two and twentieth yeer, the like Sweating-ſickneſſe happened againe; but by reaſon of Remedies found in the former, took away fewer.

In his ſecond yeer, Wheat was ſold for three ſhillings the Quarter, Bay-ſalt at the like price: In his ſeventh yeer, Wheate was ſold at London for twenty pence the Buſhell; which was counted a great dearth. In his tenth yeer, Wheate was ſold at London for ſix pence the Buſhell, Bay-ſalt for three pence halfe penny, Nantwich-ſalt for ſixpence, white Herrings nine ſhillings the Barrell, red Herrings three ſhillings the Cade, red Sprats ſix pence the Cade, and Gaſcoigne wines for ſix pounds the Tun. In his fifteenth yeer, Gaſcoigne wine was ſold at London for forty ſhillings the Tunne, a Quarter of Wheate foure ſhillings, and Bay-ſalt foure pence the Buſhell.

The two and twentieth of Auguſt 1485. the very day that King Henry got the victory of King Richard; a great fire was in Bread-ſtreet in London, in which was burnt the Parſon of Saint Mildreds, and one other man in the Parſonage there.

In his tenth yeer, in digging to lay a new foundation in the Church of Saint Mary Hill in London, the body of Alice Hackney, which had been buried in the Church a hundred ſeventy five yeeres before, was found whole of Skin, and the joynts of her Armes pliable; which Corpes was kept above ground foure dayes without annoyance, and then againe buried.

In his twelveth yeere, on Bartholomew day, at the Towne of Saint Neots in Bedfordſhire, there fell Hayle-ſtones that were meaſured eighteene Inches about.

In his thirteenth yeer, on the one and twentieth of December; ſuddenly in the night brake out a fire in the Kings lodgings, being then at his Manour of Sheen; by violence whereof, a great part of the old building was burnt, with hangings, beds, Apparell, Plate and many Jewells. In his fifteenth yeer, the Town of Babram in Norfolke was burnt: Alſo this yeer, a great Plague happened; whereof many people died in many places, but ſpecially in London, where there died in that yeer thirty thouſand.

In his twentieth yeer, Alum which for many yeers had been ſold for ſix ſhillings a hundred, roſe to five nobles a hundred, and after to foure marks.

In his two and twentieth yeer, the Citty of Norwich was well neere conſumed with fire. Alſo in the ſame yeer in July, a gallery new builded at Richmond, wherein the King and the Prince his Sonne had walked not an houre before, fell ſuddenly downe, yet no man hurt.

The great Tempeſt which drave king Philip into England, blew down the Golden Eagle from the Spire of Pauls, and in the fall, it fell upon a ſigne of the Black-Eagle, which was in Pauls Church-yard, in the place where the School-houſe now ſtandeth; and battered it, and brake it downe. This the people interpreted to be an ominous Prognoſtick upon the Imperiall Houſe, as indeed it proved; for this king Philip being the Emperours ſonne, arriving in Spaine, ſickned ſoon after; and being but thirty yeeres of age, deceaſed: upon whoſe deceaſe, his wife Queen Joane out of her tender love to him, fell diſtracted of her wits.

Of his wife and children.

HE maried Elizabeth eldeſt daughter of King Edward the Fourth, being of the age of nineteene yeeres; whom two yeeres after his Mariage he cauſed to be Crowned: She lived his wife eighteen yeeres, and dyed in Child-bed in the Tower of London, the eleventh of February, the very day on which ſhe was borne; and is buried at Weſtminſter, in the magnificent Chappell and rich Monument of Copper and Guilt, which her Huſband had erected. He had iſſue by her, three Sonnes and foure Daughters: his eldeſt ſonne Arthur was born at Wincheſter, the twentieth day of September in the ſecond yeere of his Reigne; and dyed at Ludlow, at fifteen yeeres old and a halfe: and of this ſhort life ſome cauſe may be attributed to his Nativity, being borne in the eighth moneth after conception: He was buried in the Cathedrall Church of St. Maries in Worceſter, where in the South ſide of the Quire he lies entombed in Touch or Jet, without any remembrance of him by Picture. His ſecond ſonne Henry was borne at Greenwich in Kent; on the two and twentieth day of June, in the ſeventh yeere of his Fathers Reigne; and ſucceeded him in the kingdome. His third ſonne Edmund was borne in the tenth yeere of his Fathers Reigne, and dyed at five yeares of age, at Biſhops Hatfield, and lyes buried at St. Peters in Weſtminſter. His eldeſt daughter Margaret was born the nine and twentieth day of November, the fifth yeer of her Fathers Reigne; and at fourteen yeers of age was married to James the fourth King of Scotland; unto whom ſhe bare three Sons, James the fifth, Arthur and Alexander, and one Daughter, which three laſt dyed all of them young; and after the death of her huſband king James, (ſlaine at Flodden field in fight againſt the Engliſh.) ſhe was remarried to Archibald Douglaſſe Earle of Angus, in the yeer 1514. to whom ſhe bare Margaret, eſpouſed to Mathew Earle of Lenox, Father of the Lord Henry, who died at the age of nine moneths, and lyeth interred in the upper end of the Chancell in the Pariſh Church of Stepney neer London: Her ſecond Sonne was Henry Lord Dernley, reputed for perſonage the goodlieſt Gentleman of Europe; who married Mary Queen of Scotland, the Royall Parents of the moſt Royall Monarch James the firſt, King of great Britaine: Her third Sonne was Charles Earl of Lenox, Father to the Lady Arbella. King Henries ſecond Daughter the Lady Elizabeth was borne in the yeere 1492. at three yeers of age, died; and was buried at Weſtminſter: His third Daughter the Lady Mary, had been promiſed to Charles King of Caſtile; but was married to Lewis the twelveth, King of France; who dying three moneths after, ſhe was then married to Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke: His fourth Daughter, the Lady Katherine, was borne in the yeer 1503. in the eighteenth yeer of her Fathers Reigne, and dyed an Infant.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

HE was of Body leane and ſpare, yet of great ſtrength; of ſtature ſomewhat higher than the common ſort, his Eyes gray, his Teeth ſingle, his Haire thinne, of a faire complexion and pleaſing countenance. Concerning his Conditions, he had in him the virtue of a Prince, and of a private man; affable, yet reſerved. We might ſay he was Politick; if not rather, that he was Wiſe: for though he uſed tricks of Cunning ſometimes, yet ſolid Circumſpection more. He loved not Warre, but in caſe of neceſſity; alwayes Peace, but with conditions of Honour. Never any Prince was leſſe addicted to bodily pleaſures of any kinde, than he. Three pleaſures he had, but in three Cares; One for Safety; another for Honour; and the third for Wealth: in all which hee attained his end. His great reſpect of the Church, was ſeen by his great imployment of Church-men; for through the hands of Biſhop Morton, Biſhop Foxe, and his Chaplaine Yorſwick, the greateſt part of all his great negotiation paſſed. He was Frugall from his youth, not Covetous till ancient and ſickly; and therefore what defect he had in that kinde, muſt be attributed to age and weakneſſe. This City of London was his Paradiſe, for what good fortune ſoever befell him, he thought he enjoyed it not, till he acquainted them with it. His Parliament was his Oracle; for in all matters of importance he would aſke their advice; and he put his very Prerogative sometimes into their hands. He was no great lover of women; yet all his great fortune both Precedent and Subsequent came by women: His own title to the Crown, was by a woman; His Confirmation in the Crown, was by a woman; His Transmission of the Crowne to his Posterity, was by a woman: The first by the Lady Margaret, descended from John of Gaunt, the second by the Lady Elizabeth, eldest Daughter of King Edward the fourth; the third by the Lady Margaret, eldest Daughter of himselfe King of England, and maried to James the Fourth, King of Scotland; by meanes whereof, as he was the Prince that joyned the two Roses in one, so he was the Founder of joyning the two Kingdomes in one. And lastly, it may be said of him, as was said by one of Augustus Cæsar, --Hic vir hic est tibi quem promitti sæpius audis: for Cadwalloder last king of the Britaines, seven hundred yeeres before, had Prophesied of him; and of later time, King Henry the Sixth plainly fore-shewed him.

IN the two and twentieth yeer of his Reigne, he began to be troubled with the Goute; but a Defluction also taking into his Breast, wasted his Lungs, so that thrice in a yeer, and specially in the Spring, he had great fits and labours of the Tissick, which brought him to his end, at his Palace of Richmond, on the two and twentieth day of April in the yeer of 1508. when he had lived two and fifty yeers, Reigned three and twenty and eight moneths: Being dead, and all things necessary for his Funerall prepared; his Corps was brought out of his Privy Chamber, into the great Chamber, where it rested three dayes; and every day, had there a Dirge and Masse sung by a Prelate, Mitred: and from thence it was conveyed into the Hall, wherein it remained also three dayes, and had a like service there; and so three daies in the Chappell: Upon Wednesday the nineth of May, the Corps was put into a Chariot, and over the Corpes was a Picture of the late King, laid on Cushions of Gold; and the Picture was apparelled in the Kings rich Robes, with a Crown on the head, and a Ball and Scepter in the hands: when the Chariot was thus ordered, the Kings Chappell had a great number of Prelates set forward, praying; then followed all the kings Servants in Black; then followed the Chariot, and after the Chariot nine Mourners, and on every side were carried Torches, to the number of six hundred, and in this order they came from Richmond to St. Georges field; where there met with it all the Priests and Religious men within the City and without; the Major and Aldermen, with many Commoners, all cloathed in Blacke, met with the Corpes at London-bridge; and so the Chariot was brought throught the City to the Cathedrall of St. Paul, where the Body was taken out and carried into the Quire, and set under a goodly Hearse of Wax; where after a solemne Masse, was made a Sermon by the Bishop of Rochester: The next day, the Corps in like manner was removed to Westminster; Sir Edward Howard bearing the kings Banner. In Westminster was a curious Hearse full of lights, which were lighted at the comming of the Corps; and then was the Corpes taken out of the Chariot by six Lords, and set under the Hearse, which was double railed: when the Mourners were set, Garter king at Armes, cryed, For the Soule of the Noble Prince king Henry the seventh, late king of this Realme: The next day were three Masses solemnly sung by Bishops, and after the Masses was offered the kings Banner and Courser, his Coat of Arms, his Sword, his Target and his Helm, and at the end of the Masse, the Mourners offered up rich Palls of Choath of Gold and Bodkin; and when the Quire sang Libera me, the Body was put into the Earth; then the Lord Treasurer, Lord Steward, Lord Chamberlaine, the Treasurer and Comptroller of the kings household, brake their Staves and cast them into the Grave: Then Garter cryed with a loud voice; Vive le Roy, Henry le huitiesme; Roy d'Angleterre & de France, Syre d'Irlande: and thus ended the Funerall.

OF Men of Valour and Armes, they are to be seene in the History of this Kings Reigne. For men of letters in his time, of forreigners were Sanctes Pagninus a great Hebrician; Leonicenus, Gattinaria, Cabellus and Optatus Phisitians; Augustinus Niphus, Jacobus Faber, Stapulensis and Pighius Philosophers; Petrus Bembus, and the famous Clerke Rheudin, who restored againe the knowledge of the Hebrew Tongue. Of our own Country, there lived in his time, George Ripley a Carmelite Frier of Boston, who wrote divers Treatises in the Mathematicks; and after his death was accounted a Necromancer. John Erghom borne in Yorke, a Black-Frier, studious in Prophesies, as by the Title of the workes he wrote, may appeare. Thomas Mallorie a Welshman, who wrote of King Arthur, and of the round Table. John Rouse borne in Warwickshire, a diligent searcher of Antiquities, and wrote divers Treatises of Historicall Argument. Thomas Scroope sirnamed Bradley, of the Noble family of the Scroopes, entred into divers orders of Religion, and after withdrew himselfe to his house, where for twenty yeeres he lived the life of an Anchorite; and after, comming abroad againe, was made a Bishop in Ireland, and went to the Rhodes in Ambassage; from whence being returned, he went bare-footed up and downe in Norfolk, teaching the ten Commandements; and lived till neere a hundred yeeres old. John Tonneys an Augustine Frier in Norwich, who wrote certaine Rules of Grammar, and other things printed by Richard Pinson. Robert Fabian a Sheriffe of London, and an Historiographer. Edmund Dudley, the same man whom king Henry used to take the forfeitures of Penall Statures; who wrote a Booke intituled Arbor Reipublicæ. John Bockingham an excellent Schoole-man: and William Blackeney a Carmelite Frier, a Doctor of Divinity, and a Necromancer.

THE REIGNE OF KING HENRY THE EIGHT.

KING Henry the ſeventh being deceaſed, his only ſonne Prince Henry, Heire by his Father of the houſe of Lancaſter, and by his Mother of the houſe of Yorke: by unqueſtionable right ſucceeded in the Crowne, at the Age of eighteene yeers, on the two and twentieth of Aprill, in the yeere 1509. who having been trained up in the ſtudy of good letters all his Fathers time, he Governed at firſt, as a man newly come from Contemplation to Action, as it were by the Booke; in ſo regular and fair a manner, that as of Neroes Goverment, there was ſaid to be Quinquennium Neronis; ſo of this Kings, there might as juſtly be ſaid, Decennium Henrici; and perhaps double ſo long a time, comparable with ſo much time of any Kings Reigne, that had been before him. How he came to alter, and to alter to ſuch a degree of change as he did, we ſhall then have a fit place to ſhew, when we come to the time of his alteration. King Henry having learned by Bookes, that the weight of a Kingdome is too heavy to lie upon one mans ſhoulders, if it be not ſupported by able Councellours; made it his firſt care, to make choice of an able Councell; to which he called William Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Chancellour of England, Richard Fox Biſhop of Wincheſter, Thomas Howard Earle of Surry, and Treaſurer of England, George Talbot Earle of Shrewsbury, and Lord Steward of his Houſhold, Charles Summerſet Lord Chamberlaine, Sir Thomas Lovell, Sir Henry Wyat, Doctor Thomas Ruthall, and Sir Edward Poynings; by adviſe of theſe Councellours, his firſt Act after the care of his Fathers Funerall; was the care to performe his Fathers Will, in marrying the Lady Katherine of Spaine, the Relict of his Brother Prince Arthur; to which perhaps but in reſpect of filiall pierie, he had not the greateſt devotion; and for relinquiſhing whereof, he might (no doubt) more eaſily have obtained a Deſpenſation from the Pope, then his Father had done, for getting it to be allowed: but obſequiouſneſſe to his Fathers deſire, and reſpect to his Councels advice, ſo far prevailed with him, that he would not be Crowned, till that were performed, that one Coronation might ſerve them both: and ſo on the third day of June following, he married the ſaid Lady, at the Biſhop of Salisburies houſe in Fleetſtreet; where of many great ſolemnities, I will remember but this one; that though the Bride were a Widdow, yet to ſhew ſhe was a Virgin Widdow, ſhe was attired all in white, and had the haire of her head hanging downe behinde at the full length: and then (having made in the Tower four and twenty Knights of the Bath) two dayes after being Midſomer day, he was Crowned at Weſtmin-

ster, together with his Queene, by the hands of William Warham Archbishop of Canterbury; with all Circumstances of State, in such cases usuall; and then all the Nobility Spirituall and Temporall, did him Homage; and the people being asked whether they would receive him for their King, they all with one voice, cryed, yea, yea.

This done, his next Act was another part of performing his fathers Will, which was to proclaime Pardons for all offences, (Treason, Murder, and Felonie only excepted) and to have restitution made of all goods unjustly taken from any; and because the Instruments of such injustice, are alwayes most odious, and nothing gives the people so much contentment, as to see their Persecutours punished; he therefore caused Empson and Dudley the two chiefe Actours of the late unjust proceedings, to be committed to the Tower, and divers of their inferiour Agents, called Promoters, as Canby, Page, Smith, Derby, Wright, Simpson, and Stockton, to be set on the Pillory in Cornhill, with papers on their heads, and then to ride through the City, with their faces to the horse tailes; with the shame whereof within seven dayes after, they all died in Newgate. Shortly after a Parliament was called; whereof Sir Thomas Ingleby was chosen Speaker; and therein Empson and Dudley were attainted of High Treason, and after arraigned; Edmund Dudley in the Guildhall, on the seventeenth of July, and Sir Richard Empson at Northampton in October following; and on the seventeenth of August the yeere following, they were both of them beheaded on the Tower Hill; and their Bodies and Heads buried, the one at the White Fryers, the other at the Black.

On Midsomer Eave at night, King Henry came privily into Westchester, cloathed in one of the Coats of his Guard, to behold the same: and this first yeer King Henry spent in Justs and Maskes, which were almost perpetuall, performed with great Magnificence alwayes; and sometimes with great Acts of Valour, on the Kings part specially.

In February the same yeer, Embassadours came from the Kings Father in law, the King of Aragon; requiring Ayde against the Moores; in which service, the Lord Thomas Darcy, a Knight of the Garter, making suite to be imployd; he was sent thither, and with him the Lord Anthony Gray, brother to the Marquesse Dorset, Henry Guilford, Wolstan Browne, and William Sidney Esquires of the Kings House, Sir Robert Constable, Sir Roger Hastings, Sir Ralph Elderton and others; who on the Munday in the Rogation Weeke, departed out of Plimuth Haven, with four ships Royall, and on the first of June, arrived at the Port of Cadiz in south Spaine; of whose comming the King of Aragon hearing, sent to bid them welcome, but advertising them withall, that he had now by reason of new troubles with France, taken truce with the Moores; and therefore they might returne againe into their owne Country, to whom yet he allowed wages for all his souldiers. Whereupon the Lord Darcy and all his men went aboord their ships, but Henry Guilford, Wolstan Browne, and William Sidney, desirous to see the Court of Spaine, went thither and were honourably entertained. Henry Guilford, and Wolstan Browne were made Knights by the King; who gave to Sir Henry Guilford a Canton of Granado; and to Sir Wolstan Browne an Eagle of Sicily on a Chiefe, to the augmentation of their Armes: William Sidney so excused himselfe, that he was not made Knight. After this they returned to their ships, and their ships into England.

During the time that the Lord Darcy was in Spain, the Lady Margaret Dutchesse of Saxoy, Daughter unto Maximilian the Emperour; and Governesse of Flanders and other the Low-countryes, pertaining to Charles the young Prince of Castile, sent to King Henry for fifteen hundred Archers, to aid her against the Duke of Gelders, which the King granted; and thereupon Sir Edward Poynings Knight of the Garter, and Comptroller of the Kings House appointed to goe, accompanied with his Sonne in law the Lord Clinton, Sir Matthew Browne, Sir John Digby, John Werton, Richard Wetherill, and others, to the number of fifteen hundred, hundred, took shipping at Sandwich, and passing over to the said Lady Regent, did her there great service; for which John Norton, John Fogge, John Scott, and Thomas Lynde were knighted; and then with many thanks and rewards, returned, not having lost in all the Journey, by warre or sickneſſe, above an hundred men.

In the third yeer of King Henryes Reigne, one Andrew Barton a scottish Pirate, was grown so bold, that he robbed English-men no lesse then other Nations, till the King sent his Admirall, Sir Edward Howard to represse him, who in a fight, so wounded the said Barton, that he died; and then taking two of his ships, brought the men prisoners to London; and though their offence deserved no lesse then death, yet the King was so mecifull as to pardon them all; provided, they departed the Realme within twenty dayes. The King of Scotts hearing the death of Barton, and taking of his ships; sent to King Henry, requiring restiturion; but King Henry answered his Herauld, that he rather looked for thanks for sparing their lives, who so justly had deserved death.

In the third yeer also of King Henryes Reigne, the French King made sharpe Warre against Pope Julius the second; whereupon King Henry wrote to the French King, requiring him to desist from his Warre against the Pope being his friend and confederate; but when the King of France little regarded his request, he then sent him word, to deliver him his Inheritance of the Dutchy of Normandie and Guyen, and the Countryes of Angiou and Mayne; as also his Crown of France, or else he would recover it by the sword. But when the King of France was not moved with this threatning neither; King Henry then joyning in league with the Emperour Maximilian, with Ferdinand King of Spaine, and with divers other Princes; resolved by advise of his Councell to make warre on the King of France, and to that end made preparation both by Sea and Land.

This yeer the King kept his Christmas at Greenwich in a most Magnificent manner. On New-yeers day was presented one of his Joviall Devises, which onely for a Patterne what his showes at other times were, I thinke fit to set downe at large. In the Hall was made a Castle, garnished with Artillery and weapons in a most warlike fashion, and on the Front of the Castle was written, la Forteresse Dangerense: within the Castle were six Ladies, clothed in russet Sattin, laid all over with leaves of gold: On their heads Coyfes and Caps of gold. After this Castle had been carried about the Hall, and the Queen had beheld it; in came the King with five other, apparelled in Coates, one halfe of russet-Satten, with spangles of fine gold; the other halfe of rich cloath of gold: on their heads Caps of russet Sattin, embrodered with works of fine gold. These six assaulted the Castle, whom the Ladies seeing so lusty and couragious, they were contented to solace with them; and upon further communication, to yeeld the Castle; and so they came downe, and daunced a long space: after that the Ladyes led the Knights into the Castle, and then the Castle suddenly vanished out of their sights. On Twelfth day at night, the King with eleven more were disguised, after the maner of Italie, called a Maske; a thing not seen before in England. They were apparelled in garments long and broad, wrought all with gold, with Vysors and Caps of gold. And after the banket done, these Maskers came in, with six Gentlemen disguised in silke, bearing staffe Torches; and desired the Ladyes to dance, and after they had danced and communed together; tooke their leave and departed.

The five and twentieth of January began the Parliament, of which was speaker Sir Robert Sheffield knight, where the Archbishop of Canterbury shewed the wrong which the King of France did to the King of England, in with-holding his Inheritance from him; and thereupon the Parliament concluded that Warre should be made on the French King and his Dominions.

At this time King Ferdinand of Spaine, having Warre with the French King, wrote to his Sonne in law King Henry, that if he would send over an Army into Bitkey, and invade France on that side; he would aid them with Ordnance, Horſes, and all other things neceſſary; whereupon Thomas Gray, Marqueſſe Dorſet was appointed to go, and with him the Lord Howard Sonne and heire to the Earle of Surry, the Lord Brooke, the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Ferrers, the Lords John, Anthony, and Leonard Grey, all brothers, to the Marqueſſe; Sir Griffeth ap Ryce, Sir Maurice Barkeley, Sir William Sands, the Baron of Burford, and Sir Richard Cornwall his brother, William Huſſey, John Melton, William Kingſton Eſquires, and Sir Henry Willoughby, with divers others, to the number of ten thouſand, who taking ſhip at Southampton, on the ſixteenth of May, the third of June they landed on the coaſt of Biskey, whither within three dayes after their arrivall, came from the King a Marqueſſe and an Earle to welcome them; but of ſuch neceſſaries as were promiſed, there came none; ſo as the Engliſh being in ſome want of victualls, the King of Navarre offered to ſupply them, which they accepted; and promiſed thereupon not to moleſt his Territories. After the Army had lyen thirty dayes, looking for aid and proviſion from the King of Spaine, at laſt a Biſhop came from the King, deſiring them to have patience a while, and very ſhortly he would give them full contentment. In the mean time, the Engliſhmen forced to feed much upon Garlick, and to drink of hott Wines; fell into ſuch ſickneſſe, that many of them dyed, at leaſt eighteen hundred perſons; which the Lord Marqueſſe ſeeing, he ſent to the King to know his pleaſure, who ſent him anſwer, that very ſhortly the Duke of Alva ſhould come with a great power, and joyne with him; and indeed the Duke of Alva came forward with a great Army, as if he meant to joyne with him as was promiſed; but being come within a dayes Journey, he ſuddenly turned towards the Realme of Navarre; and entring the ſame, chaſed out the King, and Conquered the Kingdom to the King of Spaines uſe. This Spaniſh policie pleaſed not the Engliſh, who finding nothing but words from the King of Spain, and being weary of lying ſo long idle; they fell upon ſome ſmall Townes in the border of Guyen, but for want of Horſes as well for ſervice as draught; were unable to performe any great matter; at which time, being now October, the Lord Marques fell ſick, and the Lord Howard ſupplied his place of General, to whom the King of Spaine once again ſent, excuſing his preſent coming, and requiring him, ſeeing the time of yeer was now paſt, that he would be pleaſed to break up his Army, and diſperſe his Companies into Townes thereabout, till the next ſpring, when he would not faile to make good all his promiſes: Hereupon the Lord Howard and his Company went to Rendre, the Lord Willoughby to Gourchang, and Sir William Sands with many other Captaines to Fontarely. King Henry in the meane time, hearing what the King of Spaines intention was; ſent his Herauld Windſor with Letters to the Army, willing them to tarry there for that very ſhortly he meant to ſend them a new ſupply of Forces, under the conduct of the Lord Herbert his Chamberlaine; but this meſſage ſo incenſed the Souldiers, that in a great fury they had ſlaine the Lord Howard if he had not yeelded preſently to returne home; who thereupon was forced to hire ſhippes, and in the beginning of December they landed in England; being taught by this experience what truſt is to be given to Spaniſh promiſes.

About the ſame time that the Marqueſſe went into Spaine, Sir Edward Howard Lord Admirall of England, with twenty great ſhips made forth towards Brittaine; where ſetting his men on land, he burned and waſted divers Townes and Villages, and being threatned by the Lords of Brittaine to be encountred, to encourage his Gentlemen, he made divers of them Knights; as Sir Edward Brook brother to the L. Cobham, Sir Griffeth Downe, Sir Thomas Windham, Sir Thomas Lucy, Sir John Burdet, Sir William Pirton, Sir Henry Sherburne, and Sir Stephen Bull. The Brittains were tenne thouſand, the Engliſh but five and twenty hundred; yet the Brittaines not contented with this advantage of number, would needs uſe policy beſides, for by the advice of an old experienced Captaine, their Generall commanded his men that aſſoone as Battels were joyned, they ſhould retire a little, meaning thereby to draw the Engliſh into ſome diſadvantage; advantage; but the common Souldiers not knowing their Generalls purpoſe, and ſuppoſing he had ſeen ſome preſent danger, inſtead of retyring tooke their heeles and fled; ſo giving the Engliſh by their Brittiſh policy, if not a Victory, at leaſt a ſafety to returne to their ſhips. After which the Brittaines ſued for truce, and could not obtaine it; for the Engliſh Admirall purſued his forraging the Countrey, till fearing there were many French ſhips abroad at Sea, he came and lay before the Iſle of Wight. King Henry in the meane time followed his pleaſures; and in June kept a ſolemne Juſt at Greenwich, where he and Sir Charles Brandon took up all cummers; and the King ſhewed himſelfe no leſſe a King at Arms, then in Eſtate.

After this, King Henry having prepared men and ſhips ready to go to Sea; under the Governance of Sir Anthony Outhread, Sir Edmund Ichingham, William Sidney and divers other Gentlemen; appointed them take the ſea, and to come before the Iſle of Wight, there to joyne with the Admirall; which altogether made a Fleet of five and twenty faire ſhips: and to Porteſmouth he went himſelfe to ſee them, where he appointed Captaines; for one of his chiefeſt ſhips called the Regent, Sir Thomas Knevet maſter of his horſe, and Sir John Carew of Devonſhire, and to another principall ſhip called the Soveraigne, he appointed for Captaines Sir Charles Brandon, and Sir Henry Guildford; and then making them a banker, ſent them going. The French King likewiſe had prepared a Navy of nine & thirty ſhips in the Haven of Breſt, whereof the chief was a great Carrick, called the Cordelyer, pertaining to the Queen his wife. Theſe two Fleets met at the Bay of Brittaine, and there entred a tirrible fight; The Lord Admirall made with the great ſhip of Deepe, and chaſed her; Sir Charles Brandon and Sir Henry Guildford being in the Soveraigne, made with the great Carrick of Breſt, and laid ſtemme to ſtemme to her: but whether by negligence of the Maſter, or by reaſon of the ſmoake from the Ordnance, the Soveraigne was caſt at the ſterne of the Carrick; whereat the Frenchmen ſhouted for joy; which Sir Thomas Knevet ſeeing, ſuddenly he cauſed the Regent in which he was, to make to the Carrick, and to grapple with her a long boord; and when they of the Carrick perceived they could not get a ſunder, they let ſlippe an Anchor, and ſo with the ſtreame the ſhips turned, and the Carrick was on the Weather ſide, and the Regent on the Lee ſide; at which time a cruell fight paſſed between theſe two ſhips: but in concluſion the Engliſhmen entred the Carrick, which when a Gunner ſaw, he deſperately ſet fire on the Gunpowder (aſſome ſay) though others affirmed, that Sir Anthonie Outhread following the Regent at the ſterne, bowged her in divers places, and ſet her powder on fire; but howſoever it chanced, the Carrick and the Regent both were conſumed by fire. In the Carrick was Sir Piers Morgan, and with him nine hundred men: in the Regent were Sir Thomas Knevett, and Sir John Carew, and with them ſeven hundred men, all drowned and burnt. King Henry to repaire the loſſe of the Regent, cauſed a great ſhip to be made, ſuch a one as had never been ſeen in England; and named it Henry Grace de Dieu.

Though King Henry had hitherto followed his pleaſures, as well agreeing with his youth and conſtitution; yet he neglected not in the meane time ſeverer ſtudies; for he frequented daily his Councell Table, and no matter of importance was reſolved on, till he had heard it firſt maturely diſcuſſed: as was now a War with France, which he would not enter into upon his owne head, nor yet upon adviſe of his private Councell, till he had it debated and concluded in Parliament; whereupon he called his High Court of Parliament, wherein it was reſolved; that himſelfe in perſon with a Royall Army, ſhould invade France; and towards the charges thereof, an extraordinary Subſidy was willingly granted.

On May even this yeer, Edmund de la Poole, Earle of Suffolke, was beheaded on the Tower Hill: This was that Earle of Suffolke whom King Phillip Duke of Auſtria, had delivered up into the hands of King Henry the ſeventh, upon his promiſe that he would not put him to death; which indeed he performed, but his sonne King Henry the eight was not bound by that promise, and by him he was; and shortly after, to bring another Lord in his place, Sir Charles Brandon was created Viscount Lisle.

For all the great preparation for France, King Henry forbore not his course of Revelling, but kept his Christmas at Greenwich, with divers curious devises, in most magnificent manner. In March following, the Kings Navy Royall, to the number of two and forty ships was set forth, under the conduct of Sir Edward Howard Lord Admirall, accompanied with Sir Walter Deveraux Lord Ferrers, Sir Wolston Browne, Sir Edward Ichingham, Sir Anthony Poynings, Sir John Walloppe, Sir Thomas Windham, Sir Stephen Bull, William Fits Williams, Arthur Plantagenet, William Sidney esquires; and divers other Gentlemen, who sayling to Brittane, came into Bertram Bay, and there lay at Anchor in sight of the French Navie, whereof one Prior John was Admirall, who keeping himselfe close in the Haven of Brest; the English Admirall intended to assaile him in the Haven, but because his ships were to great to enter the Bay; he caused certaine Boates to be manned forth, thinking thereby to toule out the French; but when this neither would draw them to come abroad, he then called a Councell, where it was determined, that first they should assayle Prior John and his Gallies, lying in Blankesable Bay, and after set upon the rest of the French Fleete in the Haven of Brest; and it was further appointed, that the Lord Ferrers, Sir Stephen Bull, and others should go on land, with a convenient number, to assault the Bulworkes, which the French had there made; while the Admirall with Row Barges and little Gallies entred into the Bay, that so the Frenchmen might at once be assailed both by sea and land. But though this were determined by the Councell of Warre yet, the Lord Admirall had a trick by himselfe, for by the advise of a Spanish Knight called Sir Alphonso Charunt, affirming that he might enter the Bay with little danger; he called to him William Fits-Williams, William Cooke, John Colley, and Sir Wolston Browne, as his most trusty friends, making them privy to his intent, which was to take on him the whole enterprize with their assistance only; and so confident he was of successe, that he wrote to the King to come thither in person, to have the honour of the enterprize himselfe; but it seemes the King had bettter Fates, at least went not; and thereupon, on Saint Marks day the Admirall put himselfe in a small row Barge; and appointing three other small row Ships, and his own Shipboat to attend him: and therewith on a sudden rowed into the Bay, where Pryor John had moored up his Gallies just to the ground; which Gallies with the Bulworks on the land shot most cruelly; yet the Admirall went on, and comming to the Gallies, drove out the French-men. The Bay was shallow, and the other ships by reason the Tide was spent, could not enter; which the French-men perceiving, they entred the Gallies againe with Morris Pikes, and began a new fight; whereupon the Admirall attempting to returne back into his row Barge; which by violence of the Tide, was driven downe the streame; with a Pike was throwne over boord, and drowned; the just issue of his headstrong enterprize; the forenamed Alphonso was also there slaine: upon which sorrowfull accident, the Lord Ferrers with the rest, returned into England. After whose departure, Pryor John came forth with his Gallies; and coasting over the borders of Sussex, burnt certaine poore Cottages; but the King made suddenly a new Admirall, the Lord Thomas Howard, eldest Brother to him that was drowned; sonne and heire of the Earle of Surrey: who so skowrd the seas, that the French were no more to be seen on any coast of England.

King Henry had hitherto performed Acts of Armes, though in Jest, yet with great magnificence; he will not performe them with lesse, being now in earnest and especially to deale with so potent aa adversary: and therefore when it was concluded by Parliament, that he should make a Warre in France himselfe in person; he sent before to prepare the way for him, George Talbot, Earle of Shrewsbury, high Steward of his Household; accompanied with the Lord Thomas mas Stanley Earle of Derby, the Lord Dowckeroy Pryor of Saint Johns, Sir Robert Ratcliffe, Lord Fitswater, the Lord Hastings, the Lord Cobham, Sir Rice ap Thomas, Sir Thomas Blunt, Sir Richad Sacheverell, Sir John Digly, Sir John Askew, Sir Lewis Bagot, Sir Thomas Cornwall and others, to the number of eight thousand; who arrived at Callice about the middle of May; after him in the end of May, followed Sir Charles Somerset, Lord Herbert, Lord Chamberline, accompanied with the Lord Percy Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Gray Earle of Kent, the Lord Stafford Earle of Wiltshire, the Lord Dudley, the Lord Delaware, Sir Edward Hussey, Sir Edward Dimmock, Sir David Owen, with others, to the number of six thousand: These Generalls joyning together, issued out of Callice, and on the two and twentieth day of June, sate downe before the strong Towne of Terwin, which City was strongly fortified; and in it was Governour the Lord Poultrey, who had with him six hundred Horsemen, and five and twenty hundred Almans, besides the Inhabitants. Here at the very first happened two disasters to the Englishs; one, that the Baron Carew was slaine with a shot from the Towne; the other, that Sir Nicholas Vaux, and Sir Edward Belknappe coming from Guysnes with four and twenty Carts of Provision, were set upon by the Duke of Vendosme, Lieutenant of Picardie, and many of the English slaine, and the Provision taken. In this state was the English Campe at Terwin; when King Henry the last day of June came himselfe to Callice, and on the one and twentieth of July took the field, having in his Army of fighting men, not above nine thousand, but with Pyoners, and others that attended the Cariages, eleven thousand and three hundred men: His foreward was led by Charles Brandon Viscount Lisle, his maine Battaile by himselfe, and Sir Henry Guildford carried his Standard; and in this order he marched forward to the siege of Terwin, entring upon the French ground, the five and twentieth of July. On the morrow after, by negligence of the Carters, that mistook the way, a great Gunne called the John Evangelist, was overthrowne in a deep Pond of water, and could not at that time be recovered; but a few dayes after, the Master Carpenter taking with him a hundred labourers, went and weyed it up; but having carted it ready to bring away, was set upon by eight hundred French; and the most of his company slaine: the Gunne was taken by the French, and carried to Bulloyne. In the French Army were to the number of eleaven thousand footmen, and four thousand Horse; whereof were Captaines, the Lord De la Palyce, the Lord De Prienes, the Duke De Longuevyle, the Earle of Saint Paul, the Lord of Floringes, the Lord of Clermont, and Richard De la Poole an English man, sonne to John Duke of Suffolke. The Armies were come within two miles one of another, and some light skirmishes passed between them, specially one; on a day called the dry Wednesday, for the day was wonderfull hot, and the King with his Army stood in order of battaile, from six a clock in the morning, till three in the afternoone: after this, the King removed towards Terwyn; and as the Army marched, another of the Kings Bombards of Iron, called the Redde Gunne, was overthrowne in a lane, and there left; which the French understanding, went with a great power to fetch it away, as they had done the other; but the Lord Berners, Captaine of the Englishs Pyoners, prevented them; and though set upon by the French, to the number of nine or ten thousand, yet by the valour of the Earle of Essex, and Sir Rice ap Thomas, with the bold adventures of Sir William Tyler, and Sir John Sharpe, they recovered it and brought it safe to the Campe. On the fourth of August K. Henry came before the city of Terwyn, where he strongly fortified his Tents with Ordnance, and other Warlike defences. In which meane time, the Captaine of Bulloigne, knowing that many of the Garison of Callice were gone with the King, thought to take advantage of their absence, and do some great exploit upon Callice; and therupon with a thousand men, came to Newnham Bridge, and killing the watchmen, tooke it; but afterward some of his company going to fetch Booties, and coming so neere the walls of Callice, that they were descried; about sixscore Coopers and other Artificers issued forth, and driving them back, recovered againe Newnham Bridge, and took divers of them prisoners; especially when the gate of Callice, called Bulloign gare was opened, & that Colepepper the under Marshal, with two hundred Archers issued forth, and joyned with them. The French prisoners were brought to Callice, and there sold in open Market; amongst others, a Cooper of the Town of Callice, bought a prisoner that dwelt in Bulloigne, and had of the prisoner for his ransome, a hundred Crowns; when the mony was paid, the French man prayed the Cooper to see him safe delivered, and to conduct him out of danger; the Cooper was content, and went himselfe alone with the French man, till he came beyond the Cawsey, and there would have departed; but the French man perceiving that the Cooper was aged, and that no rescue was nigh, by force rooke the Cooper prisoner, and caried him to Bulloigne; making him pay two hundred Crownes, before he was delivered.

Whilst King Henry lay thus at the siege of Ternyn, on the eleventh of August, the Emperour Maximilian was come to Ayre; which King Henry understanding, went and met him between Ayre and the Campe; where with great complements they saluted each other; but their complements were broken off, by the extreame foule weather which happened that day: the morrow after, the Emperour Maximilian came from Ayre to the Kings Campe, wearing a Crosse of Saint George, as the Kings Souldier, and receiving wages of him for service; an honour never done to any King of England before; and yet was no disparagement to the Emperour, for he was royally received, and lodged in a Tent of cloath of gold; that as no Emperour before, had ever been souldier to a King; so no souldier before was ever lodged in such a Tent. At this time the City of Ternyn, being in some distresse for want of victualls; the French King appointed all his horsemen to the number of eight thousand, to see victualls by any means convoyed into it; the charge of which Convoy was committed to Monsieur De Priennes: but King Henry by advise of the Emperour Maximilian, had made Bridges to passe his men over the river, to the other side of the Towne, where was easiest accesse; in such sort, that when the French Convoy came with their victualls, and thought to have entred the Towne, they found the English Army there ready to resist them; whereupon a fierce battell was fought between them: but in conclusion the French were put to flight, and fled so fast, that from thence it was called the battell of Spurres, for that they used more their spurres in running away, then their Launces in fighting. In this battell, the Duke of Longueyle, the Lord of Clermont, Captaine Bayard, and others to the number of twelve score were taken prisoners, and all brought to the Kings presence; with six Standards that were likewise taken. After the battell, the King made Sir John Pechye Banneret, and John Carre Knight, who had both of them done great service in this encounter. King Henry having obtained this victory against the French horsemen, and hindred the Towne of Ternyn from reliefe of victualls, and withall plying his battery more fiercely then before; made the Townsmen soone fall to desire composition, and upon condition that the souldiers might depart with Horse and Armour, they yeelded up the Towne into the Kings hands. This was done on the eighteenth of August, and the Earle of Shrewsbury entred the Towne the same night; and set up the Banner of Saint George in the highest place of it, in signe of victory, and swore all the Townsmen to be true subjects to the King of England. The four and twentieth of August, the King himselfe entred the Towne, and dined in the Bishops Palace, where it was resolved, that the Walls and Fortifications of Ternyn should be raced, and the Towne burnt all but the Cathedrall Church and the Pallace, all the Ordnance was sent to Ayre, to be kept there to the Kings use.

After this it was concluded, that the King should lay siege to the City of Tourney; whereupon he set forward in three battells, the Eeale of Shrewsbury led led the Vangard; the King and the Emperour, the Battaile; and the Lord Chamberlaine the Reareward. In this order the Kings Army marched forwards towards Tourney; by the way, he went and visited the yong Prince of Castile, and the Lady Margaret, Governesse of the Prince, in the Towne of Lisle, where with all Magnificence; or rather indeed Reverence, he was entertained; and after he had staied there three dayes, he took his leave; and being gone a mile and somewhat more out of the towne, he asked where his Campe lay, and no man there could tell the way, and guide they had none; the night was so darke and mystie, by chance at last they met with a victualler comming from the Camp, who was their guide and conducted them to it. By which we may see, to what distresse a great Prince may be brought by a little over-sight.

On the one and twentieth day of September, the King removed his Campe towards Tourney; and being come within three miles of the towne, he sent Garter king of Armes to summon the towne; but they, though they had but few men of warre amongst them, yet stood upon their guard; whereupon the King begirt it on all sides, and made such fierce batteries upon it, that though it were written on the gates of the towne, graven in stone, Iamais tu ne as perdu ton Pucellage; thou hast never lost thy Maidenhead; yet now they were glad to loose it: and in conclusion, they sent a trumpet to require a Parley, and then sued for mercy, and yeelded it up, and paid ten thousand pounds sterling besides, for redemption of their liberties: and then Master Thomas Woolsey the Kings Almoner, calling before him all the Citizens yong and old, swore them to the King of England; the number of whom was foure score thousand. This done, the King entred into Tourney, and calling into his presence Edward Guildford, William Fitzwilliams, John Dansie, William Tyler, John Sharpe, William Hussey, John Savage, Christopher Garnysh, and some other valiant Gentlemen; he gave to them the order of knighthood; and then remembring the great entertainment the Prince of Castile and the Lady Margaret had given him at Lisle, he would not be behinde them in such courtesie; and thereupon invited them solemnly to his citie of Tourney, whom at their coming he brought into the towne in great triumph: during their abode in Tourney, amongst other compliments of entertainment, there was had a Justs, where the King and the Lord Lisle answered all comers: after the Justs, was a sumptuous Banquet; after the Banquet, the Ladies danced, and then came in the King, and eleven other in a Maske, all richly appatelled with Bonnets of gold: and when they had passed the time at their pleasures, the garments of the Maskers were cast off; amongst the Ladies take them that could. This was King Henries disposition, that he could not forbear Revelling in the midst of his Armes; and Ladies must be entertained as well as souldiers. After this, finding the French not willing to come to a Battaile, and the winter drawing on, he left Sir Edward Poynings Governour of Tourney, and then returned to Callice, and from thence passed into England, and rode in post to Richmond to the Queene.

Whilst King Henry was thus busied in his warre with France, the King of Scots, though his Brother in law, yet instigated by the French King, and taking advantage of King Henries absence, assembled his people to Invade England; but before his whole power could come together, the Lord Humes his Chamberlin, with seven or eight thousand men entred the borders; but as he was returning with a great booty of Cattle, in a field overgrowne with Broome, called Milfield, he was encountred by Sir Edward Bulmer, having with him not above a thousand men; who lying in that field in ambush, broke out upon him, and put him to flight, with the slaughter of five or six hundred of his company, and foure hundred taken prisoners; the Lord Humes himselfe escaped by flight, but his Banner was taken; and this, by the Scots was called, the ill Rode. In the meane time the whole power of Scotland was assembled, no fewer then one hundred thousand men; though Buchanan in favour of his Countrey, saith, not the fifth part of that number; and with these, King James approaching the borders, and coming to Norham Caſtle, laid ſiedge unto it, which for want of Powder, was ſoone delivered up unto him. But by this time the Earle of Surrey, Lievtenant of the North parts, had aſſembled an Army of ſix and twenty thouſand men; to whom alſo ſoone after, his Sonne the Lord Admirall, with one thouſand expert ſouldiers came and joyned: and now having many great Lords and Knights in his Army, he appointed to every one their ſtation; and then was informed, that King James being removed ſix miles from Norham, lay embattelling upon a great Mountain called Floddon, where it was impoſſible to come neere him, but with great diſadvantage; for at the foot of the hill, on the left hand, was a great mariſh ground full of reeds and water, on the right hand was a river called Till, ſo ſwift any deepe that it was not poſſible; on the back-ſide were ſuch craggie rocks and thick woods, that there was no aſſaylting him on that part; the forepart of his Campe he had fenced with his great Ordnance. Being in ſuch a hold, the Earle of Surry found there was no poſſibility of a Battaile, unleſſe he could draw him from the hil; whereupon he called a counſell, by which it was determined to ſend Rouge-Croſſe Purſuivant at Armes with a trumpet, to the K. of Scots, to let him know, that he was ready on Friday following to give him Battaile, if he would abide it; whereunto the King of Scots by his Purſuivant Ilay, made anſwer, that at the day prefixed he ſhould finde him redy for Battail as he deſired, that he would willingly have come to ſuch a march if he had bin at Edenburgh; but though he made this anſwer, yet he would not leave the ſtrong Hold he was in, but kept himſelfe ſtill upon the Hill; at laſt, Thomas Lord Howard, ſonne and heire to the Earle of Surrey, having viewed the Countrey round about, declared to his Father, that if he would but fetch a ſmal compaſſe, and come with his Army on the back of his Enemies, he ſhould enforce the Scottiſh King to come down out of his ſtrength, or elſe ſtop him from receiving of victuals or any other thing out of Scotland. This councell of the Lord Howard his Father followed, and King James perceiving what their meaning was, thought it ſtood not with his honour to be foreſtalled out of his owne Realme, and thereupon immediately raiſed his Camp, and got to another Hill, but not ſo ſteepe as the other; which the Earle of Surrey perceiving, he determined to mount it, and to fight with the Scots, before they ſhould have leiſure to fortifie their Campe; and herewith making a ſhort Speech, for encouragement of his Souldiers, he divided his Army into Battailes; the Vantguard was led by the Lord Howard, to whom was joyned as a Wing, Sir Edward Howard; the middle-ward was led by the Earl himſelf, and the Rear-ward by Sir Edward Stanley; the Lord Dacres with a number of horſmen was ſet apart by himſelfe, to ſuccor where need ſhould be; the Ordnance was placed in the Front, and in other places, as was thought moſt convenient: and in this order they March forward, towerds the Scots. On the other ſide, King James reckoning upon the benefit of the Hill, thought the Engliſh half mad, to venture a Battaile upon ſuch diſadvantage; and thereupon making a Speech to encourage his Souldiers, who were of themſelves ſo forward, that they needed no encouraging. Hee divided his Battailes in this manner; the maine Battaile he led himſelf, to which he appointed two Wings; the right led by the Earls of Huntley, Crawford and Mountroſſe; the left by the Earls of Lenox and Argyle, together with the Lord Hume Lord Camberlain: and ſo confident they were of victory, that the King firſt, and after all the Lords and meaner men, put away their Horſes, as thinking they ſhould not need them; which confidence was afterward their undoing; for when the Battaile being joyned, Sir Edward Howard in getting up the Hill, was ſo aſſaulted by the Earles of Lenox and Argyle, that he was left almoſt alone, and in manifeſt perill to be ſlaine; in comes the Lord Dacres with his Horſmen, and trode under foot the Scottiſh Battaile of ſpeeres on foot, which he could not have done, if they had kept their Horſes. And this part of the Scottiſh Army being led by the Earles of Crawford and Mountroſſe, they were both of them ſlaine, and the whole Battaile but to flight. In another part alſo alſo Sir Edward Stanley did the like, upon the Battaile led by the Earles of Lenox and Argyle, putting it to flight, with the ſlaughter alſo of theſe two Earles. King James notwithſtanding, maintained the fight ſtill, with great reſolution, till Sir Adam Forman his Standard-bearer was beaten downe; and then not fainting, though deſpairing of ſucceſſe, he ruſhed into the thickeſt of his Enemies, amongſt whom he was beaten downe and ſlaine; and to make his death the more honourable, there dyed with him three Biſhops (whereof one was Alexander, Archbiſhop of Saint Andrewes, the Kings baſe Sonne) two Abbots, twelve Earles, and ſeventeene Lords, of Knights and Gentlemen very many, in all about eight thouſand, and almoſt as many taken priſoners (as Paulus Jovius ſaith) amongſt whom was Sir William Scot, Chancellour to the ſaid King, and Sir George Forman his Sergiant Porter; the Lord Hume and the Earle Huntley got horſes and eſcaped. Neither was the Battaile without blood to the Engliſh, for there was ſlaine at leſt a thouſand, and (that which in a Deſeat was ſtrange) many alſo taken priſoners; for many in purſuing the Scots, went raſhly ſo farre, that they knew not which way to returne, and by Bands of Scots that had not fought that day, were ſet upon and taken. When the field was done, the Lord Generall called to him certaine Lords and Gentlemen, and made them Knights, as Sir Edward Howard his Son, the Lord Scroope, Sir William Percy, Sir Edward Gorge, and others. This Battaile was fought on Friday the ninth of September, in the yeere 1513. called by ſome Bramſton, by ſome, Flodden Field. King James heere ſlaine was the ſame that had maried the Lady Margaret eldeſt Daughter of King Henry the ſeaventh; and ſiſter to the preſent King Henry; and might have enjoyed many happy dayes, if he had kept himſelfe firme to his alliance, but being carried away with the inveterate ſpleen betweene the two Nations, and propenſion to France; he ended his life, though honorably, yet miſerably under many wounds. It is a very memorable, but ſcarce credable thing; which, (from the mouth of a very credible perſon who ſaw it) George Buchanan relates concerning this King; that intending to make a warre with England; a certaine old man of venerable aſpect, and clad in a long blew garment, came unto him; and leaning familiarly upon the chaire where the King ſat, ſaid, I am ſent unto thee O King, to give thee warning, that thou proceed not in the warre thou art about; for if thou doe, it will be thy ruine: and having ſo ſaid, he preſſed thorow the company, and vaniſhed out of ſight; for by no inquiry it could be knowne what became of him. But the King was too reſolute to be frighted with Phantoſmes, and no warning could divert his Deſtinie, which had not been Deſtiny if it could have been diverted. The day after the Battaile, his Body, though diſfigured with wounds, was knowne by the Lord Dacres and others, to be his; and thereupon bowelled, embalmed and wrapped in lead, was brought to the Monaſtery of Sheene in Surrey, and there interred; but at the diſſolution of that Houſe, was taken up and thrown into a waſte roome amongſt timber and ſtone; which John Stow ſaith, he ſo ſaw; and further relateth, that the ſervants of Launcelot Young, Glaſier to Queene Elizabeth being at Sheene, in new Glazing the windowes, either upon a fooliſh pleaſure, or deſire of the lead, cut the head from the reſt; but ſmelling the ſweet perfums of the Balms, gave it to their Maſter; who opening the lead, found therin the head of a man, retaining favour, though the moiſture were cleane dried up, whoſe haire both of head and beard was red: which afterward, he cauſed to be buried, at Saint Michaels Church in Woodſtreet, where he dwelled. But notwithſtanding this relation of Stow; John Leſly Biſhop of Roſſe affirmeth, that it was held for certaine, the Body thus found, was the Body of the Lord Bouchard ſlaine in that Battaile. Buchanan ſaith, of Alexander Elfinſton, who in countenance and ſtature was like the King; and that King James was ſeene alive the ſame night at Kelſo, whence he paſſed to Hieruſalem, and there ſpent the reſt of his dayes in holy contemplation: but howſoever it was, he was never ſeen any more in Scotland.

King Henry being now returned from Tourney into England, and finding the great ſervices done in his abſence againſt the Scots; on the day of the Purification of our Lady, at Lambeth he created the Earle of Surrey Duke of Norfolke, with an augmentation of the Armes of Scotland; Sir Charles Brandon Viſcount Liſle, he created Duke of Suffolke, the Lord Howard high Admirall, hee made Earle of Surry, Sir Charles Somerſet Lord Herbert his chiefe Chamberlaine Earl of Worceſter, and ſhortly after Sir Edward Stanly he made Lord Monteagle; and in March following, Maſter Thomas Woolſey his Almoner, was made Biſhop of Lincolne. Here before we goe further, it will be fit to ſay ſomething of this man, that he be not a rub afterward in the way of the Story: He was borne at Ipſwich in Suffolke, the ſonne of a Butcher, ſent to Oxford by reaſon of his pregnancy of wit, ſo ſoone, that taking there the firſt degree of Art, he was called the Boy Batchelour; proceeding in learning, he was made Fellow of Magdalen Colledge in Oxford, and afterward Schoolemaſter of the Schoole there, at which time the Marqueſſe Dorſet committed three of his Sonnes to be Inſtructed by him; and having a Benefice fallen in his gift, ſent for him one Chriſtmas, and beſtowed it upon him; whereof Woolſey going to take poſſeſſion, at his being there, for what miſdemeanour is not delivered, he was by Sir Amyas Paulet ſet by the heeles, which afterward he remembred to Sir James his no ſmall trouble, for he made him attend his pleaſure five or ſix yeeres; all which time lying in the Middle-Temple, where he re-edified the Gate-houſe next the ſtreet very ſumptuouſly, ſetting the Cardinals Armes upon it, to appeaſe him. After this diſgrace he went over-ſea, where he fell in acquaintance with Sir John Naphant treaſurer of Callice, and by him was preferred to be King Henry the ſevenths Chaplaine: and now being by this meanes in the Kings eye, he ſo diligently carried himſelfe, that he ſoone got into the Kings heart. One time it happened, the King had occaſion to ſend a Meſſenger to the Emperour Maximilian, about a buſineſſe that required haſte; for which imployment no man was thought more fit then Woolſey; whereupon, the King called him, gave him his Errand, and bad him make all the ſpeed he could; Woolſey departed from the King at Richmond about noone, and by the next morning was got to Dover, and from thence by noone that day was come to Callice, and by night was with the Emperour; to whom declaring his Meſſage, and having a preſent diſpatch, he rode that night backe to Callice, and the night following came to the Court at Richmond. The next morning he preſented himſelfe before the King, who blamed him for not being yet gone, the matter requiring haſte; to whom Woolſey anſwered, that he had beene with the Emperour, and had diſpatched the buſineſſe, and for proofe ſhewed the Emperours lines; the King wondred much at his ſpeed, but then asked him if he met not his Purſuivant, whom he ſent after to advertiſe him of a ſpeciall matter hee had forgotten; whereto Woolſey anſwered, May it pleaſe your Grace I met him yeſter-day upon the way, but that buſineſſe I had diſpatched before, taking the boldneſſe ſo to doe without commiſſion, as knowing it to be of ſpeciall conſequence; for which boldneſſe I humbly intreat your Graces pardon. The King not onely pardoned him, but beſtowed preſently upon him the Deanery of Lincolne, and ſoone after made him his Almoner. In this ſtate King Henry the eight found him, with whom alſo he grew into ſuch favour, that he made him of his Councell; and having won Tourney, made him Biſhop of that Citie; and returning into England, (the Biſhopricke of Lincolne falling void by the death of Doctor Smith) made him Biſhop of that Dioceſſe. And thus far the ſtory hath now brought him, but ſoone after he was raiſed higher; for Doctor Bambridge Archbiſhop of Yorke dying, he was tranſlated from Lincolne to that See; and that he might not be inferiour to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, he procured of the Pope to be made Cardinall, and Legat a Latere; and after, by the King was made Lord Chancellour of England: and being come to this height of dignity, he ſo carried himſelfe in Expences of Houſhold, in number number of Retinve, and in all circumſtances of State, that no Subject before or ſince, hath in any degree come neere him. And if we may ſay it, he was the firſt Debaucher of King Henry; for to the end he might have the managing of all matters himſelfe, he perſwaded the King that he ſhould not need trouble himſelfe with frequenting the Councell Table as he did, but take his pleaſure, and leave thoſe things to his Councell, whereof himſelfe would alwayes give him true Information. This was plauſible Councell, and no marvaile if it were embraced of a yong King, coming from the mouth of ſo great a Prelate.

In this fifth yeer of the King, the Citizens of London finding themſelves grieved with the Incloſures of the common fields about Iſlington, Hogſdon and Shordich, and other places adjoyning; went one morning, and threw downe all the Hedges, and filled up all the Ditches; whereat though the Kings Councell were at firſt offended, yet the Maior and City ſhewed them ſuch reaſons, that they reſted ſatisfied, and the fields were never ſince hedged.

On the nineteenth of May, this yeer Pope Julius the ſecond ſent to King Henry a Cap of Maintenance and a Sword; and being angry with the King of France, transferred by Authority of the Lateran Councell, the title of Chriſtianiſſimo from him, upon King Henry, which with great ſolemnity was publiſhed the ſunday following, in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul; but this ſolemnity muſt not paſſe without Revelling, Maskes, and Juſts; wherein the King and the Duke of Suffolke were defendants againſt all commers; who having the Duke of Longuevyle, and the Lord of Clermont to be ſpectatours, ſpread the fame of their Chivalrie into forreigne Nations.

And now the great love that had been long between King Henry and the Flemings, began to abate; upon this occaſion, King Henry the ſeventh had concluded a match between his daughter Mary, and Charles Prince of Spaine: but by reaſon of her young yeers, and for want of aſſurance of Joynture, the match was deferred during his time; but now King Henry the eight ſeeing his ſiſter of convenient yeers, began to call upon it, and ſignified ſo much to the Councell of Flanders; but they, whether having other ends, or out of Spaniſh delayes, put him off with excuſes, and at laſt ſent him word plainly, they could doe nothing in it that yeer. The King of France had ſoone Intelligence how much King Henry diſtaſted theſe Spaniſh dealings, and meant to make ſome good uſe of it, for the ends he began to propoſe to himſelfe, which were, to get the Lady Mary for himſelfe, and thereby procure peace with England, being now old, and weary of the War. And for this purpoſe he got the new Pope Leo the tenth to be his mediatour, and both of them ſend Embaſſadours to King Henry, the Pope to perſwade him to have peace with France, the French King to treat about a Marriage with the Lady Mary: upon whoſe Embaſſages, King Henry partly to ſatisfie the Pope, and partly to advance his ſiſter; did not unwillingly hearken to the motions: but whilſt this was in working, Pryor John (who knew nothing of theſe intentions) began again to play his Pranks; and coming with his Gallyes on the coaſt of Suſſex, burnt Rhighthem-ſteed, and took away the goods he found in the Village, whereupon the Lord Admirall ſent Sir John Wallopp to ſea, with divers ſhips and eight hundred men, who for one Village that Pryor John burnt in England, burnt one and twenty Villages and Townes in France, to the great honour of himſelfe, and his countrey.

And now King Henry by advice of his Councell, and ſpecially of Woolſey Biſhop of Lincolne, concluded both the peace with France, and the Marriage of his Siſter the Lady Mary, with the French King; but yet it ſtuck a while upon ſome differences, King Henry demanding Bulloigne, and the King of France Tourney: in concluſion theſe demands were waved, and the principall conditions were; firſt concerning the Ladies Joynture, that ſhe ſhould have two and thirty thouſand Crownes of yeerly revenues if ſhe ſurvived the King; and then concerning the peace, that the French King ſhould pay yeerly to King Henry for five yeers one hundred thouſand Crownes, and the peace to continue between them

them during their lives, and a yeer after, and bound reciprocally to assist each orher with ten thousand foot, if the warre were by land, with six thousand if by sea, All things thus concluded, the Lady Mary was brought to Dover by King Henry and his Queen: and on the second of October taking shipping, was conducted by the Duke of Norfolke, the Marquesse Dorset, the Bishop of Durham, the Earle of Surry, the Lord De la ware, the Lord Berners, the Lord Monteagle, Sir Maurice Berkely, Sir John Pechye, Sir William Sands, Sir Thomas Bulleyne, Sir John Carre, and many other Knights and Ladies; but being not past halfe way over the sea, their ships by tempest were dispersed, and the Lady with some jeoperdy landed at Bullen, where Sir Christopher Garnish was faine to stand in the water and take her in his armes, and so set her on shore, and there the Duke of Vendosme with a Cardinall and many other great States received her. From Bullen the eight of October, she came to Abbeyvile where the Dolphyn received her: on the morrow being Saint Dennis day, she came to Saint Denis, where the marriage between the King of France and her, was solemnized (though some write it had been solemnized before at Abbeyvile.) The fifth of November she was Crowned Queene of France, at which time the Dolphyn held the Crowne over her head, as being too massie for her to weare; and the day following she was received into Paris in most magnificent manner. In honour of whose Marriage and Coronation, the Dolphyn had caused a solemne Justs to be proclaimed, which should be kept in Paris the seventh of November. Upon report of this Proclamation in England, the Duke of Suffolke, the Marquesse Dorset and his four Brothers, the Lord Clinton, Sir Edward Nevill, Sir Giles Capell, Thomas Cheiney and others, obtained leave of the King to be at the challenge, where they all behaved themselves with great valour, but specially the Duke of Suffolke; whose glory the Dolphyn so much envied, that he got a Dutch-man the tallest and strongest man in all the Court of France, secretly as another person to encounter him, with a purpse to have the Duke foyled; but indeed it turned to his greater honour, for he foiled the Dutch-man in such sort, that when they came to the Barriers, the Duke by maine strength took him about the neck, and so pommeled him about the head, that he made the blood issue out at his nose: many other Princes and Lords did bravely; and after three dayes the Justs ended.

King Henry was not long behinde to solemnize it in England also; for at Greenwich the Christmas following, on Newyeers night, and Twelfth night; he presented such strange and magnificent devices, as had seldome been seene; and the third of February following he held a solemne Justs, where he and the Marquesse Dorset answered all commers, at which time the King brake three and twenty speares, and threw to the ground one that encountred him both man and horse.

At this time preparation was making for King Henry in person to go to Callice, there to meet with the French King and Queere, but death hindred the designe; for before the next spring, the first of January the French King dyed at the City of Paris, fourscore and two dayes after his marriage; teaching others by his example, what it is for an old man to marry a young Lady. King Henry hearing of the French Kings death, sent the Duke of Suffolke, Sir Richard winkefield, and Doctor West, to bring over the Queene Dowager, according to the Covenants of the marriage. Whereupon the Queene was delivered to the Duke by Indenture, who obtaining her good will to be her husband, (which was no hard matter, that had been her first love:) wrote to the King her brother for his consent; whereat the King seemed to stick a while, but at last consented; so as he brought her into England unmarried, and then marry at his return; but the Duke for more surety married her secretly in Paris, and after having received her Dower, Apparrell and Jewels; came with her to Callice, and there openly married her with great solemnity. At their coming into England, King Henry to shew his contentement with the marriage, in the company

pany of the Duke of Suffolke, the Marquesse Dorset, and the Earle of Essex, all richly apparelled; held a new kinde of Justs, running courses on horseback in manner Volant, as fast as one could follow another, to the great delight of the beholders.

This yeer the King at his Mannour of Oking; Woolsey Archbishop of Yorke came and shewed him letters, that he was elected Cardinall; for which dignity he disabled himselfe, till the King willed him to take it upon him, and from thenceforth called him Lord Cardinall, but his Hat and Bull were not yet come: after which Doctor Warham Archbishop of Canterbury, and Lord Chancelour of England; finding Woolsey being now Cardinall, to meddle more in his office of Chancelourship, then he could well suffer, resigned up the Seal, which the King presently gave to Woolsey. About this time, Cardinall Campejus was sent by Pope Leo to King Henry, to solicite him to a Warre against the Turke, with whom Cardinall Woolsey was joyned in Commission, who hearing of the ragged retinue of his fellow Cardinell; sent store of red cloath to Callice to make them fit followers of so great a Lord: and when Campejus was landed at Dover, Cardinall Woolsey caused the gentry of Kent to waite upon to Black-heath, where he was met and received by the Duke of Norfolk and many Prelates, & there in a Tent of cloath of gold shifted himself into his Cardinals robes. Eight Mules he had laden with necessaries; but Woolsey not thinking them enough for his honour, sent him twelve more. But now see the shame of pride, for in Cheap-side his Mules by some mischance overthrew their Carriages and Coffers on the ground, whose lyds flying open, shewed the world what treasure it was they carried, old Breeches, Boots, and broken Shoos, broken Meat, Marybones and crusts of Bread; exposing him to the laughter of all the people: yet the Cardinall went joging on afore with his Crosses, guilt Axe and Mace, unto Pauls Church; and by the way had an Oration made him by Sir Thomas Moore, in name of the City, and then waited on with many Bishops, was conducted to Bath Place, where he was lodged for his own particuler: he got well by the Journey, for the King gave him the Bishoprick of Salisbury; but the errand he came about, which was to have Ayde by mony, for a Warre against the Turke, he could not obtaine; for it was well known to be but a devise to get money, without any intention of what was pretended.

In his seventh yeer, King Henry kept his Christmas at his Mannour of Eltham; where on Twelfth night according to his custome, was a stately Maske of Knights and Ladies, with solemne Daunsing and a most Magnificent Banquet.

It was now the eight yeer of King Henryes Reigne, when the new league between him and the French King was Proclaimed in the City of London: and this yeer Margaret Queene of Scots eldest Sister to King Henry, having before married Archibald Douglasse Earle of Angus; by reason of dissention amongst the Lords of Scotland, was glad with her husband to flye into England, and to seek succour at her brothers hands; who assigned to her the Castle of Harbottell in Northumberland to reside in; where she was delivered of a daughter named Margaret. From thence the King sent for her and her husband to come to his Court; and thereupon the third of May, Queene Margaret riding on a white Palfrye (which the Queen of England had sent her) behinde Sir Thomas Parre, came through London to Baynards Castle, and from thence went to Greenwich: but her husband the Earle of Angus, was secretly before departed into Scotland; which when King Henry heard, he onely said it was done like a Scot. And now in honour of his sisters coming, King Henry the nine and twentieth of May, appointed two solemne dayes of Justs; where the King, the Duke of Suffolke, the Earle of Essex, and Nicholas Carew Esquire: took upon them to answer all commers, amongst others, the King and Sir William Kinston ran together, which Sir William though a strong and valourous Knight, yet the King overthrew him to the ground: all the rest was performed with no lesse valour then magnificence. This yeer died the King of Aragon, Father to the Queene of England, for whom was kept a solemne Obsequie in the Cathedrall Church of Pauls; and Queene Margaret after she had been a yeer in England, returned into Scotland.

In this yeer were sent twelve hundred Carpenters and Masons, with three hundred Labourers, to the City of Tourney in France, to build a Castle there, to keep the City in Awe. And now the Cardinall being weary of hearing so many Causes himselfe, as were daily brought before him; ordained by the Kings Commission (after the patterne of Mases, divers under Courts to hear complaints of Suitours: whereof one was kept in the Whitehall, another before the Kings Almoner Doctor Stokesley, a third in the Lord Treasurers lodging neere the Starre-chamber, and the fourth at the Roles in the afternoone: these Courts for a time were much frequented; but at last, the people perceiving that much delay was used in them, and that sentence given by them bound no man by Law: they thereupon grew weary of them, and resorted to the common Law. By occasion of this Government of the Cardinall, who under colour of Justice, did what he pleased: many great men withdrew themselves from the Court; as first the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Winchester, who went and lived in their Dioceses; then the Duke of Norfolke, and at length the Duke of Suffolke, who being run deep into the Kings debt, by reason of his many Imployments into France, and his great House-keeping since his marriage with the Kings Sister, hoped the King would have forgiven it, and would no doubt have done it, but that the Cardinall opposed it, to the end the Duke should be the more at his command.

In October this yeer, Matthew Bishop of Sion commonly called the Cardinall of the Switzers came into England from the Emperour Maximilian; by whose soliciting, and Cardinall Woolseys perswasion, the King lent the Emperor a great some of money, for Woolsey being angry with the King of France, for detaining the revenewes of his Bishoprick of Tourney, perswaded King Henry that the best way to abate the French Kings power, was to furnish the Emperour money, the better to maintaine warre against him: and what Woolsey said, was in those dayes to King Henry an Oracle.

This yeer the King kept his Christmas at his manner of Greenwich; where on Twelfth night according to his custome, rare devices with great magnificence were presented; after which time the King exercised himselfe much in Hawking, which was like to have proved no good sport to him; for one time following his Hawke, and leaping over a Ditch with a Pole, the Pole brake, so that if one Edmund Mody a foot-man had not leapt into the water and lift up his head which was fast in the clay, he had been drowned.

In this yeer also there happened in the City of London, an Insurrection against strangers, specially of Artificers, complayning that strangers were permitted to resort hither with their Wares, and to exercise Handy-crafts, to the great hindrance and impoverishing the Kings own Subjects; and not onely so, but that they were borne out in many great Insolencies, and wrongs they offered to the English, as one time it happened, a Carpenter in London called Williamson, had bought two Pigeons in Cheap-side and was about to pay for them, when a French-man tooke them out of his hand, saying, they were no meat for a Carpenter: well (said Williamson) I have bought them, and I will have them; nay (said the French-man) I will have them for my Lord Embassadour; hereupon they grew to words, and complaint was made to the French Embassadour, who so aggravated the matter to the Major, that the Carpenter was sent to prison, and when Sir John Baker sued to the Embassadour for him, he answered, by the body of God, the English knave was worthy to loose his life for denying any thing to a French-man, and other answer he could have none. Many like and worse Insolencies were offered by changes; which one John Lincoln a Broker drew into a Bill, and prevailed with Doctor Beale, Preacher on Easter

Tuesday at the spittle to reade it openly in the pulpit, which so stirred up many, that strangers could hardly passe the streets, but were strucken, and sometimes beaten downe. At last, one evening, many Prentises and others assembling, rifled some strangers houses, and much mischief was like to be done: but by the care of the Maior and Aldermen and by the indrstry of Robert Brook Recorder, and Sir Thomas Moore, that had bin under shriefe of London; they were gotten to be quiet and many of the disturbers were sent to prison, whereof Lincolne and twelve other were hanged, foure hundred more in their shirts, bound in ropes and halters about their neckes (and thereupon called the black wagon) were brought to Westminster, where the King himselfe sate that day; and when the Cardinall had charged them with the greatnesse of their offence; they all cryed, mercy, mercy: and then the King by the mouth of the Cardinall, pardoned them all which clemency purchased the King no small love amongst the people.

In this ninth yeere, in June King Henry had divers Embassadors at his Court; for whose entertainment he prepared a costly Justs; himselfe and twelve more against the Duke of Suffolke and other twelve. The King had on his Head a Ladies sleeve full of Diamonds, and perhaps something else of the Ladies in hes heart, which made him performe his courses with the applause of all beholders. This yeere by reason of a sweating sicknesse, Michaelmas Tearme was adjourned; and the yeere following, Trinity Tearme was held one day at Oxford, and then adjourned againe to Westminster.

About this time Cardinall Woolsey obtained of Pope Leo, authority to dispence with all Offences against the spirituall Lawes; by vertue whereof he set up a Court, and called it, The Court of the Legat; in the which he proved Testaments, and heard Causes, to the great hindrance of all the Bishops of the Realme; and to the debauching of Priests and Religious persons, who relying upon his greatnesse, tooke such a liberty of licentiousnesse, to themselves, that none was more disorderly, then those that were in orders: and supposiing perhaps, they might lawfully comit such sins themselves, as they forgave to others. And indede the Cardinalls carriage exceeded all boundes of moderation; for when he said masse, he made Dukes and Earles to serve him of wine, with a say taken, and to hold the bason at the Lauatory: and when the Archbishop of Canterbury, writing a letter to him, subscribed, your brother William of Canterbury, he tooke it in great dudgion, to be termed his brother.

It was now the tenth yeere of King Henries Reigne, when the King of France, longing much, to have Turney restored to him: by great guifts and greater promises, wonne the Cardinall Woolsey, to move the King in it; who upon his perswasions, was contented to be treated withall about it: to which the King of France sent the Lord Bonquet high Admirall of France: and the Bishop of Paris, who in there attendance, having above fourescore Gentlemen, and with their servants and all above twelve hundred, arived in England; and on Munday the seaven and twentieth of September, were met at Black-heath by the Earle of Surrey high Admirall of England, attended likewise with above five hundred Gentlemen and others, who conducted them to London, where they were lodged at Marchantailors Hall: The last of September, the Embassadours went to the King at Greenwich, where after long communication, an Agreement was at last concluded under pretence of a marriage to be had, betweene the Dolphin of France, and the Lady Mary Daughter to the King of England, that in name of her marriage money, Tourney should be delivered to the French King: he paying to the King of England, for the Castle he had made in that Citty, six hundred Thousand Crownes in twelve yeeres, by fiftie Thousand Crownes yeerly: and if the marriage should chance not to take effect, then that Tourney should be againe restored to the King of England; for performance of which article, Hrstages should be delivered: namely, Monsieur de Memorancye, Monsieur de Monpesac, Monsieur de Moy, and Monsieur Morett, and moreover the French King should pay to the Cardinall of England a thousand markes yeerly, in recompence of his Revenewes, received before of his Bishoprick of Tourney: All things thus concluded, the Cardinall made to the Embassadours a solemne Banquet, and after presented them with a stately Mummery. The eighth of October, the King feasted them at Greenwich, and at night presented a stately Maske of Knights and Ladies, with reare devises and great magnificence: The next day, Sir Thomas Exmew Major of London, feasted them at Goldsmiths-Hall, and then delivering their foure Hostages, they tooke their leave. At whose departure, the King gave to the Admirall of France, a Garnish of guilt vessell, a paire of covered Basons, gilt, twelve great guilt Bowles, fower paire of great guilt Pots, a standing Cup of Gold, garnished with great Pearles, and to some other he gave Plate, to some other cheins of Gold, to some rich Apparell: to the great comendation of his liberality. Shortly after their departure, the Earle of Worcester Lord Chamberlaine, the Bishop of Ely, the Lord of Saint Johns, Sir Nicholas Vaux, Sir John Pechy, and Sir Thomas Bullen, as Embassadours from the King of England, accompanied with Knights, Gentlemen, and others, to the number of above foure hundred, passed over to Callice, and from thence went to Paris; where after Royall Entertainment by the King, with diverse Maskes and stately shewes, they tooke their leaves and rode to Tourney to see the Citty delivered to the French men, on the eighth of February to the great griefe of the English Garrison. After the English Embassadours were returned, King Henry to cheere up the foure French Hostages, left heere for performance of covenants, on the seaventh of May, presented a solemne and stately Maske, wherein himselfe, the Duke of Suffolke and the French Queene were Actors, and on the eight of March following was a solemne Just holden, and with great magnificence performed.

In the eleventh yeere of King Henries Raigne died the Emperour Maximilian, for whom, the King caused a solemne obsequie to be kept in Paules Church. After whose death the French King and the King of Spain, endeavoured by sundry plots, each of them to get the Empire, but in conclusion, Charles King of Castile, (afterwards called Charles the fifth) was elected Emperour; for joy whereof, a solemne Masse was sung at Pauls, the seaventh of July, at which were present the Cardinall Campeius, the Cardinall of Yorke, the Duke of Buckingham, Norfolke and Suffolk, with the Embassadours of Spaine, Fraunce, Venice, and Scotland; and this yeere the King kept Saint Georges feast at Winsor, with great solemnity.

At this time, diverse young Gentlemen that had been in France, after the manner of that Country, carried themselves so familiarly with the King; that the Lords of his counsell thought it a disparagement to him: and thereupon, with his leave first obtained, they banished them the Court: and in their places, brought in more staied and graver men: namely, Sir Richard Winkefield, Sir Richard Jerningham, Sir Richard Weston and Sir William Kingston.

In the summer of this yeere, the Queene lying at her Mannor of Havering in Essex, desired the King to bring thither the foure Hostages of France: to whom shee made a Royall Banquet: and in September following the King lying at his Mannor of Newhall in Essex, otherwise called Beaulieu; where he had newly built a stately Mansion, invited the Queen and the French Hostages thither, where after a sumptuous Banquet, he presented them with an extraordinary Mask, for the Maskers were the Duke of Suffolk, the Earl of Essex, the Marquesse Dorset, the Lord Aburgaveny, Sir Richard Winkfield, Sir Richard Weston and Sir William Kingston, the youngest of whom was fifty yeeres old at least, that the Ladies might see, what force they had to make age young againe.

At this time, the French King was very desirous to see the King of England with whom he had entred into such a league of alliance, and to that end made meanes to the Cardinall, that there might be an Enterview betweene them at some convenient place: to which the Cardinall, nor so much to satisfie the French

French King as to shew his owne greatnesse in France; easily condiscended, and thereupon perswaded King Henry, how necessary it was, that such an Enterview should be: and then were sent unto Guysnes, under the rule of Sir Edward Belknap three thousand artificers, who builded on the plaine before the Castle of Guysnes, a most stately Pallace of timber, curiously Garnished without and within: whither both the Kings in June next following, agreed to come and to answere all commers at the Tilt, Tournies and Barriers, whereof proclamation was made in the Court of England, by Orleance King of Armes of France and in the Court of France by Clarentius, King of Armes of England: whilst these things were preparing on Candlemas Even, as the King and Queene were come from Even-song at their Mannour of Greenwich; suddainly there blew a Trumpet, and then entred into the Queenes Chamber, foure Gentlemen, who brought with them a waggon, in which sate a Lady richly apparelled; which Lady, acquainted the King, that the foure Gentlemen there present, were come for the love of their Ladies, to answer all commers at the Tilts on a day by the King to be appointed; which day was thereupon appointed on Shrovetuesday next ensuing, where they all behaved themselves with great valour, to the great delight of the King and Queene.

By this time King Henry was ready for his journey into France, and so removing from his Mannour of Greenwich, on Friday the five and twentieth of May he with his Queene arived at Canterbury, where he ment to keepe his Whitsontide. At which time, the Emperour Charles returning out of Spaine arrived on the coast of Kent, where by the vice Admirall of England, Sir William Fitzwilliams, he was conducted to land, and there met and received by the Lord Cardinall in great state. After which the King himselfe rode to Dover, to welcome him: and on Whitsunday earely in the morning conducted him to Canterbury, where they spent all the Whitsontide in great joy and solace. The chiefe cause that moved the Emperour at this time, to come on land, was to have disswaded the King from any Enterview with the French King: but when he saw him ro forward in that journey, he then onely endeavoured to perswade him, that he should put no trust in the French Kings words, and with great guifts and promises, prevailed with the Cardinall to joyne with him in this perswasion. The last of May, the Emperour tooke his leave, and the same day, the King made saile from Dover and landed at Callice, together with the Queen and many Lords and Ladies. The fourth of June the King and Queen removed from Callice to his Princely lodging beside the Towne of Guysnes, the most Royall Building that was ever seene; likewise Francis the French King had his lodging prepared close to the Towne of Ard, in a strange but most magnificent fashion. Both Kings had given authority and power to the Cardinall to affirme and confirme, to bind or unbind, whatsoever should be in difference betweene them; no lesse an honour to the Cardinall then a confideuce in the Kings. On Thursday the seaventh of June, the Kings met in the vale of Andren so magnificently attired, both themselves, and all their followers, that from thence it was called the campe of cloath of Gold. Heere they spent that day in loving complements; and at night departed, the one to Guysnes, the other to Ard. On Saturday the ninth of June were set up in a place, within the English pale two Trees of honour, with stately roomes and stages for the Queens, and thither the two Kings came, most Royally accompanied; wherein most magnificent manner, they performed Acts of valour, both on foote and horseback; and after them all the great Lords both of France and England did the like: this solemnity of Justs and Maskes was continued to the foure and twentieth day of June; at which time, the Kings and Queenes tooke leave of each other, the French King and Queene removed to Ard; the King and Queene of England to Callice, where he remained till the tenth of July, and then ridings toward Graveling, was by the way met by the Emperour, and by him conducted thither, and there in most royall manner entertained; whereof when the French King heard, he began from that day forward, to have King Henry in a kinde of jelousie, as though to love him and the Emperour both were inconsistent, and could not stand together. On Wednesday the eleventh of July, the Emperor and his Aunt the Lady Margaret, Dutchesse of Savoy, came with the King of England to the town of Callice, and there continued with Feasting, Dancing and Masking, till the fourteenth of July. In which time, all the Articles of the league tripartito, betweene the Emperour and the Kings of England and France were reviewed; to which the King of France had so fully condiscended, that he had sent Monsieur de Roche to the Emperor with Letters of credence; that in the word of a Prince, he would inviolably observe and keepe them all: all which notwithstanding, he dispenced with his conscience afterward, in breaking them all. On Saturday, July 14. the Emperor tooke his leave and went to Graveling; the King with his Queene returned into England.

It was now the twelfth yeer of King Henries reigne; when being returned from Callice, he kept his Christmas at Greenwich with great magnificence; & on twelfth day he and the Earl of Devonshire maintained a solemn Justs against al commers.

The Cardinal had long born a grudg against the Duke of Buckingham, for speaking certain words in his disgrace, and now hath made his way for reveng: for the Earl of Surrey, Lord Admirall, who had maried the Dukes daughter, the Cardinall had caused to be sent Depury into Ireland, and the Earle of Northumberland, the Dukes speciall friend he had caused upon certain suggested crimes to be Imprisoned; so as the Duke having his friends sequestred from him, he lay now open to accusations, and accusations shall not long be wanting; for the Duke having some time before put from him in displeasure, one Charles Knevet, that had been his Surveyar, and inward with him; him the Cardinall gets to him, to see what he could get out of him against the Duke. And whether it was out of desire of revenge, or out of hope of reward, or that the matter was so indeed, this Knevet confessed to the Cardinall, that the Duke had once fully determined to make away the King; being brought into a hope to be King himselfe by a vaine Prophesie, which one Nicholas Hopkins (a Monke of an house of the Chartnar Order, besides Bristow, called Henton) sometimes his Confessor, had opened to him; and as for the Cardinall, that he had often heard the Duke sweare, he would punish him soundly for his manifold misdoings. And now had the Cardinall matter enough for Accusation, which he so aggravated to the King, that the King bid him do with him according to Law. Hereupon the Duke is apprehended and brought to the Tower by Sir Henry Marney, Captain of the Guard, the fifteenth of April, and shortly after in Guild-hal before Sir John Brugge, then Lord Major, was indited of divers points of High-treason; the substance whereof was, that in the second yeer of the Kings reign, and at divers times before and after, he had imagined and compassed the Kings death at London and at Thornbery in Glocestershire; and that in the sixth yeer of the Kings reign, he went in person to the Priory of Henton, and there had conference with the foresaid Nicholas Hopkins, who told him he should be King; and that he had often said to the Lord Aburgayne who had maried his daughter, that if King Henry died without issue, he would look to have the Crown himself. Vpon these points hee was arraigned in Westminster-hall, before the Duke of Norfolk, sitting then as high Steward of England, the Duke of Suffolk, the Marquesse Dorset, the Earls of Worcester, Devonshire, Essex, Shrewsbury, Kent, Oxford and Darby, the Lords of Saint Johns de la ware, Fitz-water, Willoughby, Brook, Cobham, Herbert & Morley. The Duke pleaded for himself til he swet again, but al booted not, for by these Peeres he was found guilty and condemned; and so on Friday the seventeenth of May was led by John Keyme and John Skevington Sheriffes of London to the scaffold on Tower-hill, and there beheaded. The Augustine Friers took his body and head and buried them. This Edward Bohun Duke of Buckingham was the last high Constable of England (the greatest place, next the high Steward in the kingdome) whose Power extended to restrain some actions of the King. He was also Earl of Hereford, Stafford and Northampton: he maried Elianor the daughter of Henry Earle of Northumberland, and had issue Henry Lord Stafford (Father to Henry Lord Stafford late living) and three daughters, Elizabeth maried to Thomas

Howard Earl of Surrey, Katherine maried to Ralph Nevil Earl of Westmerland, and Mary maried to George Nevill Lord of Abergavenie.

In this meane while, a new Warre was begun between the Emperour and the King of France; for composing whereof, the Cardinall of Yorke was sent attended with the Earle of Worcester, Lord Chamberline, the Lord of Saint Johns, the Lord Ferrers, the Lord Herbert, the Bishop of Durham, the Bishop of Ely, the Primate of Armagh, Sir Thomas Bullen, Sir John Pechye, Sir John Hussey, Sir Richard Winkfield, Sir Henry Guildford, and many other Knights, Gentlemen and Doctors. On the twelfth of July he arrived at Callice, whether came to him the Chancellour of France, and the Count de Palice attended with four hund red horse, as Embassadours from the French King; and from the Emperour the like, with Commissions to treat and conclude of Peace. There were also Embassadours from the Pope, whom the Cardinall moved to have the Pope be a party also in their League, but they wanting Commission. Letters were presently sent to Rome about it, and in the time till answer might be had, the Cardinall went to Bruges, to speak with the Emperour, with whom having stayed thirteene dayes, after most Royall entertainment, he returned back to Callice, and then fell presently to the treaty of Peace, with the French Commissioners, but was colder in the matter then he was before, as having had his edge taken off, by some dealings with the Emperour, so as nothing was concluded; but that Fishermen of both the Princes might freely Fish on the Seas without disturbance, till the end of February following; whereof he sent advertisement to both the Princes; to the Emperour by the Lord of Saint Johns and Sir Thomas Bullen; to the French King by the Earle of Worcester and the Bishop of Ely. During all which time of the Cardinalls stay in Callice, all Writs and Patents were there by him sealed, and no Sheriffe could be chosen for lack of his presence, having the Great Seal there with him, and full power in things, as if the King had been there in person. Before he returned he made a new League with the Emperour, and intimated to the French King, that he doubted the King of England would not hereafter be so much his friend, as heretofore he had been; whereat, though the King of France were much offended, yet he signifyed by his Letters (perhaps dissemblingly) that he would continue the King of Englands friend as much as ever: onely he enveighed against the Cardinall, as a man of no truth, & withdrew many Pensions which he had before given to some English. Presently upon this, was Tourney besieged, by the Lord Hugh de Moncada a Spaniard; and though the French King sent great Forces to succour it; yet it was rendred up to the Emperour the last of November, in the thirteenth yeer of King Henries Reigne.

This yeer Pope Leo died the first of December, suspected to be poysoned by Barnabie Malespina his Chamberlaine, whose office was alwayes to give him drinke. After whose death, Doctor Pace was sent to Rome, to make friends in behalfe of the Cardinall of Yorke; who was brought into a hope through the Kings favour to be elected Pope, but that hope was soon quailed; for before Doctor Pace could get to Rome, Adrian the sixth was chosen Pope. This Doct. Pace was a very learned and religious man, yet thorow crosses in his imployment, fell mad and dyed; in whose place of Imployment succeeded Doct. Stephen Gardyner.

On the second of February, King Henry being then at Greenwich, received a Bull from the Pope, whereby he had the Title given him to be defender of the Christian Faith, for him and his successours for ever; which Title was ascribed to him, for writing a Booke against Luther, of which Booke (saith Holingshoard) I will onely say thus much, that King Henry in his Booke, is reported to rage against the Devill and Antichrist, to cast out his foame against Luther, to race out the Name of the Pope, and yet to allow his Law; which Booke Luther answered with as little respect to the King, as the King had done to him.

In this meane time, many displeasures grew between the two Kings of England and France, specially two: one that French-men seized upon English ships as they paſſed: for remedy whereof, one Chriſtopher Cee an expert ſeaman, was ſent with ſix ſhips to ſafeguard the Merchants. Another, that the Duke of Albanye was returned into Scotland, contrary to that which was Covenanted by the league, which though the King of France denied to be done with his priuity, yet King Henry knew the Duke of Albanye had Commiſſion from the French King to returne, which did the more exaſperate him; and hereupon were Muſters made in England, and a note taken of what ſubſtance all men were.

This yeere died the Lord Brooke, Sir Edward Poynings Knight of the Garter, Sir John Pechy, and Sir Edward Belknappe, all valient Captaines, ſuſpected to have poyſoned at a Banquet made at Ard, when the two Kings met laſt.

At this time, Owen Douglas Biſhop of Dunkell, fled out of Scotland into England, becauſe the Duke of Albanye being come thither, had taken upon him the whole Government of the King and Kingdome; whereupon Clarentieux the Herald was ſent into Scotland, to command the Duke of Albany to avoid that Realm; which he refuſing, the Herald was commanded to defie him. Thereupon the, French King ſeized all Engliſh-mens goods in Burdeaux, and impriſoned their perſons; and retained not onely the money to be paid for the reſtitution of Tourney; but alſo with-held the French Queenes Dower: whereof when King Henry underſtood; he called the French Embaſſadour reſiding in England, to give account thereof; who though he gave the beſt reaſons he could to excuſe it, yet was commanded to keep his houſe, and the French Hoſtages remaining here, for the money to be paid for the delivery of Tourney, were reſtrained of their liberty, and committed to the cuſtody of the Lord of Saint Johns, Sir Thomas Lovell, Sir Andrew Windſor, and Sir Thomas Nevyle; each of them to keep one; and withall, all French-men in London were committed to priſon, and put to their Fines; and all Scotſ-men much more. There were then alſo ſent to ſea under the conduct of Sir William Fitz-Williams Viceadmirall, eight and twenty great ſhips, and ſeven more towards Scotland; who ſet fire on many Scottiſh-ſhips in the Haven, and at length tooke many priſoners, and returned.

King Henry hearing that the Emperour would come to Callice, ſo to paſſe into England, as he went into Spaine; appointed the Lord Marqueſſe Dorſet, to go to Callice, there to receive him; and the Cardinall to receive him at Dover. The Cardinall taking his Journey thither on the tenth of May, rode thorow London accompanied with two Earles, ſix and thirty Knights, and a hundred Gentlemen, eight Biſhops, ten Abbots, thirty Chaplains, all in Velvet and Sattin; and Yeomen ſeven hundred. The five and twentieth of May being Sunday, the Marqueſſe Dorſet with the Biſhop of Chicheſter, the Lord de Lawarre and divers others, at the water of Graveling, received the Emperour, and with all honour brought him to Callice, where he was received with Proceſſion, by the Lord Berners Lieutenant of the Towne. On Munday he tooke ſhip at Callice, and landed at Dover, where the Cardinall with three hundred Lords, Knights and Gentlemen received him, and in great State brought him to the Caſtle, where he was lodged. On Wedneſday being Aſcention Even, the King came to Dover, and there with great joy and gladneſſe, the Emperour and he met. On Friday in the afternoone they departed from Dover, and came that night to Canterbury, and from thence next day to Greenwich, where the Queene received her Nephew with all the joy that might be. Here to honour the Emperours preſence, Royall Juſts and Turneys were appointed; where the King, the Earle of Devonſhire and ten Aydes, kept the place againſt the Duke of Suffolke, the Marqueſſe Dorſet and other ten Aydes, on their part. On Friday the ſixth of June, the Emperour and the King with all their companies went to London, where the City received them with Pageants, and other as rare devices, as at a Coronation, and the Emperour was lodged at the Blackfryers, and all his Lords in the new Palaces of Bridewell. On Whitſunday, the King and the Emperour rode to the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, where the Cardinall ſung Maſſe, and had his Traverſe and his Cupboord. Before Maſſe, two Barons gave him water, and after the Goſpel, two Earles, and at the laſt Lavatory two Dukes, which pride the Spaniards much diſdained. After many Feaſtings in other places, at laſt they rode to Windſor, where they ſtayed a whole weeke; and there on Corpus Chriſti day, the Emperour wore his Mantle of the Garter, and ſate in his owne Stall. On the ſame day, both the Princes received the Sacrament, and tooke their oathes to obſerve the League concluded betweene them. On the morrow after, they came to Wincheſter: before whoſe comming thither there was come to Hampton, the Earle of Surrey Admirall of England, with all the Kings Navy, and with him the Lord Fitz-water, the Barron Curſon, Sir Nicholas Carew, Sir Richard Winkfield Sir Richard Jernyngham, Francis Brian, Sir William Barentine, Sir Adrian Foskew, Sir Edward Donne, Sir Edward Chamberlaine, Sir Richard Cornwall, Sir Antony Poynes, Sir Henry Shirborn, and the Viceadmirall, Sir William Fitz-Williams, Sir Edmund Bray, Sir Giles Capell, Sir William Pirton, John Cornwallis, Sir John Walloppe, Sir Edward Ichingham, Sir William Sidney, Anthony Bromme, Giles Huſſey, Thomas Moore, John Ruſſel, Edward Bray, Henry Owen, George Cobham, Thomas Oldhall, Thomas Lovell, Robert Ichingham, Anthony Knevet, Sir John Tremaile, Sir William Skevington, Maſter of the Ordinance, and John Fabian Serjant at Armes, by whom chiefly a diſſegne was moved, though now noiſed onely that it was but to ſcowre the ſeas for the ſafe conducting of the Emperour. For the Earle of Surrey having wafted the Emperour over to the coaſt of Biſkay; upon his returne, made to the coaſt of Brittaine; and there landing ſeven thouſand of his men, marched to the Towne of Morleys, and by aſſault took it: having wonne this Towne, the Earle called to him certaine Gentlemen and made them Knights; as Sir Francis Brian, Sir Anthony Browne, Sir Richard Cornwall, Sir Thomas Moore, Sir Giles Huſſey, Sir John Ruſſell, Sir John Rainsford, Sir George Cobham, Sir John Cornwallis, Sir Edward Ridgley, and ſome others; and after the Earle had lien a while on the Coaſt of Brittaine, he was commanded home by the Kings letters: who thereupon brought back his whole fleet, to a place called the Cow under the Iſle of Wight, and then went on land, leaving diverſe of of his ſhips, under the Governance of the Vice-admirall Sir William Fitz-Williams.

In this meane time, diverſe exploits were atchieved between them of the Garriſon in the marches of Callice, and the French men of Bulloigne, where the French commonly had the worſt: but being of no great moment, may well be paſſed over without relating. Likewiſe at the ſame time the Lord Roſſe, and the Lord Dacres of the North, appointed to keepe the Borders againſt Scotland, burnt the Towne of Kelſie, and foureſcore Vilages, and overthrew eighteene Towers of ſtone, withall their Bulwarkes.

King Henry intending now to goe ſeriouſly on with his warres in France, levied an Army, which under the conduct of the Earle of Surrey, he ſent over to Callice; whither the Earle being come, he divided his Army into three battailes; the firſt was led by Sir Robert Ratcliffe Lord Fitz-water, the middleward by himſelfe and his brother the Lord Edmund Howard, the reare-ward by Sir William Sands and Sir Richard Winkfield, both of them Knights of the Garter: and Sir Edward Guildford was Captaine of the horſemen. In this order the Earle entred the French ground the ſecond of September, and took his Journey towards Hedring. By the way there came to him a great Power of Burgognions, ſent by the Lady Margaret, according to the Articles of the League. All the Townes, Villages and Caſtles, in the Countrey through which they paſſed, they burnt and ſacked; as the Towne and Caſtle of Selloys, the Towne of Brunbrigge, Senekerke, Botington and Manſtier, with divers others. On the ſixteenth of September, they came before the Caſtle of Heding, and laid ſiege unto it; but the Caſtle being wel fortified, & the Earle having not battering Ordnance, which by reaſon of the foule weather, he could not bring with him:

after

after eleven dayes he raiſed his ſiege, and paſſing from thence to Dorlens, burnt the Towne and raced the Caſtle, as alſo the Towne of Dortyer, and then the yeer being farre ſpent, came back to Callice the ſixteenth of October.

At this time, the Duke of Albany being eſtabliſhed Governour of Scotland, raiſed an Army of fourſcore thouſand men, with which he approached the borders, but made no Invaſion, as thinking perhaps that the onely report of his great Army, would fright the Engliſh; but yet this ſtayed not the Lord Marqueſſe Dorſet, Warden of the eaſt and middle Marches; to enter into Tividale, and ſo forward ten miles into Gallaway, burning all townes and Villages on every ſide as he paſſed. All that night he tarried within the Scottiſh ground, and the next day being good-Friday, withdrew back into England, with a head of four thouſand cattell; having burned Grimſeley, Mowhomſe, Donford, Myles, Ackforth, Crowling, and many other Townes and Villages.

In King Henries fourteenth yeer, on the fifteenth of Aprill began a Parliament, which was holden at the Blackfryers, whither the King came, and there ſate downe in his Royall Seate; at his feet on the right ſide ſate the Cardinall of Yorke, and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; and at the Raile behinde, ſtood Doctor Tunſtall Biſhop of London, who making an Oration, told there the cauſes of calling this Parliament; which were (as he ſaid) for remedying of miſchiefs by the common Law, as Recoveries, Forraigne Vouchers and corrupt Trialls, and for making new Lawes for the good of the Common-wealth: whereof notwithſtanding, no one word was ſpoken all the time of the Parliament, nor any other thing done, but a Subſedie granted; but howſoever, being commanded to chuſe their Speaker, they choſe Sir Thomas Moore, who at firſt diſabling himſelfe, at laſt made two Petitions to the King; one for himſelfe, that if he ſhould be ſent by the Commons to the King on a Meſſage, and miſtake their intent, he might then with the Kings pleaſure reſort again to the Commons to know their meaning. The other, for the Houſe of Commons, that if in communication and reaſoning, any man ſhould ſpeake more largely then of duty he ought to do, yet all ſuch offences ſhould be pardoned, and that to be entred of Record. Which Petitions were granted, and then the Parliament began; where at firſt a Subſidie was demanded, but as there was much adoe in the Houſe of Commons about it, ſo there was no leſſe amongſt the Clergey in the Convocation Houſe; for Richard Biſhop of Wincheſter, and John Biſhop of Rocheſter were much againſt it, but moſt of all, one Rowland Philips, Vicar of Croyden, and a Canon of Pauls, but the Cardinall taking him aſide, dealt ſo with him, that he took him off, ſo as he came no more to the Houſe, and then the Bel-weather (as one ſaith) giving over his hold, the reſt ſoon yelded; and ſo was granted the half of all their ſpiritual yeerly Revenues, to be paid in five yeers following. The Clergey being thus brought on, on the nine & twentieth of April, the Cardinall came into the Houſe of Commons, to work them alſo; and there ſhewing the great charges the King was neceſſarily to be at in his preſent Wars: demanded the ſum of eight hundred thouſand pounds, to be raiſed of the fifth part of every mans Goods and Lands, which was four ſhillings of every pound. This demand was enforced the day after by the Speaker Sir Thomas Moore; but the Burgeſſes were all againſt it, ſhewing that it was not poſſible to have it gathered in money; for that men of Lands had not the fifth part thereof in Coyne. And further alleadged, that there be not many pariſhes in England one with another, able to ſpare a hundred Marks, except Cities and Townes; and ſeeing there were not above thirteen thouſand Pariſhes in the Kingdome, (at this day there are but 9 2 8 5.) how could ſuch a ſumme be raiſed? Hereupon certaine of the Houſe were ſent to move the Cardinall, to be a meanes to the King to accept of a leſſer ſumme, but the Cardinall anſwered, he would rather have his tongue plucked out of his mouth with a paire of Pinſors, then make to the King any ſuch motion. Whereupon the Cardinall came again into the Houſe, and deſired that he might reaſon with them that were againſt the demand; to which

which it was anſwered, that the order of that houſe was to heare, and not to reaſon, except amongſt themſelves. When the Cardinall was gone, the Commons after long debating the matter; at laſt, agreed of two ſhillings in the pound, from twenty pounds upward, and from forty ſhillings, to twenty pounds; of every twenty ſhillings, twelve pence, and under forty ſhillings, of every head of ſixteene yeeres and upwards, foure pence, to be paid in two yeeres: when this was told to the Cardinall, he was much offended; ſo that to pleaſe him, the Gentlemen of fifty pound Land and upward, by the motion of Sir John Huſſey, a Knight of Lincolneſhire, were charged with twelve pence more in the pound, to be paid in three yeeres. The Cardinall to move them to it, bore them in hand, that the Lords had agreed to foure ſhillings of the pound; which was untrue, for the Lords had granted nothing, but ſtayed to ſee what the Commons would doe; whereof when the King heard, he reproved the Cardinall for it; ſaying withall, that ere it were long he would looke to things himſelfe, without any Subſtitute. Which ſpeech of the Kings, though it danted the Cardinall for a while, yet he ſoone recovered his Spirits, and now as peremptory afterwards as he had been before. After this, the Parliament was prorogued till the tenth of June; during with prorogation, the Common people ſaid to the Burgeſſes, we heare ſay, you will grant foure ſhillings of the pound, we adviſe you to doe ſo, that you may goe home; with many like threatnings. At this time, the Cardinall by his power Legantine, diſſolved the Convocation at Pauls, convoked by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, calling him and all the Clergy, to his Convocation at Weſtminſter: which was never ſeene before in England (ſaith Hall.) The one and thirtieth of July, the Parliament was adjourned to Weſtminſter, and there continuing till the thirteenth of Auguſt, was that day at nine of the clock at night diſſolved.

About this time, the Biſhop of Durham died, and the King gave that Biſhoprick to the Cardinall; who reſigned the Biſhoprick of Bath to Doctor John Clerke, Maſter of the Rolles, and Sir Henry Marney, that was Vice-chamberlain, was made Lord Privy Seale, and ſhortly after, was created Lord Marney: alſo during this Parliament, Sir Arthur Plantagenet, baſtard ſonne to King Edward the fourth at Bridewell, was created Vicount Liſle; in right of his wife who was wife before to Edmund Dudley, Beheaded.

The fifteenth of June; in the fifteenth yeere of the Kings Reigne, Chriſtian King of Denmarke with his Queene; driven out of his own Country, came into England, and was lodged at Bath place; who after, he had been feaſted by the King and by the Citty of London, and received great guifts of both, returned again into Flanders, where he remained as a baniſhed man: ſome yeers after, King Henry ſent Doctor Henry Standiſh, Biſhop of Saint Aſſaph, and Sir John Baker Knight, into Denmarke, to perſwade the people to receive him againe into his Kingdome; but they could not prevaile, he was ſo much hated for his cruelty.

About this time, the Earle of Kildare having recovered againe the favour of the Cardinall, was ſent Deputy into Ireland, as he had bin before, where he reduced the wilde Iriſh to indifferent conformity. All this while had England warres both with the French and with the Scots. In Scotland the Marqueſſe of Dorſet threw downe the Caſtles of Wederborne, of Neſgate, of Blackaſter, of Mackwals, and burnt to the number of ſeven and thirty Villages, yet never came to skirmiſh. In France, the Lord Sands, Treaſurer of Callice, with twelve hundred men went before Bulloigne, where he skirmiſhed with the Enemie; and after taking divers Churches and Caſtles in the Enemies Countrey, returned backe to Callice, with the loſſe onely of a dozen men. King Henry being advertiſed that the Duke of Albanie was providing of Forces in France, with which to returne into Scotland, ſent forth his Vice-admirall Sir William Fitz-williams, with divers great Shippes to intercept him; but when he could not meet with him, he then landed in the Haven of Treport; where with ſeaven hundred men, hee beat ſix thouſand French that fought to to impeach his landing, tooke their Bulworks and much Ordnance in them, burned the suburbs of the town of Treport, and all in five houres, and then returned.

All this while King Henry had but played with the French, but now he means to be in earnest, and therefore sends over the Duke of Suffolk with an Army, the foure and twentieth of August; attended with the Lord Montacute and his brother Sir Arthur Poole, the Lord Herbert, sonne to the Earle of Worcester, the Lord Ferrers, the Lord Marney, the Lord Sands, the Lord Barkley, the Lord Powis, and the Baron Curson, Sir Richard Winkfield, Chauncellour of the Duchy of Lancaster, Sir John Vere, Sir Edward Nevile, Sir William Kingston, Sir Richard Weston, Sir Andrew Winsore, Sir Robert Winkfield, Sir Anthony Winkfield, Sir Edward Guildford, Sir Edw: Grevile, Sir Edw: Chamberlaine, Sir Thomas Lucy, Sir Everard Digby, Sir Adrian Fosker, Sir Richard Cornwall, Sir William Courtney, Sir William Sidney, Sir Henry Owin, sand many other Knights and Gentlemen. In the whole Army were six hundred Demylaunces, two hundred Archers on Horsback, three thousand Archers on foot, and five thousand Billmen. Also seventeen hundred taken out of the Garrisons of Hammes, Guysnes, and Callice, in all, ten thousand and five hnndred, besides two thousand six hundred labourers and Pioners. With this Army the Duke of Suffolk took the field, his vauntguard was led by the Lord Sands; Captaine of the right wing, was Sir William Kingston; of the left, Sir Everard Digby, Captain of all the Horsmen was Sir Edward Guildford, Marshall of Callice; the Duke himselfe led the Battaile, and Sir Richard Winkfield the Reareward. The Dukes first enterprise was the winning of Bell Castle, which the Lord Sands and the Lord Fenis assaulted, and had it yeelded to them: and then Sir William Skevington was placed Captaine in it. At this time, the Duke of Bourbon, high Constable of France, began to have his mind alienated from the King of France, and to draw him the more on, the Duke of Suffolk sent Sir John Russel (afterward created Duke of Bedford) to him, who passing in disguised apparell, so prevailed with him, that he professed to take part with the Emperour, and the King of England, who having ten thousand Almans in his pay: it was thought fit (for encouragement of the English) to proclaime in the Army, the accesse of so powerfull an assistant: and thereupon the Duke of Suffolk removed to Ard, and so forward into Picardie. At Cordes between Ternyn and Saint Omers, there came to him the Lord of Isilsteyn, and with him of Spaniards, Almans and others, three thousand Foot-men, and five hundred Horse. With these forces, the Duke marching on, took first the rich Town of Anchor, then the Castle of Bounguard, and then by assault the Towne of Bray, though two thousand good men of war were in it. After this, the Towres of Cappe and Roy, Lihome and Davenker, and then came before the Towne of Mount-Dedyer, in which were a thousand foot and five hundred horse; yet upon Sir William Skevingtons Batteries, was yeelded to him. From hence he removed to Roy, where he rested a while with his whole Army: and there on Alholland-day, in the chiefe Church of Roy, made Knights, the Lord Herbert, the Lord Powis, Oliver Manners, Arthur Poole, Richard Sands, Robert Jerningham, Robert Salisbury, Edward Beningfield, Richard Corbet, Thomas Wentworth, William Storton, Walter Mantel, George Warram and Edward Seymour (that was after Duke of Somerset.) The day after, the Army removed to a place called Neele, from thence to Veane, and then to Beauford, where the Duke made John Dudley, and Robert Vtreight Knights, and from thence on the eighth of November to a place called Mount Saint Martin; here the Welshmen began to murmure, that they might not returne home, the winter being so far spent; but there was to the number of a thousand persons, under the leading of Sir John Valloppe, who having no wages, but what they could get by booties, and were therefore called Adventurers, and by some Kreekers, and these had more desire to stay, then the Welshmen had to be gon; for the great gaines they made, by the spoyles of so many Townes that were taken. The thirteenth of November, the Duke removed to a place within two miles miles of Boghan Castle, defended by great Marishes, that lay before it, but the frost being at that time so great that many lost their fingers and toes with cold, and some died; Sir Edward Guildford acquainted the Duke, that he thought the marishes were hard enough frozen to beare great Ordnance; whereupon, the Duke bid him venture it then and goe on, which he resolutely did, and had the Castle presently delivered up to him. In this meane time, the King hearing in what state the Army stood, had prepared six thousand men to be sent to the Duke for a reliefe, under the leading of the Lord Montjoy; but before they could be put in order to passe the Sea, the Duke, partly by extremity of the weather, and partly by the murmuring of the Souldiers, was constrained to breake up his Army, and returne to Callice.

In this meane time, the Scots knowing that the strength of England was gone into France, tooke boldnesse to invade the Marishes; but then the Earle of Surrey, Treasurer and high Admirall of England, with six thousand men, being sent against them, tooke divers of their Castles and Holds; and at Tedworth, skirmishing with a great Garrison of Scots, overthrew them, and tooke and burned both the Towne and Castle. And now the French King finding that the Scots did not worke any great trouble to the English, whereby to keepe them from molesting of France, and thinking it to be for want of the Duke of Albanies presence, whom they accounted their Governour; he therefore prepared a Navie of Ships to transport him into Scotland; but when the Duke of Albany heard that Sir William Fitz-williams was sent with a great Fleet to stop his passage, he brought his Ships into the Haven of Brest, and gave it out that he would not goe into Scotland that yeere; which being told to the King of England, he commanded that his Ships also should be laid up in Havens, till the next spring. And now see the cunning of the Scot; for when he saw the Kings Ships discharged, he then boldly tooke shipping himselfe, and sailed into Scotland; whither being come, he presently levied a great Army, and approached the English Borders; but when he heard the Earle of Surrey was coming against him with a mighty power, he then sent a Herauld to him, promising of his honour, to give him Battaile; and if he tooke him prisoner, to give him good quarter. To whom the Earle answered, that he would not faile to abide his Battaile; but if he tooke him prisoner, the quarter he would give him, should be to cut off his head, and send it for a Present to his Master the King of England. At this time, to the Earle of Surrey being at Alnewicke, came the Earles of Northumberland and Westmerland, the Lords Clifford, Dacres, Lumley, Ogle and Darcye, with many Knights, Gentlemen and other Souldiers, to the number of forty thousand; and from the Court, came the Master of the Horse, Sir Nicholas Caren, Sir Francis Bryan, Sir Edward Baynton, and others. The last of October, the Duke of Albonye sent two or three thousand men over the water to besiedge the Castle of Warke; who by battery of their Ordnance got the outermost Ward, called the Barnekins; and continuing their battery, won the second Ward; but then Sir William Lisle, that was Captaine of the Castle, issuing forth with those few he had left, drove the French-men from the place, and slew of them to the number of three hundred; a memorable service, and for which the Earle of Surrey afterwards gave him great thankes. The Earle would gladly have followed his enemies into their owne Borders, but that his Commission was onely to defend England, and not to invade Scotland. Shortly after the Queene of Scots, Mother to the King, sent to her Brother the King of England, for an abstinence from Warre, till a further communication might be had; which being granted, the English Army brake up, and the Earle of Surrey returned to the Court.

And now for a while we must be content to heare of petty Occurrances, because greater did not happen; which if it make us like the Story the worse, it may make us like the times the better, seeing they are ever the best times that afford lest matter to be talked of: but this time will last but a while; for shortly we shall come to hear Occurrances, that have been matter of talke to this day, whereof the like have never scarce been seen, and will hardly be believed, when they are heard; a Marriage dissolved after twenty yeeres consummation; Nonnes built in Piety; under pretence of Piety demolished; a King made captive, a Pope held a prisoner; Queenes taken out of love, put to death out of loathing; and the Church it selfe so shaken, that it hath stood in distraction ever since.

At this time, the Emperour Charles sent to the King of England two Mules trapped in crimson Velvet, richly embroidered; also eleven goodly Jennits, trapped with russet Velvet, richly wrought; foure speares and two Javelins of strange timber, and worke richly garnished; and five brace of Greyhounds. To the Queene he sent two Mules richly trapped and high Chaires after the Spanish fashion: which Presents were thankfully received both of the King and Queene.

At this time in the moneth of October, the Cardinall sent out Commissions, that every man being worth forty pounds, should pay the whole Subsidie before granted, out of hand; which he called an Anticipation: which fine new word, he thought would make them pay their money the more willingly; but they loved their money better then any words he could devise.

In this yeere the King sent the Lord Morley, sir William Husſey, knight, and Doctor Lee his Almoner, to Ferdinand Archduke of Austria, with the Order of the Garter; which he received in the towne of Norimberg, to his great contentment.

In this yeere, through Bookes of Prognostications, foreshewing much hurt to come by waters and floods, many persons withdrew themselves to high grounds, for feare of drowning; specially one Bolton, Prior of Saint Bartholomewes in Smithfield, builded him an House upon Harrow on the Hill, and thither went and made provision for two moneths. These great waters should have fallen in February, but no such thing happening, the Astronomers excused themselves, by saying, that in the computation they had miscounted in their number an hundred yeeres.

In this meane time, many enterprises were attempted, betweene the Englishmen of Calice, and Guysnes, and the Frenchmen of Bullogne, and the Frontiers of Picardie, and till Sir William Fitz Williams, Captaine of Guysnes, Sir Robert Ferningham, Captaine of Newnham Bridge, Sir John Wallop, and Sir John Gage, were the men that did the French most hurt.

This yeere, the first of September, was Doctor Thomas Hannibell Master of the Rolles, received into London, by Earles, Bishops, and diverse Lords and Gentlemen, as Embassadours from Pope Clement: who brought with him, a Rose of gold for a present to the King: & on the day of the Nativity of our Lady after a solemne Masse sung by the Cardinall of Yorke, the said present was delivered to the King, which was a Tree forged of fine Gold, and with buddes, leaves, and flowers resembling Roses.

About the beginning of Winter, the adventurers called Kreekers, being not above two hundred; and of them, five and twenty horsmen, made an attempt to fetch some booty from a Village not farre from Muttrell, whereof the Earle of Dammartine having notice, he set upon them with a far greater number, and slew most of them, and this was the end of the Kreekers, as brave men as ever served any Prince.

In December this yeere, there came to London diverse Embassadours, out of Scotland, about a peace to be had, and a marriage to be concluded, betweene the King of Scots, and the Lady Mary daughter to the King of England.

At

At this time, the Lord Leonard Gray, and the Lord John Gray, brothers to the Lord Marquesse Dorset, Sir George Cobham sonne to the Lord Cobham, William Carye, Sir John Dudley, Thomas Wyat, Francis Poynts, Francis Sidney, Sir Anthony Browne, Sir Edward Seymor, Oliver Manners, Percivall Hart, Sebastian Nudigate, and Thomas Calen, Esquires of the Kings Household; made a challenge of Arms against the Feast of Christmas, which was proclaimed by Windsor the Herauld, and performed at the time appointed very Nobly; at Tilts, Turneys, Barriars, and the assault of a Castle erected for that purpose, in the Tilt-yard at Greenwich; where the King held his Christmas that yeer, with great State and magnificence.

About this time, John Jokyn Steward of the Household to the French Kings Mother, came into England, and was received in secret manner into the House of one Doctor Larke, a Prebendary of Saint Stephens; who oftentimes talked with the Cardinall, about a Peace to be concluded between the two Kings of England and France; of whose often meetings, Monsieur de Brate the Emperours Embassadour, grew very jealous. The four and twentieth of January, Monsieur Brynion President of Roan, came to London as Embassadour from the French King, and was lodged with the said John Jokyn, which small things should not be related, but that they were preparatives to great matters afterward.

On Sunday the fifth of March, were received into London Monsieur de Beuer Lord of Campher, Admirall of Flanders, Monsieur John de la Coose President of Malines, & Master John de la Gache, as Embassadours from the Lady Margaret in the name of the Emperour, who required three things. First they demanded the Lady Mary the Kings only daughter, to be presently delivered, and she to be maried Empresse, and as Governesse take possession of all the Low-Countryes. Secondly, that all such summes of money as the King should give with her in marriage, should be paid incontinently. Thirdly, that the King of England should passe the sea in person, and make Warre in France the next Summer. The first two demands were not agreed too for certaine causes; and as to the third, the King said, he would take time to advize. On Thursday the ninth of March, a Gentleman came in Post from the Lady Margaret, with Letters signifying, that whereas the King of France had long lyen at the siege of Pavia; he had now been forced to raise his siege, and was himselfe taken prisoner by the Imperialists; for joy whereof, Bonfires and great Triumph was made in London, and on the twentieth of March being Sunday, the King himselfe came to Pauls, and there heard a solemne Masse. But for all this shew of joy, it was thought if the King of France had not now been taken prisoner; that the King of England would have joyned in amity with him, as being angry with the Flemings, for inhaunsing his Coyne in Flanders, which caused much money to be conveyed out of England thither. The King of France being taken prisoner, was after some time conveyed into Spaine, and at last brought to Madrill, where he fell so sicke, that the Physitians had little hope of his life, unlesse the Emperour would be pleased speedily to visit him; upon whose visitation he recovered his health, though not presently his strength. In which time, many propositions were made for his delivery, but the Emperour would accept of none, without restitution of the Dutchy of Burgoigne. At last, the French King weary of imprisonment, and longing for liberty, was content to agree to any conditions: the chiefe whereof were, that the French King by a certaine day should be set at liberty, and within six weeks after should resigne to the Emperour the Dutchy of Burgoigne, with all Members pertayning to it; and at the same instant, should put into the Emperours hands, the Dolphyn of France, and with him, either the Duke of Orleance his second sonne: or else twelve principall Lords of France, whom the Emperour should name; and that there should be between them a League and perpetuall confederation for defence of their estates. Of whose attonement when King Henry heard, as before he had expreſſed gladneſſe, that he was taken priſoner, ſo now he ſent Sir Thomas Cheiney to him, to expreſſe his joy for being ſet at liberty; ſo ſuddaine is the enterchange of love and hate amongſt great Princes. The French King being thus delivered, the Emperour married the Lady Iſabel, Daughter to Emanuel King of Portingal; and had with her in Dower eleven hundred thouſand Duckets, though three yeers before being at Windſor, he had covenanted to take to wife the Lady Mary King Henries Daughter.

At this time Cardinall Woolſey obtained licence of the King to erect a Colledge at Oxford, and another at Ipſwich; and towards the charge of them, got leave alſo, to ſuppreſſe certaine ſmall Monaſteries, to the number of forty; and after, got a confirmation of the Pope, that he might imploy the Goods and Lands belonging to thoſe Houſes, to the maintenance of thoſe two Colledges; a pernitious preſident, and that which made the King a way afterward, to make a generall ſuppreſſion of all religious Houſes, though indeed there be great difference between converting of Moneſtaries into Colledges, and utter ſubverting them.

In March King Henry ſent Cutbert Tunſtall Biſhop of London, and Sir Richard Winkfield Chancelour of the Dutchy of Lancaſter into Spaine, to conferre with the Emperour, about matters of great importance, and particularly about Warre to be made in France, and yet were theſe two Princes at this time in League: but he that ſhall obſerve the carriage of theſe three Princes towards one another, and how convertible their Leagues were into Warre, and their Warre into Peace; ſhall finde it a ſtrange Riddle of Ragion di ſtato, and their Leagues to have been but meere complements, where the skale was turned with the leaſt graine of a circumſtance; and though they were bound by Oath, yet that Oath made the Leagues but little the firmer, ſeeing the League might be broken, and yet the Oath kept: for while one gave the occaſion, and the other took it, though they were both acceſſaries, yet neither was principall; and where there is not a principall, the Oath remains inviolate. And upon thoſe Hinges did the friend-ſhip of theſe Princes turne, as at this time; the Emperour, though not long before, he had parted with the King of England, in the greateſt kindneſſe that could be; yet gave not the Engliſh Embaſſadours ſo kinde entertainment now, as he had formerly done; but for what cauſe was not apparent, unleſſe upon ſome ſiniſter report made to him, by Monſieur du Prat; who having been his Ligier with the King of England, was without taking leave of the King departed, and come to the Emperour before the Engliſh Embaſſadours came.

But howſoever, King Henry being determined to make Warre in France himſelfe in perſon, his Councell fell into conſideration how the charge of the Warre ſhould be maintained: which care the Cardinall takes upon him; and thereupon appoints Commiſſioners in all Shiers, to ſit and draw the people to pay the ſixth part of every mans ſubſtance, in plate or money: but the people oppoſed it, alleadging that it was againſt the Law of the Realme, for any man to be charged with ſuch payments, unleſſe by Parliament; and as the Cardinall continued to preſſe it, ſo the people continued to denye it; and when ſome for denying it were committed to priſon, the Commons in many Countryes, made great aſſemblies for their defence: the report whereof at laſt came to the King, who thereupon came to Weſtminſter, and proteſted openly, that it was done without his knowledge, and that it was never his meaning, to aske any thing of his Subjects but according to Law; and therefore deſired to know by whoſe Authority it was done. Here the Cardinall excuſed himſelfe and ſaid, that it was the opinion of all the Judges, and of all his Councell, that he might Lawfully demand any ſumme, ſo it were done by Commiſſion, and thereupon it was done. But the King liked not to take advantage of a diſtinction to draw money from his Subjects; and thereupon gave warning for doing any ſuch thing hereafter: and ſignified ſo much by his Letters into all the Shiers of England; land giving alſo a generall pardon to all that had offered to riſe upon it; which though he did of his owne free grace, yet the Cardinall to win a good opinion in the Commons, gave out, that it was by his meanes the King granted the pardon.

King Henries ſeventeenth yeer, was honoured with the advancing of many in honour, for on the eighteenth of June, at his Pallace of Bridewell, the Kings ſonne (which he had by Elizibeth Blunt daughter to Sir John Blunt Knight) called Henry Fitz-Roy, was created firſt Earl of Nottingham, and after on the ſame day Duke of Richmond and Somerſet, Henry Courtney Earle of Devonſhire was created Marquis of Excetur, the Lord Brandon, ſonne to the Duke of Suffolke and the French Queene (a child of two yeers old) was created Earle of Lincolne, Sir Thomas Manners Lord Roſſe, was created Earle of Rutland, Sir Henry Clifford, was created Earle of Cumberland, Sir Robert Ratcliffe Lord Fitz-water, was created Viſcount Fitz-Water, and Sir Thomas Bullen Treaſurer of the Kings Houſhold, was created Viſcount Rochford.

At this time the French Kings mother, as then Regent of France, procured by her Embaſſadours, at firſt a Truce, and afterward a peace with England, which was proclaimed in London, the eighth of September. By the covenants of which peace, the King of England ſhould receive at certaine dayes, twenty hundred thouſand Crowns, which in ſterling money amounted to the ſumme of foure hundred thouſand pound; whereof fifty thouſand was to be paid in hand. Sir William Fitz-Williams and Doctor Talour, was ſent to the Lady Regent, to take her corporall oath, and likewiſe King Henry the foure and twentieth of Aprill, at Greenwich, in preſence of the Embaſſadours of France, Rome and Venice, tooke his corporall oath, to obſerve the peace betweene him, and his loving brother the French King, during his life, and one yeer after.

In this winter was great mortality in London, ſo as the Terme was adjourned, and the King kept his Chriſtmas at Eltham, with a ſmall number, and was therfore called the ſtill Chriſtmas. At which time, the Cardinall comming to the Court, took order for altering the ſtate of the Kings Houſe: many officers and other ſervants were diſcharged, and put to their penſions, in which number were foure ſcore and foure Yeomen of the Guard: who before having had twelve pence the day with check, were now allowed but ſix pence the day without check, and commanded to goe into their Countries.

On Shroveueſday this yeere, a ſolemne Juſts was held at Greenwich, the King and eleven other on the one part, the Marques of Excetur and eleven other of the other part.

In his nineteenth yeer, King Henry kept a ſolemne Chriſtmas at Greenwich, with Revels, Maskes, diſguiſings, and Banquets, and the thirtieth of December and third of January were ſolemne Juſts holden, when at night the King and fifteen other with him, came to Bridewel, and there putting on masking apparel, took his Barge, and rowed to the Cardinalls place, where were at ſupper many Lords and Ladyes, who danced with the maskers, and after the dancing was made a great Banquet. This Chriſtmas was a play at Grayes-Inne, made by one Maſter Roe a Sergiant at Law, the effect whereof was, that Lord Gouvernance was ruled by diſſipation and negligence, by whoſe evill order Lady Publick-Weale was put from governance. This the Cardinall took to be meant by him, and therupon ſent the ſaid Maſter Roe to the Fleet, though the Play were made long before the Cardinall had any authority: by which we may ſee how inſeperable a companion ſuſpition is to a guilty conſcience.

The fourteenth of January came to the Court Don Hugo de Mendoza, a Grande of Spaine, as Embaſſadours from the Emperour to the King, with a large commiſſion, to make King Henry Judge; how juſt the conditions were, which the Emperour required of the King of France, and about this negotiation carried two yeers in England, ſo deſirous the Emperour was to continue good correſpondence with the King of England.

On

On Shrovetuesday the King and the Maqueſſe of Exceſter with others, in moſt ſumptuous attire came to the Tilt, and ran ſo many courſes, till two hundred foureſcore and ſix Speares were broken; and then diſarming themſelves went into the Queenes Chamber, where a ſumptuous Banquet was provided. But this Banquet was one of the laſt of the Queenes preparing; for hitherto there had been no exception taken to the lawfulneſſe of her marriage, but now came over Embaſſadours from the King of France, requiring to have the Kings Daughter the Lady Mary, to be given in marriage to the Duke of Orleance ſecond Sonne to their Maſter the French King, wherein they that were the ſuitors for it, were the hinderers of it; for amongſt them was the Preſident of Paris, who made a doubt, whither the marriage betweene King Henry and the Lady Katherin of Spaine, having been his Borthers wife, were lawfull or no: But howſoever, the French Embaſſadours at Greenwich on Sunday the fifth of May, in the name of their Maſter the French King, took their Oathes to obſerue the League concluded betweene them during their lives. And ſhortly after were ſent Sir Thomas Bullen Viſcount Rochford, and Sir Anthony Browne Knight, as Embaſſadours to the King of France, to take his Oath in perſon for performance of the League.

But enough of ſmall Occurrances, and indeed there will be Occurrances now more worthy to be related, but more lamentable to be heard; for now the Duke of Bourbon Generall of the Emperours Army in Italie, was ſlaine by a ſhot from the Walls of Rome, as he was paſſing by; upon whoſe death, the Army entred and ſacked the City, made the Pope flye to the Caſtle of Saint Angelo, and there cooped him up; abuſed the Cardinals, and put them to grievous ranſomes, ſpared neither Sacred places, nor Religious perſons, but committed all manner of barbarous and inhumaine cruelty. Theſe inſolencies of the Emperours Army committed againſt the Pope; togeather with the hard conditions the Emperour had impoſed upon the King of France, for ſetting him at liberty; and the Emperours breach of promiſe, in not marrying the Lady Mary King Henries Daughter, were the apparent cauſes of King Henries breaking League with the Emperour Charles: but a more enforcing though concealed cauſe perhaps was the growing greatneſſe of the Emperour, by his acqueſts in Italie and other places; enough to breed a jealouſie in all neighbouring Princes; and indeed King Henry had ſome cauſe to thinke the Emperours ſpirits were grown higher with his Victories, ſeeing where before he was wont alwayes to write letters to King Henry with his own hand, and ſubſcribe them, your ſon and faithfull friend, now after his Victories in Italie, he cauſed his Secretaries to write them, ſubſcribing only Charles. And yet a more preſſing cauſe though not avowed, might be the Cardinalls ſpleene againſt the Emperour, for denying him the Biſhopricke of Toledo in Spaine. But which ſoever of theſe was the predominant cauſe, all of them togeather made a cauſe ſufficient for King Henry to fall off from amity with the Emperour; and his falling off from the Emperour, cauſe ſufficient to fall in with the King of France: and thereupon, the two Kings ſend their ſeverall Heraulds to the Emperour: King Henry Clarentius, the French King his Herauld Guyen, to expoſtulate their grievances with the Emperour, and he refuſing to returne a ſatisfactory anſwer, to defie him as their enemy. The Emperour heard the Heraulds with great temper, and anſwered Clarentius very mildely; that he knew his Maſters grievance was grounded upon miſinformation, wherein he would ſhortly rectifie him by his Letters, as deſiring nothing more then to continue his friend; but Guyen hee anſwered rougly, bidding him tell his Maſter that he had broken his faith, in not performing the Covenants agreed upon for his liberty; and with theſe anſwers diſmiſſed them, only Guyen not thinking it fit to deliver his anſwer, being in ſuch termes by word of mouth, obtained to have it ſent in writing. The Heraulds being returned home, and delivering the anſwers; the King of France was ſo incenſed, to be charged with breach of faith, that ſoone after he ſent another another defiance to the Emperour, telling him in plaine tearmes, that he lyed in his throat; and thereupon challenged him the Combate, requiring him to appoint the field, and himſelfe would the weapons. The Emperour accepted the chalenge, but other occurrances intervening, hindred the performance.

In this meane time, the Cardinall was appointed to go Embaſſadour to the King of France; carrying with him twelve ſcore thouſand pounds, to be employed by the French King, and other the confederates; in a Warre againſt the Emperour, who the eleventh of July took ſhipping at Dover, and landed that day at Callice; with whom was Cuthert Tunſtall Biſhop of London, the Lord Sands Chamberlaine to the King, the Earle of Derby, Sir Henry Guildford, Sir Thomas Moore, with other Knights and Gentlemen, in all to the number of twelve hundred horſe. At Amynes he was received by the French King himſelfe, and by his Mother, and by all the chiefe Peers of France. By whom it was agreed, that Articles of Accord ſhould be offered to the Emperour; which if he refuſed, then the French King ſhould marry the Lady Mary King Henries Daughter, and they both to be enemies to the Emperour. Theſe things concluded, the Cardinall returned, and on the laſt of September came to the King at Richmond. In October following, there came Embaſſadours from the French King, to take King Henries Oath, for obſerving the League with the King of France: and on Sunday the tenth of November, King Henry at Greenwich received the Order of Saint Michael, by the hands of the Lord Annas de Memorancye great Maſter of the Kings Houſehold; and Monſieur Humieres: as likewiſe the ſame day at Paris the French King received the Order of the Garter by the hands of the Lord Liſle, Doctor Taylor Maſter of the Rôles, Sir Nicholas Carew Maſter of the Kings horſe, Sir Anthony Browne and Sir Thomas Wriothſlye Knight, otherwiſe called Garter king of Armes, who were ſent thither with the whole Habit, Coller and other habiliments of the Order.

Upon King Henries defiance of the Emperour in the French Kings quarrell, Engliſh Merchants their ſhips and goods were attached in Spaine, and in the Low Countries, as likewiſe all Spaniſh & Flemiſh Merchants were attached here; which being very detrimentall to both Nations; at laſt, by mediation of Hugo de Mendoza, the Emperours Embaſſadour Legier, a reconcilement was made, and free traffique betweene the Nations was revived.

In this twentieth yeer, on the two and twentieth of February: Sir Piers Butler of Ireland, was created Earl of Oſory. And now King Henry began to be troubled in mind about his marriage with Queen Katherin; but whether his trouble of minde grew for ſcruple of conſcience, or from deſire of change, was by many men doubted; ſome thought he had ſet his affection upon the Lady Anne Bullen whom afterward he maried, and to make way for that mariage, moved his ſcruple, that he might be divorced; but this is not likely, for he maried not the ſaid Lady, til above three yeers after this doubt had bin moved; and three yeers was a long time to have affection be delaid, which comonly is impatient of any delay: if King Henries own proteſtation may be taken, it was very ſcruple of conſcience that troubled his mind; but then by what meanes this ſcruple came firſt into his head, is another doubt; ſome thought it was firſt moved by his confeſſor, Doctor Longland telling him, that the mariage with the relict of his Brother, could not be lawful; but neither is this likely, for Doctor Longland was not like to tel him ſo, who knew the mariage had been made by diſpenſation from the Pope, an authority in that time beyond exception; ſome thought it was a plot of Woolſeis, thereby to make variance between King Henry and the Emperour, with whom he was at varience himſelf, and for ſpleen to the Nephew, he revenged upon the Aunt; but neither is this likely: or els the Cardinall was much deceived in his plot; for though the Emperor laboured Milan and ſome other Vniverſities, to forbeare giving ſentence againſt the mariage, yet he continued amity with King Henry, as much afterward as before; if we wil beleeve the King himſelf, it was the Preſident of Paris, comming Embaſſadour from the King of France, that firſt moved moved it, upon a propoſition of marriage betweene the Lady Mary, King Henries daughter, and the Duke of Orleance, ſecond ſonne to the French King: but by what meanes his ſcruple had beginning, King Henries deſire was now it ſhould have an ending, and that the matter might be debated with indifferency; he allowed the Queene to make choyce of what councell ſhe thought beſt; who thereupon choſe William Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Nicholas Weſt Biſhop of Elye, Doctors of the Law; John Fiſher Biſhop of Rochester, and Henry Standiſh Biſhop of Saint Aſſaph, Doctors of Divinity, with many other; and in the mean time, ſent to all the Vniverſities in Italie & France to have their opinions, but ſpecially to the Court of Rome, deſiring the Pope to ſend his Legat to hear the cauſe; who thereupon ſent Cardinall Campeius, and joyned Cardinall Woolſey in Commiſſion with him. The place appointed for the Cardinalls to ſit and to heare the cauſe, was at the Black-friers: where in the great Hall preparation was made of ſeats, and all things neceſſary for ſuch a ſeſſion. Amongſt other Officers of the Court, Stephen Gardiner (afterward Biſhop of Winchester) late as chiefe ſcribe. The Court being ſet, the Judges commanded ſilence, whilſt their Commiſſion was read; which done, the Scribes commanded the Cryer to call the King, by the name of King Henry of England, come into the Court; who anſwered, Here: then called he the Queen, by the name of Katherine Queen of England, come into the Court: the Queen though preſent, yet anſwered not, but riſing from her ſeat, went to the place where the King ſat, and kneeling down, ſaid in effect; Sir, I humbly deſire you to take pity upon me, for I am a poor woman & a ſtranger, & have here no indifferent Councel, where all are your Subjects, and leſſe aſſurance of friendſhip when they all depend upon your favour; I have bin your wife theſe twenty yeers, and have borne you divers children, if you can charge me with diſhoneſty or undutifulneſſe, I am content to depart from you to my ſhame; but if you cannot, I then deſire you to do me juſtice, and ro ſpare me untill I may know what councel my friends in Spain will give me; but if you will not, then your pleaſure be fulfilled: and having ſo ſaid, ſhe roſe up, and making a low curſie, departed. The King being advertiſed that ſhe was going out of the Houſe, commanded the Cryar to call her again; who there upon called her, ſaying, Katherine Queen of England come into the Court, which her Gentleman-uſher Maſter Griffith hearing, told her, Madam, you are called; wel (ſaid ſhe) it makes no matter, I will not tarry, go your way: and thus ſhe departed, and never after would appear in any Court, but appealed from the Cardinals to the Pope himſelfe. The Queen being gone, the King ſaid, I confeſſe ſhe hath bin to me, the moſt dutifull and loving wife, that ever Prince had; and if it were not for this ſcruple of my conſcience, I would not leave her for any woman living: and having now referred the judgement of the cauſe to theſe Commiſſioners, I ſhould be moſt glad they could finde the marriage betweene us to be in ſuch ſort lawfull, that with obedience to the Law of God, we might continue together; for I take God to witneſſe, there is nothing I more deſire. This ſaid, the King roſe, and the Court was adjourned to another day; for notwithſtanding the Queens Appeal (from which ſhe would by no meanes be drawn) the Cardinals continued their Seſſion weekly, & heard all of both ſides: the Point that was chiefly ſtood on, was, whether Prince Arthur had ever had carnall knowledg of her, or no; the Kings Councell alleadged, he had, and proved it; firſt, by Prince Arthurs ſpeech, the nexr morning after his mariage, that he had bin that night in the midſt of Spain; and then by the words of the laſt Diſpenſation, Vel forſan Cognitam: the Queens Advocates alleadged the contrary; appealing to the Kings owne conſcience; whom the Queene charged that he knew her to be a Virgin when he married her; (though, to ſay the truth, it were ſtrange, Prince Arthur and ſhe having lyen five moneth together, and hee no leſſe then almoſt ſixteene yeeres old.) But whileſt Argumets were thus urged on both ſides, and no certainty could appeare; the King ſent the two Cardinals to the Queene, lying then in Bridewell, to perſwade her, ſhe ſhould ſubmit her ſelfe to the Kings pleaſure, and not ſtand ſo peremptorily to her Appeale. The Cardinals coming to her found her at work amongſt her Maids, with a skaine of white thred about her necke: who having heard their meſſage, anſwered, That in all other things ſhe would willingly ſubmit her ſelfe to the Kings will, but in this which concerned her honeſty, and the legitimateneſſe of her children, ſhe durſt not, but would relye upon the wiſdom and pietie of both their Fathers, who (ſhe knew) would never have aſſented to the marriage, if there had bin the leaſt ſcruple of unlawfulneſſe in it; and other anſwer ſhe would not give. Upon their returne to the King, when he perceived ſhe could not be removed from her opinion; he commanded the Court to goe on; ſo that at laſt it came to judgement, which every man expected ſhould be the next day. At which day the King came thither (but in ſo ſecret manner that he might heare and not be ſeene) where the Kings Councell at the Barre calling for Judgement; Cardinall Campeius, as being chiefe Commiſſioner, ſtood up and ſaid; I finde the caſe very doubtfull, and the party Defendant ſtanding to her Appeale, I will therefore give no Judgement, till I have conferred with the Pope; and therefore I adjourne the Court for this time, according to the order of the Court of Rome, which heares no Cauſes judicially from the laſt of July till the fourth of October; at which protraction of time, King Henry was not a little angry, and the Duke of Suffolk being preſent, in a great rage ſaid; it was never merry in England, ſince we had Cardinals amongſt us. Soon after this, the Cardinall tooke his leave of the King, and returned to Rome: he was indeed commanded ſo to doe by the Pope, who would elſe moſt willingly have gratified King Henry, that had beſtowed upon him the Biſhoprick of Salisbury. Whilſt theſe things were in acting, Cardinall Woolſey had an inkling of the Kings affection to Anne Bullen, daughter of the Viſcount Rochford; and that the Divorce once paſſed, he ment to marry her; which Match, becauſe for many reaſons, he miſliked; one perhaps, becauſe ſhe was a Lutheran, he ſent privily to the Pope, that by no means he ſhould give ſentence for the Divorce, till he had framed the Kings minde another way; for his deſire was, that the King ſhould marry the Dutcheſſe of Alanſon, the French Kings ſiſter. This packing of Woolſey was not ſo cloſely carried, but that it ſoone came to the Kings knowledge; and the King finding him a rubbe in his way, whom he expected to have expedited his proceeding, began to thinke it neceſſary to remove him, and to take him off from that greatneſſe which had made him ſo preſuming; and indeed he made ſhort worke with him; for ſoone after he ſent the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke to him for the Seale, which yet he would not deliver to them, till they brought him a Warrant under the Kings owne hand. When the Seale was brought to the King, he delivered it to Sir Thomas Moore, Speaker then of the Parliament (the firſt Lay-man that bore that Office in any memory;) and in his roome was choſen Speaker Thomas Audley, Attourney of the Dutchie. Woolſey now removed from his Chauncellourſhip; was in the Parliament then holden, charged with points of treaſon; but that charge was ſo cleerely taken off by his ſervant Thomas Cromwell, who was then of the Houſe, that the Cardinall was acquitted, to the great commendation of Cromwell, both for abilities in himſelfe, and faithfulneſſe to his Maſter.

After this, the King being informed, that all thoſe things which the Cardinall had done by his power Legantine, were within the caſe of Præmenire; he cauſed his Attourney Chriſtopher Hales to ſue out a Præmunire againſt him; and thereupon the two Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke were ſent unto him, to let him know, the Kings pleaſure was, he ſhould goe to Asher, a Houſe neere to Hampton-Court, belonging to his Biſhopricke of Winchester, and there to reſide: whereupon, the Cardinall having firſt delivered up all his Moveables to the Kings uſe; (the greateſt ſtore and richeſt that was ever knowne of any Subject) went preſently to Putney by water, water, and from thence rode to Asher, where he and his Family continued three or foure weekes, without either Bed, Sheetes, Table-loathes or Dishes to eat their meat in, or money wherewith to buy any, but what he was forced to borrow of the Bishop of Carlile. After this, his matter for the Præmunire being called upon in the Kings Bench, his two Atturnies confessed the Action, and thereupon had Judgement to forfeit all his Lands and Goods, and to be out of the Kings protection; but the King of his clemency, sent him a sufficient Protection, and left him the Bishopricks of Yorke and Winchester, with Plate and stuffe convenient for his dignity. His Bishopricke of Duresme was given to Doctor Tunstall, Bishop of London; his Abbey of Saint Albans to the Prior of Norwich, and the Bishopricke of London to Doctor Stokesley, Embassadour then beyond the Seas.

In this meane while, Margaret Dutchesse of Savoy, aunt to the Emperour, and the Lady Loyse Dutchesse of Angoulesme, Mother to the French King, met at Cambray to treat of a Peace between the Emperor, the Pope and the Kings of England and France, where were present Doctor Tunstall Bishop of London, and Sir Thomas Moore, then Chancelour of the Dutchie of Lancaster, Commissioners for the King of England: after long debating, through the diligence of the said Ladies, a Peace was concluded; and was thereof called, The Womans Peace; and was indeed as fickle as women, for it was soone broken, and neither of the Princes trusted the other ere the more for it.

King Henry before this time had beene wholly ruled by the Cardinall and by the Clergie, but now growing sensible of that errour, he called his high Court of Parliament; in which the Commons complained sharply of their grievances against the Clergie, specially in six things.

The first, for that they exacted unreasonable summes of money, as duesses, for the probate of mens last Wils and Testaments: in so much, that Sir Henry Guildford Knight of the Garter, and Comptroller of the Kings House declared openly, that he and others being Executers to Sir William Compton, payed for the probate of his Will to the Cardinall, and the Archbishop of Canterbury a thousand markes.

The second, the extreame exaction, which spirituall men used in taking of corps, or mortuaries.

The third, that spirituall men became Farmours of great Granges and Farmes: to the prejudice of Husbandmen and Graziers.

The fourth, because many Abbots, Pryors, and other spirituall men, kept Tan-houses, and bought and sold wooll, cloath, and other wares, as temporall Merchants.

The fifth, because such Clergy men as had the best livings, would take the uttermost of their right, and yet live in the Court or in Noble mens or Bishops houses, where they spent nothing.

The sixth, because diverse ignorant men amongst them, held ten or twelve Benifices to themselves severally, and yet lived not upon any one of them, but kept great schollers at small pension.

These things before this time might not be touched, because the Bishops were Chancelours, and had all the rule about the King: but now the King looking better into the matter, gave way to these complaints: whereupon the Burgesses drew up three Bils; one of the probate of Testaments, another for Mortuaries: and the third, for Non-residence, pluralities, and taking of farmes by spirituall men. The bill of Mortuaries, passed first the House of Commons, and was sent up to the Lords: within two dayes after, was sent up the Bill of probate of Testaments, at which the Archbishop of Canterbury, and all the Bishops much frowned, but specially John Fisher Bishop of Rochester who rose up and said; my Lords, you see what Bills come dayly from the Common House, and all is to the destruction of the Church, for Gods sake, consider what a realme Bohemia was, and when the Church went downe, then fell the glory of that Kingdome. Now

Now with our Commons is nothing but downe with the Church; and all this mee seemeth, is for lacke of faith onely. When these words were reported to the House of Commons, they tooke the matter very hainously, and thereupon sent their speaker Thomas Audeley, with thirty of the House, to the King, complayning what a dishonour to the King and to the whole Realme it was to say, that they which were elected for the wisest men of all Shires, should be charged to lack faith, which was all one as to say, they were Infidels and no Chrystians, so as what Acts or Laws soever they made should be taken as Laws made by Paynims and Heathen, and not worthy to be kept by Christian men. And therfore humbly besought his Majesty, to call the said Bishop of Rochester before him, to give accompt of the words he had spoken. Wherupon within few daies after, the King sent for the Bishop, and acquainted him with the Commons complaint against him; who excused himselfe, by saying he meant the doings of the Bohemians was for lack of faith, and not the doings of the House of Commons; of which excuse, the King sent word to the House by Sir William Fitz-williams Treasurer of his household, but it pleased the Commons nothing at all. After divers meetings between the Lords and the Commons, about the Bils of probate of Testaments and Mortuaries, the temporalty laid to the spiritualty their owne lawes and constitutions, and the spiritualty defended them, by prescription and usage; to whom a Gentleman of Grayf-Inne made this answer, the usage hath ever been of theeves, to robbe on shooters hill; is it therefore lawfull? whilst these Bils were in debate, an Act was passed, which released to the King all such summes of money as he had borrowed at the Loane, in the fifteenth yeere of his Reigne; which Bill at first was much opposed, but the most part of the House being the Kings servants, it was at last assented to, which once knowne in the Country abroad, made much murmering, and the Parliament to be ill spoken of; for every man counted it as a sure debt, so as some made their Wils of the money, and some turned it over in satisfaction to their creditours. To qualifie which grievance, the King granted a generall pardon for all offences (certaine excepted) and was a meanes also to have the three Bils passed; one for probate of Testaments, another for Mortuaries; and the third, against plurality of Benefices; Non-residence, buying and taking of farmes by spiritual persons, though this last with some qualifying.

During this Parliament, the King created Viscount Rochford, Earl of Wiltshire, the Vicount Fitz-Water Earle of Sussex, and the Lord Hastings Earl of Huntington.

By this time, the Lords of the upper House, had drawne certaine Articles against the Cardinall, and sent them downe to the House of Commons, the chiefe wherof were these.

First, that without the Kings assent, he hath procured himselfe to be made a Legat, by reason whereof he tooke away the right of all Bishops and spirituall persons.

Secondly, that in all his writings which he wrote to Rome, or to any foraign Prince he wrote Ego et Rex meus, I and my King; so preferring himselfe before the King.

Thirdly, that without the Kings assent, hee carried the great Seale of England with him into Flanders.

Fourthly, that having the French-pox, he presumed to come and breath upon the King.

Fifthly, that he caused the Cardinals-hat to be put upon the Kings Coyne.

Sixthly, that he would not suffer the Kings Clerke of the Market to sit at Saint Albanes.

Seventhly, that he had sent infinite store of treasure to Rome, for purchasing of his dignity.

These Articles were read in the House, and if not otherwise proved, yet confessed feſſed afterward under the Cardinals owne hand, which added to the former Præmunire; all his Lands and goods were ſeized on to the Kings uſe.

This Parliament being ended, the King removed to Greenwich, and there kept his Chriſtmas with his Queene Katherine in great ſtate; for though this matter of making void the marriage between them, was hotly purſued by the King, yet abſtaining onely from her bed, he converſed with her ſtill, and they kept Court together, in as loving manner as they had done before. And now King Henry underſtanding that the Pope and the Emperour was to meet at Bologna, he ſent Embaſſadours thither, the Earle of Wiltſhire, Doctor Stokeſley Elect of London, and Doctor Lee, to declare both to the Pope and to the Emperour, the opinions of divers learned men in the matter of his Marriage; who all agreed that it was againſt the Law of God; and thereupon requiring the Pope to doe him juſtice; and ſhewing to the Emperour, that the King moved this matter for diſcharge of his Conſcience onely, and to no other end. To which the Pope anſwered, that when he came to Rome, he would heare the matter diſputed, and doe the King right. The Emperour anſwered, that he would in no caſe be againſt the Law of God, and if this marriage were Judged ſuch by the Court of Rome, he would reſt contented: with theſe Anſwers the Embaſſadours returned.

It was now the two and twentieth yeere of King Henries reigne, when the Emperour gave to the Maſter of Saint Johns of Hieruſalem the Iſland of Malta, in ſupplying of the Iſland of Rodes, which the Turke ſometime before had won from that Order.

In this yeere, the New Teſtament having beene Tranſlated into Engliſh, by Tindall, Joy, and others, was forbidden to be read; and many for reading it, were ſharply puniſhed by command of the Biſhops and Sir Thomas Moore then Lord Chancellour; but none was more violent in the matter then the Biſhop of London, who cauſed all the Bookes to be brought into Pauls Church-yard, and there burned.

King Henry having heard by good information, that when Campeius was ſent Legat into England, he had brought with him a Bull of Divorce; but was afterward upon change of the Popes mind, commanded to burne it; ſaw plainly by this, that the Pope had no meaning of proceeding really in the matter, but to keepe it a foot for his owne ends; neither to diſpleaſe the Empour by granting it, nor King Henry by not granting it, but promiſing expedition to keepe him in expectance; yet uſing delayes to keepe him in dependance; and therefore reſolved now to take ſuch a courſe, that he ſhould not need to care whether the Pope granted it or no; and thereupon cauſed a Proclamation to be publiſhed, that no perſon of what eſtate or condition ſoever ſhould Purchaſe, or attempt to purchaſe from the Court of Rome, any thing prejudiciall to the Juriſdiction, or Prerogative of this his Realme, upon paine of impriſonment, and other puniſhments at his Graces pleaſure; and ſhortly after an Act was made, that Biſhops ſhould pay no more Annats, or money for Bulls to the Pope; for as much as it was proved, there had been paid for Bulls of Biſhops, ſince the fourth yeere of King Henry the ſeventh, an hundred and threeſcore thouſand pounds, beſides what had been paid for Pardons and other diſpenſations. Another Act was then alſo made, that no perſon, ſhould appeale for any cauſe, out of this Realme to the Court of Rome, but from the Commiſſary to the Biſhop, and from the Biſhop to the Archbiſhop, and from the Archbiſhop to the King: and all Cauſes of the King, to be tried in the upper Houſe of the Convocation.

At this time, the Cardinall lying ſtill at Aſher, and his Adverſaries doubting leaſt lying ſo neare the King, he might one time or other get acceſſe to the Kings preſence, and come againe into favour; they uſing meanes to have him ſent further off, and thereupon the King appointed him to goe to his Dioceſſe of Yorke, and not to come Southward without ſpeciall licence; whereupon in in Lent he made great preparation for his journey, and having in his train to the number of an hundred and threeſcore perſons: by eaſie journeyes came to Peterborrow, and there kept his Eaſter; the weeke after he went to Stamford then to Newark, and ſo to Southwell, where he continued moſt part of all that ſummer: and then rode to Scroby, where he ſtaid till Michaelmas and then came to Cawood Caſtle, within ſeaven miles of Yorke where he kept a plentifull houſe for al commers: and repaired the Caſtle, being greatly in decay, having above three hundred Artificers in daily wages. At laſt, he determined to be inſtalled at Yorke, the next Munday after Alhallan-day; againſt which time great preparation was made, and the Cardinall ſent to the King, to lend him the Miter and Pall, which he uſed to wear at any great ſolemnity. At which preſumption the King marvailed not a little; ſaying to thoſe that were about him, what a thing is this, that pride ſhould thus reigne in a man that is quite under foot? but before the day of Inſtalment came; he was arreſted in this manner; Sir walter Walſh one of the Kings Privy-chamber, was ſent downe to the Earle of Northumberland, with whom he was joyned in Commiſſion to arreſt the Cardinall; whereupon they goe together to Cawood, where the Cardinall lay: and being entred into the houſe, it was told the Cardinall, that the Earle of Northumberland was come, and in the Hall; then (quoth the Cardinall) I am ſorry wee have dined, for I doubt our Officers are not provided of any good cheere. With that, he went and brought the Earle up, welcomming him in a complementall manner, as if he had come but onely to viſit him: but being come into the Chamber, the Earle with a ſoft voyce, laying his hand upon the Cardinals arme, ſaid; My Lord, I arreſt you of high treaſon: the Cardinall ſomewhat aſtonied, asked to ſee his Commiſſion, which the Earle denying to ſhew; then (ſaith the Cardinall) I will not obey your arreſt; at that inſtant Maſter Walſh came in, and kneeled downe to the Cardinall; who asked him if he were joyned in Commiſſion with the Earle; who anſwered, he was: well then, ſaid the Cardinall, I trow you are one of the Kings Privie Chamber, your name is Walſh; I am content to yeeld to you, but not to my Lord of Northumberland, unleſſe I ſee his Commiſſion: the meaneſt of the Kings Privie-chamber is ſufficient to arreſt the greateſt Peere of the Realme, by the Kings commandement, without any Commiſſion. Then the Earle took the Cardinals keyes from him, and put him in cuſtody of his Gentlemen: ſome few dayes after, he was conveyed from Cawood to Pomfret, and after to Sheffield Parke, where he had kinde entertainment, and ſtaid with the Earle of Shrewsbury and his Lady eighteene dayes; till at laſt ſitting one day at dinner, his colour was obſerved to change, and being asked how he did; not well (ſaith he) I have ſomething ſuddenly at my ſtomacke, as cold as a whetſtone, which I know is winde; I deſire to have ſomething from the Apothecary, to breake winde; which was brought, and the Earle ſeeing the ſay taken, he tooke it, and thereupon broke winde indeed; but whether it were he tooke it in too great a quantity, or that there was ſome foule play uſed, he fell ſoone after into ſuch a looſeneſſe, that the night following he had above fifty ſtooles; yet the next day he rode to Nottingham, and the day after to Leiceſter Abbey; being ſo ſicke by the way, that he was ready to fall off his Mule; comming to the Abby gates, the Abbot with all the Covent met him; to whom he ſaid, Father Abbot, I am come hither to lay my bones among you; and then was led up into his chamber, and went to bed; where growing ſicker and ſicker; the next morning Maſter Kingſton Lievtenant of the Tower, who had beene ſent to bring him up, comming to him, and asking him how he did; I doe but tarry, (ſaith he) the pleaſure of God, to render up my poore ſoule into his hands; for this is my caſe, I have a flux with a continuall feaver, the nature whereof is, that if there be no amendment within eight dayes, either excoriation of the entrailes will enſue, or frenzie, or elſe preſent death; and the beſt of them is death; and (as I ſuppoſe) this is the eight day. Sir (ſaid Maſter Kingſton) you are afraid of that you have no cauſe; for for I assure you, the King commanded me to say unto you, that you should be of good cheere, for that he beareth you as much good will as ever he did; No, no (Master Kingston) said the Cardinall, I see how it is framed; but if I had served God as diligently as I have done the King, he would not have given me over in my gray hayres; but it is a just reward for my study to doe him service, not regarding the service of God, to doe him pleasure; and having so said, his speech failed, and incontinent the clock struk eight, and then he gave up the Ghost; which made some about him to remember, how he had said the day before: that at eight of the clock they should loose their master. Being dead, he was buried in the Abby of Leicester. This man held at once the Bishopricks of Yorke, Winchester, and Durham, the dignities of Lord Cardinall Legat and Chancelour of England, the Abbey of Saint Albans, diverse Priories, and sundry great Benefices in Commendum: he had also in his hands, as it were in Farme, the Bishoprick of Bath, Worcester and Hereford, which having beene given by King Henry the seventh to strangers, that lived out of the Realme, they suffered Woolsey to enjoy them, receiving of him a Pension onely. The Retinue of this Prelate is scarce credible, a thousand persons daily in his household, of whom many Knights and some Lords; all which greatnesse as it came by the Kings favour, so by the withdrawing of his favour, it was overthrowne: so true is that saying of Salomon, The Kings favour is as dew upon the grasse; but his wrath is as the roaring of a Lion, and as a messenger of death. After this the King removed from Hampton-Court to Greenwich, where with his Queene Katherine he kept a solemne Christmas, and on twelfth night he sat in state in the Hall, where was divers Enterludes, costly Masques, and a sumptuous Banquet. After Christmas he came to his Mannor of Westminster, which before was called Yorke Place; for the Cardinall had made a Feoffment of it to the King, which the Chapter of Yorke confirmed, and then it was no more called Yorke Place, but the Kings Mannor of Westminster, now Whitehall.

At this time the whole Clergie of England was charged by the Kings learned Councell, to be in a Præmunire, for supporting and maintaining the Cardinals Legatine power, and were thereupon called by Processe into the Kings Bench to answer; but before their day of Appearance came, they in their Convocation concluded an humble submission in writing, and offered the King an hundred thousand pound to have their pardon by Parliament; which offer, after some labour, was accepted, and their pardon promised. In which submission the Clergie called the King supreame Head of the Church. This Pardon was signed with the Kings hand, and sent to the Lords, who assented to it; and then sent it to the Lower House: but here, divers of the House excepted against the Pardon, unlesse themselves also might be included in it; who (they said) having had something to doe with the Cardinall, might be brought into the same case as the Clergie were. Hereupon their Speaker Thomas Audeley, with a convenient number of the House, was sent to the King about it; to whom the King made answer, that he was their Soveraigne Lord, and would not be compelled to shew his mercy; and seeing they went about to restraine him of his liberty, he would grant a Pardon to the Clergie, which he might doe, by his great Seale without them; and for their Pardon, he would be advised before he granted it: with this Answer the Speaker and Commons returned, much grieved and discontented; and some said that Thomas Cromwell, who was newly come into the Kings favour, had disclosed the secrets of the House, which made the King give this unpleasing Answer. But soon after the King of his own accord, caused their Pardon also to be drawn, and signed it; which easily passed both Houses, with great commendation of the Kings judgement, to denie it at first when it was demanded as a right, and to grant it afterward, when it was received as of grace.

In this Parliament time, on the thirtieth of March, Sir Thomas Moore Lord Chancellour, with twelve of the Lords, came into the Lower House, acquainting them, that though in the matter of the Kings Divorce, he might sufficiently rest upon the judgement of learned men in his owne Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, yet to avoid all suspicion of partiality, he had sent into France, Italy, the Popes Dominions, and the Venetians, to have their opinions; and then causing them to be read, Sir Bryan Tuke tooke out of a box certaine writings sealed, which were the determinations of the Universities of Orleance, of Paris, of Anjou, of Burges, of Bolonia, of Padua, and of Thoulouse: all which were peremptory in these two Points; that the Brother, by the Law of God, might not marry the Relict of his brother; and then, being against the law of God, that it is not in the power of the Pope to dispence with it: and now (said they) you may know, that the King hath not sought this Divorce for his pleasure, but for discharge of his conscience; and this said, they departed. The King himselfe, when he heard of these determinations, was so farre from rejoycing at it, that he rather mourned, as for the losse of so good a wife; yet he conversed with her as he had done before, in nothing altered but in abstaining from her bed. But being willing the Queene should know these Determinations; in Whitsonweeke after, he sent divers Lords to acquaint her with them; requiring her thereupon to recall her Appeale, and to refer the matter to eight indifferent Lords; which she utterly refused, using her usuall Answer, that she was his lawfull wife, and would abide the Determination of the Court of Rome, but of no other. After Whitsontide, the King and Queen removed to Windsor, and there continued till the fourteenth of July, on which day the King removed to Woodstocke and left the Queen at Windsor, where she remained a while, and after removed to Easthamsted, whither the King sent to her divers Lords, first to perswade her to be conformable to the law of God; which if they could not do, then to let her know, that his pleasure was, she should be at either of these three places, his Mannor of Oking, or of East-hamstead, or the Monastery of Bisham, and there to continue without further molesting him with her suits.

And now came Cranmer in to play his part. It chanced that Doctor Stephens, Doctor Foxe and he met at Waltham one day at dinner; where falling into discourse, about the case then in agitation, of the Kings mariage with Queene Katherine; the other Doctors thought the mariage might be proved unlawfull by the Civill Law: (but (said Cranmer) it may better be proved by the Law of God, and it is no hard matter to doe it; which words of his being made knowne to the King, Cranmer is sent for, and commanded to set his reasons down in writing: which having done, and shewed them to the King; he was asked whether he would stand to that which he had written: who answered, he would, even before the Pope himselfe, if his Majesty pleased: marry (said the King) and to Pope you shall go; and thereupon sent him to the Court of Rome, and with him Thomas Bullen Earl of Wiltshire, Doctor Stokesley Elect of London, Doct. Lee the Kings Almoner, and others: who coming to Bolonia where the Pope was, had a day of audience appointed, but was hindred by a ridiculous accident; for the Pope holding out his foot for them to kisse his toe, as the manner is, a dog of the Earls, by chance in the room, ran and caught the Popes foot in his mouth, & made it for that time unfit to kisse. After this, when Cranmer had made his Proposition, he was told, it should be answered when the Pope came to Rome: so the Embassadors were dismissed, and Cranmer went to the Emperours Court; where in private conference he satisfied Cornelius Agrippa, the most learned at that time about the Emperour, and brought him to be of his opinion. Cranmer returning home, and giving the King this satisfaction; the Kings mariage with Queen Katherine was soon after dissolved by Parliament, and the Bishop of Canterbury accompanied with Doctor Stokesley Bishop of London, Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, the Bishop of Bathe and Lincolne, and other learned men, rode to Dunstable where Queen Katherine then lay; where being cited to appeare, and making default fifteen dayes togethers, for lack of appearance, she was divorced from the King, and the mariage declared to be void and of none effect; and from thencethenceforth it was decreed, ſhe ſhould no more be called Queen, but Princeſſe Dowager: after which time, the King never ſaw her more.

At this time, being the foure and twentieth yeer of King Henries reigne, Sir Thomas Moore, after long ſuit, delivered up the great Seal, which was then delivered to Thomas Audeley Speaker of the Parliament; and he made firſt Lord Keeper, and ſhortly after Chancelour; in whoſe roome of Speaker, Henrey Wingfeld of Grayes-Inne was choſen on the firſt of September this yeer: the King being at Windſor, created Anne Bullen Marchioneſſe of Pembrooke, giving her a thouſand pounds land a yeere: and then being deſirous to talke with the King of France in perſon, on the tenth of October, taking the ſaid Lady with him, and divers Lords, as the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke, the Marqueſſe of Dorſet and Exceſter, the Earles of Arundell, Oxford, Surrey, Eſſex, Derby, Rutland, Suſſex and Huntington, with divers Viſcounts, Barons and Knights, he ſailed over to Callice; and on the twentieth of October met with the King of France at Bolloigne, with whom he ſtaid foure dayes; in which time, to doe him honour, the King of France honored the two Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke with the Order of Saint Michael, and then both Kings went to Callice, where the French King ſtayed certain dayes; in which time to doe the King of France honor, King Henry honored two of his great Lords with the Order of the Garter, and then after great magnificence in revelling & feaſting, on the twentieth of October, the French King departed from Callice, and King Henry returned into England, where on the fourteenth of November following, he maried ſecretly the Lady Anne Bullen, which mariage was not openly known till Eaſter after, when it was perceived ſhe was with childe; at which time William Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury dyed, Thomas Cranmor was elected Archbiſhop in his roome.

After that the King perceived his new wife to be with childe, he cauſed all Officers neceſſary to be appointed to her; and ſo on Eaſter eave ſhe went to her cloſet openly as Queen, and then the King appointed her coronation to be kept on Witſunday following, and writings were ſent to all Sheriffes, to certifie the nams of men of forty pounds, to receive the order of Knighthood, or elſe to make fine: the aſſeſment of which fines was appointed to Thomas Cromwell Maſter of the Jewel-houſe, and of the Kings Councell; a man newly come in the Kings favour, by whoſe induſtry great ſums of money were by ſuch fines gathered. In the beginning of May, the King cauſed Proclamation to be made, that all men who claimed to doe any ſervice at the Coronation, by the way of tenure, grant, or preſcription, ſhould put in their claime three weekes after Eaſter in the Star-chamber, before Charles Duke of Suffolke, for that time high Steward of England, the Lord Chancellour and other Commiſſioners. Two dayes before the Coronation were made Knights of the Bath, the Earle of Dorſet, the Earle of Derby, the Lord Clifford, the Lord Fitzwater, the Lord Haſtings, the Lord Monteagle, the Lord Vaux, Sir John Mordant, Sir Henry Parker, Sir William Windſor, Sir Francis Weſton, Sir Thomas Arundell, Sir John Hurlſon, Sir Thomas Poynings, Sir Henry Savill, Sir George Fitzwilliams, Sir John Tindall, and Sir Tho: Jermey. On Whitſunday the Coronation was kept in as great ſtate & pomp for al circumſtances as ever any was, and the day after a ſolemn Juſt was holden.

In May this yeer Pope Clement ſent a meſſenger to King Henry, requiring him perſonally to appeare at the generall Councell, which he had appointed to be kept the yeer following; but when his Commiſſion was ſhewed, there was neither time nor place ſpecified for keeping of the ſaid Councell; and ſo with an uncertain Anſwer to an uncertain Demand, the Meſſenger departed.

It was now the five and twentieth yeere of the Kings reigne, when on Midſomer day, Mary the French Queene, and then wife to Charles Duke of Suffolke, dyed; and was buried at Saint Edmund-berry; and on the ſeaventh of September following, between three and foure a clocke in the afternoone, the Queene was delivered of a daughter that was named Elizabeth; the Godfather at the chriſtning was the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; the Godmother the old Dutcheſſe of Norfolke, and the old Marchioneſſe Dorſet widow; and at the Confirmation, the Lady Marchioneſſe of Exceſter: the Chriſtning was performed with exceeding great ſtate, and great gifts were given by the Goſſips.

This yeere, one Pavier the Town-clerke of London hanged himſelfe, (whom Hollinſhead ſaith) he heard once ſweare a great oath; that if he thought the thought the King would ſet forth the Scripture in Engliſh, rather then he would live to ſee that day, he would cut his owne throat: which I therefore relate, that the judgement of God may be ſeene upon ſuch unhallowed oathes.

A little before this time one Elizabeth Barton, named the Holy Maid of Kent, came to be diſcovered; whoſe abettours were Richard Maſter a Prieſt, Parſon of Aldington in Kent, Edward Bocking Doctor of Divinity, a Monke of Canterbury, Richard Deering a Monke, Edward Thwayts Gentleman, Henry Gold Parſon of Aldermary, Hugh Rich a Fryar obſervant, Richard Risby and Thomas Gold, Gentlemen. This Maid had learned to counterfeit falling into Trances; in which ſhe would deliver many ſtrange things, and amongſt others, ſaid, that by Revelation from God and his Saints ſhe was informed; that if King Henry proceeded to the Divorce, and married another, he ſhould not be King of England one moneth after. And here we may ſee how credulous oftentimes great Scholars are in beleeving Impoſtures, when Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Fiſher Biſhop of Rocheſter were thought to give credit to this Counterfeit, that we need not wonder at Saint Auſtin, who though he gave credit to many lying Miracles, yet they were ſuch as had more probability in them then this; which conſiſted in nothing but making of faces, as upon Examination of the Maide and her Abettours was confeſſed; and thereupon ſhe and moſt of them were condemned, drawne to Tyburne and there hanged.

In this meane time the Scots had beene troubleſome, and made Inrodes upon the Borders; till at laſt, Commiſſioners being ſent to treat of agreement; a Peace was concluded, to continue both the Kings lives; which on the twentieth of May this yeer, was openly Proclaimed.

About this time, at the ſuit of the Lady Katherine Dowage, a Bull was ſent from the Pope, which curſed both the King and the Realme; which Bull was ſet up in the Towne of Dunkerke in Flanders, the Meſſenger not daring to come neerer: and becauſe it was knowne that the Lady Dowager had procured this Curſe to be ſent, the Duke of Suffolke was ſent to her, lying then at Bugden beſides Huntington, to diſcharge a great part of her houſhold ſervants; yet leaving her a convenient number, like a Princeſſe.

It was now the ſix and twentieth yeer of King Henries reigne, when in a Parliament holden, an Act was made for eſtabliſhing the ſucceſſion in the Crown, upon the Lady Elizabeth; to which, firſt all the Lords, Knights and Burgeſſes were ſworne; and after Commiſſioners were ſent into all parts of the Realm, to take the oath of all men and women to the ſaid Act. Another Act was alſo made, which authorized the King to be Supreame Head of the Church of England, and the Popes authority to be utterly aboliſhed. But Doctor John Fiſher, Biſhop of Rocheſter, Sir Thomas Moore Knight, and Doctor Wilſon Parſon of Saint Thomas Apoſtles in London, expreſly denied at Lambeth, before the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to take the Oathes; of whom Doctor Wilſon recanted, but the other two perſiſting in their opinion, were both of them beheaded. Of theſe two Biſhop Fiſher was much lamented, as repured a man both of great learning and good life. The Pope had elected him Cardinall, and his Hat was come as farre as Callice, but before it could come into England his head was off. Sir Thomas Moore was both learned and very wiſe, but ſo given to a vaine of jeſting and merry ſcoffing, that he could not refrain it at the very time of his death: as when he was carried to the Tower, being demanded his upper garment (meaning his Gowne) you ſhall have it, ſaid he, and gave them his cap; ſaying, it was the uppermoſt garment he had: alſo, when being upon the Scaffold, the Hangman kneeled downe and asked him forgiveneſſe; I forgive thee (ſaid he) but I promiſe thee, thou wilt never have credit by cutting off my Head, my necke is ſo ſhort: and when he was to lay his head downe upon the blocke, having a great gray beard, he ſtroked it out, and ſaid to the Hangman, I pray you let me lay my beard over the blocke, leſt you ſhould cut it; for though you have Warrant to cut off my head, you have none to cut my beard. But his Devotion was no jeſting matter, for he uſed to weare a ſhirt of haire next his skin, for a perpetuall penitence; and oftentimes in the Church he would put on a Surpleſſe, and helpe the Prieſt to ſay Maſſe; which he forbore not to doe even when he was Lord Chancellour of England; as one time the Duke of Norfolke comming to the Church found him doing it. Two memorable things are recorded of him; one, which ſhewes his great integritie, and the ſmall reckoning he made of riches; that having paſſed through ſo many great imployments, and borne ſo many great Offices; yet in all his time, he never Purchaſed above one hundred pounds land a yeere, nor left any great ſtocke of money behinde him, when he died. The other, which ſhewes his filiall pietv, that being Lord Chancellour of England, at the ſame time that his Father was a Judge of the Kings Bench, he would alwayes at his going to Weſtminſter, goe firſt to the Kings Bench and aske his Father bleſſing, before he went to ſit in the Chancery.

The ninth of July, this yeere, the Lord Dacres of the North was arraigned at Weſtminſter of high treaſon, before the Duke of Norfolke, as high Steward of England; his Inditement being read, he ſo anſwered every part and matter therein contained, that by his Peeres he was found Not guilty; a rare thing to ſtop a currant that ran with ſuch violence. The one and twentieth of September Doctor Taylour Maſter of the Roles, was diſcharged of that Office; and the nineteenth of October following, Thomas Cromwell was ſworne in his place.

This yeere the King of Scots was inſtalled Knight of Garter, by his Deputy the Lord Erskin and Stephen Gardiner, who after the Cardinals death, was made Biſhop of Wincheſter, was ſent Embaſſadour Legier, into France, where he remained three yeeres. Alſo in January, of this yeere, Katherine Princeſſe Dowaget, fell into her laſt ſickneſſe; to whom the King ſent the Emperours Embaſſadour Legier, deſiring her to be of good comfort; but ſhe finding her death to approach, cauſed onely one of her Gentlewomen to write a Letter to the King; commending to him her Daughter and his, and beſeeching him to be a good Father to her; and then deſiring him further, to have ſome conſideration of her Servants. On the eighth of January, at Kimbolton, ſhe departed this life, and was buried at Peterborough. A woman of ſo vertuous a life, and of ſo great obſequiouſneſſe to her husband, that from her onely merit, is grown a reputation to all Spaniſh wives. Alſo the nine and twentieth of January, this yeere, Queene Anne was delivered of a childe before her time, which was borne dead.

And now King Henry began to fall into thoſe great diſorders, which have been the blemiſh of his life, and have made him be blotted out of the Catalogue of our beſt Princes; for firſt, in October this yeer, he ſent Doctor Lee and others, to viſit the Abbeys, Priories, and Nunneries in England; who ſet at liberty all thoſe Religious perſons, that would forſake their habit, and all that were under the age of foure and twenty yeers; and in December following, a ſurvay was taken of all Chantries, and the names of ſuch, as had the guift of them. After which, in a Parliament holden the fourth of February, an Act was made, which gave to the King all Religious houſes, with all their lands and goods, that were of the value of three hundred marks a yeere and under: the number of which Houſes, was three hundred ſeventy and ſix: the valne of their lands yeerly, above two and thirty thouſand pounds, their movable goods, one hundred thouſand, the Religious perſons put out of the ſame houſes above above ten thouſand. This yeere, William Tindall, was burnt at a Town in Flanders, betweene Bruſſels and Mechlyn, called Villefort, for tranſlating into Engliſh the New Teſtament, and divers parts of the old; who having beene long impriſoned, was upon the Lord Cromwels writing for his Deliverance, in all haſte, brought to the fire, and burnt.

It was now the eight and twentieth yeere of King Henries Reigne, when on Munday, there were ſolemne Juſts holden at Greenwich, from whence the King ſuddainely departed, and came to Weſtminſter, whoſe ſuddaine departure ſtroke great amazement into many, but to the Queene eſpecially, and not without cauſe; for the next day, the Lord Rochford her brother, and Henry Norris were brought to the Tower of London, priſoners, whither alſo the ſame day at five a clock in the afternoone, was brought Queene Anne her ſelfe, by Sir Thomas Audeley Lord Chancelour, the Duke of Norfolke, Thomas Cromwell Secretary, and Sir William Kingſton Leivtenant of the Tower, who at the Tower-gate, fell on her knees before the ſaid Lords, beſeeching God to help her, as ſhe was innocent of that whereof ſhe was accuſed: on the fifteenth of May, ſhe was arraigned in the Tower, before the Duke of Norfolke, ſitting as high Steward of England. When her Inditement was read, ſhe made unto it ſo wiſe and diſcreet anſwers, that ſhee ſeemed fully to cleere her ſelfe of all matters laid to her charge: but being tried by her Peeres, whereof the Duke of Suffolke was chiefe, ſhe was by them found guilty, and had Judgment pronounced by the Duke of Norfolke; immeadiatly the Lord Rochford her brother, was likewiſe arraigned and condemned: who on the ſeaventeenth of May, together with Henry Norris, Marke Smeton, William Brierton, and Francis Weſton, all of the Kings Privy-chamber, about matters touching the Queen, were beheaded on the Tower-hill, Queen Anne her ſelfe on the nineteenth of May, on a Scaffold upon the Green within the Tower, was beheaded with the ſword of Callice by the hangman of that Towne; her body with the head, was buried in the Quire of the chappell there. This Queen Anne, was the daughter of Thomas Bullen Earle of Wiltſhire, and of Lady Elizabeth daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke; the Earles Father was the ſonne of Sir William Bullen, whoſe wife was Margaret the ſecond daughter and Coheire of Thomas Butler Ealre of Ormond, and the ſaid Sir William, was the ſonne of Sir Godfrey Bullen, Lord Major of London, who lieth buried in Saint Leonards Church in the Jewry, whoſe wife was Anne eldeſt daughter & coheire to Thomas Lord Hoo and Haſtings: and his diſcent was out of the houſe of the Bullens in the County of Norfolke; thus much for her Parentage: for her Religion, ſhe was an earneſt Profeſſor, and one of the firſt Countenancers of the Goſpell: in Almeſ-deeds ſo liberall, that in nine moneths ſpace; It it is ſaid, ſhe diſtributed amongſt the poore, to the value of fifteene thouſand pounds: now for the crimes for which ſhe died, (Adultery and Inceſt:) prooſes of her guiltineſſe there are none recorded: of her Innocency, many; firſt, her owne clearing of all objections, at the time of her arraignment: then Cromwels writing to the King, after full examination of the matter; that many things have been objected, but none confeſſed, onely ſome circumſtances had been acknowledged by Marke Smeton: (and what was Marke Smeton, but a meane fellow, one that upon promiſe of life, would ſay any thing; and having ſaid ſomthing, which they took hold of was ſoone after executed leaſt he ſhould retract it:) laſtly, they that were accuſed with her, they all denied it to the death: even Henry Norris, whom the King ſpecially favoured, and promiſed him pardon if he would but confeſſe it. It was a poore prooſe of Inceſt with her brother, that comming one morning into her chamber before ſhe was up, he leaned down upon her bed, to ſay ſomthing in her eare; yet this was taken hold of for a proof: and it need be no marvaile if we conſider the many aduerſaries ſhe had; as being a Proteſtant, and perhaps in that reſpect, the King himſelfe not greatly her friend: (for though he had excluded the Pope, yet he continued a Papiſt ſtil: and then who knowes not, that nature is not more able of an Acorn to make an oake, then authority is able of the leaſt ſurmiſe, to make a certainty. But howſoever it was, that her death was contrived: certain it is, that it caſt upon King Henry a diſhonourable Imputation; in ſo much, that where the Proteſtant Princes of Germany had reſolved to chooſe him for head of their League; after they heard of this Queens death, in ſuch a manner, they utterly refuſed him as unworthy of the honour: and it is memorable what conceit Queene Anne her ſelfe had of her death; for at the time, when ſhee was led to be beheaded in the Tower, ſhee called one of the Kings Privy-chamber to her, and ſaid unto him, commend me to the King, and tell him; he is conſtant in his courſe of advancing me, for from a private Gentlewoman, he made me a Marqueſſe, from a Marqueſſe, a Queen; and now, that he had left no higher degree of worldly honour for me, he hath made me a Martyr.

Immediatly after her death, in the weeke before Whitſontide, the King maried Jane Seymour, daughter to Sir John Seymour, who at Whitſontide was openly ſhewed as Queene: and on the Tueſday in the Whitſon-weeke her brother Sir Edmund Seymour, was created Viſcount Beauchamp, and Sir Walter Hangerford, was made Lord Hangerford.

The eight of June, the Parliament began; during the which, the Lord Thomas Howard, without the Kings aſſent, had affianced the Lady Margaret Douglas, daughter to the Queen of Scots, and Niece to the King: for which he was attainted of treaſon, and an Act was made for like offenders hereafter; and ſo he died in the Tower, and ſhee long time remained there a priſoner; yet afterward was ſet at liberty, and maried Mathew Earle of Lenox, who by him had Henry, Father of James the firſt King of Great Brittaine.

In the time of this Parliament, the Biſhops and all the Clergy had a ſolemne Convocation at Pauls Church in London; where after much diſputation and debating of matters, they publiſhed a book of Religion; intituled, Articles deviſed by the Kings Highneſſe: in which booke are ſpecially mentioned but three Sacraments: namely Baptiſme, Euchariſt, and Pennance; alſo certaine Injunctions were ſet forth, whereby many of the old Holi-dayes were abrogated, ſpecially thoſe that fell in Harveſt time.

The two and twentieth of July, Henry Duke of Richmond and Somerſet, baſe ſonne of King Henry by Elizibeth Blunt, died at Saint James, and was buried at Thetford in Norfolke.

The nine and twentieth of June the King held a great Juſts and Triumph at Weſtminſter, but a diſaſtrous Sea-fight on the water; where one Gates a Gentleman was drowned in his harneſſe, and by the breaking of a Gunne two Mariners were ſore mained: in July following, Thomas Cromwell, Secretary to the King, and Maſter of the Rolles, was made Lord Keeper of the Privy-ſeale: and the nineteenth of July the Lord Fitz-Warren was created Earl of Bath; and the day after, the ſaid Cromwell was made Lord Cromwell; and on the eighteenth of July, Vicar Generall under the King over the Spiritualty; who ſate diverſe times in the Convocation Houſe, amongſt the Biſhops as head over them: and now was the ſtate of Religion in England come to a ſtrange paſſe; becauſe alwayes in paſſing, and had no conſiſtance; for at firſt, the authority of the Pope was excluded in ſome caſes onely, a while after in all; but yet his Doctrine was wholly retained. Afterward, his Doctrine came to be Impugned, but in ſome few points onely: a while after, in many more: that the fable of Proteus might no longer be a fable, when the Religion in England might be his true Morrall: and indeed, it could be no otherwiſe; the diſtance between the two Religions being not poſſible to be paſſed Per ſaltum; but muſt be done by degrees, which degrees may be obſerved in the progreſſe of the ſtory: for where at firſt, it was permitted onely to read the Bible in Engliſh, now it came to be permitted, to pray in Engliſh; for now in September, the Lord Cromwell ſet forth Injunctions, to have the Lords prayer, the Ave, the Creed, the ten Commandements, dements, and all Articles of the Chriſtian-faith tranſlated into Engliſh, and to be taught by all Parſons and Curates to their Pariſhoners: which Innovation ſo ſtirred up the people, that in Lincolnſhire they aſſembled to the number of twenty thouſand; againſt whom the King himſelfe went in perſon, who winning by perſwaſions their chief leaders, brought the reſt upon pardon to ſubmit themſelves: but when he had himſelfe done the work of mercy; he afterward ſent the Duke of Suffolke, with Sir Francis Brian, and Sir John Ruſſell to doe the worke of Juſtice; who cauſed Nicholas Melton, and a Monke naming himſelfe Captaine Cobler, and thirteen others (Ringleaders of the ſedition,) to be apprehended, and moſt of them to be executed. But this Commotion was ſcarce appeaſed, when preſently there roſe another in the Norrh-parts, where forty thouſand were aſſembled, giving themſelves out for an holy Pilgrimage, where on one ſide of their Enſignes, they had Chriſt hanging on the croſſe, on the other ſide, the Cuppe and Bread of the Sacrament, as taking Armes onely for maintenance of the Faith of Chriſt, and deliverance of the holy Church now oppreſſed: but theſe were oppoſed by George Earle of Shrewſbury, who having railed an Army without Commiſſion, though to reſiſt the Rebels, yet began to be much troubled, whither in ſo doing he had not committed Treaſon, and was never quiet till he had ſent to the King for pardon and commiſſion to proceed: at which time a rumour being raiſed amongſt his ſouldiers, that the Earle ſo well liked the Rebels cauſe, that what ſhew ſoever he made, yet when it ſhould come to the triall, he would not ſtick to joyne with them and take their parts: to remove which Opinion out of their minds, he cauſed all his ſouldiers to come before him, and made his Chaplaine give him an oath; by which he ſwore in their hearing, to be true to the Crowne, and never to be aſſiſting to any Rebels: to his aide were ſent the Duke of Norfolke, with the Marquis of Exceter; the Earles of Huntington and Rutland: who with a mighty Army approaching the Rebels, beyond Doncaſter, in the way towards York, attempted firſt to have pacified them without blood-ſhed; but when no perſwaſions would ſerve, it was reſolved of both ſides to come to a battell; but ſee here the great goodneſſe of God, for the night before the day appointed for battel, it happened that a litle Brook called Don, running betweene the two Armies, upon a ſmall traine grew to ſuch a height, that it was not paſſable by either foot or horſe; ſo as the Armies having time to conſider, and conſidering perhaps this miracle as ſent of God, they came to agreement, and upon pardon diſbanded and returned to their houſes: but in the mean time they had beſieged the Caſtle of Scarborough where the reſolute carriage of Sir Ralph Eures is memorable; who held the Caſtle by onely his owne ſervants and Tennants, and that, when for twenty dayes together, he had no other ſuſtenance but bread and water: but all Commotions were not yet appeaſed, for at this very time, there was another great Army aſſembled out of Cumberland, Weſtmerland, and the North-parts of Lancaſhire; marching South-wards; but by the diligence of the Earl of Darby, to whom alſo the Earle of Suſſex was ſent, they were ſuppreſſed, and their chief Leaders, as the Abbots of Wally, Sauly, and others, apprehended and hanged: but neither is there yet an end of comotions, for now in February Nicholas Muſgrave, Thomas Tilby, with others to the number of twelve thouſand, began a Rebellion, and beſieged Carlile, but by the power of the City were firſt beaten back, and then were encountred by the Duke of Norfolke, who cauſed ſeventy foure of them, by Martiall-law to be hanged on the walls of Carlile: but neither was there yet an end of Comotions, for now in Setrington, Pickering, Leigh and Scarborough, began a new Rebellion, by procurement of Francis Bigot; who had raiſed a great power, and meant to have taken Hull, but by the induſtry of Sir Ralph Ellarker, and the Major of the Towne, threeſcore of the Rebels were taken and hanged, and the reſt put to flight, and glad to be quiet: but neither yet was there an end of Commotions, for in the latter end of this eight and twentieth yeer, the Lord Darcy, the Lord Huſſey, Sir Robert Conſtable Sir John Bulmer

Bulmer and his wife, Sir Thomas Percy brother to the Earl of Northumberland, Sir Stephen Hamilton, Nicholas Tempeſt Eſquire, and others began to conſpire, although each of them before had been pardoned by the King: but this as being but the fagge end of Commotion, was ſoon ſuppreſſed, the Lord Darcy was beheaded on the Tower-hill, the Lord Huſſey at Lincolne, Sir Robert Conſtable was hanged in cheins at Hull, Sir John Bulmers Paramour was burnt in Smithfield, and moſt of the other were executed at Tyburne: Tanta molis erat, ſo great a matter it was, to make the Realme be quiet, in ſo great innovations of Religion.

This yeer on Saint Georges-feaſt, the Lord Cromwell was made Knight of the Garter, and on the twelfth of October, which is Saint Edwards-even, at Hampton-Court, the Queen was delivered of a ſonne; (but with ſo hard a labour that ſhe was faine to be ript) the child was named Edward, whoſe Godfathers at the Chriſtning were the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and the Duke of Norfolke, his Godmother was his ſiſter the Lady Mary: at his Biſhoping, his Godfather was the Duke of Suffolk: on the eighteenth of October, he was made Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall and Earle of Cheſter: but the birth of his ſonne brought not ſo much joy to the King, as the death of his Queene brought him ſorrow; for within two dayes after ſhe died, and was buried at Winſor, and ſo much was the Kings grief for her death, that he continued a widdower two yeeres after.

It is not unworthy the relating, what a miſerable diſſolation befell the family of the Geraldynes or Fitz-Garrets, (Earle of Kildare in Ireland) about this time; for Gerald Fitz-Garret, who had been ten yeers Deputy in Ireland; upon complaint of ſome fault, was ſent for over into England, where not making a ſatisfying anſwer, he was committed to the Tower; but before his comming over, had with the Kings leave, left Deputy there his own ſonne, a Young-man of not above twenty yeers of age, but yet ripe of underſtanding and fit for the place: this young Lord, hearing that his father was committed priſoner to the Tower; and ſoon after, as the rumour encreaſed, that he was put to death; in rage to be revenged, roſe up in Armes; and having five Unckles in the Country (men of great eſtimation) drew them (though ſome of them unwillingly) to take his part; amongſt other outrages he committed, the Archbiſhop of Dublin was ſlaine in his preſence: the Father in the Tower hearing hereof, with very griefe died; the Sonne and his Uncles, upon the Kings ſending an Army, were all either taken or ſubmitted; and being ſent for over into England, thoſe of his Unckles, that againſt their wils had been drawn into the Action, had good hope of their lives, till entring the ſhip of paſſage, which was called the Cow; they then preſently diſpaired, becauſe of a Propheſie, that five ſonnes of a certaine Earl ſhould be carried into England in the belly of a Cowe, and never after return: and indeed it fell out true, for through the malice of their adverſaries, (exaſperating the King againſt them and ſaying, there would never be quietnes in Ireland, as long as any of the Geraldines were left alive,) they were all put to death: one onely ſonne of the family remained, a youth of thirteene yeers of age, who though at that time ſick of the ſmal-pox, yet made ſhift to ſave himſelfe by flight; fled firſt into France, and frighted from thence, afterwards into Flanders, and driven from thence, at laſt into Italy, where preſected by Reginold Poole, at that time made Cardinall, by Pope Julie the third, he was afterward, by his meanes, reſtored to his dignity and his patrimony.

This yeere Edward Seymour, Viſcount Beauchamp the Queens brother, was created Earl of Hartford, and Sir William Fitz-Williams Lord Admirall, was created Earl of Southamton, Maſter Paulet was made Vice Treaſurer, Sir John Ruſſell was made Controller of the Kings Houſe, and diverſe Gentlemen were made Knights.

In February diverſe Roodes were taken downe by the Kings commandement, as the Roode of Boxeley, called the Rood of grace, which was made with vices to move the eyes and lips, alſo the Rood called Saint Saviour at Bermondſey Abbey

Abbey in Southwarke, and diverſe others: in May a Frier Obſervant, called Frier Forreſt, who had taken the oath of Supremacy himſelfe, yet privately perſwaded others, that the King was not ſupreme head of the Church; was thereupon examined, and for his defence ſaid, that he took the oath with his outward man, but his inward man never conſented to it; but this anſwer ſerved not his turn from being condemned; and on a paire of Gallowes prepared for him, in Smithfield, he was hanged by the middle, and arme-holes, all quick, and under the Gallowes was made a fire wherewith he was conſumed: a little before his execution, a huge great Image was brought to the Gallowes, fetched out of Wales, which the Welch-men had in great reverence, called Darvell Gatheren, of which there went a Propheſie, that this Image ſhould ſet a whole Forreſt on fire, which was thought to take effect, in ſetting this Frier Forreſt on fire, and conſuming him to nothing.

In September, by the ſpeciall motion of the Lord Cromwell, all the notable Images, unto which were made any ſpeciall Pilgrimages and offerings, were taken downe and burnt; as the Images of Walſingham, Ipſwich, Worceſter, the Lady of Wilſdon, with many other, and forthwith by meanes of the ſaid Cromwell all the orders of Friers and Nunnes, with theirs Cloyſters and Houſes were ſuppreſſed and put downe: alſo the ſhrines of counterfeit Saints; amongſt others, the ſhrine of Thomas Becket in the Priory of Chriſt-church was taken to the Kings uſe, and his bones, ſcull and all which was there found, with a peece broken out by the wound of his death, were all burnt in the ſame Church by command of the Lord Cromwell: and the one and twentieth of October, the Church of Thomas Becket in London, called the Hoſpitall of Saint Thomas of Acres was ſuppreſſed: the ſixteenth of November the Black-friers in London was ſuppreſſed; the next day the White-friers, the Gray-friers, and the Monkes of the Charter-houſe, and ſo all the other immediately after, only three Abbots reſiſted, the Abbot of Colcheſter, the Abbot of Reding, and the Abbot of Glaſtenbury, who therefore were all taken and executed. The foure and twentieth of November the Biſhop of Rocheſter Preached at Pauls-croſſe, and there ſhewed the blood of Hales, affirming it to be no blood, but honey clarified and coloured with ſaffron, as it had been evidently proved before the King and Councell. The number of Monaſteries ſuppreſſed, were ſix hundred forty five, beſides foureſcore and ten Colledges, one hundred and ten Hoſpitals, and of Chantries and free Chappels two thouſand three hundred ſeventy foure. But now to make amends for the ſuppreſſing of ſo many Monaſteries, the King inſtituted certaine new Biſhoprickes, as at Weſtminſter Oxford, Peterborough, Briſtow, Cheſter and Gloſter; and aſſigned certaine Canons and Prebends to each of them.

The third of November Henry Courtney Marqueſſe of Exceter, and Earle of Devonſhire, Henry Poole Lord Montacute, Sir Nicholas Carew of Bedington, Knight of the Garter, and Maſter of the Kings Horſe, and Sir Edward Nevill, brother to the Lord of Aburgeiney, were ſent to the Tower, being accuſed by Sir Geoffry Poole, the Lord Montacutes brother, of high treaſon; they were indited for deviſing to promote and advance one Reinold Poole to the Crowne, and put downe King Henry. This Poole was a neere kinſman of the Kings (being the ſonne of the Lady Margaret Counteſſe of Saliſbury, daughter and heire to George Duke of Clarence) he had been brought up by the King in learning, and made Deane of Excetur; but being ſent after, to learne experience by travaile, he grew ſo great a friend of the Popes, that he became an enemy to King Henry, and for his enmity to the King, was by Pope Julius the third made Cardinall; for this mans cauſe, the Lords aforeſaid being condemned, were all executed, the Lord Marquis, the Lord Montacute, and Sir Edward Nevill, beheaded on the Tower-hill, the ninth of January, Sir Nicholas Carew the third of March, two Prieſts condemned with them were hanged at Tyburn, Sir Jeoffry Poole though condemned alſo yet had his pardon.

About this time one Nicholſon alias Lambert, being accuſed for denying the Reall preſence in the Sacrament, appealed to the King, and the King was content to heare him; whereupon a Throne was ſet up in the Hall of the Kings Pallace at Weſtminſter, for the King to ſit: and when the Biſhops had urged their arguments, and could not prevaile, then the King tooke him in hand, hoping perhaps to have the honour of converting an Hereticke, when the Biſhops could not doe it, and withall promiſed him pardon if he would recant; but all would not doe, Nicholſon remained obſtinate, the King miſt his honor, the delinquent miſt his pardon; and ſhortly after was drawne to Smithfield and there burnt.

About this time King Henry being informed that the Pope, by inſtigation of Cardinall Poole, had earneſtly moved divers great Princes to invade England; He as a provident Prince, endeavoured as earneſtly to provide for defence; and to that end, rode himſelfe to the Sea-coaſts to ſee them fortified, and in needfull places Bulwarkes to be erected: Hee cauſed his Navie to be rigged, and to be in readineſſe at any ſhort warning: he cauſed Muſters to be taken in all ſheeres; and liſts of all, able men in every County, in London ſpecially; where Sir William Forman the then Major, certified the number of fifteene thouſand; not that they were no more, but that ſo many were ready prepared; and theſe on the eight of May, the King himſelfe ſaw Muſtered in James Parke; where the Citizens ſtrove in ſuch ſort to exceed each other in bravary of armes, and forwardneſſe of ſervice, as if the City had bin a Campe, and they not men of the gowne, but all profeſt Souldiers; which they performed to their great coſt, but greater comendation.

It was now the one and thirtieth yeere of King Henries reigne, and the nine and fortieth of his age; when having continued a widdower two yeeres, he began to thinke of marrying againe; and hee needed not be a ſuitour for a wife, for he was ſued unto take one. The Emperour ſollicited him to marry the Dutcheſſe of Milan; but to marry her he muſt firſt obtaine a Licence from the Pope, and King Henry was reſolved rather to have no wife, then to have any more to doe with the Pope. Then the Duke of Cleve made ſuit unto him, to marry the Lady Anne his Siſter, and hee was a Proteſtant Prince; and ſo, though differing in points of Doctrine, yet in the maine Point of excluding the Pope, both of one minde. Many about the King were forward for this Match, but the Lord Cromwell ſpecially; and indeed it concerned him more then any other, that the King ſhould take a Proteſtant wife, ſeeing his actions had beene ſuch as none but a Proteſtant Queene would ever like; and if the Queene ſhould not like them; the King, though done by his leave, would not like them long. Hereupon ſuch meanes was uſed, that Embaſſadours came from the Duke of Cleve to conclude the Match; and then, the eleventh of December, the Lady her ſelfe in great ſtate was brought, firſt to Callice, and then over to Dover; and being come to Rocheſter, the King ſecretly came to ſee her, afterward ſhe was conducted to London, met by the way in ſeverall places, by all the great Lords and Ladies of the Kingdome. The third of January ſhe was received into London by Sir William Hollice, then Lord Major, with Orations, Pageants, and all complements of State, the greateſt that ever had beene ſeene. On Twelfth day the Marriage was ſolemnized, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury did the office, the Earle of Overſteine, a German Lord gave her. In Aprill following the Lord Cromwell, as though he had won the Kings heart for ever by making this match, was made Earle of Eſſex; for in March before, Henry Bourchier Earle of Eſſex, and the ancienteſt Earle of England, had broken his necke by ſeeking to breake a yong Horſe, leaving onely one Daughter, and the dying without iſſue, the Earldome came to the Family of Devereux, which yet enjoyed not the honour, till afterward in Queene Elizabeths time, and then made but not reſtored.

The

The ninth of March, the King created Sir William Paulet Treaſurour of his Houſe, Lord Saint John, Sir John Ruſſell Controlour, Lord Ruſſell, and ſhortly after Sir William Par was created Lord Par. The eight and twentieth of April began a Parliament at Weſtminſter, in the which Margaret Counteſſe of Saliſbury, Gertrude wife to the Marqueſſe of Exceter, Reynold Poole Cardinall, brother to the Lord Montacute, Sir Adrian Foskew, Thomas Dingley Knight of Saint Johns, and divers others were attainted of high treaſon; of whom Foskew and Dingley the tenth of July were beheaded, the Counteſſe of Saliſbury two yeeres after: and in this Parliament the Act of the ſix Articles was eſtabliſhed, and Sir Nicholas Hare was reſtored to his place of Speaker in the Parliament.

It was now five moneths after the Kings marriage with the Lady Anne of Cleve; and though the King at the firſt ſight of the Lady, did not like her perſon; yet, whether as reſpecting the honour of Ladies, he would not diſgrace her at the firſt meeting; or whether he ment to try how time might worke him to a better liking; or indeed, that he would not give diſtaſte to the German Princes at that time, for ſole ends he had a working, he diſſembled the matter, and all things went on in a ſhew of contentment on all hands. But for all theſe ſhewes, the crafty Biſhop of London Stephen Gardiner, finding how the world went with the Kings affection towards his Queene; and for her ſake with Cromwell; to neither of whom he was greatly affected (not to the Queene, as miſliking her religion; not to Cromwell, as envying his greatneſſe;) he ſo wrought upon the Kings inclination; what by ſuggeſting, and what by aggravating, that the Lord Cromwell the ninth of July, ſitting in the Councell Chamber, was ſuddenly apprehended and committed to the Tower; and the nintеenth of the ſame moneth was attainted by Parliament, and never came to his Anſwer; by a Law, which (as ſome reported) he himſelfe had cauſed to be made; and the eight and twentieth of July was beheaded on the Tower-hill; for crimes (as appeares in Record) of Hereſie and Treaſon. This Lord Cromwell was borne at Putney, a Village in Surrey neere the Thames ſide; ſonne to a Smith, after whoſe deceaſe, his Mother was married to a Sheereman; for the pregnancy of his wit he was firſt entertained by Cardinall Woolſey, and by him imployed in many great affaires; the Cardinall falling, the King tooke him into his ſervice; and finding his great abilities, firſt advanced him for his worth, and then for his pleaſure overthrew him. But the greateſt part of Stephen Gardiners practice had beene done before; for at Midſomer before, the King cauſed the Queene to remove to Richmond, as for her health and pleaſure; and and in the time of her abſence, on the ſixt of July, ſent certaine Lords to the Lower Houſe of Parliament, who there declared certaine cauſes, for which the Kings marriage with the Lady Anne of Cleve, was not to be counted lawfull; and ſo carried the matter, that the Convocation cleerly determined, the King might marry any other; and ſo might ſhe. Being thus Divorced; it was further Enacted, ſhe ſhould no more be called Queene, but the Lady Anne of Cleve. The fault for which this Divorce was decreed, is not expreſly delivered; ſome ſay, a precontract of the ſaid Lady with a Lord of Germany was prerended; but it ſeems to have bin for ſome womaniſh defect in her body; as ſhe ſpared not to affirme that ſhe had never bin carnally known by the King in al the time of their lying together: and as it is ſaid, when her Ladies, one time ſaid unto her, that they looked now every day to hear of her great belly; ſhe ſhould anſwer, they might look long enough, unleſſe, ſaying, how doſt thou ſweereſt, God morrow ſweet-heart, and ſuch like words, could make a great belly; for (ſaid ſhe) more then this, there never paſſed between the King and me. How ever it was, ſhe willingly ſubmitted to the Decree, whether out of fear, or perhaps as little liking the King as the King did her; and afterward led a private life here in England, wel reſpected of the King, and dying ſixteen yeers after, in the fourth yeer of Queen Mary, was buried at weſtminſter.

About this time Leonard Gray Deputy of Ireland, was on the Tower-hill beheaded, for ſuffering his Nephew Gerald Fitz-Garret to eſcape, who had been declared an enemy to the ſtate, and then alſo was Thomas Fines Lord Dacres, a young man of foure and twenty yeers of age, hanged at Tyburne, for killing a meane peſon upon a ſuddaine affray; alſo the fourth of Auguſt, Thomas Epſon a Monke of Weſtminſter, for denying to take his oath, to be true to the King, had his Monks garment plucked from his back, the laſt Monke that was ſeen in ſuch habit in England till Queen Maryes dayes.

The ſixt of July in the two and thirtieth yeere of his Reigne, King Henry had been divorced from the Lady Anne of Cleve, and now the eighth of Auguſt following, the Lady Katherine Howard, Niece to the Duke of Norfolke and daughter to the Lord Edward Howard was ſhewed openly as Queene at Hampton-Court.

On the tenth of June the yeere following, Sir Edmund Knevet of Norfolke, Knight, was arraigned before the Officers of the Green-cloath, for ſtriking one Maſter Cleere of Norfolke, within the Tennis-court of the Kings Houſe, being found guilty, he had judgment to looſe his Right hand, and to forfeite all his lands and goods; whereupon there was called to do execution, firſt, the Serjeant Surgion, with his Inſtruments pertaining to his office, then the Serjeant of the Wood-yard, with a maller and a block to lay the hand upon, then the Kings Maſter-cooke with the knife to cut off the hand, then the Serjeant of the larder to ſet the knife right on the joynt, then the Serjeant Farrier with ſearing irons to ſeare the veines, then the Serjeant of the Poultry with a Cock, which cock, ſhould have his head ſmitten off upon the ſame block, and with the ſame knife; then the Yeoman of the Chandry with ſeare-cloaths, then the Yeoman of the Scullery, with a pan of fire to heare the irons, a chafer of water to coole the ends of the irons, and two formes for all Officers to ſet their ſtuffe on; then the Serjeant of the Cellar with wine, Ale and Beere, then the Serjeant of the Ewry, with Baſon, Ewre, and towels: all things being thus prepared Sir William Pickering Knight Marſhall, was commanded to bring in his priſoner, Sir Edmund Knevet, to whom the chiefe Juſtice declared his offence, which the ſaid Knevet confeſſed, and humbly ſubmitted himſelfe to the Kings mercy, onely he deſired, that the King would ſpare his Right hand and take his left, becauſe (ſaid he) if my right hand be ſpared, I may live to doe the King good ſervice: of whoſe ſubmiſſion, and reaſon of his ſuite, when the King was informed, he granted him to looſe neither of his hands, and pardoned him alſo of his lands and goods.

The ſummer of his three and thirtieth yeere, King Henry with his Queene Katherine, made a progreſſe into the North-parts, and returning at Allhallantide to Hampton-court he was there informed, of the Queens deſſolute life firſt before her mariage with one Francis Deerham, a Gentleman of Norfolke, whom imployed afterward in Ireland; ſhe had lately againe at Pomfret received into her ſervice, and now ſince her mariage with one Thomas Colepepper, of the Kings Privy-chamber; whereupon the thirteenth of November, Sir Thomas Wriothſley Knight ſecretary to the King, was ſent to the Queen at Hampton-Court, to charge her with theſe crimes, and diſcharging her houſhold, to cauſe her to be conveyed to Sion, there to remaine, till the Kings pleaſure ſhould be further knowne: the delinquents being examined, Deerham confeſſed, that before the Kings mariage with the Lady Katherine, there had been a pre-contract between himſelfe and her; but when he once underſtood of the Kings liking towards her, he then waved and conſealed it for her preforment: ſo the firſt of December, theſe Gentlemen being arraigned at the Guild-hall, they confeſſed the Indictment, and had Judgment to die, as in caſes of treaſon: the tenth of December, they were drawne from the Tower to Tyburne, where Colepepper was beheaded, and Deerham was hanged and diſmembred; Colepeppers body was buried in Sepulchers Church in London, but both their heads were ſet on London-bridge.

bridge: the two and twentieth of December, there were arraigned at the Kings-bench, the Lord William Howard and the Lady Margaret his wife, Katherin Tilney and Alice Reſtwold Gentlewomen, Joane Bulmer, wife to Anthony Bulmer Gentliman, Anne Howard wife to Henry Howard Eſquire, and brother to the Queene, with divers others, who were all condemned for miſpriſion of treaſon, for concealing the Queens miſdemeanor, and adjudged to forfeit all their lands and goods during life, and to remaine in perpetuall priſon. The ſixteenth of January the Parliament began at Weſtminſter, where the Lords and Commons petitioned the King, that he would not vex himſelfe with the Queenes offence, and that both ſhe and the Lady Rochford might be attainted by Parliament; and that to avoid protracting of time, he would give his royal aſſent unto it, under the great Seale, without ſtaying for the end of the Parliament. Alſo, that Derham and Colepepper having beene attained before by the Common-Law, might be attainted likewiſe by Parliament: all which was aſſented to by the King; and after, on the thirteenth of February, the Queen and the Lady Rochford were beheaded on the greene within the Tower, where they confeſſed their offences, and dyed penitently: yet ſomething to take off the offences of this Queene; it is certainly ſaid, that after her condemnation, ſhe proteſted to Doctor White Biſhop of Winchester, her laſt Confeſſour, that as for the Act for which ſhe was condemned, ſhe tooke God and his holy Angels to witneſſe, upon her ſoules ſalvation, that ſhe died guiltleſſe.

Before this, on the three and twentieth of January, King Henry was proclaimed King of Ireland; where as before this time, the Kings of England were onely entituled Lords of Ireland: and this title was given him both by the Parliament here, and by the Parliament holden in Ireland, before Sir Anthony Saintleger knight, the Kings Deputy there.

About this time Arthur Plantagenet Viſcount Liſle, baſe ſonne to King Edward tha fourth, having beene impriſoned upon ſuſpition of a practice, for betraying of Callice to the French, whilſt he was the Kings Lievtenant there, was now found to be innocent of the Fact: and thereupon, the King to make him ſome reparation for his diſgrace, ſent him a Ring and a very gracious meſſage, by Sir Thomas Wriothſley his Secretary; whereat the ſaid Viſcount tooke ſo great joy, that the night following, of that very joy he died: ſo deadly a thing is any paſſion, even joy it ſelfe, if it be extream. After his death Sir John Dudley, his wives Sonne, was created Viſcount Liſle. This Sir John Dudley was ſonne to Edmund Dudley, beheaded in the firſt yeere of this Kings reigne, and was made Viſcount Liſle in right of his Mother.

During this Parliament, one George Ferrers Gentleman, ſervant to the King and Burgeſſe for the town of Plimmouth in Devonſhire, in going to the Parliament Houſe, was arreſted in London by a Proceſſe out of the Kings Bench, for a Debt wherein he was late afore condemned, as ſurety for one Welden, at the ſuit of one White; which arreſt being ſignified to Sir Thomas Moyle knight, Speaker then of the Parliament, and to the Knights and Burgeſſes there; order was taken, that the Serjeant of the Parliament, called Saint John, ſhould be ſent to the Counter in Bredſtreet (whither the ſaid Ferrers was carried) and there demand to have him delivered: but the Officers of the Counter not onely refuſed to deliver him, but gave the Serjeant ſuch language, that they fell at laſt to an affray; at which time the Sheriffes comming, they alſo tooke their Officers part; ſo as the Serjeant was faine to returne without the priſoner; which being ſignified to the Speaker and the Burgeſſes, they tooke the matter in ſo ill parr, that they would ſit no more without their Burgeſſe; and thereupon riſing up, repaired to the Upper Houſe, where the whole Caſe was declared by the Speaker, before Sir Thomas Audeley Lord Chancellour, and the Lords and Judges there aſſembled: who judgeing the contempt to be very great, referred the puniſhment thereof to the Houſe of Commons it ſelfe: whereupon returning to their places againe, upon new debate of the Caſe, they tooke tooke order that their Serjeant shou'd once more repaire to the Sheriffe of London, and demand the prisoner, without carrying any Writ or Warrant for the matter. It is true, the Lord Chancellour offered to grant a Writ, but the House of Commons refused it; being of a cleare opinion, that all Commandements from the nether House were to be executed by their Serjeant without Writ, onely by shewing his Mace, which is his Warrant: but before the Serjeants returne into London, the Sheriffes better advised, became more mild, and upon the second demand, delivered the prisoner without any denial, but then the Serjeant had further in charge, to command the Sheriffs and Clerkes of the Counter, to appeare personally the next morning before the House of Commons: where appearing, they were charged by the Speaker, with their contempt, and compelled to make immediate answere, without being admitted to any counsaile, Sir Roger Chomley Recorder of London, offered to speak in the cause, but was not suffered, nor any other but the parties themselves: in conclusion, the Sheriffes and white who had caused the Arrest, were committed to the Tower, the Officer that did the Arrest, with foure other Officers to Newgate; but after two or three dayes, upon the humble suite of the Major, were set at liberty; and because the said Ferrers being in execution upon a condemnation of debt, and set at large by priviledge of Parliament, was not by law to be brought againe into execution; and so the creditour without remedy for his debt, against him as his principall debtour; therefore after long debate, by the space of nine or ten dayes together, they at last resolved to make an Act of purpose, to revive the execution of the said debt, against welden who was principall debtour, and to discharge Ferrers that was but surety: wherein notwithstanding, the house was devided, and the Act passed but by fourteen voyces: the King being advertised of this proceeding, called before him the Lord Chancelour and the Judges, the Speaker and divers of the lower House, to whom he declared his Opinion to this effect: first commending their wisdome, in maintaining the priviledges of their house, (which hee would not have to be infringed in any point) he alleaged, that he being head of the Parliament, and attending in his owne person upon the businesse thereof, ought in reason, to have Priviledge for himselfe and all his servants attending upon him, so as if the said Ferrers had been no Burgesse, but onely his servant; yet in that respect, he was to have the priviledge as well as any other: for I understand (saith he) that you, not onely for your owne persons, but also for your necessary servants, even to your Cookes and Horse-keepers injoy the same priviledge; in so much, as my Lord Chancelour here present, hath informed us, that whilst he was Speaker of the Parliament, the Cook of the Temple was Arrested in London, and in execution upon a statute of the Sraple, and for so much, as the said Cook during all the Parliament served the Speaker in that office; he was taken out of execution by priviledge of Parliament; the Prerogative of which Court, (as our learned Counsaile informeth us) is so great, that all Acts and processes comming out of any other Court, must for the time cease and give place to it: and touching the party himselfe, though for his presumption he was worthy to have lost his debt, yet I commend your Equity, that have restored him to his debt against him that was the principall: when the King had said this, Sir Edward Mountacute Lord chiefe Justice, rose up, and confirmed by many reasons, all that the King had said, as likwise did all the other Lords, none speaking any thing to the contrary.

It was now the foure and thirtieth yeere of King Henries Reigne, when in May he took a loane of money of all such as were valued at fifty pounds and upwards in the Subsidy book, the Lord Privy-seale, the Bishop of Winchester, Sir John Baker, and Sir Thomas Wriothsley were commissioners, that the loane in London, who so handled the matter, that of some chief Citizens they obtained a thousand markes in prest to the Kings use: for which Privie Seales were delivered to repay it againe within two yeeres.

At

At this time, were many complaints made by the English, against the Scots, partly for receiving and maintaining diverse English Rebels, fled into Scotland, and partly for invading the English Borders; but still when the King of England was preparing to oppose them, the Scottish King would send Embassadours to treat of reconcilement, till at last, after many delusory prankes of the Scots; the King of England, no longer enduring such abuses, sent the Duke of Norfolke his Leivtenant Generall, accompanied with the Earls of Shrewsbury, Darby, Cumberland, Surrey, Hartford, Angus, Rutland, the Lords of the North parts, Sir Anthony Browne Master of the Kings horse, and Sir John Gage Controller of the Kings House, with others, to the number of twenty thousand men; who on the one and twentieth of October entred Scotland, where staying but eight dayes onely he burnt above eighteen Townes, Abbeys, and Castles, and then without having battaile offered, for want of victuals returned to Barwick; so soon as he was returned, comes abroad the King of Scots, raiseth a power of fifteen thousand men, and using great threatnings what he would doe, invaded the west Borders, but the edge of his threatning was soon taken off, for the bastard Dacres, with Jack of Musgrave setting upon them with onely an hundred Light horse, and Sir Thomas Wharton with three hundred, put them to flight; upon a conceit, that the Duke of Norfolke with all his Army had beene come into those parts; where were taken prisoners of the Scots, the Earl of Cassill and Glencarne, the Lord Maxwell Admirall of Scotland, the Lord Flemming, the Lord Somervell, the Lord Olyphant, the Lord Gray, Sir Oliver Sincleere, the Kings Minion, John Rosse Lord of Gragy, Robert Erskin sonne to the Lord Erskin, Cur Lord of Gredon, the Lord Maxwells two Brothers, John Lesley bastard sonne to the Earl of Rothus, George Hume Lord of Hemerton, with divers other men of account, to the number of above two hundred, and more then eight hundred of meaner calling; so as some one English man, and some women also, had three or foure prisoners in their hands: at which overthrow, the King of Scots took such grief, that he fell into a burning Ague, and thereof died, leaving behind him one onely daughter; and heere King Henry began to apprehend a greater matter then the victory, for he and his Counsaile conceived, that this daughter, would be a fit march for his sonne Prince Edward, thereby to make a perpetuall union of the two Kingdomes; and to this purpose they conferred with the Lords whom they had taken prisoners, who exceeding glad of the proposition, and promising to further it by all the possible meanes they could, were thereupon set at liberty, and suffered to return home. Commting into Scotland and acquainting the Earl of Arraine with the motion, who was chosen Governour of the young Queen and of the Realme; the matter with great liking was entertained, and in Parliament of the three estates in Scotland, the marriage was confirmed, and a peace between the two Realms, for ten yeers was proclaimed, and Embassadours sent into England, for sealing the conditions. But Beton Archbishop of Saint Andrews being Cardinall, and at the Popes devotion, and therefore an utter enemy to King Henry, so crossed the businesse that it came to nothing, but ended in a war between the two Kingdomes; so as in March the yeere following, the Lord Seymour Earle of Hartford, with an Army by Land and Sir John Dudley Lord Lisle, with a Fleere by Sea, met at New-castle, and there joyned together, for invading of Scotland; with the Earl of Hartford, were the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Lords Cobham, Clinton, Conyers, Stinton, the Lord William Howard, with Knights and others, to the number of ten thousand, with Sir John Dudley the Admirall, were two hundred saile of ships: on the fourth of May, the whole Army was landed two miles from the Towne of Lieth, at a place called Granther Crag; and there the Lord Lievtennant puting his men in order, marched toward the Towne of Lieth: the Lord Admirall led the foreward, the Lievtennant the Battell, and the Earl of Shrewsbury the Rearward. Before they came to the Towne of Lieth, the Cardinal with six hundred horse, besides foot, lay in the way to impeach their passage; but they were so

assailed by the Harquebutars, that they were glad to flye, and the first man that fled was the Cardinal himself, and then the Earls of Huntley, Murrey & Bothwel; hereupon the English made forward to Lieth, and entred it without any great resistance: the sixth of May they marched towards Edenbrough, and as they approached the Towne, the provost with some of the Burgers, came and offered the keyes of the Towen, to the Lord Lievtennant, upon condition they might depart with bag and baggage, and the Towne to be preserved from fire; but the Lord Livetennant told them, their falthood had been such, as deserved no favour, and therefore unlesse they would deliver the Towne absolutely without any condition, he would proceed in his enterprise, and burne the Towne. Here wee may see, what it is to make men desperate, for to this the Provest answered, they were better then to stand upon defence, and so indeed they did, and made the English glad to retire, for the Castle shot so fiercely upon them, that having burnt onely a part of the Towne, they returned to Lieth; but whilst they lay there, they so wasted the Country, that within seaven miles every way of Edenbrough, there was not a Towne, nor Village, nor house that was left unburnt: at Lieth, the eleventh day of May, the Lord Generall made Knights, the Lord Clinton, the Lord Conyers, Sir William Wroughton, Sir Thomas Holcraft, Sir Edward Dorrell, sir Francis Hothome, and other., to the number of at least threescore: in Lieth Haven, they seized upon all the Scottish Ships; whereof two were of notable fairnesse, the one called the Salamander, given by the French King, at the mariage of his daughter into Scotland, the other called the Unicorne, made by the late Scottish King; the ballast of which two ships was Cannon-shot, whereof they found in the Towne, to the number of fourscore thousand. On the fifteenth of May, their Army and their Fleet departed from Lieth, both in one houre, having first set the Towne on fire and burned it to the ground: from Lieth the English Army marched to Seaton, from thence to Haddington, from thence to Dunbar, from thence to Ranton, all which Towns and Castles with diverse others they burnt and utterly defaced; and on the eighteenth of May came to Barwick, not having lost in all the journey above fourteen men:

In the meane time, in King Henries five and thirtieth yeer, on Trinity sunday a new league was entred into and sworne, between the King and the Emperour at Hampton-court, to be both offensive and defensive.

In this yeer, Proclamation was made, whereby the people were licensed to eare white meats in Lent, but streightly forbidden the eating of flesh; whereupon shortly after, the Earle of Surrey with diverse other Lords and Knights, were imprisoned for eating of flesh contrary to the proclamation.

The third of June this yeer, there came out of Ireland three Lords, of whom Obrine was here created Earle of Thomond, (which honour his posterity injoyeth to this day) Mack William a Bary, was created Earle of Clanrinckford, and Mack Gilparick, was made Barron of Ebranky.

King Henry had already had five wives all of them Maides, and no good luck with any of them, he will now therefore try his fortune with a Widdow, and thereupon the twelveth of June, in the five and thirtieth yeere of his Reigne hee took to wife the Lady Katherine Par, widdow of the Lord Latimer late deceased, who was then proclaimed Queen; but how lucky would this match have proved, if the King had longer lived, God knowes, seeing in the short time of three yeers they lived together, it was no smal danger she escaped, which though it hapenned not till a yeer or two after this time, yet will not unfitly be spoken of in this place, that so her story may come together; this Queen as being an earnest Protestant, had many great adversaries, by whom she was accused to the King, to have Hereticall books found in her closet; and this was so agravated against her, that they prevailed with the King, to signe a warrant to commit her to the Tower, with a purpose to have her burnt for Heresie; this warrant was delivered to Wriothsley Lord Chancelour, and he by chance, or rather indeed indeed by Gods providence, letting it fal from him, it was taken up and caried to the Queen; who having read it, went soone after to visit the King, at that time keeping his chamber, by reason of a sore leg; being come to the King, he presently fel into talk with her, about some points of Religion, demanding her resolution therin; but she knowing that his nature was not to be crost, specially considering the case she was in, made him answer, that she was a woman accompanied with many imperfections, but his Majesty was wise and judicious, of whom she must learne as of her Lord and Head; not so by Saint Mary (said the King) for you are a Doctor Kate to instruct us, and not to be instructed by us, as often we have seen heretofore: indeed Sir (said she) if your Majesty have so conceived, I have been mistaken, for if heretofore I have held talke with you touching Religion, it hath bin to learn of your Majesty some point, whereof I stood in doubt, and sometimes that with my talke, I might make you forget your present infirmity: and is it even so Sweet heart (quoth the King) why then we are friends, and so kissing her, gave her leave to depart. But soon after, the day was appointed by the Kings warrant, for apprehending her; on which day, the King being disposed to walk in the Garden, had the Queen with him, when suddenly the Lord Chancelour with forty of the Guard, came into the Garden, with a purpose to apprehend her: when as soon as the King saw, he stept to him, and calling him knave and foole, bid him avaunt out of his presence: the Queen seeing the King so angry with him, began to intreat for him, to whom the King said; ah poore soule, thou little knowest what it is he came about, of my word sweet heart, he hath bin to thee a very knave; and thus by Gods providence was this Queen preserved, who else had tasted of as bitter a cup, as any of his former wives had done.

About this time King Henry and the Emperour sent Garter and Toyson d'or, kings at Armes, to demand performance of certain Articles of the French King; which if he denied, they were then commanded to defie him: but the French King would not suffer them to come within his land, and so they returned: whereupon King Henry caused the said demands to be declared to the French Embassadour at Westminster; and in July sent over six thousand men, under the leading of Sir John Walloppe accompanied with divers Knights & Gentlemen, Sir Thomas Seymour was Marshal of the Army, Sir Robert Bowes Treasuror, Sir Richard Cromval Captain of the horse, and Sir George Carew his Lieutenant. There were likewise Sir Thomas Palmer, Sir John Rainsford, Sir John St. John, and Sir John Gascoigne Knights, that were Captains of the foot. Their Comission was to joyn with the Emperor, and together to make war upon France. The third of August open war was proclaimed in London, between the Emperor & the King of England on the one part, and the French King on the other, as mortal enemy to them both; and to all other christian Princes besides, as he that had confederated himselfe with the Turk. Sir John Wallop marching forth of Callice with his Army, joyned with the Emperors Forces, who together went and besieged Landersey a Town lately fortified by the French, lying within the borders of the Emperors dominions: to raise this siege, the French King had raised a mighty army; with which he came on, as if he ment to give the Emperor battaile; and thereupon the Emperor raising his siedge, with a purpose to encounter him, the French King tooke the opportunity to put men and victuals into the town, which was the thing he intended: and having done this, the night following departed with his army; and then the Emperour seeing him gone, and finding the winter coming on, and no hope of sudden getting the Town, being now newly supplied, he also broke up his Army, and returned home.

This yeer, the sunday before Christmas, the Lord William Parre, brother to the Queen, who had maried the daughter and heire of Henry Bourchier Earle of Essex, was at Hampton Court created Earl of Essex, & Sir William Parre knight uncle to them both, was made Lord Parre of Horton and Lord Chamberlin to the Queen; and on New-yeers-day Sir Thomas Wriothsley, the Kings Secretary, was made Lord Wriothsley of Tichfeld.

In June this yeer, Matthew Earl of Lenox fled out of Scotland and came into England, whom King Henry received kindly, and gave him in marriage the Lady Margaret his Sisters daughter, by whom he had Henry, Father of our late King James of blessed memory.

Thomas Audley Lord Chancellour, being lately dead, Thomas Lord Wriothsley succeeded him in the place; and now was an Army levied to goe for France, the Duke of Norfolke and the Lord Privie Seal, accompanied with the Earl of Surrey the Dukes Son, the Lord Gray of Wilton, the Lord Ferrers of Chartley and his Son Sir Robert Devereux, Sir Thomas Chainey Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, the Lord Montjoy, Sir Francis Byran, Sir Thomas Poynings Captaine of Guisnes, with many other Knights and Gentlemen, about Whitsontide passed over to Callice; and marching toward Muttrel, joyned with the Emperours forces, under the leading of the Count de Buren; which two Armies laid siedge to Muttrel, whereof Monsieur de Bies, one of the Martials of France was Captaine, but being then at Bullogn, and hearing of the siedg of Muttrel, he left Bulloigne and with his forces came thither, which was the thing that was desired, to draw him from Bulloign; and thereupon was the Duke of Suffolke appointed to passe over with the Kings army, accompanied with the Earl of Arundell Marshall of the Field, the Lord St. John, the Bishop of Winchester, Sir John Gage Controlor of the Kings house, Sir Anthony Browne Master of the Kings horse, with divers others; who the nintteenth of July came and incamped before Bulloigne; the four and twentieth of July the King in person, accompanied with divers of the Nobility, came to Callice; and the six and twentieth incamped before Bulloign on the north side: many batteries and assaults were made, so long, till at last the Town upon composition yeelded, and the Duke of Suffolke entred and tooke possession, suffring six thousand French, as was agreed, with bag and baggage to depart. The eight of September King Henry entred the town himselfe, and then leaving the Lord Lisle Lord Admirall, his Deputy there, he returned into England, landing at Dover the first of October. Many enterprises after this were made by the Dolphin of France, and by Monsieur de Bies for recovery of Bulloigne, but they were still repulsed, and the English kept the towne in spight of all they could doe; although at one time there came an Army of eighteene thousand foot, at another time an Army, wherein were reckoned twelve thousand Lance-knights, twelve thousand French foot-men, sixe thousand Italians, foure thousand of Legionarie souldiers of France, a thousand men of Armes, besides eight thousand light Horse; great Forces certainly to come and doe nothing.

Whilst these things were doing about Bulloign, the ships of the west Country and other places wafted abroad on the Seas, and took above three hundred French ships; so that the Gray-friers Church in London was laid full of wine, the Austin-friers and Black-friers full of herrings and other fish, which should have bin convayed in France.

About this time the King demanded a Benevolence of his Subjects, towards his wars in France and Scotland, to which purpose, the Lord Chancelour, the Duke of Suffolke, and other of the Kings Counsaile sate at Baynards Castle, where they first caled before them the Major and Aldermen, and because Richard Read Alderman, would not agree to pay as they set him, he was commanded to serve the King in his wars in Scotland, which the obstinate man rather choose to doe, then he would pay the rate he was required, but being there, he was taken prisoner by the Scots, to his far greater damage, then if he had agreed to the Benevolence required. For at this time, Sir Ralph Evers Lord Warden of the Marches, after many fortunate Roades into Scotland, assembled four thousand men, and entring Scotland now againe, was encountred by the Earl of Arraigne by whom he and the Lord Oagle, and many other Gentlemen were slaine, and diverse were taken prisoners, of whom Alderman Read was one.

It was now the seaven and thirtieth yeer of King Henries Reigne, when on Saint Saint Georges day Sir Thomas Wriothsley Lord Chancelour, was made Knight of the Garter, also Trinity Tearme was adjourned, by reason of the warres but the Exchequer and the Court of the Tenthes were open.

At this time, the English fleet went before New-haven, but being there encountred by a farre greater fleet of French, they retnrned; with whose retreate, the French Admirall emboldned, came upon the Coast of Sussex, where hee landed Souldiers, but upon firing of the Beacons was driven back, after which he landed two thousand men in the Isle of Wight, but was there repelled, though reported to have in his ships threescore thousand men.

In August this yeer, died the valiant Captaine, the Lord Poynings, the Kings Lievtenant of his Towne of Bulloigne, and the same month also, died at Guildford, the noble Duke of Suffolke, Charles Brandon, Lord great Master of the Kings House, whose Body was honourably buried at Windsore at the Kings cost.

About this time, the Scots having received aide out of France, approached the English Borders, but durst attempt nothing, whereupon the Earle of Hertford, Lievtenant of the North parts, raising an army of twelve thousand men, English and strangers, entred Scotland and burnt a great part of Mers and Tividale, as Kelsay Abbey and the Towne, the Abbeys of Medrosse, Driborne, and Tedworth, with a hundred Townes and Villages more; when on the sixteenth of September, an Army of Scots and French attempted to enter into England on the East borders, but in a streight were set upon by the English, who slew and tooke of them to the number of seven score, amongst whom was the Lord Humes sonne, and a principall French Captaine; in another roade, which they made into the West Borders, the Lord Maxwels sonne, and diverse other were taken, but then at another time (such is the chance of war) five hundred English entring the West Borders of Scotland were discomfited, and the greatest part of them either taken or slaine.

And now to revenge the presumptious attempts of the French upon the Isle of Wight, the Lord Admiral with his fleet approached the Coasts of Normandy landed six thousand men at Treport, burnt the Suburbs of that Towne with the Abbey, destoryed thirty ships there in the Haven, and then returned, not having lost above fourteen persons in the whole voyage.

At this time the Earle of Hartford lying at Bulloigne, had in his Army above fourscore thousand men, and many skirmishes passed between him and the French, till at last, by mediation of the Emperour and diverse other Princes a meeting was appointed to treat of a peace, between the two Kings of England and France; hereupon there came to Guisnes for the King of England, the Earl of Hertford, the Bishop of Winchester, Sir John Dudley Viscount Lisle, Baron of Manp.s and high Admirall of England, Sir William Paget the Kings Secretary & Doctor Nicholas Wootton Dean of Canterbury. For the French King, there came to Ard, Claude Daneholt Admirall of France, the Bishop of Eureux, Monsieur Reymond chiefe President of Roan, and the Secretary Bouchetell. Diverse times they met betwixt Ard and Guisnes, and after long debating of matters, and diverse breakings off; at length, the seventh of June, a Peace was concluded, and proclaimed in the City of London on Whitsunday the thirteenth of June, by sound of trumpet; and the same day in like manner at Paris and Roan; the chiefe Article of which Peace was this; that the French King paying to the King of England eight hundred thousand Crownes, within the terme of eight yeeres, should have Bulloigne againe restored to him, which in the mean time should remain in possession of the King of England, as a pledge for assurance of the said money; and now for a full establishment of this Peace, the Viscount Lisle Lord Admirall, with the Bishop of Duresme and divers other Lords, were sent into France to take oath of the French King and of the Dolphin; as likewise at the same time, divers Lords came from the French King to take oath of King Henry; who by the way were met by the yong Prince and many Lords, and conducted to the King at Hampton-Court.

In his seven and thirtierh yeere, the three and twentieth of November, a Parliament began at Westminster, wherein was granted to the King, a Subsidie both of Spiritualty and Temporalty, and all Colledges, Chanteries and Hospitalls were given to him to dispose of: the foure and twentieth of December the Parliament was prorogued, on which day the King comming to the Parliament House, the Speaker made to him an Oration, which the Lord Chancellour was used to answere, but at this time the King would answer himselfe, the effect whereof was, that where Master Speaker had commended him for many excellent qualities that were in him, he thanked him for it, nor that he had them, but for putting him in mind, how necessary it was, he should have them; then he thanked the whole House for their Subsidie, and for giving him the Colleges and Chanteries, which hee promised to see bestowed, to the glory of God and good of the Realme; lastly, he ackowledged their love to himselfe, but found fault with want of love to one another; for what love, where there is not concord? and what concord, when one calleth another Heretick and Anabaptist, and he againe calleth him Papist and Hipocrite: and this not onely amongst those of the Temporalty, but even the Clergy men themselves preach one against another, inveigh one against another, without Charity or Discretion; some be so stiffe in their old mumpsimus, and others so curious in their new sumpsimus, that few or none Preacheth truly and sincerely the word of God; now therfore let this be amended, feare and serve God, be in Charity amongst your selves, to the which I as your supream Head and Soveraigne Lord, exhort and require you: and this said, the Acts were openly read, to some he gave his Royall assent, and to diverse assented not.

Whilst oath for the peace was thus taken by both Kings, Bulloigne remaining still in King Henries possession, Monsieur de Chatillon Captain of Mont-pleasier began to make a new Bastillion at the very mouth of the Haven of Bulloigne naming it Chatillons Garden: hereof the Lord Gray of Wilton as then Deputy of Bulloigne advertised the King by Sir Thomas Palmour, requiring to know his pleasure whither he should race it, as a thing very incommodious to the Town, or let it stand; the King asked advice of his Counsail, who all agreed, that the conditions of the peace ought in no wise to be infringed, and therefore to let the Bastillian stand; whereupon the King caused his Secretary the Lord Paget, to write a letter to the Lord Gray, to that purpose, but then called Sir Thomas Palmour secretly to him, bidding him tell the Lord Gray, that whatsoever he had written in his letter, yet with all speed possible, he should race the fortification to the ground; Sir Thomas Palmour replying that a message by word of mouth being contrary to his leter, would never be beleeved, wel (said the King) do you tell him as I bid you, and leave the doing it to his choice; upon the comming back of Sir Thomas Palmour, the Lord Gray called a counsaile, shewing them the Kings letter, and withall Sir Thomas Palmours message, and then asked their Advise, what in this case he should doe? who all agreed without any question, that the letter was to be followed, and not the message, to which the Lord Gray himselfe said nothing, but caused the message to be written verbatim from Sir Thomas Palmours mouth, and those of the Counsaile, to set their hands to it: this done, the night following he issued forth with a company of Armed men and Pioners, and overthrew the fortification to the ground, and then sent Sir Thomas Palmour with letters to the King, who as soon as he saw him, asked aloud, what, will he doe it or no? Sir Thomas Palmour delivering his letter said, your Majesty shall know by these, but then the King halfe angry, nay tell me (saith he) wil he doe it or no? being then told it was done, and the fortification clean raced, he turned to his Lords and said, what say you my Lords to this, Chatillous Garden is raced to the floore; whereto one presently answered, that he that had done it, was worthy to loose his head, to which the King streightly replyed, that he would rather lose a dozen such heads as his was, that so Judged, then one such servants as had done it, and therewith commanded the Lord Grays pardon pardon should presently be drawn, the which he sent with letters of great thanks, and promise of reward; the cause why the King took this course was this, lest if he written the racing of the Fortification, in his letter it might have come to the French-mens knowledge, before it could have been done, and so have been prevented, and by this may be taken a scantling of King Henries great Capacitie.

It is now the eight and thirtieth yeere of his reigne, when about Michaelmas Thomas Duke of Norfolke, and Henry Earle of Surrey his Sonne and heire, upon certaine surmises of treason, were committed to the Tower of London; and the thirteenth of January, the King then lying at the point of death, the said Earle was arraigned in the Guild-hall, before the Lord Major, the Lord Chauncellour, and other Lords there in Commission; the speciall matter wherewith he was charged, was the bearing of certaine Armes that were said to belong to the King and to the Prince; though the Earle justified the bearing of them, as belonging to divers of his Ancestours; affirming withall, that he had the opinion of Heraulds therein: But this notwithstanding, being no Lord of the Parliament, he was tried by a common Jurie, and by them was found guilty, and thereupon had judgement of death; and the nineteenth of January was beheaded on the Tower-hill. The Duke was attainted by Parliament and kept in prison, till in the first yeer of Queen Mary the Attaindour was reversed. The death of this Earle might lay an imputation of cruelty upon King Henry, if a just jealousie growing from the many circumstances of the Earles greatnesse, in the tender age of his owne Sonne did not excuse him: [illegible]

Soone after the death of this Earle, the King himselfe died; having made his last Will, in which he tooke order, that his Sonne Edward should succeed him in the Crowne, and he dying without issue, his daughter Mary, and she dying without issue, his daughter Elizabeth; although another order of succession had passed before by Act of Parliament. The Executors of his last Will were these sixteene; Thomas Cranmor Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Wriothsley Lord Chancellour, Sir William Pawlet Lord Saint John, and great Master of the Household, Sir Edward Seymor Earle of Hartford and high Chamberlin of England, Sir John Russell Lord Privie Seale, Sir John Dudley Viscount Lisle, Lord Admirall, Cuthert Tunstall Bishop of Durham, Sir Anthonie Browne Master of the Horse, Sir Edmund Montacute, Lord chiefe Justice of the Common-Pleas, Sir Thomas Bromley one of the Justices of the Kings Bench, Sir Edward North Chancellour of the Augmentation, Sir William Paget Knight of the Order, Sir Anthonie Dennie, Sir William Herbert, Sir Edward Wootton Treasurour of Callice, and Nicholas Wootton Deane of Canterbury and Yooke. To whom were adjoyned as assistance these twelve, Henry Fitz Allan Earle of Arundell, William Par Earle of Essex, Sir Thomas Cheyney Treasurour of the Household, Sir John Gage Controlour, Sir Anthony Wingfield Vicechamberlaine, Sir William Peter Principall Secretary, Sir Richard Rich, Sir John Baker of Sissingherst in Kent, Chancellour of the Exchequer, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Thomas Seymour, Sir Richard Southwell and Sir Edward Peckham. And it was not without need to leave a full Councell Table, considering in what termes he left the Kingdome when he died. Abroad, in league with the Emperour, at Peace with the King of France; but whether these were not personall onely, and no longer binding then King Henry lived, might be doubted; with the Scots at deadly feud; with the Pope at utter defiance; from both which coasts there could be expected but little faire weather: at home, the frame of Religion extreamly disjoynted; and the Clergie that should set it in frame, out of frame themselves: the mindes of the people extreamly distracted; and the Nobility that should cyment them, scarce holding themselves together: And in this stare was the Kingdome when King Henry the eight dyed, in the yeer 1547. the fifty sixth of his life, and of his Reigne the eight and thirtieth.

Of his Taxations.

IN his fourth yeer, in a Parliament at Weſtminſter, was granted to the King, two Fifteens of the Temporalty, and two Tenths of the Clergie, and Headmoney; of every Duke ten marke, an Earle five pound, a Barron foure pound, a Knight foure markes, and every man valued at eight hundred pounds in goods, to pay foure markes, and ſo after that rate till him that was valued at forty ſhillings, and he paid twelve pence, and every man and woman of fifteen yeers & upward four pence. In his ſixth yeer, a Parliament was holden, wherin divers Subſidies were granted to the King, towards the charges of his wars in France: in his fourteenth yeer, order was taken by the Cardinall, that the true value of all mens ſubſtance might be knowne, and he would have had every man ſworn, to tell what they were worth, and required a tenth part thereof, towards the Kings charges in his preſent wars, as the ſpiritualty had granted a fourth part: this the Londoners thought very hard, and thereupon were excuſed for taking oath, and were allowed to bring in their bils upon their honeſties; but when all was done, after much labouring by the Cardinall, the Clergy granted one halfe of all their yeerly Spirituall Revenues, for five yeers, and the Temporalty two ſhillings in the pound, from twenty pounds upwards, and from forty ſhillings to twenty pounds, of every twenty ſhillings twelve pence; and under forty ſhillings, of every head of ſixteen yeers and upwards four pence, to be paid in every two yeers: in his ſixteenth yeer, the Cardinall of his owne head, attempted by Comiſſion, to draw the People to pay the ſixth part of every mans ſubſtance in plate or monie; but this was generally oppoſed, and the People in many Countries riſe upon it, ſo as comming to the Kings knowledg, he utterly diſavowed it, and blamed the Cardinall exceedingly for attempting it. In his foure and twentieth yeer in a Parliament then holden, a fifteenth was granted to the King, towards his charges of making fortifications againſt Scotland. In his one and thirtieth yeer, a Subſidie of two ſhillings in the pound of lands, and twelve of goods, with foure fifteenes were granted to the King, towards his charges of making Bulwarks. In his five and thirtieth yeer, a Subſidie was granted to be paid in three yeers, every Engliſh-man being worth in goods twenty ſhillings and upwards to five pounds, to pay four pence of every pound, and from five pounds to ten pounds eight pence, from ten pounds to twenty pound ſix pence, from twenty pounds and upwards, of every pound two ſhilings; ſtrangers as wel denizens as others, being inhabitants to pay double, and for lands, every Engliſh-man paid eight pence of the pound, from twenty ſhillings to five pounds, & from five pounds to ten pounds ſixteen pence, and from ten pounds to twenty pounds two ſhillings, and from twenty pounds and upwards, of every pound three ſhillings, ſtrangers double; the Clergy ſix ſhillings in the pound of Benefices, and every Prieſt having no Benifice, but an Anual ſtipend, ſix ſhillings eight pence yeerly, during three yeers.

Of Lawes and Ordinances in his time.

IN a Parliament holden in his ſixth yeere, diverſe Lawes were made, but two moſt ſpoken of; one for Apparell, another for Labourers. In his twelvth yeere, he cauſed the Statutes againſt Incloſures to be revived, and Commanded that decaied houſes ſhould be built up againe, and that incloſed grounds ſhould be laid open; which though it did ſome good, yet not ſo much as it might have done, if the Cardinall for his owne benefit, had not procured liberty for great men, to keep up their incloſures, to the oppreſſion of poor men. In his ſeventeenth yeer, the King lying at Eltham, diverſe ordinances were made by the Cardinall touching the Governance of the Kings Houſe, and were long after called the Statutes of Eltham. In his eighteenth yeere, in the month of May, Proclamation was made againſt all unlawfull games, ſo that in all places tables, dice, cards and Bowles, were taken and burnt; but this order continued not long, for young men being reſtrained from theſe Games, fell ſome to drinking, ſome to ſtealing of Conies and Deere, and ſuch other miſdemeanours: alſo in this yeere, was an inhauncing of Coyne, for preventing the carrying it over to places where it went at higher rate, ſo that the Angell which went before but for ſeven ſhillings, ſhould now goe for ſeven and ſix pence, and every ounce of Gold ſhould be five and forty ſhillings, which was before but forty, and other Coynes accordingly. In his twentieth yeer Sir James Spencer being Major of London, the watch uſed on Mid-ſomer night was laid downe. In his three and thirtieth yeer, in a Parliament then holden, an Act was made, that whoſoever ſhould poyſon any perſon ſhould be boyled to death, by which Sratute one Richard Rooſe, who had poyſoned diverſe perſons in the Biſhop of Rocheſter place, was boyled to death in Smithfield, to the terrible example of all other. In his two and twentieth yeer, three Acts were made, one for probare of Teſtaments, another for Mortuaries, the third againſt plurality of benefices, Non-Reſidence, buying and taking of Farmes by ſpirituall perſons. In his thirtieth yeer, it was ordained by Cromwel the Kings Vicar General, that in al Churches a Regiſter ſhould be kept of every Wedding, Chriſtning, and buriall within the ſame Pariſh for ever. In his one and thirtieth yeer, the King firſt inſtituted and appointed fifty Gentlemen called Penſioners, to waight upon his perſon, aſſighning to each of them fifty pounds a yeer, for the maintainance of themſelvs and two horſes, in his ſix and thirtieth yeer, Proclamation was made for the inhancing of Gold, to eight and forty ſhillings, and ſilver to foure ſhillings the ounce, alſo he cauſed to be coyned baſe money, mingling it with braſſe which was ſince that time called downe the fifth yeere of Edward the ſixth, and called in the ſecond yeer of Queen Elizibeth. In his ſeven and thirtieth yeer, the brothell houſes, called the Stewes on the Bank-ſide in Southwarke, were put downe by the Kings Commandement, and was done by proclamation and ſound of Trumpet. In his three and twentieth yeer, it was enacted, that Butchers ſhould ſell their meat by weight, Beef for a half-peny the pound, and Mutton for three farthings, alſo at this time forraigne Butchers were permitted, their fleſh in Leadenhall-market, which before was not allowed; in his time alſo, the Government of the Preſident in the North was firſt inſtituted, and the firſt Preſident there, was Tunſtall Biſhop of Durham.

Affaires of the Church in his time.

IN the yeer 1517. the eighth yeer of this Kings Reigne, Martin Luther of Wittemberg in Germany a Frier of the Order of the Hermiſſes, taking occaſion from the abuſe of Indulgences, began to Preach againſt the Authority of the Pope, and to bring in a Reformation of Religion; for repreſſing of whom the Counſaile of Trent was called by Pope Paul the third, in the yeere 1542. which continued above forty yeers, but was never received in the Kingdome of France; which Counſaile, by decreeing many things to be poins of faith, which were not ſo accounted before, hath made no ſmall diſtraction amongſt Papiſts themſelves: againſt this Luther, King Henry wrote a booke with great bitterneſſe, and with as great bitterneſſe was anſwered; at the ſame time with Luther, there aroſe alſo in the ſame Country other Reformers of Religion, as Zuinglius, Occloampadius, Melanthon, who differing from Luther in ſome few points, made the difference which is at this day of Lutherans and Proteſtants, ſo called at firſt Auſpurg, for making a proteſtation in defence of their Doctrine, which ſoon after ſpread all Chriſtendome over: King Henry in the ſixth and twentieth yeer of his Reigne, had excluded the Popes Authority out of his Realme; but thinking the worke not ſufficiently done, as long as Abbeys and Priories kept their ſtation, which were, as it were his Forteresſes and Pillars; there there was not long after meanes found to have them suppressed, for aspersions being laid upon them (and perhaps no more then truth) of Adulteries and Murthers, they by Act of Parliament, in his eight and twentieth yeer, at left neere foure hundred of them suppressed, and all their lands and goods conferred upon the King. In his one and thirtieth yeer all the rest; and lastly, in his five and thirtinth yeer, all Colledges, Chantries and Hospitals; so as the hives being now all removed, there have never since any Bees or Drones been seen in the Country: in this Kings time, the Citty of Rome was taken and sacked by the Imperiall Army, forcing the Pope to fly to his Castle Saint Angelo, and there kept a prisoner, till he agreed to such conditions as his Adversaries propounded. In the two and twentieth yeere of this Kings reigne, a Proclamation was set forth that no person should purchase any thing from the Court of Rome, and this was the first blow given to the Pope in England. In his three and twentieth yeer the Clergy submitting themselves to the King, for being found guilty of a Præmunire, were the first that called him supream head of the Church. In his foure and twentieth yeere a Parliament was holden, wherein one Act was made, that Bishops should pay no more Annats or money for their Buls to the Pope, and another that no person should appeale for any cause out of this Realm, to the Court of Rome, but from the Commissary to the Bishop, and from the Bishop to the Archbishop, and from the Archbishop to the King, and all causes of the King to be tried in the upper Honse of the Convocation. In his six and twentieth yeer in July, John Frith was burnt in Smithfield, and with him at the same stake one Andrew Hewet a Tailor, both for denying the Reall presence in the Sacrament; and in a Parliament holden tl is yeer, an Act was made which Authorized the Kings Highnesse, to be supreame head of the Church of England, and the Authority of the Pope to be abolished, and then also was given to the King the first fruits and tenths of all Spirituall livings; and this yeer were many put to dearth, Papists for denying the Kings Supremecy, Protestants for denying the Reall presence in the Sacrament; and it is incredible what numbers for these two causes were put to death, in the last ten yeers of this Kings Reign, of whom if we should make perticular mention, it would reach a great way in the Book of Martyrs: in his eight and twentieth yeer, the Lord Cromwell was made Vicar Generall under the King, over the Spiritualty, and sate divers times in the Convocation House amongst the Bishops as head over them; and in September this yeere, he set forth injunctions, commanding all Parsons and Curates to teach their Parishoners the Pater Noster, the Ave, and Creed, with the ten Commandements and Articles of the Christian Faith in the English tongue. In his one and thirtieth yeer, was set forth by the Bishops, the Book of the six Articles, condemning all for Hereticks and to be burnt that should hold,

1. That the body of Christ was not Really present in the Sacrament after Consecration.
2. That the sacrament might not truly be Administred under one Kind.
3. That Priests entred into Holy Orders might marry.
4. That vowes of Chastity entred into upon mature deliberation, were not to be kept.
5. That private Masses were not to be used.
6. That Auricular Confession was not necessary in the Church.

Tl is yeere also the Religion of St. Johns in England, commonly called the Order of Knights of the Rhodes was dissolved; and on Assension day, Sir William Weston Knight, Prior of St. Johns departed this life, for thought (as was reported) after he heard of the dissolution of his Order, for the King took all the lands that belonged to that Order into his owne hands; in his six and thirtieth yeere, the Letany or Praceession was set forth in English, with commandement by the King, to be generally used in Parish Churches.

Workes

Workes of Piety done by him or others in his time.

UPon the suppressing of Abbeys, King Henry instituted six new Bishopricks and six Cathedrall Churches, endowing them with convenient maintenance, he also gave competent Pensions during their lives, to such Riligious Persons as were turned out of their Cloysters; he also instituted in both the Universities, Professors of the Hebrew and Greek tongues, of Divinity, Civill law and Physick, allowing to each of them forty pound a yeer: he also founded a Colledge at Cambridge; he gave at his death a thousand markes to the poor, and to twelve poore Knights of Windsore, each of them twelve pence a day for ever, and every yeere a long gowne of white cloath: in the fifth yeer of this Kings reigne, George Monor Major of London, re-edified the decayed steeple of the Church of waltham-stow in Essex, adding thereunto a side Isle with a Chappel where he lieth buried; on the North side of the Church-yard there he founded a faire Almes-house, for a Priest and thirteen poor men and women, giving them a weekly maintenance; he also for the commodity of Travelours made a cawsey of timber over the marshes, from Waltham-stow to Lock-bridge towards London. In this Kings eighth yeer Richard Foxe Bishop of Winchester founded Corpus Christi Colledge in Oxford, minding to have made it a house for Monkes, but Hugh Oldham Bishop of Exceter, perswaded him to make it rather a Colledge for Schollars, and joyned with him in it, contributing great sums of money towards it, contenting himselfe with the name onely of a Benefactour. In his seventh yeer King Henry builded the town of Greenwich. In this Kings time, Cardinall woolsey Founded two Colledges, one at Oxford, another at Ipswich; to his Colledge at Oxford he had given foure thousand pounds Land a yeere, but his Lands being all confiscate to the King, the King tooke the Lands, but yet gave to the Colledge a competent maintenance for a Deane, eight Prebends, and a hundred Fellowes; which Colledge is now called Christ-Church, and accounts King Henry for their Founder. His Colledge at Ipswich was demolished. This Cardinall also built Hampton-Court, the chiefest at this day of all the Kings houses, and built or enlarged White-hall, called then Yorke-Place. King Henry in his foure and twentieth yeer, built his Mansion House of Saint James, where also he made a faire Parke. This place before had beene an Hospitall of Sisters, with whom the King compounded, giving them Pensions during their lives. In his thirtieth yeere, Nicholas Gibson Grocer, then Sheriffe of London, builded a Free-School at Ratcliffe nere London with maintenance for a Master and an Usher; he also builded an Almes-house there for fourteen poor and aged people. In his one and thirtieth yeer, Thomas Huntlow the then Sheriff of London, gave certain tenements to the Haberdashers, for finding of ten Almes-men of the same company. In his six and thirtieth yeer, Sir John Allen who had been twice Major of London, and of the Kings Counsaile, gave at his death, to the Citty of London, a rich Coller of Gold, to be worn by the Major: which Collor was first worne by Sir William Laxton on Saint Edwards day, at the Election of the new Major, who gave to every Ward in London twenty pounds, to be distributed amongst poore Housholders, besides to sixscore persons, whereof threescore men to every one a gowne of broad-cloth and a black cap; and threescore women, to every one a gowne of the like cloath and a white Kerchiffe. In his eight and thirtieth yeer, King Henry gave to the City of London, for reliefe of poore people Saint Barthalomews Spittle, the Church of the Gray-Friers, and two Parish Churches, the one at Saint Nicholas in the Shambles, the other Saint Ewins in Newgate-Market, all to be made one Parish Church of the Gray-Fryers; and in Lands he gave for the maintenance of the same five hundred markes a yeere for ever: and this Church to be named Christ-Church; founded by King Henry the eighth.

Casualties in his time.

IN his ninth yeere happened a Sweating-sickneſſe, whereof infinite multitudes in many parts of England dyed, ſpecially in London; and was ſo violent, that in three and ſometimes two houres, it tooke away mens lives, and ſpared neither rich nor poore; for in the Kings Court the Lord Clinton, the Lord Gray of Wilton, and many Knights, Gentlemen and Officers dyed of it. It began in July, and continued to the midſt of December. In his thirteenth yeere, was a great mortality in London, and other places of the Realme, and many men of Honour and Worſhip dyed; amongſt others, Doctor Fitz-James Biſhop of London, in whoſe place Doctor Tunſtall ſucceeded. In his nintenth yeere, by extremity of raine in ſeed-time, there followed a great dearth of Corne, which would have cauſed great calamity, but that it was relieved in London by Merchants of the Styliard out of Germany, and a thouſand quarters ſupplied out of the Kings owne proviſion. In his twentieth yeere, in the end of May, began in London another Sweating-ſickneſſe, which afterwards infected all places of the Realme; by reaſon whereof the Tearme was adjourned, and the Circuit of the Aſſizes alſo; many dyed in the Court, as Sir Francis Poynts, Sir William Compton Knights, and William Carew Eſquire of the Kings Privie-Chamber; the King himſelfe for a ſpace, removed almoſt every day, till he came to Tittinhanger, a place of the Abbot of Saint Albones, where he with the Queene and a ſmall number remained, till the ſickneſſe was paſt. In his thirtieth yeere, the manner of caſting Pipes of Lead, for conveyance of water under-ground, without uſing of ſoder, was firſt invented by Robert Brocke Clerke, one of the Kings Chaplaines: a profitable invention, for by this, two men and a boy will doe more in one day, then could have beene done before by many men in many daves: Robert Cooper Goldſmith, was the firſt that made the Inſtruments, and put this Invention in practice. In a Rebellion in the North, in this Kings time, when the Duke of Norfolke was ſent with an Army againſt the Rebels, and that a day of battaile betweene them was appointed, it happened, that the night before a ſmall Brooke called Dun, running between the two Armies, upon the fall of a ſmall raine, ſwelled to ſuch a height, that it was not paſſable by either foot or horſe; a thing which had never happened before upon a great raine, and was then accounted (as indeed it was) no leſſe then a Miracle. In his three and thirtieth yeere, was a great mortality in the Realme, by reaſon of hot Agues and Fluxes; and withall ſo great a drouth, that ſmall Rivers were clean dryed, much cattell dyed for lacke of water, and the Thames were grown ſo ſhallow, that the Salt-water flowed above London-bridge, till the raine had encreaſed the freſh waters. In his five and thirtieth yeere, the firſt caſt-Peeces of Iron that ever were made in England, were made at Buckſtead in Suſſex by Ralph Hage and Peter Bawde. In his ſix and thirtieth yeere, was a great Plague in London, ſo as Michaelmas Tearme was adjourned to Saint Albones, and there kept. In his ſeven and thirtieth yeere, on Tueſday in Eaſter-weeke, william Foxley Pot-maker for the Mint of the Tower of London, fell aſleepe, and could not be waked with pinching or burning, till the firſt day of the next Tearme, which was full fourteene dayes; and when he awaked, was found in all points, as if he had ſlept but one night, and lived forty yeeres after. About this fifteenth yeere, it happened that divers things were newly brought into England, whereupon this Rime was made:

Turkies, Carps, Hoppes, Piccarell and Beere, Came into ENGLAND all in one yeere.

Of

Of his Wives and Children.

KIng Henry had ſix Wives, his firſt was Katherine, daughter of Ferdinand King of Spain, the Relict of his brother Arthur, ſhe lived his Wife above twenty yeers, and then was divorced from him; after which ſhe lived three yeers by the name of Katherine Dowager, ſhe deceaſed at Kimbolton in the County of Huntington, the eighth of January in the yeere 1535. and lieth interred in the Cathedral Church of Peterborough, under a Hearce of black ſay, having a white Croſſe in the midſt. His ſecond Wife was Anne ſecond daughter of Sir Thomas Bullen, Earle of Wiltſhire and Ormond; ſhee was maried to him the five and twentieth day of January, in the yeere 1533. lived his wife three yeers, three months and five and twenty dayes, and then was beheaded, and her body buried in the Quire of the Chappell in the Tower: his third Wife was Jane daughter of Sir John Seymour and ſiſter to the Lord Edward Seymour, Earle of Hartford and Duke of Somerſet, ſhe was maried to him the next day after the beheading of Queen Anne, lived his Wife one yeer five months and foure and twenty dayes, and then died in Child-bed, and was buried in the midſt of the Quire of the Church within the Caſtle of Windſor. His fourth Wife was Anne, ſiſter to the Duke of Cleve, ſhe lived his wife ſix moneths, and then was Divorced; ſhe remained in England long after the Kings death, and accompanied the Lady Elizabeth through London, at the ſolemnizing of Queene Maries Coronation. His fifth wife was Katherine, daughter of Edmund, and Neece of Thomas Howard his brother Duke of Norfolke; ſhe was married to him in the two and thirtieth yeere of his reigne; lived his wife one yeere ſixe moneths and foure dayes, and then was beheaded in the Tower of London, and buried in the Chancell of the Chappell by Queene Anne Bullen. His ſixt wife was Katherine, daughter of Sir Thomas Parre of Kendall, and ſiſter to the Lord William Parre, Marqueſſe of Northampton; ſhe was firſt married to John Nevill Lord Latimer, and after his deceaſe to the King at Hampton-Court, in the five and thirtieth yeere of his reigne: ſhe was his wife three yeeres ſix moneths and five dayes; and then ſurviving him, was againe married to Thomas Seymour Lord Admirall of England, unto whom ſhe bore a daughter, but died in her Childe-bed, in the yeere 1548. He had children by his firſt wife Queene Katherine, Henry borne at Richmond, who lived not full two moneths, and was buried at Weſtminſter; alſo another Sonne, whoſe name is not mentioned, lived but a ſhort time neither: then a daughter named Mary, borne at Greenwich, in the eighth yeere of his reigne, and came afterward to be Queene of England. By his ſecond wife, Queene Anne Bullen, he had a daughter named Elizabeth, borne at Greenwich, in the five and twentieth yeere of his reigne; who ſucceeded her ſiſter Mary in the Crowne: he had alſo by her a ſonne, but borne dead. By his third wife Queene Jane, he had a Sonne named Edward, borne at Hampton-Court in the nine and twentieth yeere of his reigne, who ſucceeded him in the Kingdome. Beſides theſe, he had a baſe ſonne, named Henry Fitz-roy, begotten of the Lady Talboyſe, called Elizabeth Blunt, borne at Blackamore in Eſſex, in the tenth yeere of his reigne; who was made Duke of Richmond and Somerſet; married Mary daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke; with whom he lived not long, but dyed at Saint Iames by Weſtminſter, and was buried at Framingham in Suffolke.

Of his Perſonage and Conditions.

HEE was exceeding tall of ſtature, and very ſtrong; faire of complexion, in his latter dayes corpulent and burley: concerning his conditions,

Hee was a Prince of ſo many good parts, that one would wonder he could have any ill; and indeed he had not many ill, till flattery and ill councell in his latter time got the upper hand of him. His cruelty to his wives may not onely be excuſed, but defended; for if they were incontinent, he did but juſtice; if they were not ſo, yet it was ſufficient to ſatisfie his conſcience, that he thought he had cauſe to thinke them ſo; and if the marriage bed be honourable in all, in Princes it is ſacred. In ſuppreſſing of Abbies he ſhewed not little Piety, but great providence; for though they were excellent things being rightly uſed, yet moſt peſtilent, being abuſed; and then may the uſe be juſtly ſuppreſſed, when the abuſe ſcarce poſſibly can be reſtrained. To thinke he ſuppreſſed Abbies out of covetouſneſſe and deſire of gaine, is to make him extreamly deceived in his reckoning; for if we compare the profit with the charge that followed, we ſhall finde him certainly a great looſer by the bargaine. He was ſo farre from Pride, that he was rather too humble, at leſt he converſed with his Subjects in a more familiar manner then was uſuall with Princes. So valiant, that his whole life almoſt, was nothing but exerciſes of valour; and though performed amongſt his friends in jeſt, yet they prepared him againſt his enemies in earneſt, and they that durſt be his enemies found it. It may be ſaid, the complexion of his government for the firſt twenty yeers, was ſanguine and joviall; for the reſt, colerick and bloody: and it may be doubted, whether in the former, he were more prodigall of his owne treaſure, or in the latter of his Subjects blood; for as he ſpent more in Fictions, then any other King did in Realities; ſo in any diſtemper of his people, he had no other Phyſicke, but to open a veine: but we ſhall do him extreame wrong, to thinke that all the blood ſhed in his time, was of his ſhedding; they were the Biſhops that were the Draco to make the bloody Laws; the Biſhops that were the Phalaris, to put them in execution: the King oftentimes ſcarce knowing what was done. Certain it is, when a great Lord put a Gentlewoman the ſecond time on the rack, the King hearing of it, exceedingly condemned him for ſuch extream cruelty. As for Religion, though he brought it not to a full Reformation; yet he gave it ſo great a beginning, that we may truly ſay of that he did, Dimidium plus toto. They who charge him with the vice of luſt, let them ſhew ſuch another example of continence as was ſeen in him to lye ſix moneths by a yong Lady, and not to touch her; for ſo did hee with the Lady Anne of Cleve: but this is to make Noſegayes, I like better to leave every flower growing upon its ſtaulke, that it may be gathered freſh; which will be done by reading the Story of his Life.

Of his Death and Buriall.

IT is Recorded of him, that in his later time he grew ſo fat and ſlothfull, that engines were made to lift and remove him up and downe; but howſoever in the ſix and fiftieth yeer of his age, whither a dropſie, or by reaſon of an ulcer in his leg, he fell into a langniſhing feaver, which brought him into ſuch extremity, that his Phyſitians utterly deſpared of his life, whereof yet none durſt ſpeake a word to him, till Maſter Denny one of his Privy-chamber tooke the the boldnes to goe to him, telling him of the danger he was in, and withall putting him in mind to thinke of his ſoules health; to which he anſwered, that hee confeſſed his ſinnes to be exceeding great, yet had ſuch confidence in the mercy of God through Chriſt, that he doubted not of forgiveneſſe though they had been much greater; and being then asked by Maſter Denny, if he would have any Divine brought to him with whom to confer, he anſwered he would willingly have the Archbiſhop Cranmer, but not yet a while, til he had taken a litle reſt: whereupon the Archbiſhop being then at Croydon, was preſently ſent for, but before he could come, the King was growne ſpeechleſſe, onely ſeeming to retain a little memory, ſo as putting out his hand, and the Archbiſhop deſiring him to ſhew ſome ſigne of his faith in Chriſt, he then wrung the Archbiſhop hard by the hand, and immediately gave up the Ghoſt, the eight and twentieth of January, in the yeer 1547. the ſix and fiftieth of his age, and of his reigne the eight and thirtieth: his body with great ſolemnity was buried at Windſor under a moſt coſtly and ſtately Tombe, begun in copper and guilt, but never finiſhed.

Men of note in his time.

MEn famous for the ſword were many in his time, and in a manner all, that it is hard making choice, without being partiall, unleſſe we ſhal preferre Dukes of equal valour, before others of meaner caling, and then wil the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke hold worthily the place firſt, and next to them the yong Earl of Surrey, who had been more fortunate if he had been leſſe valiant. Of men of letters in his time, there were whole Armies in forraigne parts, the moſt famous, were Budæus, Ludovicus Vines, John Revolin, Eraſmus Roteradamus, Vyſinus, Cornarius, Sadolet, Martin Bucer; in England were John Collet Deane of Pauls and Founder of the Schoole there, William Lilly borne at Odiham in Hamſhire, firſt Schoolmaſter of Pauls-Schoole, Thomas Linaker a learned Phiſitian, John Skelton a pleaſant Poet, William Horman Vice Proveſt of Eaton, who wrote divers workes, Sir Thomas Moore, William Tindall, John Raſtal, a Citizen and Stationer of London, Chriſtopher Saint-Germane an excellent Lawyer, Sir Thomas Elyot, John Leland, a diligent ſearcher of Antiquities, Sir John Bourchier Knight, Lord Berners, who tranſlated the Chronocles of Froyſard out of French into Engliſh, Henry Standiſh Biſhop of Saint Aſſaph, who wrote a book againſt Eraſmus traſlation of the new Teſtament; Arnold of London, who wrote certain Colections touching Hiſtoricall matters, Thomas Lupſet a Londoner, who wrote ſundry vertuous Treatiſes, Henry Bradſhaw a black Monke, who wrote the life of Saint Werborough, and alſo a certain Chronocle, John Palſgrave a Londoner, who wrote inſtructions for the perfect underſtanding of the French tongue, John Skuiſh a Corniſh-man, who wrote certaine abbreviations of Chronicles, with a Treatiſe of the wars of Troy, Anthony Fitz-Herbert a Judge, who wrote an Abridgment of the Law, wilfride Holme who wrot a Treatiſe of the rebellion in Lincolnſhire, Thomas Lanquet who wrote an Epitomy of Chronicles, and alſo of the winning of Bulloigne, Thomas Soulman of Gernſey, who wrote divers notes of Hiſtory, Cutbert Tunſtall Biſhop of Durham, Robert Whittington who wrote divers Treatiſes for the inſtruction of Grammarians, John Ruſſell, who wrote a Treatiſe entituled ſuper jure Cæſaris et Papæ, alſo commentaries in Cantica, Simon Fiſh a Kentiſh-man, who wrote a book called the ſupplication of Beggars, George Bullen Lord Rochford brother to Queen Anne who wrote divers ſongs and ſoners, Francis Bigod Knight born in Yorkeſhire, who wrote a book againſt the Clergy, intitled de Impropriationibus, Henry Lord Morley, who wrote divers Treatiſes, as Comodies and Tragedies, as the life of ſectaries, and certaine rimes, William Botevile alias Thynne, who reſtored the works of Chawcer, Richard Turpin, who ſerving in the Garriſon of Callice, wrote a Chronicle of his time, and died in the yeer 1541. Sir Thomas Wiat Knight, who wrote divers matters in Engliſh-meeter, and tranſlated the ſeven Penitentiall Pſalmes, and (as ſome ſay) the whole Pſalter, he died of the peſtilence, as he was going Embaſſadour to the Emperour, in the yeer 1541. Henry Howard Earle of Surrey, who wrote divers Treatiſes in Engliſh-meeter, John Field a Londoner, who wrote a Treatiſe of mans Free-will, de Servo hominis Arbitrio, and Collections of the common Laws of England, Robert Shingleton borne in Lancaſhire, who wrote a Treatiſe of the ſeven Churches, and certaine Propheſies, William Parry a Welſh-man, who wrote a booke intitled ſpeculum Juvenam.

THE REIGNE OF KING EDWARD THE SIXTH.

IT was now the yeere 1547. when on the eight and twentieth of January King Henry dying; Prince Edward his Sonne by his third wife, the Lady Jane Seymour, and the onely Sonne he left behinde him, as well by right of Inheritance, as by his last Will, succeeded him in the Kingdome; to whom as being but nine yeers old, and therefore unripe for Government; hee had assigned eight and twenty Councellours; a fit number, if agreeing amongst themselves; too many, if at variance: and at variance they would soon fall, if there were not a moderatour to keep them in concord; the first worke therfore necessary to be done in this new world, was to make choice of such a man, as might be to the Counsailors a Moderator, a protectour to the King, and in his minority, to the Kingdome. To this place, by common consent of the King and Counsaile, Edward Seymour Earl of Hartford the Kings Uncle, was chosen to hold the place, untill the King should accomplish the age of eighteene yeeres. In which Office the first thing he did, was to make the young King Knight, who presently thereupon, made Henry Hobblethorne Major of London Knight, and then King Henries Obsequies being solemnly performed; on the seaventeenth of February, were raised in Honour the Earl of Hartford Protectour, to be Duke of Somerset, William Par Earle of Essex, to be Marquis of Northampton, Dudly Viscount Lisle, to be Earle of Warwick; Wriothsley Lord Chancelour, to be Earle of Southampton, Sir Thomas Seymour the Protectours brother, was made Lord of Sudeley, and Admirall of England, Sir Richard Rich was made Lord Rich, Sir William Willoughby was made Lord Willoughby, and Sir Edmund Sheffield was made Lord Sheffield of Butterwick: on the nineteenth of February, the King in great state rode from the Tower to the Pallace of Westminster, where the day following, he was Crowned by the Archbishop of Canterbury, with all rites accustomed, in great solemnity. At which time a generall pardon was Proclaimed for all offenders, six onely excepted, namely the Duke of Norfolke, Cardinall Poole, Edward Courtney eldest sonne to the Marquis of Excetur, Master Fortescue, Master Throgmorton, and Doctor Pates Bishop of Worcester, who was fled to Rome, to avoid taking the oath of Supremacy, all which six continued unpardoned, till the first yeere of Queene Mary, and then were restored. A few dayes after, the Earle of Southampton Lord Chancelour for being contumacious to the rest of the Lords in matters of Counsaile, was removed both from his Office of being Chancelour, and from his place in Counsaile Counsaile, and the great Seale was delivered to Sir William Paulet, Lord Saint-John, and Lord great Master of the Kings Huoshold.

Within two monthes after the death of King Henry, died Francis King of France also, for whom solemne Obsequies were kept in Pauls Church, as hee likewise had kept before at Paris for King Henry: these two Kings were of so consenting natures, that they had certainly been great friends while they lived, if they had not been Kings, and that jelousie of state had not made them oftentimes not to be themselves.

King Henry before his death, had left in charge with the Lords of his Counsaile, by all meanes possible, to procure a proceeding in the mariage with the young Queen of Scots; and now in discharge therof the Lord Protectour himselfe, with an Army of twelve thousand foot, and six thousand horse, besides Labourers and Pioners thirteen hundred, entred Scotland the third of September, at which time also Edward Lord Clinton with a fleet of threescore saile assisted by sea, but before he would doe any hostile Act, he caused Proclamation to be made, that his comming was onely to have performance of the Articles heretofore agreed on for the mariage, tending to the good of both Kingdomes, if they would yeeld unto, he would then returne in peaceable manner, and the more to draw them on, where before it was demanded to have the Queen brought into England, and there to be brought up, the Protectour was content, she should remaine in Scotland till yeers of consent: this demand, the more moderate sort of the Scots accounted very reasonable, but those of the French and Papal faction, who were the greatest persons, and the greatest number strongly opposed; wherupon, the Lord Protectour, presently put his Army into Array, the Lord Gray and Sir Francis Brian, with eight hundred Light-horse, were sent before to provide lodging for the Army, and to give advertisement of the enemies approaches; then followed the Avant-guard, in number between three and foure thousand foot, one hundred men at Armes, and six hundred Light-horse, led by the Earle of Warwick; then followed the maine Battaile, consisting of above six thousand foot, six hundred men at Armes, and one thousand Light-horse led by the Protectour himself lastly followed the Arrear, wherein were between three and foure thousand foot, one hundred men at Armes, and six hundred Light-horse, under the conduct of the Lord Dacres, upon one wing the Artillery was drawne, being sixteen pieces of great Ordinance; the other wing was made by men at Armes and Demilances; for the Avant-guard and halfe the battaile, riding about two flight shoot from their side, the other halfe of the battaile, and the whole flanke of the Arrear was closed by the carraiges, being nine hundred Carts besides Waggons; the rest of the men at Armes, and the Demilances marched behinde. In this order they marched two dayes, taking in three Castles as they went, with little resistance; where it is memorable, what a suddaine device the Defendants of one of them used to save themselves; for finding they were no longer able to defend themselves, and that their obstinacy had excluded all hope of pardon; they made suite, they might not presently be slain, but have some time to commend their soules to God, and afterwards be hanged: which respite being obtained, their pardon afterward did more easily ensue; so much doth the winning of time oftentimes prevaile, more then any other policy. The Governour of Scotland, hearing of the Protectours approch and having no sufficient Army ready to resist him, sent his Heralds abroad, into all parts of the Realm, and commanded the fire-crosse to be carried (an antient custome in cases of importance) which, was two firebrands set in fashion of a crosse, and pitched upon the point of a speare, and therewith Proclamation to be made, that all above sixteen yeers of age, and under sixty, should resort forthwith to Musselborough & bring convenient provision of victuals with them. By this meanes, having gotten a sufficient Army, he set forward towards the English who were now come to a River called Linne, and here the Earle of Warwick being too venterous, was like to have bin entrapped, but by his valour came came off bravely; and now the Scottiſh Horſe-men began to hover about the Engliſh Army, and to come pricking towards them, ſometimes within length of their ſtaves, uſing provoking words, to draw the Engliſh from their ſtrength; but the Protector, not moved with their provocations, maintained a cloſe march till he came to Salt-preſton by the Frith, where he incamped within two miles of the Scottiſh Army: and here the Scots having gotten the advantage of a Hill came upon the Engliſh with the number of twelve hundred Horſe, beſides five hundred foot that lay in ambuſh behind the Hill; at which time the Lord Gray and Sir Francis Brian, impatient of ſuch bravaries, obtained leave of the Gene- to encounter them, and ſo as they came ſcattered upon the ſpurre, within a ſtones caſt of the Engliſh, and were beginning to wheele about, the Lord Gray with ſome troops of Light horſ-men, charged them home, and was forthwith ſeconded by certaine numbers of Demilances, and both of them backed with a thouſand men at Armes; yet the Scots reſolutely maintained the fight three houres and more, but in the end, overlaid with number, they were put to flight and chaſed almoſt to the edge of their Camp. In this fight the chiefeſt force of the Scottiſh Horſ-men was defeated, the Lord Hume, by a fall from his Horſe loſt his life, his ſonne and Heire with two Prieſts and ſix Gentlemen were taken priſoners, and about fifteene hundred ſlaine: the next day, the Protector and the Earle of Warwick, rode towards the place where the Scottiſh Army lay, to view the manner of their incamping. As they returned, an Herauld and a Trumpeter from the Scots overtook them; who having obtained Audience, the Trumpeter ſaid, that the Lord Huntley his Maſter, to ſpare effuſion of Chriſtian blood, would fight upon the whole quarel, either with twenty againſt twenty, or with ten againſt ten, or elſe try it between the Lord Generall and himſelfe: the Protector anſwered, that for number of Combatants, it was not in his power to conclude any bargaine; and as for himſelfe, that being in publick charge, it was not fit he ſhould hazard himſelfe againſt a man of private Conditions, which otherwiſe he would moſt willingly accept: here the Earle of Warwick intreated the Lord Generall, that he might accept the Challenge, and Trumpeter (ſaith he) bring me word, that thy Maſter will performe the Combat with me, and thou ſhalt have an hundred Crownes for thy paines; nay rather (ſaith the Lord Generall) bring me word that thy Maſter will abide and give us battaile, and thou ſhalt have a thouſand Crownes for thy paines: and thereupon, when no other agreement could be made, a generall battaile was reſolved on: in the Army of the Scots, were five or ſix and thirty thouſand men; in the Avant-guard, commanded by the Earle of Angus, about fifteen thouſand; in the Battaile, over whom was the Lord Governour, about ten thouſand; and in the Arreare as many, led by the valiant Gourdon Earle of Huntley; Hackbutters they had none nor men at Armes, but about two thouſand Horſ-men (Prickers as they terme them) the reſt were all on foote well furniſhed with Jack and Scull, pikes, daggers, Bucklers made of boord, and ſlicing ſwords broad and thin; every man had a long Kirchiffe, folded twice or thrice about his neck, and many of them had cheines of Lattin, drawne three or foure times along their hoſes and doublet-ſleeves: they had alſo to affright the enemies Horſes, great rattles covered with parchment or paper, and ſmall ſtones within put upon ſtaves three ells long. And now both Armies joyned in battaile, where a long fight and much variety of fortune on both ſides; at length, the victory fell to the Engliſh: in this fight, divers of the Nobility of Scotland were ſlain; of the inferior ſort about ten, or as ſome ſay, fourteen thouſand: of the Engliſh were ſlain, onely one and fifty Horſe-men and on footmen, but many hurt; the Lord Gray was dangerouſly thruſt with a pike in the mouth which ſtruck two inches into his neck; the Scottiſh priſoners accounted by the Marſhals booke, were about fifteene hundred, the chiefe whereof were, the Earle of Huntley, the Lords Reſter, Hobley and Hamilton, the Maſter of Sanc-Poole and the Lord of Wimmes; the Earle of Huntley being asked whilſt he was

was a priſoner, how he ſtood affected to the marriage; made this anſwer, that he liked the mariage wel enough, but he liked not this kinde of woing. This victory of Muskelborough againſt the Scots, was on the tenth of December, the very ſame day on which thirty yeers before a victory had bin had againſt them at Flodden field; ſo as it ſeems this day was fatall to the Scots, and confirms the opinion of Aſtologers, that there are dayes to ſome men fortunate & unfortunate to others if they could be known. This victory ſtrook ſuch a terror into many of the Scots, that the Earl Bothwel and divers chiefe Gentlemen of Tividale and Meers ſubmitted themſelves to the King of England, and were received by the Prorector into his protection: after this, the Engliſh army took many towns and Caſtles, and then for want of Proviſion, returned into England, having not ſtayed above five and twenty dayes in Scotland, and not loſt above threeſcore men. But notwithſtanding this great overthrow at Muskelborough, the Governour of Scotland would not yet be quiet; but aſſembling the people, made unto them a long Oration, exhorting them to defend the liberty of their Countrie, and not to be daunted with any event of warre. In this mean time many diſtractions and troubles happned in England; partly in matters of Religion, and partly about Incloſures: and firſt for incloſures, the Lord Protector cauſed Proclamation to be ſet forth, commanding they who had Incloſed any Lands, accuſtomed to lye open, ſhould upon a certain pain, before a day aſſigned, lay them open again: and then in matter of Religion, certain Injunctions were ſet forth, for removing of Images out of Churches; and divers Preachers were ſent with Inſtructions to diſſwade the people from praying to Saints or for the dead; from uſe of Beads, Aſhes & Proceſſions; from Maſſes, Durges, praying in any unknown tongue; and for defect of Preachers, Homilies were appointed publickly to be red in Churches: & many for offering to maintaine theſe Ceremonies, were either puniſhed or forced to recant. Edmund Bonner Biſhop of London, was committed to the Fleet, for refuſing to receive theſe Injunctions; Stephen Gardiner Biſhop of Winchester, was likewiſe committed firſt to the Fleet and after to the Tower, for that he had preached; It were well, theſe changes in Religion ſhould be ſtayed untill the King were of yeers to govern by himſelfe: for the like cauſes Tunſtall Biſhop of Durham, Heath Biſhop of Rocheſter, and Day Biſhop of Chicheſter, were in like manner committed to priſon, and all of them diſpoſſeſſed of their Biſhopricks; and that which was worſe, the Biſhopricks themſelves were diſpoſſeſſed of their Revenues, in ſuch ſort, that a very ſmal patt remained to the Biſhops that came after. And now a Parliament was held, in the firſt veer of the King, and by Prorogation in the ſecond; wherein divers Chantries, Colledges, free Chappels, Fraternities and Guildes, with all their Lands and goods were given to the King; which being ſold at a low rate, enriched many and ennobled ſome, and thereby made them firme in maintaining the change: alſo it was then ordered, that no man ſhould ſpeak againſt receiving the Euchariſt in both kindes, and that Biſhops ſhould be placed by Collation of the King under his Letters Patents, without any election preceding, or confirmation inſuing; and that all Proceſſes Eccleſiaſticall ſhould be made in the Kings name, as in Writs at the Common-Law; and that al Perſons exerciſing Eccleſiaſticall juriſdiction, ſhould have the Kings Armes in the Seales of their Office: and further, the Statute of the ſix Articles and other Statutes concerning puniſhment of Lollards were repealed, and the Kings Supremacy over the Church of England was confirmed.

All this while the warres in Scotland continued, and were managed by the Lord Gray of Wilton with variable ſucceſſe; and now about this time was ſent to him in aide, the Earle of Shrewsbury with fifteen thouſand men; againſt him, in aid of the Scots was ſent the Rhinegrave with ten thouſand French; who entring into conſultation, how to remove the yong Queene out of the reach of the Engliſh; provided a Fleet, and ſailing round about Scotland, notwithſtanding the Engliſh Fleet lay in wait to impeach their paſſage, yet conveyed her ſafely into France, being then but ſix yeers old; accompanied in the journey journey with James her base brother, John Erskin and William Levistō; and in April following was married to Francis the Dolphin of France.

You heard before the alterations, now heare the troubles; for when the Injunctions were sent abroad into the Countrey, and Commissioners appointed to see them executed; one Master Bodye a Commissioner, as he was pulling down Images in Cornwall, was suddenly by a Priest stabbed into the body with a knife. Hereupon the people flocked together in divers parts of the sheere, taking Armes, and beginning to commit outrages; and although the chiefe Offendour was hanged and quartered in Smithfield, and many of his complices executed in divers parts of the Realme; and withall a Pardon proclaimed to all that would lay downe Armes, yet neither could that severity, nor this lenity restraine them from their insolencies; but in divers Countries, as Sussex, Hampshire, Kent, Glostershire, Warwickshire, Worstershire, but specially in Semersetshire and Devonshire, great assemblies of people gathered to a head; whose chiefe Leaders were Humfrey Arundel, and about six others of inferiour note, but many Priests. Some of these (we may say) were Commonwealth mutiners; and some mutined for religion: they who were for the Common-wealth could agree upon nothing; some would have no Justices, some no Gentlemen, some no Lawyers, nor ordinary Courts of Justice, but above all Inclosures must down; but whether all, or which, or how to be imployed, none could tell. The religious Mutiners were not altogether so various in their voyces, as having some few amongst them by whom they were guided: these in name of the people hammered up these Arricles following; upon granting of which, they professed that both their bodies and goods should be at the Kings devotion.

1. That Curates should administer Baptisme at all times of necessity, as well on week-dayes as on holy-dayes.
2. That their children might be confirmed by the Bishop.
3. That the Masse might be celebrated, no man communicating with the Priest.
4. That they might have reservation of the Lords body in their Churches.
5. That they might have holy-bread and holy-water in remembrance of Christs precious body and blood. 6. That Priests might live unmarried.
7. That the six Articles set forth by King Henry the eight might be continued, at lest till the King should come to full age.

Upon these demands, the King, although he knew that Reasons would little prevaile with unreasonable men; yet to discharge the place he held, he sent them in writing Answers to them all, and withall a generall pardon, if they would desist and lay downe armes. But the seditious growing the more outragious, the fairer they were intreated; and finding themselves unable to subsist with their owne estates, began to thinke upon the spoyle of Cities; and first they came to Excetour, and demanded entrance, which the Citizens refusing, they fell to set fire on the gates; but the Citizens prevented this, by casting in wood and maintaining the fire, till they had cast up a halfe moone within; upon which when the Seditious attempted to enter, they were presently hewen and cut in peeces. After this they mined the wals, laid powder, and rammed the mouth; but the Citizens prevented this also, by making a countermine, whereinto they poured such plenty of water, that the wet powder could not be fired. All this while, the Lord Russell Lord Privie Seale, who had beene sent downe to suppresse the Commotion, lay at Huntington, expecting more Forces; whilst these Citizens of Excetour, for twelve dayes together endured so great famine, that they were faine to eat horses, and make bread of course bran moulded in cloathes, for that otherwise it would not cleave together. At last the Lord Gray came to the Lord Russell with supply of Forces; who after many conflicts with the Rebels, forced them to raise their siedge at Excetour; and thereby freed the City from many miseries: to whom the King afterward, gave the Mannour of Evyland, in reward for their loyalty. After this, the Rebels rallying their Forces, were againe set upon by the Kings Army, and the greatest part part of them slaine, the rest fled; many were taken and executed by Martiall Law; the chiefe Leaders were sent to London and there executed. The sedition being thus suppressed; it is memorable what sport Sir William Kingston the Provost Marshall made, by vertue of his Office, upon men in misery. One Boyer Major of Godmin in Cornwall, had bin amongst the Rebels, not willingly but enforced; to him the Provost sent word he would come and dine with him, for whom the Major made great provision; a little before dinner, the Provost took the Major aside, and whispered him in the eare, that an execution must that day be done in the town, and therefore required to have a paire of Gallows set up against dinner should be done; the Major failed not of his charge, presently after dinner the Provost taking the Major by the hand, intreated him to lead him to the place where the Gallowes was, which when he beheld he asked the Major if he thought them to be strong enough; yes (said the Major) doubtlesse they are; well then (said the Provost) get you up speedily, for they are provided for you. I hope (answered the Major) you mean not as you speak: in faith (said the Provost) there is no remedy, for you have bin a busie Rebell; and so without respit or defence he was hanged to death:) a most uncurreous part, for a guest to offer his host. Neere the said place dwelled a Millar, who had bin a busie actor in that Rebellion; who fearing the approach of the Marshall, told a sturdy fellow his servant, that he had occasion to go from home, and therefore bid him, that if any man came to enquire after the Millar, he should not speak of him, but say that himselfe was the Millar, and had bin so for three yeers before. So the Provost came and called for the Millar, when out comes the servant, and saith, he was the man: the Provost demanded how long he had kept the Mill; these three yeeres answered the servant: then the Provost commanded his men to lay hold on him, and hang him on the next tree. At this the fellow cryed out, that he was not the Millar but the Millar's man: nay Sir (said the Provost) I will take you at your word, and if thou beest the Millar thou art a busie knave; if thou beest nor, thou art a false lying knave, and howsoever thou canst never do thy Master better service then to hang for him; and so without more adoe he was dispatched.

When this sedition in Devonshire was appeased, there rose another in Norfolke, and that specially upon a grievance for enclosures; the Rebels had got one Robert Ket a Tanner of Wimondham to be their Leader, and were growne to a body of twenty thousand, fearing themselves at Monshold, neer Mount-Surrey, where they carried a face as it were of Justice and Religion; for they had one Conyers an idle fellow to be their Chapleyne, who morning and evening read solemn Prayers, also Sermons they had often, and as for Justice they had a bench under a tree where Ket usually sate, and with him two of every hundred whence their Companies had been raised, to heare complints and to give Judgment, and from hence were warrants sent in the Kings name, to bring in powder, shot, victuals, and all things necessary: which tree hath ever since been called the tree of Reformation; and now being grown to a heighth, they presented certain complaints to the King, requiring, he would send a Herauld to them, to give them satisfaction; the King though he tooke it for a great indignity, to have such base fellowes to capitulate with him, yet framing himselfe to the time, he returned this answer; that in October following he would cal a Parliament wherein their complaints should be heard, and all their grievances should be redressed, requiring them in the meane time, to lay downe Armes and returne to their houses, and therupon granting them a generall pardon: but this was so far from satisfying the seditious, that hereupon first, they assaulted the Town of Norwich tooke it, and made the Major attend them as their servant, and then returned again to their station at Manshold: not long after William Parre Marquesse of Northampton, with the Lord Sheffield, the Lord Wentworth, divers Knights, and fifteen hundred Horse, with a small band of Italians was sent against them; whom the seditious so stoutly opposed, that much mischiefe was done on both sides;

sides, the Lord Sheffield falling with his Horse in a ditch was taken prisoner, and as he pulled off his helmet to shew who he was, he was by a Butcher stricken downe with a club and slaine; so as the Marquesse with his forces not prevailing, there was afterward sent the Earle of Warwick with six thousand foot, and fifteen hundred Horse, with whom were the Lords Willoughby, Powis and Bray his two sonnes Ambrose and Robert, and many Knights and Gentlemen of Name. When the Earl was come neere to the Camp of the seditious, he sent a Herauld to them, offering them the Kings pardon, if they would desist, but they were so far from accepting it, that a lewd Boy turned up his naked breech towards the Herauld and bid him kisse it; upon this, many skirmishes passed between the Earle and them, with losse sometimes to one side, and sometimes to another; at last they came to a Battaile, where the Rebels placed in the Front, all the Gentlemen they had taken prisoners, meaning they should be the first slain, of whom yet very few were hurt, but of the Rebels were slain above two thousand, and now once againe the Earle offered them pardon, if they would desist; but for all their losses, they continued obstinate still, at last the Earle sent to know if they would entertaine their pardon, in case he should come in person and assure them of it; this moved them much, and then they answered, they knew him to be so honourable, that from himself they would embrace it; whereupon the Earle riding to them, and causing their pardon to be read, they threw away their weapons, wishing all joy and prosperity to the King: nine of the principall Rebels were hanged upon the tree of Reformation; Ket himselfe flying away was taken and hanged in chaines upon Norwich Castle; the day of this defeat of the seditious, was a long time after observed for a festivall day by the Inhabitants of Norwich, and thus ended the sedition in Norfolke; when at the same time another arose in Yorkshire, whereof the chiefe movers were William Ombler a Gentleman, Thomas Dale a Parish Clerk, and Stephenson a Post, to whom were assembled foure or five thousand, who tooke their encouragement from a certain Prophesie, which did foretell, that the time should come, when there should be no King, when the Nobility and Gentry should be destroyed, when the Realm should be ruled by foure Governours elected by the Commons, holding a Parliament in commotion, which should begin at the South and North Seas of England, and that time they understood to be the present, and that the Rebels of Devonshire, Norfolke and Yorkshire should draw together to accomplish this prophesie; but as soon as they heard that the tumults of Devonshire and Norfolke were quieted, they found that they were deceived in the understanding of the prophesie, and therupon presently upon the Kings pardon, they fell off and dispersed, their chiefe Leaders Ombler, Dale and foure others were executed at Yorke; and with this, the Spirit of sedition was quite laid in all places of the Kingdome.

But the King of France, taking advantage of these seditions, though he had been in treaty before of peace with England, yet now he brake off the treaty, Proclaimed war, and denounced it by his Embassadour to the King: hereupon all French-men in England, not Denizens, were taken prisoners, and all their goods seized for the King, which the French King understanding, he sent a fleet of Ships to surprise Gernsey and Jarnsey, but was repelled with the losse of a thousand men: after this, he levied an Army by land, and went himselfe in person against Bulloigne, defended by the valiant Sir Nicholas Arnold, but being weary of the worke, he left his Lievtenant Chatillon to pursue the Siedge, who having made many fierce batteries, and at last assaults and not prevailing, hee then attempted to hinder the Towne from supply of victuals; and to this end, charged a Galley with gravell and stones, meaning to sinke it in the Haven, but the English took the Galley before it was sunke, and made use of the stones for their owne defence: after this, they made faggors of light matter, mixed with pitch, tar, tallow, rosin, powder and wild-fire, with intention to fire the ships in the Haven, but that enterprise was defeated by the Bulloignes, and the faggors gors taken from the French; and more then this, there was little done in those parts at this time.

But in England in the meane time, an unfortunate accident happened, which beginning upon a very light occasion, produced afterward very heavy effects; whereof, though there were many concurrant circumstances, yet the originall cause was the pride of a woman, upon a point indeed, wherein the natures of women are commonly most tender, Precedency of place; the Protectour had maried Anne Stanhope, a woman of a haughty stomack, and the Lord Admirall his Brother the Queene Dowager, a Lady of great mildnesse: the neerenesse of the Husbands, gave occasion to the Ladies often meeting, where the Dutchesse would inwardly murmur, why shee being the wife of the elder brother and the better man, should give place to her, who was the wife of the younger brother, and the meaner man; this envy of hers toward the Queen, bred a malice in her towards the Admirall, as thinking the mischiefe she did to the husband, to be a part of revenge upon the wife, and though the Queene shortly after died in Child-bed, yet the mallice of the Dutchesse towards the Admirall lived still; (so hard a thing it is, for malice once setled in a womans heart, to be removed) out of this malice, she put divers surmises into her husband the Protectours head against his brother the Admirall, as though he went about to procure his death, to the end he might aspire to the place he held; but certainly as misliking his government being a Protestant, who was himselfe a Papist; in this case causes of jealousie against the Admirall was obvious enough, for it was knowne that in King Henries time, he had aimed at the mariage of the Lady Elizabeth King Henries second daughter; and now his wife the Queen Dowager being dead (and not without suspition of poyson) he fell upon that mariage a fresh, which could not be thought to tend, but to some very high aspiring end: the Protectour a plain man, and one that had not the cleerest insight into practises; whether too importunately provoked by his wife, or whither out of an honest mind, not willing to patronize faults though in a brother, gave way to accusations brought against him, so as in a Parliament then holden, he was accused, for attempring to get into his custody the person of the King, and government of the Realm, for endeavouring to marry the Lady Elizabeth the Kings sister, for perswading the King in his tender yeers, to take upon him the rule and ordering of himselfe; upon which points (though perhaps proved, yet not sufficiently against him, who was never called to his answere) he was by Act of Parliament condemned, and within few dayes after condemnation, a warrant was sent under the hand of his brother the Protectour to cut off his head; wherein (as after it proved) he did as much, as if he had laid his own head downe upon the block; for whilst these brothers lived and held together, they were as a strong fortresse one to the other; the Admirals courage supporting the Protectours authority, and the Protectours authority maintaining the Admirals stoutnesse; but the Admiral once gone, the Protectours authority as wanting support began to totter, and fell at last to utter ruine: besides there was at this time, amongst the Nobility a kind of faction; Protestants who favoured the Protectour for his owne sake, and other of Papall inclination, who favoured him for his brothers sake, but his brother being gone, both sides forsooke him, even his owne side; as thinking they could expect little assistance from him, who gave no more assistance to his own brother, and perhaps more then all this, the Earl of Warwick at this time, was the most powerfull man both in Courage and Counsaile amongst all the Nobility, and none so neere to match him as the Admirall while he lived, but he being gone, there was none left that either was able and durst, or durst and was able to stand against him: however it was, not long after the Admirals death, the Protectour was invaded with sundry accusations, wherein th' Earl of Warwick made not alwaies the greatest show, but yet had alwayes the greatest hand; one thing the Protectour had done, which though a private act, yet gave a publick distaste. To make him a Mansion house in the Strand (the same which is now called Somerſet-houſe) he pulled downe a Church, and two Biſhops houſes by the Strand Bridge; in digging the foundation wherof, the bones of many who had been there buried, were caſt out and carried into the fields; and becauſe the ſtones of thoſe houſes and the Church ſuffiſed not for his work, the ſteeple and moſt part of the Church of Saint Johns of Jeruſalem neer Smithfield, was mined and overthrowne with powder, and the ſtones applied to this ſparious building; and more then this, the Cloyſter of Pauls on the North ſide of the Church, in a place called Pardon Church-yard, and the dance of Death very curiouſly wrought about the Cloyſter, & a Chapel that ſtood in the midſt of the Churchyard; alſo the Charnal houſe, that ſtood upon the South ſide of Pauls (now a Carpenters yard) with the Chappell, timber and Monuments therin were beaten downe, the bones of the dead caried into Finſbury-fields, and the ſtones converted to this building. This Act of the Protectours, did ſomething alienate the Peoples minds from him; which the Earle of Warwick perceiving thought it now a fit time to be falling upon him; and therupon drew eighteene of the Privy Counſaile to joyne with him, who withdrawing themſelves from the Court, held ſecret conſultations together, and walked in the Citty with many Servants weaponed, and in new Liveries; whereof when the Lord Protectour heard, he ſent ſecretary Peter to them, to know the cauſes of their Aſſembly, requiring them to reſort unto him peaceably, that they might comune together as friends; but in the meane time, hee Armed five hundred men, and removed the King by night from Hampton-court to Windſor: on the other ſide, the Lords at London having firſt taken poſſeſſion of the Tower, ſent for the Major and Aldermen of the Citty, to the Earle of Warwicks lodging at Ely-houſe in Holburn; to whom the Lord Rich then Lord Chancelour made a long Oration wherin he ſhewed the ill government of the Lord Protector, and the many miſchifes that by it were come upon the Kingdome; and therupon requiring them to joyn with the Lords there aſſembled to remove him; and preſently that day, a Proclamation was made in divers parts of the Citty to that purpoſe; to which the Lords and Counſailors that ſubſcribed their names were theſe; the Lord Rich Chancelour, the Lord Saint-John Lord great Maſter, the Marqueſſe of Northampton, the Earle of Warwick Lord great Chamberlaine, the Earle of Arundell Lord Chamberlaine, the Earle of Shrewſbury, the Earle of Southampton, Sir Thomas Cheyney Treaſurer of the Houſhold, Sir John Gage Conſtaple of the Tower, Sir William Peter ſecretary, Sir Edward North Knight, Sir Edward Montague chiefe Juſtice of the Common-pleas, Sir John Baker Chancelour of the Exchequer, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Edward Wootton, Sir Richard Southwell Knights: and Doctor Wootton Deane of Canterbury. In the afternoone of the ſame day, the Lord Major aſſembled a Common Counſaile in the Guild-hall where two letters arrived almoſt in one inſtant from the King and the Lord Protectour, for a thouſand men to be Armed for defence of the Kings Perſon; another from the Lords at London for two thouſand men to aide them in defence of the Kings perſon alſo; both pretending alike, and therefore hard how to pleaſe them both. The Recorder ſet forth the complaint of the Lords againſt the Protectour, in ſuch ſort, that he made many inclinable to favour that ſide, but one named George Stadlow better adviſed, ſtept up, and in a long Speech ſhewed, what miſchiefes had come to the City by oppoſing the King; and therefore gave his opinion to ſuſpend giving aide to the Lords, at leſt for a time. His advice was harkened to, and thereupon the Court reſolved onely to arme a hundred Horſemen and foure hundred foot, in defence of the City; and to the letters, returned ſubmiſſive but dilatory anſwers. After ſome other paſſages betweene the Protectour and the Lords, Sir Edward Winkfield Captaine of the Guard, was ſent from the Lords to Windſor; who ſo well perſwaded the King of the Lords loyall affection towards him, and of their moderate intention towards the Protectour, that the King was contented to have him preſently remoued from him, and ſuffered him within two dayes after ter to be carried to the Tower. In whoſe abſence, ſeven Lords of the Councell and foure Knights were appointed by turnes to attend the Kings perſon, and for affaires of State, the government of them was referred to the whole body of the Councell: ſoone after were ſent to the Protectour in the Tower, certain Lords of the Councell, with Articles againſt him, requiring his preſent Anſwer, whether he would acknowledge them to be true, or elſe ſtand upon his juſtification. The chiefe Article was this; That he tooke upon him the Office of Protectour, with expreſſe condition, that he ſhould doe nothing in the Kings affaires, but by aſſent of the late Kings Executours, or the greateſt part of them; and that contrary to this condition, he had hindered Juſtice, and ſubverted laws of his owne authority, as well by letters as by other command; and many other Articles, but all much to this purpoſe. The Protectour, whether thinking to ſpeed better by ſubmiſſion then by conteſting; or perhaps finding himſelfe not altogether innocent, (for indeed in ſo great a place, who can beare himſelfe with ſuch ſincerity, but he will commit errours, with which he may be taxed;) ſubſcribed an acknowledgement with his owne hand; humbly ſubmitting himſelfe to the Kings mercy, and deſiring their Lordſhips favour towards him. Upon this ſubmiſſion, three moneths after he had bin impriſoned, he was releaſed, entertained and feaſted by the King, and ſworne again to be a Privie Councellour, but no more Protectour: at which time, betweene him and the Lords, a ſhew at leſt of perfect amity was made; and to make it the more firme, the Dukes daughter was afterward married to the Lord Liſle, Sonne and heire to the Earle of Warwicke; at which marriage the King himſelfe was preſent; and perhaps to honour their reconcilement and this marriage, the Earle of Warwicke was made Lord Admirall of England, Sir John Ruſſell Lord Privie Seale was created Earle of Bedford, the Lord Saint-John was created Earle of Wiltſhire, and ſoone after made Lord Treaſurour, Sir William Paget Controlour of the Kings Houſe, was made Lord Paget, Sir Anthony Winkfield Captaine of the Guard, was made Controlour, and Sir Thomas Darcye was made Captaine of the Guard. But of the other ſide, the Earle of Arundell, the Earle of Southampton, were put off from the Councell; of whom, the Earle of Southampton dyed ſhortly after at Lincolne-Place in Holborne, and was buried in Saint Andrewes Church there.

About this time a Parliament was held at Weſtminſter, wherein one Act was made againſt ſpreading of Propheſies; another againſt unlawfull Aſſemblies: but for feare of new tumults, the Parliament was untimely Diſſolved, and Gentlemen were commanded to retyre to their Countrey-habitations; and for the ſame cauſe alſo Trinity Terme did not hold.

About this time alſo, Pope Paul the third dyed; after whoſe death the Cardinals being divided about the election of a new Pope; the Imperial part, which was the greateſt, gave their voyces for Cardinall Poole; which being told him, he diſabled himſelfe, and wiſhed them to chooſe one that might be moſt for the glory of God, and good of the Church: upon this ſtop, ſome that were no friends to Poole, and perhaps looked for the place themſelves, if he were put off, laid many things to his charge; amongſt other, that he was not without ſuſpition of Lutheriſme, as having bin very converſant with Immanuell Tremellius and Anthonius Flaminius, great Lutherans, and not altogether without blemiſh of incontinency; there being a young Nunne that was thought to be his daughter. But of theſe criminations Poole ſo cleered himſelfe, that he was afterward more importuned to take the place then he was before; and thereupon one night the Cardinals came unto him, being in bed; and ſent him word they came to adore him (which is one ſpecial kind of electing the Pope) but he being awaked out of his ſleepe, and acquainted with it, made anſwer, that this was not a worke of darkeneſſe, and therefore required them to forbeare till the next day, and then to doe as God ſhould put in their mindes. But the Italian Cardinals attributing this putting off, to a kinde of ſtupidity and ſloth in Poole; looked

no more after him, but the next day chose Cardinall Montanus Pope, who was afterward named Julius the third.

And now the King of France, upon many just considerations, was growne desirous to have a Peace with England; and thereupon sent one Guidotti a Florentine into England, to make some overture of his desire to the Lords of the Councell; who addressing himselfe to the Earle of Warwicke, whom he knew to be most prevalent; so prevailed, that it was concluded foure Embassadours should be sent from the King of England into France, and foure from the French King, to treat with them. The Commissioners for the English were John Earl of Bedford, William Lord Paget, Sir William Peter and Sir John Mason, Secretaries of State. For the French were Monsieur Rochpot, Monsieur Chatillon, Guillart de Martyer and Rochetelle de Dasse: much time was spent to agree about a place of meeting; till at last the English to satisfie the French, were contented it should be before Bulloigne; where were many meetings and many differences about conditions; but in conclusion, a Peace was concluded upon certaine Articles; the chiefe whereof was, that Bulloigne and the places adjacent should be delivered up to the French within six weekes after the Peace Proclaimed; and that the French should pay for the same two hundred thousand crownes, within three dayes after delivery of the Towne; and other two hundred thousand crowes upon the fifth day of August following: hostages were on both sides given for performance; and to those Articles the French King was sworne at Amyens, and the King of England in London: the Lord Clinton who had been Deputy of Bulloigne was made Lord Admirall of England.

Presently after this Agreement, the Duke of Brunswicke sent to the King of England, to offer his service in the Kings wars, with ten thousand men, and to intreat a marriage with the Lady Mary, the Kings eldest sister. To his offer of aide, answer was made, that the Kings warres were ended; and touching the marriage with the Lady Mary, that the King was in speech for her marriage with the Infanta of Portugall, which if it succeeded not, he should then be favourably heard. Upon this, the Emperours Embassadour demanded of the King, that the Lady Mary might have free exercise of the Masse, which the King not onely constantly denied, but thereupon Sermons were exercised at Court, and order taken, that no man should have any Benefice from the King, but first he should Preach before him; and shortly after, under pretence of preparing for Sea-matters, five thousand pounds were sent to relieve Protestants beyond the Seas. At this time also, an Embassadour came from Gustavus King of Sweden, to enter league with the King for entercourse of Merchants; and charge was then also given, that the Lawes of England should be administred in Ireland.

About this time the Queene Dowager of Scotland, going from France to her Countrey, passed thorow England, having first obtained a safe Conduct, she arrived at Portesmouth, and was there met by divers of the English Nobility; conducted to London, she was lodged in the Bishops-Pallace: after foure dayes staying, having beene feasted by the King at whitehall, she departed; being waited on by the Sheriffes of Counries to the borders of Scotland. And now was one Steward a Scot apprehended in England, and imprisoned in the Tower, for intending to poyson the yong Queene of Scots, whom the King delivered to the French King upon the frontiers of Callice, to be by him justiced at his pleasure.

At this time certaine ships were appointed by the Emperour, to transport the Lady Mary either by violence or by stelth out of England to Antwerpe; whereupon Sir John Gates was sent with Forces into Essex, where the Lady lay; and besides, the Duke of Somerset was sent with two hundred men, the Lord Privie Seale with other two hundred, and Master Sentleger with foure hundred more, to severall coasts upon the Sea, and the Lord Chancellour and Secretary Peter were sent to the Lady Mary; who after some conference, brought brought her to the Lord Chancellours house at Lyee in Essex, and from thence to the King at Westminster. Here the Councell declared unto her, how long the King had permitted her the use of the Masse, and considering her obstinacy, was resolved now no longer to permit it, unlesse she would put him in hope of some conformity in short time. To which she answered, that her soule was Gods; and touching her faith, as she could not change, so she would not dissemble it. Reply was made, that the King intended not to constraine her faith, but to restrain the outward profession of it, in regard of the danger the example might draw. After some like enterchange of speeches, the Lady was appointed to remain with the King, when there arived an Embassadour from the Emperor, with a threatning message of warre, in case his cousin the Lady Mary, should be denied the free exercise of the Masse: hereupon the King presently advised with the Archbishop of Canterbury, and with the Bishop of London and Rochester, who gave their opinion, that to give licence to sin was sin, but to connive at sinne might be allowed so it were not too long, nor without hope of reformation: then answere was given to the Embassadour, that the King would send to the Emperour within a month or two, and give him such satisfaction as should be fit.

And now the King being uncertaine of the faith, both of his Subjects and of his Confederates, intended by alliance to strengthen himselfe; and thereupon sent one Bartwicke, to the King of Denmarke with private instructions, to treat of a mariage, betweene the Lady Elizabeth the Kings youngest sister, and the King of Denmarks eldest son; but when it came to the point, this Lady could not be induced to entertaine mariage with any.

After this, the Marquesse of Northampton was sent Embassadour to the French King, as well to present him with the Order of the Garter, as to treat with him of other secret affaires: with him were joyned in Commission the Bishop of Elye, Sir Philip Hobbie, Sir William Pickering, Sir John Mason, and Master Smith Secritary of State; also the Earle of Worcester, Rutland, and Ormond were appointed to accompany them; as likewise the Lords Lisle, Fitzwater, Bray, Aburgavenie and Evers, with other Knights and Gentlemen of note, to the number of six and twenty; and for avoiding of immoderate traine, order was given that every Earle should have but foure attendants, every Baron but three, every Knight and Gentleman but two, onely the Commissioners were not limited to any number. Being come to the Court of France, they were forthwith brought to the King, being then in his Bedchamber; to whom the Marquesse presented the Order of the Garter, wherewith he was presently invested: then the Bishop of Elye in a short Speech, declared, how the King of England, out of his love and desire of amitye, had sent this Order to his Majestie; desiring with all, that some persons might be authorized to treat with them, about some other matters of importance; whereupon a Commission went forth to the Cardinall of Lorraigne, Chastillion the Constable, the Duke of Guyse, and others. At the first, the English demanded, that the yong Queene of Scots might be sent into England for perfecting of marriage betweene King Edward and her. But to this the French answered, That conclusion had beene made long before for her marriage with the Dolphin of France. Then the English proposed a marriage betweene King Edward and the Lady Elizabeth the French Kings eldest daughter: to this the French did cheerfully incline; but when they came to talke of Portion, the English demanded at first fifteen hundred thousand crownes, then fell to foureteene, and at last to eight hundred thousand: the French offered at first, one hundred thousand crownes, then rose to two hundred thousand, and higher they would not be drawne; saying, it was more then ever had bin given with a daughter of France. Shortly after Monsieur the Marshall and other Commissioners were sent by the French King, to deliver to the King of England the Order of Saint Michael; and then was further treaty about the marriage; and because the French could be served no higher then two hundred thousand crownes, it was at last accepted, and the agreement was reduced into writing, and delivered under Seale on both sides.

And now King Edward supposing his state to be most safe, when indeed it was most unsure; in testimony both of his joy and love, advanced many to new titles of honour; the Lord Marquesse Dorset, who had maried the eldest daughter of Charles Brandon was created Duke of Suffolke, the Earle of Warwicke Duke of Northumberland, the Earle of Wiltshire was created Marquesse of Winchester, Sir William Herbert Lord of Cardisse and Master of the Horse, was created Earle of Pembrooke; also William Cecill the Kings Secretary, John Cheeke one of his Schoolmasters, Henry Dudley and Henry Nevill were made Knights, and (that which perhaps it had bin happy, if it had never bin) Sir Robert Dudley one of the Duke of Northumberlands sons (the same who was afterward the great Earle of Leicester) was sworne one of the six ordinary Gentlemen of the Kings Chamber; for after his comming into a place so neere about him, the King enjoyed his health but a while.

The aspiring thoughts of the Duke of Northumberland, were now growne up to be put in execution: He was advanced in title of honour equall with the highest; in authority and power above the highest; he had placed his politicke Sonne neere about the Kings person; the next thing was to remove the Duke of Somerset out of the way; and for this also he had prepared instruments; Sir Thomas Palmer, Crane, Hamond, Cecill, and others; who brought severall accusations against the Duke; some trenching upon the King and Kingdome, but one specially against the Duke of Northumberlands person; whose practises when the Duke of Somerset found, and had cause to feare; he went one day Armed into the Duke of Northumberlands Chamber, with a purpose to kill him; but finding him in his bed, and being received with much kinde complement by him, his heart relented, and thereupon came away without any thing done: at his comming out, one of his company asked him if he had done the deed? who answered, No: then said he, you are your selfe undone: and indeed it so fell out; for when all other Accusations were refelled, this onely stucke by him, and could not be denyed; and so on the first of December he was arraigned at Westminster; where the Lord William Paulet Marquesse of Winchester and Lord Treasurour, sat as high Steward of England, and with him Peeres to the number of seven and twenty; the Dukes of Suffolke and Northumberland, the Marquesse of Northampton, the Earles of Derby, Bedford, Huntington, Rutland, Bathe, Sussex, Worcester, Pembrooke and Hertford; the Barons, Aburgavenny, Audeley, Wharton, Evers, Latymer, Borough, Zouch, Stafford, Wentworth, Darcye, Sturton, Windsor, Cromwell, Cobham and Bray. The Lords being set, the Inditements were read, in number five, containing a charge, for raising men in the North parts of the Realme; and at his house, for assembling men to kill the Duke of Northumberland; for resisting his Attachment, for raising London, for assaulting the Lords, and devising their deaths. To all which he pleaded, Not guilty, and made a satisfactory Answer to every point, though the Kings learned Councell prest them hard against him. This done, the Lords went together, where exception was taken by some, as a thing unfit, that the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquesse of Northampton, and the Earle of Pembrooke should be of the Jurie; seeing the prisoner was chiefely charged with practises against them. But to this, the Lawyers made answer, that a Peere of the Realm might not be challenged; so after much variation of opinions, the prisoner was acquit of Treason, but by most voyces found guilty of Felony; and that by a Statute, lately by his owne procurement made; That if any should attempt to kill a Privie Councellour, although the Fact were not done, yet it should be Felonie, and be punished with death. But upon his being acquit of Treason, the Axe of the Tower was presently laid downe, which made people conceive he had beene acquitted of all; who thereupon for joy, gave so great a shout, shout, that it was heard as farre as Charing-Crosse: but the Duke was little the better for being acquitted of Treason, seeing he was found guilty of Felonie; and had Judgement to dye. It is thought by some, he might have saved his life, if he had demanded his Clergie; but it is rather thought, that in that Statute Clergie was denied. Two moneths after his condemnation; (much against the Kings will) Hee was brought to the Tower-Hill to execution; where being ascended the Scaffold, hee entred into a Speech, wherein though he justified himselfe, for any matter tending to the hurt of the King or Kingdome; yet he confessed, he was justly by the Law brought to this death; and thanked God, that had given him so large a time of repentance, specially that he had opened his eyes, to see cleerely the light of the Gospell; and going on in his Speech, a sudden noyse arose, of some crying, away, away; which made some thinke a Pardon had beene come; but was indeede the voyce of some that had beene warned to be at the Execution, and were come somewhat late: but the tumult being appeased, the Duke went on with his Speech, and at last commending his soule to God, with a countenance not shewing a signe of feare or perturbation, onely his cheekes a little redder then they use to be; he peaceably laid downe his head upon the blocke, and in a moment with one stroke of the Axe, had it strucken off. The death of this Duke, made the Duke of Northumberland more odious to the people then he was before; and there were some that dipped Handkerchiffes in his blood, and kept them to upbraide the Duke of Northumberland withall, when he came himselfe afterward to the like end. After execution of the Duke, Sir Ralph Vane and Sir Miles Partridge were hanged at the Tower-hill, Sir Michael Stanhope and Sir Thomas Arundell were there beheaded.

After the Dukes condemnation, it was thought fit to have something done for averting the Kings minde, from taking thought; and to that end, one George Ferrers, a Gentleman of Lincolnes-Inne, was appointed in the Christmas-time, to be Lord of Misrule; who so carried himselfe, that he gave great delight to many, and some to the King, but not in proportion to his heavinesse.

About this time was a call of seven Serjeants at Law, who kept their Feast at Grayes-Inne; of whom, Master Robert Brooke Recorder of London, was the first; and the next Master Dyer, who was chosen Speaker the next Parliament.

About this time also, the Lord Paget was committed to the Tower, for what cause is not certaine; and being a Knight of the Order, his Garder was taken from him by Garter king at Armes, upon this pretence, that he was said to be no Gentleman, either by Father or Mother; and the Garter was then bestowed on the Earle of Warwicke, the Duke of Northumberlands eldest Sonne, and the Lord Rich Lord Chancellour, was put off from his Place, and the Seal then delivered to Doctor Thomas Goodricke Bishop of Ely.

About this time also three great Ships were set forth at the Kings charge, for discovery of a passage to the East Indies by the North Seas; the chiefe Pilot and director in this Voyage, was one Sebastian Gabato an Englishman, borne at Bristow, but the son of a Genoway: these Ships at the last arrived in the Countrey of Muscovia, but not without losse of their Captain Sir Hugh Willoughby, who being tossed and driven by tempest, was afterward found in his Ship frozen to death, and all his people.

At this time also the Duke of Suffolks three Daughters, which he had by Frances, Daughter of Charles Brandon and Mary Queene of France, were married at Durham-House; the eldest Jane to the Lord Guildford Dudley, fourth Soone of the Duke of Northumberland: the second Katherine, to Henry Sonne and heire to the Earle of Pembrooke; the youngest Mary, being somwhat deformed, to Martyn Keyes the Kings Gentleman-Porter. And then also Katherine Katherine the Duke of Northumberlands yongeſt daughter, to the Lord Haſtings, eldeſt ſonne of the Earle of Huntington. And now had the Duke of Northumberland gone a great way in his deſign; it remained to perſwade King Edward to exclude his two ſiſters from ſucceſſion in the Crowne; for that done, his daughter in law the Lady Jane, would come to have a right; for as for pretenders out of Scotland, or any other, he made no great matter. And now to worke the King to this perſwaſion, (being in a languiſhing ſickneſſe, not farre from death) he inculcates to him, how much it concerned him to have a care of Religion, that it might be preſerved in purity, not onely in his owne life, but as well after his death; which would not be, if his ſiſter the Lady Mary ſhould ſucceed, and ſhe could not be put by unleſſe her other ſiſter the Lady Elizabeth were put by alſo, ſeeing their rights depended one upon another; but if he pleaſed to appoint the Lady Jane, the Duke of Suffolkes eldeſt daughter, and his owne next kinſwoman to his Siſters, to be his ſucceſſour, he might then be ſure that the true Religion ſhould be maintained, to Gods great glory, and be a worthy Act of his owne religious Providence. This was to ſtrike upon the right ſtring of the yong Kings affection, with whom nothing was ſo deere as preſervation of Religion; and thereupon his laſt Will was appointed to be drawne (contrived chiefly by the Lord chiefe Juſtice Montague, and Secretary Cecill:) by which Will, as farre as in him lay, he excluded his two ſiſters from the ſucceſſion, and all other, but the Duke of Suffolkes daughters; and then cauſing it to be read before his Councell, he required them all to aſſent unto it, and to ſubſcribe their hands; which they all, both Nobility, and Biſhops and Judges did; onely the Archbiſhop Cranmer refuſed at firſt, Sir James Hales a Judge of the Common-Pleas to the laſt, and with him alſo Sir John Baker Chancellour of the Exchequer. And now remained nothing for the Duke of Northumberlands purpoſe, but that the King ſhould dye; which ſoone after he did at Greenwich the ſixth of July, in the yeere 1553. One point of the Dukes policie muſt not be forgotten, that fearing what troubles the Lady Mary might raiſe after the Kings deceaſe, if ſhe ſhould be at liberty; he therefore, ſeeing the King drawing on, uſed all meanes poſſible to get her within his power; to which end Letters are directed to her in the Kings name from the Councell, willing her forthwith to repaire to the King, as well to be a comfort to him in his ſickneſſe, as to ſee all matters well ordered about his perſon: whereupon, the Lady ſuſpecting nothing, addreſſed her ſelfe with all ſpeed to the journey; till being upon the way, ſhe was advertiſed of the Dukes deſigne; and then ſhe returned to her Houſe at Hoxeden, and ſo eſcaped the ſnare; by whoſe eſcape, the whole deſigne of the Duke of Northumberland was diſappointed; as ſoone after will be ſeene.

Of his Taxations.

IN no Kings reigne was ever more Parliaments for the time, nor fewer Subſidies; the greateſt was in his laſt yeere, when yet there was but one Subſidie, with two fifteenes and tenths granted by the Temporalty, and a Subſide by the Clergie. And indeed to ſhew how loath this King was to lay Impoſitions upon his people, this may be a ſufficient argument; that though he were much in debt, yet he choſe rather to deale with the Foulker in the Low-Countries for money upon loane, at the intereſt of fourteene pounds for a hundred, for a yeere. But his waves for raiſing of money, was by ſelling of Chantrie Lands and Houſes, given him by Parliament; and by inquiring after all Church-goods, either remaining in Cathedrall and Pariſh-Churches, or embezeled away, as Jewels, gold and ſilver, Chalices, ready money, Copes, and other Veſtments; reſerving to every Church one Challice, and one covering for the Communion-Table, the reſt to be applied to his benefit. He alſo raiſed money by enquiring after offences of Officers in great places; in which inquirie, one Beaumont Maſter of the Rolles, being convinced of many crimes, ſurrendred all his Offices, Lands and Goods into the Kings hands: alſo one Whalley Receiver of Yorkeſhire, being found a delinquent, ſurrendred his Office, and payed a great fine beſides: alſo the Lord Paget, Chancellour of the Dutchie, convinced, that he had ſold the Kings Lands and Timber-woods without Commiſſion, and had applied the Kings Fines to his owne uſe; for theſe and other offences, ſurrendred his Office, and was fined at foure thouſand pounds, which he payed in hand. One thing more was done in his time for raiſing of money; twenty thouſand pounds weight of Bullion, was appointed to be made ſo much baſer, that the King might gaine thereby a hundred and forty thouſand pounds.

Of his Lawes and Ordinances.

IN his third yeere a Parliament was holden; wherein one Act was made againſt ſpreading of Propheſies; another againſt unlawfull Aſſemblies. In his fourth yeere a Parliament was holden, wherein Prieſts certaine children were made legitimate; and uſury for the loane of money was forbidden. In his fifth yeer, it was ordained that the Lawes of England ſhould be adminiſtred in Ireland; and a king at Armes named Vlſter, was newly inſtituted for Ireland; whoſe Province was all Ireland; and he was the firſt fourth king of Armes, and firſt Herauld appointed for Ireland. Alſo in his fifth yeere, baſe monies formerly coyned, were cried downe; ſo as the ſhilling went but for nine pence, and ſhortly after but for ſix pence, the groat but for three pence, and ſhortly after but for two pence.

Affaires of the Church in his time.

IN the firſt yeere of this Kings reigne, Injunctions were ſet forth, for pulling downe and removing all Images out of Churches; alſo certaine Homilies were appointed to be made by learned men, to be read in Churches, for the peoples inſtruction: and at Eaſter this yeer, it was ordered, that the Sacrament of the Lords Supper ſhould be miniſtred to the Lay-people in both kindes; alſo Marriage was allowed to Clergie men; Auricular Confeſſion and prayer for the dead were forbidden: and it is obſervable, that the very ſame day that Images were pulled downe at London, the great overthrow was given to the Scots at Muſkleborough. Alſo at this time, by the Archbiſhop Cranmers means, divers learned Proteſtants came over into England, and had here entertainment, as Peter Martyr, Martin Bucer, and Paulus Fagius; of whom Peter Martyr was ſent to read a Divinity Lecture in Oxford, Bucer and Fagius in Cambridge. In this Kings fourth yeer, all Altars in Churches were commanded to be taken downe, and Tables placed in their roomes. In his fifth yeer the Book of Common Prayer was eſtabliſhed.

Caſualties happening in his time.

IN his ſecond yeere, Saint Annes Church within Aldeſgate was burnt. In his fifth yeere, a ſweating ſickneſſe infeſted firſt Shrewesbury, and then the north parts, and after grew moſt extreame in London, ſo as the firſt weeke there dyed eight hundred perſons, and was ſo violent that it tooke men away in foure and twenty houres, ſometimes in twelve, and ſometimes in leſſe: amongſt other of account that dyed of this ſickneſſe, were the two ſonnes of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke, who dyed within an houre after one another, in ſuch order that both of them dyed Dukes. This diſeaſe was proper to the Engliſh Nation, for it followed the Engliſh whereſoever they were in foraigne parts; but ſeized upon none of any other Countrey. In this yeere, one Maſter Arden of Kent

Kent, by procurement of his wife was murthered in his owne house; being dead, his body was carried out and laid upon the ground, in a close hard by; where this is memorable, that for two yeers after, the ground where his body lay, bore no grasse, but represented still as it were a picture of his body, onely in the space between his legges and armes there grew grasse, but where any part of his body touched, none at all. Yet this miraculous accident was not so much for the murther, as for the curses of a widow-woman, out of whose hands the said Master Arden had uncharitably bought the said close, to her undoing. And thus the divine justice even in this world oftentimes works miracles upon offenders, for a mercifull warning to men, if they would be so wise to take it. In his sixth yeer, the third of August, at Middleton-stony, eleven miles from Oxford, a woman brought forth a childe which had two perfect bodies from the navill upward, the legges for both the bodies grew out at the midst where the bodies joyned, and had but one issue for the excrements of them both: they lived eighteen dayes, and were women children. This yeere also were taken at Quinborow three Dolphins, and at Black-Wall six more, the least of which was bigger then any horse.

Works of Piety by him or other in his time.

THis King gave three houses to the reliefe of the poor; first for the fatherlesse and beggers children, he gave the late Gray-Fryers in London, which is now called Christs Hospitall: then for lame and diseased persons he gave the Hospitall of Saint Thomas in Southwarke, and Saint Barthalomews in west Smithfield: Thirdly, for riotous and idle persons, he gave his house of Bridewell; and for their maintenance, he took six hundred pounds a yeer land from the house of the Savoy (which had been long abused) and bestowed it upon these houses; to which he added four thousand marks a yeer more. By his example Sir William Chester Alderman of London, and John Calthroppe Draper, at their owne costs made the Brickwalls and way on the backside that leadeth to the Hospitall of Saint Barthalomews; and also covered and vawted the Towne Ditch, which before was very noysome. In the second yeer of this King, Sir John Gresham then Major of London, founded a free Schoole at Host in Norfolke; also at his decease, he gave to every Ward in London ten pounds, to be distributed amongst the poor, and to maids marriages two hundred pounds. In his third yeer, Sir Rowland Hill the then Lord Major of London, caused to be made a Cawsway commonly called Overlane pavement, in the high way from Stone to Nantwich, in length four miles, for the ease of horse and man. He caused also a Cawsway to be made from Dunchurch to Branson in Warwickshiere, more then two miles in length; and gave twenty pounds towards the making of Roitton Bridge three miles from Coventry. He made likewise the high way to Kilborne neere to Louden. Also four Bridges, two of them of stone, containing eighteen arches in them both; the one over the River of Severne called Acham Bridge, the other Terne Bridge; and two other of Timber at Stoke, where he built also a good part of the Church. A free Schoole likewise he builded at Drayton in Shropshiere, with Master and Usher, and gave sufficient stipends to them both. Also he purchased a free fair to the said Towne, with a free Market weekly; and every fourteen dayes a free Market for cattell. Besides all this, he gave to the Hospitall of Christ-Church in London in his life time, five hundred pounds, and at his death, a hundred. In this Kings fourth yeer, Sir Andrew Jud Major of London, founded a notable free Schoole at Tunbridge in Kent; he builded also an Almshouse for six poor people, nigh to the Parish Church of Saint Helens in Bishopsgate-streete; and gave threescore pounds land a yeer to the Skinners of London, for which he bound to pay twenty pounds to the Schoolemaster, and eight pounds to the Usher of his free Schoole at Tunbridge yeerly for ever; and four shillings weekely to the six poor Almspeople, and and something more yeerly. In his sixth yeer, Sir George Barnes Major of London, gave a Windmill in Finsbury-field to the Haberdashers of London, the profits thereof to be destributed to the poor of that Company; also to Saint Bartholomews the little, certaine Tenements to the like use.

Of his personage and conditions.

COncerning his personage, it is said, he was in body beautifull, of a sweete aspect, and specially in his eyes, which seemed to have a starry livelinesse and lustre in them. Concerning his conditions, in matter of fact, there is not much to be said; but in matter of disposition and inclination very much, even to admiration. For though his tree was not yet come to the maturity of bearing fruit, yet it was come to the forwardnesse to bear plenty of buds and blossomes. For proofe of his mercifull disposition this one example may be sufficient; when one Joan Butcher was to be burned for blasphemy and heresie, all the Counsell could not get him to signe the Warrant, till the Archbishop Cranmer with much importunity perswaded him, and then he did it, but not without weeping. For his pregnancy of wit, and knowledge in all kindes of learning; we shall need but to hear what Cardan (who coming into England, had often conference with him) reporteth of him: that he was extraordinarily skilfull in Languages, and in the Politicks; well seen in Philosophy and in Divinity, and generally indeed a very miracle of Art and Nature. He would answer Embassadours somerimes upon the suddaine, either in French or Latine; he knew the stare of forraigne Princes perfectly, and his own more. He could call all Gentlemen of account through his Kingdome by their names; and all this when he had scarce yet attained to the age of fifteene yeers, and died before sixteene; that from hence we may gather, it is a signe of no long life, when the faculties of the minde are ripe so early.

Of his death and buriall.

IN the sixth yeer of his reigne, which was the yeer before he died, he fel sick of the Measels, and being well recovered of them, he fell after soon into the smal Pox, & of them also was so well recovered, that the summer following he rode a progresse, with a greater magnificence then ever he had done before; having in his traine no fewer then four thousand horse. In January following, (whether procured by sinister practise, or growing upon him by naturall infirmity) he fell into an indisposition of body, which soon after grew to a cough of the Lungs. Whereupon a rumour was spread abroad by some, that a Nosegay had been given him at Newyeerstide, which brought him into this slow but deadly consumption; by others that it was done by a Glister: how ever it was, he was brought at last to so great extremity, that his Physicians despared of his life; and when Physicians could do him no good, a Gentlewoman (thought to be prepared for the purpose) tooke him in hand, and did him hurt; for with her applications his legges swelled, his pulse failed, his skinne changed colour, and many other symptomes of approaching death appeared. The hour before his death, he was overheard to pray thus by himselfe, O Lord God, deliver me out of this miserable and wretched life; O Lord, thou knowest how happy it were for me to be with thee; yet for thy chosens sake, if it be thy will send me life and health that I may truly serve thee: O Lord God, save thy chosen people of England, and defend this Realme from Papistrie, and maintaine thy true Religion, that I and my People may praise thy holy Name, for thy Sonne Jesus Christs sake. So turning his face and seeing some by him, he said; I thought you had not been so nigh: Yes, said Doctor Owens we heard you speak to your selfe; then said the King, I was praying to God: O, I am faint; Lord have mercy upon me, and receive my spirit; and in so saying gave up the Ghost, the sixth day day of July, in the yeer 1553. and in the sixteenth yeer of his Age when he had reigned six yeers, five moneths, and nine dayes. It is noted by some, that he died the same moneth, and the same day of the moneth that his father King Henry the eight had put Sir Thomas Moore to death. His body was buried upon the ninth of August in the Chappell of Saint Peters Church in Westminster; and laid neere to the body of King Henry the seventh his grandfather. At his funerall which was on the tenth of August following, his sister Queen Mary shewed this respect to him, that though Doctor Day a Popish Bishop preached, yet all the service with a communion was in English.

Men of note in his time.

THis Kings reigne being short, and having but small warres, had not many sword-men famous for any acts they did; Gowne men there were some, as Edward Holl a Councellour in the Law, who wrote a notable Cronicle of the union of the two houses of Yorke and Lancaster; William Hugh a Yorkeshire-man, who wrote a notable Treatice called The troubled mans medicine; Thomas Sternehold, borne in Southampton, who turned into English Meeter seven and thirty of Davids Psalmes.

The Interregnum betweene the death of King Edward and the proclaiming at London of Queene Mary.

KIng Edward being dead, the Duke of Northumberland tooke upon him to sit at the Sterne, and ordered all things at his pleasure: so two dayes after he with others of the Councell, sent to the Lord Major that he with six Aldermen and twelve principall Commons, should repaire presently to the Court; to whom when they came, it was secretly signified that King Edward was dead; and that by his last Will, to which all the Nobility and Judges had given assent, he had appointed the Lady Jane, daughter to the Duke of Suffolke, to succeede him; his Letters Patents whereof were shewed them, and thereupon they were required, to take their Oathes of Allegeance to the Lady Jane, and to secure the City in her behalfe; which whether dissemblingly, or sincerely; whether for love or fear, yet they did, and then departed. The next day the Lady Jane in great state, was brought to the Tower of London, and there declared Queene; and by edict with the sound of Trumpet proclaimed so through London; at which time, for some words seeming to be spoken against it, one Gilbert Pot a Vintners servant, was set in the Pilory, and lost both his ears. Before this time, the Lady Mary having heard of her brothers death, and of the Duke of Northumberlands designes; removed from Hoxedon to her Mannour of Kenninghall in Norfolke, and under pretence of fearing infection, (having lately lost one of her household servants of the plague) in one day she rode forty miles, and from thence afterward to her Castle of Framingham in Suffolke; where taking upon her the name of Queene, there resorted to her the most part of all the Gentlemen both of Norfolke & Suffolke, offering their assistance; but upon condition she would make no alteration in Religion, to which she condiscended; and thereupon soone after came to her, the Earles of Oxford, Bathe and Sussex, the Lord Wentworth, Thomas Wharton, and John Mordant Barrons eldest sonnes; and of Knights Cornwallis, Drury, Walgrave, Shelton, Beningfield, Jerningham, Suliard, Freston and many others. The Lady Mary being thus assisted, wrote her letters signed the ninth of July to the Lords of the Councell, wherein shee claimed the Crowne, as of right belonging to her; and required them to proclaime her Queene of England in the City of London, as they tendred her displeasure. To this letter of hers, the Lords answered, that for what they did, they had good Warrant; not onely by King Edwards last Will, but by the Lawes of the land, considering her Mothers divorce, and her owne Illegitimation;

tion; and therefore required her to submit her selfe to Queene Jane, being now her Soveraigne. This Letter was written from the Tower of London, under the hands of these that follow, Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Elye Chancellour, William Marquesse of Winchester, John Earle of Bedford, Henry Duke of Suffolke, Francis Earle of Shrewsbury, John Duke of Northumberland, William Earle of Pembrooke, Thomas Lord Darcey Lord Chamberlin, Cobham, Rich, Huntington, Cheyney, John Gates, William Peter, William Ceuill, John Clerke, John Mason, Edward North and Robert Bowes. The quarell on both sides being thus begun by Letters, is prosecuted by Armes; and the Lords for their Generall make choyce of the Duke of Suffolke, as a man most likely to be firme and sure in the imployment; but the Queen his daughter cannot misse his presence; and besides, is not willing to hazard his person; and thereupon, she by intreaties and the Lords by perswasions prevaile with the Duke of Northumberland to undertake the charge; who before his going having conference with the Lords, let them know how sensible he was of the double danger he under-went in this enterprize; both in respect of the Lady against whom he went, and in respect of them whom he left behinde him; for if they in his absence should by any accident be drawne to waver in their resolution, they might worke their owne safety with his destruction, and make themselves seeme innocent in his guiltinesse. To which one of the Lords replied and said; Your Grace makes a doubt of that which cannot be, for which of us all can wash his hands cleane of this businesse? and therefore it behooves us to be as resolute as your selfe; and the Earle of Arundell, to testifie his resolution in the matter, said, he was sorry it was not his chance to goe with him, at whose feet he could finde in his heart to spend his blood. So the Duke with the Marquesse of Northampton, the Lord Gray, and divers other of account, on the fourteenth of July set forward on the journey with eight thousand foot and two thousand horse; and passing through Shoreditch, the Duke said to the Lord Gray, see how the people presse to see us, but not one of them saith, God speed you. The Duke had every dayes march how farre he should goe, appointed him by Commission; which being very slow, whether it were done of purpose, by some that favoured the Lady Maries side, was certainly a great helpe to her proceedings; for by this meanes she had the longer time to make her preparations; and indeed in this time two accidents happened, of great benefit to her; one, that Edward Hastings the Earle of Huntingtons brother, having an Army of foure thousand foot committed to him by the Earle of Northumberland, he now left his Party, and went to the Lady Mary: the other, that six great Ships which lay before Yarmouth to intercept the Lady Mary, if she shouly attempt to flye, now at the perswasion of Master Jerningham, came in to her aide: which two revolts so terrified the Londoners, that though Doctor Ridley Bishop of London, on the sixteenth of July, at Pauls Crosse Preached a Sermon, wherein he invited the people to stand firme to Queene Jane, whose cause he affirmed to be most just, yet few or none were perswaded by him; so as the Lords themselves fell off from the side, who assembling at Beynards-Castle, first the Earle of Arundell, then the Earle of Pembrooke fell to invectives against the Earle of Northumberland; and then all the Lords joyning in opinion with them, they called for the Major, and in London Proclaimed the Lady Mary Queene; as likewise the Lord Windsor, Sir Edmund Peckham, Sir Robert Drurie and Sir Edward Hastings did in Buckinghamshire; Sir John Williams of Tame, and Sir Leonard Chamberlaine in Oxfordshire, and Sir Thomas Tresham in the County of Northampton. All this came soone to the knowledge of the Duke of Northumberland, being then at Burie; who thereby seeing how the world went, thought it his best course to turne with the streame, and thereupon returning to Cambridge, he tooke the Major of the Towne with him into the Marker-place, and there himselfe for want of a Herauld, Proclaimed the Lady Mary Queene, and in signe of joy threw up his Cap; which yet ſerved not his turne, for the next morning Henry Fitz-Allen Earle of Arundell, came into Cambridge from Queene Mary, who entring his Chamber, the Duke at his feet fell on his knees; deſiring him for Gods love to conſider his caſe, that had done nothing but by the Warrant of him and the Councell: My Lord (ſaid the Earle) I am ſent hither by the Queen to arreſt you; and I (ſaid the Duke) obey your arreſt; yet I beſeech your Lordſhip, to uſe mercy towards him whoſe Acts have been no other then were injoyned by Commiſſion: you ſhould have thought of that ſooner (ſaid the Earle) and thereupon committed him to a Guard, and left him to the Queenes mercy. Thus ended all this great Dukes deſignes, in his owne deſtruction, and brought him to fall on his knees to them, who had often before bowed their knees to him; and the Earle, who at the Dukes going out, could have beene contented to ſpend his blood at his feet, was now contented to be made an inſtrument of his fall: ſo ſudden are the turnes of mens affections, and ſo unſtable is the building upon their aſſeverations; at leſt no man muſt looke to have his caſe be of any weight againſt him, who hath his owne caſe put in the Ballance. Together with the Duke his three Sonnes John, Ambroſe and Henry, the Earle of Huntington, Sir Andrew Dudley, the two Gates, John and Henry, Sir Thomas Palmer and Doctor Sands were conveyed towards London, and brought to the Tower; and the next day the Marqueſſe of Northampton, the Lord Robert Dudley and Sir Robert Corbet. Before which time, the Duke of Suffolke entring his daughters the Lady Janes Chamber, told her, ſhe muſt now put off her Royall Robes, and be contented with a privare life: to which ſhe anſwered, She would much more willingly put them off, then ſhe had put them on; and would never have done it, but in obedience to him and her Mother. And this was the end of the Lady Janes ten dayes Reigne.

THE REIGNE OF QUEEN MARY.

THE Lady Mary having bin Proclaimed Queen in London and other parts of the Realme; removed from her caſtle of Framingham towards London, and being come to Wanſtead in Eſſex, on the thirtieth of July, the Lady Elizabeth her ſiſter, with a traine of a thouſand horſe, rode from her place in the Strand to meet her: on the third of Auguſt, the Queene rode through London to the Tower, where at her entrance were preſented to her Thomas Duke of Norfolke, Edward Lord Courtney, Stephen Gardiner late Biſhop of Wincheſter, and the Dutcheſſe of Somerſet; who all kneeling downe, ſhe kiſſed them, and ſaid, Theſe be my Priſoners, and then cauſed them preſently to be ſet at liberty: the next day ſhe reſtored the Lord Courtney to his Marchiſate of Exceter; and the ſame day alſo ſhe not onely reſtored Stephen Gardiner to his Biſhopricke of Wincheſter, but a few daves after made him Chancellour of England; yet this was the man that had ſubſcribed to her Mothers Divorce, and had written Bookes againſt the lawfulneſſe of her mariage. The fift of Auguſt Edmund Bonner late Biſhop of London priſoner in the Marſhalſey, and Cutbert Tunſtall the old Biſhop of Durham priſoner in the Kings Bench, had their Pardons and were reſtored to their Sees. Sortly after, all the Biſhops which had been deprived in the time of King Edward the ſixth, were reſtored to their Biſhopricks, and the new removed, as Ridley was removed from London and Bonner placed, Skory from Chicheſter and Day placed, Miles Coverdale from Exceter and weſt placed, John Hooper from Worceſter and Heath placed. Alſo all Beneficed men that were married, or would not renounce their Religion, were put out of their Livings, and other of a contrary opinion put in their rooms.

On the thirteenth of Auguſt one Maſter Bourne a Canon of Pauls, preaching at Pauls Croſſe, not onely prayed for the dead, but alſo declared that Doctor Bonner Biſhop of London, (late reſtored, and there in preſence) for a Sermon by him made foure yeeres before, in the ſame place, and upon the ſame Text, had unjuſtly beene caſt into the vile priſon of the Marſhalſey; which Speech ſo offended ſome of the Auditory, that they cried, Pull him downe, pull him downe; and had certainly done him violence (for a Dagger was throwne at him) if Maſter Bradford a Proteſtant Preacher, had not ſtept into his place and appeaſed the tumult, and Maſter Rogers another Proteſtant Miniſter (who were both afterward burnt for Religion) had not ſhifted away Bourne into Pauls Schoole.

Hitherto Queene Maries reigne had beene without blood, but now the Cataracts of seventy will be opened, that will make it raine blood: for now on the eighteenth of August, John Dudley Duke of Northumberland, William Parre Marquesse of Northampton, and John Earl of Warwicke, sonne and heire to the Duk, were arraigned at Westminster-hall, before Thomas Duke of Norfolke as high Steward of England; where the Duke of Northumberland, after his Indictment read, required the opinion of the Court in two points; first, whither a man doing any Act by authority of the Princes Counsaile, and by warrant of the great Seale of England, might for any such Act be charged with treason: secondly, whither any such persons as were equally culpable, and by whose commandements he was directed, might be his Judges and passe upon his triall: whereunto was answered, that concerning the first; the great Seale which he alleaged for his warrant, was not the Seale of the lawfull Queen of the Realm, but of an Usurper, and therfore could be no warrant for him: and as to the second, it was resolved, that if any were as deeply to be touched in the cale as himself, yet so long as no Attainder were of record against them; they were persons able in law to passe upon his triall, and not to be challenged but at the Princes pleasure. After which answers, the Duke used few words, but confessed the Indictment, and accordingly had judgment to dye. By whose example the other prisoners arraigned with him, confessed the Indictments, and thereupon had judgment: the nineteenth of August, Sir Andrew Dudley, Sir John, and Sir Henry Gates brethren, and Sir Thomas Palmer Knights, were arraigned at Westminster, who confessing their Indictments, had judgment, which was pronounced by the Marquesse of Winchester, Lord high Treasurer, sitting that day as chiefe Justice: after these condemnations, followed the executions; for on the two and twentieth of August John Duke of Northumberland was brought to the Tower-hill, and there beheaded; being upon the scaffold in a gowne of green coloured damaske, he put it off and then made a long Speech, wherein he asked the Queen forgivenesse, whom he acknowledged to have grievously offended; and then making profession of his Faith, that he died a true Catholick (meaning a Papist) he said the Psalmes of Miserere and De Profundis, the Pater noster, and six of the first verses of the Psalme In te Domine speravi, ending with this verse, Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit; and this said, he looked about him, as looking for a Pardon, but none comming, he laid his head downe upon the blocke, and at one blow had it strucken off; his body with the head was buried in the Tower, by the body of Edward late Duke of Somerset (mortall enemies while they lived, but now lying together as good friends) so as there lyeth before the high Altar in Saint Peters Church, two Dukes between two Queens, namely the Duke of Somerset and the Duke of Northumberland between Queen Anne and Queene Katherine, all foure beheaded. Of what religion this Duke was may well be doubted, seeing at his death he professed himself a Papist, when lately before he had importuned King Edward to make the Lady Jane his successour, lest the Papall religion should be restored; it seems he was not greatly of either but for other ends; a Protestant then when it was to make his daughter in law Queen; now a Papist, when it was to save his life (for it was thought he had Pardon promised, if he would recant. At the same time and place were beheaded Sir John Gates and Sir Thomas Palmer, who were no such temporizers but persisted and dyed in the Protestant Religion, which they had always professed.

After this, a sprinkling of mercy came from the Queene; for on the third of September the Lord Ferrers of Chartley, the two chiefe Justices, Sir Roger Cholmley and Mountague, Sir John Cheeke and others were delivered out of the Tower whether before they had been committed; but a shower of severity followed soon after, for on the fifteenth of September Master Latimer and Doctor Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury were sent to the Tower, and on the third of November following, the said Archbishop Cranmer, the Lady Jane (late Queene) and and the Lord Guildford her husband, with the Lords Ambrose and Henry, sonnes to the late Duke of Northumberland, were all arraigned at the Guild-hall, found guilty and had judgement to dye.

All this while Queen Mary had contented her selfe to be Queene by Proclamation; but now that things were something setled, she proceeds to her Coronation: for on the last of September she rode in her Chariot through London towards Westminster in this order; first rode a number of Gentlemen and Knights, then Doctors, then Judges, then Bishops, then Lords, then the Councell, after whom followed the Knights of the Bath, thirteene in number in their Robes, then the Bishop of Winchester Lord Chancellour, and the Marquesse of Winchester Lord high Treasurer, next came the Duke of Norfolke, and after him the Earle of Oxford who bore the sword, then the Major of London in a Gowne of Crimson Velvet, who bore the Scepter of Gold; after came the Queenes Chariot, and then followed another Chariot wherein sat the Lady Elizabeth her sister and the Lady Anne of Cleeve, and then came Ladies and Gentlewomen riding on horses, trapped with red velvet: &c. In this order they came through London to Westminster; where in many places by the way, were Pageants and stately shewes, and many rich presents given to the Queene. The next day she went by water to the old Palace, and remained there till eleven of the clock, and then went on foot upon blew cloth, being railed on either side to Saint Peters Church, where she was Crowned and Anointed by the Bishop of Winchester, (the two Archbishops being then in the Tower) with all Rites and Ceremonies of old accustomed.

After her Coronation, a generall pardon was published in her name, but interlaced with so many exceptions of matters and persons, that very few tooke benefit by it; for after the pardon published, there were Commissioners assigned, to compound with such persons as were excepted: from some of whom they tooke away their Fees and Offices, some they fined, and some they deprived of their estates and livings.

About this time Sir James Hales one of the Justices of the Common Pleas, who in the time of King Edward had refused to signe a writing for disinheriting the Lady Mary, and the Lady Elizabeth; (a fact worthy at least of a kinde remembrance from the Lady Mary now Queene) yet now, for that at a quarter Sessions in Kent, he gave charge upon the statures of King Henry the eight, and King Edward the sixth, in derogation of the Primacy of the Church of Rome; he was first committed to the Kings Bench, then to the Counter, and lastly to the Fleet; where he grew so troubled in minde, that he attempted with a Pen-knife to kill himselfe; and being afterward recovered of that hurt, and brought to the Queenes presence, who gave him very comfortable words, yet could never come to be quiet in his minde; but in the end, drowned himselfe in a River not halfe a mile from his house, the River being so shallow, that he was faine to lye groveling before he could dispatch himselfe of life.

And now another sprinkling of mercy came from the Queene; for the Marquesse of Northampton, and Sir Henry Gates, lately before condemned to dye, were now pardoned and set at liberty. The Lady Jane also was allowed the liberty of the Tower, not without hope of life and liberty altogether; if her father the Duke of Suffolke had not the second time been cause of her destruction.

About this time also a Synod was assembled, for consulting about matters of Religion; and the point specially of the reall presence in the Sacrament. The Prolocutour was Doctor Weston; and of the Protestant side, were John Almer and Richard Cheyney, both Bishops afterward in Queene Elizabeths time, also John Philpot, afterward burnt; James Haddon and others. After long disputation, where reasons were not so much weighed as voyces numbred; the Papall side, as having most voyces, carried it; and thereupon was that Religion againe restored, and the Masse commanded in all Churches to be celebrated, after the ancient manner.

It

It was now the yeer 1553. when Queene Mary was come to the age of seven and thirty yeers, and therefore high time now to thinke of marriage, at least if she meant to have issue of her body; but a hard matter it was to finde a husband in all points fitting for her, yet three at this time (in common fame at least) were taken into consideration: one was the Lord Courtney Marquesse of Exceter, a goodly Gentleman and of Royall blood, but there was exception against him because inclining (as was thought) to Lutheranisme; another was Cardinal Poole, of a dignity not much inferiour to Kings, and by his Mother descended from Kings; but there was exception against him also, because foure and fifty yeers old, (as old a Batchelour as Queen Mary was a maid) and so the lesse hope of issue betweene them: but the third (if he might be had) was without exception, and this was Phillip Prince of Spaine, the Emperour Charles his eldest sonne, with whom being a Spaniard, she was the fitter matched, as being by the Mother a Spaniard her selfe. And now very oppertunely came in the beginning of Jan. Embassadors into England about it; amongst others, the Count of Egmond Admirall of the Low Countryes; and John of Memorancy Lord of Curryers; whose message was so kindely entertained, that the marriage in short time was absolutely concluded, though it seemed something strange to many, that she should now be wife to the sonne, who thirty yeers before should have been wife to the father. But so it is, Queenes are never old, so long as they are within yeers of bearing children. And indeede the match was concluded, with conditions of farre more advantage to Queene Mary, then they were to King Phillip, as on the fourteenth of January Stephen Gardiner Bishop of winchester and Lord Chancelour of England, openly in the Presence Chamber at Westminster, declared to all the Lords and Gentlemen there present: for it was agreed, that after the marriage, King Phillip should have the Title of all the Queenes Dominions, and be assumed into fellowship of the government; but yet with reservation to the Queene, of all Priviledges and Customes of the Kingdome, and free disposition of all Offices and Honours, as likewise the Queene should be assumed into the fellowship of all the Kings Dominions, and surviving him, should have a Joynture of two hundred thousand Pounds a yeer. Then for the issue betweene them, if she had a Sonne, that he should inherit the Low Countryes and Burgundy; and King Phillips sonne Charles, which he had by a former wife, should inherit all his Dominions in Italie and Spaine; but if his sonne Charles should fail without issue, then the sonne he should have by Queene Mary, should inherit his Kingdomes of Italie and Spaine also. And the like good provision was also made for daughters. But notwithstanding these great advantages of the match, yet such was the precipitant rashnesse of some; that thinking themselves wiser then the Queene and the Councel, they sought by all meanes to oppose the match; giving out that it tended to bring England under the yoke of Spaine, and to make the Countrey a slave to strangers. This was the generall murmuring of people; but the first that shewed himselfe in Armes, was Sir Thomas wyat of Kent; who having communicated the matter with the Duke of Suffolke the Lady Janes father, with Peter Caroe a Knight of Devonshire, and divers others; intended onely to make secret provision, but not to stirre till Prince Phillip should be come, that so their cause of taking armes might have the better colour. On the fifteenth of January, Robert Dudley sonne to the Duke of Northumberland, was arraigned at the Guildhall of high Treason, who confessed the indictment, and had judgement given by the Earle of Sussex, to be drawen, hanged, bowelled and quartered.

But now in counsels communicated to many, it is a hard matter to have counsell kept, and Sir Peter Caroe finding that their plot was discovered, fled privily into France, where lurking for a time, he was afterward taken at Bruxells, and brought captive into England; as likewise at the same time and place Sir John Cheeke King Edwards Schoolmaster was taken, who being drawne by terrours to embrace the Papall Religion, with very griefe afterward of his errour pined away and dyed; Sir Peter Caroe lived many yeers after, and dyed in Ireland; though it be falsely recorded, they were both burnt for Religion, in June of this yeer. Wyatt hearing of Sir Peter Caroes flight, and that all their purpose was discovered; was driven before his time to enter into armes, giving out for the cause that it was not to attempt any thing against the Queene, but onely to remove ill Councellours, and chiefly to repell Prince Phillip; least by this mariage the Kingdome should come in subjection to the Spaniard. With Wyatt were joyned Sir Henry Isley, Sir George Harper, Anthony and William Knevet, and divers other Gentlemen of the County; against him were the Lord Abuegaveny, Sir Thomas Cheyney Lord Warden of the Ports, Sir Sobert Southwell Sheriffe of Kent, Sir Warram Sentleger, Sir Thomas Kempe Sir Thomas Moyle, Sir Thomas Finch with divers other; yet all these great men had such doubt of the people, that they durst not proceed but very warily. The five and twentieth of January, newes came to London of Wyats rising; against whom was presently sent the Duke of Norfolke, with Sir Henry Iernigham Captaine of the Guard, Sir Edward Bray, Sir John Fogge, John Covert, Roger Appleton Esquires, and five hundred souldiers out of London; appointed to go after him, under the leading of Captaine Brett. And now see in times of Sedition, how uncertaine a thing it is to trust to the people; for before Brett could overtake the Duke, Sir George Harper was secretly got to him, who so perswaded him that he and his five hundred souldiers left the Duke and went all to Wyatt; which made the Duke and those with him presently to flye, and put such boldnesse into Wyatt, that now he marched in great confidence towards London, with so great terrour to all sorts of people, that at Westminster-Hall, the Serjeants and other Lawyers, pleaded in harnesse.

In the meane time, the Duke of Suffolke was perceived in Warwickshire, to be raising of Forces in assistance of Wyatt; against whom was presently sent the Earle of Huntington, and the Duke finding himselfe unable to make resistance, having with all his industry gotten together but onely fifty men; he betooke himselfe to a Tenant of his One, Underwood, with whom he hoped and had promise to remaine undiscovered, till he might have oppertunity to escape, as some say, as others to a Keeper of his Parke called Nicholas Lawrence, who kept him in a hollow Oake in the said Park, for two or three dayes: but whether Underwood or Lawrence, either out of fear, or out of hope of reward, he betrayed him to the Earle, by whom he was taken, and under a strong guard carried to the Tower. Upon this, Queen Mary her selfe came into London, where calling the Major and chiefe of the City together, she made an Oration, wherein she shewed the insolency of Wyatt; who though he pretended the but onely the crossing of the marriage; yet was now grown to such presumption, that he required to have the custody of her person; and to have Councellours retained or removed at his pleasure. And as for her mariage, she there affirmed she had done nothing in it, but by advice of her Councell; and for her selfe, that she was not so longing for a husband, but that if it were not more for the good of the Kingdome, then for her own satisfaction, she would never once think of entertaining it. Having by her speech confirmed the minds of the Citizens; Forces are presently raised, and placed about the Bridge, and other fit places of the City. The third of February, Wyatt with an Army of three or four thousand, came to London, hoping of present entrance, but finding the Bridge broken, and souldiers placed to resist him, after two dayes stay in Southwarke, he removed to Kingstone, where he found likewise the Bridge broken, yet with great industry suddenly repairing it, he passed over his men, and meant with all speed, to get to the Court, before the Queene should have notice of him coming; and had done so indeede, if a mischance, and an errour upon that mischance had not hindred him. For being come within six miles of London, the carriage of one of his great Ordnance brake, in mending whereof so much time time was ſpent (and Wyatt by no perſwaſions would go forward without it) that the time was paſt, in which his friends at London expected his coming; which diſappointment made many in thoſe parts to fall off, and being perceived by thoſe about him, many of them alſo; ſo as one halfe of his Army was ſuddenly gone and left him; amongſt other, Sir George Harper, the moſt intimate of all his councell, went to the Queene and diſcovered all his purpoſes: whereupon the Earle of Pembrooke with a company levied upon the ſudden, was ſent againſt him; which made Wyat ſlacke his pace, ſo as it was noone before he came to the ſuburbs of the City; and then placing his Ordnance upon a hill, and leaving there the greateſt part of his Army, he onely with five Enſignes marched towards Ludgate, and being encountred at Charing-croſſe by the Lord Chamberlin and Sir John Gage, after a ſmall fight put them to flight in ſuch ſort, that word was carried to the Queene, how neer Wyat approached, and how wonderfully he prevailed all the way he came: with which nothing diſmayed; well then (ſaid ſhe) I will go in perſon againſt him my ſelfe; and was preparing to doe ſo indeed (ſo much was her Fathers valour running in her veines:) but it needed not; for by this time Sir Henry Jerningham Captaine of the Guard, Sir Edward Bray Maſter of the Ordnance, and Sir Phillip Paris, had given him battaile and ſlaine many of his men; and that which was more, comming to Ludgate, he was denied entrance; and then thinking to retyre, he heard the Earle of Pembrooke with his Forces was behinde at Charing-croſſe; ſo as neither able to goe forward nor yet backward, he was at a ſtand and in amazement, and then leaning a while upon a ſtall by the Bell-ſavage, after a little muſing, he returned towards Temple-gate; where Clarentius the Herauld meeting him, fell to perſwade him, not to be a cauſe of more effuſion of blood, nor by perſiſting in obſtinacy to exclude all hope of the Queenes mercy. The Souldiers of Wyat were earneſt with him to have ſtood it out; but Wyat as ſillily ending, as he had unadviſedly begun; yeelded himſelfe to Sir Maurice Berkeley, and getting up upon his horſe behinde him, in that manner rode to the Court; where he had not the entertainment he expected, for without more adoe he was preſently ſent away to the Tower. The Captaine taken, the reſt made no reſiſtance, few fled, and of the other many were taken and laid in priſon: and this was done the ſixth of February. And now conſultation was held what Delinquents ſhould be puniſhed; where the firſt that was thought on was the Lady Jane, in whom was verified, The Fathers have eaten ſower grapes, and the childrens teeth are ſet on edge; the innocent Lady muſt ſuffer for her Fathers fault; for if her Father the Duke of Suffolke, had not this ſecond time made ſhipwracke of his loyalty, his Daughter perhaps had never taſted the ſalt-waters of the Queens diſpleaſure: but now as a rocke of offence, ſhe is the firſt that muſt be removed; and thereupon is Doctor Feecknam ſent to acquaint her, that ſhe muſt prepare her ſelfe to dye the next day: which Meſſage was ſo little unpleaſing to her, that ſhe ſeemed rather to rejoyce at it, as wherby ſhe ſhould at laſt be ſet at liberty; and the Doctor being earneſt with her to leave her new Religion, and to embrace the old; ſhe anſwered, She had now no time to thinke of any thing, but of perparing her ſelfe to God by Prayer: Feecknam thinking ſhe had ſpoken this, to the end ſhe might have ſome longer time of life, obtained of the Queene three dayes longer, and then came and told ſo much to the Lady Jane; whereat ſhe ſmiling ſaid, You are much deceived if you thinke I had any deſire of longer life; for I aſſure you, ſince the time you went from me, my life hath beene ſo tedious to me, that I long for nothing ſo much as death, and ſince it is the Queenes pleaſure, am moſt willing to undergoe it. Before ſhe was brought to Execution, her husband the Lord Guildford, had made ſuit, and obtained to ſee her and have ſome conference with her; but ſhe refuſed it, ſaying, Theſe were rather augmenters of griefe, then comforts of death; ſhe made no doubt, but they ſhould ſhortly meet in a better place, and in a better condition of ſociery: ſo on the twelfth of

of February, her husband the Lord Guildford firſt, and then ſhe an houre or two after, was beheaded within the Tower; where ſhe acknowledged her ſelfe to have deſerved death, not for ſeeking the Crown, but for not refuſing it, being offered; and after prayers to God, unclothing her ſelfe, and putting a Handcarchiffe before her eyes, ſhe laid her head downe upon the blocke, and patiently ſuffered death, more grievous to the beholders, then to her ſelfe. This end had the Lady Jane Gray, a Lady of incomparable Pietie, and (for her yeers) of incomparable learning; for being not paſt ſeventeen yeeres of age, ſhe underſtood perfectly the Greek and Latine tongues, and was ſo ready in all points of Divinity, as if ſhe knew them by inſpiration rather then by inſtruction; no leſſe a miracle in this kinde then King Edward; and therefore no mervaile if he appointed her to ſucceed him in the Kingdome, who in the endowments of minde was ſo like unto him, that whileſt ſhe reigned, it might be thought he continued to reigne himſelfe, at leſt no more differing but onely the ſex. It may not be forgotten, that Judge Morgan, who at her arraignement gave the ſentence againſt her, ſhortly after fell mad, and in his raving, cried continually to have the Lady Jane taken away from him, and ſo ended his life.

Two dayes after the execution of the Lady Jane, namely the fourteenth and fifteenth of February, twenty paire of Gallowes were ſet up in divers places of the City, whereon were handed fifty of Wyats faction; on the eighteenth of February Bret was hanged at Rocheſter in chaines, Sir Henry Iſle, who had beene taken in an old freeze coat and an old paire of hoſe, with his brother Thomas Iſle and Walter Mantell were hanged at Maidſtone, Anthony Knevet and his brother William, with another of the Mantels were executed at Sevenocke; but then on the twentieth of February a ſprinkling of mercy came, for foure hundred of Wyats followers, being brought before the Queene, with halters about their necks, were all pardoned and ſet at liberty. But then ſeverity ſoone after began againe, for on the three and twentieth of February the Lord Henry Gray Duke of Suffolke, and Father to the Lady Jane, who the weeke before had been arraigned and condemned, was on the Tower-hill beheaded, and on the eleventh of Aprill, in the ſame place was beheaded (the Author of all this miſchiefe) Wyat himſelfe, whoſe quarters were ſet up in divers places of the City, his head upon the Gallowes at Hay-hill, beſides Hide Parke. This man, in hope of life, having before accuſed the Lord Courtney and the Lady Elizabeth the Queenes ſiſter, to be privie to his conſpiracy, yet at his death he cleered them, and proteſted openly, that they were altogether innocent, and never had been acquainted with his proceedings. Yet was this matter ſo urged againſt them by Stephen Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter and Lord Chancellour, that both of them in March before had beene committed to the Tower, though in May following they were both againe releaſed, but yet confined, the Lady Elizabeth to Woodſtocke, under the cuſtody of Sir Henry Beningfield of Oxenborough in the County of Norfolke; the Lord Courtney to Foderingham, under the cuſtody of Sir Thomas Treſham, who after ſome time was ſet at liberty, and going into Italie there dyed. It is memorable, what malice this Biſhop Gardiner bore to the Lady Elizabeth, by whoſe onely procurement, not onely ſhe was kept in moſt hard durance, but a Warrant was at laſt framed under certaine Counſellours hands, to put her to death, and had beene done, but that Maſter Bridges Lieutenant of the Tower, pitying her caſe, went to the Queene to know her pleaſure, who utterly denied that ſhe knew any thing of it; by which meanes here life was preſerved. Indeed the Biſhop would ſometimes ſay, how they cut off boughes and branches, but as long as they let the root remaine, all was nothing; and it is not unworthy the remembring what traines were laid to enſnare her. The common net at that time for catching of Proteſtants, was the Reall Preſence, and this net was uſed to catch her; for being asked one time, what ſhe thought of the words of Chriſt, This is my Body; whether ſhe thought it it the true body of Christ, that was in the Sacrament. It is said, that after some pawsing, she thus answered:

Christ was the Word that spake it:
He tooke the Bread, and brake it:
And what the Word did make it,
That I beleeve, and take it.

Which though it may seeme but a slight expreſſion, yet hath it more ſolidneſſe then at firſt ſight appears; at leſt it ſerved her turne at that time to eſcape the net, which by direct anſwering ſhe could not have done.

On the ſeventeenth of Aprill Thomas Lord Grey, the Duke of Suffolkes brother was beheaded, the laſt, and indeed the leſt in delinquency, that ſuffered, for having any hand in Wyats conſpiracy. There remained yet a fagge end, and was indeed but a fagge end, as nothing worth; for on the ſame day Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, being accuſed to have beene a party in Wyats conſpiracy, was at the Guild-hall arraigned before Sir Thomas White Lord Maior, the Earles of Shrewsbury and Derby, Sir Thomas Bromley Lord chiefe Juſtice of England, Sir Nicholas Hare Maſter of the Roles, Sir Francis Engleſield Maſter of the Wards, Sir Richard Southwell and Sir Edward Walgrave Privie Councellours, Sir Roger Chomley, Sir William Portman one of the Juſtices of the Kings Bench, Sir Edward Sanders one of the Juſtices of the Common Pleas, Maſter Stanford and Maſter Dyer Serjeants at Law, Maſter Edward Griffin Attorney generall, Maſter Sendall and Peter Titchborne Clarkes of the Crowne, where the ſaid ~~Maſter~~ Nicholas Throgmorton ſo fully and diſcreerly anſwered all objections brought againſt him, that he was found by the Jurie, Not Guilty, and was cleerly acquitted, but the Jury notwithſtanding was afterward troubled for acquitting him, and ſent priſoners, ſome of them to the Tower, and ſome to the Fleet, and afterward fined to pay a thouſand makes a peece at leſt, and ſome 2000. l. though theſe ſums were afterward ſomething mitigared.

More of Wyats complices had beene taken, arraigned and adjudged to dye, but in judgement the Queene remembred mercy, and gave them their Pardons; of which number were Maſter Rudſton of Kent, Sir James a Croſts, the Lord John Gray brother to the Duke of Suffolke, and ſome others.

About this time, a little before and after, were advancements in honour, the Lord William Howard, Lord Admirall of England, was created Baron Howard of Effingham, Sir John Williams was created Baron of Tames, Sir Edward North was created Baron of Chartleigh, Sir John Bridges was created Baron Chandowes of Sudeley, Gerrard Fitz Garrét was created Earl of Kildare and Baron of Opheley, and not long after Sir Anthony Browne Maſter of the Horſe, was created Viſcount Mountague.

It is ſcarce worth remembring, that in the end of this firſt yeer of the Queens reigne, one Elizabeth Croſt, a wench of eighteen yeeres old, was by practice put into a Wall, and thereupon called the Spirit in the Wall, who with a whiſtle made for the purpoſe, whiſtled out many ſeditious words againſt the Queene, the Prince of Spaine, the Maſſe, Confeſſion, and ſuch other Points; for which ſhe did Penance, ſtanding upon a ſkaffold at Pauls Croſſe all the Sermon time, where ſhe made open confeſſion of her fault.

There had beene good ſtore of Laymens blood ſhed already, and now the times is comming to have Clergie mens ſhed, and for a preparative to it, on the tenth of Aprill, Cranmer Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Nicholas Ridley late Biſhop of London, and Hugh Latimer late Biſhop of Worceſter, are conveyed from the Tower to Oxford, there to diſpute with Oxford and Cambridge men in points of Religion, but ſpecially of the Euchariſt; the Oxford men were Cole, Chadſey, Pye, Harpſefield, Smith and Doctor Weſton Prolocutour: the Cambridge men Young, Seaton, Watſon, Atkinſon, Feckenham and Sedgewicke: the Diſputation ended, which (we may well thinke, as the matter was carried) went againſt the priſoners; on the twentieth of Aprill they were brought again on the Stage; and then demanded, whether they would perſiſt in their opinion, or elſe recant; and affirming they would perſiſt, they were all three adjudged Hereticks, and condemned to the fire; but their execution we muſt not looke for till a yeere or two hence; but in the meane time we have John Rogers, the firſt Martyr of theſe time, burnt at London the fourth of February; after whom the ninth of February, John Hooper late Biſhop of Worceſter, burnt at Gloceſter; after him, Robert Ferrar Biſhop of Man, burnt at Carmarden; after him John Bradford, with many others; and then the two famous men Ridley and Latimer, no leſſe famous for their conſtant deaths, then their religious lives, both burnt at Oxford the ſixteenth of October.

This riſing of Wyat had beene a Remora to the Queenes marriage, and now to avoid all ſuch obſtacles hereafter, the Queen in Aprill called a Parliament; wherein were propounded two things; one for confirmation of the Marriage, the other for reſtoration of the Popes Primacie. This latter was not aſſented to, but with great difficulty; for the ſix yeers reigne of King Edward had ſpred a planration of the Proteſtant Religion, in the hearts of many; but the Propoſition for the marriage was aſſented to readily, but yet with the adding of ſome conditions, which had nor beene thought of in the former Articles: Firſt, that King Phillip ſhould admit of no Stranger in any Office, but onely Natives: ſecondly, that he ſhould innovate nothing in the Lawes and Cuſtomes of the Kingdome. Thirdly, that he ſhould not carry the Queen out of the Realme, without her conſent, nor any of her children without conſent of the Councell. Fourthly, that ſurviving the Queen, he ſhould challenge no right in the Kingdome, but ſuffer it to deſcend to the next heire. Fiftly, that he ſhould carry none of the Jewels of the Realme out of the Kingdome, nor ſuffer any Ships or Ordnance to be removed out of the Realme: and laſtly, that neither directly nor indirectly, he ſhould cauſe the Realme of England to be intangled with the warre betweene Spaine and France.

All things being thus agreed on, the Earle of Bedford Lord Privie Seale, the Lord Fitzwaters, and divers other Lords and Gentlemen, are ſent into Spaine to fetch over Prince Phillippe, who arrived at Southampton the twentieth of July in the yeere 1554. and the three and twentieth came to Winchester, where the Queene met him, and the five and twentieth, the marriage betweene them there was openly ſolemnized: (the diſparity of yeeres, as in Princes, not much regarded, though he were then but ſeven and twenty yeeres of age, ſhee eight and thirty) at which time, the Emperours Embaſſadour being preſent, openly declared; that in conſideration of that mariage, the Emperour had given to Prince Phillippe his ſonne, the Kingdomes of Naples and Hieruſalem; and thereupon (the ſolemnity of marriage being ended) Garter King of Heraulds openly in the Church, in the preſence of the King, the Queene, and the Lords both of England and Spaine, ſolemnly proclaimed, the title and ſtile of theſe two Princes, as followeth: Phillip and Mary by the grace of God King and Queen of England, France, Naples, Hieruſalem, and Ireland, Defenders of the Faith; Princes of Spaine and Scicily, Archdukes of Auſtria, Dukes of Millany, Burgandy, and Brabant, Counts of Habſpurge, Flanders and Tyroll. After this the King and Queene by eaſie journeys came to Winſor Caſtle, where the King was inſtal'd Knight of the Garter, and the Earle of Suſſex with him: The eleventh of Auguſt they removed to Richmond, the ſeven and twentieth to Suffolk-place in Southwark, and the next day to London (where the ſtately ſhews that were made, may well enough be conceived without relaring) from hence after foure dayes they removed againe to Richmond, where all the Lords had leave to depart into their Countries, and indeede ſo many departed, that there remained not an Engliſh Lord at the Court, but the Biſhop of Winchester: from Richmond they removed to Hampton-court, where the Hall door within the Court was continually kept ſhut, ſo as no man might enter unleſſe his errand were firſt known, which might perhaps be the faſhion of Spain, but to Engliſhmen ſeemed very ſtrange.

About this time Cardinall Poole, sent for by the King and Queene, came over into England; and had come sooner, but that the Emperour fearing he might prove a corrivall with his sonne Phillip, had used meanes to stop his passage, but now that his Sonnes marriage was past, he was content to let him passe, who though he came from Rome with the great authority of a Legat a Latere, yet he would not but come privately into London, because his Attaindour was yet upon Record; an Act therefore was presently passed to take it off, and to restore him in blood; for passing of which Act, the King and Queene in person came to the Parliament house; whither a few dayes after, the Cardinall came himselfe, which was then kept in the great Chamber of Whitehall, because the Queen by reason of sickneſſe, was not well able to goe abroad; and here the King and Queene sitting under the cloath of Estate, and the Cardinall on their right hand, all the Lords, Knights and Burgesses being present, the Bishop of Winchester Lord Chancellour, made a short speech unto them; signifying the presence of the Lord Cardinall, and that he was sent from the Pope as his Legate a Latere, to doe a worke tending to the glory of God, and the benefit of them all; which (saith he) you may better heare from his own mouth. Then the Cardinall rose up, and made a long solemne Oration, wherin he first thanked them for his restoring, by which he was enabled to be a member of their society; then exhorting them to returne into the bosome of the Church, for which end he was come; not to condemne, but to reconcile; not to compell, but to call and require; and for their first worke of reconcilement, requiring them to repeale and abrogate all such Lawes as had formerly beene made in derogation of the Catholicke Religion. After which Speech, the Parliament going together, drew up a Supplication, which within two dayes after they presented to the King and Queene; wherein they shewed themselves to be very penitent for their former errours, and humbly desired their Majesties to intercede for them to the Lord Cardinall and the See Apostolicke, that they might be Pardoned of all they had done amisse, and be received into the bosome of the Church; being themselves most ready to abrogate all Lawes prejudiciall to the See of Rome. This Supplication being delivered to the Cardinall, he then gave them Absolution, in these words; Wee, by the Apostolicke authority given unto us, by the most Holy Lord Pope Julius the third (Christs Vicegerent on Earth) doe Absolve and deliver you and every of you, with the whole Realme and Dominions thereof, from all Heresie and Schisme, and from all Judgements, Censures and Paines for that cause incurred, and also Wee doe restore you againe, to the unity of our Mother the holy Church, The report hereof comming to Rome, was cause that a solemne Procession was made, for joy of the conversion of England to the Church of Rome. And now the Queene had a great desire to have King Phillip crowned, but to this the Parliament would by no meanes assent.

In October this second yeere of her reigne, a rumour was spread of the Queenes being with childe, and so forward that she was quicke; and thereupon were Lettes sent from the Lords of the Councell: to Bonner Bishop of London, that Prayers of Thanksgiving should be made in all Churches; and the Parliament it selfe was so credulous of it, that they entred into consideration of the education of the childe, and made an Act; desiring the King (our of the confidence they had in him) that if the Queene should faile, he would be pleased to take upon him the Rule and Government of the childe; but after all this, in June following, it came to be knowne, that it was but a Tympany, or at best the Queene so miscarried, that there came no childe, nor the Queene likely ever after to have any. But howsoever, in hope of the joy that was expected; in January of this yeere, divers of the Councell, as the Lord Chancellour, the Bishop of Elye, the Lord Treasurour, the Earle of Shrewsbury, the Controlour of the Queens house, Secretary Bourne and Sir Richard Southwell Master of the Ordinance, were sent to the Tower, to discharge and set at liberty liberty a great part of the Prisoners in the Tower; as namely, the late Duke of Northumberlands sonnes, Ambrose, Robert and Henry, also Sir Andrew Dudley, Sir James Crofts, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, Sir John Rogers, Sir Nicholas Arnold, Sir George Harper, Sir Edward Warner, Sir William Sentlow, Sir Gowen Carow, William Gybbs Esquire, Cuthert Vaughan, and some others.

About this time, one William Fetherstone, a Millers sonne, of the age of eighteene yeeres, named and bruted himselfe to be King Edward the sixth; for which being apprehended and examined, he answered as one lunaticke; and thereupon was whipped at a Carts tayle, and banished into the North; but the yeere after, spreading abroad againe, that King Edward was alive, and that he had talked with him, he was arraigned and condemned of treason, and at Tyburn hanged and quartered.

In the moneth of March, the Queene was taken with a fit of Devotion, and thereupon called unto her foure of her Privie Councell, namely, William Marquesse of Winchester Lord Treasurour, Sir Robert Rochester Comptroller, Sir William Peter Secretary, and Sir Francis Englefield Master of the Wards, and signified unto them, that it went against her conscience, to hold the Lands and Possessions as well of Monasteries and Abbeys as of other Churches, and therefore did freely relinquish them, and leave them to be disposed, as the Pope and the Lord Cardinall should thinke fit; and thereupon charged them to acquaint the Cardinall with this her purpose. And shortly after in performance hereof, John Feckenam late Deane of Pauls, was made Abbot of Westminster, and had possession delivered him, and with him fourteen Monkes received the Habit at the same time: and on the twentieth of November, Sir Thomas was instituted Lord of Saint Johns of Hierusalem, and was put in possession of the Lands belonging unto it. And when it was told her, that this would be a great diminution of the Revenues of her Crowne; she answered, she more valued the salvation of her soule, then a thousand Crownes: a most religious speech, and enough, if there were but this, to shew her to be a most pious Prince.

The fourth of September this yeer, King Phillip waited on with the Earle of Arundell Lord Steward, the Earle of Pembrooke, the Earle of Huntington and others, went over to Callice, and from thence to Brussels in Brabant, to visit the Emperour his Father; who delivering him possession of the Low Countries, in March following he returned into England; but then, on the sixth of July following, by reason of warswith France, he passed again over to Callice and so into Flanders, from whence he returned not till eighteene moneths after; which made great muttering amongst the common people, as though hee tooke any little occasion to be absent, for the little love hee bore to the Queene.

In the third yeere of the Queene dyed Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester at his house in Southwarke; of whose death it is memorable, that the same day in which Bishop Ridley and Master Latimer suffered at Oxford, he would not goe to dinner till foure a clocke in the afternoone, though the old Duke of Norfolke was come to dine with him; the reason was, because he would first heare of their being burnt, and as soon as word of that was brought him, he presently said, Now let us goe to Dinner; where sitting downe and eating merrily, upon a sudden he fell into such extremity, that he was faine to be taken from the Table and carried to his bed, where he continued fifteen dayes, without voyding any thing either by urine or otherwise, which caused his tongu to swell in his mouth, and so dyed; after whose death, Nicholas Heath Archbishop of Yorke was made Lord Chancelour.

And now comes the time of Archbishop Cranmers execution, who the yeere before had beene condemned and degraded by Commission from the Pope; after which, being by the subtiltie of some, put in hope of life, out of frailty, he subscribed to a Recantation, which yet did him no good; for whether it were, that Cardinall Poole would no longer be kept from being Archbishop

(which he would not be as long as he lived) or that the Queen could not be gotten to forget, his being the chief instrument of her Mothers divorce; his execution was resolved to be the 14. of Febr. in the same place at Oxford where Ridley and Latimer five month before had bin: before the execution Doct. Cole preached, who to make use of Cranmers Recantation, told the people, they doe well to harken to this learned mans confession, who now at his death, and with his death, wold testifie which was the true religion, never thinking that Cranmer wold have denied his former Recantation; but Cranmer being brought to the stake (contrary to expectation) acknowledged, that through frailty he had subscribed it, praying God hartily to forgive it; and now for a punishment, that hand which had done it should first suffer, and therewithall thrusting his right hand into the fire, he there held it, till it first and then his whole body was consumed; onely (which was no small miracle) his heart remained whole and not once touched with the fire. The same yeer also, no fewer then 84. of both sexes were burnt for Religion; and it was a cruelty very far extended, that the bones of Bucer and Phagius some time before dead and buried, were taken up and publikely burnt in Cambridge. No sooner was Cranmer dead, but the very same day was Cardinall Poole made Archbishop of Canterbury.

In the fourth yeere of the Queene, exemplar Justice was done upon a great person; for the Lord Sturton, a man much in the Queens favour, as being an earnest Papist, was for a murther committed by him, arraigned and condemned, and he with foure of his servants, carried to Salisbury, was there in the Market-place hanged, having this favour to be hanged in a silken halter, his servants in places neere adjoyning to the place where the Murther was committed.

The foure and twentieth of Aprill, Thomas Stafford second son to the Lord Stafford, with other, to the number of two & thirty persons (set on by the French King) attempted to raise Sedition against the Queen, for marrying with King Phillip, and comming out of France, arrived at Scarborough in Yorkeshire, where they tooke the Castle, but within two dayes were driven out by the Earle of Westmerland, and then taken and arraigned: the eight and twentieth of May Stafford was beheaded on the Tower-hill, and the next day three of his associates Strelley, Bradford & Proctor were drawn from the Tower to Tyburne and there executed. The first of May Thomas Percy was first made Knight, after, Lord, and the next day was created Earle of Northumberland, to whom the Queene gave all the Lands that had bin his Ancestours.

At this time the Queene intangled her selfe (contrary to her promise) in her husbands quarrell, sent a defiance to the French King, by Clarentius king at Armes; and after on the Munday in Whitsonweeke, by sound of trumpet, proclaimed open warre against him in Cheapside, and other places of the Citie; and shortly after, caused an Army of a thousand Horse, and foure thousand foot, to be transported over, to the aid of her husband King Phillip, under the leading of the Earle of Pembrooke Captain Generall, Sir Anthony Browne Viscount Mountague Lievtenant Generall, the Lord Gray of Wilton Lord Marshall, the Earle of Rutland Generall of the Horse, the Earle of Lincolne Coronel of the Foot, the Lord Robert Dudley Master of the Ordnance, the Lord Thomas Howard, the Lord De la Ware, the Lord Bray, the Lord Chandowes, the Lord Ambrose Dudley, the Lord Henry Dudley, with divers Knights and Gentlement; who joyning with King Phillips Forces, they altogether set down before Saint Quintyns, a town of the French Kings of great importance. To the rescue whereof, the French King sent an Army, under the leading of the Constable of France, which consisted of nine hundred men at armes, with as many light horse, eight hundred Reystres, two and twenty Ensignes of Lancequenets, and fifteen Ensignes of French footmen; their purpose was not to give battell, but to put more succours into the Town; which the Philippians perceiving, encountred them, and in the fight slew John of Burbon Duk of Anghien, the Viscount of Torain, the Lo. of Chadenier, with many gentlemen of account; they took prisoners the Duk of Memorancy Constable of France, the Duk of Montpensier, Duk Longueville, the the Marshall of Saint Andrewes, the Lord Lewis brother to the Duke of Mantova, the Baron of Curton, the Rhinegrave Colonell of the Almaynes, Monsieur d'Obigny, Monsieur de Biron, and many others; and then pursuing the victory, under the government of the Earle of Pembrooke, on the seven and twentieth of August they tooke the towne of Saint Quintyns; in the assault whereof, the Lord Henry Dudley, yongest sonne to the Duke of Northumberland, was with a peece of great Ordnance slaine, and some other of account. The saccage of the Town King Phillip gave to the English, as by whose valour chiefly it was won.

The joy was not so great for this winning of Saint Quintyns, but there will be greater sorrow presently for other losses. Many of the Garrison of Callice had beene drawne from thence, for this service of Saint Quintyns, and no new supply sent, which being perceived by the French King, a Plot is laid how to surprize it, which yet was not so secretly carried, but that the Officers of Callice had intelligence thereof; who thereupon signified it to the Councell of England, requiring speedy succours, without which, against so great an Army as was raisd against them, they should not be able to hold out. But whether they gave no credit to their relations, or whether they apprehended not the danger so imminent as indeed it was, they neglected to send supplies till it was too late. For the Duke of Guyse, with no lesse speed then Policie, tooke such a course that at one and the same time, he set both upon Newnambridge and also Ricebanke, (the two maine Skonces for defence of the Towne,) and tooke them both, and then fell presently to batter the Wals of the Castle it selfe, and that with such violence of great Ordnance, that the noyse was heard to Antwerpe, being a hundred miles of. But having made the wals assaulcable, the English used this stratagem, they laid traines of Powder to blow them up, when they should offer to enter, but this stratagem succeeded not; for the French in passing the Ditch, had so wet their cloathes, that dropping upon the traine, the Powder would take no fire, (so all things seemed to concurre against the English) and thereupon the Castle was taken also, and with it the Towne also had beene taken, but that Sir Anthony Ager, with the losse of his owne life and his eldest sonnes, valiantly defended it, and for that time repelled the French, but their numbers increased so fast upon the Towne, that the Lord Wentworth the Deputy, seeing no other way of safety, demanded Parlee, where a composition was made, that the Towne should presently be yeelded to the French King, the lives of the Inhabitants onely saved, with safe conduct to passe away, saving the Lord Deputy with fifty other, such as the Duke should name. And here to be quit with the English for their hard usage at Saint Quintins, the Duke caused Proclamation to be made, that all and every person of the Towne, should bring their money, jewels and plate, to the value of a groat, and lay it downe upon the high Altar of the Church; by which meanes an inestimable sum of treasure was there offered, enough to enrich an Army, which had before enriched a Towne: and now to make it appeare how unable the Towne was to hold out against so great an Army. It is said, there were in it but onely five hundred souldiers of ordinary, and scarce two hundred more of able fighting men; but of other people, men, women and children foure thousand and two hundred, all which were suffered to depart, saving the Lord Wentworth the Deputy, Sir Ralph Chamberlaine Captaine of the Castle, John Hurlston Captaine of Ricebanke, Nicholas Alexander Captain of Newnambridge, Edward Grimston the Controlour, John Rogers the Surveyour, with others to the number of fifty, who were all caried prisoners into France. And thus Callice, which had bin in possession of the English above two hundred yeers, was won from the English in eight dayes, which King Edward the third had not won from the French in lesse then a yeer. The Lord Wentworth was suspected, and in Queen Elizabeths time arraigned for betraying it, was acquitted by his Peeres. Callice thus won, the Duke with his Army marched to Guysnes, five miles distant, whereof was Captaine the Lord Gray of Wilton, who held out the siedge and batteries five or six dayes with so great valour and resolution, that he appeared in nothing inferiour to the Enemy but in multitude, yet at last overlaid with their numbers, and importunde by his souldiers, much against his owne will, he made composition, that the Towne and Castle should be wholly rendered, himselfe and all Officers remaine prisoners, all other to depart with their Armour and Baggage. The Lord Gray afterward ransomed for foure and twenty thousand crownes. And now the Duke of Guise considering that Guysnes would be too costly a Castle to be kept, and too dangerous a neighbour to Callice, if it should be recovered, raced it with the Bulwarkes and Fortifications to the ground. Guysnes thus won, there remained nothing within the English pale, but the little Castle of Hammes, whereof was Captaine the Lord Edward Dudley, who considering that though it were naturally strongly scituate, as being invironed with Fens and Marshes, yet it had but little helpe by Art of Fortifications, and being assured that the Duke of Guyse would speedily come upon him, he secretly in the night with all his garrison, departed into Flanders, so as the Castle was not won, but taken by the Duke of Guyse; and with the losse of this Castle, the English lost all their footing in Terra firma, and the Kings of England all the reality of their Title in France, having nothing left but nudum nomen.

Presently after this, the French King caused the mariage between his eldest sonne Francis the Dolphin, and Mary Steward sole heire of James the fift King of Scotland to be solemnized: whereupon great wars insued soon after between England and Scotland.

Queen Mary being infinitely troubled in minde for the losse of Callice, sent presently forth her Admirall the Lord Clinton, with a Fleet of more then a hundred sayle, to recover, at lest reparation in honour, by doing some exploit upon France, who not finding opportunity to set upon Brest, as he was appointed, fell upon the towne of Conquest, which he tooke and burnt, and also divers Villages thereabouts, and then returned. In which meane time, many great conflicts having been between King Phillip and the King of France; at last, by mediation of the Dutchesse of Lorraigne, a treaty of Peace is agreed on, where all things seemed to be well accorded, but onely that King Phillip by all meanes required restitution of Callice, to which by no means the French would assent; but whilst they stood upon these termes, it happened that first the Emperour Charles King Phillips father dyed, and shortly after Queene Mary, and the day after her Cardinall Poole, and shortly after Sir John Baker of Sissingherst in Kent, who had been a Privie Councellour to Henry the eight, Edward the sixth and Queen Mary. And so our Story hath no further relation to either War or Peace, between the two Kings of France and Spaine.

Of her Taxations.

SHEE began with a rare Example; for in the first yeer of her Reign, was pardoned by Proclamation, the Subsidie of foure shillings the pound of Land, and two shillings the pound of goods, granted in the last Parliament of King Edward the sixth. In her second yeer in a Parliament then holden, was granted to the King and Queen, a Subsidie of the Layitie, from five pounds to ten pounds, of eight pence in the pound; from ten pounds to twenty pounds, of twelve pence in the pound; and from twenty pounds upwards, sixteen pence in the pound; all Strangers double; and the Clergie six shillings in the pound. If this were all, then upon the matter, in all her time, there came no new charge upon her people; for one Subsidie remitted and one received, made but even. In her last yeer she borrowed twenty thousand pounds of the City of London, and paid twelve pounds a yeer interest for every hundred pound.

Lawes

Lawes and Ordinances in her time.

IN her first yeere, on the fourth of September, were proclaimed certaine new Coynes of gold and silver, a Soveraigne of gold of thirty shillings; the halfe Soveraigne fifteene shillings; an Angell of ten shillings; the halfe Angell five shillings. Of silver, the groat, the halfe groat and penny; all these Coynes to be currant as before. In her second yeer, Proclamation was made, forbidding the shooting in Hand-guns and bearing of weapons. The yeer in which she was married to King Phillip, a straight charge was to all Victuallers, Taverners and Alehouse-keepers, that they should sell no Meat nor Drinke nor any kinde of Victuals, to any Serving-man whatsoever, unlesse he brought a testimoniall to shew whose servant he was. Also in a Parliament holden this yeere, amongst other Acts, the Statute Ex Officio, and other Lawes made for the punishment of Heresies, were revived; but chiefly the Popes Bull of Dispensation of Abbey-Land was there confirmed. In her second yeere, on Michaelmas Eeven, the Prisoners that lay in the Counter in Bredstreet, were removed to a new Counter made in Woodstreet, of the Citie Purchase and building; the which removing was confirmed by the Common Councell of the City.

Affaires of the Church in her time.

IN the first yeere of this Queenes reigne, all Bishops which had beene deprived in the time of King Edward the sixth, were restored to their Bishopriks, and the new removed; also all Benefized men that were married, or would not forsake their opinion, were put out of their Livings; and other of a contrary opinion put in their roomes. Also this yeere, on the seven and twentieth of August, the Service begun to be sung in Latine in Pauls Church. Also this yeere the Popes authority was by Act of Parliament restored in England; and the Masse commanded in all Churches to be used. In her second yeer, the Realme is Absolved, and reconciled to the Church of Rome, by Cardinall Poole; and first Fruits and Tenths are restored to the Clergy: but this was soone revoked, the Councell finding the necessity of it for the Queenes support. In her fourth yeere, Monasteries were begun to be reedified; of which number were that of Westminster, that of Sheene and Sion, that of the Black-fryers, and the Fryers of Greenwich. Of the number of those that dyed for Religion in her time, there are recorded five Bishops, one and twenty Divines, and of all sorts of men and women, two hundred threescore and seventeene.

Workes of Pietie done by her or others in her time.

THis Queen restored a great part of Abbey-lands that were in her possession, and if she had lived longer, very likely she would have restored more. In her first yeer, Sir Thomas White then Major, erected a Colledge in Oxford, now called Saint Johns Colledge, before, Bernard Colledge; he also erected Schooles at Bristow and Reading, and gave two thousand pounds to the City of Bristow to purchase Lands, the profits whereof to be imployed for the benefit of young Clothiers for ten yeeres, and after that to be imployed in like manner, to the benefit of two and twenty other shires and Cities. In her third yeere dyed Sir John Gresham, late Major of London, who founded a free School at Holt in Norfolke, and gave to every Ward in London ten pounds, to be distributed to the poore; also to Maids marriages two hundred pounds. Cuthbert Tunstall Bishop of Durham, erected a goodly Library in Cambridge, storing it with many excellent both Printed and written Bookes: he also bestowed much upon building at Durham, at Alnewicke and at Tunbridge.

Casualties happening in her time.

IN her first yeere, on the seven and twentieth of August, the goodliest Ship in England, called The Great Harrye, being of the burthen of a thousand tun, was burnt at Woolwich by negligence of the Mariners. In her second yeer on the fifteenth of February, appeared in the skie a Rainbow reversed, the bowe turned downward, and the two ends standing upward: also two Sunnes shined at one time, a good distance asunder, which were taken for ill signes. This yeere also in the moneth of August, at a place in Suffolke by the Sea side, all of hard stone and pibble, lying betweene the Townes of Oxford and Aldborough, where never grasse grew, nor any earth was ever seene, there chanced suddenly to spring up without any tillage or sowing, so great abundance of Peason, that the Poore gathered above an hundred quarters, yet there remained some ripe, and some blossoming, as many as were before. In her fourth yeer, hot burning Agues and other strange diseases, tooke away much people; so as between the twentieth of October and the last of December, there dyed seven Aldermen, namely, Henry Heardson, Sir Richard Dobbs late Major, Sir William Laxton late Major, Sir Henry Hobblesterne late Majors, Sir John Champneys late Major, Sir John Aleph late Sheriffe, and Sir John Gresham late Major. In her fourth yeer, before Harvest, Wheat was sold for foure Markes the quarter, Mault at foure and forty shillings the quarter, and Pease at six and forty shillings eight pence; where after harvest, Wheat was sold for five shillings the quarter, Malt at six shillings eight pence, Rye at three shillings foure pence the quarter. In the Countrey, Wheat was sold for foure shillings the quarter, Mault at foure shillings eight pence, and in some places a bushell of Rye for a pound of Candles, which was foure pence. In her fift yeer, within a mile of Nottingham, so mervailous a tempest of thunder happened, that it beat down all the Houses and Churches in two Towns thereabouts, cast the Bels to the out side of the Church-yard, and some webs of Lead foure hundred foot into the field, writhen as if it had been leather; the river of Trent running between the two Townes, the water with the mud in the bottome was carried a quarrer of a mile, and cast against trees; with the violence whereof the trees were pulled up by the the roots, and cast twelve score off; also a childe was taken forth of a mans hand and carried two speares length high, and then let fall two hundred foot off, of which fall it dyed; five or six men thereabouts were slaine, and neither flesh nor skin perished; also there fell some Hale-stones that were fifteen inches about. This yeer also in Harvest-time was great mortality, and specially of Priests, so as many Churches were unserved, and much corne was lost in the field for want of Workmen; whereupon ensued a great scarcity, so that corne was sold for fourteen shillings a quarter, and Wood sold in London for thirteen shillings a thousand of Billets, and Coles ten pence a sacke. Also this yeer on the last of September, fell so great store rain, that Westminster Hall was full of water, and Boats were rowed over Westminster-bridge into Kings-street.

Or

Of her Personage and Conditions.

OF her Personage we can make no particular description, only we may say, she was none of the most amiable, but yet without deformity; but of her Conditions we may say, she was not without deformity, and yet was very amiable. If we account her Religion a deformity, yet her constancy and devotion in it, we must needs count a beauty: if it were a deformity to promise the Suffolke men, not to alter the Religion which King Edward had established, yet it was certainly a Pious dissembling, Cretizare cum Cretensibus; and equivocation (will some say) was there a vertue, where she deceived them into truth, and did them good against their wils. And as for her sister Elizabeth, if she did not love her, it was but a quality hereditary in her; for their Mothers did not love one another before; and indeed not without some cause in both; for as those upbraided each others marriage, so these, each others birth. We shall not doe her right, if we deny her to be of a mercifull disposition, seeing oftentimes she pittied the person, where she shed the blood; she could have found in her heart, to have spared the Lady Janes life, if Ragion di stato had not beene against it; and she did spare her Father the Duke of Suffolkes life, till his second offence gave her just provocation. The goodnesse of her nature might be seene in the badnesse of her fortune; who tooke nothing so much to heart, as unkindnesse of friends; the revolt of Callice, and the absence of King Phillip, being the two chiefe causes that brought her to her end.

Of her Death and Buriall.

THE conceit of her being with childe, had kept Physitians to looke into the state of her body; so as her distemper at first neglected, brought her by degrees into a Dropsie, to which was added a burning Feavour, brought upon her by a double griefe; one for the long absence of King Phillip (who had now beene away a yeer and a halfe;) the other, and perhaps the greater, for the losse of Callice; as she forbore not to say to some about her, that if they looked into her Heart, being dead, they should finde Callice there. She began to fall sicke in September, and dyed at her Mannour of Saint James the seventeenth of November, in the yeer 1558. when she had reigned five yeers foure moneths and eleven dayes. Lived three and forty yeers. Her Body was interred in a Chappell in the Minster of Saint Peters Church at Westminster, without any Monument or other Remembrance.

Men of note in her time.

OF Men of Valour in her time, there were many, as may be seen in the Story of her Reigne; but to name some for example, there was William Herbert Earle of Pembrooke, the chiefe assistant of King Phillip in the winning of Saint Quintins; there was William Lord Gray of Wilton, Captain of Guisnes, who though he yeelded the Town, yet more out of tendernesse to his Souldiers, then out of feare of his Enemies, which he would never else have yeelded up;

up; and to speake of one of a meaner ranke, there was Sir Anthony Ager, who in defence of the Town of Callice lost his life, but not till he made the Enemie turne their backes and flye. Of Learned men also there were many, as John Rogers borne in Lancashire, who Translated the Bible into English with Notes, Richard Morysin Knight, borne in Oxfordshire, who wrote divers Treatises, Robert Record a Doctor of Physicke, who wrote a Booke of Arithmaticke, Cuthbert Tunstall, of a worshipfull Family in Lancashire, though base borne, whose Ancestours came into England with the Conquerour, as his Barbour, and therefore hath three Combs his Armes; Bishop first of London, and after of Durham, who wrote divers learned Workes: Richard Sampson, Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, who wrote certaine Treatises: Lucas Shepheard borne at Colechester in Essex an English Poet: Jane Dudley, daughter to Henry Gray Duke of Suffolke, wrote divers excellent Treatises: William Thomas a Welshman, who wrote the History of Italie, and other things: James Brookes and John Standish, both of them writers in defence of the Popes Doctrine: William Peryn a black Fryer, who wrote in defence of the Masse, and also divers Sermons: Henry Lord Stafford, sonne to Edward Duke of Buckingham, who amongst other things which he wrote, Translated a Booke out of Latine into English, intituled Utriusque Potestatis Differentia; which Booke (as some thinke) was first compiled by Edward Foxe Bishop of Hereford: John Hopkins who translated divers of Davids Psalmes into English Meeter, which are to be found amongst those appointed to be sung in the Church.

THE RAIGNE OF Queen Elizabeth.

Queen Mary dying on Thursday the seventeenth of November, in the Yeer 1558, her sister, the Lady Elizabeth, of the age of five and twenty yeers, the onely surviving childe of King Henry the eighth, by undoubted Right, succeeded Her in the Crown; which happened in a time of Parliament: Nicholas Heath, Arch-bishop of York, and Lord Chancellor, sent to the Knights and Burgesses in the Lower House, to repair immediately to the Lords of the Upper House; to whom he signified, That Queen Mary was that morning dead, and therefore required their Assents to joyn with the Lords in proclayming Queen Elizabeth; which accordingly was done, by the sound of Trumpet, first at Westminster, and after in the City of London. The Queen was then at Hatfield; from whence, on Wednesday the three and twentieth of November, she removed to the Lord North's house in the Charterhouse, where she stayed till Monday the eight and twentieth of November, and then rode in her Chariot thorow London to the Tower; where she continued till the fifth of December; and then removed by water to Somerset-House in the Strand; from whence she went to her Pallace at Westminster; and from thence, on the twelfth of January, to the Tower; and on the fourteenth of January, to Westminster, to her Coronation; where it is incredible, what Pageants and Shews were made in the City, as she passed: On Sunday the five and twentieth of January, she was Crowned in the Abbey Church at Westminster, by Doctor Oglethorp, Bishop of Carlile, with all Solemnities and Ceremonies in such case accustomed. At this time, to honour her Coronation, she conferred more Honour, then in all her life after: William Parre, degraded by Queen Mary, she made Marquesse of Northampton; Edward Seymor, whose father had been Attaynted, she made Earl of Hertford; Thomas Howard, second son to Thomas Duke of Norfolk, she made Viscount Bindon; Sir Henry Carie, her Cousin German, she made Baron of Hunsdon; and Sir Oliver St. John, she made Baron of Bletsho.

And now the Queen, though she were her self very wise, yet would not

truſt (and it was a great point of wiſedome that ſhe would not truſt) to her own wiſedome; and therefore ſhe choſe Counſellors to aſſiſt her: In which number ſhe took Nicholas Heath, Arch-biſhop of York; William Paulet, Marqueſſe of Wincheſter, L. High Treaſurer; Henry Fitz Alan, Earl of Arundell; Francis Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury; Edward Stanley, Earl of Derby; Wil. Herbert, E. of Pembroke; Edw. L. Clinton, L. Admirall; and William L. Howard of Effingham; Sir Thomas Cheyney; Sir William Peter; Sir Richard Sackvyle; and Nicholas Wootton, Dean of Canterbury; all which had been Counſellors to Queen Mary, and were of her Religion: But then to make a counter-poyſe of Counſellors of her own Religion, ſhe joyned with them William Parre, Marqueſſe of Northampton; Francis Ruſſell, Earl of Bedford; Sir Thomas Parry; Sir Edward Rogers; Sir Ambroſe Cave; Sir Francis Knolles; and Sir William Cecill, late Secretary to King Edw. the ſixth; and a little after, Sir Nicholas Bacon, whom ſhe made Keeper of the Great Seal. And having thus provided for her State at home, ſhe ſeeks correſpondence with Princes abroad: To the Emperour Ferdinand, ſhe ſent in Embaſſage Sir Tho. Chaloner; to the King of Spain in the Low-Countreyes the Lord Cobham; to the Princes of Germany Sir Henry Killigrew; Sir Aemygill Wnad; to the Duke of Holſt; and another Ambaſſadour to the King of Denmark. There were alſo Ambaſſadours ſent to the Pope, to the State of Venice, and to the French King; with whom at this time there was a Treaty of Peace holden at Cambray, between the Kingdoms of France, England and Spain; where for England was employed, the Earl of Arundell; Thurſbey, Biſhop of Ely; and Doctor Wootton, Dean of Canterbury; with whom, William, Lord Howard of Effingham was joyned by a new Commiſſion.

As ſoon as King Philip heard of the death of his wife Queen Mary, partly out of conſiderations of State, and partly out of affection of love, he ſolicited Q. Elizabeth by his Ambaſſadour, the Earl of Feria, to joyn in Marriage with himſelf; which was no more for two ſiſters to have ſucceſſively one husband, then was done before, for two brothers to have ſucceſſively one wife; and for this he promiſed to procure a Diſpenſation from the Pope. To which motion the Queen, though ſhe well knew, That to allow a Diſpenſation in this caſe to be ſufficient, were to make her own Birth Illegitimate; yet to ſo great a Prince, and who in her ſiſters time had done her many favours, ſhe would not return ſo blunt an Anſwer; but putting the Ambaſſadour off for the preſent in modeſt tearms: She conceived there would be no better way to take him off clean from further ſute, then by bringing in an Alteration of Religion; which yet ſhe would not do all at once, and upon the ſudden (as knowing the great danger of ſudden changes) but by little and little, and by degrees: as at firſt, ſhe permitted onely Epiſtles and Goſpels, the Ten Commandments, the Lords Prayer, and the Creed to be read to the People in the Engliſh Tongue; in all other matters they were to follow the Romane Rite and Cuſtome, untill order could be taken for eſtabliſhing of Religion by Authority of Parliament; and a ſevere Proclamation was ſet forth, prohibiting all Points of Controverſie to be medled with: by which means, ſhe both put the Proteſtants in hope, and put not Papiſts out of hope. Yet privately ſhe committed the correcting of the Book of Common Prayer, ſet forth in the Engliſh Tongue under King Edward the ſixth, to the care and diligence of Doctor Parker, Bill, May, Cox, Grindall, Whitehead, and Pilkington, Divines of great Learning; with whom ſhe joyned Sir Thomas Smith, a learned Knight: but the matter carryed ſo cloſely, that it was not communicated to any, but to the Marqueſſe of Northampton, the Earl of Bedford, and Sir William Cecile. The two and twentieth of March, the uſe of the Lords Supper in both kindes was by Parliament allowed: The four and twentieth of June, the Sacrifice of the Maſſe was aboliſhed, and the Liturgy in the Engliſh Tongue eſtabliſhed, though, as ſome ſay, but with the difference of ſix voyces. In July the Oath of Supremacy was propounded to the Biſhops and others: And in Auguſt, Images were removed out of Churches, and broken or burnt. By theſe degrees the Religion was changed; and yet the change, to the wonder of the world, bred no diſturbance: which if it had been done at once, and on the ſudden, would hardly; at leaſt not without dangerous oppoſition, have been admitted.

During this time, a Parliament had been ſummoned to begin at Weſtminſter, upon the fifteenth of January; and now the Queen, for ſatisfaction of the people, appointed a Conference to be held, between the Prelates of the Realm; and Proteſtant Divines now newly returned, who had fled the Realm, in the time of Queen Mary: for the Prelates were choſen John White, Biſhop of Wincheſter; Ralph Bayne, Biſhop of Coventry and Lichfield; Thomas Watſon, Biſhop of Lincolne; Doctor Cole, Dean of Pauls; Doctor Langdell, Arch-deacon of Lewis; Doctor Harpſefield, Arch-deacon of Canterbury; and Doctor Chadſey, Arch-deacon of Middleſex: For the Proteſtant ſide were appointed, Doctor Scory, Doctor Cox, Doctor Sands, Doctor Whitehead, Doctor Grindall, Maſter Horne, Maſter Gueſt, Maſter Elmer, and Maſter Fuell. The place was prepared in Weſtminſter Church; where, beſides the Diſputants, were preſent the Lords of the Queens Councell, with other of the Nobility; as alſo many of the Lower Houſe of Parliament. The Articles propounded againſt the Prelates, and their adherents, were theſe: Firſt, That it is againſt the Word of God, and the Cuſtome of the ancient Church, to uſe a Tongue unknown to the people, in common Prayer, and in the Adminiſtration of the Sacraments. Secondly, That every Church hath authority to appoint and change Ceremonies, and Eccleſiaſticall Rites, ſo they be to edification: Thirdly, That it cannot be proved by the Word of God, that there is in the Maſſe a Sacrifice Propitiatory for the living and the dead. For the manner of their Conference, it was agreed it ſhould be performed in writing; and that the Biſhops ſhould deliver their Reaſons in writing firſt. The laſt of March was the firſt day of their meeting; where, contrary to the Order, the Biſhops brought nothing in writing; but ſaid, They would deliver their mindes onely by Speech: This breaking of Order much diſpleaſed the Lords, yet they had it granted. Then roſe up Doctor Cole, and made a large Declaration concerning the firſt Poynt: when he had ended, the Lords demanded if any of them had more to ſay; who anſwered, No: Then the Proteſtant Party exhibited a written Book; which was diſtinctly read by Maſter Horne. This done, ſome of the Biſhops began to affirm, they had much more to ſay in the firſt Article: This again much diſpleaſed the Lords; yet this alſo was granted them, to do at their next meeting on Munday next: but when Munday came, ſo many other differences aroſe between them, that the Conference broke off, and nothing was determined. But in the Parliament there was better Agreement; for there it was enacted, That Queen Elizabeth was the lawfull and undoubted Queen of England; notwithſtanding a Law made by her Father King Henry the eighth, that excluded both her and her ſiſter Mary from the Crown, ſeeing, though the Law be not repealed, yet it is a Principle in Law, That the Crown once gained, taketh away all defects. Alſo in this Parliament, Firſt fruits and Tenths were reſtored to the Crown; and the Title of Supreme Head of the Church of England was confirmed to the Queen, with ſo univerſall conſent, that in the Upper Houſe none oppoſed theſe Laws, but onely the Earl of Shrewsbury, and Sir Anthony Brown, Viſcount Mountague: and in the Lower Houſe, only ſome few of Papall inclination, murmured, ſaying, That the Parliament was packt; and that the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Arundel, and Sir William Cecill, for their own ends, had cunningly begged voyces, to make up their Party.

The Supremacie thus confirmed to the Queen, the Oath was ſoon after tendred to the Biſhops and others; of whom, as many as refuſed to take it, were preſently deprived of their livings. And that we may ſee, how inclining the Kingdom at this time was to receive the Proteſtant Religion; It is ſaid, that in the whole Realm (wherein are reckoned above Nine thouſand Spirituall Promotions) there were no more that refuſed to take the Oath, but onely fourſcore Parſons, fifty Prebendaries, fifteen Maſters of Colledges, twelve Archdeacons, twelve Deans, ſix Abbots, and fourteen Biſhops, (indeed all that were at that time, except Anthony Biſhop of Landaff, as Nicholas Heath Archbiſhop of York, Edmund Boner Biſhop of London, Cuthert Tunſtall Biſhop of Durham, Thomas Thurſby Biſhop of Ely, Gilbert Bourn Biſhop of Bath and Wells, John Chriſtopherſon Biſhop of Chicheſter, John White Biſhop of Wincheſter, Thomas Watſon Biſhop of Lincoln, Ralph Bayne Biſhop of Coventry and Lichfield, Owen Oglethorp Biſhop of Carlile, James Turbervile Biſhop of Exeter, and David Pool Biſhop of Peterborough: And with theſe Doctor Fecknam Abbot of Weſtminſter: All which were at firſt committed to priſon, but ſoon after delivered to the cuſtody of private friends, excepting thoſe two ſawcie Prelates, Lincoln and Wincheſter, who threatned to excommunicate the Queen. Three onely, namely, Cuthert Scot Biſhop of Cheſter, Richard Pate Biſhop of Worceſter, and Thomas Goldwel Biſhop of Saint Aſſaph, changed their Religion of their own accord; as alſo did certain Noble Perſonages, namely, Henry Lord Morley, Sir Francis Engleſield, and Sir Robert Peckham, (who had been Privie-Councellours to Q. Mary) Sir Thomas Shelley, and Sir John Gage.

In the ſeas of the Prelates removed, were placed Proteſtant Biſhops, as Matthew Parker was made Archbiſhop of Canterbury, (who was conſecrated by the Impoſition of the hands of three that formerly had been Biſhops; namely, William Barlow of Bath and Wells, John Scory of Chicheſter, and Miles Coverdale of Exeter) and being conſecrated himſelf, he afterward conſecrated Edmund Grindall Biſhop of London, Richard Cox Biſhop of Ely, Edwyn Sands Biſhop of Worceſter, Rowland Merick Biſhop of Bangor, Thomas Young Biſhop of Saint Davyes, Nicholas Bullingham Biſhop of Lincoln, John Jewell Biſhop of Salisbury, Richard Davis Biſhop of Saint Aſſaph, Edward Gueſt Biſhop of Rocheſter, Gilbert Barkeley Biſhop of Bath and Wells, Thomas Bentham Biſhop of Coventry and Litchfield, William Alley Biſhop of Exceter, John Parkhurſt Biſhop of Norwich, Robert Horn Biſhop of Wincheſter, Richard Cheyney Biſhop of Glouceſter, Edmund Scambler Biſhop of Peterbo ough, William Barlow Biſhop of Chicheſter, John Scory Biſhop of Hereford, Young Archbiſhop of York, James Pilkington Biſhop of Durham, John Beſt Biſhop of Carlile, and William Downham Biſhop of Cheſter.

Whileſt theſe things were done in England, the Treaty of peace at Cambray continued ſtill; Wherein King Phillip ſtood for the reſtitution of Calice to the Engliſh, as firmly as if it had been his own intereſt; and without it would agree to no peace with France: But when by Meſſages he underſtood, that his ſuit for marriage with Queen Elizabeth was rejected; and that the Proteſtant Religion was eſtabliſhed in the Kingdom, he then left Queen Elizabeth, ſeeing ſhe would not be his, to her ſelf; and though he became not preſently a Foe, yet he became preſently leſſe then a Friend, and forbore to do any more good offices in that buſineſſe. Queen Elizabeth thus left to her ſelf, agreed with the French King, to conclude her own peace apart; and thereupon, Delegates on both ſides were appointed to meet at Cambray: For the Queen of England were, Thursby Biſhop of Ely, the Lord Williams, the Lord Howard of Effingham, Chamberlain to the Queen, and Doctor Wootton Dean of Canterbury and York: For the King of France were, Charls Cardinall of Lorrain, the firſt Peer of France, Annas Duke

Duke of Memorancy, James Albon Lord of Saint Andrews, John Morvilliers Biſhop of Orleance, and Claude Aubeſpine Secretary of the Privie Councel. The Commiſſioners meeting, the chief point in difference, was the reſtitution of Calice; for which, the Engliſh Commiſſioners, by the Queens appointment, offered to remit two Millions of Crowns, that by juſt accompt were due from France to England; but the Queen was not more deſirous to recover Calice, then the French King was to hold it: And thereupon at laſt, it was concluded, that Calice ſhould remain in poſſeſſion of the French for the term of eight yeers; and thoſe expired, it ſhould be delivered to the Engliſh, upon forfeiture of five hundred thouſand Crowns; for which, hoſtages were given: But all this notwithſtanding, though the Conditions were ſealed and ſworn to, and though hoſtages were aſſigned to remain in England, till one or other were performed; yet all was fruſtate, and came to nothing.

About this time, Henry King of France married his daughter Iſabell to Phillip King of Spain, and his ſiſter Margaret to Emmanuel Phylibert Duke of Savoy; at the ſolemnity of which Marriages, he would needs be a Tiltor himſelf; and thereupon commended the Earl of Montgomery to run againſt him, who unfortunately breaking his Launce upon the Kings Cuyraſſe, a ſplinter thereof (his Beaver being ſomewhat open) ſtruck him ſo deep in the eye, that within few dayes he ended his life: After whoſe death, Francis his ſon at the age of ſixteen yeers, ſucceeded him in the Crown, having by the marriage of Queen Mary the Title of Scotland, and upon ground thereof laying claim to the Crown of England alſo, and giving the Arms of England, as properly belonging to him.

And now begins the game of Faction to be play'd, wherein the whole eſtate of Queen Elizabeth lyes at ſtake, a game that will hold playing the moſt part of her Reign, and if not play'd well, will put her in jeoparey of loſing all, ſeeing all about her are againſt her, Phillip King of Spain hath a quarrell to her, for being rejected in his ſuit; the King of France hath a quarrell to her in right of his wife, which is now his right. The Queen of Scots hath a quarrell to her for detaining her Inheritance: The Pope hath a quarrell to her, for excluding his Authority: The King of Sweden hath a quarrell to her, for ſlighting his ſon in the way of marriage: And all theſe being againſt her, whom hath ſhe of her ſide, but onely her own Subjects, Papiſts yeſterday, and to day Proteſtants, who being ſcarce ſetled in their Religion, how ſhould they be ſetled in their Loyalty? And not being Loyall, where can ſhe finde to caſt Anchor for her ſafety? But it is a true ſaying, Nullum numen abeſt ſi ſit prudentia; Wiſdom is a ſi pply for all defects: And indeed, the Queen being very wiſe her ſelf, and having a wiſe Councell about her, ſhe paſſed all theſe difficulties, though not without danger, yet with little or no hazard.

It happened (if at leaſt it happened, and were not rather plotted of purpoſe) that a Reformation of Religion was pretended in Scotland; but was indeed an incroachment upon the Princes Authority; for at the preaching of John Knox, and other headſtrong Miniſters, not onely Images and Altars were caſt down and burnt, the Monaſteries of Saint Andrews, of Stone, of Stryveling, and of Lynlithew were overthrown; but it was further put into the heads of the Nobility, that it pertained to them, of their own Authority, to take away Idolatry, and by force reduce the Prince to the preſcript of Laws: Whereupon there was preſently a bandying of the Lords of Scotland, againſt the Queen Dowager, Regent of the Country; and in this caſe each of them fought for aid; The Queen Dowager had aid out of France, the Lords of Scotland ſent for aid to the Queen of England: But this was matter for conſultation; It ſeemed a bad Example, for a Prince to give aid to the rebellious Subjects of another Prince. On the other ſide, it seemed no lesse then impiety, not to give Ayd to the Protestants of the same Religion; but most of all it seemed plain madnesse, to suffer adversaries to be so neer neighbours, and to let the French nestle in Scotland, who pretend Title to England: upon such like considerations, it was resolved to send them Ayd; and thereupon an Army of six thousand Foot, and twelve hundred Horse, was sent under the Command of the Duke of Norfolk, the Lord Grey of Wilton his Lievtenant Generall; Sir James a Crofts, Assistant to him; the Lord Scroop, L. Marshall; Sir George Howard, Generall of the men at Arms; Sir Henry Percy, Generall of the Light-horse; Thomas Huggens, Provost Marshall; Thomas Gower, Master of the Ordnance; Master William Pelham, Captain of the Pyoners; and Master Edward Randoll, Serjeant Major, and divers others. These coming into Scotland, joyned with the Scottish Lords, and set down before Leith, where passed many small skirmishes, many Batteries, and sometimes Assaults: to whom, after some time, a new supply came of above two thousand Foot; whereof were Captains, Sir Andrew Corbet, Sir Rowland Stanley, Sir Thomas Hesbith, Sir Arthur Mannwaring, Sir Lawrence Smith, and others: yet with this new supply there was little more done then before; many light skirmishes, many Batteries, and sometimes Assaults; so long, till at last the young French King, finding these broyls of Scotland to be too furious for him to appease, he sent to the Queen of England, desiring that Commissioners might be sent, to reconcile these differences: whereupon were dispatched into Scotland, Sir William Cecill, her principall Secretary, with Doctor Wotton, Dean of Canterbury; who concluded a Peace between England and France, upon these Conditions, That neither the King of France, nor the Queen of Scotland, should thenceforth use the Arms or Titles of England or Ireland; And that both the English and the French should depart out of Scotland; And a generall pardon should be enacted by Parliament, for all such as had been actors in those stirs. This Peace was scarce concluded, when Francis the young King of France died, leaving the Crown to his younger brother Charles, who was guided altogether by the Queen-Mother, and molested with the Civill dissentions between the Princes of Guise and Conde; for whose reconcilement, the Queen sent Sir Henry Sidney, Lord President of Wales; and shortly after an Army, under the leading of the Lord Ambrose Dudley, Earl of Warwick; who arriving at Newhaven, was received into the Town; which having kept eleven months, he was then constrayned, by reason of a Pestilence, to surrender again upon Composition, and so returned.

About this time when the Parliament was upon dissolving; it was agreed upon by the House of Commons, to move the Queen to marry, that she might have Issue to succeed her; to which purpose, Thomas Gargrave, Speaker of the House, with some few other chosen men, had accesse to the Queen, who humbly made the motion to her, as a thing which the Kingdom infinitely desired; seeing they could never hope to have a better Prince, then out of her loyns: Whereunto the Queen answered in effect thus; That she was already marryed; namely, To the Kingdom of England: and behold (saith she) the Pledge of the Covenant with my husband; and therewith she held out her finger, and shewed the Ring, wherewith, at the time of her Coronation, she gave her self in Wedlock to the Kingdom: and if (saith she) I keep my self to this husband, and take no other; yet I doubt not but God will send you as good Kings, as if they were born of me; forasmuch as we see by dayly experience, That the Issue of the best Princes do often degenerate: And for my self, it shall be sufficient that a Marble stone declare, That a Queen having Raigned such a time, lived and dyed a Virgin. Indeed before this time, many Matches had been offered her: First, King Philip: and when he was out of hope of matching with her himself, he then dealt with the Emperor Ferdinand his Unkle, to commend his younger Son

Son Charles, Duke of Austria, to her for a husband. And when this succeeded not, then John, Duke of Finland, second Son to Gustavus King of Sweden, was sent by his father, to solicite for his eldest Brother Ericus: who was honourably received, but the Match rejected. Then Adolphus Duke of Holst, Unkle to Frederick King of Denmark, came into England, upon a great hope of speeding; but the Queen bestowed upon him the Honour of the Garter, and a yeerly Pension, but not her self. Then James Earl of Arran, was commended to her by the Protestants of Scotland; but neither the man nor the motion was accepted. Of meaner Fortunes there were some at home that pleased themselves with hope of her Marriage: First, Sir William Pickering, a Gentleman of a good House, and a good Estate; but that which most commended him, was his studiousnesse of good letters, and sweet demeanour. Then Henry, Earl of Arundel, exceeding rich, but now in his declining age. Then Robert Dudley, youngest son of the Duke of Northumberland, of an excellent feature of face, and now in the flower of his age: but these might please themselves with their own conceit; but were not considerable in her apprehension: they might receive from her good Testimonies of her Princely favour; but never Pledges of Nuptiall love.

About this time the Earl of Feria (who had married the daughter of Sir William Dormer) being denyed leave of the Queen for some of his wives friends to live out of England, grew so incensed, that he made means to Pius the fourth, then Pope, to have her excommunicate, as an Heretick and Usurper: but the Pope inclining rather to save then to destroy; and knowing that gentle courses prevail more with generous mindes, then roughnesse and violence; in most loving manner wrote unto her, exhorting her to return to the Unity of the Catholike Church; and as it is said, made her great offers, if she would hearken to his counsell; Particularly, That he would recall the Sentence pronounced against her mothers Marriage; confirm the Book of Common Prayer in English; and permit to her people the use of the Sacrament in both Kindes. But Queen Elizabeth neither terrified with the Earl of Feria's practises, nor allured with the Popes great offers, according to her Motto, Semper Eadem, persisted constant in her resolution, To maintain that Religion, which in her conscience she was perswaded, to be most agreeable to the Word of God, and most consonant to the Primitive Church.

Whilst these grounds of Troubles are sowing in England, France, and Scotland, it is not likely that Ireland will lie fallow; though indeed it be a Countrey that will bring forth Troubles of it self, without sowing: but howsoever, to make the more plentifull Harvest of troubles at this time, John Oneal (whose father King Henry the eighth made Earl of Tyrone) to prevent the punishment of a private Out-rage upon a Brother, broke into open Rebellion against the Prince: and though his attempts were maturely made frustrate by timely opposition; yet this was he that in the beginning of the Queens Raign, sowed the seeds of that trouble in Ireland; which afterward took so deep root, that till the ending of her Raign, it could never thorowly be rooted out: though this man a yeer or two after came into England, and casting himself at the Queens feet, acknowledged his fault, and obtained pardon.

The Treaty of Edinburgh should by promise have been confirmed by Francis the French King while he lived: he not having done it, Queen Elizabeth requires his Dowager the Queen of Scots to confirm it: but she solicited often to it by Throgmorton the Queens Ligier in France; made alwayes answer, She could not do it without the counsell of her Nobility in Scotland: whereupon Queen Elizabeth suspecting that this answer was but to hold her in amuzement, while some mischief was practising against her, her, sent Sir Thomas Randoll into Scotland, to perswade the Lords there to enter into a League of mutuall amity with her, and other Protestant Princes: and further, by no means to permit their Queen, now a widow, to marry again to any forraign Prince, for which she alleadged many great reasons. In the mean while, the Queen of Scots, purposing to return into Scotland, sent before-hand D'Oysette a French Lord, to intreat Queen Elizabeth, that with her leave, she her self might passe by Sea into Scotland, and D'Oysette might passe by Land. But Queen Elizabeth openly denyed both the one and the other, unlesse she would confirm the Treaty of Edinburgh; saying, It was no reason she should do the Queen of Scots courtesie, if the Queen of Scots would not do her right. The Queen of Scots much troubled with this answer, expostulates the matter with her Ligier Throgmorton, and much complains of the unkindenesse: but in the mean time providing Shipping, she loosed from Calice; and under covert of a mist, notwithstanding that Ships were laid to intercept her, she arrived safe in Scotland; where she intreated her subjects in so loving a manner, that she gave great contentment to the whole Kingdom; as well to the Protestant Party, as the other: and then sent Letters to Queen Elizabeth, proferring all observance and readinesse to enter League with her; so she might by Authority of Parliament be declared her Successor; which was but her Right. To this Queen Elizabeth answered, That though she would no way derogate from her Right: yet she should be loth to endanger her own security, and as it were to cover her own eyes with a Grave-cloth while she was alive; but fell again to her old Admonition, requiring her to confirm the Treaty of Edinburgh: And now to shew the respect she bore her, when her Unkles the Dukes D'Aumale, D'Albeuse, and other Lords of France that had brought her home, returned thorow England, she gave them most bountifull and loving entertainment.

These two Queens indeed were both of great Spirits, and both very wise; but there grew such Jealousies of State between them; (the Queen of Scots doubting lest Queen Elizabeth meant to frustrate her Succession; Queen Elizabeth doubting lest the Queen of Scots meant to prevent her succession) that it kept them more asunder in love, then they were neer in blood, and was cause of many unkinde passages between them: in all which, though the Queen of Scots were a very neer Match to the Queen of England in the abilities of her minde; yet in the favours of Fortune she was much her inferiour.

But now for all the courtesie which Q. Elizabeth shewed to the Queen of Scots Unkles at their returning thorow England, yet new practises were again set on foot against her at Rome; the Duke of Guise especially labouring to have her be Excommunicate; but Pope Pius still averse from such roughnesse, meant now to try the Queen another way; and thereupon sent the Abbot Martinengi; and when he might not be admitted to enter England, then caused the Bishop of Viterbo his Nuntio in France, to deal earnestly with the Queens Ligier Throgmorton, that she (as other Princes had done) would send her Orators to the Councell of Trent, which he before had called. But the Queen nothing tender in this point, made peremptory answer, That a Popish Assembly she did not acknowledge to be a Generall Councell; nor did think the Pope to have any more Right or Power to call it, then any other Bishop. This Answer not only exasperated the Pope, but so alienated also the King of Spain's minde from her, that he was never after so kinde a friend to her as he had been; and none of her Embassadours ever after had any great liking to be employed to him. And now at this time, as the Abbot Martinengi was the last Nuntio that ever was sent from the Pope into England, so Sir Edward Carne, now dying at Rome, was the last Ligier that was ever sent to the Pope from the Kings of England.

And

And now Queen Elizabeth knowing well that she had drawn many ill willers against her State, she endeavoured to strengthen it by all the means she could devise: She caused many great Ordnance of Brasse and Iron to be cast; She repaired Fortifications in the Borders of Scotland; She encreased the number of her Ships, so as England never had such a Navy before; She provided great store of Armour and Weapons out of Germany; she caused Musters to be held, and youth to be trayned in exercises of Artillery; and to please the people (whose love is the greatest strength of all) she gave leave to have Corn and Grayn transported; and called in all base Coyns and Brasse Money.

It was now the Fifth yeer of Queen Elizabeths Raine: when diverse great persons were called in question: Margaret Countesse of Lenox, Neece to to King Henry the eight, by his eldest sister, and her husband the Earle of Lenox, for having had secret conference, by letters with the Queen of Scots, were delivered prisoners to Sir Richard Sackvile, Master of the Rolles, and with him kept a while in custody. Also Arthur Poole and his brother, whose great grand-father, was George Duke of Clarence, brother to King Edward the fourth: Antony Forteseue, who had married their sister, and other, were arraigned, for conspiring to withdraw themselves to the Duke of Guise in France; and from thence to return with an Army into Wales; to Declare the Queen of Scots, Queen of England; and Arthur Poole Duke of Clearnce; which particulars they confessed at the Barre, and were thereupon condemned to die; but had their lives spared, in regard they were of the Blood Royall. Also the Ladie Katherine Grey, daughter to Henry Grey Duke of Suffolke, by the eldest daughter of Charles Brandon; having formerly been married to the Earle Pembrookes eldest sonne; and from him soone after lawfull divorced, was some yeers after found to be with childe by Edward Seymoure Earl of Hertford: who being at that time in France, was presently sent for; and being examined before the Archbishp of Canterbury: and affirming they were lawfully married; but not being able within a limited time to produce witnesses of their marriage; they were both committed to the Tower: where she was brought to Bed: and after by the Connivence or Corruption of their Keepers, being suffered sometimes to come together: Shee was with childe by him again, which made the Queen more angry then before, so as Sir Edward Warner Lieutenent of the Tower was put out of his place, and the Earle was fined in the star-chamber, five thousand pounds, and kept in prison nine yeers after. Though in pleading of his Case; One John Hales argued; They were lawfull man and wife, by virtue of their owne bare Consent, without any Ecclesiasticall Ceremonie. The Lady a few yeers after, falling through grief into a mortall Sickneſſe, humbly desired the Queens Pardon, for having married without her knowledge, and commending her children to her clemency, dyed in the Tower.

At this time (the King being under Age) dissentions amongst the Peeres grew hot in France; of which there were two Factions; Both pretending the cause of Religion: of the One the Duke Guise, a Paipst, was Head; of the other the Prince of Conde a Protestant: but while Delirant Reges Plectuntur Achiui: while these Princes are at variance, the people suffer for it: and chiefly, as being under the weaker protection, the Protestant Party: where upon Queene Elizabeth, having well learned the Lesson: Tum tua res agitur, partis cum proximus ardet: and fearing least the flaim of their dissention, might kindle a fire within her owne Kingdome; sent over Sir Henry Sidney Lord Presiden of Wales into France, to endeavour by all possible means their reconcilement, which when hee could not effect,

(and perhaps it was never meant he should effect it, but onely to see what invitations would be made to the Queen for her assistance) she thereupon, at the moan of the afflicted Protestants, sent over an Army of six thousand Souldiers, under the Conduct of the Earl of Warwick, in assistance of the Prince of Conde, and other Protestant Lords, who delivered to him the Town of Newhaven, to hold in the King of France his name, untill such time as Calice were restored: But the Prince of Conde marching to joyn with the English Forces, was by the Duke of Guise interrupted and taken prisoner; which had been a great disappointment to the English, but that the Duke of Colin joyned with him, besieged Caen in Normandy, and took it; togeather with Bayeux, Faleise, and Saint Lo. The French Hostages that were pledges for the payment of five hundred thousand Cowns, if Calice were not restored, were remaining still in England; who perceiving there was like to be War with France, prepared secretly to get away; but being ready to take Shipping, were discovered, and brought back again.

In the mean while, the Prince of Conde drawn on with a hope, to marry the Queen of Scots, and to have the chief Government in France, during the Kings Minority, concluded a Peace with the King, and with the Guises; so as now, all French, as well Protestants as Papists, required to have Newhaven delivered up: But the Earl of Warwick perceiving the fickleness of the French Protestants, First to make sure to draw him into France, and now upon so slight occasion to require him to be gone, he shutteth all French, both Protestants and Papists, out of the Town, and layes hold of their Ships; the French on the other side make ready to set upon the Town, saying, They fought not now for Religion, but for their Countrey; wherefore it was meet that both Protestants and Papists should joyn their Forces, seeing they had already concluded a Peace betwixt themselves. And hereupon the Duke of Memorancy sent a Trumpetter to the Earl of Warwick, commanding him yeeld the Town; who making answer by Sir Hugh Pawlet, That he would never yeeld it without the Queens leave: he thereupon besieged the Town, and with great violence of Battery, sought to get it by force: Which Queen Elizabeth hearing, she sent a Commission to the Earl of Warwick to yeeld it up, if upon honourable Conditions; which soon after was accordingly done, after the English had held it eleven months; and then the Earl, without any dishonour for yeelding up a Town, which the Pestilence made him no lesse unwilling then unable to hold, he returned into England: but that which was more dolefull then the losse of Newhaven, he brought the Pestilence with him into England. The recovery of this Town not onely made the French to triumph, but hereupon the Chancellor of France pronounced openly, That by this Warre, the English had lost all their Right to Calice, and were not to require it any more, seeing it was one of the Conditions, That neither of the Nations should make Warre upon the other; which was the Point stood upon by the King of France and his mother, when Queen Elizabeth sent Sir Thomas Smith to demand Calice to be restored.

At this time there were such crosse designes amongst the Princes of Christendome, that a very good Polititian could hardly understand their Ayms. The Duke of Guise being slain in the Civill Warre, the Queen of Scots Dowry was not paid her in France, and the Scots were put off from being the Kings Guard: This exceedingly displeased the Queen of Scots: but then to please her again, and for fear lest hereupon she should apply her self to the friendship of the English, her Unkle the Cardinall of Lorrain solicites her afresh, to marry Charls Duke of Austria

Austria, offering her for her Dowry the County of Tyroll. The Queen of Scots, to make use of her Unkles fear, and perhaps to bring Queen Elizabeth into an opinion of depending upon her, acquaints her with this motion, and therein requires her advice. Queen Elizabeth not willing she should marry with any forraign Prince, perswades her to take a husband out of England, and particularly commended to her the Lord Robert Dudley (whose wife a little before had with a fall broke her neck) promising withall, that if she would marry him, she should then by Authority of Parliament, be declared her successour, in case she dyed without issue. But when her Unkles and the Queen-Mother were informed of this motion, they so much disdained the Marriage with Dudley, that so she would refuse that Match, and perseverein the friendship of the French, they offered to pay her the Dowry money that was behinde, and to restore the Scots to all their former liberties in France. And as for the King of Spain, he had indeed a Ligier Embassadour here in England; but rather by way of complement, and to watch advantages, then for any sincere love; which he began now to withdraw from the English, as suspecting them to intend a Trade to the West Indies.

And now the French Protestants may see what they brought upon themselves, by leaving the English at Newhaven, and by trusting to their Country-men the French Papists; for their peace was but a snare, and the Marriage of Henry of Bourbon, Prince of Navarre, with Margaret of Valois, the French Kings sister, was but a bait to entrap them; for upon the confidence of this Marriage, being drawn together into Paris, they were the readier for the slaughter; and a few dayes after the Marriage, which were all spent in Feasts and Masks, to make them the more secure, upon a Watch-word given, the bloody faction fell upon the Protestants, and neither spared age, nor sex, nor condition, but without mercy, and sense of humanity, slaughtered as many as they could meet with, to the number of many thousands.

It was now the sixth yeer of Queen Elizabeths Raign, a yeer fatall for the death of many great Personages: First died William, Lord Grey of Wellon, Governour of Berwick, a man famous for his great Services in War: then William, Lord Paget, a man of as great Services in Peace; who by his great deservings, had wrought his advancement to sundry dignities, and honourable places: and though zealous in the Roman Religion, yet held by Queen Elizabeth in great estimation to his dying day: Then Henry Mannors, Earl of Rutland, descended by his mother from King Edward the fourth: And lastly, Francis the Dutchesse of Suffolk, daughter to Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, and mother to Queen Jane.

And now Queen Elizabeth finding how fickle the French Protestants had carryed themselves towards her, intended to make a Peace; and to that end sent Sir Thomas Smith into France, joyning Throgmorton in Commission with him; and in conclusion a Peace was agreed on; whereof, amongst other Articles, this was one, That the Hostages in England should be freed, upon the payment of six hundred thousand Crowns: and this Peace was ratified by the Oath both of the Queen of England, and the King of France.

About this time the English Merchants were hardly used both in Spain, and in the Netherlands, upon pretence of Civill differences, but indeed out of hatred to the Protestant Religion; whereupon the English removed the seat of their Trading to Embden in Freezland: but Gusman the Spanish Liegier, newly come into England, finding the great dammages that the Netherlands sustained by these differences, endeavoured by all means to compose them; and thereupon Viscount Mountague, Nicholas Wootton, and Walter Haddon, Master of the Requests, were sent to Bruges in Flanders; who, after many interruptions, brought the matter at last to some indifferent agreement.

It was now the seventh yeer of Queen Elizabeth; when making a Progresse, she went to see Cambridge; where after she had viewed the Colledges, and been entertained with Comedies, and Scholasticall Disputations, she made her self a Latine Oration, to the great encouragement of the Scholars, and then returned. Presently after her return, she made the Lord Robert Dudley Master of her Horse, first Baron of Denbigh (giving him Denbigh and all the Lands belonging to it) and then Earl of Leicester, to him, and the heirs males of his body lawfully begotten: which Honour was conferred upon him with the greatest State and Solemnity that was ever known. And now Leicester, to endear himself to the Queen of Scots, accused Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper, for being privy to the libell of Hales, who affirmed the Right of the Crown to belong to the Family of Suffolk, in case the Queen should die without Issue; and thereupon was Bacon cast into prison; till afterward, upon his purgation, and the mediation of Sir William Cecill, he was set at liberty, and restored to his place.

And now for a while we must cast our eyes upon Scotland, for that was now the Stage where all the great businesses of State were acted: Matthew Steward, Earl of Lenox, who had marryed Margaret Dowglas, King Henry the eighth's Neece by his eldest sister, had been kept as an Exile in England now twenty yeers; him the Queen of Scots invites to come into Scotland, under pretence of restoring to him his ancient Patrimony; but indeed to conferre with him about a Marriage with his son the Lord Darlie, for being reputed heir to the Crown of England, next after her self; she thought by matching with his son, to strengthen her own title, and to prevent the hope of any other. Queen Elizabeth, upon sute made by his wife, gave the Earl leave to go; but soon after, suspecting what the Queen of Scots intent was in sending for him, she, to hinder the proceeding, sent Sir Thomas Randoll to her, to let her know, That if she proceeded in this Match, she would exceedingly wrong her self; for that it was a Match so much disliked by all the English, that she was fain to prorogue the Parliament, lest upon dislike thereof, there should something be enacted against her Right of Succession: But if she would marry the Earl of Leicester, she should then by Parliament be declared her next Heir. Hereupon, in the month of November, the Earl of Bedford, and Sir Thomas Randoll for Queen Elizabeth, the Earl of Murray and Lidington for the Queen of Scots at Barwick, entred into a Treaty concerning the Marriage with the Earl of Leicester. The English Commissioners urged the great benefits that by this Match would accrew both to the Queen of Scots her self, and to the whole Kingdom of Scotland: The Scottish on the other side, urged the great disparagement it would be to the Queen of Scots, if refusing the offers made her of divers great Princes, she should match her self with so mean a person as the Earl of Leicester. This matter held long debate, partly for that the English Commissioners were so appointed by Queen Elizabeth; and partly for that the Scottish Commissioners had a good minde to hinder her from marrying at all; and perhaps not the least, for that the Earl of Leicester, being verily perswaded he should at last obtain Queen Elizabeth her self, by secret Letters warned the Earl of Bedford not to urge the Marriage with the Queen of Scots too far; and was thought for this cause to favour Darly under hand. The matter being in this manner protracted for two whole yeers together, the Queen of Scots impatient of longer delay, and being resolved in her minde what she would do, used means that the Lord Darly got leave of Queen Elizabeth to go into Scotland for three months onely, under colour to be put in possession of his fathers Lands (though it be strange, the Queen upon any termes would let him go, if she really intended to hinder the Marri-

Marriage: but such was the destiny, if there were not a plot in it) and so in February he came to Edinburgh; who being a young man, of not above nineteen yeers of age, of a comely countenance, and most Princely Presence, the Queen of Scots as soon as she saw him, fell in love with him, yet in modesty dissembling it for the present; she sought to get a Dispensaon from Rome, because of their neerneesse in Consanguinity. And now, her inclination being grown so apparent, that there was no concealing it, she sent Lydington to Queen Elizabeth, desiring her consent. But she, through the suggestions of the Earl of Murray, being induced to believe that the Queen of Scots intention was, by this Marriage, to get the Crown of England, and to bring in Popery, entred into consultation with her Privy Councell, what was fit to be done to hinder the Marriage; who all concluded, that these were the best wayes: First, To have a Company of Souldiers levyed for terrour sake, about the Borders towards Scotland; then to commit to prison the Countesse of Lenox, the Lord Darlies Mother; and to recall from Scotland the Earl of Lenox and his son Darly, upon pain of the losse of all their goods in England: then that the Scots, who were known to be averse from the Marriage, should be relieved and assisted: and lastly, That Katherine Grey, with the Earl of Hertford, should be received into some grace; about whom onely (it was thought) the Queen of Scots was most solicitous, as being her Rivall to the English Crown. Hereupon Sir Nicholas Throgmorton was sent to the Queen of Scots, to counsell her in the Queens name, not to proceed in this Marriage; and to shew her the many inconveniences that would accrew unto her by it. But she returned answer, That the matter was too far passed to be recalled; and that Queen Elizabeth had no cause to be displeased with it; seeing herein she followed her advice, Not to match with a stranger, but with an English man born. Queen Elizabeth being informed of her answer, calleth home the Earl of Lenox, and the Lord Darly his son, commanding them upon their Allegiance to return: The Father modestly by Letters excuseth himself; the son humbly intreateth her not to be a hinderance to his preferment; which he vows to employ in her Majesties Service to the uttermost of his power. And now, to make him the fitter match for her, the Queen of Scots honoured him first with Knighthood; then with the Dignities of the Lord Armanack, Earl of Ross, and Duke of Rothsay; which Dukedom by Birth, pertaineth to the eldest sons of the Kings of Scotland. After this, when he had not been above five months in Scotland, she marryed him, and with the consent of most of the Peers, declared him King. At this, the Earl of Murray, and other whom he drew to his party extremely fretted, and fell to moving of turbulent questions, Whether it were lawfull to admit a Papist King? Whether the Queen of Scots might choose a husband at her own pleasure? and whether the Peers of the Kingdom might not out of their Authority, impose one upon her? But howsoever, they raised Arms, and had disturbed the Nuptialls, but that the Queen levyed an Army to encounter them; with which she pursued them so closely, that they were fain to fly into England for protection; where Queen Elizabeth made no scruple to receive them, seeing the Queen of Scots had received Tarely, Standon, and Wallis, that were fled out of England; but the Earl of Murray especially; who had alwayes been found addicted to the English. Queen Elizabeth perhaps was not much troubled at this Marriage, partly as knowing the milde disposition of the Lord Darly, and how little accesse of strength it brought to the Queen of Scots; but most of all, as plainly seeing there would troubles arise in Scotland upon it; and the troubles of Scotland would be the quietnesse of England; which, as a good Mother of her Country, was the mark she aymed at: yet she made a shew of being offended with it, but rather to conceal her aym, then that she was offended with it indeed.

At

At this time the Emperour Maximilian sent to Queen Elizabeth his Embassadour, Adam Smiricote, renewing the former sute for his brother Charles of Austria; for which Marriage the Earl of Sussex was very earnest; the Earl of Leicester as much against it; so as it grew to a quarrell between them, and the Court was divided into factions about it: but the Queen, who never liked the dissentions of her Peers (though it be a Rule with some, Divide, and Raign) made them friends, at least in countenance.

We may now leave Scotland a while, and see the Honour done at this time to Queen Elizabeth, not much inferiour to the Honour done to Solomon by the Queen of Saba; for now Cecile, the sister of Errick King of Sweden, and wife of Christopher Marquesse of Baden, being great with childe, came from the farthest part of the North (a long Journey) thorow Germany, of purpose to see her, for the great fame she had heard of her Wisedom: At her being here, she was delivered of a childe, to whom, in requitall of her kindenesse, Queen Elizabeth was God-mother, and named him Edwardus Fortunatus; giving to her and her husband, besides Royall Entertainment, a yeerly Pension. At this time also, for the great Fame of her wisedome, Donald mac Carty More, a great Potentate of Ireland, came and delivered up into her hands all his most ample Territories; and then receiving them again from her, to hold them to him and his Heirs males lawfully begotten; and for want of such Issue, to remain to the Crown of England. The Queen in requitall, invested him with the honour of Earl of Glenkarne, and Baron of Valence; and besides many Presents given him, paid the charges of his Journey.

It was now the eighth yeer of Queen Elizabeths Raign; when Sir Nicholas Arnold, a Knight of Glocestershire, Governing Ireland under the title of a Justice, was called home, and Sir Henry Sidney placed in his room. And here by the way it is to be noted, That the Governours of Ireland, after it came under the English, were at first called Justices of Ireland; afterwards, Lievtenants; and their Vice-gerents were called Deputies. Afterwards at the Princes pleasure, sometimes Deputies, sometimes Justices, and sometimes Lievtenants; which last Title, though it be of greatest honour, yet in power is in a manner but the same. Sir Henry Sidney at his coming into Ireland, found the Province of Munster in much disorder, by reason of strife between Gyrald Earl of Desmond, and Thomas Earl of Ormond: whereupon the Queen sending for the Earl of Desmond into England, ordained a new Government in that Province, appointing a President to administer Justice, together with an Assistant on the Bench, two Lawyers and a Notary: and the first President she made in this place, was Sir William Sent-leger.

And now Queen Elizabeth in a Progresse went to Oxford; where she took pleasure in viewing the Colledges, in hearing Orations, in seeing of Comedies, till the Comedy of Palemon and Arcite turned to a Tragedy, for by the fall of a wall, through the multitude of people that pressed in to see it, three men were slain. At her coming away, she made an Oration in Latine to the Schollars, a sufficient recompence for all the Orations they had made to her. And this yeer, was a call of seven new Serjeants at Law, who kept their Feast at Grayes Inne in Holborn.

Upon the Queens return from Oxford, the Parliament began, where they presently fell upon the matter of succession; and moving the Queen to marry; in which points some went so far, that they spared not to accuse the Queen, as one careless of Posterity; to defame Cecill with libells and reproaches, as if he were her Counsellour in this matter; but above all, to curse Doctor Huic her Physitian, who was thought to disswade her from Marriage, by reason of I know not what womanish insufficiency. At last in the Upper House it was agreed, That Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper, their Orator, should in all their names beseech the Queen to marry; and withall, to declare a Successor in the Crown, if she should happen to die without Issue; for which he gave many reasons, declaring what mischiefs were likely to befall the Kingdom, if she should die before a Successor were designed. But in the Lower House there were some, amongst whom, were Bell and Mounson (two Lawyers of great account) Dutton, Sir Paul Wentworth, and other, who grew to far higher tearms, disparaging the Queens Authority, and saying, That Princes were bound to designe a Successor; and that in not doing it, the Queen should shew her self no better then a parricide of her Countrey. The Queen was contented to bear with words spoken in Parliament; which spoken out of Parliament, she would never have endured: but not willing to expostulate the matter with the whole number, she commanded that thirty of the Higher House, and as many of the Lower, should appear before her, to whom she delivered her minde to this effect; That she knew what danger hangeth over a Princes head, when a Successor is once declared; she knew that even children themselves, out of a hastie desire of bearing Rule, had taken up Armes against their own fathers; and how could better conditions be expected from kindred? She had by reading observed, That Successors in a collaterall Line, have seldom been declared; and that Lewis of Orleance, and Francis of Angoulesme were never declared Successors, and yet obtained the Crown without any noyse. Lastly, she said, Though I have been content to let you debate the matter of Succession, yet I advise you to beware, that you be not injurious to your Princes patience. With these and the like reasons she gave so good satisfaction, that they never after troubled her with making any more such motion. And though she consented not in plain tearms to declare a Successor, yet soon after she gave some intimation of it; for one Thornton, a Reader of the Civill Law in London, who in his Lectures, called the Queen of Scots Right in question, was clapped up in prison for his labour.

In the beginning of her ninth yeer, Charles the ninth, King of France, sent his Ambassadour Ramboulet into England to the Queen, with the Robes and Ornaments of the Order of S. Michael, to bestow upon which two of her Nobility she pleased; and she making choice of the Duke of Norfolk, and the Earl of Leicester, they were by Ramboulet invested with them; an Honour that had never been conferred upon any English, but only K. Henry the eighth, King Edward the sixth, and Charls Brandon Duke of Suffolk, though afterward prostituted almost to any, without difference.

And now to return to the Affairs of Scotland: The nineteenth of June last past, the Queen of Scots, in a happy hour, was at Edinborough Castle diliveted of a Son, that was afterward James the sixth of Scotland, and the first Monarch of Great Britain; whereof she presently sent word to Queen Elizabeth by James Melvyne; who thereupon sent Sir Henry Killigrew to congratulate her safe deliverance; and her young son, with all demonstration of love and amity. But now the love of the Queen of Scots to her husband the Lord Darly, was not so hot at first, but it was now grown to be as cold; and she had not heaped honour on him so fast before, but now as fast she taketh them off: for where before in all publike Acts, she had used to place her husbands name first, now she caused it to be placed last, and in the coyning of money began to leave it quite out.

This unkindeness between them was fomented by one David Rizie an Italian, whom the Queen had taken into her service, first, as a Musician, and then taking a liking to him, made him here Secretary for the French Tongue; by means whereof, he had oftentimes secret conference with her, when the King her Husband might not be admitted. This indignity the King himself, being given to his pleasures of Hunt-

Hunting and Hawking, resented not so much, as some Lords that were his friends; who told him plainly, That it stood not with his Honour to suffer this fellow to live. By whose instigation the King drawn to plot his death; One day, taking with him the Earl of Ruwen, and other, he rushed into the Queens Chamber at her Supper time, where finding David Rizie at a Cupboord, tasting some meat that had been taken from the Table, he seized upon him, dragged him forth into an outer Chamber, and there murthered him; the Queen at that time being great with childe; and like by that affright to have miscarryed: But the Fact being done, the King came in to her again, assuring her there was no hurt at all intended to her Person. The man that had animated the King to do this fact, was especially the Earl Murray, of whom it is necessary to say something, because his part will be the greatest of all the Scottish Actions of this time. He was the base sonne of King James the fifth, and so the base brother of the Queen; made at first, Prior of Saint Andrewes: But not liking that Religious Title, he affected rather some Temporall Honour; which when the Queen, being then in France, denyed him, then in an angry mood returned into Scotland, where, by the advice of Knox, whom he held for a great Patriark, brought the matter so to passe, that in an Assembly of the States, the Religion was altered, and the French were banished out of Scotland. Yet afterward, as soon as the Queen was a Widow, he posted into France, and so insinuated with her, that she created him Earl of Murray, and promoted him to an Honourable Marriage. Being thus exalted, he returned into Scotland; where, for the further growth of his ambitious designes, he sowed seeds of Sedition, affirming often, what a misery it was to be under the Command of a woman; and that Royalty was not to be tyed to any Stock or Kindred, but to Vertue onely, whether the parties were legitimate or no; by this course making way to the Kingdom for himself. To this end, he used all the means he could to keep the Queen from marrying again; which when he could not effect, he then sought wayes how to make discord between her and her Husband; for which cause he had caused the King to murther Rizie. Of the foulnesse of which Fact, when the King had a while grew sensible, he meant to be revenged of Murray, who had counselled him to do it: which Murray understanding, prevented it with causing the like to be done to him, as will presently be seen. For the Queen having been delivered of a Son, and the day appointed for the Christning being come; where the God-fathers were Charles King of France, and Philibert Duke of Savoy; Queen Elizabeth being requested to be God-mother, sent thither the Earl of Bedford as her Deputy, and a Font of Massie Gold for a Present, in value 1043 l. but gave him expresse Command, That he should not honour Darly with the Title of King. But before a month or two, after the Christning were passed, The King in a stormy and tempestuous night, was strangled in his Bed, and then cast forth into the Garden, and the house immediately blown up with Gun-powder.

The rumour of this murther being spread abroad, the common Fame laid it upon Murray and Morton, and their Confederates; Murray and Morton upon the Queen: But we must not here give ear to that which BUCHANAN writes; who to curry favour with the Earl MURRAY, layes most impudent scandalls upon the Queene; whereof, before his death, he repented himself extremely. The King thus murthered, and the QUEENE left alone to her self, she is counselled to marry with some, that might be able to assist her against all her opposites: JAMES Hep-

Hepburn Earl of Bothwell being then greatly in her favour, and of great eminencie for his valour: And though he were the man that had acted the murther, yet is he by Murray and his confederates, commended to the Queen; to which motion, as being destitute of friends, and not knowing whom to trust; she at last consents, but upon these conditions, That above all things, respect might be had to her yong Sonne; and that Bothwell might be legally quitted, both from the bond of his former marriage, and also of the Kings murther. Hereupon a course is plotted, by which, Bothwell is called to the Barre; and Morton being his Advocate, by the Sentence of Judges he is cleerly acquitted. Upon this, he is created Duke of Orkency, and by consent of many of the Nobility, is marryed to the Queen; which bred a suspition in many, that the Queen was conscious of the murther, which was the thing that by the marriage they intended: And the suspition once raised, they seek by all means to increase, that they may have the better colour against her; and so, the very same man who had absolved Bothwell, and consented to the marriage, now takes Arms against her, as a Delinquent in both; force him to flee, and then seize upon the Queen, whom, clad in a very homely garment, they thrust into prison in Loch-levyn, under the custody of Murray's mother, who had been the Harlot of King James the fifth; but boasting her self to have been his lawfull wife, and her son, his lawfull Issue. Queen Elisabeth having at length notice hereof, sent Sir Nicholas Throgmorton into Scotland, to expostulate with the Confederates, touching this insolent usage of the Queen; and to consult, by what means shee might be restored to her liberty. But Throgmorton coming into Scotland, found the Confederates in more insolent terms then had been reported; being divided in opinion, what to do with the Queen, some would have her banished perpetually, into England or France; some would have her questioned before the Judges, committed to perpetuall custody, and her son proclaimed King: others, more inhumane, would have her at once deprived of Princely Authority, of life and all; and this, Knox and some other Ministers thundred out of the Pulpits. Throgmorton on the other side, alleaged many passages out of the holy Scriptures, touching Obedience to the higher Powers; maintaining, That the Queen was subject to no Tribunall, but that in Heaven; That no Judge upon Earth might call her in question; That there was no Office nor Jurisdiction in Scotland, which was not derived from her Authority, and revokeable at her pleasure. They again opposed the peculiar Right of the Kingdom of Scotland, and that in extraordinary cases, they were to proceed besides order; taking up Buchanans Arguments, who in those dayes, by instigation of Murray, wrote that damned Dialogue, De Jure Regni apud Scotos; wherein, against the verity of the Scottish History, he indeavours to prove, That the People have power, both to create, and to depose their King. After all their debating, all that Throgmorton could get of them, was a Writing without any Subscription, wherein they protested, They had shut up the Queen for no other intent, but to keep her apart from Bothwell, whom she loved so desperately, that to injoy him, she regarded not all their ruines; willing him to rest satisfied with this Answer, till such time as the rest of the Peers met together. And notwithstanding all he could say, they shut up the Queen daily, in more straight custody, though with tears she besought them to deal more mildly with her, and to let her but once have a sight of her son, which would not be granted her. At last when fair perswasions would not serve to make her freely give over the Kingdom, they threatned to question her openly for incontinent living, for the Kings murder, and for Tyranny, so as through feare of death, they compelled Her, unheard, to set her hand hand to three Instruments; In the first whereof, she gave over the Kingdom to her young son, at that time scarce thirteen Months old: In the second, she constituted Murray Vice-Roy during the minority of her son: In the third, in case he refused the charge, these Governours were nominated; James Duke of Chasteau, Herald, Giles Spike Earl of Argile, Mathew Earl of Lenox, John Earl of Atholl, James Earl of Morton, Alexander Earl of Glencarn, and John Earl of Mar. And presently she signified to Queen Elizabeth by Throgmorton, that she had made these grants by compulsion through the counsell of Throgmorton, telling her that a grant extorted from one in prison (which is a just fear) is actually void and of no effect.

Five dayes after the Queen had made this Resignation, James the sixth, the Queens Son, was Anointed and Crown'd King, John Knox preaching at the same time; but a Protestation was then put in by the Hamiltons, that all this ought to be no prejudice to the Duke of Chasteau Herald in his Right of succession against the Family of Lenox; but Queen Elisabeth had forbidden Throgmorton to be at the Action, that she might not seem by the presence of her Embassador, to approve their proceeding in displacing of the Queen.

Fifteen dayes after this transaction, Murray himself returned out of France into Scotland, and within three dayes went to the Queen with some other of the confederates, who charged her with many crimes, and wished her if she tendered her Life and Honor, to observe these prescriptions: Not to disturb the peace of the Kingdom, nor desire to be at Liberty, not to stir up the Queen of England, or the King of France to molest Scotland with any War, not to think any more of Bothwells love, or meditate revenge upon Bothwells adversaries.

Murray being now proclaimed Regent of Scotland, he bindeth himself under his Hand and Seal to do nothing which shall concerne War or Peace, the Kings Person or his marriage, or the Liberty of the Queen, without the consent of the confederates; and then gives Throgmorton warning by Lydington, not to make any further intercession for the Queens Liberty, for that he and the rest had rather run any hazard then to suffer it. Soon after he puts to death John Hepburn, Dagliſh, and others that were Bothwells servants, for having a hand in the murther of the King: But they (which he little expected) when they were at the Gallows, ready to dye, protested before God and his holy Angells, that Bothwell had told them, that Morton and Murray were the first authors of the murther. They freed the Queen from all suspition, like as Bothwell himself being prisoner in Denmark, both living and dying, often protested with deep asseverations, that the Queen was innocent. And fourteen yeers after, Morton going to execution, confessed that Bothwell dealt with him to consent to the murther of the King, which, when he refused utterly unlesse the Queen under her hand writing would allow of it; Bothwell made answer, that could not be, but the fact must be done without her knowledge.

A little before this time, upon one and the same day, dyed two of the Privy Councell, Sir John Mason Treasurer of the Queens Chamber, a grave and learned man, but a great Usurper and Encroacher upon Ecclesiasticall Livings; and Sir Richard Sackville Vice-Treasurer of the Exchequer, a man both prudent and provident, and allyed to the Queen by her mother Anne Bolen. In his room succeeded Walter Mildmay, a man of wisdom and integrity; In Masons Office came Sir Francis Knowles, who married Katherine Carle, the daughter of Mary Bolen, the Queens Mothers Sister.

It was now the yeer 1567. And the tenth yeer of Queen Elizabeths Raign, when the Earl of Stollberg came into England from the Emperour Maximillian, to treat of the mariage of the Queen with the Archduke Charls upon which very occasion the Queen a little before had sent the E. of Sussex to to the Emperor, with the Order of the Garter: But in the Treaty of marriage, there fell out so many difficulties, about Religion, maintenance of the Duke, about the Royall Title, and concerning succession, that after it had been treated of seven whole yeers together, it came at last to nothing, and the Duke not long after marryed Mary daughter to Albert the fifth Duke of Bavaria; yet both he and the Emperour continued ever after a good correspondence with the Queen.

About this time, there came from John Basil Emperour of Russia and Muscovia, Stephen Twerdico, and Theodore Pogorella, with a Present of rich Furs of Otter, Miniver, and the like, tendering all service and obsequiousnesse to the Queen and the English. The Merchants by vertue of a Grant from Queen Mary, had combined themselves into a Society, which they called the Muscovie Company, and having large Priviledges granted them from the Emperour, went thither with a Navie yeerly, making a very gainfull Voyage; but then it proved most gainfull, when for the Queens sake they obtained at the Emperours hands, in the yeer 1569. That none but the English of that Company, should Traffique in the North-parts of Russia. With these Russian Embassadours there returned into England, Anthony Jenkinson, who in his Travels had made curious Observation of Russia, set forth a Geographicall Description of it, and was the first of the English that sailed through the Caspian Sea. And this yeer, the 8. of June, Sir Thomas Sackvile was created Baron of Buckhurst, at Whitehall.

We have seen before, the first Act of the Queen of Scots Tragedy: Now comes in the second, having been 11 Moneths kept a prisoner; at last, by the help of George Dowglas, to whose Brother she was committed, she made escape from Loch-levyn, to Hamiltons castle; where upon the testimonies of Robert Melvyn, and others, in a meeting of a great part of the Nobility, there was drawn a sentence declaratory, That the Grant extorted from the Queen in prison, (which is Fustus metus) was actually void from the beginning. Upon which Declaration, great multitudes flocked to her, so as within a day or two she had gotten an Army of at least six thousand; but when they joyned battell with Murray, being but raw and unexpert Souldiers, they were soon defeated. In this case, the Queen sought to save her self by flight, journeying in one day threescore miles, and coming at night to the house of Maxwell Lord Herie, from thence she sent John Beton to Queen Elisabeth with a Diamond Ring, which she had formerly received from her, as a Pledge of mutuall Amity; intimating, that she would come into England, and implore her aid, if her Subjects offered to prosecute her any further. Queen Elisabeth returned answer, that she should expect from her, in abundant manner, all loving and friendly offices. But before the Messenger was returned, she, contrary to the advice of her friends, entred into a small Bark, & with the Lords, Herie, and Flemming, and a few others, landed at Wickinton in Cumberland, neer the mouth of the River of Decwent, the seventeenth day of May; and the same day wrote Letters to the Queen in French with her own hand, the effect whereof was, That having made an escape from the the hands of her insolent and rebellious Subjects, she was now come into England, upon certain hope of her approved clemencie; and therefore humbly desiring, she might forthwith be conducted to her presence. Queen Elisabeth sending Letters by Sir Francis Knolles, comforted her, and promised her aid and defence, according to the equity of her cause; but denyed her accesse, for that she was held guilty of many crimes, giving command to have her brought to Carlile, as a place of better safety. The Queen of Scots receiving this answer, and finding accesse to the Queen denyed her, maketh request again by Letter, that she might have leave, both to unfold the injuries she had received, and to answer the crimes objected, in her own presence; humbly humbly intreating her, that either she might be admitted to have conference and assistance, or else have free leave to depart out of England, to gain supply elsewhere, and not be held a prisoner in the Castle at Carlile, for as much as she came voluntarily into England, relying upon her love so often professed. Upon these Letters, Queen Elisabeth exceedingly commiserated her case, and could have found in her heart to admit her to her presence, but that her Councellours conceived it to be matter for consultation, what to do in this case. To detain her in England, had many mischiefs attending on it; to send her into France, as many; to send her back into Scotland, many more; so as in conclusion, the most were of opinion, to have her detained, as one taken by right of War, and not to be dismissed, till she had made satisfaction for assuming the Title of England, and for the death of Darly her husband, who was born one of the Queens Subjects. In this diversity of opinions, Queen Elisabeth out of her own judgement, sent word by Middemore, to the Regent of Scotland, that he should come himself in person, or else depute some fit persons to answer the complaints of the Queen of Scots against him and his confederates, and render sufficient reasons wherefore they had deprived her; otherwise, she would forthwith dismisse her, and with all the forces she could, settle her in her Kingdom. To this Summons, Murray obeys, and comes to York, the place appointed for this Treaty, accompanied with seven more of his intimate friends, who stood Delegates for the Infant King, namely, James Earl of Morton, Adam Bishop of the Orkeneys, Robert of Dunferm, Patrick Lord of Lyndsey, James Mac-gylly, and Henry Badinary; and with these, Lydington the Secretary, and George Buchanan. And the very same day came thither Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Ratcliff Earl of Sussex, and Sir Ralph Sadler a Privie-Councellour, appointed Commissioners for Queen Elisabeth. For the Queen of Scots, (who took it hainously, that Queen Elisabeth would not hear the cause her self, but refer her to Subjects, being an absolute Prince, and not tyed to their proceedings) there appeared John Lesley Bishop of Ros, William Lord Levyngston, Robert Lord Boyde, Gawen of Kilwynnin, John Gourdon, and James Cockburn. Being met, Lydington turning himself to the Scots, in a wondrous liberty of Speech, gave them this advice, Maturely to consider, what prejudice they should draw upon themselves, by accusing the Queen of Scots, and calling her Reputation in question publikely before the English, professed enemies of the Scottish Nation. Likewise, what account they shall be able to give hereof to the King, when he shall grow to riper years, and shall see what an injury this was to the Kingdom, his Mother, and his own person. Wherefore (said he) it seemeth requisite to forbear this businesse altogether, unlesse the Queen of England will enter into a mutuall league of Offence and Defence, against all those, which under this pretence, shall go about to molest us. Upon this Speech of his, the Delegates of the Queen of Scots made Protestation, That although it pleased the Queen of Scots, to have the cause between her and her disloyall Subjects, debated before the English, yet she being a free Prince, and obnoxious to no earthly Prince whatsoever, did not thereby yeeld her self subject to the Jurisdiction and command of any person. On the contrary, the English protested, That they did in no wise admit that Protestation, in prejudice to the right which the Kings of England have anciently challenged as superiour Lords of the Kingdom of Scotland. The day after, the Queen of Scots Delegates set forth at large the injurious dealing of Morton, Murray, Marre, Glencarn, Hames, and others, against the Queen, and how they had compelled her, for fear of death, to resign her Crown; which therefore (they said) was of no force. Murray and his confederates make answer, That they had done nothing, but by consent of the Peers in Parliament; and that in prosecuting of Bothwell, the author of the Kings murther, ther, whom the Queen protected; and as for her resignation, that it was voluntarily and freely done. All this the Queen of Scots Delegates answered and confuted, affirming in particular, That where there are two Earls, Bishops and Barons, (more or lesse) that have voices in the Parliament of Scotland, there were not in that tumultous assembly they speak of, above four Earls, one Bishop, an Abbot or two, and six Barons; wherefore their earnest request was, that the Queen of England would be sensible of these indignities offered her, and take some course for a speedy redresse. After this, some new Commissioners from Queen Elizabeth were added to the former, to some of whom, the Queen of Scots took exception, unlesse the French and Spanish Embassadors might be taken in, and her self admitted into the presence of the Queen and them, publickly to defend her own innocency; and that Murray might be detained and tried, whom she affirmed, she was able to prove to have been the chief Plotter of the murther of her husband Darley. This was held to be a just demand by the Duke of Norfolk, the Earls of Arundell, Sussex, Leicester, and the Lord Clinton: But Queen Elizabeth waxing somewhat angry, openly said, that the Queen of Scots should never want an Advocate as long as Norfolk lived: It was seen here, which is said, that the heart of the King is inscrutable; for how Queen Elizabeth stood affected in this case of the Queen of Scots, no man could well discern; she detested the insolency of her Subjects in deposing her, and yet gave no assistance to restore her. After long agitation of this businesse, and nothing concluded, Murray a little before his return into Scotland, slyly propounded the mariage of the Queen of Scots to the Duke of Norfolk; which he with a modest answer rejected as a thing full of danger. But withall, Murray the more to alienate Queen Elizabeths mind from the Queen of Scots, gave out, that she had passed away to the Duke of Andyn her Right to the Crown of England, and that the transaction was confirm'd at Rome; he shewd Letters also which the Queen of Scots had written to some friends whom she trusted, wherein she accused the Queen for not dealing with her according to promise, and boasted of succours she expected from some others. This last clause something troubled Queen Elizabeth, neither could she conjecture from whence any such succour should come; seeing both France with the Civill Wars, and the King of Spain in the Low-countries had enough to do at home. But at last it brake out, that one Robert Ridolph a Florentine under the habit of a Merchant in London, was suborned by Pope Pius the fifth, to make a secret commotion of the Papists in England against the Queen, which he performed indeed with a great deal of secrecy and much cunning; whereupon the Queen of Scots was removed from Bolton (a Castle of the Lord Scroops) where all the neighbouring people were Papists; to Tutbury more toward the heart of the Country, under the custody of George Earl of Shrewsbury.

About this time the Guises in France, and the Duke D'Alva in the Low-countries, began to endeavour the utter extirpation of the Protestant Religion. In France the Ministers of the Gospell are commanded within a limitted time to depart the Kingdom; when Queen Elizabeth forgetting the fickleness of the Protestants at New-haven, once again takes upon her their protection; supplyes them with two hundred thousand Crowns in money, besides Munition in abundance, and with all humanity receives the French that fled into England; the rather, for that they made solemn protestation they took not up Arms against their Prince; but only stood upon their own defence. In the Low-countries likewise, the Duke D'Alva, breathing nothing but slaughter and blood; made the Dutch come flocking into England as into a Sanctuary, where with all courtesie they were received.

And

And here it will be fit to shew how the War in the Low-countries began first, which was thus: At which time the King of Spain brought in the Spanish Inquisition; a small number of the meaner sort of people, in tumultuous manner, cast the Images out of Churches and brake them in pieces, and although that tumult was soon quieted, yet the King of Spain taking advantage at the rashnesse of a few, to charge the whole Nation with Rebellion: sent amongst them Ferdinando Alvarez, Duke D' Alva, a bloody and fierce man, (who contrary to the Ordinances and customes of the Country) took away all authority from the ordinary Courts of Justice; Erected new consistories; condemned and put to death the Peers, without tryall by their lawfull Judges; Placed Garrisons of Spaniards throughout all their Cities and Villages, and by force exacted the twentieth part of the fruits of the Earth, and the tenth of moveables upon every Alienation. At that time, a mighty masse of money borrowed from the Genowayes, and other Italian Merchants was sent out of Spain into the Low-countries, there to be imployed to interest, which being brought by shipping, was pursued by the French; and forced to fly for succour into the Havens of England, whom the Queen commanded to be succour'd; as conceiving the money to be the King of Spains as it was given out: But at the same time, Cardinall Odette coming out of France into England, and giving notice to the Queen that the money was not the King of Spains, but belonged to certain merchants of Geneva; from whence the Duke D' Alva had taken it against their will, with a purpose to imploy it to the ruine of the Protestants; and information also being given her by one that had a property in the money that it was so; she determined to put in security, and to borrow the money of the merchants her self, which is an usuall thing with Princes when goods are taken in their Ports; and the King of Spain himself had lately done the like. The Duke D' Alva being informed of this dealing of the Queens; by Gerard de Spese the King of Spains Embassador in England; seizeth presently upon all the goods of the English in the Low-conntries, and kept the men prisoners; The Queen did the like with the Dutch merchants in England, Letters of Mart were granted on both sides, and this grew to such a quarrell between the Nations, that being nourished with other differences afterward, it brought forth in Eighty Eight, that Spanish Invasion, which is, and will be memorable in all future Ages.

Upon occasion of this Money detained, certain Peers of England, amongst whom, were the Duke of Norfolk, the Marquesse of Winchester, the Earls of Arundell, Northumberland, Pembroke, Leicester, and others, Accused Sir William Cecill, for sending away money into France, making this their colour, but done indeed out of envying his great favour with the Queen, and suspecting him to incline to the house of Suffolk in the matter of succession. Hereupon they consult secretly how to get him be imprison'd; and Throgmorton (who envyed him as much as they) suggesting that if he were once clapp'd up, they might soon find out a way to crush him; But the Queen (by what means it is uncertain) coming to have notice hereof, gave a check to their purpose, and protected Cecill against their combined practises.

The Earl Murray being returned into Scotland, makes the Lords believe that he desires a meeting at Edinbourgh, to consult about restoring the Queen to her Liberty; but as Hamilton Duke of Chasteau Herald (appointed Vicegerent of the Kingdome by the Queen) and the Lord Heris were coming thither, he circumvented them, and before any of the rest came cast them into prison; and forthwith in an open War, oppresseth all her Favourers. It may be thought, the Earl Murray could have been content, the Queen should have been set at liberty; but that he knew, her her liberty could not be without his servitude; and Queen Elisabeth perhaps would willingly have had her restored to her Kingdom, but that she doubted, her restoring would indanger her own security: And thus, while they regarded their own ends in the first place, and hers but in the second, she had the fortune to be pitied, but not the happinesse to be relieved; and all she could do her self, was but to tye the knot of her bonds the faster; if she could have sate still, they would perhaps have loosened of themselves; but now, the more she stirred, the more she was intangled.

And now the Destiny of the Duke of Norfolk began to work: It was in every ones mouth, that the Duke should marry the Queen of Scots; and it is true, there had been motions made; but the matter not so forward, as the Voice of the People, which commonly presageth what will follow. It had been motioned to the Duke at York, by the Bishop of Rosse; and afterward (in pretence at least) by Murray himself at Hampton-Court; but the Duke, before he would resolve in the matter, deliberated with the Earls of Arundell, Northumberland, Westmerland, Sussex, Pembroke, Southampton, and Leicester himself, who all judged it fit, he should acquaint the Queen with it first, and then leave the matter to her liking. Within a few dayes, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton meeting the Duke in the Pallace at Westminster, advised him, to move the Earl of Leicester himself to embrace the match, seeing he had formerly sued for it; but if he refused it, then at least to take him along with him, for that himself alone would hereby be able to procure the Queens consent. A day or two after, the Earl of Leicester propounded the matter to the Duke, and then communicateth it to the Earls of Arundell and Pembroke; who thereupon, together with Throgmorton, wrote Letters to the Queen of Scots, commending the Duke of Norfolk to her for a Husband; the Duke himself likewise writeth to her, tendering his singular Love and respect unto her. Upon this, Articles are drawn, written with Leicesters own hand, and sent to the Queen of Scots; to which if she consented, they then promised to procure, that Queen Elisabeth should give her assent, and that forthwith she should be reinvested in her Kingdom, and the Succession of England should be confirmed upon her. Wee may easily believe, the Queen of Scots was not hardly drawn to give consent to her own desire; but in the mean time, the Duke had imparted to the Lord Lumley the whole proceeding, and had much ado to get the Earl of Leicesters consent, that he might advise of it with some other of his Friends; yet a little after, he opened the matter to Cecill also. The rumour of this Marriage was soon come to the Queens ears; which the Duke understanding, hee dealt earnestly with the Earl of Leicester, to have the matter propounded to the Queen out of hand. Leicester makes delayes, and pretends causes to put it off, which Cecill seeing, he adviseth the Duke, to go and acquaint the Queen with it himself. This councell Leicester opposed, promising to open it to the Queen as she went in Progresse. At length, at Farnham, the Duke standing by as the Queen sate at Table, she gave him a tart Admonition, That he were best take heed, upon what pillow he rested his head. After this, at Tichfield, Leicester fell sick, or at least counterfeited; to whom the Queen coming, and bidding him be of good cheer; hee with sighs and tears craved pardon for his fault, and unfolded to her the whole story from the very beginning. Whereupon, the Queen called the Duke into the Gallery, reproving him sharply, for going about the Marriage, without acquainting her; and commanding him, upon his Allegiance, to desist. The Duke made her her a free and hearty promise of obedience, and spared not to say (as if he little regarded the Qu. of Scots) that his Revenues in England were not much lesse then hers in Scotland; and that when he was at his house in Norwich, he thought himself in a sort not inferior to some kings: but notwithstanding, finding the Queens anger by her countenance, and perceiving Leicester to be in a manner quite alienated, & most of the Nobility also, as scarcely saluting him when they met him, he grew extremely dejected, and prepared presently to leave the Court, meaning to stay at Norfolk, till by his friends intercession, and his own submissive Letters, the Queens heart might be mollified towards him: Mean while, the Court was suspitously fearfull, lest he should raise Rebellion, and (they say) it was concluded, that if he did so, the Qu. of Scots should presently be made away. And now the Duke, who held secret commerce by Letters with the Bishop of Ross, Throgmorton and Leicester (for they were sent to and fro in bottles) being examined touching the marriage of the Qu. of Scots, and certain secret conferences with the Bishop of Rosse, confessed most of the Objections, and was thereupon committed to the Tower, under the custody of Sir Henry Nevill; within two dayes after the Bishop of Rosse likewise is examined, and together with the Florentine Robert Ridolph, is delivered to the custody of Sir Francis Walsingham, the Earl of Pembroke is confined to his house, and examined privately; but his confession was not committed to writing; It being his request because he could not write himself. At this time, the rumor of Insurrection in the North, begun in Autumne before, grew very strong, by reason of some frequent meetings of the Earls of Northumberland, Westmerland, and others, who thereupon being upon their Allegiance sent for to repaire presently to the Queen, they make delayes (for they stayed waiting for supplies, both from the Scots, and from the Duke D'Alva) when the Earl of Northumberland, doubtfull what to do, was frighted of purpose by his servants, telling him, that men in Arms were neer at hand to apprehend him; Who thereupon in a tempestuous night, riseth out of his bed, and in great fear gets into his Park at Topcliffe, and the night following to Branspith to the Earl of Westmerlands house, where a great many were met that were acquainted with the Enterprise: Here they brake forth into an open Rebellion, being pressed forward, by one Nicholas Morton a Romish Priest, sent by the Pope to pronounce Queen Elizabeth an Heretick, and therefore to have utterly lost all Right of Soveraignty: By and by they send forth a writting, wherein they declare that they had taken Arms for no other end, but that the Religion of their fore-fathers might be restored, wicked Counsellors removed from the Queen, the Duke of Norfolk, and others of the loyall Nobility relieved, who were now in disgrace; but towards the Queen, professing themselves most dutifull Subjects; withall they send Letters to the Papists all the Kingdom over, requiring them to come to their assistance: but they were so far from joyning with them, that many sent both the Letters and the bearers of them to the Queen, and afforded their aides and purposes against them; no lesse then the best Protestants, even the Duke of Norfolk himself was not backward in it. These Rebells go first to Durham, where they tear in pieces all the Bibles and Books of Common Prayer they could finde in Churches of the English tongue: when they had been twelve dayes in Rebellion, they numbered their Army, and could not reckon above 5600 horse, and 4000 foot, whereupon being certainly informed, that the E: of Sussex with 7000, and the E: of Warwick with 12, were setting out against them, they betook themselves to Rabie, the chief house of the E: of Westmerland, going from thence they besieged Bernards castle, which for lack of provision, was yeelded to them. At which time, being proclaimed Traitors and hearing a fresh of the great forces that were coming against them, the two Earls with a small company, get presently into Scotland hard by: where where the Earl of Northumberland hid himself at Harclow; in a poor Cottage, amongst the Grayhams (famous Robbers) who afterwards betrayed him to the Earl Murray: Westmerland made a shift to get into the Low-Countryes, where he had a slender Pension from the King of Spain, and there lived even to old age. Of the rest, for terrour and examples sake, there were hanged at Durham, threescore and six of the chief; amongst whom, Plomtree, a noted Priest. At York were executed, Simon Digby, John Fulthrop, Thomas Bishop, Robert Penyman; and at London a few months after, Christopher and Thomas; and some other in other places. After this, the heads of the Rebels being convict of High Treason, were proscribed; namely, Charles, Earl of Westmerland; Thomas, Earl of Northumberland; Anne, Countesse of Northumberland; Edward Dacres of Morton; John Nevill of Leversege; John Swinborn, Thomas Markenfield, Egremond Ratcliffe, brother to the Earl of Sussex; Christopher Nevill, Richard Norton, Christopher Marmaduke, Robert and Michael Tempest, George Stafford, and forty others of good account. Out of the ashes of this Rebellion, a new fire was kindled at Naworth in Cumberland, by Leonard Dacres, second son to the Lord Dacres of Gillisland; He was a Party with the Earls in their Rebellion; but they breaking forth sooner then he expected, and he at that time being at the Court, and there admitted to kisse the Queens hand, tendered his service to go against them; and to that purpose, was sent home: but in his Journey (branding himself with a double disloyalty) he consulted with the Rebels, and encouraged them to go on; and by vertue of Letters of Credence from the Queen, he surprised the Castle of Greystock, and other houses of the Dacres, and gathered together an Army of three thousand men: But being encountred by the Baron of Hunsdon, after a great fight, wherein; though he were crook-backt, he behaved himself valiantly, he was put to flight, and fled into Scotland, from whence soon after, he passed over into the Low-Countryes, and in great misery and poverty died at Louvayn.

But though the Queen were thus entangled with Rebellions at home, yet she was not careless of the afflicted Protestants in France; for she stirred up the Protestant Princes to defend the common Cause; supplyed them with money, taking in pawn the Queen of Navar's Jewells; and gave leave to Henry Champernoon to lead into France a Troop of a hundred Horse, Gentlemen all, and Voluntaries; amongst whom were Philip Butshed, Francis Barkley, and Walter Raleigh, a very young man, who now began to look into the world. But as the Queen of England assisted the French, so in revenge thereof, the King of France meant to assist the Scots, but that he was taken away by death; being slain by a shot, at the Siege of S. John D'Angelo.

There was at this time a Rebellion in Ireland also, raised by Edmund and Peter, brothers to Boteler Earl of Ormond; but after many out-rages by them committed: the Earl of Ormond first by perswasions, obtained of them to submit themselves; and when notwithstanding they were committed to prison, he then obtained of the Queen they should not be called to the Barre, being exceedingly grieved that any of his Blood should be attaynted of Rebellion. The rest of the Rebells were pursued by Sir Humphrey Gilbert, and soon dispersed.

And now the Earl of Murray, Regent of Scotland, when he had wrought all things to his hearts desire, and thought himself secure, at Lithquo, riding along the streets, was shot into the belly with a Bullet, beneath the Navill, and there fell down dead. The actor was a Hamilton, who did it upon a private revenge, for that Murray had forced him to part with a piece of Land which he had by his wife; who thereupon falling Lunatick, he in a great rage committed this slaughter.

After Murrayes death, the Countrey being without a Regent, was cause of many disorders. Tho. Carre, and Walter Scot, two principall men amongst the the Scottish Borders, and devoted to the Queen of Scots, made Inrodes into England, wasting all places with fire and sword, till by Forces sent out of England, under the command of the Earle of Sussex, and the Lord Hunsdon, they were defeated. In whose pursuit, three hundred villages were fired, and above fifty Holds were over-turned. For which service the Earl made many Knights, as Sir William Drury, Sir Thomas Manners, Sir George Carie, Sir Robert Constable and others, and then returned. And now to prevent further disorders, the Lords of Scotland being ready to assemble about the election of a new Regent, they asked counsell of Queen Elizabeth in the matter; but she making answer she would not meddle in it, because she would not be thought to work any thing prejudiciall to the Queen of Scots, whose cause was not yet tried; they created Matthew Earl of Lenox Regent; which Queen Elizabeth did the better like, as conceiving he could not chuse out of naturall affection, but have a speciall care of the young King being his Grand-childe.

But while Queen Elizabeth favoured the Kings Party in Scotland, the Earl of Hamley, the Duke of Castle-Herald, and the Earle of Argyle, (the Queen of Scots Lieutenants) imploy the Lord Seton to the Duke D'Alva, Requiring him for many great reasons, to vindicate the Queen of Scots liberty alleadging how acceptable a work it would be to all Christian Princes and to the whole Catholike Chuch: wherunto the Duke made answer; They should finde him ready to the uttermost of his power to satisfie their Request. At which time also the French King dealt earnestly with Queen Elizabeth to the same purpose; and the Spanish Embassadour in his masters name urged it no lesse extremely; but Queen Elizabeth assaulted with all these Importunities, made answer, That as she would omit nothing that might serve for the Reconciling of the Queen of Scots and her subjects, so she must have leave to provide for her own and her subjects safety; a thing which Nature, Reason, and her own Honor requires at her hands. And now when these Princes prevailed not with Queen Elizabeth to set the Queen of Scots at liberty, out comes Pope Pius Quintus with his Bull Declaratory, which he caused to be fastened in the night time upon the gate of the Bishop of Londons Palace, wherein all her subjects are absolved from their Oath of Allegiance, or any other dutie, and all that obey her, accursed with Anathema. He that fastned up the Bull was one John Felton, who never fled for the matter, but as affecting Martyrdome, suffered himself to be apprehended, confessed and justified the Fact, and thereupon arraigned, was condemned and hanged neer the place where he had fastened the writing.

The same day that Felton was Arraigned, the Duke of Norfolk seeming now extremely pentitent for his fault, and utterly to abhorre the marriage, was delivered out of the Tower, and suffered to goe to his owne house, but yet to be in the custodie of Sir Henry Neuill still. Indeed Cecill being a good friend of the Dukes, had told the Queen, That the Law of 25 of Edward the third could not take hold upon him: And now being in a kinde of liberty, Cecill deales earnestly with him to marry speedily some other, thereby to take away all suspition in that behalf: yet some again thought that this liberty of the Dukes was granted him of purpose to bring him into greater danger.

At this time died William Herbert Earl of Pembrook the grand-child of an Earl of Pembrook, yet the son but of an Esquire, and grand-father to Phillip Earl of Pembrook and Mountgomery now living, who lieth buried in Paul's, under a faire Monument of Marble, with an Inscription testifying his great deservings while he lived.

Many conspiracies were at this time to set the Queen of Scots at liberty; amongst others, there conspired Thomas and Edward Stanley younger sonnes of

of the Earl of Derby, with others; but the matter discovered, they were soon suppressed, and some of them executed. And now the Lords of the Queen of Scots Party continuing to protect the English Rebells, the Earl of Sussex once again, accompanied with the Lord Scroop, entereth Scotland, burneth the Villages all along the Valley of Anandale, and compasseth the Duke of Castle-Herald, and the Earls of Huntley and Argyle, under a Writing signed with their own Hands and Seals, to forsake the English Rebells. Whereupon the Earl of Sussex returned home, he made these Knights; Edward Hastings, Francis Russell, Valentine Browne, William Hilton, Robert Stapleton, Henry Carwen, and Simon Musgrave.

Queen Elizabeths minde being now in great suspension, by reason of that Bull from Rome, and the late conspiracy in Norfolk, sent Sir William Cecill, and Sir Walter Mildmay to the Queen of Scots, who was then at Chatesworth in Derby-shire, to consult with her by what means the breach in Scotland might best be made up, She re-invested in her former Dignity, and her son and Queen Elizabeth might be secured. The Queen of Scots did little deplore her own afflicted condition, putting her self wholly upon the Queens clemency; when the Commissioners made unto her certain Propositions of Agreement: First, That the Treaty of Edinborough should be confirmed: then, That she should renounce her Right and Title to England, during Queen Elizabeths life, or any children of her body lawfully begotten: then, That she should send her sonne for a Hostage into England, with other six Hostages, such as the Queen should nominate: then, That the Castles of Humes and Fast-castle should be held by the English for three yeers; with some other. To which Propositions the Queen of Scots for the present gave a provident answer, but referred the fuller Answer to the Bishop of Rosse her Ambassadour in ENGLAND, and some other Delegates; who afterwards allowing some of the Propositions, and not allowing others; the Treaty came to nothing, but the matter rested in the state it was before.

At this time Philip King of Spain had contracted Marriage with Anne of Austria, Daughter to the Emperour Maximilian, his own Neece by his Sister; who was now setting Sayl from Zealand towards Spain; when Queen Elizabeth, to testifie her love and respect to the House of Austria, sent Sir Charls Howard with the Navy Royall, to conduct her thorow the British Sea.

And now was the twelfth yeer of Queen Elizabeths Raign finished; which certain Wizards had made Papists believe should be her last: but contrary, as if it were but her first, a new Custome began, of celebrating the seventeenth day of November (the Anniversary day of her Raign) with ringing of Bells, Tiltings, and Bon-fires: which Custome, as it now began, so it was never given over as long as she lived; and is not yet forborn so long after her death.

At this time in Ireland, Connagher ô Brien Earl of Tomond, not brooking the severe Government of Edward Fitton, President of Connaght, entred into Consultation with some few to raise a new Rebellion; which, being at the point ready to break forth, was strangely discovered: for the day before they meant to take up Arms, Fitton knowing not at all of the matter, sent the Earl word in friendly manner, That the next day he and a few friends with him, would be his Guests. The Earl convinced by his own conscience, imagined that his Intendments were revealed, that Fitton would come as an enemy, rather then a Guest. Out of which feare he presently set Sayle into FRANCE; where repenting himself seriously of his fault, he confessed the whole busi-neſſe to Norris, the Queenes Embaſſadour in France; and by his interceſſion, was afterward pardoned and reſtored.

In January, the thirteenth yeer of her Raigne, Queen Elizabeth in royall pompe, entring the City of London, went to ſee the Burſe which Sir Thomas Greſham had lately built, for the uſe of the Marchants; and with ſound of trumpets, and the voice of a Herald, ſolemnly named it the Royall Exchange. A few dayes after, for his many great ſervices, ſhe made Sir William Cecill Baron Burgley.

There were now about the Scottiſh affaires, in the name of the King of of Scots, the Earle Morton; Peruare Abbot of Dumformelin; and James Mac-Gray; whom when Queen Elizabeth required to ſhew more clearely, for what cauſes they had depoſed the Queen; they exhibited a long and tedious Commentary; wherein with a certain inſolent liberty, they endeavoured to prove, by the ancient Right of the Kingdom of Scotland, that the people of Scotland were above the King: and urged Calvins Authority alſo, That Popular Magiſtrates are conſtituted for the moderation of the Licentiouſnes of Princes: and that it is lawfull for them, both to impriſon Kings; and upon juſt cauſes, to depoſe them. This writing the Queen could not reade without indignation; but to the Delegates ſhe gave this Anſwer; She ſaw no juſt cauſe yet, why they ſhould handle the Queen in ſuch manner; and therefore willed them to think upon ſome courſe out of hand, how to allay the diſſentions in Scotland. Hereupon in Sir Nich. Bacons houſe, Keeper of the Great Seal, a Propoſition was made to the Biſhop of Roſſe, the Biſhop of Galloway, and Baron Levingſton, delegates for the Queen of Scots, that for the ſecurity of the Kingdom, and the Qu. of England; it were requiſite, that before the Queen of Scots ſhould be let at libertie: The Duke of Caſtle-Herald the Earle of Huntley and Argyle, the Lord Humes, Herie, and another of the Barons ſhould be delivered for Hoſtages, and the caſtle of Dumbriton and Hames yeelded up into the hands of the Engliſh, for three yeers. But they made Anſwer, that to yeeld up great perſonages, and ſuch fortifications as were demanded, were nothing elſe; but to leave the miſerable Queen utterly deſtitute of faithfull friends, and naked of all places, fit for guard and defence: yet they offered, to give two Earls and two Barons for Hoſtages, till two yeers were expired: which not being accepted, they ſtraightway gathered, and ſpoke it openly; That now they plainly perceived the Engliſh meant to keepe the Queen of Scots perpetually priſoner, and likewiſe to break off the Treary; ſeeing they rigorouſly demanded ſuch ſecuritie as Scotland was not able to make good. And now Queen Elizabeth ſeeing that nothing could be done, for her owne, the King and Queen of Scots ſafety, unleſſe Both Factions in Scotland conſented; ſhe held it fit that the Lords of Scotland ſhould themſelves appoint ſome choſen perſons to compound the matter.

While matters in England, proceeded in this ſort; the Queenes partie in Scotland was hardly uſed: Dumbrtion Fryth; the ſtrongeſt caſtle in Scotland was taken: and J. Hamilton Archbiſhop of Saint Andrewes; the Duke of Caſtle-Heralds brother, as an acceſſary to the murder of Darlye, was hanged without being arraigned according to Law. In England, the Queen of Scots had all her ſervants taken from her, except Tenne only, and a Prieſt to ſay maſſe: with which indignities the Queen of Scots provoked, cauſeth a large Commentary of her Counſels, with certain love-letters to the Duke of Norfolk, to be carried to the Pope, and the King of Spain, by Ridolphus; which being brought firſt to the Duke, Higford (one that waited on the Duke in his bed chamber) had copyed out: but being commanded to burne them, he hid them under a Matt in the Dukes Bed-chamber; and that (it ſhould ſeeme) purpoſely. Ridolphus to draw on the Duke to be Head of the diſcontented Partie in England, aggravated to him the wrongs he had ſuffered: how how againſt all law he had been kept a long time in priſon: and now, to his great diſgrace, was not Summoned to the Parliament: he exhibited to him a Catalogue of ſuch of the Nobilitie, who had vowed to Aſſiſt him: he ſhewed how the Pope, (ſo the Catholick Religion might be promoted) would himſelf undergo all the charge of the Warre, and had already layd down an hundred thouſand Crownes; whereof himſelf had diſtributed twelve thouſand amongſt the Engliſh that were fled: he promiſed, that the King of Spain would ſend four thouſand horſe, and ſix thouſand foot to his Aſſiſtance; to theſe reaſons the Biſhop of Roſſe added, That it was an eaſie matter for him to ſurprize the Queen; whom, when he had in his hands, he might then ſet the Queen of Scots at liberty, and might eaſily obtain of Queen Elizabeth, a toleration of Religion. The former Reaſons tooke ſomewhat with the Duke, but this point of ſurprizing the Queen, he abhorred, as an impious fact and therefore rejected as pernitious and Dangerous.

In France a little before this, was the mariage ſolemnized between Charles the ninth King of France, and Elizabeth of Auſtria daughter to the Emperor Maximilian; in gratulation whereof, Queen Elizabeth ſent into France, Thomas Lord Buckhurſt, who with great magnificence was received, and perhaps the more, in regard of a motion now intended to be made: for the Lord Buckhurſt, having in his retinue, one Guydo Cavalcantius a noble man of Florence, the Queen Mother of France, as being a Florentine her ſelf, had often conference with him, when ſhe would many times ſay, what a happines it would be to both the Kingdoms, if a Match were made between the Queen of England and her ſonne Henry Duke of Angiou; and at laſt deſired him to commend the motion to the Queen of England, both from her, and from her ſon the King of France, as a thing they both exceedingly deſired. The Lord Buckhurſt returned, having for a preſent from the King of France a chayn weighing a thouſand French crowns; and Cavalcantius at his return made the motion to the Queen, who ſeemed not unwilling to hearken to it; for by this Match, there ſhould be added to the Kingdome of England, the wealthy Dukedoms of Angiou, Bourbon, Auvernе, and in poſſibility, the Kingdome of France it ſelf. Hereupon a Treaty was held, in which the French propounded three Articles, one concerning the Coronation of the Duke; another, concerning the Joynt Adminiſtration of the Kingdom; a third, concerning a Toleration of his Religion: to which it was anſwered, that the two firſt Articles might in ſome ſort be compoſed; but the third, ſcarce poſſibly: for though a contrary Religion might be tolerated, between Subjects of the ſame Kingdome; yet between a wife and her husband, it ſeemed very Incongruous and inconvenient; yet the matter at laſt came to this concluſion, That if the Duke would afford his preſence with the Queen at divine Service, and not refuſe to hear and learn the doctrine of the Church of England; he ſhould not be compelled to uſe the Engliſh Rites, but at his pleaſure uſe the Romane; not being expreſſly againſt the word of God. But upon theſe Punctilios they could not accord: and ſo the Treaty, after it had continued almoſt a yeer, brake utterly off. It was indeed generally thought, that the Match was never really intended of either ſide, but that they both pretended it, for onely their owne ends: for the Earle of Leiceſter (who knew more of the Queenes minde then any man) wrote at this time to Sir Francis Walſingham, the Queens Embaſſador in France, That he found the Queens inclination ſo cold in the matter, that though the Point of Religion were fully accorded; yet ſhe would finde one point or other to breake it off.

At this time the continuance of the Duke of Norfolkes affection towards the Queen of Scots, came to be diſcovered by a packet of Letters, ſent by Ridolphus to the Biſhop of Roſſe; and by Bayliffs confeſſion (who brought the letters) being ſet upon the Rack; ſo as the Biſhop of Roſſe was confined to the Iſle of Ely: Thomas Stanlie, Sir Thomas Gerard, and Rolſton were caſt into the Tower:

Tower: and Henry Howard, who had an aspiring minde to be Arch-bishop, was committed to the Arch-bishop of Canterbury's keeping. At the same time the Queen of Scots sent money to her confederates in Scotland; which being by Higford delivered to one Browne to carry, and told it was Silver, when he found by the weight that it was Gold, he began to suspect something; and thereupon went and delivered both the money and Letters to the Lords of the Councell. Upon this, Higford being examined, confessed the whole matter; and withall gave notice of that Commentary also of the Queen of Scots which is mentioned before. Two dayes after, the Duke himself being examined, and knowing nothing what his servants had confessed, denyed every particular; and thereupon, was brought again to the Tower, by Ralph Sadler, Thomas Smith, Henry Nevill, and Doctor Wilson: And after him Bannester, who was the Dukes Counsell at Law: The Earls of Arundel and Southampton; the Lord Lumley, the Lord Cobham; Henry Percy, Lowder, Powell, Goodyer, and others, are committed to prison; who upon hope of pardon, confessed all they knew concerning the matter. When these things, and especially the Commentary, which the Duke thought had been burnt, were shewed him, he then cryed out, I am betrayed by my own servants; not having learned to be distrustfull, which is the very sinew of Wisedom. And then with all submission, he besought the Lords to mediate for him to the Queen; towards whom, he protested he never had the least thought of doing any hurt.

And now seeing it appeared that the Bishop of Rosse had been the whole contriver of the businesse, it was deliberated what to do with him, because he was an Ambassadour. Hereupon divers Civilians are called; as David Lewis, Valentine Dale, William Drury, William Aubny, and Henry Jones; of whom these questions were asked:

First, Whether an Ambassadour who raiseth Rebellion against that Prince to whom he is an Ambassadour, may enjoy the Priviledges of an Ambassadour, and is not lyable to punishment?

They answered, That such an Ambassadour hath forfeited the Priviledges of an Ambassadour, and is liable to punishment.

Secondly, Whether the Minister or Procter of a Prince, who is deposed by publike Authority, and in whose room another is Inaugurated, may enjoy the Priviledges of an Ambassadour?

They answered, That if such Prince be lawfully deposed, his Procter cannot challenge the Priviledges of an Ambassadour, forasmuch as none but absolute Princes, and such as have Right of Majesty, can appoint Ambassadours.

Thirdly, Whether a Prince who is come into another Princes Country, and held in Custody, may have his Proctor; and if he shall be held an Ambassadour.

They answered, If such a Prince have not lost his Soveraignty, he may have his Proctor; but whether that Proctor shall be reputed as an Ambassadour or no, this dependeth upon the Authority of his Delegation.

Fourthly, Whether if a Prince give warning to such a Proctor, and to his Prince who is under custody, that this Proctor shall not from henceforth be accounted for an Ambassadour; Whether that Proctor may by Law challenge the Priviledge of an Ambassadour?

They answered, A Prince may forbid an Ambassadour to enter into his Kingdome, and may command him to depart the Kingdome, if he contain not himself within his due limits; yet in the mean while he is to enjoy the Priviledges of an Ambassadour.

Upon

Upon these Answers, the Bishop of Rosse is warned by the Lords of the Councell, that he shall no longer be esteemed an Ambassadour, but be punished as his fault shall deserve. The Bishop alledged for himself, That he had not violated the Right of an Ambassadour Vis Juris, but Vis Facti, (to use his own words) and therefore adviseth them, not to use harder measure to him, then was used to the English Ambassadours, Throgmorton in France, Randoll and Tamworth in Scotland; who had raised Rebellions there, and were open Abettors of the same; and yet had no greater punishment, then to be gone at a time limitted. When they began to urge him what the English had testified against him, he lovingly requested them to give no credit to it, forasmuch as by a received Custome, which hath the force of a Law, The Testimony of an English man against a Scot, or of a Scot against an English man, is not to be admitted: but after some other altercations, the Bishop is led away to the Tower, and kept close prisoner.

At this very season, Matthew Earl of Lenox, Regent of Scotland, the Kings Grand-father, was by the adverse party set upon at unawares; who having yeelded himself to David Spense of Wormester, (that was then very carefull to defend him) together with him, was slain by Bell and Chulder; when with great industry he had governed the Kingdom for his Grand-childe about fourteen moneths. In whose room, John Areskin, Earl of Marre, by common consent of the Kings Faction, was chosen Regent of Scotland; who being a man of a quiet disposition, through extreme grief of the many troubles he sustained in the place, departed this life when he had governed thirteen months.

And now a Parliament was held at Westminster; wherein, besides a Law for preventing of the treacherous endeavours of seditious subjects; another Law was made, That if any one, during the Queens life, by Books written or printed, shall expressely affirm, That any is, or ought to be the Heir or Successor of the Queen (besides the naturall Off-spring of her Body) or shall to that purpose publish, print, or disperse any Book or Schedules; he, and his favourers, shall for the first offence suffer 2 yeers imprisonment, and the losse of one half of his goods: and if they offend again, they shall be in a Præmunire. A Law also was made, by which to be reconciled to the Sea of Rome, was made Treason: and it was pronounced against the Queen of Scots, That if she offended again against the Laws of England, it might be lawfull to question her, as the wife of a Peer of the Kingdom of England. But here the Queen interposed her Authority, and would not suffer it to be enacted. About this time, in May, a solemn Tilting was performed at Westminster; where the Challengers were Edward Earl of Oxford, Charles Howard, Sir Henry Lee, and Christopher Hatton Esquire; who all did valiantly, but the Earl of Oxford best.

Assoon as the Parliament was dissolved, a Consultation was held, Whether John Story, Doctor of the Laws, the Duke D'Alva's Searcher (who somtime before, was by a wile brought into England) being an Englishman born; and having in Brabant consulted with a forrain Prince, about the invading of England, were to be held guilty of high Treason? It was resolved affirmatively: whereupon he is called to the Bar, and indicted of Treason, That he had consulted with one Pressall a Conjurer, to make away the Queen; That he cursed her dayly, when he said Grace at Table; That he shewed a way to the Secretary of Duke D'Alva how to invade England, &c. where he affirming, That the Judges had no power to meddle with him, for that he belonged not to the Queen of England, but was the King of Spain's sworn subject, is nevertheless condemned by the Form of Nihil dicit (forasmuch as no man can renounce the Country wherin he was born, nor abjure his Prince at his own pleasure) and finally executed after the manner of Traytors.

Ireland

Ireland at this time was indifferent quiet; for Sir John Perot, President of Munster had brought James Fitz Morris to submit himself, and crave pardon. Sidney the Lord Deputy returned into England, and Sir William Fitz Williams, who had marryed his sister, succeeded in his room.

It was now the fifteenth yeer of Queen Elizabeths Raign; when Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, on the sixteenth day of January, was brought to his Tryall at Westminster-Hall; where sate as Commissioners, George Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury (made High Steward of England for that day) Reynold Grey, Earl of Kent; Thomas Ratcliff, Earl of Sussex; Henry Hastings, Earl of Huntington; Francis Russell, Earl of Bedford; Henry Herbert, Earl of Pembroke; Edward Seymor, Earl of Hertford; Ambrose Dudley, Earl of Warwick; Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester; Walter Devereux, Viscount of Hereford; Edward, Lord Clinton, Admirall; William, Lord Howard of Effingham, Chamberlain; William Cecill, Lord Burley, Secretary; Arthur, Lord Grey of Wilton; James Blunt, Lord Mountjoy; William, Lord Sands; Thomas, Lord Wentworth; William, Lord Borough; Lewis, Lord Mordant; John Pawlet, Lord St. John of Basing; Robert, Lord Rich; Roger Lord North; Edmund Bruges, Lord Chandois; Oliver, Lord St. John of Blatsho; Thomas Sackvile, Lord Buckhurst; and William West, Lord de la Ware. After silence bidden, Sir Owen Hopton, Lievtenant o the Tower, is commanded to bring the Duke to the Bar; and then the Clerk of the Crown said, Thomas, Duke of Norfolk, late of Keningale, in the County of Norfolk, Hold up thy hand; which done, the Clerk with a loud voyce readeth the crimes laid to his charge: That in the eleventh yeer of the Queens Raign, he had trayterously consulted to make her away, and to bring in forraign Forces for invading the Kingdom: Also, That he dealt with the Queen of Scots concerning Marriage, contrary to his promise made to the Queen under his hand writing: Also, That he relieved with money the Earls of Northumberland and Westmerland, that had stirred up Rebellion against the Queen: Also, That in the thirteenth yeer of the Queens Raign, he implored Auxiliary Forces of Pope Pius the fifth, the Queens professed enemy, of the King of Spain, and the Duke D'Alva, for the freeing of the Queen of Scots; and restoring of the Popish Religion: And lastly, That he sent supply to the Lord Heris, and other the Queens enemies in Scotland. These Indictments being read, the Clerk demanded of the Duke, if he were guilty of these crimes, or not? Here the Duke requested he might be allowed to have Counsell. But Catiline, chief Justice, made answer, That it was not lawfull. Yet (saith the Duke) I have heard that Humphrey Stafford, in the Raign of K. Henry the seventh, in a Cause of Treason, had one assigned to plead for him. To which Dyer chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, made answer, That Stafford had Counsell assigned him concerning the Right of Sanctuary, from whence he was taken by force; but in the Inditement of Treason he pleaded his own cause. After this, the Duke yeelding to be tryed by the Peers; first Barham, Serjeant at Law; then Gerard the Queens Atturney; and lastly, Bromley, the Queens Solicitor, enforced the crimes objected against him: to all which the Duke made colourable answers; but most of them being proved by sufficient testimony, he asked upon occasion, Whether the subjects of another Prince, who is confederate, and in league with the Queen, are to be accounted the Queens enemies? to which Catiline answered, They were; and that the Q. of England might wage War with any Duke of France, & yet hold firm Peace with the French King. When it grew towards night, the L. high Steward demanded of the Duke if he had any more to say for himself? who answered, I rely upon the equity of the Laws. After this, the Lords withdrawing a while, and then returning, the Lord Steward beginning at the lowermost, asked them, My Lord de la Ware, Is Thomas Duke of Norfolk guilty of these crimes of High Treason, for which he is called in question? He rising up, and laying his hand upon his breast, breast, answered guilty, in like manner they answered all. After this, the Lord Steward with teares in his eyes, pronounced sentence in forme as is used. A few dayes after were Barnes and Mather executed, who conspired with one Herle, to make away certaine of the Councellors, and to free the Duke; but Herle revealed the businesse presently, to whom Barnes (when hee saw his Accuser brought forth) smilingly said, Herle thou wert but one houre before mee; else I had beene in thy place for the accuser, and thou in my roome to be hanged: at the same time with them was hanged also Henry Rolfe, for counterfeiting the Queens hand. But though the Duke were now condemned, yet the Queen was so tender of his case, that it was foure Moneths after before he was executed, at last on the second of June at eight of the clock in the morning, he was brought to the Scaffold upon the Tower-Hill, and there beheaded.

At this time and upon this occasion, a Parliament was Assembled, wherein amongst other Lawes, it were Enacted, that if any man shall go about to free any person imprisoned by the Queens expresse Commandement, for Treason or suspition of Treason, and not yet Arraigned, he shall lose all his goods for his life time, and be imprisoned during the Queens pleasure, if the said person have beene Arraigned, the Rescuer shall forfeit his life; if condemned, he shall be guilty of Rebellion.

In the time of this Parliament, the Queen created Walter Devereux Earl of Essex, being before but Viscount Hereford; because he was descended by his Great-grand-mothers from the Bourchiers, and made the Lord Clinton (who had large Revenues in Lincolnshire) Earl of Lincoln; Also she called forth John Paulet of Basing, the Marquesse of Winchester's son, Henry Compton, Henry Cheyney, and Henry Morris for Barons by Summons.

Within ten dayes after the Dukes death, William Lord De-la-ware, Sir Ralph Sadler, Thomas Wilson Doctor of the Laws, and Thomas Brumley the Queens Solicitour, were sent to the Queen of Scots, to expostulate with her; That shee had usurped the Title and Arms of the Kingdom of England, and had not renounced the same, according to the agreement of the Treaty at Edinburgh, That shee had endeavoured the marriage of the Duke of Norfolke, without acquainting the Queene, and had used all forcible meanes to free him out of prison; had raised the Rebellion in the North, had relieved the Rebels both in Scotland and in the Low-Countries; had implored Aids from the Pope, the King of Spaine and others; had conspired with certaine of the English, to free her out of Prison, and Declare her Queen of England; Lastly, that she had procured the Popes Bull against the Queen, and suffered herself to be publikely named the Queen of England in Forreigne Countries: All which accusations she either absolutely denyed, or else fairly extenuated, and though (as she said) she were a free Queen, and not subject to any creature; yet she was content, and requested, that she might make her personall answer at the next Parliament.

About this time, the King of Spain by his Embassadour here, complained to the Queen, that the Rebels of the Netherlands were harboured and entertained in England, contrary to the Articles of the League; whereupon the Queen set forth a severe Proclamation, That all the Dutch, who could any wayes be suspected of Rebellion, should presently depart the Realm; which yet turned little to D'Alva's, or the King of Spains benefit: For hereupon, Count Vander-Mark, and other Dutch going out of England surprized the Brill first, then Flushing, and afterwards drew other Towns to Revolt, and in a short time excluded the Duke D'Alva in a manner from the Sea. And this errour, to ſuffer the Proteſtant party to get poſſeſſion of the Sea-towns, hath been the cauſe they have been able to hold out, even all this long time, againſt the King of Spain. And now many military men having little to do at home, got them into the Netherlands, ſome to Duke D'Alva, but the far greater number to the Prince of Orenge: The firſt of whom, was Thomas Morgan, who carryed three hundred Engliſh to Fluſhing, then followed by his procurement nine Companies more under the conduct of Humphry Gilbert; and afterward it became the Nurſery of all our Engliſh Souldiers.

At this time, Charls the French King ſetting his mind wholly (at leaſt ſeeming ſo) upon the Low-Country War, concluded a peace and entred into a league with Queen Elizabeth; which was to remain firm, not only during their two lives, but between their ſucceſſors alſo, if the ſucceſſor ſignifie to the ſurviver within a yeer that he accepteth it, otherwiſe to be at liberty. It was likewiſe agreed, what aid by Sea or Land, they ſhould each of them afford to other upon occaſion; and for ratification of this League, Edward Clinton Earl of Lincoln and Admirall of England was ſent into France, with whom went the Lord Dacres, Rich, Talbot, Sands, and others. The French King likewiſe ſent the Duke of Memorancy, and Paul Foix into England with a great train; that the Queen in the preſence of them, and the Embaſſador in Ordinary might ſweare to the league, which ſhe did at Weſtminſter, the ſeaventeenth of May, in the yeer 1572. The day after ſhe made Memorancye Knight of the Garter.

Memorancye whilſt he tarryed in England, made interceſſion in his Kings name, that what favour could be without danger, might be ſhewed to the Queen of Scots; and then made much a do again about the marriage with the Duke of Angiou; but being hopeleſſe to make concluſion thereof, by reaſon of the diverſity of Religion he returned into France; for now was great proviſion making ready for the mariage, between Henry King of Navarre; and the Lady Margaret the French Kings Siſter; to which ſolemnity with notable diſſimulation, the Queen of Navarre and the chief of all the Proteſtants were allured, being born in hand that there ſhould be a renovation of love, and a perpetuall peace eſtabliſhed: The Earl of Leiceſter likewiſe and the Lord Burleigh were invited out of England, and out of Germany, the ſons of the Prince Elector Palatine under colour of honour: but indeed, that they might be intrapped, and they, and together with them the Proteſtant Religion at one blow, if not clean cutt off, yet receive a deadly wound: For the marriage being celebrated, there preſently followed that cruell Maſſacre at Paris, and the terrible ſlaughter of the Proteſtants throughout all the Cities of France; but to ſet a ſhew of equity upon the fact, Edicts and Proclamations were preſently ſet forth, that the Proteſtants had plotted a wicked conſpiracy againſt the King, the Queen Mother, the Brethren, the King of Navarre, and the Princes of the blood Royall; and to keep the thing in memory, Coyne was preſently ſtamped, upon the one ſide whereof was the Kings picture with this Inſcription, Virtus in Rebelles, on the other ſide; Pietas excitavit juſtitiam; But the King of France, notwithſtanding all the ſhew hee made of Piety, eſcaped not the Divine revenge, for before the yeer came about, hee fell ſick of a bloody Flixe, and afterwards with long and grievous torments ended his life.

A little before this, Mota Fenell Embaſſador to the King of France, being in England, by vertue of an order from the Queen Mother of France, propoundeth to Queen Elizabeth at Kenelworth (two dayes before the Maſſacre in that Kingdome) the marriage of her youngeſt ſonne Francis Duke of Alenſon (for the Queen Mother had been told by ſome cunning men, that all her ſons ſhould be Kings, and ſhe knew no no way for it but this) But Queen Elizabeth, by reaſon of the diſparity of age, modeſtly excuſed her ſelf, (For he was ſcarce ſeventeen yeers old, and ſhe was now paſt eight and thirty) yet ſhe promiſed to conſider of it, and Alenſon did not leave to proſecute the ſuit.

At this time, Thomas Percy Earl of Northumberland, who firſt Rebelled, and afterwards fled into Scotland, was for a ſum of money delivered by the Earl of Morton, to the Lord Hunſdon Governour of Barwick; and a while after was beheaded at York. And now as theſe two great Perſonages, the Duke of Norfolk, and the Earl of Northumberland were taken away by a violent death; ſo three other great Perſonages were at this time taken away by a naturall death: Firſt William Paulet, who from a private man came by degrees to be Marqueſſe of Winchester: lived to the age of within three yeers of a hundred, and could reckon a hundred and three of his children, and his childrens iſſue, after he had held the place of Lord Treaſurer of England above twenty yeers; in whoſe roome ſucceeded Sir William Cecill, Lord Burleigh, then dyed Edmund Earle of Darby, famous as well for his hoſpitality and good houſe-keeping, as for his skill in Surgery and Bone-ſetting; then dyed Sir William Peter, who being deſcended from an honeſt ſtock at Exceter in Devonſhire, was Privy Counſellor and Secretary to King Henry the Eight, King Edward the Sixth, Queen Mary, Queen Elizabeth; who planted himſelf in Eſſex, where he purchaſed great poſſeſſions; whoſe ſon John was by King James made Baron of Writle in that Country.

And now Queen Elizabeth having formerly borrowed money of her Subjects, ſhe thankfully repayd it, which wonne her no leſſe love, then if ſhe had given it, and more love ſhe gained alſo at this time by two Proclamations; by one of which, ſhe commanded Noble men to obſerve the Law of keeping Retainers; by the other, ſhe reſtrained Informers, who, under colour of ſpying out Crown Land concealed by private perſons, ſacralegiouſly ſeized upon the Lands of Pariſh-Churches, and Alms-Houſes prouſly endowed by the Queens Anceſtors. And more Love and Honour alſo ſhe gained at this time by two acts of Juſtice; the one, that ſhe ſatisfied the Engliſh Merchants out of the goods which were detained belonging to the Dutch, and reſtored the reſt to the Duke D'Alva, and made a full tranſaction with the Merchants of Geneva for the money intercepted; the other, that ſhe freed England at this time of the debts which her Father and her Brother had run into in forraign parts, and were increaſed by yeerly intereſt, and cauſed the obligations of the City of London, which had ſo often been renued to be given in, to the great rejoycing of the Citizens.

The Spaniſh affairs growing now very turbulent in the Netherlands, Fluſhing loſt, the towns of Holland revolted, and the Spaniſh Navy vanquiſhed by the Zelanders, Duke D'Alva againſt his will, began to ſhew more kindneſſe towards the Engliſh, ſo as in the month of January, the trade which in Anno 1568. had been forbidden, was now allowed again between the Dutch and the Engliſh for two yeers; but thoſe two yeers expired, the Engliſh removed their trading to the confederates States.

The laſt yeer in the month of November, a daughter was born to the French King, to whom he requeſted Queen Elizabeth to be God-mother, who thereupon ſent William Somerſet Earl of Worceſter into France with a Font of maſſy Gold to ſtand as her Deputy at the Chriſtning. Hereupon, and for that the Queen promiſed to obſerve the League ſtrictly, the French King and the Queen mother began to affect her more and more, and the Duke D'Alenſon wrote ſundry love-letters to her, the French King and His Mother interceding for the mariage with all earneſtneſſe.

It is true, the Queen conceived divers reasons, why it was fit for her to marry; but the Courtiers for their own ends disswaded her as much from it: at last the Queen Mother of France was wonderfull importunate, that her sonne Alenson might have leave to come and see her: whereunto, being wearyed with continuall Letters and Messages, she gave her consent; but upon condition, that hee should not take it for any disgrace to him, if hee returned without obtaining his suit: But as soon as Queen Elizabeth had notice, that his brother Henry was elected King of Poland, and that the King of France was very sick, shee gave intimation to Alenson, by Edward Horsey Governour of the Isle of Wight, that hee should not make too much haste into England; but should first procure a peace by some meanes or other in France, and declare by some notable Argument, his good will towards the Protestants, thereby to be the more welcome Ghest into England. Hereupon a peace was concluded in France, and in certain places the Protestants were allowed to exercise their Religion: and then again the French King and the Queen Mother, used all their endeavour to have the marriage go forward (for they were very desirous th t Alenson, who was of a crooked and perverse disposition, and prone to raise tumults) might bee removed out of France; and withall, they requested of Queen Elizabeth, that if the Duke of Angiou took his voyage into Poland by Sea; hee might have publike caution to sail through the British Ocean. To this last request, she not only consented with all alacrity, but also made offer of a Fleet to conduct him thither. In the mean while, Alenson fell sick of the Meazles, which his mother signified to Queen Elizabeth by Count Rhets, excusing him thereupon for not coming into England as he had determined: The Count found the Queen at Canterbury, where she gave him Royall intertainment: and Matthew Parker Archbishop of Canterbury, Royall intertainment to them both.

All this while since the death of the Earl of Marre, there had been no Regent in Scotland, but now by the procurement of Queen Elizabeth chiefly; James Douglas Earl of Morton, is made Regent; who, when his Authority in a Parliamentary Assembly was establisht, Enacted many profitable Laws for the defence of Religion against Papists and Hereticks, in the name of the King: But the protection and keeping of the Kings Person, hee confirmed to Alexander Areskin Earl of Marre (to whom the custody of the Kings in their tender yeers, by speciall priviledge belongeth) though hee were himself in his Minority: Upon these conditions, That no Papists, nor factious persons should be admitted to his presence: An Earl should come with onely two servants attending him: A Baron, with onely one: All other, single: and every one unarmed. The French King in the mean time, sent his Embassadour Mounsier Vyriar, to corrupt the Earls of Atholl and Huntley with large promises, to oppose the Regent; Queen ELISABETH as much laboured to defend him: but though by the ministery of Killigrew, shee had drawn James Hamilton Duke of Castle-Herald, and George Gourdon Earl of Huntley, and the most eminent of that Faction, upon indifferent conditions, to acknowledge the Regent, yet William Kircald Lord Graunge, (whom Murray when hee was Regent, had made Governour of Edingborough Castle) The Lord Humes, Lydington, the Bishop of Dunkeld and others, would by no meanes admit of the Regents Government, but held that Castle, and fortified it in the Queen of Scots name, having Lydington for their Counsellor herein, and trusting to the naturall strength of the place, and to the Duke D' Alva's and the French Kings promises, to send them supplies both of men and money. Now when these persons, could by no meanes be drawne to accept of conditions of peace, and to deliver up the Castle to the Regent, Queen Elizabeth (who could in no case endure the French in Scotland) suffered her self at length to be intreated by the Regent, to send Forces, Gunnes and Ammunition, for assaulting of the Castle upon certain conditions, whereof one was, that ten Hostages should be sent into England, to be security for returning the men and Munition, unlesse by the common hazard of War they should chance to miscarry. The conditions being argued on; William Drury Marshall of the Garrison at Barwick, with some great Ordnance and Fifteen hundred Souldiers, (amongst whom were some noble Voluntiers, George Carie, Henry Carie, Thomas Cecill, Henry Lee, William Knolles, Sutton, Cotton, Kelway, William Killigrew, and others, entred into Scotland, and besieged the Castle, which after three and thirty dayes siege, was delivered up to the Regent for the Kings use, with all the persons that were in it; amongst whom Kircald Lord Grange, and James his brother Musman, and Cook gold-smiths (who had counterfeited Coyne in the Castle) were hanged; although to redeem Granges life, a hundred of the Family of the Kircalds, offered themselves to be in perpetuall servitude to the Regent, besides an annuall Pension of three thousand Marks; and twenty thousand pounds of Scottish money in present; and to put in caution, that from thence forth he should continue in duty & homage to the King; but it would not bee accepted. Humes and the rest were spared, through Queen Elizabeths mercifull intercession; Lydington was sent to Leith, where hee dyed, and was suspected to bee poysoned: A man of the greatest understanding in the Scottish Nation, and of an excellent wit, but very variable; for which, George Buchanan called him the Camelion.

And now from this time Scotland began to take breath, after long Civill Warres, and as well the Captaines of both parties, as the Souldiers, betook themselves into Swedeland, France and the Low-Countries, where they valorously behaved themselves, and wonne great commendation. As for John Lesle Bishop of Rosse he was now set at liberty, but commanded to depart presently out of England, and being beyond the Sea, he continued still to sollicite his Mistresse the Queen of Scots cause, with the Emperour, the Pope, the French King, and the German Princes of the Popish Religion; who all led him on with faire promises, but performed nothing: For indeed he in whom he had greatest confidence, which was the Duke D' Alva, was at that time called away, partly out of Jealousie of State, as being thought to grow too great, and partly out of opinion, that by his cruelty he made the people to revolt; and therefore in his place was sent Ludovicus Zuinga, a man of great Nobility in Spain, but of a more Peaceable disposition then D' Alva; & now this man did all good Offices to win Queen Elizabeth to him, and minding his owne Affairs only, would not intermeddle with the Scottish or English matters.

About this a frentick Opinion was held by one Peter Bourchet a Gentleman of the Middle-Temple, that it was lawfull to kill them that opposed the truth of the Gospell; and so far was he possest with this opinion; that he assaulted the famous Seaman Captain Hawkins, and wounded him with a dagger, taking him for Hutton, who at that time was in great favour with the Queen, and of her privy Counsell, whom he had been informed to be a great Adversary to Innovations. The Queen grew so angry hereat, that she commanded Marshiall Law should be executed upon him presently, till her Counsell advised her that Marshiall Law was not to be used, but in the Field, and in turbulent times, but at home and in time of Peace, there must be Legall proceedings: Hereupon upon Bourchet was sent to the Tower, where taking a brand out of the fire, he strook it into the brains of one of his keepers named Hugh Longwroth and killed him, for which fact, he was condemned of murther, had his right hand cutt off, and nayled to the Gallows, and then himselfe hanged.

After the violent death of this Varlet, we may speake of the naturall death of two great persons; First, William Lord Howard of Effingham, Son of that warlike Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, by his second wife Agnes Tilney. This William was made a Baron by Queen Mary, and Lord High Admirall of England, and by Queen Elizabeth Lord Chamberlain, till such time that being taken with age, he yeelded up that place to the Earl of Sussex, and was then made Keeper of the Privy Seal, which is the fourth degree of honour in England. His Son Charles succeeded him in the Dignity of his Barony, who was after made Lord Chamberlain to the Queen, and then Lord High Admirall of England. A while after him, dyed Reginold Grey Earl of Kent, whom the Queen a yeer before of a private man had made Earl of Kent, when as that Title, from the death of Richard Grey Earl of Kent, who had wasted his Patrimony, and was elder brother to this mans Grand-father; had lyen asleep for fifty yeers together.

At this time many particular Rebellions were in Ireland; The O Cenors, and O Moors took Arms, and committed many outrages: In Munster, James Fitzmorris, and Fitz Edmund did the like; but by the industry of Sir John Perrot, President of Munster, were suppressed. In Ulster, Bryan Mac Phelym burnt Knockfergus, and many other joyned in Rebellion with him. Against these, Walter Devereux, (whom the Queen had lately created Earl of Essex) desired leave to go; which Sir William Fitz-Williams Deputy of Ireland opposed, as fearing, that the glory of so great an Earl would ecclipse his light. But for this, the Queen findes a remedy, by appointing Essex, to take a Parent of the Deputy, whereby to be made Governour of Ulster. But this remedy for Fitz-Williams, might have made a sore in the minde of Essex; (to receive his Authority from his inferiour) but that the nobleness of his minde, made him more to regard the vertue, then the glory. And so, in the end of August, hee landed at Knockfergus, having with him the Lords, Darcy and Rich, and Sir Henry Knowles and his four Brothers, Michael and John Carves, Henry, William, and John Norreses: At his landing, Bryan Mac Phelim welcomed him, tendring unto him all manner of dutifulness and service; but presently after, falls from him, and joyns with Turlogh Leynigh. After this revolt, the Earl of Essex, finding many difficulties in the business, and himself not well provided of skilfull Souldiers, makes suit to the Queen for leave to come home; which the Earl of Leicester, (who liked his room better then his company) opposed; till after expence of a yeers time, and much treasure, hee at last obtained leave, and returned home.

The next yeer, being 1574. and the seventeenth yeer of Queen Elisabeths Raign, the Duke of Alenson grew more importunate in his suit, then at any time before; so as hee obtained of the Queen, to come into England, any time before the twentieth of May; and this she the rather did, because shee perceived him now to bee really bent against the Guyses her sworn Enemies. But before this Answer was brought him, Valentine Dale Doctor of the Civil Law, the Queens Embassadour in France, gave intimation to the Queen, That Alenson and Navarre were in restraint, and committed to Keepers: For the Guyses had suggested, suggested, that Alenson held intimate friendship with Admirall Colin, the chief Leader of the Protestants in France; and indeed, Alenson being examined, freely confessed, that hee had now for a good while desired the marriage of the Queen of England: and conceiving, that good correspondence with Colin might be usefull to him to that end, hee had thereupon had conference with him thereabout, and concerning the Low-Country Warre. In the mean time, Thomas Wilks, Dales Secretary, got cunningly to Alenson, and in the Queens name, made promise both to him, and to Navarre, that she would omit no opportunity of procuring their inlargement. For which, the subtle Queen-Mother so complained of him to Queen Elisabeth, that hee was fain to go into France, and there to crave pardon for his fault. But Navarre, not unmindfull of this kindnesse in Wilks, when about five and twenty yeers after, being King of France, hee saw him in Normandy, hee Knighted him. Hereupon the Queen sent Thomas Randoll into France, to the Queen-Mother, that if it were possible, hee might gain Reconciliation for Alenson her sonne, and for the King of Navarre. But before hee was landed in France, Charles the then French King dyed, whose Funerall Rites were solemnly performed in Saint Pauls Church in London.

Assoon as Henry the third, King of France, was come from Poland, Roger Lord North was sent into France, to congratulate his return, and his happy Inauguration into the Kingdom; who thereupon, together with the Queen-Mother, did forthwith send their joynt Letters into England, strongly soliciting the businesse of marriage, between Alenson and the Queen. In the mean time notwithstanding, they used all possible devices, (and left no means unsought) to get the young King of Scotland to bee sent into France, and to deprive Morton who was the Regent, of his Authority, whereof the Queen of Scots also was very desirous; shee being perswaded, that if her sonne were once gotten safely into France, shee and the Catholicks in England should bee more mildly used. At which time, an aspersion was cast upon the Queen of Scots, as if she had made the match between Charles Uncle to the Queen of Scots (who had lately the Earldom of Lenox confirmed to him by Parliament) and Elizabeth Cavendish the Countesse of Shrewsburie's daughter by a former husband; upon which ground, both their mothers and some others also were kept in Prison for a time; and being doubted whereunto this marriage should tend: Henry Earle of Huntington, President of the Councell in the North, is authorized with secret Instructions to examine it. It will be fit here to say something of this place of Government in the North; which from small beginnings, is now become so eminent as it is at this day, whereof this was the Originall. When as in the Raigne of Henry the Eight, after that the Rebellion in the Northerne parts, about the subversion of Abbyes was quieted, the Duke of Norfolke tarryed in those quarters, and many complaints of injuries done were tendered unto him, whereof some he composed himself, and others hee commended under his Seale to men of wisdome to determine: Hereof when King Henry heard, he sent down a peculiar Seal to be used in these cases, and calling home the Duke, committed the same to Tunstall Bishop of Durham, and Constituted Assistants with Authority to heare and determine the complaints of the poor, and he was the first that was called President; and from that time, the authority of his successours grew in credit.

It was now the yeer One thousand five hundred seventy five, and the Eighteenth yeer of Queen Elisabeths Raign, when Henry the third King

King of France being returned from Poland, and Crowned at Rheims, was carefull to have the League of Blois confirmed; which, in the Yeer 1572. had beene concluded betweene his Brother Charles and that moſt Illuſtrious Queen ELIZABETH; Now therefore hee confirmed it with His owne Subſcription, and delivered it to Dale the Queen's Legier, as the Queen like wiſe ratified it at Saint-James neere Weſtminſter: But a little after he demanded by Letters, whether the mutuall defence againſt all perſons mentioned in the League, was intended to comprehend the caſe of Religion alſo? Whereunto ſhe anſwering, that it did comprehend it; hee thereupon hearing this from the Queen, began preſently to prepare Warre againſt the Proteſtants, and Alenſon being drawne to the Adverſe party, there was no ſpeech of the marriage for a long time.

In the Netherlands at this time, Lodovicke Zuinga who was ſucceſſor unto Duke D'Alva, was wholly bent to recover the Command of the Seas, which D'Alva had neglected; but not being ſufficiently provided of a Navy, he ſent Boiſchott into England, that with the Queens leave, he might take up Ships and Marriners to goe againſt the Hollanders and Zelanders, but this ſhe would not grant: Then hee made ſuite, that the Queen would pleaſe not to take it in evill part, if the baniſhed perſons of the Engliſh in the Low-Countries ſerved the King of Spaine in a Sea-Fight againſt the Hollanders; and that they might have free acceſſe to the Ports of England, to buy proviſion for ready money; But this ſhee would not grant neither: Then he made requeſt, that the Dutch, who were Rebels againſt the King of Spaine, might be put out of England; but neither would ſhee grant this, as being an Action voide of Humanity; and againſt the Lawes of Hoſpitality; yet becauſe ſhee would not be thought to violate the old Burgundian Law, ſhee Commanded by Proclamation, that the Shipps of the Dutch which were made ready, ſhould not go forth of the Haven; nor yet the Dutch, who had taken up Armes againſt the King of Spaine, enter into the Ports of England, and by name, the Prince of Orenge, and Fifty other the prime of that Faction; and this ſhee did the more willingly, becauſe Zuinga at the interceſſion of Wilſon the Engliſh Embaſſador, had removed the Earle of Weſtmerland, and other Engliſh Fugitives out of the Dominions of the King of Spaine, and had alſo diſſolved the Engliſh Seminary at Doway; though in ſtead thereof, the Guiſes through the procurement of Pope Gregory the thirteenth, ſet up another Seminary at Rhemes.

And at this time the Prince of Orenge, perceiving his Forces but ſmall, and thinking himſelf too weake for the King of SPAINE, and little hope of ayde from England, he entered into Conſultation with the Confederate States, to whoſe protection, they were beſt and in the moſt ſecurity to betake themſelves: The Princes of Germany they knew were not all of one minde, parted from money very hardly, and did not every way, nor would not by no meanes poſſible accord and concurre with them in their Religion; and therefore they were not ſo fit. Then, the French they ſaw, were intangled in a Civill War, and ſo had enough of their owne to do; beſides the old grudges and heart-burnings that vvere between the French and Dutch; and therefore neither were they ſo fit. There remained then the Engliſh, as the fitteſt of any (if it might be obtained) ſeeing they were Neighbouss, of the ſame Religion, and of a Language not much different, ſtrong in ſhipping, and rich in Merchandize. Hereupon (conſidering the commodiouſneſſe of the Engliſh Nation) they ſend into England, England, Philip Marnixie of S. Aldegond; Janus Dowſa, William Nyvell, and Doctor Melſen; who in an honourable Ambaſſage, offer the Countries of Holland and Zealand to be poſſeſſed or protected by the Queen, foraſmuch as ſhe was deſcended from the Princes of Holland, by Philip wife of Edward the third, daughter of William of Bavaria, Count of Hanonia and Holland; by whoſe other ſiſter, the hereditary Right of thoſe Provinces came to the King of Spain. To this offer, the Queen takes time to anſwer; and at laſt, having maturely adviſed of the matter, her Anſwer was this, That as yet ſhe conceived not how with ſafety of her honour, and an upright conſcience, ſhe could receive thoſe Provinces into her protection, much leſſe aſſume them into her poſſeſſion; but promiſed, She would deal earneſtly with the King of Spain, that a well conditioned Peace might be concluded. Preſently upon this, Zuinga, Governour of the Low-Countries died; after whoſe death, the States of Brabant, Flanders, and the other Provinces, took upon them the ancient Adminiſtration, and Authority in the Commonwealth; which the King of Spain was fain to confirm to them, till ſuch time as John of Auſtria were come, whom he determined to make Governour there. In the mean time, Queen Elizabeth in behalf of the King of Spain, ſent William Davyſon in Ambaſſage to thoſe Provinces, to exhort them to be peaceable and quiet, which yet, by reaſon the Spaniſh Souldiers, were ſo outragious, little prevailed.

In England all was calm and quiet for all this yeer; onely a difference fell out between Sir John Forſter, Governour of Berwick, and John Cormichill, Keeper of Liddeſdale in Scotland: In compoſing whereof, the Regent of Scotland, having given Queen Elizabeth ſome diſcontentment, was fain to come unarmed before the Earl of Huntington, appointed the Legate for England, at Bonderod, and ſo the matter was taken up, and the Regent ever after continued conſtant in obſerving the Queen, and to his great commendation, reſtrayned the Freebooters of the Borders, to the great good of both Kingdomes.

This yeer there died in Scotland, James Hamilton, Duke of Caſtle-Herald, and Earl of Arran, who was great Grand-childe to James the ſecond, King of Scots, by his daughter, appointed Tutor to Mary, Queen of Scots, and deſigned Heir and Governour of the Kingdom, during her minority.

At this time the Earl of Eſſex is come into Ireland again, where having done good ſervices, and being in the midſt of Victory, he was on a ſudden commanded to reſigne his Authority in Ulſter; and as though he were an ordinary Commander, is ſet over three hundred Souldiers; which diſgrace was wrought by his adverſaries in Court, to the continuall perplexing of his milde ſpirit. And now is Sir Henry Sidney the third time ſent Deputy into Ireland; who going into Ulſter, there came to him and ſubmitted themſelves Mac Mahon, Mac Guyre, Turlogh Leynigh, the O Conors and O Moors, the Earl of Deſmond, and the rebellious ſons of the Earl of Clanricard, all whom he received into favour, and with great commendation adminiſtred the Province.

At this time the Spaniard in the Low-Countries began to deal roughly with the people, and haryed the Inhabitants with all manner of ſpoyl and injury; Antwerp, the moſt famous Town of Traffick in all Europe, was miſerably pillaged, the Engliſh Merchants houſes rifled, inſomuch that the States were enforced to take up Arms, and Meſſengers were ſent to all neighbouring Princes; and to Q. Elizabeth was ſent Monſieur Aubigny, both to ſhew her upon how neceſſary and juſt cauſes they had taken up Arms, and alſo to borrow of her a great ſum of money, the better to enable them to reſiſt

the Spaniard. But she being certainly informed, That they first sued to the French King for help, denieth the requeſt, yet promiſeth to intercede earneſtly with the King of Spaine for peace. And in that imployment, ſhe addreſſed into Spaine, John Smith, coſen German to King Edward the ſixth, a man of Spaniſh behaviour: and well knowne to the King of Spaine, who was liberally received by the King; and with ſuch wiſdome retorted the contumelious ſpeech, of Gaſper Quiroga Archbiſhop of Toledo, and the Spaniſh Inquiſitors, who would not admit in the Queenes Title, the Attribute of Defendor of the Faith; that he had gained great thankes from the King of Spaine himſelf, who requeſted him, not to ſpeake of it to the Queen, and gave ſevere command, That the Title ſhould be admitted.

And now by this time was John of Auſtria come into the Low-countries, with a large Commiſſion: for he was the Naturall ſonne of the Emperour Charles the fifth; to whom the Queen ſent Edward Horſey, Governour of the Iſle of Wight, to Congratulate his coming thither, and to offer help, if the States called the French into the Netherlands; yet at the ſame time, Smevingham being exceeding importunate on the States behalfe, ſhe ſent them twenty thouſand pounds of Engliſh mony, (ſo well ſhe could play her game of both hands) upon condition, they ſhould neither change their Prince nor there Religion, nor take the French into the Low-countries, nor refuſe a Peace, if John of Auſtria ſhould condiſcend to indifferent Conditions, but if he embraced a Peace, then the money ſhould be paid back to the Spaniſh ſouldiers, who were ready to mutiny for lack of pay. So carefull ſhe was to retaine theſe declining Provinces in obedience to the King of Spaine.

At this time a Voyage was undertaken, to trie if there could be found any ſea upon the North part of America, leading to the wealthy coaſt of Cathaia, whereby in one Comerce, might be joyned the riches of both the Eaſt and Weſt parts of the worlde, in which voyage was imployed Martyn Frobiſher, who ſet ſaile from Harwich the eighteenth of June, and the ninth of Auguſt, entred into that Bay, or ſea, but could paſſe no further for Snow and Ice. The like expedition was taken in hand, two yeers after, with no better ſucceſſe.

About this time died the Emperour Maximilian, a Prince that Deſerved well of Queen Elizabeth and the Engliſh, who thereupon ſent Sir Philip Sidney to his ſonne Ridolphus King of the Romanes, to condole his Fathers death, and congratulate his ſucceſſion: as likewiſe to doe the like, for the deceaſe of the Count Electour Palatine, named Frederick the third, with her ſurviving ſonne.

And now Walter Deverux Earl of Eſſex, who out of Leiceſters envie, had bin recalled out of Ireland, was out of Leiceſters feare, (as being threatned by him) ſent back again into Ireland, but with the empty title of Earl Marſhall of Ireland; with the grief whereof, he fell into a bloody Flux, and in moſt grievous torments ended his life. When he had firſt deſired the ſtanders by to admoniſh his ſonne (ſcarce tenne yeers old at that time) to have alwayes before his eyes, the ſix and thirtieth yeer of his age, as the utmoſt terme of his life, which neither himſelf, nor his father before him could out-go, and the ſonne indeed attained not to it, as ſhall hereafter he declared. He was ſuſpected to be poiſoned, but Sir Henry Sidney, Deputie of Ireland, after diligent ſearch made, wrote to the Lords of the Counſell, That the Earl often ſaid, It was familiar to him upon any great diſcontentment to fall into a Flux, and for his part, he had no ſuſpition of his being poiſoned, yet was this ſuſpition encreaſed, for that preſently after his death, the Earl of Leiceſter, with a great ſum of money and large promiſes, putting away Douglaſſe Sheffield, by whom he had a ſon openly marryed Eſſex his widdow. For although it was given out, That he was privately marryed to her, yet Sir Francis Knolles his father, who was well acquainted with Leiceſter's roving loves, would not believe it, unleſſe he himſelf were preſent at the Marriage, and had it teſtified by a publike Notary. At this time alſo, died Sir Anthony Cook of Gyddy-Hall in Eſſex, who had been School-maſter to King Edward the ſixth, and was no leſſe School-maſter to his own daughters, whom he made skilfull in the Greek and Latine Tongues; marryed all to men of great Honour; one to Sir William Cecill, Lord Treaſurer of England; a ſecond, to Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal; a third, to Sir Thomas Hobby, who died Ambaſſador in France; a fourth, to Sir Ralph Lowlet; and the fifth to Sir Henry Killigrew.

At this time, the ſons of the Earl of Clahricard, who ſcarce two months before had obtained pardon for their Rebellion, fell into Rebellion again; but were by the Deputy ſoon ſuppreſt; and William Drury newly made Preſident of Munſter, reduced the whole Provice to good Order, except only the County of Kerry, whither a number of Vagabonds were gotten, truſting to the Immunities of the place. For King Edward the third made Kerry a County Palatine, and granted to the Earls of Deſmond all the Royall Liberties which the King of England had in that County, excepting Wreckby Fyre, Foreſtall, and Treaſure Trouue. The Governour notwithſtanding, who wiſely judged that theſe Liberties were granted for the better preſervation of Juſtice, and not for maintenance of outragious malefactors, entred into it, and violently put to flight and vanquiſhed the miſchievous crew, which the Earl of Deſmond had placed there in ambuſh. The Earl in the mean while made great complaints of Drury to the Deputy; and particularly, of the Tax which they call Ceaſſe, which is an exaction of proviſion of Victualls at a certain rate, for the Deputies Family, and the Souldiers in Garriſon. This Tax, not he onely, but in Leinſter alſo many Lords refuſed to pay, alleadging that it was not to be exacted but by Parliament; but the matter being examined in England, it appeared by the Records of the Kingdome, That this Tax was anciently impoſed; and that, as a certain Right of Majeſtie, a Prerogative Royall, which is not ſubjected to Laws, yet not contrary to them neither, as the wiſe Civilians have obſerved. Yet the Queen commanded to uſe a moderation in exactions of this nature, ſaying, She would have her ſubjects ſhorn, but not devoured.

It was now the yeer 1577, and the twentieth of Queen Elizabeths Raign, when John of Auſtria, pretending to Queen Elizabeth nothing but Peace, yet is found to deal ſecretly with the Pope, to peprive her of her Kingdome, and himſelf to marry the Queen of Scots, and invade England: of which his practices the Prince of Orange gives Queen Elizabeth the firſt intelligence. Whereupon (finding his deep diſſembling) ſhe enters into a League with the States, for mutuall defence both at Sea and Land, upon certain Conditions; but having concluded it (becauſe ſhe would not have it wrongfully interpreted, as though ſhe meant to foſter a Rebellion in the Netherlands) ſhe ſent Thomas Wilkes to the King of Spain with theſe Informations; That ſhe had alwayes endeavoured to keep the Low-Countryes in obedience to the King of Spain; had perſwaded (even with threatnings) the Prince of Orange to accept of Peace; but withall, if the King of Spain would have his Subjects obedient to him, ſhe then requeſts him to reſtore their Priviledges; and to remove John of Auſtria from the Government, who not onely was her deadly enemy, but laboured by all means to bring the Netherlands into utter ſervitude. If this be granted by the King of SPAIN, ſhe then faithfully promiſeth, That if the States perform not their Allegiance to him, as by their Promiſe to her they are engaged to doe, ſhe will utterly forsake them, and bend her self with all her Forces to compell them. While Wilkes in Spain unfoldeth theſe matters, John of Auſtria ſendeth to Queen Elizabeth, in moſt grievous manner accuſing the States for diſobedience, and making a large declaration of the cauſes for which he had taken up Armes again. Thus Queen Elizabeth (like a fortunate Princeſſe) ſate as an Honourable Arbitreſſe between the Spaniſh, the French, and the States; inſomuch that it was not untrue which one wrote, That France and Spaine were Ballances in the Scale of Europe; and England the Beame to turne them either way; for they ſtill got the better, to whome ſhe adhered.

About this time, when the Judges ſate at the Aſſizes in Oxford, and one Bowland Ienkes a Book-ſeller was queſtioned for ſpeaking approbrious words againſt the Queen, ſuddenly they were ſurpriſed with a peſtilent ſavour, whether riſing from the noyſome ſmell of the priſoners, or from the dampe of the ground, is uncertaine, but all that were there preſent, almoſt every one, within forty hours died, except Women and children; and the Contagion went no further. There died Robert Bell Lord chief Baron, Robert D'Oylie, Sir William Babington: D'Olye Sheriffe of Oxford-ſhire, Harcourt, Weynman, Phetiplace, the moſt noted men in this Tract; Barham the famous Lawyer; almoſt all the Jurours, and three hundred other, more or leſſe.

This yeer the title of the Lord Latimer, (which had flouriſhed in the Familie of the Nevills, ever ſince the dayes of King Henry the ſixth) was extinct in John Nevill, who died without iſſue male, and left a faire eſtate to four daughters, whereof the eldeſt married Henry Earl of Northumberland, the ſecond, Thomas Cecill, who was afterward Earl of Exceter; the third, Sir William Cornwallis; and the fourth Sir John Daverſe.

In Ireland the O-Moores and O-Conors, and others, whoſe Anceſtours the Earl of Suſſex in Queen Maries dayes, had for their rebellion, deprived of their Patrimonie in Leyſe and Ophalie, did now break forth into a new Rebellion, under the conduct of Rorie Oge, that is, Rodrick the younger: ſet on fire the village of Naaſſe, aſſault Lechlin, from whence being driven back by the valour of George Carew the Governour, he was afterward ſlain.

Out of England at this time there went into the Low-countries, John North, the Lord Norths eldeſt ſonne; John Norris, ſecond ſon to the Lord Norris, Henry Cavendiſh, and Thomas Morgan Colonells, with many voluntaries, to learn Militarie experience. Thither alſo came Caſimire the Elector Palatines ſonne, with an Army of German Horſe and foot, at the Queenes charges: upon theſe Don John, aſſiſted by the Prince of Parma, Mondragon, and other the beſt Commanders of Spain, confident of victorie, flyeth furiouſly, before they expected him, yet after a long fight, was forced to retreat; but then turning again, and thin king to breake through the Hedges, and Brakes where the Engliſh and Scottiſh voluntaryes had placed themſelves, was again repulſed; for the Engliſh and Scottiſh were ſo hot upon the matter, that caſting away their garments, by reaſon of the hot weather, they fought in their ſhirts; which they made faſt about them. In this battell North fought moſt valiantly, and had three horſes ſlain under him, as alſo Stuard the Scot, Bingham, and William Markham.

Now for comfort to the afflicted Provinces, there came at that time into the Netherlands, the Count Swartzenberg from the Emperour, Monſieur Ballieure from the French King, and from the Queen of England, the Lord Cobham and Walſingham, with Commiſſion to produce conditions of Peace, but returned without doing any thing, for that Don John refuſed to admit the Proteſtant Religion, and the Prince of Orange refuſed to return into Holland.

About this time Egremond Ratcliffe, ſon to Henry Earl of Suſſex, by his ſecond wife, who had been a prime man in the rebellion of the North, and ſerved ſerved now under Don John, was accuſed by the Engliſh fugitives, that he was ſent under hand to kill Don John; which (whether true or falſe) he was thereupon taken and put to death. The Spaniards have affirmed, That Ratcliffe at his laſt end, confeſſed voluntarily, That he was freed out of the Tower of London, and moved by Walſinghams large promiſes, to do this Fact; but the Engliſh that were preſent at his death, deny that he confeſſed any ſuch thing, though the Engliſh Rebells did all they could to wreſt this confeſſion from him.

At this very time, Don John, in the flower of his age, died of the Peſtilence, or (as ſome ſay) of grief, as being neglected by the King of Spain his brother; a man of an inſatiable Ambition, who aymed firſt at the Kingdom of Tunis, and after, of England; and who, without the privity of the French King, or King of Spain, had made a league with the Guiſes, for the defence of both Crowns.

Alanſon, although very buſie about the Belgick War, yet now began again to purſue the Marriage with Queen Elizabeth; for renewing of which ſuit, firſt was Bacheville ſent to the Queen; and ſoon after Ramboulet, from the French King; and within a month after that, Simier, a neat Courtier, and exquiſitely learned in the Art of Love, accompanied with a great number of the French Nobility; whom the Queen at Richmond entertained in ſuch loving manner, that Leiceſter began to rage, as if his hopes were now quite blaſted. Certainly a little before, when Aſhley, a Lady of the Queens Bed-chamber, mentioned the Earl of Leiceſter to her for husband, ſhe, with an angry countenance, replyed, Doſt thou think me ſo unlike my ſelf, and ſo forgetfull of Majeſtie, as to prefer my ſervant, whom I my ſelf have advanced, before the greateſt Princes of the Chriſtian world?

But it is now time to return to the Scottiſh Affairs. The Earl of Morton, Regent of Scotland, though a man of great wiſedome and valour, yet was now ſo overcome of covetouſneſſe, that he grew univerſally hated; and thereupon, with the joynt conſent of the Nobility, the Adminiſtration of the Common-wealth was tranſlated to the King, though he was yet but twelve yeers old, and twelve of the chief Lords were appointed to attend him in Councell, three of them by courſe for three months; amongſt whom, the Earl of Morton for one, that they might not ſeem to caſt him quite off. The King having taken upon him the Adminiſtration, ſent preſently the Earl of Dumfermelin to Queen Elizabeth, acknowledging her great deſerts towards him, and requeſting to have the Treaty of Edinburgh, agreed on in the yeer 1559, to be confirmed, for the more happy reſtraining the robbers about the borders; and withall, That his ancient Patrimony in England; namely, the Lands granted to his Grand-father Matthew, Earl of Lenox, and the Counteſſe his Grand-mother, might be delivered into his hands, who was the next Heir. The Queen readily promiſed the former demands, but ſtuck a little at the laſt, concerning the Patrimony; For ſhe would not grant, That Arbella, the daughter of Charles the King of Scots Unkle, Born in England, was the next Heir to the Lands in England; neither would ſhe grant the Ambaſſadours proof out of Hiſtory, That the Kings of Scots, born in Scotland, did anciently (without queſtion) hold the Earldome of Huntington by Right of Inheritance. Yet ſhe commanded a Sequeſtration to be made of the Revenues of thoſe Lands; by Burleigh Maſter of the Wards; and willeth the King, That out of the goods of the Earl of Lenox in Scotland, ſatisfaction might be made to his Grand-mothers Creditors here. For ſhe took it in ill part, that the King had recalled the Inſeoffment of the Earldom of Lenox (made to his Unkle Charles and his Heirs) after the death of Charles, to the prejudice (as was ſuggeſted to her) of Arbella, although indeed, it be a Priviledge of the Kings of Scotland, That they may recall Donations made in their minority.

The

The Earl of Morton in the mean while, not enduring the disgrace to be outed of his Regency, regarded not the prescript Form of Government lately set down, but drew the Administration of all matters to himself, and kept the King in his own power, at the Castle of Sterling, admitting none to his presence, but whom he pleased. At this presumption, the Lords growing angry, made the Earl of Athol their Captain, and in the Kings Name levyed a great Army, and were ready to encounter Morton; but by the interception of Robert Bowes, the English Ambassadour, they were stayed from fighting; and Morton presently betook himself home, and the Earl of Athol soon after died, not without suspition of being poysoned.

At this time the King of Spain, and Pope Gregory the thirteenth, held secret Consultation, to invade at once both England and Ireland, and to work the absolute ruine of Queen Elizabeth; The Pope to gain the Kingdom of Ireland for his son James Buen of Compagno, whom he had made Marquesse of Vincola. The King of Spain secretly to relieve the Irish Rebells, as Queen Elizabeth did the Dutch, while friendship in words was upheld on both sides: and being known, That the greatest strength of England consisted in the Navy Royall, and Merchants Ships, it was advised, that the Italian and Dutch Merchants should hire these Ships for long Voyages; to the end that while they were absent, the Queens Navy might be surprized with a greater Fleet: and at that time Thomas Stukeley, an English fugitive, should joyn himself to the Irish Rebells with new Forces. For he making great boast, and promising the Kingdom of Ireland to the Popes bastard son, had so insinuated himself into grace with the ambitious old man, that he adorned him with the Titles of Marquesse of Leinster, Earl of Wexford and Caterlogh, Viscount Morogh, and Baron of Rosse (the principall dignities of Ireland) and made him Commander over eight hundred Italian Souldiers, to be employed in the Irish War. With which Forces Stukeley setting Sayl from Civita Vecchia, arrived at length in Portingall, where he and his Forces, were by the divine providence, diverted another way. For Sebastian King of Portingall (to whom the chief Command, in this Expedition against England was assigned) being first to dispatch a War in Africa, in Ayd of Mahomet Abdall, son to the King of Fesse, perswaded Stukeley to go along with him into Mauretania, together with his Italian Souldiers; and then afterward they would go together against Ireland: To this motion Stukeley soon agreed, and therein agreed with his destiny; for in that memorable Battell where three Kings were slain, both he and Sebastian lost their lives.

At this time Sir Henry Sidney (who had been Deputy of Ireland at severall times eleven yeers) delivered up his Deputy-ship to Sir William Drury, President of Munster: Such a Deputy, for good Government, that if any have equalled him, none have exceed him.

It was now the yeer 1579, and the two and twentieth yeer of Queen Elizabeths Raign; when John Casimire, son of Frederick the third, Count Palatine of the Rhyne, came into England; where, after he had been entertained with Tilings and Justs, made Knight of the Garter (the Queen tying the Garter about his leg) and rewarded with a yeerly Pension, he returned. And now was Alexander Farnese, Prince of Parma, made Governour of the Netherlands by the King of Spain: and Queen Elizabeth supplied the States with a great Sum of money; for which William Davison brought into England the ancient precious Habilliments of the Family of Burgundy, and their costly Vessells, laid to pawn by Matthew of Austria and the States.

Simier in the mean time here in England, ceaseth not by all amorous devices to perswade the Queen to marry Alanson; wherein he drew her so far, that the Earl of Leicester gave out, He crept into the Queens affection by Love-love Potions and unlawfull Arts: and Simier on the other side endeavoured by all means to cast down Leicester, discovering his mariage with the Earl of Essex widdow, whereat the Queen grew so angry, that she confined him to the Castle at Greenwich, and had meant to have him Committed to the Tower, but that the Earl of Sussex (though his greatest Adversarie) disswaded her: telling her that none ought to be molested for contracting lawfull Matrimonie. But Leicester notwithstanding was so provoked for his confining, that he was bent to revenge it, and if it be true, as some said, he had suborned on Teudor a Yeoman of the Guard to murder Simier, sure it is the Queen by Proclamation commanded that no person should offer injury to the Embassadour or any of his servants. At which time it fell out that as the Queen, together with Simier, the Earle of Lincolne, and Hatton Vice-Chamberlaine were rowed in a barge to Greenwich, a young man shooting off a Harquebus out of a boate, shot one of the rowers in the Queenes Barge thorough the arme with a bullet, who was presenly taken and ledde to the Gallowes, but upon solemne Protestation, that he did it unwillingly, and out of no malicious Intent, he was let go and Pardoned. Some would have perswaded the Queen that was purposely suborned to shoote either her or the French Embassadour: but she was so far from suspecting her Subjects, that she would often say, She would not believe any thing against them which a mother would not believe against her children.

After a few dayes Alanson himself came privately into England with only on or two attendants, and came to the Queen at Greenwich, at a time when she thought not of it; they had secret conference together, all parties being sent away, after which, being seen of very few, he returned home; but within a moneth or two after the Queen enjoyned the Lord Burleigh treasurer, the Earle of Sussex, Leicester, Hatton and Walsingham, seriously to weigh both the dangers, and the Commodities likely to arise from the marriage with him, and to consult with Simier concerning the marriage Covenants.

As in England there was some feare of this Frenchman: So in Scotland at this time of another Frenchman, called Esme Steward, Lord of Aubigny, who came now into Scotland to visit the King his cosen. He was the sonne of John Steward brother to Matthew Steward Earle of Lenox the Kings grandfather, and had denomination from Aubigny in France, which title Charles the seaventh King of France had antiently conferred upon John Steward of the Familie of Lenox, who being constable of the Scottish Army in France, vanquished the English in one battle, and was slain by them in another: and from that time the title belonged to the younger descent of that house. This Esme Steward, the King embraced with exceeding great love, made him Lord Chamberlaine of Scotland, and Captain of the Castle of Dumbriton, and created him first Earle and then Duke of Lenox. The feare from this man was; becausse he was devoted to the Guises and the Popish religion, and that which encreased the feare from this man; becausse he applied himselfe to Mortons adversaries, and mediated to have Thomas Carre Lord of Fernihurst called home, who of all men was most addicted to the Queen of Scots.

About this time Queen Elizabeth, at the request of William Harbourne an Englishman, procured a grant from the Turkish Emperour for the English merchants to exercise free traffick in all places of his dominions, as well as Venetians, Polanders, and other neighbouring Nations; whereupon they set up first the Companie of Turkie Merchants, managing a most gainfull Trade at Constantinople, Alexandria, Egypt, Aleppo, Cyprus, and other parts of Asia, bringing home Spices, Perfumes, unwrought Silks, Tapistry, Indico, Corrants, and the like.

This yeer died Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal; but who, by vertue of an Act of Parliament, alwayes exercised the Jurisdiction of Lord

Lord Chancellor; a very fat man, but singularly wise, and a chief prop of the Queens Privy Councell: In whose place succeeded Sir Thomas Bromley, the Queens Solicitor, with the Title of Lord Chancellor of England.

In Ireland at this time, in the Province of Munster, James Fitz Morris kindled a new fire of Rebellion; for after his former submission upon his knees, vowing all Obedience to the Queen, he stole away into France, and promised the French King, if he would lend him assistance, to make him King of Ireland. But being by him slighted, he went into Spain, and made the like offer to the King there. The King of Spain sent him to the Pope, from whom (by means of Nicholas Sanders, an English Priest, and Alan an Irishman, both Doctors of Divinity) he obtained a little money, a Legats Authority for Sanders, a consecrated Banner, and Letters of Commendation to the Catholike King. And returning from Spain with those Divines, three Ships, and a few men, he landed at Smerwick in Kerry, a Demy Island in the West part of Ireland, about the first day of July; where (the place being first of all consecrated by the Priests) he built a Fort, and brought the Ships close under it; but these were presently set upon and carryed away, by Thomas Courtney, and thereby the Spaniards deprived of their opportunity of coming thither by Sea. But now John and James, brothers to the Earl of Desmond, gathering together a small number of Irish, joyn themselves presently with their kinsman Fitz Morris. Yet the Spaniards seeing that but a very few Irish, and those unarmed, came unto them, they began to distrust the estate they were in, and to cry out, That they were undone; whom Fitz Morris heartened the best he could, telling them that Supplyes were presently to come. And going himself to get more company, he passed thorow the Land of his Cosin William a Burgh, who though he had been a Rebell before, yet was now grown loyall, so as there fell out a Skirmish between them; in which Fitz Morris being strucken thorow with a Pike, and shot into the head with a Leaden Bullet, died in the place, and most of his Company with him; but withall, two of William Burghs sons were in that Skirmish slain also; when the Queen, to comfort him for the losse of his sons, adorned him with the Dignity of Baron of Castle Conell, and rewarded him with a yeerly Pension besides: which favours so overwhelmed him with joy, that he lived but a short while after. And now Sir William Drury the Deputy growing very sick, appointed Sir Nicholas Malby then Governour of Connaght, to be President of Munster, and Generall of the Army; at which time, the Earl of Desmond, who had all this while made a shew of Loyalty, breaks openly out into Rebellion; when now Drury the Deputy dying at Waterford, and by his death Malbyes Authority ceasing, Sir William Pelham is by the Counsell chosen Justice of Ireland, with Authority of Vice-Roy, untill such time as a Deputy were appointed, and the Earl of Ormond is made President of Munster. Pelham goeth into Munster, and sendeth for the Earl of Desmond, who refusing to come, is thereupon proclaymed Traytor, and an enemy to the State; and this being published, the Justice committed the following the War to the Earl of Ormond, who slaying most of the Spaniards, and adherents to Desmond, compelleth him to send his wife to the Justice, to beg his pardon.

The Lord Justice Pelham now certified, that Arthur Lord Grey was landed with authority to be Deputy of Ireland, at Munster delivereth the Army to George Bourchier, the son of John, second Earl of Bathe, of that name, and himself returneth to Dublin, to deliver up the Province to his Successor. The Lord Grey at his landing, before he received the Sword, hearing where the Rebells had their Randevouz, marcheth towards them, who presently betake themselves to Glandilough, a grassie Valley, and beset thick with Trees, Trees, where they who dwell neer, scarce know the winding out; yet the Deputy (taking one Cosbie an old man, well acquainted with the place, to be is leader) entred into it, where he lost divers of his men; namely, Peter Carew the younger, George Moore, Audeley, and Cosbie himself th. t was his Leader.

A short time after, there landed at Smerwick in Kerry, under the command of San Joseph an Italian, about seven hundred Italian souldiers, who fortifie the place, and name it Fort del Or. Whereupon the Deputy sent a Trumpetter to the Fort to demand who they were, what they had to do in Ireland, and who sent them; with all commanding them to depart immediately. But they replyed, That some of them were sent from his Holinesse, other from the Catholike King, upon whom the Pope had bestowed the Kingdome of Ireland, for that Queen Elizabeth (by reason of heresie) hath forfeited the Right unto her; and therefore what they had gotten, they would maintain. Upon this the Deputy prepares for Battery, lets flie his Ordnance four dayes together; in which time the Spaniards once or twice make sallyes out, to their own losse much, but not an English-man slain, but onely John Check, a couragious young Gentleman, son to Sir John Check, a learned Knight. And now San Joseph, who commanded the Fort, a white-liver'd souldier, terrified with the continuall Battery, and having no hope of relief, either from the King of Spain, or Desmond (contrary to the will of all his souldiers) he set up a White Flagge, and desired Parlee, but Parlee was denyed, because he had combined with Rebells, with whom it is not lawfull to hold Parlee. Then he demanded that his Company might passe away with their Baggage, but neither would this be granted. Then he required that some of the chiefer sort might have leave to depart; but neither could this be obtained. At last, when they could prevail in nothing, they hanged out the white Flagge again, and submitted themselves absolutely, without any condition, to the Deputies mercy, who presently consulteth how to deal with them, and this was the Case; Their number was well neer as great as the English; there was present fear of danger from the Rebells; and the English were so destitute of meat and apparell, that they were ready to mutiny, unlesse they might have the spoyl granted them; and besides, there were no ships neither to send them away if they were spared: For these Reasons it was concluded (the Deputy gain-saying, and letting tears fall) That onely the Leaders should be saved, the rest all slain, and all the Irish hanged up; which was presently put in execution; to the great disliking of the Queen, who detested the slaughter of such as yeelded themselves, and would accept of any excuses or allegations.

And yet more cruelty then this was at that time committed in the Netherlands; for John Norris, and Oliver Temple, English Commanders, together with some Companies of Dutch, setting out early one morning, took Mechlyn a wealthy Town of Brabant, at an assault with ladders, where they promiscuously murthered both Citizens and Religious Persons, offering violence even upon the dead, taking away Grave-stones, which were sent into England to be sold.

About this time certain English Priests, who were fled into the Netherlands, in the yeer 1568, by the procurement of William Allen, an Oxford Schollar, joyned themselves to study at Doway, where they entred into a Collegiate Form of Government; to whom the Pope allowed a yeerly Pension. But tumults arising in the Low-Countries, and the English Fugitives being commanded by the King of Spains Deputy to depart from thence, other the like Colledges, for the trayning up of the English youth, were erected, one at Rheims by the Guises, and another at Rome by Pope Gregory the thirteenth, which alwayes afforded new supplyes of Priests for England, when the old fayled, who should spread abroad the seeds of the Romish Religion here amongst us; from whence, those Colledges had the name of Seminaries, and they called Seminary-Priests who were trayned up in them. In these Seminaries, amongst other Disputations, it was concluded, That the Pope hath such fulnesse of Power, by Divine Right, over the whole Christian world, both in Ecclesiasticall and Secular matters, that by vertue thereof, it is lawfull for him to excommunicate Kings, absolve their subjects from their Oath of Allegiance, and deprive them of their Kingdoms. From these Seminaries at this time, there came two into England, Robert Parsons, and Edmund Campian, both of them English-men, and Jesuites. Parsons was born in Somersetshire, a fierce and rough conditioned fellow; Campian was a Londoner, of a milder disposition. They had been both brought up in Oxford; Campian a Fellow of St. John's Colledge, and had been Proctor in the yeer 1569; and when he was made Deacon, counterfeited himself to be a Protestant, till such time as he slipped out of England. Parsons was of Baylioll Colledge, where he made open profession of the Protestant Religion, till for dishoneſt carriage, he was expelled the House, and then fled to the Popish Party. Both these came privily into England, in the disguise one while of Souldiers, another while of Noble-men; sometimes like English Ministers, and sometimes in the habit of Apparitors. Parsons, who was made the Superiour, brake forth into such open words amongst the Papists, about deposing the Queen, that some of themselves had a purpose to complain of him to the Magistrates. Campian, though something more moderate, yet in a Writing provoked the English Ministers to a dispute; and published in Latine an Elegant Book of his ten Reasons, in maintenance of the Doctrine of the Romish Church; as Parsons in like manner, set forth another violent Pamphlet against Clark, who had written modestly against Campians Provocation. But Doctor Whitaker soundly confuted Campian, who being after a yeer apprehended, and put upon the Rack, was afterward brought out to a Disputation; where he scarcely made good the great fame that went of him.

In this yeer was the return of Captain Drake from his incredible Voyage round about the World (which Magellan had before attempted, but died in the Voyage) whereof to relate all particular accidents, would require a large Volume: It may suffice in this place, to deliver some speciall Passages. He was born of mean Parentage in Devon-shire, yet had a great man (Francis Russell, after Earl of Bedford) to be his God-father. His father, in K. Henry the eighth's time, being persecuted for a Protestant, changed his Soyl, and lived close in Kent. K. Henry being dead, he got a place amongst the Marriners of the Queens Navy, to reade Prayers, and afterward bound his son Francis to a Ship-Master, who in a Ship which went to and fro upon the Coast with Commodities, one while to Zealand, another while to France, trayning him up to pains and skill at Sea; who afterward dying, took such a liking to him, that he bequeathed his Barque to him by his Will: This Barque Drake sold, and then in the yeer 1567, went with Sir John Hawkins into America; in which Voyage, he unfortunately lost all he had. Five yeers after, having gotten again a good sum of Money by Trading and Pyracy, (which the Preacher of his Ship told him was lawfull) he bought a Ship of Warre, and two small Vessells, with which he set Sayl again for America, where his first Prize was great store of Gold and Silver, carryed over the Mountains upon Mules, whereof the Gold he brought to his Ships, but left the Silver, hiding it under ground: After this, he fired a great place of Traffique, called, The Crosse, at the River Chirugue, when roaming to and fro upon the Mountains, he espyed the South Sea; where where falling upon his knees, he craved assistance of Almighty God, to finde out that passage, which he reserveth for another Voyage: and for the present, having gotten much riches, he returned home. Afterwards, in the yeer 1577, the thirteenth day of November, with five Ships, and Sea-men, to the number of 163, he set Sayl from Plimmouth, for the Southern Sea, and within five and twenty dayes, came to Canlyne, a Cape in Barbary, and then sayled along by the Isle of Fogo, which sends forth flames of Sulphur, and being now under the Line, he let every one in his Ships blood. The sixteenth of April, entring into the mouth of the Plate, they espyed a world of Sea-Calves; in which place John Doughty, the next to Drake in Authority, was called in question for raising Sedition in the Navy, who being found guilty, was beheaded. Some report, That Drake had charge given him from the Earl of Leicester, to make away Doughty upon some pretence or other, for that he had said, that the Earl of Essex was craftily made away by Leicester. The twentyeth of August, two of his Ships he turneth off, and with the other three came to the Sea, which they call, The Straight of Magellon. The sixth of September, entring into the wide Southern Ocean, which they call, The Pacifique Sea, he found it out of measure troublous, so that his Ships were here by Tempests disperſed, in one of which, John Winter was Master, who returned back into England, Drake himself, with onely one Ship, coasted along the Shore, till he came to the Isle Mocha, from whence loosing, he lighted upon a fellow fishing in a little Boat, who shewed him where a Spanish Ship laden with Treasure lay; Drake making towards it, the Spaniards thought him to be their owne Country man, and thereupon invited him to come on, but he getting aboord presently shut the Spaniards (being not above eight persons) under hatches, and took the Ship, in which was four hundred pound weight of gold. At Tarapaca, going again on shoar, he found a Spaniard sleeping by the Sea-side, who had lying by him twenty bars of masſie Silver, to the value of four thousand Duckats, which he bid his followers take amongst them, the Spaniard still sleeping. After this, going into the Port of Africa, he found there three Vessels without any Marriners in them; wherein, besides other wares, were seven and fifty silver bricks, each of which weighed twenty pound; From hence, Tyding it to Lima, he found twelve Ships in one Road, and in them great store of Silks, and a Chest full of money coined, but not so much as a Ship-boy aboord; (such security there was in that Coast:) Then putting to Sea with those Ships, he followed the rich Ship called Cacafoga; and by the way met with a small Ship, without Ordnance or other Arms, out of which he took fourscore pound weight of gold, a golden Crucifix, and some Emraulds of a fingers length. The first day of March, he overtook the Cacafoga, set upon her, and took her; and in her, besides jewels, fourescore pound weight of gold, thirteen Chests of silver ready coyned, and as much silver as would ballast a Ship. And now thinking he had gained wealth enough, he resolved to return home, and so on the third of November 1580. he landed at Plimmouth, having sayled round about the World, in the space of three years, to the great admiration of all that know what compasse the World is of.

The Queen welcomed him home, but made a sequestration of the goods, that they might be ready if the King of Spain required them; and commanded the ship to be drawn on shoar neer Detford for a monument (where the carkasse of it is yet to be seen) and her selfe feasted in it, at which time She Knighted Captaine Drake. But Bernardine Mendoza, the KING of Spaines Embassadour in ENGLAND began to rage, and earnestly demanded Restitution of the Goods, and complained, that the ENGLISH sayled upon the INDIAN Sea. To whom it was answered, answered, That the goods were sequestred, and ready to make the King of Spain satisfaction, although the Queen had expended against the Rebells, whom the Spaniard had excited in England and Ireland, more money then that which Drake brought home. And as for saying on the Indian Sea, that it was as lawfull for the Queens subjects as his, seeing the Sea and the Ayr are common for all to use. Notwithstanding, to Pedro Zubaro, the King of Spain's Agent in this businesse, a great sum of money was re-paid, which was not restored to them to whom it belonged, but employed to the Spaniards Wars in the Low-Countries, as was known after, when it was too late.

But at this time, when Frobisher and Pett, two skilfull Pilots, were sent forth with two Ships by the Londoners, to finde out a shorter cut to the East Indies, by the North-West Passage; they had not the like successe, for a few Leagues beyond the Isles of Faygar, they met with such uncertain Tydes, so many Shallows, and such Mountains of Ice, that they could go no further, and had much ado to return home.

About this time, Henry Fitz-Alan, Earl of Arundel died, in whom the Sirname of a most Noble Family ended, which had flourished in this Honour for above three hundred yeers, from Richard Fitz-Alan; who being descended from the Albanets (ancient Earls of Arundel and Sussex, in the Raign of King Edward the first) obtained the Title of Earl, by reason of the possession of Arundel Castle, without Creation. He had three daughters by his wife Katherine, daughter to Thomas Grey, Marquesse of Dorset, all whom he out-lived, Henry, a young man of great hope, who died at Brussells; Joan, wife to the Lord Lumley; and Mary, who being married to Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolke, brought forth Philip, in her Right, Earl of Arundel.

In Ireland, Arthur Lord Grey the Deputy, going against the O Conors, who raised stirs in Offalie, putteth to death Hugh O Moley, quieteth all that Quarter, even the Families of the Mogohigans, and O Charles, and in the very beginning suppresseth a conspiracy which was breaking forth, by putting to death the Lord Netus, who being confident in his own innocency, when the Deputy promised to save his life, if he would but confesse himself guilty, chose rather to die and be held guiltlesse, then to live in infamy, by betraying his own Innocency. With whose death the Queen was extremely displeased, as by which she was made a Patronesse of cruelty, to her great dishonour. But the Deputy knew with what kinde of people he dealt, and by this example of severity, brought Turlogh Leymigh to accept conditions of Peace; and the O Brins, and Cavenaghs (rebellious Families in Leinster) humbly to crave Peace also, and to offer Hostages.

In Scotland at this time, great jealousie was had of Lenox, Lord of Obigny, lest, being in so great favour with the King, he should allure him to marry into France, and bring into Scotland the Popish Religion. Whereupon (although he purged himself by Letters to Queen Elizabeth, and proferred himself to be a Protestant) yet many courses were taken to sequester him from the King, but so far from taking effect, That on the contrary, the Earl of Morton, who among all other was most addicted to the English) was soon after accused of Treason by the Earl of Arran, and cast into prison, and not long after (notwithstanding all the means the Queen could use to save him) was beheaded, as convicted to be accessary to the murder of the Kings Father. Whereupon the Earl of Angus, and other, who laboured for Morton, fled straightwayes into England.

In the Low-Countries about this time, the Count Rheinberg proceeded victoriously for the King of Spain, and beleaguer'd Stenwick in Freezland, against whom the States sent Norris Generall of the Field, who put the Rheinburghs Company to the worst, and raised the Siege: but afterward joyning fought with Verdugo the Spaniard at Northone, even when the Victory was almost gotten (Roger Williams having put the enemies to flight) Sir John Norris of the War turned, Norris is vanquished, wounded, and a great many of his men slain; amongst whom were Cotton, Fitz-Williams, and other Commanders. Here it must not be omitted, That the English (as all the dwellers in the Northern parts of the World, were hitherto Drinkers, and deserved praise for their sobriety) in these Dutch Warres came to be Drunkards, and brought the vice so far to over-spread Holland, that Laws were fain to be enacted for repressing it.

Now whilst the States and the King of Spain contend about a few Towns in the Low-Countries, he seizeth upon the whole Kingdom of Portugal, for the last yeer, Henry, King of Portingall dying, many Competitors challenge the Kingdom, as the Duke of Savoy, the Prince of Parma, Katharine Bragant, and the Queen of France. But Philip King of Spain, son of Henries eldest sister, putting the case to his Divines and Lawyers, and adjuring them to pronounce to whom of Right it belonged, they pronounced, For him: whereupon he sent Duke D'Alva, who put to flight Don Antonio, whom the people had elected King, and within seventy dayes conquered all Portingall. The Queen of France angry hereat, and enviously being that the King of Spain's Dominions thus enlarged (being now Master of Portugall, the East Indies, and many Islands besides) adviseth amongst her Princes, Queen Elizabeth, to bethink themselves in time, of restraining his excessive Dominions. Whereupon the Queen received Don Antonio lovingly relieved him, which she thought might be done without breach of the League with Spain, seeing Don Antonio was descended of the Blood, and of the House of Lancaster, and that no Caution was in the League; That the Portuger should not be admitted into England.

Now now the Queen-Mother of France, and the King her son, more earnestly then ever, pursue the Match with Alanson, now Duke of Anjou; for transacting whereof, they sent in Ambassage into England, Francis Duke, Prince of Daulphine, Arthur Cosse, Marshall of France, and many other Honourable Personages, who were entertained with great respect (a House being purposely built at Westminster for that use, Royally furnished; Tilts and Justs proclaimed, by Philip Earl of Arundel, Frederick Baron Windsor, Sir Philip Sidney, and Sir Fulk Grevill, against all comers. The Delegates that were to confer with the French concerning the Marriage, were Sir William Cecill, Lord Treasurer; Edward, Earl of Lincoln, Lord Admirall; Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester; Sir Christopher Hatton, and Sir Francis Walsingham, Secretary; by whom, Covenants of Marriage were at length agreed on; First, That the Duke of Anjou, and the Queen of England, within six weeks after the ratification of the Articles, should contract Matrimony, and the rest, most of them such as were before agreed on, in the Marriage between Queen Mary and King Philip, chiefly consisting in conferring Honour upon the Duke, but Power upon the Queen. It was also agreed, That all particulars should be ratified within two Months, by the Faithfull Promise and Oath of the French King, for him and his Heirs, and a Reservation also was added apart, with the Hands and Seals of every one of the Delegates, That Queen Elizabeth is not bound to finish the Marriage, untill she and the Duke have given each other satisfaction in some Particulars, and have certified the French King of the same within six weeks. Before those six weeks were expired, Simier, Secretary to the Councell, is sent into France, to require the King of France his Confirmation: The King will not hear him, but presseth to have the Marriage accomplished, as was contracted, and that nothing else was to be done. Simier on the other side, sheweth by the Articles, That a League offensive and defensive must first be concluded: This the French King disclayneth: Whereupon

Walsing-

Walsingham is presently sent to compose this difference, who joyntly with Henry Cobham, the Embassadour in ordinarie, and Simier, alleadgeth to the French King these Particulars, That Queen Elizabeth for no other reason was willing to marry, but for the satisfaction of her people, and seeing many impediments were come in the way since the first Treaty, namely the Civill Warre in France and the Dukes engagement in a war with Spain, which makes the wisest of her subjects to be now against the Match: This hath made her to desire the accomplishment of it, although her affection be still constant toward this Duke. For this cause the Queen would have no further Treaty to be held, till the French Duke be freed from the Spanish warre, and a Leauge of mutuall offence and defence be agreed on. The French King willingly accepted of the League defensive, but of the offensive he would heare no speech, till the marriage were finished.

Not long after, the French Duke himself came into England, having with good successe raised the Siege of Cambray, he was here received with as great humanity as he could wish, and nothing omitted, where by he might judge himself to be truly welcome: Insomuch that in November, when the Anniversarie of the Queens Inauguration came to be solemnized, the Queen (while they were in Love conference) drew a Ring off from her finger, and put it upon his, upon some private conditions. The standers by imagined, that by this Ceremonie the Marriage was confirmed between them; and Aldegond Governour of Antwerp being there, presently dispatched messengers into the Low-Countries, to give notice of it; and thereupon Bonfires were made, and all shewes of Rejoycing. But the Earl of Leicester (who privily plotted to crosse the Match) Hatton the Vice-Chamberlain, and Secretary Walsingham, fret and are enraged, as if the Kingdom, the Queen and Religon, were now utterly overthrowne. The Maids of Honour, and Ladies that were familiar with the Queen, made grievous lamentation, and so terrified and daunted her, that she could take no rest that night. The next day she calleth to her the French Duke, and causing all companie to go aside, they privately entertain a long discourse. At length the Duke returning to his lodging, cast the Ring away from him, and after a while takes it up again, terribly exclayming against the Levity and inconstancie of Women.

The Queen at this time was much troubled at a Book lately put forth, with this Title, The Gulph wherein England will be swallowed, by the French Marriage: whereof, conceiving that some Puritan was the Author, it made her highly displeased with the Puritans; whereupon within a few dayes, John Stubbes of Lincolnes-Inne, a Zealous Professour, and the Author of this booke, (whose sister, Thomas Cartwright, the father of the Puritants, had married) William Page that dispersed the copies, and Singleton the Printer, were apprehended, against whom Sentence was pronounced, That their Right hand should be cut off, by vertue of a Law made in the Raigne of Phillip and Marie against the Authors and dispersers of Seditious Writings; (though the chiefe Lawyers and Judges of the Kingdom could not agree concerning the force of that Statue:) Hereupon Stubbes and Page were brought to the Scaffold, made of purpose, in the Market place at Westminster, and their right hands, with a Butchers knife and a maller, cut off by the wrest; the Printer was pardoned. At that time, Stubbs when his right hand was cut off, uncovered his head with the left, and cried out, God save the Queen, to the great amazement of all the beholders.

At this time the Queene, upon importunate suite of her Counsell, gave way, that Edmund Campian, Ralph Sherwin, and Alexander Bryans, Priests, should be called to the Barre, who being accused by vertue of a Law made in the five and twentieth yeare of King Edward the Third, to have plotted the ruine of the Queene and Kingdome; to be adhering to the Pope, the Queens enemy, and coming into England, to raise Forces against the State, were then condemned of High-treason, and accordingly executed. Campian after he was convicted, being demanded; First, whether Queen Elizabeth were a lawfull Queen? would make no answer; afterward, Whether he would stand for the Queen, or for the Pope, if he should send an Army against the Queen, he plainly professed, That he would be of the Popes side, and witnessed so much under his hand. After this, some other Papists upon the like occasion were also put to death, which the Queen rather necessarily, than willingly assented to, as being unwilling to force the conscience of any. These, and the like exorbitancies of Papists, were cause, that new and strict Laws were enacted against them the Parliament following, which began the next January.

The French Duke after three moneths abode in England, took his journey in February, into the Low-Countries, whom the Queen her self brought on his way as far as Canterbury; and then commanded the Earl of Leicester, the Lord Charles Howard, Hunsdon, Willoughby, Windsor, Sheffield, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Francis Russell, Sir George Bourchier, and some other prime knights, to accompany him to Antwerpe, where he is made Duke of Brabant, Limburg, and Lorraine; for the Dutch had long before removed the King of Spains Government, and quitted the people from their oath of Allegiance, that it might be in their power to choose any other Prince. Here the Duke of Anjou gave free leave to exercise the Roman Religion, to as many as would swear Fealty to him, and abjure the King of Spains authority: but after all, having spent a great masse of money, with which he was supplied from England; and observing, that only vain and empty titles were conferred upon him, while the States held all the Dominion in their own hands, he rathly enterprized an assault upon Antwerpe, and some other Towns, and shortly departed without any great matter performed.

At this time Queen Elizabeth, as well to get her some friends, as she had procured her selfe many enemies; received into the Order of the Garter, Frederick the Second King of Denmarke; to whom she employed Sir Peregrine Bertye (whom she had lately made Lord Willoughby of Eresby) to Invest him.

But now to prevent the Duke of Guyses designe in Scotland, which was to make use of the Duke of Lenox favour with the King, to withdraw his affection from the English: William Reuthen, whom the King had lately made Earle of Gowry, endeavoured with others, by all means to remove Lenox, and the Earl of Arran from the King; and so, while Lenox was gone from Perth (where the King at that time was) to Edinburgh, and Arran was also absent on a journey: The Earls Gowry, Marre, Lindsey, and other, taking the opportunity, invited the King to the Castle of Reuthen, and there detained him, not permitting him to walk abroad: All his trusty servants they removed from about him, Arran they cast in prison, enforced the King to call home the Earl of Angus, and to send away Lenox into France, who being a man of a soft and gentle disposition, for the Kings safety readily consented; and not content with all this, they compelled the King by his Letters to Queen Elizabeth, to approve and allow of this his thraldome. The Queen of Scots in the mean while, bewailing her own hard fortune, and the distresse of the King her Son, layeth open the same in a large letter, written to the Queen in French: With which letter, Queen Elizabeth being somewhat affected, sent unto her Robert Beale Clerk of the Councell, to expostulate with her concerning the querulous writing, and joyntly with the Earle of Shrewsbury, to treat of the setting her at liberty. And indeed, serious consultation was held at the Councell Table about it, and the most were of opinion, that upon certain conditions she should have her liberty; but the Scottish of the English faction opposing it, nothing was effected.

Soone

Soone after this, the King sent Colonell William Steward, and John Colvill to Queen Elizabeth, profering all manner of respect and observance, and requesting her advice for quieting the tumults in Scotland, and also for his contracting of marriage. At which time, news was brought, that the Duke of Lenox was dead in France, who departing this life at Paris, even at the very point of death, as oftentimes before, made open profession of the Protestant Religion; thereby confuting those who had maliciously traduced him for a Papist. After whose death, when the surprizers of the King were lift up in their own conceits, as thinking they had him safe enough: He on a sudden (though scarce eighteen yeers of age) with some few others, conveyed himselfe to the Castle of St. Andrews, to whom the Nobility presently repaired, bringing Armed Bands with them, as fearing some danger might befall him. Afterwards, in fair words, he advised some of his surprizers to go from the Court, for avoyding of tumults, and promised them pardon, if they would crave it. But Gowry only asked pardon, and submitted himselfe, using this distinction, That he had not offended in matter, but in forme onely; and then the King sent for the Earle of Arran to the Court, and respected him as his intimate friend, imploying him to compose the differences amongst the Nobility, and to purge the kingdome and his own Court from civill dissensions.

Whiles he is sedulous in these cares, comes Sir Francis Walsingham from Queen Elizabeth, to advise him not to be led away by evill Councellours, to the destruction of both kingdoms. He findeth the King accompanied with the flowr of the nobility, and beholdeth another maner of Majesty than he looked for in Scotland: Having Audience given him, he put the King in minde, of what the Queen out of Isocrates, in private Letters had formerly admonished him: That a Prince must be such a lover of Truth, that more credit may be given to his bare word, than to anothers oath; and in many words advised him, to beware now in his youth of evill Councellours, and alwayes to be like himselfe. The King answered, That he was an absolute Prince, and would not that others should appoint him Councellors whom he liked not; but that he had long since devoted the first-fruits of his amitie to the Queen of England, his deer Sister, and doth now willingly make profer of the same. Walsingham now dealt with him farther; not to lay to the Queens charge what broyls had lately fallen out in Scotland; sheweth, how beneficiall to him, and to both kingdoms Amity had been hitherto, and would be in time to come also, so it were not neglected; and that the same might the better be confirmed, if the variance between the Nobility were layd asleep, by a Law of oblivion Enacted in Parliament, The Peers which now were removed from the Court called back again, Religion looked into, and a firm League concluded between both kingdoms. The King made answer, that he gladly embraced Amity with England, and that he would constantly defend the Religion already established: Afterward he lovingly dismissed Walsingham, though he held him no good friend to him and his Mother; and carefully looking to matters, with understanding, even above his yeers, proposed and profered reconciliation to those that had surprized him, if within a limited time they asked Pardon; which they were so far from doing, that the entred into new consultations to surprize him again; whereupon they are commanded within a set time to leave the kingdom, of which number, Marre, Glames, Paslet and some other, betook themselves into Ireland; Boyde, Zesler, Weeme, Lochlevin, into the Low-Countries; Dumfermlin into France, the Earle of Angus is confined to his Earldome, Gowry onely to his owne ruine stayeth behinde after the limited time, hatching new devises.

About this time happened a difference, and thereupon a Warre, between the Emperors of Muscovia, and the King of Sweden; when John King of Sweden, Sweden, doubting himself to be no fit Match for the Emperour, sent a Royall Ambassage to Queen Elizabeth, requesting her to intercede for him to the Emperour; which she did without delay, and by her Ambassadour drew the Muscovian to a Peace upon reasonable Conditions. But the Muscovian shortly after dying, and Theodorus his Successor, granting free Traffique to Merchants of all Nations that would come thither; the Queen importuned him to admit of none but English Merchants, requiring him to confirm the Priviledges which his Father had granted them: Whereto, by way of Answer, he demanded Free Trading for all the English, saying, It was not fit that a small Company should exercise a Monopoly, and all other be restrayned: But as for Customes, he promised to take lesse by one half of that Company, then of any other, because they first opened the way thither.

The next Summer, Albertus Alasco, a Palatine of Poland, of a comely personage, and great learning, came into England to see the Queen, who was nobly entertained, both by her, and the Nobility, as also by the Scholars of Oxford, with learned Orations, and other Recreations: but having tarryed here four Months, and run into much debt, he secretly withdrew himself and departed. This man I saw my self afterward in Crakow, very bare, though it was reported of him, That he had in a Dowry with a wife, fifty Castles of great value: but what Myne can bear the charges of prodigality?

This yeer proved fatall to divers great men; for there died this yeer, first, Thomas Ratcliffe, the third Earl of Sussex of this Family; a man of great spirit, and great faithfulnesse to his Countrey. There died also Henry Wriothsley Earl of Southampton; one exceedingly devoted to the Romish Religion, and a great favourer of the Queen of Scots, which cost him Queen Elizabeths displeasure, and imprisonment besides. There died also Sir Humphrey Gilbert, who was cast away at Sea, in his return from the North part of America, whither he lately sayled with five Ships, having sold his Patrimony, in hope to plant a Colony there. There died also Edmund Grindall, Arch-bishop of Canterbury, being blinde through age, a grave and pious Prelate, who stood highly in the Queens favour for a long time, till he lost it at last, by favouring (as was said) the Puritans Conventicles; but the true cause indeed was, for disallowing the Marriage of Julio an Italian Physitian, with another mans wife, against the Earl of Leicester's pleasure. Grindall dying, John Whitegift succeeded in the See of Canterbury, being translated thither from the See of Worcester.

At this time, certain popish Books written against the Queen, and Princes Excommunicate, withdrew divers from their Allegiance, and particularly, so intoxicated one Somervile, an English Gentleman, that he went privately to the Court, and breathing out nothing but blood and death against all Protestants, set upon one or two by the way, with his drawn Sword. Being apprehended, he stuck not to say, That he would murder the Queen with his own hands. Hereupon he, and upon his intimation, Edward Arden his father in Law (a man of an ancient House in Warwick-shire) Ardens wife, their daughter; Somervils wife, and Hall a Priest, were brought to the Bar, and all condemned; Somervile as principall, the rest as accessaries. Three dayes after, Somervile was found strangled in the prison; Arden was executed and quartered; the women and the Priest were spared. Many pitied the old Gentleman Arden, as misled by the Priest, and (as it was generally believed) brought to his end through the envy of Leicester, whom he used to call Whore-master, Upstart, and many such opprobrious names.

In the Netherlands, the English Garrison at Alost in Flanders being neglected, the Governour Pigot, and the other Captains, for want of pay, upon Composition, yeelded up the Town to the Spaniard, and then fearing disgrace at home, joyned themselves to the Prince of Parma; at whose hands finding themselves slighted, by degrees they stole all away, and came all to unlucky ends.

In Ireland the famous Rebell, Gyrald Fitz Gyrald, the eleventh Earl of Desmond of this Family, having a long time in lurking places escaped the English, was now by a common Souldier found out in a poor Cottage, and slain. His head was sent into England, and set upon London-Bridge. This end had this great Lord, descended from Maurice, the son of Gyrald of Windsore, an English-man, famous amongst those who first set upon Ireland, in the yeer 1170. He possessed whole Countries, together with the County Palatine of Kerry, and had of his own Name and Race, at least five hundred Gentlemen at his command. All whom, and his own life also, he lost within the space of three yeers, very few of his House being left alive. And this disaster he fell into, by proving Trayterous to his Prince, at the instigation of certain Popish Priests. Of whom, the chief was one Nicholas Sanders an English-man, who at the same time died miserably of Famine, being starved to death, when as being forsaken, and running mad upon his ill successe, he roamed up and down the Mountains and Groves, finding nothing to sustain him. In his Scrip were found certain Orations and Letters, written to hearten the Rebells, and promising large rewards from the Pope and King of Spain. Upon the Rebells ill successe, James Fitz Eustace, Viscount Baltinglas, fled into Spain, where he pined away with grief. He out of zeal to the Romane Religion, a little before he had taken up Arms with the Rebells, and exhorting the Earl of Ormond his neighbour to do the like, (who drew his Linage from St. Thomas of Canterbury) he used these words to perswade him, That if Saint Thomas of Canterbury had not dyed for the Church of ROME, thou hadst never been Earl of Ormond, for King HENRY the second, to expiate the murther of THOMAS BECKET, gave large Lands in Ormond to his Predecessors.

The beginning of the next Spring, certain Scots, together with Gowry, plotted again to surprize the King, pretending onely a care of Religion, and to remove ill Councellors from him: but the King having intelligence of their practise, used means by Colonell Steward, to have Gowry taken and cast into prison: whereupon Marre, Glames, Angus, and other of the confederates, flie into England, and beseech the Queen to commiserate their estate, who had incurred the Kings displeasure, to do her and the Kingdom of England service. The King on the other side, accuseth them to the Queen of haynous crimes, and requires to have them delivered up into his hands. But Secretary Walsingham, who bore great good will to these men, sent Letters with a Command, That they should be safely admitted into Linds Ferme, otherwise called, The holy Island; where Hunsdon being Governour there, and great addicted to the King of Scots, resisted Walsinghams Command, alleadging he could not satisfie the Secretary in this point, unlesse the Queen gave expresse Command. Hereupon grew a Dispute, Whether a Secretary of State might not transact a businesse of State, without speciall Commission from the Prince. How this Case was determined, is uncertain; but sure it is, the Scots came not thither, though some favour they had shewed them here in England. In the mean time, Gowry was tryed by his Peers, at Steclyn; where, being accused of many Treasons, though he gave colourable answers to them all, yet was found guilty, condemed, and beheaded; whose head his servants sewing to his body, committed to the Grave.

Gowry

About

About this time were practises plotted against Queen Elizabeth, in behalf of the Queen of Scots, chiefly by Francis Throgmorton, eldest son of John Throgmorton, Justice of Chester, who came to be suspected, by reason of Letters sent to the Queen of Scots which were intercepted. Upon his apprehension, Thomas Lord Paget, and Charles Arundel, privately stole away into France, grievously complaining against Leicester and Walsingham, for alienating the Queen from them, and using such wiles, that scarce any man was able to live in safety. Henry Earl of Northumberland, and Philip Earl of Arundel, were confined to their houses, his wife committed to the custody of Sir Thomas Shirley; William Howard, the Earls brother, and Henry Howard their Unkle, brother to the Duke of Norfolk, were examined about Letters from the Queen of Scots; and many Stratagems were set on foot, dangerous to some particular persons, but necessary (as should seem) for the Queens security. Certain it is, That now the malice of the Papists against the Queen, brake forth more violently than ever before; for in printed Books they stirred up the Queens own servants to attempt the like upon her, that Judith did on Olophernes. The Author of these Books could not be found, but the suspition lay upon one Gregory Martin, sometime of Oxford; and Carter a Stationer, who printed the Books, suffered for it. And whereas the Papists every where traduced the Queen for cruelty, she desirous alwayes to leave a blessed remembrance behinde her, grew extremely offended with the Commissioners for Popish causes, taxing them of too much cruelty, insomuch that they were fain, in a printed Declaration, to cleer themselves, protesting; That they questioned no man for his Religion, but onely for dangerous attempts against the Queen and State; and that Campian himself was never so Racked, but that he could presently walk up and down. But all this gave not the Queen satisfaction, but she commanded the Commissioners to forbear tortures, and the Judges other punishments; and not long after, when seventy Priests were taken, and some of them condemned, and the rest in danger of the Law, she caused them all to be Shipped away, and sent out of England: The chief of whom were Gaspar Heywood, the great Epigrammatist's son, the first Jesuite that ever set foot in England; James Bosgrave, John Hart, and Edmund Risbton.

At this time Mendoza the Spanish Ambassadour, was thrust out of England, for joyning with Throgmorton, in his Treason against the Queen; whereupon Sir William Waad was sent to the King of Spain, to satisfie him how ill Mendoza had discharged the Office of an Ambassadour here in England; who, when the King admitted him not to his Presence, but in a slighting manner, putting him off to his Councellors; Waad taking it in great disdain, boldly said, That it was a declared Custome among Princes (though in heat of War) to give Ambassadours audience, and thereupon stourly refused to declare his Ambassage, and so returned into England unheard. The greatest matters laid to Mendoza's charge, were gotten out of Throgmorton's Confession; for when he was in danger to be apprehended, he sent to Mendoza a box of Writings; and when his Chests were searched, there were found two Scrowls, one with the names of the Ports of England, and in the other the names of the Nobility and Gentry in England that favoured the Romish Religion. These, when Throgmorton saw brought forth, he said they were counterfeited, and stood to it upon the very Rack; but being brought to the Rack the second time, he then confessed all, That Morgan by Letters out of France, had given him information, that the Catholike Princes had decreed to invade England, and with the help of the Duke of Guise, to free the Q. of Scots; and that nothing was now wanting, but mony & ayd in England: and that for procuring of this, Charls Paget, under the counterfeit name of Mope, was sent into Sussex, where the Duke of Guise intended to land; and that he had imparted all this matter to Mendoza, and intimated the names of the Ports, and of the Noble-men that should assist. But being arraigned at the Guild-hall, he denyed all this again, saying, He had spoken so, because he would not be Racked again. Yet being condemned to die, he flying to the Queens mercy, confessed in a manner all he had before related; and then at the Gallows went about to deny it again. So false to it self is the minde of man when it is divided between hope and fear, and lies under the burden of a guilty conscience.

Sir William Wade being returned from Spain, was employed to the Queen of Scots, about a Treaty begun two years before: To whom, the distressed Queen sincerely professed, That she devoted her service and her selfe to the Queen of England; and made solemne promise, That if the former Treaty might go on, she would mediate with the King her Son, to receive into favour the Earl of Angus, and the other Scottish Lords, and would charge the Bishops of Rosse and Glasco, her Agents in France, to have no further to do with the English Fugitives. These things Queen Elizabeth heard gladly, and thereupon sent Beale to the Queen of Scots, who joyntly with the Earl of Shrewsbery should signifie unto her, That if she continued still in the same minde, as she had delivered to Waad; Sir Walter Mildmay should come out of hand to her, and Treat concerning her liberty: but withall she commanded Mildmay and Beale to dive into her as well as they could, to know what practises the Duke of Guyse had on foot. To that which she had spoken to sir William Waad, the Queen of Scots made a wary answer; but to that concerning the Duke of Guyse, she plainly confesseth; That being sickly her selfe, and weak of body, she had committed her selfe and her Son, to the Protection of the Duke of Guyse, her dear Cosen, of whose intendments she knoweth nothing; nor if she did, would she disclose them, unlesse she might be sure of her own liberty. Lastly, she requesteth, That being a free and an absolute Prince, she may not be worse handled, than Queen Elizabeth her selfe was, when she was a subject, and kept in prison by her Sister. These things had a hearing, but no feeling, and the rather by a strange accident; for one Creighton a Scottish Jesuit, sayling from the Low-Countries, and taken by Dutch Pirats, had certain papers which he tore and threw away, which thrown over-boord, and by the winde blown back into the ship, miraculously (as Creighton himselfe sayd) they were brought to sir William Waad, who patching them together with much labour and cunning, discovered by them some new intendments of the Pope, the King of Spain, and the Guyse, about the Invading of England: Whereupon, and upon divers other rumors, the better to provide for the safety of the Queen, a number of her Subjects (the Earl of Leicester being the foremost) men of all ranks and conditions, bound themselves mutually to each other, by their oaths and subscriptions, to persecute all those to the very death, that should attempt any thing against the Queen; which league of theirs, they called the Association.

The Queen of Scots who presently apprehended, that this Association was entred into for her destruction, maketh this proposition by Nave her Secretary, to the Queen and the Councell; That if she might have her liberty granted, and be assured of the Queens love, she would enter a strict league and amity with her, and passing by all matters of offence, esteem and honor her, above all the Princes of the Christian World, yea, and (saving the ancient League betwixt France, and Scotland) she would her selfe be comprehended in the Association, and a League defensive, against all that should go about to injure the Queen. Herewith Queen Elizabeth was wonderfully pleased, and at that time certainly had an inclination to grant her freedom. But see what malice can do; for many in England, but specially the Scots of the adverse party, endeavoured by all means to hinder it; exclaiming, That the Queen could be no longer in safety, if the Queen of Scots were set at liberty, That both Kingdoms were utterly undone, if she were admitted into the Government of the Kingdom of Scotland, and that the reformed Religion lay a bleeding, if Papists were admitted within the Court walls; nor was this all, but the Scottish Ministers in their Pulpits, loaded the Queen of Scots with all manner of contumelies, slandred the King himselfe, and the Councell in most bitter manner; and being cited to appear before him, refused, saying, That the Pulpits were exempted from all Regall Authority, and that Ecclesiasticall persons, were not to be censured by the Prince, but by their own Consistory (directly against the Laws made the year before in Parliament) whereby the Kings Authority over all persons, whether Ecclesiasticall, or Secular, was confirmed; and namely, That the King and his Councell, were Supream Judges in all Causes; and that whosoever refused to be tryed by them, should be holden guilty of High-treason; all Presbyteries and Lay-conventicles forbidden, Parity of the Clergy taken away, and the authority of Bishops restored, whose Calling the Presbyteries had condemned as wicked and Antichristian: And lastly, all scurrilous Libels against the King and his mother, prohibited, namely, the Scottish History of George Buchanan, and his Dialogue, De Jure Regni apud Scotos.

At this time, upon her adversaries suggestion, the Queen of Scots is taken from the Earl of Shrewsbery, and committed to the custody of sir Amis Paulet and sir Drue Drury, and that on set purpose (as some were perswaded) to drive her into abrupt and desperate attempts; and indeed upon this, she grew more importunate with the Pope and King of Spain, to hasten their interidment, whatsoever became of her, as ill indeed was like to become of her, if it be true (as some sayd) that Leicester sent out assassinats to make her away, but that Drury detested the villany, and would grant them no accesse.

And now to alienate Queen Elizabeth utterly from her, it is suggested to her, That Allen for the Catholicks of the Clergy, Inglefield for the Laity, and the Bishop of Rosse for the Queen of Scots, with consent of the Pope and the King of Spain, had joyntly combined to depose her, and to bar the King of Scotland from his hereditary Right to the Crown of England, and to marry the Queen of Scots to an English Noble-man of the Romish Religion, and him the English Catholikes should chuse King of England, and the Pope confirm the Election; and all this upon the credit of Hart the Priest: but who this English Noble-man should be that should marry the Queen of Scots, could not be found, though Walsingham were very busie to search out: the same went upon Henry Howard, the Duke of Norfolks brother, who was a single man, a great Papist, and of high estimation amongst the Catholikes.

This yeer died in Exile and misery, Charles Nevill, who was in the Rebellion of the North, the last Earl of Westmerland of this Family; a House from whence descended many Noble Personages, six Earls of Westmerland, two Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, an Earl of Kent, a Marquesse Montacute, a Duke of Bedford, Baron Ferrers of Wemley, the Lord Latymer, the Lord of Abergavenny, one Queen, and five Dutchesses (to let passe Countesses and Baronnesses) an Arch-bishop of York, and a numerous company of other Noble-men. In England died none of reckoning this yeer, but onely Plowden the famous Lawyer, but in France, the Duke of Anjou died of grief; and in Holland, William Prince of Orange, shot into the body with three Bullets, by one Balthaser Gerard, a Burgundian.

It was now the yeer 1585, and the eight and twentieth of Queen Elizabeths Raign, when, to tie the French King more nearly to her, whom the yeer before she had received into the number of the Knights of the Garter, she she sent the Earl of Derby into France, to invest him with the Robes and Ornaments, according to the due Solemnity; which he kindely accepted, and at Evening Prayer was invested with them.

At this time a Parliament was assembled at Westminster, wherein William Parrie a Welsh-man, a Doctor of the Laws, when in the Lower House a Bill was read against the Jesuites, he alone stood up, and exclaimed that it was a cruell and bloody Law: and being asked his reason, he stoutly refused, unlesse he were required by the Lords of the Councell. Hereupon he was sent to the Gate-house, but upon submission, was received into the House again. Soon after, he was accused by Edward Nevill, for holding secret consultations about making the Queen away; Who thereupon apprehended, upon his examination, confessed in effect thus much, That out of discontent he went beyond the Sea, where, by the encouragement of Campegio the Popes Nuntio at Venice, and grant of a plenary Indulgence from the Pope, he undertook to kill the Queen; but coming into England to that intent, he altered his minde, and disclosed to the Queen the whole matter. After this, he received a Letter from the Cardinall of Como, perswading him to go forward with the Enterprise; and this Letter also he shewed the Queen. After this, he chanced to see a Book of Doctor Allens, written contra Justitiam Britannicam, wherein was declared, That Princes who were for heresie excommunicate, might lawfully be deprived of their life and Kingdom. This book wonderfully confirmed him, and he read it to Nevill; who, though he took an oath of secrecy, yet now upon a hope of the Earldom of Westmerland, betrayed him. This was his confession, before Baron Hunsdon, Sir Christopher Hatton, and Sir Francis Walsingham: as likewise in his Letters to the Queen, to the Lord Burleigh, and the Earl of Leicester, acknowledging his fault, and craving mercy. A few dayes after, he was called to the Bar in Westminster-Hall, where he confessed himself guilty, and thereupon was condemned. After the Sentence of death pronounced, he furiously cited the Queen to Gods Tribunall: five dayes after he was laid upon a Hurdle, and dragged thorow the City to Westminster, where at the Gibbet he made a vain-glorious boasting of his faithfulnesse to the Queen, but not so much as in a word commended himself to God; and in the great Palace at Westminster was executed as a Traytor, the Nobility and Commons sitting then in Parliament.

In this Parliament, the Association before spoken of, was universally approved, and enacted in this Form; That four and twenty, or more, of the Queens Privy Councell, and Peers of the Realm, should be selected and authorized, under the Great Seal of England, To make enquiry of all such persons as shall attempt to invade the Kingdom, or raise Rebellion, or shall attempt any evill against the Queens Person; for whomsoever, and by whomsoever, that layeth any claim to the Crown of England; and that person for whom, or by whom they shall attempt any such thing, shall be altogether uncapable of the Crown; and more to this purpose. Laws also for the Queens safety, were enacted against Jesuites and Popish Priests, and against all that shall receive or relieve them. These Laws terrified many; and particularly out of fear of them, Philip Earl of Arundel, the Duke of Norfolk's eldest son, purposed with himself to travell beyond Seas; for having been once or twice cited before the Lords of the Councell, and confined to his house, and after six months set at liberty, he hereupon wrote a Letter to the Queen, That for the Service of God, and his soules health, he purposed to leave his Countrey, but not his loyall affection towards her: but as he was taking Shipping, by his own servants treachery he was discovered, apprehended, and laid in the Tower.

At the same time lay in the Tower, Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland; a man of a lofty spirit, being suspected by reason of secret consultation with with Throgmorton, the Lord Paget, and the Guises, about the invading of England, and freeing of the Queen of Scots (whose cause he ever highly favoured) but in the moneth of June, he was found dead in his bed, shot into the body with three bullets, under his right pappe, and the door bolted on the inside: The Corroners Inquest examining the matter, found and pronounced that he had killed himself. Three dayes after, the Lords meeting in the Star-chamber, Bromeley Lord Chancellor, declared this fact of the Earls, and then commanded the Atturney Generall to shew the causes of his imprisonment, and the manner of his death; whereupon, Popham first, and then Egerton the Queens Solicitor, in long Orations, lay open all his Treasons, and how for feare of the Law, he had layd violent hands upon himself.

And now the Queen knowing that the seeds of these Treasons proceeded from the Duke of Guise, and his adherents, she sought for the strengthning of her selfe, to enter into League with the Princes of Germany; and to this end, she sent Sir Thomas Bodley to the King of Denmarke, to the Count Elector Palatine of the Rhine, to the Duke of Saxony, Wittenberg, Brunswicke, Luneburg, the Marqueese of Brandenburg, and the Lant grave of Hessia; and into Scotland, she sent Sir Edward Wootton, to let the King understand how sincerely she was affected towards him, and withall to draw the King (if he could) into a League of mutuall defence and offence, and to commend to him the Match of the King of Denmarks Daughter. The King was very inclinable to the matter of the League, but for the present the businesse was interrupted, by the death of Francis Russell, Son to the Earl of Bedford, slain at a meeting to compound a difference between the Borderers, by a sudden tumult of the Scots, but who it was that slew him, was not known. The English layd it upon the Earl of Arran, and the Lord Fernihurst Governour of the middle Borders; whereupon, at the Queenes complaint, the Earl of Arran was confined, and Fernihurst committed to prison at Dundee, where he dyed; a man of great valour and resolution, and one that was alwayes firm for the Queen of Scots. But Queen Elizabeth not thus satisfied, gave leave by way of connivance to the Scottish Lords that were fled into England, namely, the Earl of Angus, the Hamiltons, John and Cladius, the Earl of Marre, Glames, and other, that they should steal away into Scotland (she supplying them with money) there to master and subdue the Earl of Arran. For Maxwell, who was lately made Earl of Bothwell, Baron Humes, Coldingknells and other in Scotland, had already promised them their assistance, even in the very Court. Sir Patrick Grey (Arrans great Rivall for the Kings favour) Belenden, and Secretary Maitland (by Wottons craft) were made against Arran. These men, upon their first entry into Scotland, command all persons in the Kings name, to ayd them for conserving the truth of the Gospell, for freeing the King from corrupt Councellors, and for maintaining of Amity with the English, so as there presently joyned with them about eight thousand men. The Earle of Arran hearing hereof, makes haste to the King, and accuseth Patricke Grey as author of this commotion: but whiles Arran was making provision for defence of the Town, the enemies were ready to scale the Walls: whereupon, Arran being advised, that only his life was sought, gets secretly away with only one servant, the rest betook themselves to the King in the Castle. Then the Rebels get into the Market-place, and display their Banners against the Castle: the King sends Grey to know the reason of their comming; they answer, to submit themselves, and in humble manner to kisse the Kings hands: the King offereth restitution of all their goods, if they would depart; They desire to be admitted to his Presence, which upon these conditions the King granted. That they should not attempt any thing against his life, or those whom he should nominate, nor make any innovation in the Government. They proteſt, They are ready to ſacrifice their lives for the Kings ſafety, and of any Innovation they had not ſo much as a thought; onely they requeſt to have their adverſaries, and the Fortifications of Scotland delivered up into their hands. Hereupon after a dayes Conſultation, they are admitted into the Kings Preſence, and forthwith the Earls of Mount Roſſe, Crawford, and Rothſay; Colonell Steward, Downs, Arran's brothers, and others, were delivered to them: The Earl of Arran, who was fled into the Weſtern Iſlands, is called home; the aſſaulters were pardoned, and pronounced good ſubjects. Hamilton is ſet over Dumbriton Caſtle, Goldingknolls over Edinburgh; the Earl of Angus over Tantallon; the Earl of Marre over Stelyn; and Glames is made Captain of the Guard. Upon this, all Proſcriptions and Outlaries whatſoever againſt all perſons, ſince the Kings Inauguration) ſaving ſome few proſcribed for the murder of the Kings Father) are called in, and with an unanimous conſent of all parties, the Treaty of a League with the Queen of England is agreed upon, and Delegates nominated to that purpoſe.

In Ireland likewiſe was a Combuſtion this yeer; firſt the Burkes (deſcended of the ancient Family of the Burroughs in England) provoked by the ſevere Government of Richard Bingham, Governour of Connaght, raiſe Rebellion; but this was ſoon ſuppreſſed, for Thomas Burk dyed fighting; Meyler, and Theobald Burke, were taken and hanged. After this, the Clan-Gibbons, Clan-Donells, and Foyes, combined together in great numbers, and ſay plainly, They will have a Mac-William of their own, one of the Burks to rule over them, or ſome other Lord out of Spain; they will admit of no Sheriff into their Countrey, nor appear before the Engliſh Courts of Juſtice; and thereupon harryed all the Countrey with Fire and Sword, and neither by the perſwaſions of the Arch-biſhop Tuan, nor by the intreaties of the Earl of Clan-ricard (the chief of the Houſe of the Burks) would be quieted, till John Bingham the Preſidents brother, following them into the Woods, drave away five thouſand Head of their Cattell, ſo as after forty dayes, half ſtarved, they came forth and ſubmitted themſelves. But this was not yet an end; for now the Preſident underſtood, That two thouſand Scottiſh Iſlanders were landed, and ready to break into Connaght; whereupon he Muſters his men to give them Battell; but they flying to Bogs and Woods, he retires back as though in fear, thereby to draw them from the Bogs to firm ground, and then with his whole Forces ſet upon them, ſlew three thouſand of them (indeed all but fourſcore) amongſt whom were Donell Garmy, and Alexander Garmy, the ſons of James Mac-Conell, who had long diſquieted this part, and thoſe Burkes who were the firſt authors of this Rebellion. This was a famous Victory, for the good of the preſent and future times; for hereby the name of the Mac-Williams in Connaght was utterly extinct, and the inſolent attempts of the Scottiſh Iſlanders abſolutely cruſhed.

In the Low-Countries at this time the States were very hard beſet, ſo as they held a Conſultation, Whether to flie for protection, either to the French King, or to the Queen of England. Monſieur Prunie the French Ambaſſadour ſhewed many advantages, and gave many reaſons why they ſhould flie rather to the French King; the Engliſh on the other ſide, alleadged many reaſons why they ſhould flie rather to the Queen of England: but in concluſion, they have firſt recourſe to the King of France, and afterward being by him neglected, to the Queen of England. But then in England it was conſulted, Whether it were meet to protect them; wherein the Councell was divided; ſome were of opinion, That it were good to receive and aid them, leſt the Spaniard firſt conquering them, might have the better way to annoy England; other again thought, They were to be held no better then Rebells to their lawfull Soveraign, and therefore unworthy of aſſiſtance. After long debating the matter, the Queen refuſeth to take into Pro-protection, much leſſe to exerciſe Soveraignty over them. Nevertheleſſe, to raiſe the Siege of Antwerp, which was then beleaguer'd by the Prince of Parma, ſhe was content to ſupply them with four thouſand Soulders, ſo as the Town of Sluce, and the Ordnance belonging to it, were given up into their hands: but while this matter was diſcuſſing, the Town of Antwerp was fain to yeeld it ſelf.

But the Queen better bethinking herſelf, partly, as fearing the growth of the King of Spain's power, and partly, as commiſerating the afflicted of her own Religion, at laſt reſolves to undertake their protection, upon condition of her part, to ſupply them with five thouſand Foot, and a thouſand Horſe, under a ſufficient Generall, paying them during the War; And afterward the expences to be payed back, upon condition on their part, by way of Pledge, to deliver Fluſhing, and the Fort of Ramekyn, the Town of Brill, with the two neighbouring Forts: and for the juſtifying of this her action, ſhe ſet forth a large Declaration. And knowing that herein ſhe incenſed the King of Spain, ſhe thought beſt to turn his anger further from home, and thereupon ſent out Sir Francis Drake, and Chriſtopher Carlile, with a Navy of one and twenty Ships (wherein were two thouſand Voluntaries and Marriners) toward the Weſt Indies; who firſt ſurprized the Town of St. Jago, afterwards St. Dominick (where five and twenty thouſand Crowns were given them, to ſpare the Town from burning) afterward Cartagena, which they held ſeven weeks, till the Spaniards redeemed it for a hundred and ten thouſand Crowns. After this, the Calenture waxing hot, and diminiſhing their Forces, they returned homewards, paſſing by Virginia, a Colony which Sir Walter Raleigh had there planted; from whence Drake brings home with him Ralph Lane, who was the firſt that brought Tobacco into England, which the Indians take againſt crudities of the Stomack. At this Expedition were loſt about ſeven hundred men, who for the moſt part died of Calentures: their Booty amounted to the value of threeſcore thouſand pounds Sterling, beſides two hundred and forty Braſſe and Iron Pieces. Theſe things were done under the Torrid Zone in America; when in the mean while, Captain John Davis, with two Ships (at the charges of William Sanderſon, and other Citizens of London) found out away to the Eaſt-Indies, by the higher part of America, under the Frigid Zone.

At the end of this yeere, the Earle of Leiceſter is ſent Generall of the Queenes Forces into Holland, accompanied with the Earle of Eſſex, the Lords Audley, and North, Sir William Ruſſell, Sir Thomas Shirley, Sir Arthur Baſſet, Sir Walter Waller, Sir Gervaſe Clifton, and divers other Knights, beſides five hundred Gentlemen. Landing at Fluſhing, he was firſt by Sir Philip Sidney the Governour his Nephew, and after by the Townes of Zeland and Holland, entertained in moſt magnificent manner, and comming to the Hague in January; the States by Patent committed to him the command and abſolute authority over the united Provinces, with the Titles of Governour and Captain Generall of Holland, Zeland, and the Confederate Provinces: So as being now ſaluted with the Title of his Excellency, he began to aſſume unto him Princely ſpirits. But the Queene tooke him ſoone off from further aſpiring, Writing to him in moſt peremptory manner, That ſhe wondred how a man whom ſhe had raiſed out of the duſt, could ſo contemptuouſly violate her commands, and therefore charged him upon his Allegiance, to put in execution the Injunctions ſhe ſent him by HENNAGE her VICE-CHAMBERLAINE; Withall, in Letters apart, She expoſtulateth with the States, that to her great diſparagement, they had caſt upon the Earle of Leiceſter her Subject, the abſolute command over the united PROVINCES without her privity, which ſhe her ſelfe had utterly refuſed, and therfore willeth them to Deveſt him of that abſolute authority, to whom she had set bounds, which he should not passe. The States returne Answer, That they are heartily sorry they should incurre her displeasure by conferring upon the Earle that absolute Authority, not having first made her acquainted, but they beseeched her to consider the necessity of it; seeing, that for avoyding of confusion, that Authority must needs be cast upon some one or other; Neither, was there any great matter in the word Absolute, seeing the Rule and Dominion resided still in the people. By these Letters, and Leicesters own submissive writing, the Queen was soon satisfied; Leicester all this while receiveth Contributions and Rewards from all Provinces, maketh Martiall Laws, and endeavouring likewise to raise new Customs upon Merchandizes, incurred great dislike amongst the common people. His first service was to relieve Grave, a Town in Brabant, which the Prince of Parma, by Count Mansfield had besieged: Hither he sent the Count Hohenlo a German, and Norris Generall of the English Foot; but notwithstanding all the great service they did there, the Town in the end was taken; but Hemart the Governor, for his cowardly yeelding it up, lost his head. From hence the Prince of Parma marched into Gelderland, and pitched his Tents before Venlow, where Skenkic a Friezlander, and Roger Williams a Welshman performed great service, yet that Town in a short time was taken also. But in the mean while, the Lord Willoughby Governor of Bergen ap Zome, cut off the enemies Convoyes, and took away their victualls; and Sir Philip Sidney, and Maurice the Prince of Oranges Son, upon a sudden on-set, took Axale a Town in Flanders. From Venlo the Prince of Parma goes to Berke, where there were twelve thousand English, under the command of Colonell Morgan; he notwithstanding layd Siege to the Town, which the Earl of Leicester came to raise, but finding his Forces to weak to raise it, he seeks to divert it, by Beleaguering Dulsbourgh; which before the Prince of Parma could come to relieve, he tooke. And now the Prince of Parma, fearing least Zutphin should come in danger, commandeth victualls to be carried thither, which the Spaniards carrying along in a fogge, the English by chance lighted on them, vanquished a Troop of their Horse, slew Hannibal Gonzaga, and divers other, but then on the English side was one slain, more worth than all the English and Spaniards put together; Sir Philip Sidney, who having his horse slain under him, and getting upon another, was shot into the thigh, and 25 dayes after, in the floure of his age, dyed: A man of so many excellent parts of Art and Nature, of Valour and Learning, of Wit and Magnanimity; that as he had equalled all those of former Ages, so future Ages wil hardly be able to equal him. His Funeralls were in sumptuous manner solemnized at St. Pauls Church in London. James King of Scotland made his Epitaph, and both Universities celebrated his death with Funerall Verses.

After this, Leicester assaulteth Zutphen, where setting upon a Fort, he takes it in this manner; Edward Stanley (of the Stanlies of Elford) catching hold of a Spaniards Launce, which was brandished at him, held it so fast, that by it he was drawn into the very Fort; whereupon, the Spaniards being affrighted (as thinking all the enemies were comming up) forsook the place; Leicester knighted Stanly for this act, gave him forty pounds in present money, and yeerly Pension of an hundred Marks during his life. And now though in this forwardnesse to winne the Town, yet winter being already come on, he thought it unseasonable to besiege it any longer (especially so many English Garrisons lying round about it, which were in nature of a siege) but returned to the Hague, where the States entertained him with complaints, that their money was not carefully husbanded, that the number of the English supplies was not full, that forreign souldiers were levyed without their consent, that the priviledges of the united Provinces were set at nought, and new devises for contribution invented; for all which evills, they they entreat him to provide some present remedy. To which complaints (having a purpose to go for England) he gave a friendly answer; but upon the very day in which he was to depart, he committeth the government of the Province, to the deliberation of the States; and the same day, made another private instrument of writing, where he reserved to himself the whole authority over the Governours of the severall Provinces, Cities, and Forts; and more than this, taketh away the wonted jurisdiction from the States Councell, and Presidents of the Provinces; and came into England the third day of December. And thus passed the affairs of the Nether-lands for this yeare.

But in England, Philip Earle of Arundel, who had lyen in Prison a whole year, was at last brought to the Starchamber; and being charged with fostering of Priests, and having correspondence with Allen and Parsons the Jesuit, and offering to depart the Kingdom without licence, was fined ten thousand pounds, and imprisonment during the Queens p'easure.

At this time, the Queen, by Sir Horatio Palavicino, supplied with a large summe of money the King of Navarre; thorow whose side, the Guyses opposed the reformed Religion in Scotland, but her most intentive care was how so unite England and Scotland in a solid friendship: To which end, she sent Thomas Randoll into Scotland, who making Propositions to the King, touching a League offensive and defensive, though the King at first required some additions, and though the French Ambassador infinitely opposed it, yet at last he consented to it; and in July following, there met at Barwick, Edward Earle of Rutland, William Lord Euer, and Thomas Randoll for the Queen of England; Francis Earl of Bothwell, Robert Lord Boyde, and Humes for the King of Scots, and there the League (which was called the League of strict Amity; for that the word offensive liked not the Scots) was upon certain points concluded: First, for the maintenance of the reformed Religion, and then other such Articles, as commonly in Leagues are usuall.

The very same moneth that this League was agreed on, a most dangerous conspiracy against the Queen was discovered. For first, one John Savage, was by the perswasions of Gifford, Doctor in Divinity, induced to believe, that it was a meritorious work, to take away the lives of Princes Excommunicate, who thereupon vowed to kill Queen Elizabeth: but to make the Queen and her Councell secure, at the very same time they wrote a book, exhorting the Papists in England, to attempt nothing against their Prince, and to use only the Christian weapons of Tears, Prayers, Watching, and Fasting. About Whitsuntide, one Ballard a Seminary Priest of Rheims, acquainted with the vow of Savage (having dealt in France with Mendoza and Charles Paget, about invading of England) arrived here in a souldiers habit, and by a counterfeit name, called Captain Fosco; with these matters he acquaints one Anthony Babington, a gentleman of Darbyshire, who by the Bishop of Glasco, the Queen of Scots Ambassador in France, had been commended to her, as one worthy of her love; so, as between them, there passed often letters in unknown characters. In short time, Babington had drawn into the Plot, other gentlemen as zealous of the Romish Religion as himselfe; namely, Edward Windsor, brother to the Lord Windsor, Thomas Salisbery of a good Family in Devonshire, Charles Tilney one of the Queens Pensioners, Chydiock Tichburne of Hamshire, Edward Abington (whose father was Coferer to the Queen) Robert Gage of Surrey, John Traverse, and John Charnock of Lancashire, John Jones. Savage formerly spoken of, Barnwell of a noble Family in Ireland, and Henry Dunne a Clerk in the Office of First-fruits and Tenths, one Pollie also served himselfe into their company, a fellow throughly acquainted with the affairs of the Queen of Scots, who was thought to have revealed all their consultations to Walsingham day by day. To these Gentlemen, Babington communicateth his affairs, but not every every particular to every one, but to Ballard, Tichburne, and Dunne, he sheweth the Letters which passed between him and the Queen of Scots; with Tilney and the rest, he dealeth to be the Assassinates; of whom, some at first loth, at last consented, and in a foolish vainglorious nesse, a picture of the Assassinates was made to the life, and Babington in the midst, with these words; Quorsum hæc alio properantibus? This Picture (they say) was gotten and privately shewed to the Queen, who knew none of them by face, but only Bernwell (who had oftentimes come to her in the causes of the Earl of Kildare, whose servant he was) Certain it is, that the Queen one day walking abroad, spyed this Bernwell, and turning to Hatton sayd, Am not I well Guarded, that have not so much as one man in the company with a sword by his side? Thus much Bernwell himselfe told the rest of his confederacy, and how easie a matter it had bin to have dispatched her at that time, if the rest had been present. The chief discoverer of the Plot, was the aforesayd Gifford: This man was a gentleman of a good Hou'e at Chellington in Staffordshire, not far from Chartley, where the Queen of Scots was kept prisoner, and was now sent by the English fugitives in France, under the counterfeit name of Luson, to put Savage in minde of the vow he had made, and to convey letters between them and the Queen of Scots. But he, whether pricked in conscience, or dismayed in minde, came to Walsingham privately, revealing who he was, and for what end, and by whom sent into England. Walsingham courteously entertained him, and sent him down into Staffordshire, to do the work he had undertaken. Here Gifford bribing the Brewer of the House, where the Queen of Scots lay, contrived the matter in such sort with him, that by a hole in the wall, in which a loose stone was put, he should give in, and receive forth Letters, the which by messengers purposely layd by the way, came evermore to Walsinghams hands, who broke them open, copied them out, and by the rare cunning of one Thomas Philips, found out the meaning of the private Characters, and by the singular Art of Arthur Gregory, sealed them again so curiously, that no man would imagine them to have been opened, and ever sent them to the parties, to whom the superscription directed them. In like manner were the former letters from the Queen of Scots to Babington intercepted; as also, other letters written at the same time to Mendoza the Spanish Ambassador, Charles Paget, the Lord Paget, the Archbishop of Glascow, and Francis Englefield. The Queen as soon as she understood by these letters of the storm hanging over her head, both at home and abroad, commanded Ballard to be apprehended, who on a sodain is taken in Babingtons house. Babington hereupon goeth to Walsingham, with whom he had long been a suiter, for licence to go into France, promising to do great matters in discovering the practises of the Fugitives; Walsingham with fair promises drives him off from day to day; and now perswades him, that for a small space till he could get his license sealed, he would lodge at his house in London, where they might have secret conference without suspition. This Web Walsingham himselfe had spun hitherto, and no other of the Queens Councell were made acquainted; and longer yet he would have drawn the thread out, but that the Queen was unwilling; least (as she sayd) by not avoyding danger when she might, she should seem rather to tempt God, than to trust in him. Whereupon, Walsingham sent a Note to his man Scudamore from the Court, to looke carefully to Babington: This Note was delivered in such manner, that Babington sitting by at Table when Scudamore read it, overlooked him, and read it likewise; Hereupon, suspecting that all was discovered, the next night he and Scudamore, and one or two more of Walsinghams servants supping at a Tavern, and being very merry, he made an excuse that he must needs step aside, and rose up, leaving his Cloak and his sword, and so made haste through the dark to Westminster, where Gage and he changed apparel, and then together withdrew themselves into one S. Johns wood neer the City, whether Barnwell also and Dun betook themselves. In the mean space they were proclaimed Traytors all England over. Hereupon they lay lurking in Woods and by-places; they shave Babingtons head, disfigure the beauty of his countenance (for he was of an extraordinary beauty) with the husks of green Wall-nuts; and when they were half starved, went to the houses of the Bellamies, neer Harrow on the hill, who were great Papists; There they were hid in Barns, and put into a Country habit: but notwithstanding all their shifting, within ten dayes after they were discovered and brought to London. The other Complices were soon after taken, most of them in the Suburbs of the Citie, Salisbury and Travers in Cheshire, and Jones in Wales, who harboured them in his house, after he knew they were Proclaimed Traitors, Windsor only was never heard of. Many dayes were spent in the examination of them, who cut one the others throats with their own confessions. All this while, the Queen of Scots and her servants are so narrowly looked to by Pawlet, that she knew nothing of all these passages: Assoon as they were apprehended, Thomas Gorge was sent to acquaint her with the whole matter, which yet he did not do, till she was got on horse-back to Ride a hunting, and was not then suffered to return, but in shew of curtesie was carried up and down, to see the Houses of the Gentry thereabouts. In which mean while, John Manners, Edward Acton, Richard Bagot, and Sir William Waad, took Nau and Curle the Queen of Scots Secretaries, and the rest of her servants, and delivered them to Keepers apart, that they might have no speech between themselves, nor with their Lady the Queen of Scots. Then they break open all doors, and such Desks and Boxes as they found with any papers in them, they set their seals upon, and sent them to the Court: In which, being broken open before the Queen, were found a number of Letters from Forreign parts, the copies likewise of Letters sent to severall persons, and threescore Alphabets at least of private Characters; as also, Letters to her from some of the English Nobility, containing great proffers of love and service, which the Queen notwithstanding took no notice of, but passed over in silence, according to her Motto, Video, & Taceo, I see, and say nothing, Gifford now, who had all this while served their turn, is sent into France; but ere he went hence, left an Indenture with the French Ambassador here in England, with instructions, that he should deliver no Letters to the Queen of Scots, or the Fugitives in France; but to him that exhibited an Indenture matching with that, the which he sent underhand to Sir Francis Walsingham.

The twentieth of September, seven of the forenamed Conspirators were Arraigned, and pleading guilty, were condemned of High-treason. Two dayes after, seven other were called to the Bar, who pleaded not guilty, but notwithstanding were found guilty by their own confessions, and condemned; Pollie only, though he were privie to all passages, yet because he had disclosed many things to Walsingham, was not called in question. The twentieth day of the moneth, the first seven in St. Giles Fields, where they were wont to meet, were hanged, cut down instantly, their privy members cut off, and themselves yet living and beholding it, were in cruell manner bowelled and quartered; namely, Ballard, Babington, Savage (who, the rope breaking, fell dowd from the Gibbet, and was presently taken by the hangman, his privie members cut off, and bowelled, while he was perfectly living) Barnwell, Tichburne, Tilney, And Abbington. The next day, the other seven were drawn to the same place, and executed in the same fashion, but in a more gentle manner, by the Queens speciall charge, who detested the former cruelty, for they were to hang till they were quite dead. Salisbery first, then Dun, then Jones, Cherwick, Traverse, Gage, and with them Hierome Bellamy, who had concealed Babington after he was Proclaimed Traytor (whose brother being guilty of the same fact, had strangled himselfe in Prison.

Wher

When these men were executed, Nave a Frenchman, and Curle a Scotsman, Secretaries to the Queen of Scots, were examined concerning the Letters, the copies of Letters, and priviate Characters found in the Queen of Scots Closet; who under their own voluntary subscriptions acknowledged, that they were their own hand writings, dictated in French by the Queen her self, taken by Nave; turned into English by Curle, and copied out in secret Characters. Hereupon, Sir Edward Wootton was sent out of hand into France, to make known to the King, the order of the Treason, and to shew him the copies of the Queen of Scots Letters, confirmed by the testimony of sundry of the English Nobility, that the French King might see what dangerous plots were by Charls Paget, and the English Fugitives contrived against the Queen of England.

And now, what should be done with the Queen of Scots, was a great consultation, wherein the Councellours were not all of one minde; some conceived, That it were not good to take any rigorous course against her, but only to hold her in fast custody; both for that she was not Authour of the Treason, but only conscious to it, and because she was crazie, and not likely to live long. Others, out of a care of Religion, were of opinion, To have her forthwith Arraigned and put to death according to the Law; Leicester thought it better to have her poisoned, and sent a Divine to Walsingham to prove it lawfull, but Walsingham protested against that course. A difference then arose amongst them, by what Law to proceed against her; Whether by the Law of the 25. of Edward the Third? (In which they are Pronounced guilty of Treason, who plot the destruction of the King or Queen, raise War in his Dominions, or adhere to his Adversaries.) Or else by the 27. of the Queen, Enacted a year since: Their opinion at last prevailed, who thought best to proceed against her by this latter Law, as being indeed in this case provided. Whereupon, divers of the Lords of the Privie Councell, and other of the Nobility, are Authorized by the Queens Letters, to enquire by vertue of that Law, and passe sentence against all such as raised Rebellion, Invaded the Kingdome, or attempted any violence against the Queen. These Commissioners therefore upon the 11. day of October, repaired to Fotheringay Castle in Northamptonshire, where the Queen of Scots was then held prisoner; and the next day, sent unto her Walter Mildmay, Paulet and Edward Barker, publick Notary, who delivered her the Queens Letters; which, having with a setled countenance read, She sayd, It seems to me strange, that the Queen should lay her Command upon me, to hold up my hand at the Bar, as though I were a Subject, seeing I am an absolute Queen, no lesse than her selfe; but howsoever, I will never do any thing prejudiciall to Princes of my degree, nor to my Son the King of Scotland. After many meetings, she standing still upon her innocency, and upon her exemption from answering, as being an absolute Prince, and specially for yeelding to be tryed by the English Laws; of which, One (she sayd) had lately been made of purpose for her destruction. It was at last told her plainly, by the Chancellour and Treasurer, That if she refused to answer to such crimes as should be objected, they would then proceed against her, though she were absent. Being brought at last, with much ado to consent, the Commissioners came together in the Presence Chamber; a Chaire of Estate was set for the Queen of England, in the upper end of the Chamber, under a Canopy; beneath over against it, was placed a Chair for the Queen of Scots; on both sides of the Cloth of Estate, stools were set, upon which on the one side sate the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, the Earls of Oxford, Kent, Derby, Worcester, Rutland, Cumberland, Warwicke, Pembrooke, Lincolne, and Viscount Mountacute; On the other side sate the Lords Burgavany, Zouch, Morley, St. John of Bletsho, Compton, and Cheyney; Next to these, sate the Knights that were Privie Councellors, Sir James Crofts, Sir Christo- pher Hatton, Sir Francis Walsingham, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Walter Mildmay, and Sir Amis Paulet; Foreward, before the Earls, sate the two Chiefe Justices, and the Lord chiefe Baron; on the other side, the two Barons, and the other Justices; Dale, and Foord, Doctors of the Civill Law, at a Table in the midst, Popham the Queens Atturney Generall, Egerton her Solicitor, Gawdie her Serjeant at Law, the Clerk of the Crown, and two Notaries. When the Queen of Scots was come, and had placed her selfe, silence being made, Bromely Lord Chancellor turning towards her, sayd; That the Queen had appointed these Commissioners, to hear what she could Answer to crimes layd to her charge, assuring her, that nothing would be cause of more joy to the Queen, then to hear, that she had proved her selfe innocent. Upon this, she rising up, sayd; That although, being an absolute Prince, she could not be compelled to appear before the Delegates, yet to manifest her innocency, she was now content to appear. Then Gawdie, opened every speciality of the Law lately made (against which she had taken exception) shewing, By Babingtons confession, by Letters passed between them, by the confessions of Ballard, and Savage, by the confessions of her Secretaries, Nave, and Curle, that she was privy to their Treasons, and consented to the Invasion of England, and destruction of the Queen. To which she answered, That Letters might be counterfeited, her Secretaries might be corrupted, the rest, in hope of life, might be drawn to confesse that which was not true: In this she stood peremptorily, That she never consented to any Attempt against the Queens Person; though for her own delivery, she confessed she did. After many other charges by the Commissioners, and replies by the Queen of Scots; At last, she requested, that she might be heard in a full Parliament, or before the Queen her selfe, and her Councell. But this request prevailed not; for on the 25. day of October following, at the Star-Chamber in Westminster, the Commissioners met again, and there pronounced sentence against her; Ratifying by their Seals and subscriptions, that after the 1. day of June, in the seven and twentieth year of our Soveraign Lady Queen Elizabeth, divers matters were compassed and imagined in this Kingdom, by Anthony Babington, and others, with the privity of Mary Queen of Scots, pretending Title to the Crown of England, tending to the hurt, death, and destruction of the Royall Person, of our sayd Soveraigne Lady the Queen.

After a few dayes, a Parliament was holden at Westminster, the which was begun by Authority from the Queen, derived to the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Treasurer, and the Earl of Derby; and the same, not without some Presidents. At this Parliament, the Proscriptions of the Lord Paget, Charls Paget, Francis Inglefield, Francis Throgmorton, Anthony Babington, Thomas Salisbury, Edward Jones, Chydiock Tichburne, Charles Tilney, and the other complices, was confirmed, and their goods and possessions adjudged confiscate. Also the Peers of the Kingdom, with an unanimous consent, exhibit a Petition to the Queen by the Lord Chancellor, that for the preservation of the true Religion, and safety of the Queen, of themselves, and their Posterity, the Sentence passed against Mary Queen of Scots, might according to Law be presently Promulged: They put the Queen in minde of the fearfull examples of Gods Judgements extant in Scripture, upon King Saul, for sparing of Agag, and upon Ahab, for not putting Benhadad to death. But the Queen answereth them to this effect: First, acknowledging Gods miraculous preservation of her, and then their constant affections towards her, for whose sakes onely she desires to live: Otherwise, when she calls to minde things past, beholds the present, and expects what may happen in time to come, that she accounts them most happy, who go soonest hence. That the Law lately made, by which the Queen of Scots is condemned, was not made (as some maliciously have imagined) to ensnare her, but but contrariwise, to forewarn and deterre her from attempting any thing againſt it, which though it had not been made, yet were there other ancient Laws enough to condemne her. Nothing could have been more grievous to me, than that a Prince, and one ſo neer Allied unto me, ſhould deſerve the Sentence pronounced againſt her; and ſeeing the matter is of rare example, and of a very weighty conſequence, I hope you will not expect, that I ſhould at this preſent determine any thing; Yet that there may be no danger in delay, I will in due time ſignifie my minde unto you; and in the meane time, would have you to expect from me, whatſoever good Subjects may looke for, from a Gracious Prince.

Twelve dayes after, having deeply weighed the matter in her minde, ſhe ſent the Lord Chancellor to the Peers, and Puckering to the Lower Houſe, entreating them to adviſe more diligently concerning ſo weighty a matter, and to bethinke themſelves of ſome wholeſome remedy, by which the life of the Queen of Scots might be ſpared, and their ſecurity alſo provided for. They, when they had a long time in moſt ſerious manner deliberated hereof, Return at laſt this Verdict; That the Queenes life could not be in ſafety, while the Queen of Scots lived, unleſſe ſhe either repented and acknowledged her crimes, or were kept in ſtraight cuſtody, or bound by her oath and obligations, or gave Hoſtages, or laſtly, departed the Kingdome. And ſeeing none of theſe were likely to be remedies; It remained, that only her death would be a remedy. Repentance in her they could little hope for, who would not ſo much as acknowledge her ſelf faulty: Cloſe Impriſonment, Obligations, Oath, and Hoſtages they accounted as nothing, which all vaniſhed, if the Queens life were once taken away; and if ſhe departed the Kingdom, they feared ſhe would ſtraightway go about to Invade it again. Theſe things the Lord Chancellor, and Puckering the Speaker of the Lower-Houſe, declared to the Queen at large, and urged her in their names, to have the Sentence put in execution. Hereupon, the Queen after a ſhort pawſe, ſpake at laſt to this effect: I proteſt, my chief deſire hath been, that for your ſecurity, and my own ſafety, ſome other way might be deviſed, than that which is now propounded; but ſeeing it is now evident and certain, that my ſafety without her deſtruction, is in a more deplorate eſtate, I am moſt grievouſly affected with inward ſorrow; That I, who have pardoned ſo many Rebells, have neglected ſo many Treaſons (either by connivance, or ſilence) ſhould now at laſt exerciſe cruelty, upon a Prince ſo neerly Allied to me. As for your Petition, I beſeech you to reſt in an Anſwer, without an Anſwer: If I ſay I will not grant your Petition, I ſhall happily ſay what I mean not; If I ſhould ſay, I will grant it, then caſt I my ſelfe into deſtruction headlong, whoſe ſafety you ſo earneſtly deſire, And that I know, you in your wiſedoms would not I ſhould doe.

After this, the Parliament was Prorogued, and then were the Lords Buckhurſt and Beale ſent to the Queen of Scots, to let her underſtand that Sentence was pronounced againſt her, and confirmed by Parliament, and that the execution of it was earneſtly deſired, by the Nobility and the Commons; and therefore perſwaded her, that before her death, ſhe would make acknowledgement of her offences, againſt God and the Queen; Intimating, That if ſhe lived, the Religion received in England, could not ſubſiſt. Hereupon, ſhe was taken with an unwonted alacrity, and ſeemed to triumph for joy, giving God thanks, and gratulating her own felicity, That ſhe ſhould be accounted an Inſtrument, for eſtabliſhing Religion in this Iſland; and therewith requeſted, She might have ſome Catholike Prieſt to adminiſter the Sacrament to her; but was denied, which ſome deemed, not inhumane onely, but tyranicall and heatheniſh. The Biſhop and the Dean, whom for this cauſe they commended to her, ſhe utterly rejected, rejected, and jeered at the Engliſh Nation, ſaying; The Engliſh were ever and anon wont to murther their own Kings, and therefore, no marvell, they ſhould now thirſt after her deſtruction. In December following the Sentence againſt her was Proclaimed, in London firſt, and after, over all the Kingdom, wherein Queen Elizabeth ſeriouſly proteſted, that this Promulgation of the Sentence was extorted from her, to her great grief, by the importunity of the whole Body of the Kingdome. The Queeh of Scots being told hereof, ſeemed not a whit dejected with it; but writing to the Queen, never maketh interceſſion for her ſelf, nor poſtulateth her death, but onely makes three ſmall requeſts, one, That ſhe might be buried in France, by her Mother; another, That ſhee might not be put to death privately, but her ſervants to be preſent; the third, That her ſervants might freely depart, and enjoy ſuch Legacies as ſhe had given them. Of which Requeſts, ſhe deſireth the Queen to vouchſafe her an anſwer; but whether this Letter ever came to Queen Elizabeth, is uncertain.

This condemnation of the Queene of Scots, as a thing ſtrange, and ſcarce credible, was ſoone ſpread farre and neare; ſo as interceſſions came thicke in her behalfe to Queene ELIZABETH, but ſpecially from the King of Scots, and the King of FRANCE, who ſent their ſeverall Ambaſſadors, uſing all the reaſons that naturall affection in the one, and likeneſſe of condition in the other, could urge, for ſparing of her life; but when the neceſſity of the State, ſeemed to obſtruct all wayes of clemency, the French Ambaſſador L'Aubeſpine, falls from reaſons to action, and thinketh no way ſo effectuall for ſaving the Queen of Scots life, as to take away Queen ELIZABETHS life; and thereupon, Firſt, he dealeth covertly with William Stafford, a young Gentleman, and prone to embrace hopes (whoſe Mother was of the Bed-chamber to Queen ELIZABETH, and his brother at that time, Ambaſſador Lieger in France) and afterward, more openly by Trappe his Secretary, to murther the Queen. Stafford, though not daring to act ſuch a villany himſelfe, yet commended one Moody to him, a reſolute fellow, and one that for money would be ſure to do it. Upon this, Stafford brings Trappe to Moody, being then in the common Gaole, who upon Trappes offers, undertakes it: But then the conſultation was, by what way it ſhould be done? Moody propounded poiſon, or elſe to lay a bagge of Gunpowder under the Queens Bed, and ſuddenly fire it. But Trappe liked of neither of theſe wayes, but would rather have it done, as was done to the Prince of Orange. But while they are thus conſulting about the way of doing it; Stafford diſcovers all to the Lords of the Councell. Whereupon Trappe, who was now bound for France, was apprehended, and being examined, confeſſed the whole matter. Upon this, the Ambaſſador himſelf was ſent for to Cecills houſe, the twelveth of January; where met him by the Queens appointment, Cecill Lord Treaſurer, the Earle of Leiceſter, Sir Chriſtopher Hatton Vice-Chamberlain, and Davyſon one of her Secretaries; who declare to the Ambaſſador every particular which Stafford, Moody, and Trappe his Secretary had confeſſed. Aſſoone as Stafford was brought forth, and began to ſpeake, the AMBASSADOR interrupted him, and revyling him, made aſſeveration, that Stafford firſt propounded it; when Stafford falling on his knees, made fearful imprecations, that the AMBASSADOR firſt propounded it himſelf. But whoſoever propounded it (ſayth BVRLEIGH) It appeares, that you were made acquainted with the matter. To which hee preſently Replyed; That if hee had knowne of any ſuch thing, yet, being he was an AMBASSADOVR; hee ought not to

to give notice of it, but to his own King. After much reaſoning in this manner; The Lord Burleigh admoniſhed him, to beware how he offended hereafter in this kinde; and let him know, That he is not quitted from the offence, though for this time the Queen be pleaſed to forbear him.

But upon this Treaſon, the Queen of Scots Adverſaries put many terrors into Queen Elizabeths minde, giving out, That the Spaniſh Navy was come to Milford Haven, That the Scots were broken into England, That the Duke of Guyſe with a great Army was landed in Suſſex, That the Queen of Scots was eſcaped out of Priſon, and had gotten a Company up in Arms, and many other ſuch feigned ſuggeſtions; Through which, at length they drew the Queen to this: That ſhe ſealed Letters, for executing the Sentence againſt the Queen of Scots; and one of her greateſt perſwaders to it (as the Scots reported) was one whom the King of Scots had ſent to diſſwade her from it; namely, Patricke Grey, who ſounded often in her ears, Mortua non mordet; when ſhe is dead, ſhe cannot bite.

The Queen notwithſtanding, began to weigh with her ſelf, whether it were better to rid her out of the way, or elſe to ſpare her; and many great reaſons offered themſelves on both ſides, but where only ſpeculative reaſons preſented themſelves for ſparing her; many practicall reaſons, and thoſe preſſed both by Courtiers and Preachers, were preſented to her; ſo as long holden in ſuſpence, ſhe would oftentimes ſit ſpeechleſſe, and her countenance caſt down: At laſt, her fear prevayling, ſhe delivered to Secretary Davyſon, Letters under her hand and Seal, to get the Commiſſion made under the Great Seal of England, for the Execution of the Queen of Scots, which might be in a readineſſe upon any fear of danger; charging him not to diſcloſe the matter, to any whomſoever. But the next day her minde was altered, and ſent Sir William Killegrew to Davyſon, to countermand the making of the Commiſſion. Whereupon Davyſon goes to her, and lets her know, That the Commiſſion was already made, and the Seal put to it; Whereat, the Queen extreamly angry, rebuketh him ſharply for his haſtineſſe; yet Davyſon imparteth the matter to Privy Councellors, and perſwades them, That the Queen Commanded, the Commiſſion ſhould be put in execution. Hereupon, Beale Clerk of the Councell, is ſent down with Letters, wherein authority is deputed to the Earls of Shrewſbury, Kent, Derby, Cumberland, and others, that ſhe ſhould be put to death according to the Law; with which proceeding, the Queen was not once made acquainted; and more than this, Although ſhe had intimated to Davyſon, That ſhe would take ſome other order concerning the Queen of Scots, yet did not he ſtay Beale from going.

And now comes in the laſt Act of the Queen of Scots Tragedy; for aſſoon as the Earls were come to Fotheringay; They, together with Sir Amis Paulet, and Sir Drue Drurie, with whom ſhe was then in cuſtody; go unto her, and reading the Commiſſion, ſignifie the cauſe of their comming; and in a few words, admoniſh her to prepare her ſelfe for death, for that ſhe muſt dye the next day. Whereto, without any change of countenance or paſſion of minde, ſhe made Anſwer; I had not thought that my Siſter the Queen, would have conſented to my death, who am not ſubject to your Laws; but ſince it is her pleaſure, death ſhall then be to me moſt welcome. Then ſhe requeſteth that ſhe might conferre with her Confeſſor, and Melvyn her Steward, which would not be granted: The Biſhop or Deane of Peterborough they offered her, but them ſhe refuſed. The Earles being departed, ſhe gave order that Supper ſhould bee haſtened, where ſhee eat (as ſhe uſed to doe) ſoberly, and ſparingly; and perceiving her men and women ſervants to lament and weepe, ſhe comforteth them, and bid them rejoyce rather, that that ſhe was now to depart out of a world of miſery. After ſupper, ſhe looketh over her Will, read the Inventory of her Goods and Jewells, and writ their names ſeverally by them, to whom ſhe gave any of them; at her wonted hour ſhe went to bed, and after a few hours ſleep, awaking; ſpent the reſt of the night in her devotion. And now the fatall day being come, wich was the 8 of February, ſhe getteth up, and makes her ready in her beſt Apparell, and then betook her ſelf in her Cloſet to Almighty God, imploring his aſſiſtance with deep ſighes and groans; untill Thomas Andrews Sheriffe of the County gave notice, that it was time to come forth, and then with a Princely Majeſty, and chearfull countenance, ſhe came out, her head covered with a linnen Vayl, and carrying an Ivory Crucifix in her hand; In the Gallery the Earls met her, and the other Gentlemen, where Melvyn her ſervant upon his bended knees, deplored his own fortune, that he ſhould be the meſſenger to carry this ſad newes into Scotland; whom ſhe comforted ſaying, Do not lament Melvyn, Thou ſhalt by and by ſee Mary Steward freed from all cares. Then turning her ſelf to the Earls, She requeſted that her ſervants might ſtand by her at her death, which the Earl of Kent was very loath to grant, for fear of ſuperſtition; To whom ſhe ſayd, Fear nothing, theſe poor wretches deſire only to give me my laſt farewell. I know the Queen my Siſter, would not deny me ſo ſmall a requeſt. After this, the two Earls, and the Sheriff of the County leading the way, ſhe came to the Scaffold, which was ſet up at the upper end of the Hall, where was a Chayre, a Cuſhion, and a Block, all covered with Mourning. Then the Dean of Peterborough going to Prayers, ſhe falling upon her knees, and holding up the Crucifix in both her hands, prayed with her Servants in Latine, out of the Office of the bleſſed Virgin. Prayers being ended, ſhe kiſſed the Crucifix, and ſigning her ſelf with the Sign of the Croſſe, ſaid, As thy arms, O Chriſt, were ſpread forth upon the Croſſe, ſo embrace me with the open arms of thy mercy, and forgive me my ſins. Then the Executioner asking her pardon, ſhe forgave him. And now her women helping off her outer Garments, and breaking forth into ſhrikes and cryes, ſhe kiſſed them, ſigned them with the Croſſe, and willed them to leave lamenting, for now an end of her ſorrows was at hand; and then ſhadowing her face with a Linnen Cloth, and lying down on the Block, ſhe repeated the Pſalm, In te Domine ſperavi, ne confundar in æternum; at which words ſhe ſtretching forth her Body, her head at two blows was taken off. Her Body was afterward Royally buried in the Cathedrall Church at Peterborough; but ſince that, her Noble Son James, King of Great Britain, erected a Royall Monument for her, in King Henry the ſeventh's Chappell at Weſtminſter. This end had Mary Queen of Scots, in the ſix and fortieth yeer of her age, and of her Impriſonment in England the eighteenth; a Lady ſo compleat in all excellent parts of body and minde, that muſt needs have made her a happy woman, if ſhe had not been a Queen; and perhaps a happy Queen too, if ſhe had not been Heir to the Crown of England: For why did all her endeavours want ſucceſſe, but onely from the fear of that Succeſſion; and no Innocency of heas could be a Defence, where the fury of Jealouſie made the Aſſault.

Aſſoon as it came to the Queens knowledge, that the Queen of Scots was put to death, her countenance grew dejected, and her ſpeech fayled her; inſomuch that all in mourning weeds, ſhe gave her ſelf over to ſorrow, Commanded her Councellors from her Preſence, and cauſed Davyſon to be cited to the Starchamber. And aſſoon as grief would ſuffer her, She wrote a Letter with her own hand to the King of Scots, and ſent it by Sir Robert Cary, to this effect; That her minde was infinitely diſquieted, in regard of this lamentable event, againſt her meaning and intent; entreating him to believe, That if ſhe had commanded it, ſhe would never have denyed it, and withall, Proteſting her true affection towards him, and her aſſiduous watchfulneſſe for the proſpering of his affairs.

While Carye was on his journey, Davyſon is cited to the Star-Chamber before theſe Delegates, Sir Chriſtopher Wray Chiefe Juſtice of the Kings-Bench, for that time made Lord Privy Seal, the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, the Earls of Worceſter, Cumberland, and Lincolne, the Lords Grey, and Lumley, Sir James Croft, Comptroller of the Queens Houſe, Sir Walter Mildmay, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Edmond Anderſon, Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas, and Sir Roger Manwood, Lord Chief Baron (where note, That Bromely Lord Chancellor, Burleigh Lord Treaſurer, Leiceſter, and Hatton, who were indeed more guilty of the fact, than Davyſon, were none of the number.) Before theſe Delegates, Popham the Queens Atturney layeth to Davyſons charge, Contempt of the Queen; Majeſty, violating of his truſt, and neglect of his duty, laying open all particulars of his fact; which after Egerton the Queens Solicitor, Gawdy, and Puckering her Serjeants at Law, urged alſo againſt him with great aggravation: To which Davyſon mildely anſwered, That he would not conteſt with the Queen; only proteſts, That if he had done any thing otherwiſe than he ought, it was out of ignorance and miſtaking, and not out of any purpoſe to diſobey her Majeſty. It ſeems the Queen had carried her ſelfe, as one that would have it done, and yet was loth to do it, ſcarce knowing her one minde, and yet would have another know it; meaning to make it the work of miſtaking, rather than of purpoſe, that ſo at leaſt ſhe might leave ſome place of ſatisfaction to her ſelfe, that it was not abſolutely of her doing.

The Pleadings ended, the Commiſſioners went to cenſure; Manwood began, and gave his opinion, That Davyſon, for the inconſideratneſſe of his fact, ſhould be fined ten thouſand pounds, and Impriſonment during the Queens pleaſure; the reſt went on in that Sentence, only the Lord Grey excuſed Davyſon ſo far, That he thought him worthy of reward, rather than of puniſhment: The concluſion was, the firſt Sentence for his Fine and Impriſonment, was by Wray keeper of the Privy Seal confirmed; and Davyſon never after recovered the Queens favour, though ſhe relieved him ſometimes in his neceſſity. A man ingenious indeed, but not throughly acquainted with the wayes of the Court; and thought to have been raiſed to this place, of purpoſe to Act this part, and for nothing elſe.

By this time Sir Robert Cary, Son to the Lord Hunſdon, who was ſent to excuſe the Queen, was come to the Borders; but being come thither, was not ſuffered to ſet foot in Scotland, The King would ſcarce hear him by another, and with much adoe received his Letters. He called home his Ambaſſador out of England, and thought of nothing but revenge.

But the Queen ſtill laying the fault upon Davyſon, and the unadviſed credulity of her Councellros, by little and little allayeth his paſſion; and expecting, till time had ſomewhat aſſwaged his griefe, that it would endure to be touched, at length, by her Agents in Scotland; And ſoon after by the Lord Hunſdon Governor of Berwicke, She admoniſhed him, How dangerous it would be for him, to break out into War againſt England, and what little help he could juſtly expect from either Spain or France, but if he perſiſted in the amity with England, he might be ſure the Queen of England, would moſt lovingly account him for her Son. And to the end, that he ſhould aſſure himſelf, that the Queen his Mother was put to death without her privity, ſhe ſent him the Sentence againſt Davyſon, under the Seals of all the Delegates, and atteſted under the Great Seal of England; and another Inſtrument likewiſe ſigned with the hands of the Judges of England, in which they averre, That the Sentence againſt the Queen of Scots, could in no wiſe be prejudice to his right in the Succeſſion. Ha-

Having now by theſe and the like courſes, ſomewhat aſſwaged the King of Scots indignation; to prevent the War which they foreſaw was imminent from the King of Spain, they ſend forth Drake with four of the Queens ſhips and others, unto the Coaſt of Spain, to ſet upon their ſhips in the Havens, and to intercept their Munition. Drake entring into the Port of Cales, ſunck, took, and fired, about an hundred ſhips, wherein was great ſtore of Munition and Victualls: Then returning to the Cape of St. Vincent, he ſet up three Forts, and compelled them to yeild. Thence ſetting ſayl towards the Weſtern Iſlands, called Azores, under the great Meridian; by great good fortune he happened upon an huge and wealthy Carack, called St. Philip, returning from the Eaſt-Indies, and eaſily vanquiſhed it; Wherupon the Mariners on both ſides, from the name of Philip, portended no good luck to Philip King of Spain.

At the ſame time, Thomas Cavendiſh of Suffolke, in the other part of the World, who two years before had ſet ſayl from England with three ſhips, paſſing thorough the Straights of Magellan, in the Coaſt of Chily, Peru, and Nuova Hiſpania, fired a great number of Spaniſh Towns, took and pillaged ninteen great ſhips, and amongſt them a wealthy ſhip of the Kings, nigh unto Caliphornia, in North America; and ſo by the Philippine Iſles, the Molucce, the Cape de Bone Eſperance, and the Iſland of St. Helene, returned home the next year, being the third after Magellan, that ſayled about the World.

As Drake and Cavendiſh at this time gained great fame and renown; ſo two other men in the Netherlands (Stanley and Yorke) purchaſed as great infamy and diſgrace: This Yorke was a Londoner, a bold fellow, and of looſe behaviour; famous for bringing firſt into England, the manner of turning the point upon the Adverſary in ſingle Combats, whereas the Engliſh till this time, were wont to be armed with Bucklers and ſwords, and to ſtrike with edge, and it was held no manhood to turn the point, or ſtrike below the girdle. He ſuffering ſome affront from the Earl of Leiceſter, fled away, and for a time, ſerved under the Spaniards in the Netherlands, till at length being reconciled to Leiceſter, he was ſent over the Fort near Zutphen; but being bribed, he not only yeilded up the place to the Enemy, but drew to the like villany one Stanley, who with great valour had ſerved in an Iriſh expedition; to yeild up Daventry to the Spaniards, a wealthy and well Fortified Town. But what got they by their treachery, The Spaniards ſet Yorke and Stanley at variance, they poiſon Yorke and ſeize upon his goods, his carkaſſe was three years after digged up by the States commandment, and hanged up on a Gibbet till it rotted away; Stanley went into Spain, where there was no credit given to him; for the Spaniards have a ſaying, It is lawfull to give honor to a Traytor ſometimes, but never to truſt him.

Theſe late treacheries, wrought the Earl of Leiceſter much envy with the Confederate Netherlands, becauſe the Traytors were very intimate with him; whereupon the States in large letters to the Queen, accuſe Leiceſter for his ill managing of the Weal-Publick, in the matter of money, Merchandize, and Military affairs; and to his credulity, They impute the harm which accrewed by Yorke and Stanley. The Queen, for the narrow ſifting of the matter, and compoſing it; ſent thither Thomas Sackvile Lord Buckhurſt (lately taken into her Privie Councell in Leiceſters abſence) Norris, and Bartholmew Clerke: But when as the officious diligence of Buckhurſt, ſeemed to trench upon Leiceſters reputation; his grace with the Queen proved ſo forcible, that Buckhurſt at his return, was for certain moneths confined to his houſe.

Afterward, Sluce being beleaguered by the Prince of Parma, Leiceſter was by the States ſent for out of England, to ſuccour it; the Town was furiouſly aſſaulted, with ſeventeen thouſand great ſhot, and a mighty breach was made made into it; which nevertheleſſe, Roger Williams, Francis Vere, Nicholas Baskervile, with the Garriſon of the Engliſh and Wallons, were valiantly defended for a while, but at laſt were enforced to yeild it up. Leiceſter, that came to relieve it, finding himſelf too weak for the Beſiegers, being gone away. And indeed, the States would not commit any great Army to his Command; who(they knew had a determination to ſeize Leyden, and ſome other Towns into his own hands, and had a purpoſe to ſurprize the abſolute Government. Whereupon, the States uſed means, that Leiceſter was called home; gave up the Government to the States, and in his roome ſucceeded Maurice of Naſſaw Son to the Prince of Orange, being now but twenty years of age.) Peregrine Lord Willoughby, was by the Queen made Generall of the Engliſh Forces in the Low-Countries, to whom ſhe gave command to reduce the Engliſh Factions into the States obedience; the which, with the help of Prince Maurice, he eaſily effected.

Leiceſter being now come home, and perceiving that an accuſation was preparing againſt him by Buckhurſt and others, for his unfaithfull managing of affairs in Holland; privately with tears he caſt himſelf down at the Queens feet, entreating her, that ſhe would not receive him with diſgrace, at his return, whom ſhe had ſent forth with honor; and ſo far prevailed with her, that the next day being called to examination before the Lords, he took his place amongſt them, not kneeling down at the end of the Table, as the manner of Delinquents is; and when the Secretary began to read the heads of his Accuſation, he interrupted him, ſaying; That the publick inſtructions which he had received, were limited with private reſtriction; and making his appeal to the Queen, eluded the whole crimination, with the ſecret indignation of his Adverſaries.

This year was famous for the death of many great Perſonages: In the moneth of February, dyed Henry Nevill Lord of Aburgaveny, great Grandchilde to Edward Nevill, who in the Reign of King Henry the Sixth, got this Title in the right of his Wife, only Daughter and Heir to Richard Beauchamp Earl of Worceſter, and Lord of Aburgaveny; In which right, when as the only Daughter of this Henry, Wife to Sir Thomas Fane, challenged the Title of Baroneſſe of Aburgaveny; a memorable contention aroſe concerning the Title between her, and the next Heir Male, to whom by Will (and the ſame confirmed by Authority of Parliament) the Caſtle of Aburgaveny was bequeathed. This queſtion being a long time debated; at laſt in a Parliament holden in the ſecond year of King James, the matter was tryed by voyces; and the Heir Male carried the Lordſhip of Aburgaveny, and the Barony Le Diſpencer, was ratified to the Female. This year alſo, in the moneth of Aprill, dyed Anne Stanhope Dutcheſſe of Somerſet, ninety years old, who being the Wife of Edward Seymer Duke of Somerſet, and Protector of England, contended for precedency, with Katherine Parre, Queen Dowager to King Henry the Eight. There dyed alſo, Sir Ralph Sadler, Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaſter, the laſt Baneret of England, with which dignity he was adorned at the Battell of Muſſelborough in Scotland. After him dyed Thomas Bromley Lord Chancellor of England; and ſix dayes after, He, whom the Queen meant ſhould have ſucceeded him, Edward Earl of Rutland; but he now fayling, Sir Chriſtopher Hatton was made Lord Chancellor, who though he were a Courtier, yet the Queen knowing him to be an honeſt man, thought him not unfit for that place, where conſcience hath, or ſhould have more place than Law; although ſome were of opinion, That it was not ſo much the Queens own choice, as that ſhe was perſwaded to it by ſome that wiſht him not well; both thereby to be a cauſe of abſenting him from the Court, and thinking that ſuch a ſedentary place, to a corpulent man that had been uſed to exerciſe, would be a means to ſhorten his life, and indeed he lived not full out three years after.

Thi

This yeer Sir John Perot was called home out of Ireland, and left all in peace, quiet to Fitz Williams his Succeſſor. For hitherto the Engliſh found it no hard matter to vanquiſh the Iriſh, by reaſon of their unskilfulneſſe in Arms; eight hundred Foot, and three hundred Horſe, was held an invincible Army: but after that by Perots command, they were inſtruſted in Feats of Arms, and taught to diſcharge Muskets at a Mark, and had in the Low-Countries learned the Art of Fortification, they held the Engliſh better to it, and were not ſo eaſily overcome.

And now we are come to the one and twentieth yeer of Queen Elizabeths Raign, being the yeer 1588, long before ſpoken of by Aſtrologers, to be a wonderfull yeer, and even the Climactericall yeer of the World. And yet the greateſt Wonder that happened this yeer, was but the wonderfull Fleet that Spain provided for invading of ENGLAND, if the defeat of that wonderfull Fleet were not a greater Wonder.

It is true, there was at this time a Treaty of Peace between England and Spain; and the Earl of Derby, the Lord Cobham, Sir James Crofts, Dale and Rogers, Doctors of Law, Commiſſioners for the Queen: for the Prince of Parma, the Count Aurenberg, Champignie, Richardot, Maes, and Garvyer, Doctors, had many meetings about it neer to Oſtend; but it ſeemed on the part of Spain, rather to make the Engliſh ſecure, that they ſhould not make proviſion for War, than that they had any purpoſe of reall proceeding, ſeeing they accepted not of any reaſonable Conditions that were offered, but triſled out the time, till the Spaniſh Navy was come upon the Coaſt, and the Ordnance heard from Sea, and then diſmiſſed the Engliſh Delegates.

The Spaniſh Navy conſiſted of one hundred and thirty Ships; whereof Galeaſſes and Galleons, ſeventy two, goodly Ships, like to floating Towers; in which were Souldiers, 19290; Marriners, 8350; Gally-ſlaves, 2080; Great Ordnance, 2630: For the greater holineſſe of their Action, twelve of their Ships were called, The twelve Apoſtles. Chief Commander of the Fleet, was Don Alphonſo, Duke of Medina; and next to him, John Martin Recalde, a great Sea-man. The twentieth of May they weighed Anchor from the River Tagus, but were by Tempeſt ſo miſerably diſperſt, that it was long ere they met again: but then they ſent before to the Prince of Parma, That he with his Forces, conſiſting of fifty thouſand old Souldiers, ſhould be ready to joyn with them, and with his Shipping conduct them into England, and to land his Army at the Thames Mouth.

The Queens Preparation in the mean time, was this; The Lord Charles Howard, Lord Admirall, with all her Navy; and Sir Francis Drake, Vice-Admirall, to be ready at Plimouth; and the Lord Henry Seymor (ſecond ſon to the Duke of Somerſet, with forty Engliſh and Dutch Ships, to keep the Coaſts of the Netherlands, to hinder the Prince of Parma's coming forth. Then for Land-Service, there were laid along the Southern Coaſt, twenty thouſand ſouldiers, and two Armies beſides of Trayned men were levyed, over one of which, conſiſting of a thouſand Horſe, and two and twenty thouſand Foot, the Earl of Leiceſter commanded, and pitched his Tents at Tilbury, neer the Thames mouth: Over the other, appointed to Guard the Queens Perſon, and conſiſting of four and twenty thouſand Foot, and two thouſand Horſe, the Lord Hunſdon was Generall. Arthur Lord Grey, Sir Francis Knolles, Sir John Norris, Sir Richard Bingham, Sir Roger Williams, and other Military men, were choſen to make a Councell of War, and conſult how the Land-ſervice ſhould be ordered. Theſe declared, amongſt other things, That the places which lay fitteſt for the enemies landing, as Milford Haven, Falmouth, Plimouth, Portland, Portland, the Isle of Wight, Portsmouth, the Downs, the Thames mouth, Harwich, Yarmouth, Hull, and such other, should be fortified with Works and Garrisons; the Trayned Souldiers of those Shires which lay neer the Sea Coast, should defend those places, and be ready at the Alarm to hinder the Enemy from Landing; but if he did land, then to spoyl the Countrey round about, that he might finde no food; and by continuall crying, Arm, Arm, give the Enemy no rest, but yet should not give Battell, till good store of Commanders were come together.

At this time many fearing the Papists at home, no lesse than the Spaniards abroad, perswaded the Queen to take off the heads of some of the greatest of them; but she detesting such cruelty, took order onely, That some few of them should be committed to custody in Wisbych Castle.

And now all things on both sides prepared, the Spanish Navy set forth out of the Groyne in May, but was dispersed and driven back by weather. The English Navy set forth somewhat later out of Plimouth, bearing up towards the Coast of Spain; but partly by occasion of contrary windes, partly by advertisement that the Spaniards were gone back, and upon some doubt also that they might passe by towards the Coast of England, whilest they were seeking them afar off, they returned to Plimouth; At which time, a confident (though false) advertisement came to the Admirall, That the Spaniards could not possible come forward that yeer: whereupon the English Navy was upon the point of disbanding, and many of the men were gone on shore; when suddenly the invincible Armada (for so it was called in a Spanish ostentation) was discovered upon the Western Coast: whereof the Lord Admirall being informed, had much ado to get the Queens Navy out of the Haven (the winde being contrary) yet at length he haled it forth. The next day, the English beheld the Spanish Ships, in height like to Castles, sayling slowly along, whom they suffered peaceably to passe by, that they might have the benefit of the winde to follow after. The one and twentieth day of July, the Admirall of England sent a Pinnace before, called, The Defiance, which by a great shot, challenged the Spaniards to fight, and by and by they fell to it. Then Drake, Hawkins, and Forbisher let fly against the outmost Squadron, which Recalde commanded, making him glad to fly to their main Navy for succour. The night following, a mighty Biskayner of Oquenda's (in which the King of Spain's Treasure was) was by chance fired with Gun-powder, but was timely quenched by other Ships sent to her succour; one of which Ships, was the Galleon of Don Pedro, whom Sir Francis Drake took prisoner, and sent him to Darthmouth. The Biskayner it self (the Treasure being taken out by the Spaniards) they left behinde them, which the English brought into the Haven at Weymouth.

The three and twentieth day of this Month, they had a second Fight, in which most of the Spanish Shot flew over the English Ships, and never hurt them; Onely Cock an English-man, being with his little Vessell in the midst of the enemies, died valiantly. The four and twentieth day, they rested on both sides; in which time the Lord Admirall ranked his whole Fleet into four Squadrons: The first he ruled himself, Drake the second, Hawkins the third, and Forbisher the fourth.

The five and twentieth day (which was Saint James day) they fell to it the third time; in which Fight, the English had again the better, so as after this time, the Spaniards would no more turne upon the English, but holding on their course, dispatched a Messenger to the Prince Prince of Parma; Requiring him forthwith to joyne himself to the Kings Fleet, and withall to send them Bullets.

The day following, the Lord Admirall Knighted Thomas Howard, the Lord Sheffield; Roger Townsend, John Hawkins, and Martin Frobisher; and holding a Councell of War, they decreed not to set again upon the Enemy, till they came to the streight of Calice, where the Lord Henry Seymor and Sir William Winter waited for their coming. And now so far were the English from being terrified with this invincible Navy, that many of the Nobility and other of speciall note, hired Ships at their own charges and came to the Admirall; as the Earls of Oxford, Northumberland, Cumberland, Thomas and Robert Cecill, Henry Brook, Sir Charls Blunt, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir William Hatton, Sir Robert Carie, Sir Ambrose Willoughby, Sir Thomas Gerard, Sir Arthur Gorge and others.

The seaven and twentieth of July towards the Evening, the Spaniards cast Anchour neer unto Calis, and not far from them rode the English Admirall, within shot of a great Ordnance, to whom Seymor and Winter joyned themselves, so as by this time there were in the English Navy a hundred and forty Ships, nimble and serviceable for Fighting or Sayling, yet only Fifteen of them bore the stroke of the Battell. And now againe the Spaniards sent Post after Post to the Prince of Parma to send them forty Flye-boates, without which they were not able to skirmish with the English, by reason of the greatnesse and unweldinesse of their Ships, and importune him presently to put to Sea with his Army; But he was unprepared, and his Flat-bottomed Boates were full of chinks and leaked, and besides, the Hollanders hovered before the Ports of Dunkerk and Newport, in such sort, that he durst not look forth.

The eight and twentieth day, the Lord Admirall made ready eight of his worst Ships, on the out-side dawbed with wild-fire, Rozin and Brimstone, within, full of combustible matter, and under the conduct of Young and Prowse, sent them down with the winde in the silent time of the night towards the Spanish Fleet; the which when the Spaniards saw approach them, and the Sea as it were all on a light fire; imagining withall, that those Fire-ships might carry in them some murthering Engines, they made a hideous noise, took up Anchours, cutt Cables, spread Sayles, and betook themselves to their Oars, but more to flight: One of the Spanish Galleasses having lost her Rudder, and floating up and down, was held in sight by Amias Preston, Thomas Gerard, and Harvie, who slew Captain Hugh Moncada, cast the Souldiers over board, and carryed away a great deale of Gold, but the Vessell and Ordnance was wreck to the Governour of Calice.

Drake and Fenet in the mean while perceiving the Spanish Fleet to gather togethea again before Graveling, set upon them with great violence, to whom straightwayes, Fenton, Southwell, Beeston, Crosse, and Riman joyne themselves, and soon after the Admirall himself, Sir Thomas Howard, and the Lord Sheffield, the Galleon called Saint Matthew, was sorely battered by Seymor and Winter, driven toward Ostend, and set upon again by the Zelanders, and at last was taken by the Flushingers.

And now the Spanish Navy having want of many necessaries, and no hope of the Prince of Parma's coming, they resolved to returne Northward for Spain; in which passage they lost both many Ships and men, the English Navy still following them close, till they were faine to give them over for want of Powder. Whilest these things passed at Sea, the Queen in Person came to Tilbury to view the Army and Campe there, where she shewed such undaunted Courage and Resolution, that it wonderfully animated the spirits of them all.

And thus this Navy, which was three whole Yeers in preparing, in the space of a month was often beaten, and at length put to flight, many of their men being ſlain, more then halfe of their Ships taken and ſunk (of the Engliſh not above a hundred at the moſt miſſing, nor ſo much as a Ship, but Cocks little Veſſell) and Sayling about all Brittaine by Scotland, the Orkeneys and Ireland, they returned into Spain with as much diſhonour as they came out with boaſting, for indeed Mendoza in France by a Book in Print, Triumphed before the Victory.

For the happy ſucceſſe of this Action, Queen Elizabeth appointed prayers and thanksgiving over all the Churches of England, and ſhe (as it were in triumph) came in Perſon, attended with a great Troop of the Nobility into the City, and went into the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul (where the Banners taken from the Enemy was placed in view) and there in moſt humble manner gave thanks to Almighty God. And that which increaſed the publike joy, was the newes which Sir Robert Sidney brought out of Scotland, That the King had over-paſt all injuries, was lovingly affected towards the Engliſh, and deſired to imbrace ſincere and perfect amitie with the Queen. For as for the King of Spain, he wittily told the Embaſſadour, that he expected no other courteſie from him, but ſuch as Polyphemus promiſed Uliſſes, that he ſhould be the laſt whom he would devoure.

And now dyed the great Earl of Leiceſter the fourth day of September, at his Mannor of Killingworth of a violent Feaver; I may well ſay the great Earl, conſidering the many great Honours he enjoyed, which are extant in the Story; yet one honour greater then any he had before, he effected even then when he was ready to go out of the world, and that was; To be Vice-gerent in the high Government of England and Ireland, for which the Patent was already drawne, and had been ſealed; but that Burleigh and Hatton ſhewed the Queen how dangerous a thing it might prove, for ſo great Authority to reſide in one Subject. He was while he lived in ſo great favour with the Queen, that ſome thought (and himſelfe not the leaſt) that ſhe meant to marry him; yet when he dyed, his goods were ſold at an Outcry to make payment of the debts he owed her.

About this time Philip Earl of Arundell, who three yeers before had been caſt in priſon, was now cited in Weſtminſter Hall, to the judgement of his Peers, and Henry Earl of Derby was made High Steward of England for the time. The matters layd to his charge were theſe: That he had contracted friendſhip with Cardinall Allen, Parſons the Jeſuite, and other Traytours, exciting divers both abroad and at home to reſtore the Romiſh Religion, promiſing his aſſiſtance thereunto: and for that reaſon had a purpoſe to depart the Kingdom. That he was privy to the Bull, in which Pope Sixtus Quintus had depoſed the Queen, and given England to the Spaniard; that being impriſoned in the Tower he cauſed Maſſe to be ſaid for the proſperous ſucceſſe of the Spaniſh Fleet, and for that purpoſe had framed peculiar prayers for his own private uſe. Being demanded whether he were guilty of theſe things; turning himſelf to the Judges, he asked them theſe queſtions: Firſt, whether it were lawfull to heap up ſo many crimes together in one Bill of Indictment? They anſwered that it was: Then whether Arguments taken from preſumptions were of force? They anſwered, that it was lawfull for him to interpoſe exceptions if he ſaw cauſe. Then again, if he might be Arraigned for thoſe things which were Capitall, by the Law made the thirteenth yeer of the Queen, after that the time expreſſed in the Act was expired? They promiſed, they would proceed againſt him by no Law; but the old Statute of Treaſon, made in the Raigne of King Edward the Third. But now again asked if he were guilty or not; He pleaded not guilty, whereupon Puckering the Queens Sergeant at Law, Popham Atturney Generall, Shuttleworth Sergeant at Law, and Egerton the Queens Sollicitour, in their turnes, urged and proved the crimes objected; ſome whereof he denyed, ſome he extenuated; but in concluſion was by his his Peers found guilty and condemned; yet the Queen ſpared his life, and was content with thus much done in terror to the Papiſts.

It was now the yeer 1589. And the two and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeths Raign; when to be in ſome ſort revenged of the Spaniards for their Invaſion, ſhe gave leave to Sir John Norris and Sir Francis Drake to undertake an Expedition at their own private charges, requiring nothing of her but a few Ships of War, who took along with them Anthony the baſtard, laying clayme to the Kingdom of Portingall, and of Souldiers to the number of eleven thouſand, of Sea-men about fifteen hundred: ſetting Sayle from Plimmouth the fifth day of Aprill, they arrived at the Groyne in Galacia; whereof, with great valour they took firſt the Lower town, and afterward the Higher, and from thence ſayling toward Portingall, they met Robert Earl of Eſſex, who without the Queens leave had put to Sea: After two dayes they arrive at Penycha a Town of Portingall, which they took, and left the Caſtle to Don-Antonio, and from thence they march by land towards Lisbon threeſcore miles off: The Foot Companies led by Norris, whom Drake promiſed to follow with the Fleet. Being come to the Weſt Suburbs of Lisbon, they found no body there but a few poor diſarmed Portugalls who cryed out, God ſave King Antonio. The day following the Spaniards made a ſayle out, in which Skirmiſh Bret, Careſley, and Carre, (ſtout Commanders) were ſlain; yet did the Earl of Eſſex drive the Spaniards to the very gates of the Citie. And now having tarryed here two daye, and ſeeing no ſigne of the Portingalls revolting; which Don-Anthonio had aſſured them would be, finding freſh ſupplies come into the Town, their own Army ſickly, Victualls and Powder failing; and that which moſt of all Sir Francis Drake not bringing the great Ordnance as he promiſed, they departed from the Suburbs of Lisbon towards Caſcais, a little Town at the mouth of the River Tagus, which Town Drake had taken this meane while, who excuſed his not coming to Lisbon, by reaſon of the Flats he muſt have paſſed, and the Caſtle of Saint Julian, Fortified with fifty pieces of great Ordnance. Neer this place they found threeſcore Huſkes of the Hauſe towns of Germany, laden with corne and all manner of Munition, which they took as good prize towards their charges, in regard the Queen had forbidden them to carry Victualls or Munition to the Spaniard. From hence they ſet ſayle toward Virgo, a forlorne Town by the Sea-ſide, and pillaging all along that Quarter, returned for England, having loſt in the Voyage of Souldiers and Marriners about ſix thouſand; yet not ſo much by the Enemy, as by eating of ſtrange fruites and diſtemper of the Climate.

It concerns the ſtate of England, to look at this time into the ſtate of France; for while thoſe things were in doing between Spain and England, the Popiſh Princes of France, under pretext of defending the Catholike Religion, entred into a combination, which they called, The holy League: The purpoſe whereof was, to root out the Proteſtants, and to divert the Right of Succeſſion to the Crown of France; For they bound themſelves to each other by oath, to ſuffer no perſon but a Catholike to be King of France; which was directly to exclude the King of Navarre, and the Prince of Conde, if the preſent King, without iſſue male, ſhould fail. The head of this League, was the Duke of Guiſe, who having given ſome overthrows to the German Forces, that came into France in aid of the Proteſtants, was immeaſurably extolled by the Clergie and others; and grew to ſuch a height of reputation, that entring into Paris, he made the King glad to leave the City, and in an Aſſembly at Bloys, to make him great Maſter of the French Cavalery, and to conſent by Edict, to the cutting off the Proteſtants. So as the King ſtanding now in fear of him, uſed means at laſt, even in the very Court, to have him murthered; and ſoon after, the Cardinall his brother to be ſtrangled. Hereupon ſo great a confuſion followed, that the people every where diſobeyed the Magiſtrates, and ſpoiled the Kings very Pallace at Paris. Some Cities affected a Democracie, others an Ariſtocracie, but few liked of a Monarchy. The Confederates in the mean while, made a new Seal, uſurped the Royall Authority, ſeized into their hands the beſt fortified places, intercept the Kings Revenues, call in Spaniſh Souldiers, and in all places denounce war and violence againſt the King. And the King in this caſe being forced to flye to the Proteſtants for ſuccour, they then moſt wickedly, by one James Clement a Monk, made him away. The King being ready to dye, Declareth the King of Navarre to be his lawfull ſucceſſor, but the Confederates would exclude him as an open Heretick; and yet whom to make choice of they cannot well agree, ſome would have the Duke of Lorraine, as being deſcended from the ancient Kings of France, ſome the Duke of Savoy, as borne of the French Kings daughter, a Prince Potent and Couragious; others would have the Duke of Guiſes brother that was murthered; others the King of Spain; but the greateſt part gave their voices for the Cardinall of Bourbon, who was one degree neerer allyed to the ſlain King, then the King of Navarre his Nephew. He therefore was preſently proclaimed King of France, with the Title of Charls the Tenth; but he being a Prieſt, the King of Navarre alſo was at the ſame time proclaimed King of France, who abode at Diepe a Sea Town of Normandy, and doubted not to drive the Cardinall eaſily out of France.

The King of Navarre being thus raiſed in Dignity, but weake in means, implored Aid of the Queen of England, offering to make a League Offenſive and Defenſive, the Queen out of a pious reſpect to a King of her own Religion, ſent him preſently two and twenty thouſand pound ſterling in Gold (ſuch a ſumme of Gold, as he profeſſed he had never ſeen at one time before) and withall ſupplyed him with four thouſand Souldiers, under the command of Peregrine Lord Willoughby; for Colonells, ſhe appointed Sir Thomas Wilford, who was made Marſhall of the Field, John Boroughs, Sir William Drury, and Sir Thomas Baskervyle, and gave them a moneths pay in hand. Hereupon the Confederates (whom the King had vanquiſhed a little before at Arques beyond all expectation) began to quaile, and the day before the Arrivall of the Engliſh they vaniſhed away, with this addition of Forces the King marcheth to Paris, and being ready to enter the Citie, cauſeth a retreat to be ſounded, as loath to have ſpoile made of a Citie, which he hoped ſhortly ſhould be his own. Afterwards by the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh he wonne many Towns, and then having marched at leaſt five hundred miles on foot, he gave them leave after a long winters ſervice, to returne into England. In which Voyage of men of note, dyed Captain Hummings, but of a naturall death, alſo Stubbs (he whoſe right hand was cutt off for writing the book againſt the Queens marriage) and Sir William Drury ſlain by Maſter Boroughs in a ſingle Combat, where the quarrell was, that he being but a Knight, would take place of Boroughs that was the younger ſon of a Baron, contrary to the Lawes of the Engliſh Gentry.

About this time, James King of Scots (with Queen Elizabeths good liking) eſpouſed Anne the daughter of Frederick the ſecond King of Denmarke by his Deputy; but ſhe afterward ſayling for Scotland, was by tempeſt caſt upon Norway, and there, through continuall ſtormes forced to ſtay, ſo as the King in the winter ſeaſon ſet ſayle thither, that the marriage according to his vow might be accompliſhed within the yeer: ſome were of opinion that thoſe ſtormes were cauſed by witch-craft, and was confirmed indeed by ſome witches taken in Scotland; who confeſſed they had raiſed thoſe ſtormes to keep the Queen from landing in Scotland, and that the Earl of Bothwell had asked Counſell of them concerning the Kings

Kings end; who was thereupon caſt into priſon, but in a ſhort time breaking loofe, occaſioned new ſtirs in Scotland.

This yeer, many Noble perſonages dyed; Frances Counteſſe of Suſſex, ſiſter to Sir Henry Sidney, Sir Walter Mildway, Chancellour and Vice-Treaſurer of the Exchequer, William Somerſet Earl of Worceſter, ſo numerous in his off-ſpring, that he could reckon more children of both Sexes, then all the Earls of England. Alſo John Lord Sturton, Henry Lord Compton, and at Bruxels the Lord Paget.

At this time, the Queen who was alwayes frugall, ſtrained one point of Frugality more then ever ſhe had done before; for upon the information of one Coermarden, (though Burleigh, Leiceſter, and Walſingham were offended, that credit ſhould be given to ſuch a one, and themſelves neglected) ſhe raiſed Thomas Smith the cuſtomer from thirteen thouſand pounds yeerly, to two and forty thouſand pounds, and at laſt to fifty thouſand.

It was now the yeer 1590. and the three and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeths Raigne, in which, the Earl of Cumberland made a Voyage to the Indies, where he laid levell to the ground the Fort of the Iſle of Fiala, and brought away eight and fifty Pieces of great Ordnance.

This yeer was fatall to many Noble perſonages; firſt dyed Ambroſe Dudley Earl of Warwick, (ſon to John Duke of Northumberland) without iſſue. After him Sir Francis Walſingham, Secretary, a man more skilfull in the Politicks, then in the Oeconomicks; more cunning in managing matters of the publick State, then of his own private eſtate, which he left ſo mean, and dyed ſo much indebted, that he was fain to be buryed by night, without any Funerall pomp, in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, leaving behinde him one onely daughter, famous for her three husbands, all of them the goodlieſt men of their time; the firſt, Sir Philip Sidney; the ſecond, Robert Earl of Eſſex; the third, Richard Burgh Earl of Clanricard, by King Charls made Earl of Saint Albans. Within two Moneths after Walſingham, dyed Sir Thomas Randolf, who had been fourteen times ſent in Embaſſage to ſeverall Princes, yet was never rewarded with any greater dignities, then the Chamberlainſhip of the Exchequer, and the Poſtmaſterſhip of England. Soon after him dyed Sir John Croſts, who had done good ſervice in Scotland, in Edward the ſixths time; in Queen Mary's time was condemned of high Treaſon; in Queen Eliſabeths time ſet at liberty, and made Comptroller of her houſe. After him dyed George Talbot, the ſeventh E. of Shrewsbury of this houſe, he was made Earl Marſhall of England, and left behinde him a memoriall of Wiſdom and Integrity. Laſtly dyed Thomas Lord Wentworth, the laſt of the Engliſh that had been Governour of Calice.

In Ireland at this time Hugh Gaveloc (ſo called, becauſe he had been long kept in Fetters) the naturall ſon of Shan O Neale, accuſed Hugh Earl of Tir-Oen, for holding private conſultations with certain Spaniard, who in 88 were by Shipwrack caſt upon the coaſt of Ireland: Tyr-Oen to prevent the Accuſation, took the ſaid Hugh, and when others refuſed to do it, took a cord and with his own hands ſtrangled him. Hereupon he was ſent for into England, and came, and upon pardon obtained, ſolemnly undertook in preſence of the Queen at Greenwich, to maintain the peace with Turlogh Leynigh; Not to uſurpe the Title of O-Neale, nor any authority over the Gentry about him; to reduce the Territory of Tir-Oen to the form of a County, and civil behaviour, and many ſuch matters; giving hoſtages for his true performance; and indeed for a time he obſerved all things very duly. This trouble allayed, another aroſe, for ſoon after this, Hugh Roe Mac-Mahon, a Potentate in the Territory of Monaghan, compelled thoſe under his juriſdiction to pay him tribute; whereupon the Deputy cauſed him to be taken, and tryed by a Jury of common Souldiers, and then to be hanged up, dividing his lands amongſt certain Engliſh; and ſome of the Mac-Mahons, reſerving ving a certain yeerly Rent to the Crown of England, by this means thinking to extinguish the Power and Title of Mac-Mahon. But hereupon, O-Rork, fearing hee should be served in like manner, took up Arms against the Queen, whom Bingham President of Connacht soon distressed, and drave into Scotland, and at the Queens request, was by the King delivered up into his hands.

It was now the yeer 1591. and the Four and thirtieth of Queen Elisabeths Raign, when she, carefull lest Britain should come into the Spaniards hands, sent Edmund Tork into France, to advertise the King to take care thereof; and promising to send him Forces to that end, if he would, some Towns, where they might be in safety. Hereupon he named Cherburg, Granvile, or Brest, as the fittest; and it was agreed, that Three thousand English should be sent into Brittainy and Picardy; but in the mean time, Henry Palmer was sent to Sea, with certain Ships, who seized upon Thirteen Spanish Ships, as they were returning from Nova Francia. And now Roger Williams, with a Company of Six hundred Souldiers, passeth over to Diepe in Normandy; and Sir John Norris with the rest of the Forces, hasted into Britain soon after. Roger Williams, with his own Six hundred, and the help of Charter Governour of Diepe, put to rout the Confederates, that had blocked up the passages; whose valour, the French King in his Letters to the Queen, highly extolled. Whereupon growing more couragious, and not minding his charge, which was to stay at Diepe, he accompanyed the King to the very Suburbs of Paris, where in honour of his Nation, he sent a Challenge to the Spaniards, to encounter Two hundred Pikemen of the English, and a hundred Musquetiers, with as many Spaniards in open Field.

After this, the King of France acquainted the Queen, that he had a purpose to set upon Roan, or New-haven, before the Prince of Parma should come into France, and thereupon requested her, to send Four thousand English into Normandy, which upon certain conditions she willingly did, and sent them under the Command of Robert Earl of Essex, accompanyed with Sir Thomas Leighton, and Sir William Killegrew, as his Counsellours. When the Earl came into France, he found that the King was at Noyon, and in Normandy no preparation for the War at all, which seemed strange, and much troubled him; but by and by Sir Roger Williams comes to him from the King, requesting him to come to Noyon, that they might confer concerning a course of War. Thither the Earl made a tedious journey, and being come thither, the King told him, he was now of necessity to go himself into Champaigne; but promiseth to send Marshall Biron, and the Duke of Montpensier forthwith to him, to lay siege to Roan. Hereupon the Earl returned to his Tents, expecting their coming, but neither of them came, which troubled the Earl more then before; so as being weary now of doing nothing, he made himself one approach to Roan, where his Brother Walter Devereux was unfortunately slain. Indeed the affairs of the King of France were at this time upon so uncertain terms, that before he could get what he had resolved, something still intervened, that diverted him; for which, by his Letters he excused himself to the Queen of England, and by the mediation of the Earl, and Mornay Lord du Plessie, whom to that end he sent into England, obtained new supplies, and then besieged Roan.

At this time was memorable the prodigious cariage of one Hacket, born at Oundale in Northamptonshire, a mean fellow of no learning, whose first prank was this; That when, in shew of Reconciliation to one with whom he had been at variance, he imbraced him, he bit off his Nose, and the man desiring to have his Nose again, that it might be sowed on, while the wound was green, he most villanously eat it up, and swallowed it down before his face. After this, all on a sudden, he took upon him a shew of wonderfull holinesse, did nothing but hear Sermons, and getting Scriptures by heart, and and counterfeting Revelations from God, and an extraordinary calling, and grew to be so magnified by certain zealous Ministers, and specially of one Edward Coppinger, (a Gentleman of a good house) and one Arthington, a great admirer of the Geneva Discipline; that they accounted him as sent from Heaven, and a greater Prophet then Moses or John Baptist, and finally, that he was Christ himself, come with his fanne in his hand, to judge the world. And this they proclaimed in Cheapside; giving out that Hacket participated of Christs glorified body, by his especiall Spirit, and was now come to propagate the Gospel over Europe, and to settle a true Discipline in the Church of England; and that they themselves were two Prophets, the one of Mercie, and the other of Judgement; with many other such incredible blasphemies; whereupon Hacket was apprehended and arraigned, and at last, hanged, drawn and quartered, continuing all the time, and at his death, his blasphemous Assertions. Coppinger a while after starved himself to death in prison, Arthington repented, and made his Recantation in a publike writing.

Besides these, other also at this time opposed the established Government of the Church of England, crying down the calling of Bishops, with whom sided some Common-Lawyers also, affirming, that the Queen could not depute, nor these men exercise any such Ecclesiasticall Jurisdiction; and that the Oath Ex officio was unchristian. But the Queen conceiving, that through the sides of the Prelates, she her self was shot at, suppressed them what she could, and maintained the Government formerly established.

About this time, the Lord Thomas Howard, with six of the Queens ships, having waited at the Azores six whole Moneths, for the coming of the Spanish Fleet from America, was at last set upon by Alphonso Bassino, with three and fifty ships, sent out for the Convoy of the American Fleet, where Richard Granvile Vice-Admirall, being in the Revenge, and separated from his company, was so hemmed in by the Spanish ships, and so battered with great shot, that most of his men being slain, his Main-mast cut off, himself sore wounded in the head, he commanded to sink the ship, that it might not come into the Spaniards hands; but this being countermanded by most voices, it was agreed, to yeeld it to the Spaniards, upon condition that the men should be set at liberty. Granvile himself was carryed into the Spanish Admirall, where within two dayes he dyed, not without praise of his very enemies: Thus the great ship called the Revenge, was yeelded, but had so many leaks in the Keel, that soon after it was cast away in a storm; and the losse of this one ship the English soon made good upon the Spaniards, by taking many of theirs.

About this time also, Cavendish, who in the yeer 1578. had sailed round about the world, now with five ships bent his course toward the Magellan Straits, but by reason of foul weather, was not able to passe them, being driven to the coast of Brasile, was there cast away.

And now, enmity increasing daily between Spain and England, two Proclamations were set forth; one, prohibiting upon pain of high-Treason, to carry Victuals or Munition into any of the King of Spains dominions: Another, forbidding all persons to entertain any in their houses, till inquiry made, what they were, lest they might entertain Popish Priests, who at this time came swarming into England, by reason the King of Spain had lately founded a Seminary at Valledolid for the English.

At this time dyed Sir Christopher Hatton, Lord Chancelour, whom of a mean Gentlemans house, the Queens favour had raised to this height of Dignity; a goodly personage of body, of Noble, but no aspiring spirits; the onely of all the Queens speciall Favourites, that dyed a Batchelour; and therefore left William Newport his sisters son his heir, who erected for him, in Pauls Church, a sumptuous Monument. After his death, the keeping of of the great Seal was for certain Moneths committed to the Lord Burleigh Treasurer, Hunsdon, Cobham and Buckhurst: Afterward, Puckering the Queens Sergeant at Law, was elected, not Chancelour, but Keeper of the great Seal.

At this time also, Brian O-Rork, the Irish Potentate, was arraigned at Westminster; his Indictments were, For raising Rebellion against the Queen, for dragging her Picture at a horse tail, for giving the Spaniards entertainment; which things being told him by an Interpreter, (for he understood no English) hee said, Hee would not be tryed, unlesse the Queen her self in person sate to judge him. Yet being told, that it was the Law; hee onely said, If it must be so, let it be so; and so condemned, was executed at Tyburn as a Traitour, whereof hee seemed to make as little reckoning, as if it had but been in jest. And now this yeer, the Queen made the Colledge of Dublin in Ireland, an University, which was formerly the Monastery of All-Saints, endowing it with power to confer Scholasticall Dignities.

At this time, Sir John Perot, who had been Deputy of Ireland, and done good service there, was yet by the malice of Adversaries, of whom Hatton was one, called in question, before the Baron Hunsdon, the Lord Buckhurst, Sir Robert Cecill, (lately made a Councellour) Sir John Fortescue, Sir John Wolley, and some of the Judges: His Accusations were; first, that he had spoken opprobrious words against the Queen, saying, Shee was illegitimate and cowardly; secondly, that hee had fostered notorious Traitours, and Popish Priests; thirdly, that hee held correspondence with the Prince of Parma, and the Queens enemies. To the first of which he confessed, that in his passion he had spoken of the Queen unadvisedly, for which hee was infinitely grieved; the rest hee denyed: And all men knew, he was never Popishly affected. His Accusers were, one Philip Williams, sometime his Secretary; Denys O-Roghan an Irish marryed Priest, whose life hee had saved; and one Walton, a fellow of no worth or Reputation. Yet the crimes being urged against him, by Popham and other Lawyers, till eleven a clock at night; hee was at last condemned of high Treason, but Sentence was not pronounced till twenty dayes after; and yet was not put to death, but dyed a naturall death in the Tower; hee vvas a man of a goodly personage, stout and chollerick, and one whom (many thought) the Queen had the more reason to respect, for her father King Henry the Eighths sake.

The Earl of Essex, after a tedious Winters siege in Normandy, challenged Monsieur Villerse Governour of Roan to a single combate, who refusing to meet him; hee then returned into England, being called home by the Queen, whose favour, by his long absence, might else have suffered prejudice.

And now the King of France, hearing that the Prince of Parma was coming into France, once again was fain to flye to the Queen for succour, to whom, upon certain conditions, she granted an Army of four thousand men, and some great Ordnance, with which Sir John Norris was sent into France; whom yet the French King imployed not, as was agreed, to the great displeasure of the Queen. But as for the Prince of Parma's coming into France, hee was prevented by death, when hee had governed the Netherlands under the Spaniard fourteen yeers; a Prince of many excellent parts, and whom Queen Elisabeth never mentioned but with honour.

And now Queen Elizabeth considering that the King of Spaines chiefe strength was in his Gold of America, sends forth Sir Walter Ralegh with a Fleet of fifteene Ships to meete with the Spanish Fleet; who passing passing by a Promontory of Spain, received certain intelligence, that the Spanish Fleet was not to come forth that yeare: Whereupon, dividing his Navy into two parts; whereof, the one he committed to Sir John Burroughs, the other to Sir Martin Forbysher; he waited other opportunities, when soon after, a mighty Caraque came in view, called The Mother of God, which from the Beake to the Sterne, was a hundred threescore and five foot long, built with seven Decks, and carrying six hundred men, besides rich Merchandize. This great Vessell they took, and in it, to the value of a hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling, over and above what the Commanders and Sea-men pilfered.

This yeare, the Queene going in Progresse, passed through Oxford, where she was entertained by the Schollers with Orations, Stage-Players, and Disputations; and by the Lord Buckhurst Chancellor of the University, with a sumptuous Feast. At her departure, She made a Latine Oration, wherein she vowed a vow, and gave them counsell; Her vow was, That as she desired nothing so much, as the prosperity and flourishing estate of her Kingdome, so she as much wished to see the Universities and Schools of learning to flourish likewise. Her Counsell was, That they would serve God above all, not following the curiosity of some wits, but the Lawes of God, and the Kingdome, That they would not prevent the Lawes, but follow them, nor dispute whether better Lawes might be made, but observe those which were already Enacted.

This year, dyed Anthony Browne Viscount Montacute, whom Queene Mary honored with this Title; because his Grandmother was Daughter, and one of the Heirs of John Nevill Marquesse Montacute; who, though he were a great Roman Catholike, yet the Queen finding him faithfull alwayes, loved him, and in his sickneese went to visit him. There dyed at this time also, Henry Lord Scroope of Bolton, Knight of the Garter, and long time Governour of the Westerne Border toward Scotland.

At this time Henry Barrow, and his Sectaries, condemning the Church of England to be no Christian Church, and derogating from the Queens Authority in matters Ecclesiasticall; he the sayd Barrow, as Ring-leader of the rest, was put to death, in terror to all such disturbers of the peace of the Church.

About this time, by reason of the Queens correspondence with the Turk, to the end, her Subjects might have free Trading in his Territories; It was maliciously given out by some, that she had excited the Turke to a War against the Christians; which caused the Queen to write to the Emperour, shewing him the falseneese of this report, wherein she gave him full satisfaction.

And now a constant report came into England, That the King of France had already embraced, or was ready to embrace the Romish Religion, which so much troubled the Queene, that she presently sent Thomas Wilkes into France, with reasons (if it were not too late) to divert him from it. But before Wilkes came, the King indeed had openly professed the Romish Religion, at the Church of Saint Denis in Paris; of which his Conversion, he declared the causes to Wilkes at large, shewing, the necessity of it, unleese he would suffer himselfe to be utterly thrust out of the Kingdome. And the French AMBASSADOR signifying as much to the Queene, in great perplexity, She writ to him to this effect.

Alas, what grief? what anxiety of minde hath befallen me, since I heard this news? was it possible that worldly respects should make you lay aside Gods feare? could you thinke, That He, who had hitherto upheld and kept you, would now at the last, leave you? It is a dangerous thing to doe evill, that good may may come thereof. But I hope your minde may alter; In the meane while, I will pray for you, and beg of God, That the hands of Esau, may not hinder the blessing of Jacob.

To this the KING Answered, That though he had done this in his owne Person out of necessity; yet, He would never be wanting to those of the Reformed Religion, but would take them into his speciall care and Protection.

And now was Richard Hasket, condemned and executed for Treason, being sent from the English Fugitives beyond Sea, to perswade Ferdinand Earle of Derby, Sonne to Henry newly deceased, to assume the Title of the Kingdome; by right of Descent from Mary, Daughter to Henry the Seventh; and threatning him, that unlesse he undertooke this enterprize, and withall, concealed him the Abettor, he should shortly dye in most wretched manner. But the Earle fearing a trap was layd for him, revealed the matter; yet the fellows threating proved not altogether vaine, for the Earle within foure Moneths, dyed a most horrible death. This yeare, Death had his tribute payd him from the Nobility; for there dyed Henry Ratcliffe Earle of Sussex, and three renowned Barons, Arthur Grey of Wilton, Henry Lord Cromwell, and Henry Lord Wentworth; besides Sir Christopher Carlile, whose Warlike Prowesse at Sea and land, deserves to be remembred.

In IRELAND, at this time, divers great men in Connaght Rebelled; and Turlogh Leynigh being dead, Tir-Oen assumed to himselfe, the title of O-Neale, (which in IRELAND is more esteemed, than to be called EMPEROVR) But upon a sudden, dissembling his discontent, hee submitted himselfe to the DEPVTY, and promised all obedience.

It was now the yeare 1594, and the seven and thirtieth of Queen ELIZABETHS Raigne; when the good correspondence betweene the King of Scots and Queen ELIZABETH, gave the Papists small hope that ever he would prove an Instrument to restore the Catholike Religion. Whereupon, they began to bethinke themselves of some English Papist, that might succeed the Queene; but finding none of their owne Sect, a fit person, they fixed their thoughts upon the Earl of Essex, who alwayes seemed a very moderate man; and him they devised to have some right to the Crowne, by Descent from Thomas of Woodstocke, King EDVVARD the Thirds Sonne. But the English Fugitives, were for the Infanta of Spaine, and desiring to set the King of Scots and the Earle of Essex at ods; they set forth a Book, which they Dedicated to Essex, under the name of Doleman, but was written indeed by Parsons (Dolemans bitter Adversary) Cardinall Allen, and Francis Englefield. The scope of which Booke was, to exclude from Succession, all persons whatsoever, and how near soever Allied to the Crowne, unlesse they were Roman Catholikes; Contending further, for the right of Isabella, Infanta of Spaine, as being descended from Constance, Daughter of WILLIAM the Conqueror; from Eleanor eldest Daughter to HENRY the Second, Married to Alphonso the ninth King of Castile; from Beatrix, Daughter to King HENRY the Third, Titles obsolete, and which exceed the bounds of Heraldry to discusse. This year, the nineteenth of February, was Henry Prince of Scotland born, to whom the Queen was Godmother, and sent Robert Earl of Sussex for her Deputy.

But now greater matters were in hand, Plots were layd against the Queenes life, some Spaniards thinking to make her away by Poison, and not daring to trust any Englishman in such a businesse; they treat to that purpose, with Rodoricke Lopes a JEVV, and Phisitian to the Queen, with with Stephen Ferreira, Emmanuel Loyse, and other Portugalls; for divers of that Nation came into England at this time, in relation to Don Anthonio, who being discovered by letters of theirs, that were intercepted, were Arraigned at Guildhall, and by their own confessions convinced, to have consulted against the life of the Queen, they were all condemned, and Executed at Tiburne; LOPES professing that he loved the Queen, as well as Jesus Christ, which was cause of laughter to them, that knew him to be a JEVV. The next day after them, was condemned Patrick Cullen, an Irish Fencer, sent hither by the English Fugitives, to kill the Queen; who was straightway executed, though he were at that very time sick and ready to dye.

About this time, Sir John Norris having been in a hot conflict at sea against the Spaniard, where Sir Martin Forbysher received his deaths wound, was now called home, with a purpose to send him into Ireland. In which mean while, Richard Hawkins, Sonne of Sir John Hawkins the famous Sea Captain, had been set forth a year since, with three of the Queens ships, and two hundred men in them; whereof, one of them at the Isle of St. Anne, was by chance fired, another of them seperated by tempest, returned into England; himselfe in the third, passed the Straights of Magellan, being the sixth man in the Spanish accompt, that had ever done it; and being now come into the wide Southern sea, he took five ships laden with Merchandize; one whereof he took away, the rest he suffered to redeeme themselves for two thousand Duckats: But at last, being set upon by Bertrandus a Castro, who was sent out by the Vice-Roy of those parts, with eight ships against him; after three dayes battery, he yeilded, and though upon composition, yet was nevertheless sent into Spain, and there for divers years kept prisoner.

But James Lancaster in another part of America, had better successe; for being set forth by some London Merchants (whose goods the Spaniards had seized) with three Ships and a long Boat, Hee tooke nine and thirty Spanish Ships, and at Fernanbucke in Brasile, where the wealth of an East-Indian Caraque was lately unloden; hee desperately venturing upon the Shoare, Loaded Fifteene Ships with the wealth of the Indian Caraque; Sugar, Reed, Redwood called Brasill, and other Merchandize, and then safely and victoriously returned home.

At ROME, about this time dyed Cardinall ALLEN, borne in Lancashire of an honest Family, brought up in Oxford, in Oriall Colledge. In Queene Maries dayes he was Proctor of the University, and after Canon of the Cathedrall Church at YORKE. Upon the change of Religion in ENGLAND, he left the Kingdome, and was Divinity Professor at Doway in Flanders, and made Canon of the Church at Cambray. He procured a Seminary to be set up in Doway, for the English, another at Rheims, and a third at Rome; and through zeal of the Romish Religion, forgot whose subject he was born.

At home, at this time, dyed John Peers Archbishop of Yorke, in whose place, succeeded Matthew Hutton, translated from the See of Durham. There dyed also Ferdinand Stanley Earl of Derby, being in the floure of his age, miserably tormented, and vomiting stuffe of a darke rusty colour, being thought to have been poysoned or bewitched. There was found in his chamber a little image of wax, with hairs of the colour of his hairs, thrust into the belly; which some thought was done of purpose, that men should not suspect him to be poisoned; his vomit so stained the silver Andirons, that it could never be gotten out, and his body though put in searcloathes and wrapped in lead, did so stinck and putrifie, that for a long time none could endure to come neer where he was buried.

The Master of his Horse was much suspected, who the same day the Earl tooke his bed, took one of his best Horses, and fled away. About this time also dyed Gregory Fines Lord Dacres, a man somewhat crazed, the Son of Thomas Lord Dacres, hanged in the Raign of King Henry the Eight.

And now Sir William Fitz Williams Lord Deputy of Ireland was called home, and William Russell youngest Son of Francis Earl of Bedford, was sent in his room; to whom presently came the Earl of Tir-Oen, and in humble manner craved pardon of his fault, that he had not presented himself at the call of the late Lord Deputy. Bagnall Marshall of the Irish Forces, exhibited many Articles against him, but he so pleaded for himself with promise of loyalty hereafter, that he was dismissed. But see the subdolousnesse of this man, for he would never after be gotten to come again, though the Deputy sent for him with many kinde messages.

It was now the year 1595, and the eight and thirtieth year of Queen Elizabeths Raign; when Edmond Yorke, and Richard Williams who were formerly apprehended, came to their tryall, and were executed at Tiburn, for being bribed to kill the Queen.

At this time a constant rumor was blown abroad from all parts of Europe, that the Spaniards were coming again against England, with a farre greater Fleet than that in Eighty Eight, and that it was already under sayl; whereupon, Souldiers were levyed, and placed on the Sea-coast. Two Navies were made ready, one to expect them at home in the Channell, the other, to go for America, under Hawkins and Drake; but when all came to all, it was but certain Spaniards, who loosed from the sea-coast of France, with four Gallies, which betimes in the morning landing in Cornwall, fired a Church standing alone in the fields, and three Villages of Fishermen, Newlyne, Mousholе, and Pensans, and then presently retyred, not taking or killing any one person; And these were the first and last Spaniards, that in hostile manner ever set foot upon English ground.

And now mischiefs growing daily in France, a great number perswaded the King, to conclude a Peace with Spain, and the Queen her self began to mistrust him; especially, having lately received intelligence out of the Popes Conclave, that he was received into the bosome of the Church of Rome, with the Popes Benediction, and that upon conditions prejudiciall to the Protestants.

And therefore at this time, were divers undertakings of the English against Spain; Sir Walter Rawleigh Captain of the Guard, having defloured a Mayd of Honor (whom afterward he married) had lost the Queens favour, and was held in Prison for certain moneths; but afterward being set at liberty, though banished the Court. He undertook a Voyage to Guyana, setting sayl from Plimmouth in February, he arrived at Trinidada, where he took St. Josephs Town, but found not a jot of money there: From hence, with Boats, and a hundred souldiers, he entred the vast River Orenoque, ranging up in Guyana four hundred myles, but getting little, but his labour for his travell. In like manner, Amyas Preston and Sommers, Pillaged sundry Towns of the King of Spains in the Western parts; and three ships of the Earl of Cumberland, set upon a huge Caraque, which by casualty was fired when they were in sight, and these were the enterprises of private persons: but the Queen being informed, that great store of wealth for the King of Spains use, was conveyed to Port Rico, in St. Johns Island; sent thither Hawkins, Drake, and Baskervile with land Forces, furnishing them with six ships out of her own Navy, and twenty other men of War. They set sayl from Plimmouth the last of August, and seven and twenty dayes after, came upon the Coast of the great Canarie, which being strongly Fortified, they forbore to assault. A moneth after, they came to the Isle of St. Dominicke, where five Spanish ships being sent forth to watch the English, lighted upon one one of the small English ships which was strayed from the Company, and putting the Master and Marriners upon the Rack, understood by them, That the English Navy was bent to Port Rico; whereupon they make all possible speed to give notice thereof, that being fore-warned, they might accordingly be armed. And thereupon, as soon as the English had cast Anchors in the Road at Port Rico, the Spaniards thundered against them from the shore; sir Nicholas Clifford, and Brute Browne were wounded as they sate at supper, and two dayes after died. Hawkins also, and Drake, partly of disease, and partly of grief for their ill successe, died soon after. At the end of eight months, the Fleet came home, having done the enemy little hurt, fired onely some few Towns and ships, but received infinite damage themselves; lost two such Sea-men, as the Kingdom, I may say, all Europe had not their like left. For the Spaniards having of late yeers received great aims by the French and English, had now provided for themselves with Fortifications which were not easie to be won.

At this time the Queen made known to the States in the Low-Countries, the great charges she had been at in relieving them ten yeers together; for which she requireth some considerable recompence: The States again aledge the great charges they were at in Eighty Eight, in repelling the Spaniards in her cause; yet (not to fall out about the matter) they were content to allow some reasonable retribution; but yet for the present, nothing was concluded. Likewise at this time, the Hanse Towns in Germany make complaint to the Emperour, and the Princes of the Empire, That the Immunities from customes antiently granted them by the Kings of England, began to be Antiquated, and that a Monopoly of English Merchants was set up in Germany; to which, the Queen by Sir Christopher Perkins, first shewing the cause of the first Grant, and then the Reason of Queen Maries prohibiting it afterward, makes them so satisfactory an answer, that those very Hanse-Towns which complained, brought into England at this time, such store of Corne, that it prevented a mutiny, which thorough dearth of Corn, was like to have hapned in London.

This yeer was famous for the death of many great Personages, Philip Earl of Arundel, condemned in the yeer 1589. The Queen had all this while spared, but now death would spare him no longer, having since that time been wholly given to contemplation, and macerated himself in a strict course of Religion, leaving one onely son, Thomas, by his wife Anne Dacres of Gillisland. He had two brothers, Thomas Lord Howard, whom Queen Elizabeth made Baron of Walden, and King James afterward Earl of Suffolk; and William Lord Howard of the North, who yet liveth; and one sister, the Lady Margaret, marryed to Robert Sackvile, afterward Earl of Dorset, and father of Edward Earl of Dorset now living; a Lady so milde, so vertuous, and so devout in her Religion, that if her brother macerated himself being in prison, she certainly did no lesse, being at liberty; whom I the rather mention, because I had the happinesse to know her living, and the unhappinesse to be a Mourner at her Funerall. There died this yeer also, William Lord Vaulx, a zealous Papist, and Sir Thomas Hineage, Vice-Chamberlain, and Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaster, whose onely daughter marryed to Sir Moyle Finch of Kent, was no small advancer of that House. There died also William Whitaker, Master of S. Johns Colledge in Cambridge, and Divinity Professor: As likewise Sir Roger Williams, and Sir Thomas Morgan; so as this yeer was honoured with the deaths of two great Lords, one exquisite Courtier, one great Schollar, and two famous Souldiers.

In Ireland at this time, Russell the Deputy doubting a storm of War from Tir-Oen, sent into England, requiring to have some experienced souldier sent to him with Forces, who though he desired Baskervyle to be the man, yet Sir

Sir John Norris was ſent, with thirteen hundred old ſouldiers, beſides a further ſupply; whom Tir-Oen hearing to be coming, ſet preſently upon the Fort of Blackwater, and in the abſence of Edward Cornwall the Governour, took it. But now being doubtfull of his caſe, in a ſubdolous manner (as he was a double dealing man) he both offereth his help to the Earl of Kildare, againſt the Deputies ſervants; and at the ſame time, maketh promiſe to the Earl of Ormond, and Sir Henry Wallops, of loyalty and obedience; but notwithſtanding he was forthwith proclaimed Traytor, under the name of Hugh O Neal, baſtard ſon to Con O Neal. There was at this time with the Rebells in Ulſter, a thouſand Horſe, and 6280 Foot: and in Connaght, two thouſand three hundred, all at Tir Oens command; and the Forces of the Engliſh under Norris, not much fewer, with whom the Deputy himſelf joyned, and marched together to Armagh; which ſo terrified the Rebels, that Tir Oen forſaking the Fort of Blackwater, began to hide himſelf. Whereupon the Deputy returned, leaving Norris to follow the War, with the Title of Generall of the Army. But this ſatisfied not Norris, and therefore out of emulation betwixt himſelf & the Deputy, he performed nothing worth the ſpeaking of, and ſeemed to favour Tir Oen, as much as the Deputy hated him; inſomuch, as he had private conference with him (a thing not lawfull with proclaymed Traytors) and upon his ſubmiſſion, and Hoſtages given, a Truce was granted both to him and Odonell, till the firſt of Fannary. When the Truce was expired, Tir Oen exhibited certain Petitions, proteſting, if they were granted, he would then perform all duties of a loyall ſubject. In conſulting about which Petitions, another Truce was concluded, till the firſt of April: during which Truce, Tir Oen dealt ſecretly with the King of Spain for Ayd to be ſent him, making nevertheleſſe a fair ſhew of willingneſſe to obedience, ſo far, that by the procurement of Norris and Fenton, a pardon was granted him; the which he pretended to receive more joyfully, than the Inſtrument whicd conferred the Earldome upon him; yet all this was but diſſimulation, to win the time for his own ends.

In the midſt of theſe Iriſh Affairs, Albertus Arch-Duke of Auſtria, and Cardinall, whom the King of Spain had newly ſet over the Netherlands, muſtered together the Spaniſh Forces, upon pretence of raiſing the Siege of La Fere in Picardie; but upon a ſudden turneth aſide, and beſiegeth Calice; and taking Newnham Fort, the very firſt day became Maſter of the Haven. The Queen informed hereof, forthwith, upon the very Sunday, in time of Divine Service, commandeth to leuy ſouldiers, whom ſhe committeth to the Earl of Eſſex; but before they could be ſhipped, certain News came, That the Town and Fort were taken by the Spaniard: Whereupon, the Queens Army was diſmiſſed, and onely ſome money lent to the French King.

But a few dayes after, a far greater, and more ſelect Army is raiſed in England, wherein many of Noble Houſes ſerved as Voluntaries: For the Queen, to divert the King of Spain from invading her Borders, thought it the beſt way to invade his: Whereupon a Navy of a hundred and fifty Ships was made ready; where were ſouldiers under pay, 6360; Voluntaries of the Nobility and Gentry, 1000; Marriners, 6772, beſides the Dutch-men, who brought two and twenty ſhips. Robert Earl of Eſſex, and Charls Howard Lord Admirall of England, were made Generalls with equall Authority; but the Admirall to hold Prerogative at Sea, Eſſex at Land. To theſe, for a Councell of War, were joyned, the Lord Thomas Howard, Walter Raleigh, Francis Vere, George Carew, and Conyers Clifford. The whole Fleet was divided into four Squadrons; the Admirall commanded the firſt, Eſſex the ſecond, the Lord Thomas Howard the third, and Raleigh the fourth. The Officers of the Army were Francis Vere, Serjeant Major Generall, or Marſhall;

Marſhall; John Winkfield, Quarter-Maſter Generall; George Carew, Maſter of the Ordnance; Conyers Clifford, Serjeant Major. Colonells were, Robert Earl of Suſſex, ſir Chriſtopher Blunt, ſir Thomas Gerrard, ſir Richard Winkefield; William Winkefild was Commander of the Voluntaries, and Anthony Aſhley, Secretary to the Councell of War, was to Regiſter their Acts and Conſultations. The Commiſſion being drawn, the Queen gave them private Inſtructions, and withall, a Prayer of her own making, to be daily uſed in every Ship.

This Fleet ſet forth from Plimouth at the beginning of June. Nigh unto Cabo S. Vincent they lighted upon an Iriſh Barque, which told them, That at Cales they were ſecure, and that in the Haven there were at Anchor Gallies, ſhips of War, and a great many Merchants Veſſells. The twentieth of June, they caſt Anchor on the Weſt ſide of the Iſland; within two dayes they were agreed to ſet upon the Spaniſh ſhips, whereat the Earl of Eſſex caſt up his Cap for joy. This buſineſſe was alotted to the leſſer ſhips, becauſe the Road was too ſhallow for the great. The Gallyes quickly fled, and creeping along the ſhore, ſhifted away, but the Spaniſh ſhips that lay at Anchor at Puntall, turned their broad ſides; ſo as the Engliſh Fight with them, laſted from break of day till noon; at which time, the Spaniards having their Gallons miſerably torn, and many of their men ſlain, reſolved to fire the the ſhips, or run them aſhore. The Spaniſh Admirall, being fifteen hundred Tun of Burthen, was fired by a Moor, and two other ſhips which lay next her took the fire, and were loſt likewiſe. When this Sea-Fight was ended, Eſſex landed eight hundred ſouldiers at Puntall, a league from the Town of Cales, when half a mile from the Town, the Spaniſh Horſe and Foot ſhewed themſelves, and preſently gave back again; but ſtraightway cometh forth a greater number: Then Eſſex commanded his Forces to make a fair Retreat; and having enticed forth their enemies, they turned upon them with ſuch violence, that they forced them back into the Town. Then the Earl got up to a Bulwark newly raiſed, neer the Gate, where he ſpyed a paſſage into the Town, but ſo high from ground, that they muſt leap a Spears length to get down. Yet Evans the Earl of Suſſex his Lievtenant, Arthur Savage and other, leaped down; and the mean while Sir Francis Vere broke the Gate, and ruſhed in, and the reſt with him. In the Market place John Winkfield was ſhot in the head, and with ſtones from the tops of the houſes divers were wounded; amongſt whom, Samuel Bagnall received eight wounds, and Arthur Savage was bloody all over; which two were Knighted in the place. The next day the Caſtle was yeelded, upon condition, That the Inhabitants might depart with the clothes on their backs, the reſt to be left for ſpoyl. For five hundred and fourſcore thouſand Duckets the Caſtle was to be redeemed; and for the payment, forty of the chief Citizens to be ſent Hoſtages into England. Now Raleigh was commanded to fire the Merchants Ships lying at Port Reall, when they promiſed two Millions of Duckets to redeem them: but this the Admirall would not hear of, ſaying, He was ſent to deſtroy Ships, not to diſmiſſe them upon Compoſition. A world of Munition was found in the City, and great ſtore of money privately carried away, every one ſhifting for himſelf. It was thought by the wiſer ſort, That the Spaniard could not be damnified leſſe by this Expedition, than twenty Millions of Duckets. None of note was ſlain amongſt the Engliſh, but onely Winkfield, who alſo ſlew a Spaniſh Captain; and now at laſt, threeſcore Military men were honored with Knight-hood. After this, having ſpoyled the whole Iſland, and demoliſhed the Forts, they returned into England, much againſt the will of Eſſex, who would fain have bin attempting ſome other enterpriſe.

The Queen received them home with much affability, giving many thanks to thoſe of principall note, but extolling the Earl of Eſſex and the Admi-

Admirall, above the reſt. And now bethinking her ſelf of a fit man to be Governour of the Bryll, which was given by the States as a Caution Town for money due, ſhe made choyce of Sir Francis Vere, although Eſſex commended other to her for the place: but another thing he took with great indignation, That in his abſence ſhe had made Sir Robert Cecill Secretary, whereas he had formerly with great inſtance commended Sir Thomas Bodley to her.

And now the King of Spain, to recover his honour loſt at Cales, ſetteth forth a Navy for England and Ireland, with a great number of Iriſh Fugitives; but being at Sea, moſt of his ſhips were either run upon Rocks, or caſt away in ſtorms; ſo as this Expedition came to nothing.

But the Queen at this time, for her better ſecurity, entred a League of Defence and Offence with the French King, againſt the Spaniard, upon certain Conditions; which League, ſhe confirmed by Oath, in the Chappell at Greenwich, the nine and twentieth of Auguſt, laying her hand upon the hand of Henry de la Tour, Duke of Bulloign, and Marſhall of France; the Biſhop of Chicheſter holding forth the Evangeliſts, and a great company of the Nobility ſtanding round about. In September following, Gilbert Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, was ſent on Ambaſſage into France, to take the French Kings Oath, and to preſent Sir Anthony Mildmay for the Queens Ambaſſadour in Ordinary, in the room of Sir Henry Unton lately there deceaſed, and to inveſt the King with the Order of the Garter. Soon after, Baskervile wafted into Picardy with two thouſand ſouldiers; for no more were by agreement to be ſent this yeer.

It was now the yeer, 1596, and the nine and thirtieth of Queen Elizabeths Raign, when Thomas Arundel of Warder returned into England, from the Wars in Hungary againſt the Turk, whom, for his good ſervice done there, the Emperour by his Letters Patents, had created Earl of the ſacred Empire, and all and ſingular his Heirs and their Poſterity, Males or Females, lawfully deſcended from him, to be Earls and Counteſſes of the holy Empire for ever. Thoſe who are graced with this Title, have a Place and Voice in the Imperiall Diets, May purchaſe Lands in the Emperours Dominions, May take up voluntary ſouldiers, And are not bound to anſwer any matter before any Judge, but onely in the Chamber of the Empire. At his return, a great Queſtion came in agitation, Whether Titles of Honour given to the Queens ſubjects without her privity, ought to be accepted by them, or admitted by her. For this new Earl ſtuck in the ſtomacks of the Engliſh Barons, who inwardly grudged to give him place. The matter was long diſputed on both ſides, but what iſſue it had, or whether he were permitted this Honour here at home, I finde not: Certain it is, That Sir Nicholas Clifford, and Sir Anthony Shirley, whom the French King two yeers ſince received into the Order of S. Michael, were laid in priſon at their coming home, and charged to reſigne their Robes of the Order.

This yeer many great perſons died; John Puckering, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, whom Thomas Egerton ſucceeded; Richard Fletcher, Biſhop of London; who for marrying the Lady Baker (as goodly a Lady as he was a Prelate) incurred the Queens diſpleaſure; and to cure his cares, fell immoderately to drinking of Tobacco, and ſo expired. Henry Cary, Baron of Hunſdon, Lord Chamberlain of her Majeſties Houſe, and her Couſin German. Sir Francis Knolls, who married Hunſdons ſiſter, in Queen Maries dayes an Exile in Germany for the Goſpell, by Queen Elizabeth made firſt Vice-Chamberlain, then Captain of the Guard, afterward Treaſurer of the Houſhold, and Knight of the Garter. Henry Haſtings, Earl of Huntington, and Preſident of the Counſell in the North, who ſpent his eſtate upon Puritan Miniſters: Francis Lord Haſtings, Nephew to him by his brother brother George, who ſucceeded him in the Earledome, and Margaret Clifford Counteſſe of Derbie, (who deſcended of the blood Royall, from Charles Brandon) conſulted with ſorcerers and cunning men, and thereupon a little before her end, was in a manner excluded from the Queens favour.

The Queen at this time was told, that the King of Spain was preparing a new Fleet againſt Ireland; whereupon to encounter him, ſhe alſo prepared a Navy of a hundred and twenty Ships, ſeventeene of the Queens, Three and forty leſſer Ships of Warre, the reſt for the carriage of proviſion: They were parted into three Squadrons: Eſſex Commanded the firſt, who was alſo chiefe Commander in the expedition; The Lord Thomas Howard the ſecond, and Raliegh the third. In this Fleet were ſundry of the Nobility and Gentry, Charls Blunt, Lord Mountjoy, Vere, Carew, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, the Earles of Rutland and Southampton, the Lords, Grey, Crumwell, Rich, and many other. The ninth of July they weighed Anchour from Plimmouth and were to direct their courſe to Ferall and the Groyne, to ſieze upon the Spaniſh Fleet in the Harbour, and towards the Iſles called Azores, to intercept the Indian Fleet at their returne into Spaine; but this expedition was croſſed and overthrowne by Tempeſts, for they had not ſayled forty Leagues from Plimmouth, when they were ſhaken with ſuch a terrible Tempeſt for foure dayes together, that the Mariners themſelves were at their wits end, and the Fleet had much a do to recover Plimmouth; the Navy being mended, then hoiſe up ſayle the ſecond time, but the winde fell preſently againe ſo croſſe, that for a whole Moneths time they could not get out of the Haven, returning to Plimmouth the ſeventeenth of Auguſt they got out of the Haven, and now the third time, with a ſide wind hoyſe up ſayle, but before they came in view of Spaine, they were diſperſed by another horrible Tempeſt, wherein of the two great Ships which were taken at Calis, one was daſhed in pieces, the other wandered no man knew whither. At the Iſland Flores the Fleet met againe, where Rawleigh being diſtreſſed for water, went on ſhore without leave, and ere he had watered, had charge to follow Eſſex to Fayall: but not finding him there, hee obſerved the Port, and calling a Councell, the Commanders wiſhed him to ſet upon the place, and not let ſlippe ſo faire a booty. Upon this, Rawleigh with ſome of the prime Voluntaries, got to ſhoare, and wonne the Towne, but found no booty in it. The next day Eſſex came thither, whom Merrick informeth what Rawleigh had done, affirming ſpitefully, that he had done it only to prevent his Lordſhippe in the honour of the exploite: whereupon, ſome perſwaded the Earle to call a Councell of Warre and than diſplace him, others againe to take of his Head for going to Land, without the chiefe Commanders leave, ſaying, hee was never like for to have ſuch another opportunity to bee rid of his Adverſary; upon this, Sidney, Brett, Berry, and other of Rawleighs company were diſplaced, and layed by the heeles; Rawleigh himſelfe was ſent for, and entertained with a grimme looke by Eſſex and all his Party; Eſſex rebuketh him angerly, for landing his Forces, which none upon payne of death might do, without the Generalls command; Rawleigh made anſwer, that the Captaines indeed, Ship-maſters & the reſt were within the compaſſe of that Law, but not the Three prime Commanders, of whom himſelf was One: That he had a long time wayted his comming, and longer would have wayted, but that the Iſlanders provoked him to fight. And now the L. Thomas Howard mediated, that no ſeverity might be uſed againſt Rawleigh, & perſwaded him to acknowledge his fault, which being done, all were friends, and the diſplaced Captaines were reſtored to their places, for the Earle was of a placable diſpoſition, eaſily apt to take offence, and as eaſily ready to remit it.

From hence they saile to Gratiosa, where the Inhabitants crave mercy and obtained it; & here Essex would have tarried, in expectation of the Indian fleet: but that Graves the Pilot diswaded, because the harbour was not good: and now see the unluckinesse of ill counsell, for the English were not gone above an houre, or two, from this place; when loe, the American fleete; (wherein were forty Ships, and seven of them loaden with treasure) cometh thither; which, hearing that the English were there about; directed their course to Tezcera, where they gained the haven, all but three ships, indifferent wealthy; which the English tooke: and then were minded to set upon the rest, in the Port; but finding the attempt not forcible, they passed from hence, to Saint Michaells; where Southampton, Rutland, Evers, Bredon and Dockwray, were Knighted. and then Essex landed within six miles of the Towne; nigh unto Villa Franca, a faire Towne, and well furnished with marchandize; wine, wood, and corne; where they tarried six dayes: and the common souldiers found good booty. And now a Caraque was espied, coming out of the east Indies; which, by a warning peece shot off in a Dutch ship, perceiveing that the English were there; run herselfe a shoare, unloaded her merchandize, and then fiered herselfe. Thus the English had ill lucke every where in this expedition: And the ninth of October they hoysted sayle for England; but within two dayes, a terrible tempest, from the northward dispersed them; and the Spanish Fleete also at the same time, so as they never came in view of one another: one Spanish shippe was cast upon Dertmouth, the Marriners and souldiers halfe starved in her; who intimated, that the Spanish fleete intended to seize upon some haven in Cornwall, which being nigh the mouth of the channell; might be convenient to receive forces from Spaine: but the divine providence frustrated the designes both of the Spaniard and the English.

But now at his returne, the Earle of Essex found that done in England, in his absence, which infinitly discontented him: Sir Robert Cicill made Chancelour of the Dutchy of Lancaster; & which was more, Charles Lord Howard, created Earle of Nottingham, with relation in his patent to the Victory in eighty eight; and his good service at Cales: This glory he envyed him, and besides stomacked it; that he must now take place of him. It being enacted in the Raigne of Henry the eighth, that the chiefe Officers of the Kingdome, should have Presidence of all men of their degree. Whereupon the Queen, to give him content, was faine to create him Earle Marshall of England; by which he recovered his place againe.

About this time, an Embassadour came into England, from the KING of Poland; who, when the Queen expected he should give her thanks for having procured a Peace between the King his Master, and the Turke, he cleane contrary expostulated unkindnesse, for breach of Priviledge in trading with Spaine, requiring a present remedy, or else the King would otherways right himselfe. The Queen not a little offended, suddenly replyed, how was I deceived? I expected an Embassadour, and behold a Herauld; such a speech I never heard in all my life time: And after some further checking of him for his boldnesse, she referred him to her Councell; and then retired into her Closett. The Embassadour afterward, in private conference with some of the Councell, excused himselfe, saying, that his speech was penned by others, and then given him in wrighting. To his Message, the Councell gave the like answer; as they had given before the Hanse-Townes, upon the like occasion: though now againe, the Hanse-Townes obtaine of the Emperour, to prohibite the English from trading in in Germany, which made the Queen to prohibit the Hause towns from trading in England, and put them out of the Stilyard till this difference was accorded.

This yeer the Chancellor of Denmarke came into England to restore the Garter, which she had bestowed upon the Kings Father, and withall offering the Kings helpe, to make a peace for the Queen with the Spaniard. The Queen thanked him; but meant not to use his helpe for that which shee did not desire, and especially not now, when he had newly molested the King of France her Allye, and had taken Amyens the strongest Town of Picardie: Though why should the Queen be so tender of the French King, when now to get an aid of four thousand Souldiers from her, he fell to Devises; intimating unto her, that he was now offered by the Popes Nuntio a very commodious peace, if he would but forsake her. But while these things were in Treaty, Amyens was recovered againe by the valour of Baskervile (who dyed at the seige) and of Sir Arthur Savage, as the King in His Letters to the Queene thankfully acknowledged.

About this time a Parliament was holden at Westminster, where Subsidies were willingly granted; and to this Parliament was called the Lord La Ware and restored to his blood, which by Act of Parliament in the Raigne of King Edward the sixth was tainted; Also to this Parliament was called Thomas Lord HOVVARD, by the Title of Baron Howard of Walden.

In Ireland at this time, a great part of Ulster, and almost all Connacht was in Rebellion; Whereupon Russell the Deputy was called home, and Thomas Lord Burrough sent in his place, a man very stout and couragious, but no souldier: This infinitely discontented Norris, who thought himselfe sure of the place himselfe, and now to see his Rivall preferred before him, and himselfe to be under him, President of Munster, drave him into such a melancholly, that in a very short time, (and as he thought to himselfe with much disgrace) he ended his life.

And now the Earle of Tir-Oen craveth, and obtaineth a moneths Truce of the new Deputy, at the moneths end, the Deputy marcheth against the Rebels, and gaineth the Fort at Blackwater, when suddenly the Rebells flew themselves upon a hill hard by, against whom the Earle of Kildare marcheth and puts them to flight; but yet with some losse of his owne side, as Francis Vaughan the Deputies brother in Law, Turner a Sergeant Major, and two Fosters, brothers of the Earle of Kildare, whose death hee tooke so heavily, that within a few dayes he dyed himself.

As soon as the people had fortified the Castle at Blackwater and withdrawne his Army, the Rebels began to besiege it againe; (for this was the main place of their strength) which caused the Deputy with all possible speed to make thither, but unhappily dyed by the way. Whereupon the Rebells set upon the Fort more fiercely then before; but being still reppelled; they comforted themselves with this, that there was not many dayes provision left in the Fort; yet the admirable fortitude of Thomas Williams the Captain, and the Garrison Souldiers saved the place, who, when their horse-flesh was all spent, fedde upon weeds growing within the Trenches, and endured all kinde of miserty. And now the Lord Burrough the Deputy being dead, the Army by direction from England, was committed to the Earle of Ormond, and the Government to two Lords Justices, Adam Loftheuse Archbishop of Dublin and Chancellour, and Robert Gardyner: To this new Lieutenant, Tir-Oen exhibiteth a Bill of his oppressions and greivances with with request of pardon, and at the same time stirreth up Mac-Hugh to a new Rebellion in Leinster.

In France at this time, the French King being importuned by the Pope, and by his own Subjects, began to incline to a Peace with Spain, which the Queen understanding, she sent into France, Sir Robert Cecill, Herbert and Wilks, (who dyed at his landing in France:) The States likewise sent thither, Justine of Nassaw, and Barnevelt, and others likewise into England to dissuade the Peace: but notwithstanding all they could say, or do, the French King shortly after concluded a Peace, to the great discontentment of the Queen and the States, but to the great good, and establishment of the French Common-wealth.

And now the Queen providing for her own and her peoples safety, sent Sir Francis Vere to the States, to know if they were willing to joyn in a Treaty of Peace with the Spaniard; if not, what they would afford toward a Warre; and to deal earnestly with them, about repayment of money due to her from them. At home in the mean time, a great Consultation was holden, whither a Peace with Spain were convenient for England, or no; and many Reasons were on both sides alleaged. Burleigh Lord Treasurer was for Peace, Essex for Warre, and so vehement in it, that the Treasurer, after a long debating, in a strange manner of Presage, reached forth the Book of the Psalms to him, pointing him to that Verse, The bloody minded man shall not live out half his dayes. Which made Essex afterward to set forth an Apology, with Reasons for justification of his opinion.

But now another Consultation was held, about a fit man to be Deputy of Ireland; The Queen intended to send Sir William Knolles, Essex his Uncle; but Essex was violent for Sir George Carew, whom hee had a minde to remove from the Court; and when hee could not by any means perswade the Queen to it, hee then, forgetting himself and his duty, uncivilly and contemptuously turned his back upon the Queen, muttering certain words. Whereupon shee growing impatient, gave him a box on the ear, and bid him be gone with a vengeance; Essex laid his hand upon his sword hilt, and swore a great oath, That he could not, nor would not put up such an Indignity; and that hee would not have taken it at King Henry the Eighth his hands; and so in a rage flung away from the Court. But afterward, admonished by the Lord Keeper, hee became more milde, and in a short time, returned into the Queens favour.

About this time, William Cecill Lord Burleigh, and high Treasurer of England, finding himself to droop with age, (for hee was now threescore and seventeen yeers old) sent Letters to the Queen, intreating her to release him of his publike charge; whereupon shee went to visit, and comfort him, but within a few dayes hee ended his life, after hee had been the principall stay of the English Commonwealth for many yeers together. One great good hee did to his country, a little before his death, that hee brought the States of the Low-Countries to a Composition, for the payment of Eight hundred thousand pounds, by Thirty thousand pounds yeerly; likewise, a new League to be concluded with them.

The King of Denmarks Subjects having lately seized upon some goods of the English as Prize, to the value of a hundred thousand Dollers; the Queen sent the Lord Zouch, and Christopher Perkins Doctor of Law, in Embassage to the Dane, both to congratulate his late marriage with the Electors daughter of Brandenburg; and also to crave restitution of the English goods; who obtained, that in lieu thereof, Threescore thousand Dollers were repaid. And now George Clifford Earl of Cumberland, having with a Navie a Navie of eleven ships, waited for Portingall Cariques, and the American Fleet, till the season of the yeer was past (they not daring to stirre forth) he at last set upon Port-Rico and took it; but seaven hundred of his men falling sick of Calentures, and dying within forty dayes, he was faine to returne home with some honour, but little profit.

About this time, one Edward Squire was Arraigned of high Treason, he had been at first an ordinary Scrivener, afterward a Groome in the Queens stable, and going as a Souldier in Drakes last expedition, was taken prisoner and carryed into Spaine, there he came acquainted with one Wallpoole an English Jesuite, who caused him to be put into the Inquisition for an Heretick, and the fellow tasting of misery, was easily drawn to become a Papist, and afterward to attempt any thing for the Catholique cause. His ghostly father perswaded him it were meritorious to make away the Queen and the Earl of Essex, and sent him into England with a certain poyson, wherewith to anoint the pommell of the Queens Saddle, and the chayre in which the Earl should sit, which he accordingly performed, but neither of them tooke effect, whereupon Wallpoole suspecting Squires fidelity was bent to revenge it, and sent one into England, who in generall termes should lay this aspersion upon him; whereupon Squire is called in question, and never thinking that his Confessor would detect him, directly denyed all at first; but after seeing himself betrayed, confessed all the matter and was executed.

This whole yeer the Rebellion was hot in Ireland; For Tir-Oen notwithstanding his pardon lately obtained, all on a suddain besieged the Fort at Blackwater, to the raising of which siege, the Lieutenant Generall (for there was as yet no Deputy) sent 13 Companies under the command of the Marshall, Tir-Oens sworne adversary, him Tir-Oen slew, and put his whole Army to rout, and atchieved such a Victory, with so great losse to the English, as they had never felt the like since they first set footing in Ireland; for thirteen valiant Commanders, and fifteen Hundred Common Souldiers were slain at this Skirmish, and soon after the Fort of Blackwater was yeelded up. And now Tir-Oens fame began to resound, as the Assertor of the Liberty of the Nation, and upon a suddain all Munster brake forth into rebellion. For the cherishing whereof Tir-Oen sent thither Ouny Mac-Rorye and Tyrell (who originally an Englishman, was growne a deadly enemie to the English Nation) with four hundred Kernes. Against these, Thomas Norris President of the Province, marcheth to Killmallock with a good force; but finding that the Irish Souldiers of his Company were ready to revolt, he was faine to disperse his Army and retire to Corke. Hereupon the Rebells grew insolent, spoyled the Countrey, and in cruell manner put all the English to the sword. Furthermore they declare Fitz Thomas to be Earl of Desmond; but upon condition he should hold of O-Neale, that is, of Tir-Oen, who now dispatched Letters to the Spaniard, relating his victories to the full, and vowing to accept no termes of peace with the English, and yet at the same instant (after his wonted treacherous manner) proffered some kinde of submission to the Lieutenant; but withall made unreasonable demands.

The State of Ireland being thus in combustion, a serious consultation is holden whom to send to quench it, the Queen and most of the Counsell thought Sir Charls Blunt Lord Mountjoy the fittest man; but Essex covertly intimated, that he had no military experience, and besides was too bookish to prove a good Commander, he seem'd to aym at the place for himself, though he made a shew modestly to refuse it, and yet still ready with his exceptions if any other were nominated: many thought it dangerous to have an Army put into his hands, for his followers talked of great matters, that he (forsooth) was descended of the blood Royall of Scotland and England, and

and had better Right to the Crown, then any other of the Competitors. In Concluſion, he is appointed Vice-Roy, with ample Authority, to make Warre or conclude Peace, and pardon all offenders, even Tir-Oen himſelfe. An army is allotted him as great as he deſired: Indeed greater then ever Ireland had ſeen before; Twenty Thouſand Foot, and Thirteen Hundred Horſe: with theſe, and a great Retinue beſides of the Nobility, he paſſeth into Ireland; where as ſoon as he had taken the Sword, contrary to his Commiſsion (which was to go immediately againſt the arch-Rebell) he marcheth towards Munſter, againſt the petty Rebels, taketh the Caſtle of Cahir, and driveth the Rebels into the Woods and Groves adjoyning. His Forces being now impaired, he tarrieth to make them up; but in the mean time ſendeth directions to Sir Coniers Clifford, Preſident of Connacht, to ſet upon the Rebels in one place, (thereby to ſever their forces) while he aſſaulted them in another; Clifford marcheth toward Belike, with 1500. Souldiers, where the Rebels are upon them at unawares, under the conduct of O-Rorke, (his Sonne that was hanged here in England) The Engliſh repell them at firſt with eaſe, and march along, but the Rebels finding they wanted Powder, ſet upon them againe, and put them to flight; in which Skirmiſh, Clifford and many of the old Souldiers were ſlain.

Eſſex having by this time received new ſupplies out of England, and a check for neglecting the Queens Command, ſetteth forth at length toward the Borders of Ulſter, with Thirteen hundred Foot, and five hundred horſe, being come thither, Tir-Oen by a Meſſenger requeſteth Parley, Eſſex refuſeth ſaying, he might ſpeake with him the next morning, between the two Armyes; the next day, word is brought to Eſſex, that Tir-Oen craved the Queens mercy, and that he might onely be heard ſpeake, appointing the ſhallow of Balla Clinch for a moſt convenient place; thither came Eſſex alone, with whom Tir-Oen (riding his horſe up to the girts) had private conference a full houre; A while after, Con Tir-Oens baſe Sonne came to Eſſex, requeſting in his Fathers name a ſecond Parley, and that ſome of the chiefe on both ſides might be preſent: Eſſex conſented, ſo there came not more then ſix. At the day appointed, many words had not paſſed, but it was argued, that their Delegates ſhould Treat the next day concerning a Peace: between them it was concluded, that a Truce ſhould be held from ſix weekes to ſix weeks, till May-day.

By this time, the Qu. underſtanding that no more was done, after ſo much time and money ſpent, in a great anger taxeth the Earls proceedings, and I know not how, it fell from her to ſome others that ſtood by, that he had other thoughts in his mind, then the good of his Prince and Country: And thereupon diſpatched very ſharp Letters to him, blaming his delay, and letting ſlip every faire opportunity: with which Letters Eſſex was ſo netled, and chiefely troubled, that the Queen had now made Cecill Maſter of the Wards, which he expected himſelfe: that he beganne to caſt ſtrange Projects within his minde, and held private conſultations of returning into England with part of his Forces, to ſurprize his Adverſaries; But from this courſe, the Earl of Southampton, and Sir Chriſtopher Blunt diſſwaded him, as being dangerous and wicked. Yet within a moneth, over he went, and came to the Court at Noneſuch; to informe the Queen of the State of Ireland. By the way, the Lord Gray of Welton croſsed him, but ſaluted him not; whom one of his followers offered to kill for his contempt: but Eſſex would not ſuffer him: And made ſuch haſt, that early in the Morning he was upon his Knees, before the Queen in the Privy Chamber. She enteriained him courteouſly, but not with the countenance She was wont: and after a little talke, bid him keepe in his Chamber; And ſoon after, Committed him to Cuſtody, in the Lord Privy Seales Houſe; where entring into Conſideration of his caſe, he giveth himſelfe wholy wholly to Divine Contemplation, and writeth wonderfull Letters to his friends, of the vanity of the things of this life.

It was now the yeer one thouſand ſix hundred, and the two and fortieth of Queen Elizabeths Raign, when after the departure of the Earle of Eſſex, Tir-Oen began to carry himſelfe as Monarch of Ireland, and ſendeth Kernes to make ſpoyle in the poſſeſſions of ſuch as continued in their loyalty to the Queene, under Mac-Guir their Captaine, who lighting caſually upon Sir Warham Saint Leger, thruſt him thorough with a ſpeer, and was himſelf thruſt thorough withall. Whereupon the Queen ſent Sir Charls Blunt Lord Montjoy, to take upon him the Deputies place, who looſeth no time, but firſt of all marcheth towards Ulſter buildeth a fort, within eight miles of Armagh, which, in honour of Sir John Norris, under whom he had his firſt military ſchooling, he calleth by the name of Mount Norris, there he placed Edward Blanye who kept the Rebels in awe in thoſe parts, from thence back he goeth into Leynſter, wherein the Glynnes he reduceth into order, Donell-Spaniah, Phelim Mac-Pheoph, and the Rebelling Nation of the O-Tooles, taking hoſtages of them, then back into Ulſter agam, being victor whereſoever he cometh, and at Tradagh, receiveth into protection Mac-Henry, Mac-Cowly, and other rebels who fell at his feet for mercy. All this and more he did in his firſt yeer, and no leſſe ſucceſsfull was Carew Preſident of Munſter, who drave out of the County the Titular Earle of Deſmond, and having found Munſter a turbulent Province in Aprill, he overcomed and made it ſo quiet by December following, that rhe Rebels maintained not one Fort in it againſt the Queen.

And now a new conſultation was holden in England, touching a peace with the King of Spaine, the which he ſought both by the French King, and by Albertus the Archduke, who was now returned into the Netherlands out of Spain, where he was marryed to the Infanta. The Queen conſenting to a Treaty, left it to the French King to nominate both the time and place for the meeting of the Delegates, who ſet down the Month of May, and Bulloigne in France; But now foreſeeing that a queſtion would ariſe about Precedency, ſome were appointed to ſearch Ancient Records concerning that point. Theſe men found in the Book of the Ceremonies of the Court of Rome, which (according to the Canons) giveth Rule to the reſt, as the Lady and Miſtreſſe; that amongſt Kings, the firſt place is due to the King of France, the ſecond to the King of England and the 3. to the King of Caſtile; That the Engliſh quietly held this priviledge in the Generall Counſells of Baſill Conſtance, and others, beſides the Kingdome of Caſtile, which is the Spaniards firſt Title, is but an upſtart in regard of England, which had Earles, but no Kings till the yeere one 1017. In like manner, that Pope Julius the third, gave ſentence for Henry the ſeaventh of England, againſt Ferdinand, who was then King of Caſtile.

At the day appointed, the Delegates met at Bulloign, Sir Henry Nevyll, Legier Embaſſadour, Sir John Herbert, Robert Beale, and Thomas Edmunds for the Engliſh, and other for the King of Spaine and the Archduke. The Engliſh had Inſtructions, firſt concerning Precedency, in no caſe to give way to the King of SPAINE; yet if they contended, to put the matter to the deviſion of Lots, rather then the Treaty ſhould be diſſolved; and for the reſt, to propoſe and mention the renewing of the ancient Burgundian League, freedome of commerce, &c.

At the meeting, when the had ſeverally ſhewed their cõmiſſions; the Engliſh challenge the Precedency, the Spaniards do the like, and in ſoe peremptory a manner, that without it they would diſſolve the Treaty: Here-hereupon the Engliſh made a propoſition, to let paſſe the queſtion of Precedency; and to tranſact the buſineſſe by wrighting, and Meſſengers between them: Or that the Treaty might be intermitted onely for threeſcore dayes, not quite brooken off; but all was to no purpoſe; And at three monthes end, they parted.

The States the meane while, were ſo farr from regarding a Peace, that at this time, they thought upon reducing the Sea Coaſt of Flanders into their command; and thereupon they landed an Army there, of Fourteen thouſand Foote, and three thouſand horſe, under the conduct of Maurice of Naſaw; and Fifteen hundered of the Engliſh under the command of Sir Francis Vere, and his Brother Horatio: At which time happened the famous Bataile of Newport, againſt the Arch-duke, wherein nine thouſand of the Spaniards were ſlaine; and the Victory by the valour of the Engliſh, fell to the Dutch, for ſo forward were the Engliſh in this Battaile, that of their fifteen hundred, eight hundred were ſlaine and ſore wounded, eight Captaines killed, and of the reſt every man hurt.

All this year, and the yeat paſt, ſundry quarells and complaints aroſe betweene the Engliſh and the French, touching repriſalls of goods taken from each other by Pirates of either Nation: Alſo touching Cuſtomes and Impoſitions, contrary to the Treaty of Bloys, and deceit in Engliſh Clothes, to the great infamy of our Nation. In Denmarke likewiſe aroſe controverſies touching Commerce, and the Fiſhing of the Engliſh upon the coaſt of Iſland and Norway. The Queen alſo either time, for the increaſe of Navigation and Commerce, Founded the Company of Eaſt-India Merchants, allowing them large Priviledges: but whether, this hath ptoved beneficiall to the Common-wealth, (there having been by this meanes ſuch a maſſe of mony and great ſtore of other commodities carried out of the Kingdom, and ſo many Marriners loſt every year) wiſe men make a queſtion.

About this time alſo, Pope Clement the eight, perceiving the Queen to be in her declining age, ſent two Breeves into England, the one to the Popiſh Clergy, the other to the Layity, to ſuffer no perſon whatſoever, to take the Kingdome upon him after the Queenes death, but one that ſhould promiſe by Oath to promote with all his might, the Roman Catholick Religion, how neer ſoever otherwiſe, he were allyed to the Bloud Royall of the Kings of England.

This year by reaſon of intemporate weather, happened a great ſcarcity of Corne in England, and thereby many grievous complaints was occaſioned. The common people caſt out reprochfull ſlaunders, againſt the Lord Treaſurer Buckhurſt, as the granter of Lycences for tranſportation of Corne; but he appealing to the Queene, ſhee forthwith defended his Innocency, and made it knowne by open Proclamation, imputed the fault, upon the Broggers of Corne, and Foreſtallers of Markets, and gave order that the ſlanderers ſhould be reprehended and puniſhed.

The Earle of Eſſex, who had now beene Priſoner ſix moneths in the Houſe of the Lord Privie Seale, he then began to repent in good earneſt, reſolving to put away his perverſe Councellors, Cylly Merick and Henry Cuffe, and then he ſhewed ſo much patience and great ſubmiſſion, that the Queene then ſent him to his owne houſe, and to bee there confined, alwayes proteſting that ſhee would doe nothing that ſhould bee for his ruine, but onely that, which ſhould bee for his amendment. Nevertheleſſe, when as the common people extolled his Innocency, ſhe could not, for the removall of ſuſpition of injuſtice, free her ſelf and and her counſellors, but bring him to a tryall, not in the Star-Chamber, leſt the Cenſure ſhould fall too heavy on him; but in the houſe of the Lord Privie Seal, where the cauſe ſhould have a plain hearing before the Lords of the Councell, four Earls, two Barons, and four Judges of the Realm. The objections were, That contrary to his Commiſſion, he had made the Earl of Southampton, Generall of the Horſe, had drawn his Forces into Munſter, neglecting the Arch-Rebell Tir-Oen, entertained a Parlee with him, againſt the Dignity of the Queens Majeſty, and the perſon of a Vice-Roy, which he repreſented; and that the ſayd Parlee was ſuſpitious, in regard it was private. Some aggravations the Lawyers added from abrupt ſentences, in his Letter to the Lord Privie Seal, written two years ſince, as theſe; No ſtorme is more fierce than the indignation of an Impotent Prince. What? Cannot Princes erre? May they not injure their Subjects, and ſuch like.

He falling upon his knee at the end of the Boord, profeſſed he would not conteſt with the Queen, nor excuſe the faults of his young years, either in whole, or in part, Proteſting that he alwayes meant well, howſoever it fell out otherwiſe, and that now he would bid the World farewell, withall, ſhedding many tears, ſo as the ſtanders by wept alſo. Yet could he not contain himſelf, but began to plead excuſes, till the Lord Privy Seal interrupted him, adviſing him to proceed as he had begun, to flie to the Queens Mercy, who would not have him queſtioned for diſloyalty, but only for a contempt; and that he did not well to pretend obedience in words, which in deeds he had not performed. At length, in the name of the reſt, he pronounceth this Sentence againſt him; That he ſhould be depoſed from the office of a Privy Councellor, ſuſpended from the functions of the Earl Marſhall, and Maſter of the Ordnance, and be Impriſoned during the Queens pleaſure. She had given expreſſe charge, not to ſuſpend him from the office of Maſter of the Horſe (minding to take him ſhortly into favor) and that his Cenſure in no caſe ſhould be Recorded. After this, he made ſhew of wonderfull humility and mortification, which ſo affected the Queen, that ſhortly ſhe removed Barkeley his keeper, and gave him leave to go at large; only admoniſhing him, To make his own diſcretion his keeper, and not to come at the Court, or in her Preſence.

After this Sentence, Cuffe, who alwayes perſwaded the Earle to ſtand ſtoutly in his own defence, began ſo plainly to tax him of cowardize and puſillanimity; that the Earl in anger, commanded his name to be put out of the Rowl of his ſervants, yet Merrick the Steward did it not, as being of Cuffes minde himſelf.

Eſſex, being now ready to go into the Countrey, remembred himſelf to the Queen, by the Lord Henry Howard, in theſe words; That he kiſſed the Rod, and the Queens hands, which had onely corrected, not overthrown him; yet he ſhould never enjoy ſolid comfort, till he might ſee thoſe bleſſed eyes, which had been his load-ſtars, whereby he had happily ſteered his courſe, whiles he held on his way at lawfull diſtance; But now he reſolved to eat graſſe with Nebuchad-nezzar, till it pleaſe the Queen to reſtore his ſenſes. She being greatly joyed with theſe his ſpeeches; Would to God (ſayd ſhe) his deeds might be anſwerable to his words; he hath long tried my patience, I muſt now make tryall of his humility.

And now the Earl grew ſo confident of thee Queens favor, That he became a ſuitor to her for the Farme of ſweet Wines; but ſhe to try his temper, and with what minde he would bear a repulſe, made him Anſwer; That ſhe muſt firſt know what it was worth, and not give away things hand over head; and had oftentimes in her mouth, the Aphoriſme of Phiſitians, That foul bodies, the more you nouriſh them, the more you corrupt them. And indeed, this was the right way to finde, whether the ulcer of his minde were throughly cured or no; for being not throughly cured, it would endure dure no touching; and no more did his, but as though every denyall of a curteſie, were an injury that required revenge; his melancholy was preſently turned into choller, and now began to hearken to Cuffe again; telling him, That it was now plain, the Queen determined to make him as poore as Job, that he ſhould live of the basket, and gather crums under the Table. Hereupon he returned to London, Southampton is ſent for out of the Low-Countries, his doors are ſet open for all commers, Merricke his Steward receiveth to his own table decayed ſouldiers, diſcontented and audacious perſons; Sermons are made there every day by Puritan Miniſters, to which the Citizens flock, and all ſignes of popularity appeared; which matters coming to the Queens ears, Alienated her affection from him daily more and more; but eſpecially ſhe was exaſperated, that her Perſon was deſpiſed by him; for (not to ſay the worſt) he had muttered, That the Queen was now old and decrepit, and withered as well in minde as body.

And now again, he runneth upon deſperate counſells, for the removall of his adverſaries from the Court, ſeeketh to ſcrue himſelf into the King of Scots favour, to whom he traduceth his adverſaries, by name Raleigh, Cobham, Carew, Cecill, and the Admirall, as inclined to the Spaniſh Faction, and at one and the ſame time, ſeeketh to win to him both Puritans and Papiſts. Many were of his party, but few of his counſell; and theſe were the Earl of Southampton, Sir Charls Davers, Sir Ferdinando Gorge, Captain of the Garriſon of Plimmouth, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, and ſome other. With theſe he met privately in Drury Houſe to avoyd ſuſpition, where he firſt giveth them a Catalogue of the Nobility and gentry that favoured him, to the number of a hundred and twenty. Then they conſult, whether it were better to ſet upon the Tower of London, or the Queens Pallace; this latter they reſolve upon, which ſhould be done in this manner. Blunt ſhould keep the great Gate, with a ſelected number of men, and Danvers ſeize upon the Preſence Chamber: Then Eſſex with his company ſhould come from the Mues, and preſent himſelfe before the Queen. But now ſuſpitions ariſing from divers circumſtances, Secretary Herbert was ſent to call him before the Councell, at the Treaſurers Houſe; but he doubting the matter, excuſeth himſelfe, that he was not very well. And now the Plot of ſeizing upon the Court, which had been four moneths in contriving, was by this means quite daſhed, for they had ready at the preſent, neither Souldiers, nor muition, ſo as ſome ſpeedier courſe muſt now be thought on; at which time very opportunely cometh one to them (ſet on no doubt by Eſſex his Adverſaries) as if he had been ſent on purpoſe from the Citizens, to promiſe him their Ayd, which made Eſſex to applaud his own great good fortune.

And now were four of the Lords, namely the Lord Keeper, the Earle of Worceſter, Sir William Knolles, and the Lord Chiefe Juſtice of England, ſent by the Queen to Eſſex houſe, who could hardly be ſuffered to come, in, all their Attendants were kept out, ſave he that carried the Seal before the Keeper. In the Court, they found a confuſed number of people, and the Earls of Eſſex, Rutland, and Southampton in the midſt of them. The Keeper turning himſelfe to Eſſex, telleth him, The Queen had ſent him and the reſt to underſtand the cauſe of this concourſe, promiſing Juſtice, if any perſon had done them wrong. Eſſex with a loud voice cryeth out, They lye in waite for my life, we are met to defend our ſelves. The Keeper urging Eſſex again to unfold ſome part of his grievance; the unruly multitude crieth out, Away, let us be gone, they come to betray you, Kill them, caſt away that Great Seal. Eſſex retireth into the houſe, the Lords follow him, he chargeth them to make the doors faſt, and turning him to the Lords, Have patience for a while (ſaith he) I muſt go into the City, to diſpatch a little buſineſſe with the Maior and Sheriffs, I will return preſently.

There

There the Lords are kept priſoners; Eſſex maketh haſte into the City, with a Troop of 200 men at his heels; the E. of Bedford, the L. Cromwell, and other Lords meeting him by the way, joyn themſelves: coming into London, he cryeth out aloud, For the Queen, for the Queen, they lay wait for my life. The Citizens came running to gaze, but not ſo much as one perſon took Arms to take his Part. Paſſing along the City, he came all in a ſweat to the Sheriff Smith's houſe, who ſhifteth himſelf forth at a back door, and goeth to the Lord Maior. By this time, certain of the Nobility entred the City with a Herald, declaring Eſſex and his adherents Traytors. Hereupon, hearing alſo that the Lord Admirall made towards him with an Army, he began to be diſheartned; Gorge taketh care for himſelf, requeſteth he might be ſent to releaſe the Counſellors, and with them to crave the Queens mercy, whiles the iſſue was yet doubtfull. The Earl content, that Popham only ſhould be freed, but he refuſed, unleſſe the Keeper alſo might be diſmiſſed. Then Gorge freeth them all, and goeth along with them to the Court by water.

Now when Eſſex thought to return, he found a Chain faſtened croſſe the ſtreet, at the Weſt end of Pauls, and men in Arms on the other ſide: then he began to draw his ſword, and having once given the word, Blunt letteth fly at them, ſlew one of them incontinent, himſelf being ſorely wounded and taken. Eſſex himſelf had his Hat ſhot thorow; whereupon retiring, he took Boat at QueenHythe, and went to Eſſex Houſe, where finding the Counſellors all diſmiſſed, he grew extreme angry and diſmayed, and caſt certain papers into the fire, ſaying, They ſhould tell no tales. By and by the Admirall beſiegeth the houſe, commanding them to yeeld. Southampton offereth, if the Admirall would give Hoſtages to ſecure them, they would preſent themſelves to the Queen. The Admirall anſwereth him by Sidney, That Rebells are not to profer Conditions. Within an hour, Eſſex finding the caſe deſperate, reſolved to ruſh forth; and the Lord Sands (the moſt aged in the company) greatly urged it, ſaying, It were better to die valiantly, than by the hands of a Hang-man. But Eſſex his minde, upon a little deliberation altering, they fell upon their knees, and deliver their weapons to the Admirall, when it was ten a clock at night. Owen Salisbury, and one or two more were ſlain with Musket Shot, and as many of the Beſiegers. The next day, Thomas Lea, Commander of a Company of Souldiers in Ireland, who to one Croſſe a Sea-Captain (that detected him) intimated, how noble an exploit it were, for ſix ſtout fellows to go to the Queen, and compell her forceably to releaſe Eſſex and Southampton, was preſently apprehended, examined, found guilty and executed. Eſſex and Southampton were carryed firſt to Lambeth, to the Archbiſhops houſe, becauſe it was a dark night, but anon were ſent to the Tower, by the Queens direction, and with them, Rutland, Sands, Cromwell, Mounteagle, Danverſe, and Bromley, the reſt were put in common priſons.

On the nineteenth of February, Eſſex and Southampton were called to their Arraignment, before their Peers in Weſtminſter-Hall, where Buckhurſt Lord Treaſurer, was appointed Lord High Steward of England for that time. The Peers being ſeverally called by their names, Eſſex demanded, If it were not lawfull for them to except againſt ſome of the Peers, as private perſons might do againſt the Jurors. The Judges made anſwer, That the credit and fidelity of the Peers of England was preſumed to be ſuch, that in Tryalls they were not bound to take an Oath, nor are they lyable to any exception. Then were they joyntly indited of High Treaſon; namely, That they plotted to deprive the Queen of her life and Kingdom, To ſurprize her in her very Palace; And that they brake forth into open Rebellion, by impriſoning the Counſellors of the Kingdom, By exciting the Londoners to Re-bellion with vaine Fictions; By aſſaulting the Queens loyall Subjects in the City, and by defending of Eſſex Houſe againſt the Queens Forces. Hereunto they pleaded, Not guilty.

Essex withall averring, That they had done nothing but of necessity, and the Law of Nature. Yelverton aggravateth the specialties; and Edward Cook Attorney, argueth, That the Earl could not excuse himself from the Law of Nature, seeing Majesty is not to be affronted for private revenge. The Earl of Essex with great confidence made answer, That to his Prince and Countrey, he always had and would bear a loyall affection. Then Francis Bacon (one that was little expected to speak against Essex, by whom he had been raised) in defence of Cobham, Cecill, and Raleigh, aggravateth his crying out, That the Crown of England was sold to the Spaniard: wherto Essex replyed, that he heard indeed, that Cecill the Secretary should say to one of the Lords of the Councell, That the Right of the Infanta of Spain to the Kingdom of England, was as good as any of the Competitors. Upon this Cecill (who stood by as an Auditor) stepped in, and falling upon his knees, beseecheth the Steward that with his good leave, he might quit himself from this foul aspersion: which leave being granted him, he provoked Essex, if he durst, to name the Counsellor; but he would not: therefore (saith Cecill) It is a Faction: still Essex averreth it. Then Cecill turning himself to Southampton, besought him, by all manner of Obtestations, to name the man. He referreth it to the Honorable Assembly, and to Cecill himself, if in Honour and good Reason he ought to do it: they affirming, He might, Southampton nameth Sir William Knolles, Essex his Unkle. He being sent for, at Cecills intreaty, said, That Cecill two yeers since told him, that one Dolman, in a Book, had asserted the Right of the Infanta, and had spoken no otherwise than so.

Now after the Judges had delivered their opinion what was Law in the matters alleadge[d], the Earls, by the Stewards direction, were taken aside: Then the Peers rose, and went apart, and having consulted about an hour, returned to their seats, and in their order, pronounced the Earls guilty of high Treason. Then the high Steward, advising Essex to implore the Queens mercy, giveth Sentence, and that done, brake his Staff and departed.

The next day, Sir Robert Vernon, Sir William Constable, Sir Edmund Baynham, Littleton, Cluff, Captain Whitlock, John and Christopher Wright and Orell an old Souldier, were called to their Tryall: but the Queen (informed by Sir Fulk Grevill, That most of them were drawn unwittingly into the danger) commanded that onely Littleton, Baynham, and Orell should have their Tryall, the rest to be sent back to prison. These were all condemned, but their lives spared; which favour, Raleigh (for a good sum of money received of Baynham) procured.

Essex in the mean while, requested he might speak with some of the Counsellors, to whom he reconciled himself, and to Cecill especially; and then intimated, That the Queen could not be in safety while he lived; he requesteth he might be executed privately in the Tower: He grievously inveigheth against some of the Conspiracy, and wished to speak with some of them, but specially with Blunt and Cuffe; whom as soon as he saw, he brake forth into these words; O Cuffe, ask pardon of God and the Queen, for thou hast chiefly provoked me to this disloyalty. Also he intimated Sir Henry Nevill, ordinary Ambassadour in France, to have been acquainted with the Conspiracy; and that other in Scotland, France, the Netherlands, and the Lord Mountjoy, Deputy of Ireland, knew of his purpose, and other in England; who being many in number, and the Lord Mountjoy ordering the Affairs of Ireland in good fashion, the Queen wisely would take no notice of it.

The five and twentieth day of February, which was to be the fatall day, there were sent to the Earl divers Ministers, to give him ghostly comfort. The Queen now wavering in her self, one while remembring the ancient [ancient] kindenesse she had shewed him, she commanded he should not be executed; then again, thinking of his stubbornnesse, That he would not once ask her mercy, and had said openly, That he could not live, but she must perish; countermanding her former word, she gave order that he should be executed.

Then was he brought forth into the Yard, where a Scaffold was erected, and sundry of the Nobility present, amongst whom Raleigh also; but being told, It was an inhumane thing to stand by and behold the death of his adversary, he withdrew himself into the Armory, and from thence beheld the Tragedy. Essex being ascended the Scaffold, uncovered his head, cast up his eyes towards Heaven, and cryed God mercy for the manifold sins of his youth, but this last specially, which he said was a bloody, crying, and contagious sin; craved pardon of the Queen and her Councellors, commended his Spirit into the hands of God, and had his head taken off at the third blow, though the first bereft him both of sense and motion.

The fifth of March, Sir Christopher Blunt, Sir Charles Davers, Sir John Davis, Sir Gyllie Merrick, and Cuffe, were brought to their Tryall in Westminster-Hall, before the Queens Delegates. The Heads of their Inditements, were the same which were objected to Essex and Southampton. The others said little in their defence, onely Cuffe stood upon these two Answers; Whereas (saith he) I am challenged of Treason, because I was in Essex house the day of the Rebellion; by the same Argument the Lion in the Celler might be indited; all that day I lamented the Earls Fortune, and dealt with him to flie to the Queens mercy. And as for the Consultation in Drury House, it is no more to be called High Treason, than an Embryon may be accounted a perfect man. The Lawyers on the other side demonstrated, That no necessity lay upon him to tarry in the House; and that the Consultation in Drury House was it self a Treason, though it had never broke forth into act. Merrick said onely this, The Earl of Essex raised me, and he hath overturned me.

The thirteenth of March, Merrick and Cuffe are drawn to Tyburn, where Cuffe entring into a long Speech, was by the Sheriff interrupted; and then, after prayers to God, and desiring God and the Queen to pardon him, he was cast from the Ladder: a man of great Wit and Learning, but of a boysterous and turbulent disposition. In the same manner died Merrick.

The fifteenth of March, Sir Charles Davers, and Sir Christopher Blunt were beheaded on the Tower-Hill; albeit Davers offered ten thousand pounds to redeem his life, though with perpetuall Imprisonment. The Earl of Southampton, and the Sheriff Smith, were kept prisoners; though Smith, after some time, was upon sureties suffered to go at large. The eighth of July, Sir Henry Nevill was cited before the Lords of the Counsell, where it was laid to his Charge, That he was present at the Consultation in Drury House, yet had not revealed their sinister purposes; and had imparted to Essex the secrets of his French Ambassage. He confessed, That at the Earls intreaty, he shewed him the Commentaries of the French proceedings, was present at one of their Consultations onely, but contemned their counsells, yet durst not be an Informer against so great Personages. Hereupon he had a grievous check given him, and was committed to prison.

One Act of the By, is not here to be omitted. Essex at his Arraignment had complained, That his hand-writing was counterfeited. It happened, the Countesse of Essex being fearfull in her husbands behalf, gave a Letter which she had received from him, to the custody of one Ribove, a Dutchwoman that waited on her: this Dutch-womans husband, named Daniell, lighted by chance upon the Letter, and perceiving some passages in it which might bring the Earl of Essex into danger, got a cunning fellow to draw a counterfeit Copy of the said Letter; with this he cometh to the fearfull

Lady.

Lady, who was newly brought to bed, threatning to give the same to her husbands adversaries; unlesse she would presently give him three thousand pounds. She to shun the danger, paid him eleven hundred and seventy pounds at the very instant; yet did he deliver her the counterfeit Copy only, meaning to make use of the true one, to get another sum of the Earls adversaries. This imposture being found out, he was censured to perpetuall Imprisonment, condemned in three thousand pounds (two of which were to go to the Countesse) and his ears nayled to the Pillory, with this Writing over his head; A notorious Cheater.

Soon after, a Parliament was assembled, wherein grievous complaints b eing tendred to the lower House touching Monopolies; the Queen, by way of prevention, sendeth out Proclamations, declaring the said Licenses and Patents to be voyd in part, leaving some part to the discussion of the Laws: which thing was so acceptable to the Lower House, that they presently sent 80 selected persons, together with the Speaker, to give the Queen thanks; and she on the other side, gave them thanks, for being such faithfull Monitors to her, to recall her from an errour, whereinto through ignorance, not wilfulnesse, she was fallen.

In Ireland, the Deputy, at the entry of the Spring, draweth his Forces together, and driveth Tir-Oen from where he had fortified himself; Carew, President of Munster, taketh the titular Earl lurking in a Cave, and receiveth intelligence, That the Spaniards, invited by Tir Oen, had a purpose to land in Munster, yet could not perswade the Deputy they had any designe for Ireland; but in the midst of September, certain news was brought, The Spaniards were in sight, who wanting winde to carry their Fleet to Cork, put in to Kinsale, the three and twentieth of September, and land their Souldiers without resistance. Richard Percy, having but few Souldiers to defend the Town, is commanded to come away, and leave Kinsale to the Spaniards, into which they enter with Ensignes displayed, and by the Magistrates and Inhabitants, were bidden welcome.

D'Aquila, who commanded the Spaniards, publisheth a Declaration, wherein he sheweth, That Queen Elizabeth was deposed from her Kingdom by sentence of the Pope, her subjects absolved from their Allegiance; And that the Spaniards were now come to deliver Ireland from the Jaws of the devill. Tir Oen joyneth his Forces with them, so as they were now six thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, and promised themselves assured Victory, the English being not neer so many. The four and twentieth of December, a Battell is joyned; where, after a long Fight, the Victory inclined to the English. Tir Oen, O donell, and the rest, cast away their Weapons, and save themselves by flight. Alphonso O Campo, chief Leader of the Spaniards, together with three other Captains, was taken prisoner, and six Ensigne-bearers, twelve hundred were slain, nine Colours taken, whereof four belonged to the Spaniards: of the English not many were slain, but a great number wounded.

After six dayes, D'Aquila sendeth Letters to the Deputy by a Drummer, requesting that some person of account might be sent to him, with whom to confer; Sir William Godolphine is sent, to whom he complained of cowardise, and (he feared) treachery of the Irish; and therefore, although he wanted nothing to hold out the Siege, and did daily expect great Forces from Spain, yet was willing to make a Composition: whereupon, at last it was agreed, The Spaniards should yeeld up Kinsale to the Deputy, as also the Castles and Forts at Baltimore, Bere-Haven, and Castle-haven, and should depart with life and goods, and Colours displayed. The English, at a reasonable price, should furnish them with Ships and provision into Spain; and that they should not carry Arms against the Queen of England, till they were arrived in Spain, &c.

And

And now the Spaniards being driven out of Ireland, the Queen, to prevent their coming again, sendeth out Sir Richard Levison, and Sir William Monson, with eight Ships of her own, and some smaller Ships of War, to attempt something upon the Coast of Spain. On the nineteenth of March, Levison hoyseth Sayl, and Monson afterward, having in vain tarryed behinde, for some Dutch Ships to joyn with them. Levison in the mean time lighted upon the Spanish Navy of eight and thirty Ships, which brought the Treasure from America, and set upon them, but to no purpose. When Monson was come with the rest of the Fleet, they had certain notice, That a mighty Indian Caraque of sixteen hundred Tun, and richly laden, was upon the Coast of Portugall. There indeed they found it, but it lay close under a Fort, attended with eleven Gallies; and the Caraque it self appeared as big as a Castle; yet they resolved to fire it, if they could not take it. The next day, they thundered so violently against the Gallies, that within seven hours the Marquesse of St. Crosse, together with Portugall Gallies which he commanded, withdrew themselves; two of them were taken and fired; and in them was great store of Powder, which was going for the Low-Countries. And now Levison signified to the Captain of the Caraque, That the Gallies which they trusted to, were driven away, and therefore, if they now refused mercy, they must expect none hereafter. After much speech to and fro, it was at last agreed, That the Caraque, with the Ordnance and Merchandise, should be yeelded up. Thus the English, having a fair winde, returned homeward with a Booty, to the value of a Million of Duckets, by the Portugall account, and not past five of their men lost in the Voyage.

At this time there arose a Contestation amongst the Popish Clergy here in England; for the Jesuites and the Secular Priests, made bitter Invectives in their writings, one against the other. The originall of the Priests quarrell was, That Blackwell, one wholly at the beck of the Jesuites, was set over them as Arch-Presbyter, who first of all despoiled them of their Faculties; and when they appealed to the Pope, caused them to be declared Schismaticks and Hereticks. They in sundry Books extolled the Queen very highly, as one that dealt mildly alwayes with the Catholikes, till such time as they set all in a combustion in England; and by their Treasons, caused most severe Laws to be enacted against the Catholikes. Parsons they traduced, as a Bastard, an Equivocator, and a Traytor. Whether they contended thus in good earnest, or in jest only, is hard to say; but the Bishop of London politickly nourished the contention; and all he gained, was this, That the Queen and her Councell, finding them dangerous to the Common-wealth, both the one and the other, upon Penalty of the Laws, were by Proclamation commanded to depart out of the Kingdom presently.

In France, the Marshall Biron, for entring into dangerous attempts against the publike Peace, was arraigned, and lost his head. His confession brought some other into danger; and amongst them, the Duke of Bulloign, of the Protestant Religion, that when he was cited, he durst not appear, but fled into Germany. Hereupon the King of France sendeth to Queen Elizabeth, complaining that the Duke held his Marriage unlawfull, and the Popes Dispensation nothing worth, pronouncing his son Illegitimate; had destined the Prince of Conde to the Succession of the Crown, and conspired the destruction of the prime of the Nobility. The Queen, by her Legier Ambassadour, adviseth the King not too credulously to entertain those reports, as doubting these suggestions might proceed from some of the Spanish Faction. Hereupon the King grew very angry, saying, The Queen held a better opinion of the Duke then he deserved, and that he was one of the chief Architects of Essex his Treason; and being questioned by the King about it, was not able to deny it. About this time also, the Duke of Savoy, by cunning slights, and open force, practised against the State of Geneva; and the Queen relieved them with a great sum of money, gathered amongst the Clergy and Laity all over England.

And now the Earl of Tyrone, perceiving himself in a desperate estate, resolved to sue for mercy, and promised at last to submit his life and Fortunes to the Queens pleasure, absolutely without condition. Hereupon, being admitted to the presence of the Deputy, at the very entry of the room, he fell on his knees; and then passing on a few steps, prostrated himself again, saying, I confesse and crave pardon for my great fault, against God, and a most bountifull Prince, my dread Soveraign: I fly to the Queens mercy, as a sacred Anchor, permitting her to dispose of my life and Fortunes at her pleasure. Upon this his submission, the Deputy commanded him to go aside, and the next day took him along to Dublin with him, meaning to bring him into England, that the Queen might deal with him according to her Royall pleasure: But before he could come into England, the Queen died.

Her TAXATIONS.

IN a Parliament holden the first yeer of her Raign, a Subsidy was granted, of two Shillings eight pence the pound of Goods, and four Shillings of Lands, to be paid at two severall Payments, of every person Spirituall and Temporall. In her sixth yeer, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, one Subsidy was granted by the Clergy, and another by the Laity, together with two Fifteenths and Tenths. In her eighth yeer, in a Parliament then holden, there were offered to her four Subsidies, upon condition she would declare a Successor; but she refused their offer, and directly remitted the fourth Subsidy, which they had granted, saying, It was all one, whether the money were in her Subjects Coffers, or in her own. In her thirteenth yeer, in a Parliament then holden, towards her charges of repressing the Northern Rebellion, there was granted her by the Clergy, a Subsidy of six Shillings in the pound: and by the Temporalty, two fifteens, with a Subsidy of two shillings and eight pence in the pound. In her six and thirtieth yeer, a Parliament was holden, wherein was granted by the Clergy, two whole Subsidies, and by the Laity, three, besides six Fifteens and Tenths; but it was put into the Act, That this great Contribution, the like whereof had not been known in former Ages, should not be drawn into Example. In her fortieth yeer, in a Parliament at Westminster, were granted her by the Clergy, three entire Subsidies; and by the Laity, as many, with six fifteenths and Tenths. In her two and fortieth yeer, to furnish her self with money towards the Irish War, she delegated certain Commissioners, to confirm the Crown Lands to the possessors, that held any of controverted Titles, and to take money for the Confirmation, thereby to take away the troubles by concealers, who at this time were very busie.

Of her LAWS and ORDINANCES.

IN a Parliament holden in her first yeer, an Act was made, That every person should go to Divine Service upon Sundayes and Holy-dayes, or else pay twelve pence to the poor. Also it was enacted, That Bishops should not let the Lands of the Church, longer then for one and twenty yeers, or three Lives, except to the Queen or her Successors. In her third yeer, Proclamation was made, That the Teston, coyned for twelve pence, and in the Raign of King Edward embased to six pence, should not be currant but for four pence; the Groat, but for two pence; and the piece of two pence, but for a penny: And not long after, all the said base Moneyes were called in, and fine Sterling money was allowed for them, after the Rate. For

For Ireland also, she coyned Sterling money; where nine pence in England, went for twelve pence there. The Queen was the first that brought certain Counties to deliver Provision at a certain rate, that so they might be freed from the Purveyors: Also the first that granted allowance to Judges for their Circuit. In her sixth yeer, in a Parliament then holden, it was made Treason to refuse taking the Oath of Supremacy; yet with this limitation, That by it the blood should not be dishonoured, nor goods confiscate; nor the Oath to be required of any Baron of the Kingdom. Also this yeer, by a Common Councell in London, It was enacted, That all such Citizens as from thenceforth should be constrained to sell their household-stuff, Leases of houses, or such like, should first cause the same to be cried thorow the City, by a man with a Bell, and then to be sold by the common Outcryer appointed for that purpose, and he to receive one farthing upon the shilling for his pains. In her three and twentieth yeer, she represseth by Proclamation excesse in apparell, Gold Chayns, and Clokes which men wore down to their heels. The length of Swords was limitted to three Foot, and Daggers to twelve Inches, besides the Hilts. Buildings likewise in the Suburbs were restrained, In-mates forbidden, and expresse charge set forth, That no dwelling house should be new built within three miles of any of the City Gates, under pain of imprisonment, and losse of the materialls. In her time was set on foot by Sir Thomas Smith, the Law made for the serving of Colledges with provision, to the great benefit of those Scholasticall Societies. In her two and fortieth yeer, she setteth forth Proclamations against the Transportation of Gold or Silver, wrought or unwrought, according to the former Acts of Parliament in that case provided. This yeer also she founded the Company of the East India Merchants, and allowed them ample Priviledges. In her three and fourtieth yeer, all Monopolies are called in by Proclamation. In her four and twentieth yeer, severe Laws are made against Papists, some inflicting death, some fine and imprisonment. In her eight and twentieth yeer, a Proclamation was set forth, prohibiting to sow Woad within eight miles of any of the Queens Houses, and four miles off any Cities or Towns Corporate.

AFFAIRS of the CHURCH in her time.

ON Sunday the first of January, next after the Queens coming to the Crown, by vertue of her Proclamation, the English Letany was read accordingly as was used in her Graces Chappell, in all Churches thorow the City of London, and likewise the Epistle and Gospel of the day, begun to be read at Masse-time in the English Tohgue. Also in a Parliament holden in her first yeer, the first Fruits and Tenths were restored to the Crown, and the Supreme Government over the State Ecclesiasticall, and the book of Common-Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments in the English Tongue was restored, and by degrees the Protestant Religion was established. The Bishops that refused the Oath of Supremacy, were all removed, and Protestant Bishops placed in their room. It was enacted also, That all persons should go to Divine Service upon Sundayes and Holy-dayes, and a Fine of twelve pence imposed upon every one that should be absent, and the same to be given to the poor. In her fourth yeer, the Queen was solicited by Pope Pius, to send her Orators to the Councell of Trent; which she refused, as not acknowledging it a lawfull Councell. In a Parliament holden in her eighth yeer, it was enacted, and by a generall consent declared, That the Election of the Arch-bishops and Bishops in England, together with their Consecration, Confirmation, and Investiture (which some persons slanderously called in question) was lawfull and Canonicall, and that they were rightly, and according to the Acts and Statutes of the Kingdom, choſen and conſecrated. In her eleventh yeer, there aroſe in England two contrary factions in Religion: on the one ſide, Thomas Harding, Nicholas Sanders, and other Divines that had fled out of England, began to exerciſe the Epiſcopall Juriſdiction upon the Queens Subjects, which they had derived from the Sea of Rome: On the other ſide, Colman, Burton, Hallingham, Benſon, and other, making profeſſion of the pure Religion, would allow of nothing but what was directly taken out of the Scriptures, openly condemning the received Diſcipline of the Church of England, together with the Church Liturgy, and the very Calling of Biſhops, as favouring too much of the Romiſh Religion, proteſting in the Pulpits, That it was an impious thing to hold any thing common with the Church of Rome; and uſed all diligence to have the Church of England reformed in every point, according to the Rule of the Church of Geneva. Theſe, although the Queen commanded to be committed to priſon, yet it is incredible how upon a ſudden their followers encreaſed, known by the envious name of Puritans. This ſect ſo mightily encreaſed, that in her ſixteenth yeer, the Queen and Kingdom was extremely troubled with ſome of the Clergy, who breathing out nothing but Evangelicall parity, cryed down the Eccleſiaſticall Form of Government (as a thing polluted with Romane dreggs) and ſetting forth Books likewiſe, Intituled, The Admonition to the Parliament, and the Defence of the Admonition: they refuſed to reſort to the Divine Service publikely in uſe, and framed to themſelves other Rites. Whereupon, the Queen, to ſuppreſſe them, whom by no means ſhe liked, commanded every where the ſeverity of the Law touching the Uniformity of Common-Prayer, to be put in execution, and thoſe books, upon pain of Impriſonment, to be delivered into the hands of the Biſhops, or ſome of the Queens Councell. And this yeer were taken at Maſſe in their ſeverall houſes, the Lord Morley's Lady and her children, the Lady Guildford, and the Lady Browne, who being thereof indited and convicted, ſuffered the penalty of the Law in that caſe provided. Untill the twentieth yeer of Queen Elizabeths Raign, the Papiſts in England were mercifully connived at, while they ſolemnized their own Rites within their private houſes (though that alſo were againſt the Laws) but when as that Thunder-bolt of excommunicating the Queen came abroad, then was the Law enacted againſt thoſe who brought into the Kindome any Agnos Dei, or hallowed Beads, or reconciled any of the Queens ſubjects to the See of Rome; yet for ſix whole yeers together after this Law was made, it was not executed upon any Papiſt, till Cuthbert Mayne, a Prieſt, and an obſtinate maintainer of the Popes Authority againſt the Queen, was executed at Launſton in Cornwall, and the Gentlemans goods that harboured him confiſcate, and himſelf adjudged to perpetuall Impriſonment. In her three and twentieth yeer, divers Prieſts and Jeſuites came into England; amongſt whom, Robert Parſons, and Edmund Campian, Engliſh-men and Jeſuites, being now bound for England, to promote the Catholike Cauſe; at which time a Proclamation was ſet forth, That whoſoever had any children beyond the Sea, ſhould by a certain day call them home; and that no perſon ſhould receive or harbour any Seminary Prieſt or Jeſuite. At this time alſo, there aroſe up in Holland a certain Sect, naming themſelves, The Family of Love, who perſwaded their followers, That thoſe only who were adopted into that Family, were elected, and no other could be ſaved, but were all reprobates, and damned, and that it was lawfull for them to deny upon oath whatſoever they pleaſed, before any Magiſtrate or whomſoever, that were not of their Family. Many of their books were printed, under theſe titles, The Goſpel of the Kingdom, The Lords Sentences, The Propheſie of the ſpirit of love, The

The publication of Peace upon earth, by the Author H. N. but who this Author was, they would by no means reveal: at laſt) he was found to be Henry Nicholls of Leyden, who blaſphemouſly preached, That he was partaker of the Divinity of God, and God of his humane Nature: all which books were by Proclamation commanded to be burnt. In a Parliament holden the eight and twentieth yeer of her Raign, ſome, out of a deſire of a Reformation, began to pick quarrells at the Clergy, deſiring to paſſe Laws for the reſtraint of Biſhops in their granting of Faculties, conferring of holy Orders, Eccleſiaſticall Cenſure, and the Oath Ex officio. They complayned likewiſe of the non-reſidency of Miniſters, and the like. But the Queen, who alwayes hated Innovation (which for the moſt part changeth for the worſe) would give no ear unto them; conceiving beſides, That theſe proceedings in Parliament in Eccleſiaſticall Affairs, derogated from her Prerogative. In her ſix and twentieth yeer, the Queen gave a ſpeciall charge to Whitgift Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, to ſettle an Uniformity in the Eccleſiaſticall Diſcipline, according to the Laws, which through the connivence of Biſhops, and perverſeneſſe of the Puritans, lay now almoſt gaſping, Whereupon, he provided three Articles, to which every Miniſter ſhould ſubſcribe:

The firſt, That the Queen had Supreme Authority over all perſons born within her Dominions, of what condition ſoever they were; and that no other Prince, or Prelate, or Potentate, hath, or ought to have any Juriſdiction, Civill or Eccleſiaſticall, within her Realms and Dominions.

The ſecond, That the Book of Common-Prayer, and of the Ordination of Biſhops, Prieſts and Deacons, containeth nothing contrary to the Word of God, but may lawfully be uſed; and that they will uſe that, and none other.

The third, That the Articles agreed on in the Synod holden at London, in the yeer 1562, and publiſhed by the Queens Authority, they did allow of, and believe them to be conſonant to the Word of God.

It is incredible, what reproaches the Arch-biſhop incurred by ſetting forth theſe Artieles, both from factious Miniſters, and from ſome alſo of the Nobility; yet by his patience and conſtancy, he brought at laſt Peace to the Church, making this his Motto, Vincit qui patitur. Neither did theſe at home onely diſturb the Peace of the Church, but others alſo from abroad, as Robert Brown, a young Student of Divinity in Cambridge; from whom came the Sectaries called Browniſts; and Richard Harriſon, a petty School-Maſter. Theſe preſuming to judge matters of Religion by their own private ſpirit, by books ſet forth in Zealand, and diſperſed at this time over England, condemned the Church of England for no Church, and enſnared many in the nets of their new Schiſm. Neither could they be reſtrayned, though their books were prohibited by the Queens Authority, and ſoundly confuted by ſundry learned men; and one or two of the Ring-leaders executed at S. Edmunds Berry. In her one and thirtieth yeer, theſe Puritans flames brake forth again, Books are written by the names of Martin Mar-Prelate, and A Demonſtration of the Diſcipline, by Penry and Udall, againſt the Government of Biſhops; and nothing would pleaſe them, but the Diſcipline of Geneva: Many Abettors they had, Knightly and Wigſtone, Knights, beſides Cartwright (the father of them) Snape, King, Pradlow, Payn, and others; who though called in queſtion, fined and impriſoned, could never be reclaimed. In her ſix and thirtieth yeer, the Queen cauſed the ſeverity of the Laws to be executed upon Henry Barrow and his Sectaries, for diſturbing the Church, and the publike Peace, by ſcattering of their monſtrous Opinions, condemning the Church of England as no Chriſtian Church, and derogating from the Queens Authority in Cauſes Eccleſiaſticall.

WORKS of Piety in her time.

THis Queen converted Weſtminſter Abbey into a Collegiate Church, and there ordained a Dean, twelve Prebendaries, a Maſter, Uſher, and forty Schollars, Vicars, Singing-men, and twelve Almſ-men. In her third yeer, the Merchant-Taylors, founded a notable Grammar-School, in the Pariſh of S. Lawrence Pountney in London. Alſo this yeer, William Harper, Maior of London, founded a Free-School in the Town of Bedford, where he was born. In her ſeventh yeer, on the ſeventh of June, Sir Thomas Greſham laid the firſt ſtone of the Royall Exchange in Cornhill, which in November the yeer after, at his own charges was finiſhed, being the yeer 1567. In her tenth yeer, the Citizens of London builded a new Conduit at Walbrook corner, neer to Dowgate, the water whereof is conveyed out of the Thames. Alſo this yeer, Sir Thomas Roe Maior of London, cauſed to be encloſed within a wall of Brick, one Acre of ground, neer unto Bedlam, without Biſhops-Gate, to be a place of Buryall for the dead of ſuch Pariſhes in London as lacked convenient ground within their Pariſhes: He alſo builded a convenient room in Pauls Chnrch-Yard, on the South ſide of the Croſſe, to receive a certain number of Hearers at the Sermon time. Sir William Peter, having himſelf been born at Exceter in Devon-Shire, he gave to Exceter Colledge in Oxford, a hundred pounds Lands a yeer: He alſo builded at Ingerſtone in Eſſex, Almſ-houſes for twenty poor people, and giving them ſome competent maintenance. Sir Thomas Greſham had his dwelling houſe in Bread-ſtreet London, which he dedicated to the profeſſion of the Liberall Sciences, erecting there Lectures of Divinity, Civill Law, Phyſick, Geomitry, Aſtronomy, Muſick, and Rhetorick, alotting to the Profeſſors very competent allowance. In her ſeventeenth yeer, died Matthew Parker, Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, who founded a Grammar School in Rochdale in the County of Lancaſter. He alſo procured to Corpus Chriſti Colledge in Cambridge, thirteen Schollarſhips, and built two Chambers for Schollars, and the inward Library of the ſame Colledge, and procured to it the Patronage of S. Mary Abchurch in London, with many other works of like kinde. Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper, gave for ſix Schollars to be found in Benet Colledge in Cambridge, three pounds, ſix ſhillings and eight pence a piece for ever. Edmund Grindall Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, founded a Free-School in Cumberland, where he was born, and gave many Penſions to both Univerſities. Frances, Counteſſe of Suſſex, ſiſter to Sir Henry Sidney, founded Suſſex-Sidney Colledge in Cambridge: As likewiſe Sir Walter Mildmay, Chancellor of the Exchequer, founded Emmanuell Colledge in the ſame Univerſity. Sir Thomas Bodley erected and furniſhed the famous publike Library at Oxford. Alexander Nowell Dean of Pauls, endowed Braſen noſe Colledge in Oxford, where he was brought up, with two hundred pound per annum, and died in the yeer 1602. Sir Roger Manhood, chief Baron of the Exchequer, built ſeven Almſ-houſes in Canterbury, giving to every Almſ-man four pounds yeerly: and our worthy Countrey-man William Lambard built an Almſ-houſe at Greenwich, which he called, The Colledge for the poor of Queen Elizabeth.

CASUALTIES in her time.

IN the firſt yeer of her Raign, died Sir Thomas Cheyney, Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, of whom it is reported for certain, That his Pulſe did beat more then three quarters of an hour after he was dead, as ſtrongly as if he had been ſtill alive. In her third yeer, there was found neer Keſwick in Cumberland, a moſt rich Veyn of pure and native Braſſe, which had lain neglected a long time: Alſo the Stone called Lapis Calaminaris, which is of great uſe in Braſſe Works, was firſt brought into England at this time, and that in moſt plentifull manner. Likewiſe this Queen was the firſt that cauſed Gun-Powder to be made in England, which before was had from forraign parts, and at dear rates. In her third yeer, the Spire of the Cathedrall Church

Church of Pauls, being five hundred and twenty foot from the ground, and two hundred and ſixty from the ſquare Steeple where it was placed, and was made of wooden materialls, but covered with Lead, was with lightning burnt down, together with the Roofs of that large Church, and that within the ſpace of five hours; the Roofs were after re-edified, but the Spire is yet wanting. The Queen gave towards it a thouſand Marks in money, and a thouſand load of Timber; and the City granted a Benevolence, and three Fifteens; and the Clergy alſo contributed towards it. Alſo this yeer there were many monſtrous Births: A Mare brought forth a Foal with two heads, and a long tayl growing out between the two Heads. A Sow farrowed a Pig with two Bodies, eight Feet, and but one Head. A man-childe was born at Chicheſter in Suſſex, having arms and legs like to an Anatomy, the Breſt and Belly monſtrous big, about the neck a great coller of fleſh and skin, growing like the ruff of a Shirt. In her ſixth yeer, upon the returning of the Army from Newhaven, the Peſtilence was brought into England, but eſpecially into London; where in one yeer there died one and twenty thouſand and five hundred. This yeer alſo, in the Month of December, was driven on the ſhore at Grimſeby in Lincoln-ſhire a monſtrous Fiſh, in length nineteen yards, his tayl fifteen foot broad, and ſix yards between the eyes, Twelve men ſtood upright in his mouth to get the Oyl. In her ſeventh yeer, on the one and twentieth of December began a Froſt, ſo extreme, that on New-yeers Even people paſſed over the Thames on foot; ſome played at Foot-ball, ſome ſhot at pricks, as if it had been firm ground. Yet this great Froſt, the third of January at night began to thaw, and by the fifth day, there was no Ice at all to be ſeen; which ſudden thaw cauſed great Inundations. In her eighth yeer, within the ſpace of ten Months, there died in London ſeven Aldermen, namely, Edward Banks, Richard Chamberlain, Sir Martin Bowes, Sir Richard Mallory, Sir William Hewet, Sir Thomas White, and Richard Lambert, one of the Sheriffs for that yeer. The ſame yeer alſo, in the Town of Oſſeſtry in Wales, two hundred houſes, in the ſpace of two hours, were conſumed with fire. In her tenth yeer, were taken in Suffolk, at Downham Bridge neer to Ipſwich, ſeventeen monſtrous Fiſhes; ſome of them being ſeven and twenty foot in length: And in the ſame yeer, many Dutch flying into England, to avoid the perſecution of the Duke D'Alva, were the firſt that brought into England the Art of making Bayes, Sayes, Serges, and ſuch woven ſtuffs, both Woollen and Linnen. In her time a rich Veyn of Copper was found in the Earl of Northumberlands Grounds, which ſhe by her Prerogative ſeized upon. In her thirteenth yeer, a prodigious Earthquake happened in the Eaſt parts of Hereford-ſhire, at a little Town called Kinnaſton. On the ſeventeenth of February, at ſix of the clock in the evening, the earth began to open, and a hill with a Rock under it (making at firſt a great bellowing noyſe, which was heard a great way off) lifted it ſelf up a great heighth, and began to travell, bearing along with it the Trees that grew upon it, the Sheep-folds, and Flocks of Sheep abiding there at the ſame time. In the place from whence it was firſt moved, it left a gaping diſtance forty foot broad, and fourſcore Ells long; the whole Field was about twenty Acres. Paſſing along, it overthrew a Chappell ſtanding in the way, removed an Ewe-Tree planted in the Church-yard, from the Weſt into the Eaſt: with the like force it thruſt before it Highwayes, Sheep-folds, Hedges and Trees, made tilled ground Paſture, and again turned Paſture into Tillage. Having walked in this ſort from Saturday in the evening, till Munday noon, it then ſtood ſtill. In her fifteenth yeer, in the Month of November, a new Star, or rather a Meteor (but that it was found to be above the Moon) was ſeen in Cathedra Caſſiopeæ, exceeding Jupiter in brightneſſe, and in that place was carryed with the Diurnall motion of the Heavens ſixteen Months together, though after eight Months it was perceived perceived to grow leſſe and leſſe. In her ſixteenth yeer, was a great Dearth, ſo as Wheat was ſold at five and ſix ſhillings the Buſhell, and other things in proportion. In her ſeventeenth yeer, a vaſt mighty Whale was caſt upon the Iſle of Thanet in Kent, twenty Ells long, and thirteen foot broad from the belly to the back bone, and eleven foot between the eyes. One of his eyes being taken out of his head, was more then a Cart with ſix horſes could draw; the Oyl being boyled out of the head, was Parmaſitice. This yeer alſo, the River Thames ebbed and flowed twice within an hour: and in the Month of November, the Heaven ſeemed to be all on fire. Alſo on the four and twentieth of February, being a great Froſt, after a Flood which was not great, there came down the River of Severn ſuch a ſwarm of Flyes and Beetles, that they were judged to be above a hundred Quarters; the Mills thereabout were dammed up with them for the ſpace of four dayes, and then were cleanſed by digging them out with Shovells. In her three and twentieth yeer, in the beginning of April, about ſix a clock after noon, happened an Earthquake not far from York, which in ſome places, ſtrook the very ſtones out of Buildings, and made the Bells in Churches to jangle. The night following, the earth trembled once or twice in Kent, and again the firſt day of May. In her ſix and twentieth yeer, being the yeer 1583, the like Prodigie happened in Dorſet-ſhire, as in the yeer 1571 had happened in Hereford-ſhire; A field of three Acrees in Blackmore, with the Trees and Fences, moved from its place, and paſſed over another Field, travelling in the High-way that goeth to Herne, and there ſtayed. In her eight and twentieth yeer, Tobacco was firſt brought out of the Weſt Indies into England, by Ralph Lane. In her five and thirtieth yeer, there was ſo great a Drouth, that not onely the Fields, but the Springs themſelves were dried up, and many Cattell every where died for want of water. The River of Thames likewiſe did ſo fail, that a horſe-man might ride over at London Bridge. In her ſix and thirtieth yeer, was a great Plague in London, ſo as there died this yeer, in London and the Suburbs, ſeventeen thouſand eight hundred and ninety, beſides the Lord Maior, and three Aldermen; and Michaelmas Term was holden at S. Albons.

of her PERSONAGE and CONDITONS.

SHe was of ſtature indifferent tall, ſlender and ſtraight, fair of Complexion, her hair inclining to pale yellow, her fore-head large and fair, her eyes lively and ſweet, but ſhort ſighted; her noſe ſomewhat riſing in the midſt; the whole compaſſe of her countenance ſomewhat long, yet of admirable beauty, but the beauty of her minde was far more admirable: She had been a ſubject, which taught her to rule; ſhe had been in miſery, which taught her to be merciſull; and indeed, never Prince ruled with more Juſtice, and with her Juſtice mingled more mercy. She had more Valour in her then was fit for a woman, but that ſhe was a Ruler over men; and more Humility in her then was fit for a Prince, but that ſhe meant to be a Preſident to women. She delighted in nothing ſo much, as in the love of her People, which ſhe procured by ordaining good Magiſtrates, and forbearing Impoſitions. Her way not to need them, was frugality; and her way to have them when ſhe needed them, was liberality. She made Honour in her time the more honourable, by not making it common; and indeed, knowing it to be an influence from her ſelf, ſhe kept it, as her ſelf, a Virgin, and would not proſtitute it to unworthy perſons. She declined being a mother of children, to the end ſhe might be a mother of her Countrey; and indeed, no mother ever loved her children more, then ſhe did her people; and therefore never children loved a mother more, then her people did her. She coveted not ſo much to be an owner of riches, as of rich Subjects; for ſhe thought money did as well in their Coffers, as in her own: and indeed, ſhe ſhe never wanted it, when they had it; and they alwayes had it, when ſhe needed it. Never Prince had a wiſer Counſell then ſhe, yet never Prince needed it leſſe; for ſhe was her ſelf a Counſellor to her Counſell. In ſum, whatſoever may in flattery be ſaid of a wife, juſt, merciſull, religious, and learned Prince, may truely be ſaid of her; in all which, if ever ſhe had an equall, yet ſhe never certainly had a ſuperiour. In playing her game of Fortune, ſhe loved not an after-game; for ſhe liked Preventions, better then Remedies. She was admirable in expreſſing her minde, both by ſpeech and writing: and if collection could be made of her Apophthegms, and extemporall Orations, it would certainly excell any thing extant in that kinde: And for her writing, Sir Henry Savile affirms, That he had ſeen ſome Tranſlations of hers, which far exceeded the Originalls. Never Prince kept greater State with leſſe ſtatelineſſe: Her Penſioners and Guard were alwayes the talleſt and goodlieſt Gentlemen and Yeomen of the Kingdom: her maids of Honour, and other women about her, the faireſt and moſt beautifull Ladies of the Realm; and yet her ſelf a Diana amongſt her Nymphes; inſomuch that a great Lord of France being entertained at Court, and the Queen asking him how he liked her Ladies, made anſwer, It was hard to judge of Stars, in preſence of the Sun.

of her DEATH and BURYALL.

IT was now the yeer 1602, when ſhe feeling ſome Infirmities of Old-Age and Sickneſſe, retired her ſelf at the end of January, to Richmond; at which time, in a ſad Omen, ſhe commanded the Ring to be filed off her finger, wherewith ſhe was ſolemnly at the firſt inaugurated into the Kingdom, and ſince that time had never taken it off, it being grown into the fleſh in ſuch manner, that it could not be drawn off without filing. At the beginning of her ſickneſſe, the Almonds of her Jaws began to ſwell, and her appetite by little and little failed her; withall ſhe gave her ſelf wholly to ſadneſſe and heavineſſe, which ſome imputed to her care for the loſſe of the Earl of Eſſex; others, becauſe ſhe heard, That divers of the Nobility ſought the favour of the King of Scots, adoring him as the Sun riſing, and neglecting her: but howſoever, in March a kinde of benummedneſſe ſeized upon her, with a deep melancholly, ſo as ſhe would ſit ſilently, refrain her meat, and not admit of any conference, but with the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with whom ſhe prayed fervently, till ſuch time as her ſpeech failed her, which failed her a day before ſhe died. She being in this caſe, it was thought fit the Admirall and Secretary ſhould go to her, to know her minde concerning a Succeſſor; to whom ſhe gave this anſwer; My Throne hath been the Throne of Kings, I would not a mean perſon ſhould ſucceed me. The Secretary requeſting her to ſpeak more plainly, I will (ſaid ſhe) have a King ſucceed me; and what King, but the King of Scots, my neereſt Kinſman? After this, the Arch-biſhop exhorting her to think of God, That do I (ſaid ſhe) nor do my thoughts ever wander from him. And when her tongue no longer ſerved her, it was evident by the lifting up of her hands and eyes, that her thoughts were fixed upon him. And ſo on the four and twentieth day of March, being the laſt day of the yeer 1602, ſhe yeelded up her ſoul to God, when ſhe had lived threeſcore and nine yeers, ſix months, and ſeventeen dayes; Raigned four and forty yeers, four months, and ſeven dayes. Her Body was embalmed, wrapped in Lead, and brought to White-hall, from whence on the eight and twentieth of April following, in great ſolemnity, it was carried into the Collegiate Church of S. Peters at Weſtminſter, and there interred in the Vault of her Grand-father, K. Henry the ſeventh, in his magnificent Chappell, where our renowned Soveraign K. James hath built her a Princely Monument, inſcribed with Epitaphs to her eternall glory. At her Funerall were ſaid to be Mourners in black, to the number of one thouſand and ſix hundred perſons.

THE Ocean is not more boundleſſe, then the number of men of note in her time; but though all of them cannot be reckoned, yet ſome of them muſt not be omitted. And to begin with Sateſ-men: An exquiſite Stateſ-man for his own ends, was Robert Earl of Leiceſter; and for his Countries good, Sir William Cecill, Lord Burleigh; as alſo Sir Francis Walſingham, that great underminer of Conſpirators. Famous Sea-men, were the Earl of Cumberland, the Lord Thomas Howard, afterward Earl of Suffolk: and of meaner Rank, Sir John Hawkins, Sir Martin Forbiſher, Sir Walter Raleigh, Cavendiſh, Preſton, Ryman; and, to name the worthieſt laſt, Sir Francis Drake, who though he were but a ſhort ſquare bodied man, yet his great Acts have made the Spaniards believe that he was ſome goodly Perſonage. Great Commanders by Land, were Robert Earl of Eſſex, the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Grey of Wilton, Sir Francis Vere, Sir Roger Williams, Baskervile, Savage; and the Honour of his Family, and our Engliſh Nation, Sir John Norris. Learned Gentlemen and Writers, were Sir Thomas Chaloner, employed by Queen Elizabeth as her Ligier in Spain, who wrote five books of the reſtoring of the Engliſh Common-wealth, in elegant Verſes, while (as he ſaid) he lived in a Stove in Winter, and in a Barn in Summer: Roger Askam, born in York-ſhire, notably skilfull in the Greek and Latin Tongues, who had ſometime been School-maſter to Queen Elizabeth, and her Secretary for the Latin Tongue; but taking too great delight in Gaming and Cock-fighting, he both lived and died in mean eſtate, yet left behinde him ſundry Monuments of Wit and Induſtry. Sir Thomas Smith, born at Saffron Walden in Eſſex, ſometime Secretary to K. Edward the 6, who wrote an imperfect Work of the Engliſh Common-wealth, a ſingular Book of the Orthography of the Engliſh Tongue, and another of the Pronunciation of the Greek; the firſt man that ſet on foot the Law for ſerving the Colledges with Proviſion. Sir Henry Savill, Provoſt of Eaton, and Reader to Queen Elizabeth, who ſet forth all S. Chryſoſtomes works in Greek, and by tranſlating of Cornelius Tacitus, deſerved as much of the Engliſh Tongue, as he of the Latin: But above all, the admirable ſir Philip Sidney, who by writing in a light Argument, ſhewed how excellently, and beyond all compariſon he could have done in a grave. Learned Divines were John Jewell, born in Devon-ſhire, a Student in Corpus Chriſti Colledge in Oxford, in Queen Maries time an Exile, by Queen Elizabeth made Biſhop of Salisbury, who wrote an Apologie for the Proteſtant Doctrine, and died at ſcarce fifty yeers of age, in the fourteenth yeer of Queen Elizabeth. John Whitaker, Maſter of S. Johns Colledge in Cambridge, who learnedly anſwered all the books of Bellarmine. Bilſon, Biſhop of Wincheſter, ſometimes Fellow of New Colledge in Oxford, who, amongſt his other learned Works, hath written notably of Chriſts deſcent into hell. Richard Hooker, Preacher at the Temple, who with too much meekneſſe ſmoothered his great Learning, yet hath ſomething diſcovered it in his five Books of Eccleſiaſticall Diſcipline, and died in the yeer 1599. Alexander Nowel, Dean of Pauls, who forbearing deeper Works, ſet forth a Catechiſm, according to the Doctrine of the Engliſh Church, and died in the yeer 1602. After ſuch men, it might be thought ridiculous to ſpeak of Stage Players; but ſeeing excellency in the meaneſt things deſerves remembring, and Boſcius the Comedian is recorded in Hiſtory with ſuch commendation, it may be allowed us to do the like with ſome of our Nation. Richard Bourbidge, and Edward Allen, two ſuch Actors, as no age muſt ever look to ſee the like: and, to make their Comedies compleat, Richard Tarleton, who for the Part called the Clowns Part, never had his match, never will have. For Writers of Playes, and ſuch as had been Players themſelves, William Shakeſpeare, and Benjamin Johnſon, have ſpecially left their Names recommended to poſterity.

THE RAIGNE OF King Iames.

IAMES the fourth King of Scotland, marryed Margaret eldeſt daughter of Henry the 7 K. of England, by whom he had Iames the 5, who had one only child Mary Q. of Scots, who had one only ſon Iames the 6, who from Iames the fourth had undoubted right to the Kingdome of Scotland, and from Margaret, King Henry the 7 eldeſt daughter (the male line being cleane extinct) unqueſtionable title to the Crown of England: whereupon Q. Eliz. being dead about 10 a clock in the morning, K. Iames the 6, K. of Scotland was the very ſame day (M. Secretary Cecill himſelf reading his Title, and Q. Eliz. Will) proclaimed K. of Eng. Scot. and Ireland, by ſound of Trumpet, firſt at White-Hall, and then in Cheapſide, in preſence of all the Lords and the Counſell, and other of the Nobility, with a generall acclamation of all ſorts of people, that we may truly ſay, ſorrow was never more deceived than at this time; for where upon the death of Q. Eliz. it was expected there would be nothing for a long time but ſorrowing and lamenting. Now that very ſorrow was ſwallowed up of joy, her death bringing with it no other alteration but only of ſex, in all other points in a manner the ſame, the like wiſdome, the like learning, the like Iuſtice, the like religiouſneſſe in them both: only bettered in this, that we changed a Q. of 70 years old, whom we could not look to keepe long, for a K. of 36, whom we might well hope to enjoy many years.

Q. Eliz. was not ſooner dead, but Sir Robert Cary a younger ſon of the Late L. Hunſdon, poſted away unſent, to K. Iames in Scotland, informing him of the accident: for bringing which news, the K. afterwards rewarded him with making him a Baron of the Realm, and L. of Leppington. But though it were ſufficient for the K. information that he heard the news by Sir Robert Carye; yet it was not ſufficient for the Lords of the Counſell in diſcharge of their duty, if he heard it not from them, and therefore within a very few dayes, as ſoon as they could provide fit men, they ſent firſt Sir Charles Percy and Mr. Thomas Somerſet, and after them Sir Thomas Lake Clerk of the Signet, a man well acquainted with the State of the Kingdome, both to acquaint him with the generall applauſe of all the Realme, to receive him for their Soveraigne, and alſo informe him in what termes the State of the Kingdom ſtood, that ſo he might not come altogether a ſtranger when he came into it.

Q. Elizabeth indeed had left him not only a Kingdom, but a Kingdom without incombrance; No wars abroad, no ſedition at home, and not only ſo, but a kingdom furniſhed with all the fruits of Peace, plenty of all things neceſſary, and of all neceſſary things: the chiefeſt a wiſe Couſell, for ſhe left Sir Thomas Egerton L. Chanſelor, Thomas L. Buckhurſt, L. Treaſurer: Charles E. of Nottingham, L. Admiral & Sir Rob. Cecill principall Secretary. Foure ſuch men that the meaneſt of them were ſufficient to ſit at the Helme of any Kingdom. Yet to theſe and and diverse other beſides (all whom the K. now by his letters authorizeth to exercise their ſeverall places, as formerly they had done) he addeth certaine new ones of his own chooſing, as namely the E. of Northumberland, and Cumberland, the L. Tho. Howard, and then after the L. Henry Howard, the one the brother, the other the ſon of the late D. of Norfolk, who had ſuffered ſo much, that at laſt, he ſuffered for the Q. his mother. But although the calling of theſe two laſt to ſuch place, was done (no doubt) out of favour to that houſe; yet one of them being known, the other doubted to be a Papiſt, it was preſently apprehended, as a favour to that ſide; and the Catholicks were not a little confident of his good inclination to them all in generall. And it was indeed but neceſſary they ſhould at this time have ſuch a conceit, for in the late Q. ſickneſs, a little before her death, Pope Clement the 8, had written two Brieves to the Catholicks in England, to admit of none to ſucceed in the Kingdom, when that miſerable woman ſhould happen to dye (ſo he pleaſed to ſtile the moſt glorious Q. that ever lived) but ſuch a one, of whoſe good inclination to the See of Rome, they ſhould at leaſt be well perſwaded. And now K. James having ſetled the Government of his Kingdom of Scotland, and made convenient preparation for his journey: on the 5 of Aprill 1603, he ſet forward, and rode that day from Edinburgh to Dunglaſſe, and from thence the next day to Berwick; who having ſtayed two days, the 8 of Aprill he rode to Withurington, a houſe of Sir Robert Caries, from thence the 9 to Newcaſtle, where he ſtayed Sunday and heard the Biſh. of Durham preach, and ſo joyfull were the Townſmen of his being there, that all the time of his ſtay they bore the charge of his houſhold. The 13 of Aprill he ſet forward to Durham, and from thence the 14 to Waltworth, the 15 towards York, where his traine encreaſed to ſuch a multitude, that he was faine to publiſh an inhibition of the peoples reſort, and flocking to him. At York it was a queſtion to whom it belonged to beare the ſword before the K. in that place, for both the E. of Cumberland claimed it, as hereditary to his Houſe, and the Preſident of the North claimed it as belonging to his place, but it was adjudged to George E. of Cumberland, who accordingly did it. From York the 18 day the K. rode to Grimſton, to a houſe of Sir Edw. Stanhopes, the 19 to Pomfret and ſo to Doncaſter, where he lodged at the ſigne of the Beare and Sun: The 20 of Aprill he rode towards Worſuppe, a houſe of the E. of Shrewſburies, from thence the 21 to Newark upon Trent, where a Cutpurſe being taken in the fact, was by the K. warrant hanged, a moſt unſeaſonable delinquent, who would force the K. to commit Iuſtice at a time when hee intended nothing but mercy, the 22 to Beaver Caſtle, a houſe of the E. of Rutlands, hunting all the way as he rode: From Beaver the 23 to Burleigh, who having ſtayd 2 or 3 days, the 27 he removed to Hitchinbrook, a houſe of Sir Oliver Cromwels, where the heads of the Univerſity of Cambridge met him: From thence he rode towards Royſton, and as he paſſed thorough Godmanchester a Town cloſe by Huntington, the Bayliffes of Town preſented him with 70 Teeme of horſe, all traced to faire new Ploughs, at which the K. wondring, they ſaid, it was their ancient cuſtome ſo to do, when any K. of England paſſed thorough their Town, and by which as being the K. tenants they held their Land. At Royſton he lodged that night at M. Cheſters houſe, at his own charge, which he had not done before, ſince his comming into Eng. The 30 of Aprill he rode to Standon, a houſe of S. Thomas Sadlers, where he ſtayd Sunday, and heard the Biſh. of London preach. The 2 of May he removed to Broſbourne, a houſe of S. Henry Cocks, cofferer to the late Q. and now to the K. where met him the L. Keeper, the L. Treaſurer, the L. Admirall & divers other Lords: The 3 of May he came to Theobalds, a houſe of Sir Robert Cecils; when all the Lords of the late Queenes moſt honorable Privy Counſell; preſented themſelves, and there the Lord Keeper made a grave Oration. At this houſe, the fourth of May, the King made diverſe Noblemen of Scotland, of his Privy Counſell here in England; namely the Duke of Lenox, the Earle of Marre, the Lord Hume, Sir George Hume, Treaſurer of Scotland, S. James Elphingſton his Secretary and

and the Lord of Kinloſſe made afterward Mr. of the Rolles. Saterday the ſeventh of May, he rode towards London, where by the way, the Sheriffe Swynnerton and the Aldermen met him; and by their Oratour Mr. Richard Martin; made him an eloquent Oration; and then he rode on to the Charter-houſe neere Smithfield, a houſe belonging to the Lord Thomas Howard, where he ſtayed foure dayes: and at his departing from thence made the Lord Zouche, and the Lord Burgley, of his privie Counſell. But wee muſt here omit, that from the Kings firſt ſetting forth of Scotland; as hee was in all places received with moſt Royall entertainment and rich preſents; ſo he againe carryed himſelfe moſt affable, and diſtributed his favours in moſt plentious manner: in ſome places, diſcharging all priſoners, but ſuch as lay for Treaſon or murther: but ſpecially in conferring the order of Knighthood, of which ſort the firſt he made, was Mr. John Peyton, ſon to Sir John Peyton, Leiutenant of the Tower. After him divers Scots in ſundry places at Theobalds, eight and twenty; (of which number the compiler of this worke, though the unworthieſt was one;) at Charter-houſe above foureſcore: and not many dayes after, no fewer than at leaſt a hundred, and before the yeare went about, God knowes how many hundreds; that one would wonder what the King would doe with ſo many Milites, having no warre to ward. But it was indeed fit to give a vent to the paſſage of Honour, which during Queene Elizabeths Raigne had been ſo ſtopped, that ſcarce any County of England had Knights enow in it to make a Iury.

Before we goe further, it will not be amiſſe, to ſhew what great men attended King James out of Scotland; as namely the Duke of Lenox, the Earle of Marre, the Lord Hame and many other great Lords: and many other whom he afterward made great Lords, as being in his ſpeciall favour; firſt Sir George Hame, made afterward Earle of Dunbarre: then Sir Thomas Erſkin, made Earle of Kelly; then Sir John Ramſey made Earle of Holderneſſe; (which two laſt had the fortune to come firſt in to his reſcue againſt the Gowries) then Sir James Hay, made afterward Earle of Carlile; and then Sir Richard Preſton made Earle of Kildare in Ireland; but whoſe great fortune by marrying the Heire of that Earledome, was afterward the occaſion of his great misfortune; for comming out of Ireland he was unfortunately caſt away and drowned.

But though King James was now ſafely come himſelfe to London; yet he accounted himſelfe but halfe come, untill his Queene and children were come to him: and therefore there are now appointed to goe to conduct them, of Lords, the Earle of Suſſex, the Earle of Lincolne, the Lord Compton, the Lord Norris, and Sir George Carow Knight, Lord Preſident of Munſter: of Ladies the Counteſſe of Worceſter, the Counteſſe of Kildare, the Lady Anne Herberts daughter to Henry Earle of Pembrooke; the Lords Scroopes Lady, the Lady Rich wife to the Lord Rich, and the Lady Walſingham, one of the late Queenes bedchamber: But although theſe only were appointed to goe, yet many other Lords and great Ladies went of themſelves to attend her Majeſty, as the Counteſſe of Bedford, the Lady Haſtings, the Lady Cecill, the Lady Hatton, the Lady Harington, and divers other: and with this Princely attendance, the Queene with two of her children, namely Prince Henry of the age of nine yeares, and the Lady Elizabeth on the eleventh of June came to Yorke: where reſting themſelves ſome few dayes, on the ſeven and twentieth of June they came to Eaſton in Northamptonſhire, a houſe of Sir George Fermors, where the King met them at dinner: and afterward they rode together to a houſe of Sir John Forteſcue, and ſo to London. The Kings younger ſonne, Charles Duke of Albany came not at this time, as being not three yeeres old, and therefore not thought able to endure ſuch a journey, but the yeare following falling ſick of a feavor, Doctor Atkins one of the Kings Phyſitions was ſent to conduct him, who in ſix weekes cured him of his feavour; and the firſt weeke of October brought him ſafe to Windſor, where the King then lay; for which ſervice he was ſo well rewarded, that together with the gaynes of his ſuit-

all practice; hee grew to a greater wealth then was usuall for Physitions.

King James had distributed the meaner Order of Knighthood very plentifully; now he thinks fit to raise his distributions to a higher degree, and thereupon on the twentieth of May, he made Sir Robert Cecil Baron of Essindon; Sir Robert Sidney Baron of Penshurst; Sir William Knowles Baron of Greyes; and Sir Edward Wooten Baron of Morley: and not long after hee made the Lord Henry Howard Earle of North-Hampton; and Thomas Sackvile Lord Buckhurst, he made Earle of Dorset.

The King had by this time found the love and affection of his own people; but the affection of neighbouring Princes towards him stood yet in suspence, when now to take away that doubt came first in the beginning of June, an Embassador from the Palsgrave of Rhyne; presently after another from the States of Holland and Zeland; another from the Arch-Duke of Austria; another from the King of Spaine; from the Seignory of Venice another; another from the Duke of Florence; and lastly on the eight of June, Monsieur de Rhosny from the King of France: all congratulating his happy comming to the Crowne of England, for entertainment of which Embassadors, and all other that should come after; the King had erected an Office by the name of Master of the Ceremonies, allowing him two hundred pounds a yeer Fee, and the first that had the place was Sir Lewis Lewkenor: a Gentleman, who besides other good parts was very skilfull in the neighbouring languages.

Vpon the seventeenth of May this yeere, were made fourteene Serjeants at Law: whereof eleven had received Writs the last yeare of Queene Elizabeth: namely, Thomas Coventry, Robert Haughton, Lawrence Tanfield, John Crooke, Thomas Foster, Edward Philips, Thomas Harris, James Altham; Henry Hubbard, Augustine Nicholls; and Robert Perker; to whom the King added three new; John Sherley; George Snygge; and Richard Hutton, who all kept their Feast together in the Middle Temple Hall

One would thinke that by this time, all Offences against Queene Elizabeth had been forgotten: but King James more tender of wrongs done to her than to himselfe, would not suffer Valentine Thomas so to escape; who after he had lyen many yeeres prisoner in the Tower, was on the fourth of June arraigned at the Kings Bench-Barre; and for conspiracy against the late Queene and some of her Counsell, was on the seventh of June after six a clock at night, drawne to S^t Thomas Waterings, and there hanged and quartered.

About this time the Honourable Charles Lord Montjoy, returned out of Ireland; bringing alone with him Hugh O Neale, Earle of Teroen; at whose comming to the King, the Lord Montjoy was sworne of the Kings Privie Counsell, and the Earle of Teroen who had beene the cause of so much English bloud shed, was yet pardoned; and Proclamation made, that by all men he should be used with respect and honour.

All this while the King had moved within his own Spheare, and had done nothing out of the Realme; his first Imployment abroad was now in June, to his brother the King of Denmark, to whom he sent in Embassage the Earle of Rutland upon two occasions: the one to be Godfather to his sonne, who was named Christianus, the other to present him with the Order of the Garter, upon the like imployment; soone after, he sent the Lord Spencer to Frederick Duke of Wirtenberg; which Lords, saw the said Princes Invested with the Garter, and after honourable entertainment returned home.

It was now a time that every man might sit under his Vine: and enjoy the happinesse of a peaceable Government: when suddenly like a storme in a faire Somers day, brake forth a Treason of a strange Composition: for where in all Treasons commonly they are all of some one Faction in this, there were people of all sorts; Priests and Laymen, Papists and Protestants, Noblement, Knights and Gentlement; that one would think it should be a well managed Treason, and yet was the shalloweſt that was ever set on foot; so shallow, that it could scarce be be observed, either what the Authors of it ayled, or what it was they would have done. Indeed the great favour which King James at his first comming to the Crown, shewed to the Earle of South-Hampton, was like to breed no good blood in those that were his oposites; and it was said (how true I know not) that as the King had sent to enlarge the Earle of South-Hampton, and apointed him to meet him upon the way: So when he heard of an Intention that the Lord Cobham and Sir Walter Ralegh had to meet him; he sent them word they should spare their labour. But why there it were so or no, it seemes they found some cause of discontentment, and discontentment will never want Complyces; and by this meanes was the composition of this Treason made up, and thereupon were apprehended Henry Lord Cobham, and George Brook his brother, Thomas Lord Grey of Wilton, Sir Walter Ralegh, Sir Griffith Markham, and Sir Edward Parham Knights, Bartholmew Brookesby and Anthony Copley Gentlemen, William Watson and William Clerke Priests: But though they were apprehended in July, yet they come not to their arraignment till November following; for by reason of the sicknesse, which was then hot in London, the Terme was put off till Crastino Martini, and then to be kept at Winchester in Hamp-shire, only the Courts of the Exchecker, Wards, Liveries and the Dutchy of Lancaster were kept in the Kings Mannour at Richmond in the County of Surrey; and so in the fourth of November following, all the foresaid Delinquents were removed from the Tower of London and other Prisons, by strong Guards to Winchester, and there arraigned; whose Indictment was for Conspiring,

1 To kill the King.
2 To raise Rebellion.
3 To alter Religion.
4 To subvert the State.
5 To procure Invasion by Strangers.

Concerning the first Point, it was proved, that the Lord Grey intended to obtaine the levying of two thousand men, for defence of the Low-Countreyes, and with them to seize vpon the King and Prince, and take the Lords of the Counsaile in their chambers. For the other Points, It was proved, that the Lord Cobham and Sir Walter Ralegh, met at S. Martins in the Fields; and there consulted about raising Sedition, mooving Rebellion, altering Religion, subverting the State, and to set up the Lady Arbella. And particularly for the Point of subverting the State: It was proved, that Watson was designed to be Lord Chancellor, George Brooke Lord Treasurer, Sir Griffin Markham Secretary, and the Lord Grey to be Master of the Horse, and Earle Marshall of England, and for effecting of these Treasons, It was proved that Waston the Priest had devised Oaths in writing, by which all parties were bound to keep them secret. And for the last point, It was proved, that Sir Walter Ralegh was appointed to treate with Count Aramberg for six hundred thousand Crowns, and the Lord Cobham to go to the Arch-Duke and to the King of Spaine, to perswade them to assist the Lady Arbella. These things being proved against them, on the dayes in which they were severally Indicted, the most which was replied in mitigation of their fault, was first by Watson, who affirmed it could not be Treason, because the King was not yet Crowned; and then by the Lord Grey, that it was but a verbal matter and never took effect, and therfore could be no Treason, but these assertions being both refuted; they were al (except Sir Edw: Parham, who only was acquitted) on their severall dayes of inditement, found guilty of Treason; and had Iudgement accordingly. The Priests Watson and Clerk were executed at Winchester, the nine and twentieth of November: George Brooke was beheaded the fift of Decemb. but then the hand of Iustice stayed: and this was the course which the K. held in shewing mercy. After the death of the three before named he signed three other warrants for the execution of the late L: Cobham, the Lord

Gray

Grey, and Sir Griffin Markeham, on a certain day then following; but before that day came he privately framed another warrant, written with his own hand to the Sheriffe, (who was then Sir Benjamin Tichburne,) by which he countermanded the former Warrants: and that there might be no notice taken of it: he sent it by Mr. John Gybbe: a Scotch-man: and one utterly unknown to all the company, appointing him to deliver it so, that it might not take effect, til after their severall confessions, and at the very point of their Execution, which was accordingly performed: At which time it was a wonderfull thing to see how the Delinquents falling on their knees, lamented their misdoings, and most of all how they extolled the Kings unspeakable mercy. But though thus pardoned: yet were they carryed back to the Tower, where the L: Grey not long after dyed, and in him was extinct that Barony, which had formerly bronght forth many valourous & worthy men. Sir Griffin Markh[am] after some time was set at liberty & passed beyond sea, wher he lived long after in meane account. The Lord Cobham likewise was afterward discharged of imprisonment, but deprived of his Estate, lived divers years after in great pennury, and in him ended that noble Family, which had flourished in great honor many Ages. Sir Walter Raleigh was kept in the Tower, where to his great honour he spent his time in writing, and had bin a happy man if he had never beene released. But such is our state, that no mans fortune is understood, whether it be good or bad, untill it be discovered by the Event.

But in this meane time many things had passed, for his Majesty having deferred the Feast of St. George untill his being at some of his owne houses: held now the said Feast at Windsor, the second of July where the Prince was installed Knight of the Garter; as also the Duke of Lenox, the Earle of South-Hampton, the Earle of Marre, and the Earle of Pembrooke; and at the same time were elected the King of Denmark, and the Duke of Wirtenberg: though their investing have been spoken off before.

And now was preparation made for the Kings Coronation, and for a preparative unto it, he first restored the Earle of South-Hampton, and then raised in honor these following: Sir Thomas Egerton Lord Chancellour, he made Baron of Ellesmere; Sir William Russell, Baron of Thornaugh, Sir Henry Grey Baron of Grobye, Sir John Peter Baron of Writtle, Sir John Harington, Baron of Exton; Sir Henry Denvers, Baron of Danisey; Sir Thomas Gerard, Baron of Gerads Bromely in the County of Stafford, and Sir Robert Spenser, Baron of Wormeleyton. After this he conferred inferiour Orders; and made Knights, all the Iudges and Serjeants at Law, all Civilians and Clerkes of the Signet: all his Gentlemen Vshers and divers other: and lastly made Knights of the Bathe threescore and two, most of them Noble mens sons, and the rest Gentlemen of speciall worth. These things done, on the five and twentieth of July being St. Iames day; the King and Queen were together crowned, and anoynted at Westminster by the hands of John Whitegift Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, in presence of the Nobility and other, namely Sir Robert Lee Lord Major of London, in a gowne of Crymson Velvet, his brethren the Aldermen in gownes of Scarlet, and twelve principall Citizens admitted to attend on them: all other Citizens stayed from passing thither, either by water or by Land, by reson of the sicknesse; and the first of August following, all suitors were by Proclamation forbidden to repayre to the Court till the winter following.

At this time the King forgot not a deliverance he had formerly had, which though it were had in Scotland, yet he would have notice of it taken in England, which was his deliverance from the conspiracy of the Gowries, on the fift day of August three yeares before, and thereupon Friday being the fift of August was by commandement appointed to be kept Holy day, with Morning Prayer, Sermons, and Evening Prayer that day, and Bonfires at night which was then; and after during his life solemnely observed.

King Iames had in him as it were two Persons; one as he was King of Scotland; and in this he was in perfect amitie with the King of Spaine, another as he was King of

of England, and in this he had some difference with Spaine; but he, as Rex pacificus, tooke the best from both, and was altogether for the Olive branch, and thereupon when at his comming into England, he found letters of Mart granted against Spaniards: he first caused them all to be called in, and then consented to a Treaty of perfit reconcilment: In which Treaty handled at London, the 18 of August 1604: The Commissioners for the King of England were Thomas Earle of Dorset, Charles Earle of Nottingham, Charles Earle of Devonshire, Henry Earle of North-Hampton and Robert Viscount Cranbourne: For the King of Spaine, John de Velasco Constable of Castile. John de Tasis Earle of Villa Mediana, and Alexander Robidius Professor of the Law in the Colledge of Millaine: For the Archdukes, Charles Count of Aramberg, John Richardot President of the Privy Counsaile, and Lodowick Verreikin principall Secretary: by whom a Peace being concluded and contained in many Articles. The Somer following, the King of Spaine sent Don John de Velesco Constable of Castile and Duke of Frias, also Pedraca de la Sierra, his great Chamberlaine: accompagnied with diverse Marquises, Earles and Barons, who comming into England, were by the Earle of Devonshire on the nineteenth of August brought to the Court, where the King in his Chappell in the presence of the Commissioners and other English Lords, (the Duke of Frias holding the Kings hands between his) tooke his Oath upon the holy Bible, religiously to observe and keep all the Articles of the Peace and League agreed upon, and in March following, being now the third yeare of King Iames, Charles Earle of Nottingham, Lord high Admirall of England was sent into Spaine to take in like manner the King of Spaine's Oath: who accompanied with three Barons, and many Knights, Gentlemen and other, to the number of six hundred and fifty, the fifteenth of April arrived at Graine, from whence he was conducted to Valledolid, three hundred miles off, where the King of Spaine then kept his Court, entertained in all places as he passed, at the King of Spaine's charge, with so great provisions and such demonstration of love and gladnesse: that it plainly shewed the Spaniards were as glad of our friendship as we of theirs. The Lord Embassadour being come to Court: He caused Thomas Knoll Esquire, to deliver the presents sent from the King of England, which were six goodly Horses, with saddles and saddle cloaths very richly imbrodered, whereof three for the King, and three for the Queen: two crosse-bows with sheafes of arrows: foure fowling pieces, inlaid with plates of Gold: and a couple of Lyme hounds, of singular qualities: which the King and Queen in very kind manner accepted, and then on the thirtyth of May, the Lord Embassadour being sent for, the King came forth into a large room: where having a little Table set before him, and a Bible very reverently laid upon it, together with a Crucifix: The Archbishop of Toledo read the Oath, at the reading whereof, the Lord Embassadour held the Kings hands between his and the King kneeling down, layd his hands upon the Book, and after his Oath, subscribed to the Articles formerly concluded. Whilst the E. of Nothingham was thus imployed in Spaine, the right honorable Edward Earle of Hartford, was likewise sent Embassador to Albertus and Isabella, Archdukes of Austria, to take their Oaths, for confirmation of the said Articles of Peace, which were taken at Bruxell the first of May with great State and solemnity: After which, as the Earle bestowed on the Archduks servants, to the full summe of three thousand pounds, So the Archduke at his departy, bestowed upon the Earle, a Iewell worth nine hundred pounds, and a suite of Arras worth three hundred, and bore his charges all the time of his stay at Bruxels. And now was King Iames, truly Rex Pacificus, Peece and amity with all Princes of Christendome, which few of his Auncestors ever were

A little before this, in the Month of August, in the yeare 1604, the strong Town of Ostend in Flanders, after above three years siege, and the slaughter of a hundred and tweenty thousand men of both sides, and in defence whereof, Sir

Francis

Francis Vere Generall, and his brother Sir Horatio Vere had shewed great Valour, was by the Marquis Spinola taken; for which Service, the King of Spaine made him Duke of Santa Severina, and Lord Generall of all his Forces in the Low-Countryes.

It was now the third yeare of King James his Reigne, when he kept Saint Georges Feast at Grenwich, and there made two new Knights of the Garter; namely, the High and Mighty Prince Duke Ulrick, heire of Norway, and brother to our gracious Queen Anne: and the right Noble Lord Henry Howard, Earle of North-Hampton. And upon the Saturday following, in the Hall at Grenwich, being richly hanged with Arras, he created three Earles, one Viscount and foure Barons: namely, Sir Robert Cecil Viscount Cranbourne, he created Earle of Salisbury: Thomas Cecil, Lord Burley his eldest brother, he created Earle of Exceter, and Sir Philipe Herbert, yonger brother to the Earle of Pembrooke, he created Earle of Montgomery: then Robert Sidney Baron of Penshurst, Lord Chamberlaine to the Queen, he created Viscount Liste: Sir John Stanhope, Vicechamberlaine to the King, he made Lord Stanhope of Harington: Sir George Carew Vicechamberlaine to the Queen, he made Lord Carew of Clopton: Master Thomas Arundell of Devonshire, he made Lord Arundell of Wardez: and Master William Cavendish, he made Lord Cavendish of Hardwick.

About this time a strange fancy possessed the braines of a professed Physition, one Richard Haidock of new Colledge in Oxford, who pretended to preach at night in his sleep, in such sort, that though he were called aloud or stirred and pull'd by the hands or feet, yet would make no shew of either hearing or feeling: And this he did often, in the presence of many honorable persons, that came to heare him; so as within a short time, his fame was spread thorough the land, by the name of the sleeping Preacher. At length the King commanded him to be brought to the Court, where his Majesty sate up the most part of a night to attend the event: when at last, Haidock making a shew to bee a sleepe, began to Pray; then taking a Text, made his Division; applying it to his purpose, for in his Preaching his use was to Inveight against the Pope, against the Crosse in Baptism and against the last Canons of the Church of England; and having ended his Sermon seemed to continue sleeping. His Majesty having well observed the manner of his cariage; after a few days, called the said Haidock before him, and in Conference with him (as he had indeed an admirable sagacity in discovering of Fictions) made him confesse, that all he did was but imposture: and thereupon to fall upon his knees, and aske forgivenesse, which the King granted, upon condition, that in all places he should openly acknowledge his offence; because many were brought into beliefe, that his nightly preaching was either by inspiration or by vision.

We may not here think it unworthy the relating, seeing King James thought it not unworthy the seeing, thereby to observe the nature of the Lyon, and made a solemne matter of it: for on Munday the 3 of June (taking with him the Duke of Lenox, and diverse Earles and Lords) he went to the Lyons Tower and caused two Lyons a male and a female, to bee put forth, and then a live Cock to bee cast before them; which they (as being their naturall ennemy) presently killed and sucked his bloud. Then a live Lambe to bee put downe to them, which the generous Lyons (as having respect to its Innocency) never offered to touch, though the Lamb was so bold to go close unto them. Then the King caused those Lyons to be taken away and another Lyon to be put forth, and two Mastifs to be put into him, who presently flew upon the Lyon and turned him upon his back, and though the Lyon were superior to them in strength, yet it seemes they were his matches in courage and so much superior, as that they were the first assailants, with whom otherwise, perhaps the Lyon would not have offered to meddle.

On Friday the 4 of January in the Kings second yeare, Charles Duke of Albany the the Kings second son being then but 4 yeares old, was created Duke of Yorke; which, because it was done with extraordinary solemnity, is not unworthy to have the manner of it, here related. First were appointed Knights of the Bathe, the Duke of Albany himselfe, then the Lord Willowby, the Lord Chandois, the Lord Compton, the Lord Norris, William Cecill, sonne and heire to the Viscount Cranbourne, Allan Percy, brother to the E. of Northumberland, Thomas Somerset second son to the Earle of Worcester, Francis Manners brother to the Earle of Rutland, Thomas Howard second son to the Earle of Suffolk, and John Harington son and heire to the Lord Harington, the Earles of Oxford and Essex were Esquires to the Duke of Albany; all the Knights tooke their lodging that night in the first Gate-house going to Kings street, where they supped, and had Bathes provided for them. The next morning being Saturday, they went out into the Parke in their Hermits weeds, the Minstrels playing and the Herauldes going before them into the Court, and so into the Chappel, where every Knight with his Squires went to the Altar, and there offered (the Deane of the Chappell, in a rich Cope, holding the Bason. After this they went up into their lodgings, and there new attired themselves in robes of Crimsin Taffaty, with hats and white feathers, and so went back to the great Chamber: where by the King they were girded with the sword, and had gilt spurs put upon them. This done, they were solemnly served at dinner, and after went again to the Chappell, and there offered their swords. The next day being Sunday and Twelfe day in robes of purple Sattin, with Doctors hoods on their shoulders and hats with white feathers, they issued out of the Revestry, with the Duke of Albany (being then to be made Duke of York) into the Hall, where the King sate under the cloath of Estate, and then the Herauldes going before, the Knights of the Bath followed, and then the Earle of Suffolk, Lord Chamberlain came alone, then followed Henry Howard Earle of North-Hampton and Charles Blunt Earle of Devonshire, carrying the robes of Estate, for the Duke of York, after whom Wriothsley Earle of Southampton carried the Coronet, George Clifford Earle of Cumberland, the Golden Rod, the Earle of Worcester the Cappe of Estate, and the Earle of Nottingham bore the Duke of Albany in his Armes, supported by the Earles of Dorset and Northumberland, who all comming in this order before the King; the Duke of Albany was after the Patent read Created Duke of York, with the Robes and Coronet put on him and the Golden Rod, delivered into his hand: all which performed, they went to dinner, and the solemnity ended.

About this time on the fifteenth of June, Thomas Dowglas a Scotch-man, was committed to the Tower and had Irons put upon him, being sent hither, but three dayes before, from the Count Palatine of the Rhyne. His offence was, that he had counterfetted the Kings Privy Seale to divers Princes of Germany; One to the Archbishop of Cullen, another to the Archbishop of Tryer, another to the Duke of Cleve, another to the Archbishop of Moguntia, and a fifth to the Count Palatine of the Rhyne; whereof being examined and convicted; he was drawn on a hurdle into Smithfield, and there hanged and quartered:

And now was a second Parliament appointed to be held at Westminster, on the nineteenth of March following, when foure dayes before the day of sitting, The King, the Queen and Prince rode solemnly in great state thorough the City of London, where in diverse places were erected Pageants: Presents given, Orations made and all demonstrations of love and observance; and then the Parliament begioning, the King made a long and loving Speech to the House, wherein he signified the causes of his calling it; but in the time, when it should have proceeded, there was suddenly discovered a Plot of Treason (so damnable and foule, that posterity will hardly thinke it true, when they shall heare it) the Plot was, to blow up with Gun-powder, both Houses of Parliament at a time, when the King, Prince and all the Nobility should be sitting in the upper House, and all the Knights and Burgesses in the Lower.

The principall contriver of this Plot was Robert Catesbie, a Gentleman of great account in Northampton-shire, descended from that Catesby who had been a speciall Counseller of King Richard the third, to whose family the Divine Providence had now ordained to give a disastrous period. This Catesby not able to performe the worke himselfe alone, drawes in many to assist him, as namely, Thomas Percie, Thomas Winter, John Grant, Ambrose Rookwood, John Wright, Francis Tresham, Guido Fawkes, and at last Sir Edward Digby, all earnest Papists, and all bound by Oath, and by receiving the Sacrament to be secret; For effecting of this plot, they hired a house close adjoyning to the Vpper house of Parliament, where they were to dig thorow a Wall, for the fit placing of their Powder. About Candlemasse they had wrought the Wall halfe thorow: when suddainly they heard a noyse in the next room which made them feare they had beene discovered: but sending Guy Fawkes (who went now under the name of John Johnson, as Master Percies man) to see what the matter was, he brought word, that it was a Cellar where Sea-Coles had beene layd, and were now a selling, and the roome offered to bee let for a yearely rent. This roome therefore as most fit for their purpose, being right under the Parliament House, Master Percie presently went and hired, laying into it twenty barrells of powder, which they covered with Billets and Faggots, for being discovered. Thus the first part of the plot was put in a good readinesse. It now remained to consider what was to be done, when the blow should be given: for though the King and Prince might be slain, yet the Duke of York, and the Lady Elizabeth should still be safe, and so they should bee no nearer their end than now they were. This work therefore for surprizing the D. of Yorke, Percie undertook, and for surprizing the Lady Elizabeth, they agreed upon a match of hunting neare to Dunchurch, under colour whereof they would draw company together, and surprize her at the Lord Haringtons house in Warwick-shire, where she then lay, and then proclaime her Queen, and so be sure to have all things done, as they would themselves. Thus farre their bloudy plot went fairely on, and had perhaps gone on so still, if they had continued onely bloudy; but now a tendernesse of heart tooke some of them, lest their friends should perish together with the rest, and this tendernesse overthrowes them: for to prevent such promiscuous slaughter, a Letter was framed, and sent to the Lord Mounteagle, sonne and heire to the Lord Morley, brought him by one of his Foot-men, which hee received from an unknowne man in the street. The Letter was this. My Lord, out of the Love I beare to some of your friends, I have a care of your preservation; therefore I would wish you, as you tender your life, to forbeare your attendance at this Parliament; for God and man have concurred to punish the wickednesse of this time: And thinke not slightly of this Advertisement: for though there bee no appearance of any stirre; yet I say, they shall receive a terrible blow this Parliament, and yet shall not see who hurts them. This Councell is not to be contemned, because it may doe you good, and can doe you no harme; for the danger is past, as soone as you have burnt this Letter; and I hope you will make good use of it.

My Lord having read the Letter, though much perplexed, yet went presently to the Court at White-hall, (the King being then a hunting at Royston) and delivered it to the Earle of Salisburie, principall Secretary of State, and the Earle having read it, acquainted first the Lord Chamberlaine with it, and then the Lord Admirall, the Earle of Worcester and Northampton, who as soon as the King was returned from Hunting, acquainted him with it: the Earle of Salisburie telling him, that he thought it must be written either by a foole, or by a madman, because of those words, (for the danger is past as soone as you have burnt this Letter) for if the danger were so soone past, what needed any warning? But the King considering it more deeply, apprehended presently some violent, sodaine; and that it must be some suddaine danger by blowing up with powder; and thereupon commanded, that diligent search should be made in the Parliament house, and all other roomes and lodgings there adjoyning: which search was made by the Lord Chamberlaine, accompanied with the Lord Mounteagle, who entring the Cellar under the upper roome, found there great store of Faggots and Billets; which was answered to be for Mr. Percie's owne provision: but then (it being considered why such store should be laid in for Mr. Percie, who used to make but little stay in Towne) and thereupon more diligent search being made, there was found under the Billets one of the Barrells of powder; and after that all the rest, being six and thirty; together with other instruments fit for their purpose, and then spying the said Fawkes to stand suspitiously, they apprehended him, and found in his pocket a peece of Touch-wood, a Tynder boxe to light the Touch-wood, and a Watch, which Mr. Percie had bought the day before, to trie the short and long burning of the Touch-wood, which he had prepared to give fire to the traine of powder. The plot being thus discovered, yet the most of the confederates met at Dunchurch, as they had agreed; where they divulged many detestable untruths against the King and State: signifying withall, that they were there met for advancement of the Catholike cause; hoping thereby to have drawne many to joyne with them in their Rebellion: but this availed them nothing: for first Sir Richard Verney high Sheriffe of Warwick-shire chased them from thence; and then Sir Richard Wellh, Sheriff of Worcestershire, knowing them to be entred into Master Littleton's house at Walbach, beset them round, where Catesbie and Percie issuing forth, were both slaine with one shot of a Musquet; and after them, both the Wrights, John and Christopher were likewise slaine outright; Thomas Winter was taken alive: all which time, Francis Tresham remained still about the Court, offering his service for their suppression: but being suspected, was examined, and sent to the Tower, where he confest all, and within a few dayes after dyed of the Strangurie. On the seven and twentieth of Januarie following, a Commission was directed to divers Lords and Iudges of both Benches, for tryall of the rest of the Confederates: namely, of Thomas Winter, Guydo Fawkes, Robert Keyes, Thomas Bates, Robert Winter, late of Hoodington in Warwick-shire Esquire, John Graunt, late of Yorthbrook, in the Countie of Warwick Esquire, Ambrose Rookwood, late of Staningfield in Suffolk Esquire, Sir Edward Digby, late of Gothurst, in Buckingham-shire, Knight, who were all condemned, and had judgement to dye, and on the thursday following Sir Edward Digbie, Robert Winter, Graunt and Bates, were accordingly drawn, hanged and quartered, at the west end of Pauls Church in London, and on the friday, the other foure; namely, Thomas Winter, Keyes, Rookwood, and Fawkes were executed in the Parliament yard at Westminster. Of all whom, none was so much lamented as Sir Edward Digbie, and indeed worthily; for he was a goodly personage, and of excellent parts, and had it seemes beene cunningly drawne in, and bound to secresie by Oath, when he little thought of any such treason. The seventh of November the Earle of Northumberland, upon suspition of being acquainted with the plots, was first commanded to keep his house, and after a while committed to the Tower. And thus was this great plot discovered, and the Plotters punished, to the great rejoycing of all people: insomuch, that even the King of Spain's and Arch-dukes Embassadors made Bonfires, and threw money amongst the people in token of joy. And at this time, on the fourth of Januarie, the Spanish Embassador delivered a Present to the King from the King his Master: namely six Iennets of Andalusia, with saddles very richly imbroydered, and saddle-cloathes of cloth of Tissue: One of which Iennets was snoe white, and had a Maine which reached to the ground. But this was a Present sent before any knowledge had of the Powder Treason: but as soone as that was knowne, there was presently another Present sent from the Queen of Spain to the Queen of England, of purpose to congratulate the Kings happy deliverance

farree from the intended Powder Treason; and the Present was brought by Don Fohn de Mendoza, which was a Roave of Murrie Sattin, imbroydered all over with Amber leather; and upon the leather, in every seame and skirt twice imbroydered about with gold; the fore-part whereof was set with eight and forty tagges three inches long of beaten gold, hollow within, and filled with Amber-greece; also two large Chaines of Amber-greece; Two Carkanets of Amber-greece, a velvet Cappe with gold Buttons, curiously enammeled, and a girdle suteable to the Buttons; all which were presented together in a large vessell of gold, in forme of a Bason; so as it seemes there was none rejoyced more for the overthrow of this plot for the Catholike cause, than the Catholike King himselfe. And now King Fames, not to be unmindfull to the Lord Monteagle, for being the meanes of discovering this treason, he gave unto him in Fee Farme of Crowne land 200 l. a yeare to him and his heires, and 500 l. a yeare besides, during his life: and not to be unthankfull to God for the deliverance, he caused the fifth of November, being the day of the discovery, to be kept holy, which Prayers and Thanksgiving to God, which was then solemnly performed, and hath beene since, and is likely for ever to be continued.

But in the midst of this great joy, there was suddenly spread a rumour of greater sorrow, for on Saturday the two and twentieth of March, newes was brought to the Court for certaine, that the King was slaine at Oking, twentie miles from London, stabbed with an invenomed knife; whereupon the Court gates were presently shut, and double guard set in all places about London, and all mens mindes were infinitely distracted; but within two houres all these clouds were cleane dispersed, and the Sun began to shine out againe; and it was certainly knowne, that the King was safe, and in perfect health: for which a Proclamation was presently set forth to signifie it to the people; and that afternoone the King came himselfe to White-hall, where thousands of people, ravished with joy, came flocking to see him; and so generall was the rejoycing, that the Spanish Embassador, gave Sir Lewis Lewkner, Mr. of the Ceremonies, a chaine of gold of good value for bringing him the newes: Though afterward it was thought by some, that this rumour was but politickly devised to make the Parliament and people more tender of the Kings safety, and by making them more sensible what a treasure they had of his life, to make them more willing to part with their treasure for his living, as indeed this Parliament they did, giving more Subsidies then are usuall.

The eight and twentieth of March following, Henry Garvet Provinciall of the English Iesuites, was arraigned in Guild-hall, for concealing the forefaid treason, where he had Iudgement to be hang'd, drawne, and quartered, and accordingly on the third of May, was drawne from the Tower to the west end of Pauls Church, and there executed. At his death, he confessed his fault, asked forgivenesse, and exhorted all Catholikes never to attempt any treason against the King or State; as a course which God would never prosper.

On Tuesday the twentieth of May, were enstalled at Windsor Knights of the Garter, Robert Cecill, Earle of Salisburie, and Thomas Howard Viscount Byndon; both of them honourably attended, but the Earle of Salisburie beyond ordinary proportion.

There was yet a Fag end of the late powder treason behind to be examined: whereupon two Barons of the Realms; namely, Henrie Lord Mordant, and Edw. Lord Sturton, were brought from the Tower, to the Star-Chamber: and there, not charged indeed with any poynt of the treason, but onely reflectingly, because they neglected to appeare at the Parliament, according to their summons, for which neglect onely, without any further charge, they were fined to pay to the King, the Lord Mordant ten thousand Marks, and the Lord Sturton six thousand, and to be prisoners during the Kings pleasure. But on the 27. of June Henrie Earle of Northumberland was likewise brought from the Tower to the Starre

Starre Chamber, and more directly charged with circumstances concerning the Treason, specially in regard of Thomas Percie, whom hee had admitted to bee one of the Kings Gentlemen Pentioners, without ministring unto him the Oath of Supremacy, knowing him to be a Recusant; for which, and some misprisions, he was fined to pay to the King thirty thousand pounds, to forfit all his Offices, and to be kept prisoner during the Kings pleasure, as indeed hee continued many yeares, and at last released, was yet confined.

It was now the 4. yeare of King Fames his Reigne, and was a time of Princely visitation; for this Summer, the 17. of July, Christianus King of Denmarke, brother to the Queen, having beene long expected, with eight ships came into the River of Thames, and Anchored before Graves-end; to whom the next day, King Fames, with Prince Henrie, and divers of his Lords went by Barge, and conducted him to London, where he stayed till the twelfth of August following: in which time, he was entertained with all the magnificence that could be devised; the King and he riding in great state thorow the City; where Pageants in many places were erected; and after he had beene shewed the chiefe places about London: as namely, the old Exchange, the Tower, the Monuments at Westminster, and had gone up to the top of Pauls, had beene feasted by the King, by the Earle of Salisburie foure dayes together at Theobalds, had seene Tilting, Fencing, wrastling, and many other pastimes, on the twelfth of August, conducted by the King, the Queen, and Prince, with many other great Lords, he departed to his ships, and in eight dayes arrived at home: A hapy thing when Princes can converse together like private persons, and are not kept asunder with jealousies of State.

After the King of Denmarks departure, on the 23. of September, arrived at London Francis Prince of Vaudemount, third sonne to the Duke of Lorraine, accompanyed with seven Earles, ten Barons, forty Gentlemen of quality, and sixscore common persons; who all the five and twentieth of September went by Coach to the King at Hampton Court, where foureteen dayes together they were feasted and royally entertained, and then returned.

But these Festivalls were follwed with a little disturbance; for in May, the yeare after, great Assemblies were gathered together in Northampton-shire, Warwick-shire, and Leicester-shire, throwing downe Inclosures, at first, without any particular head: but at last rose up a base fellow, called John Reynolds, whom they named Captaine Pouch, becaufe he had a great leather Pouch hanging by his side, who affirmed to the Company, that in that Pouch he had sufficient to defend them against all cummers: but when hee was afterward apprehended, and his Pouch searched, there was nothing found in it but a piece of green Cheese. Proclamation was made, commanding them to surcease their disorder: But this prevailed nothing, till the King sent Henrie Earle of Huntington, Thomas Earle of Exceter, Edward Lord Zouch, and Sir Edward Cooke Lord Chiefe Iustice of England to suppresse them by force of Armes, and to punish the Levellers according to the nature of their offences; some by Death, as for Treason; some by Fines, as for Routs: but Captaine Pouch was made exampler.

On Friday, the twelfth of June, his Majesty attended with divers Lords, dyned with the Lord Major, Sir Iohn Wats, who after dinner presented him with a purse full of Gold, and humbly besought his Majestie, that he would be pleased to bee free of his Company, the Cloath-workers: To which, the KING graciously condiscended; and thereupon called to Sir William Stone, Master of the Company, and said, Stone give me thy hand; and now I am a Cloath-worker: And in token of my speciall favour to this fraternity, I doe here give to this Company a brace of Bucks yearely for ever, against the time of the Election of the Master and Wardens: at which time also many Lords and Gentlemen were made Free of the Cloath-workers.

On

On Thursday the 16 of July, the King and Prince with many Lords, dined at Merchant Taylors-Hall, where the Master and Warden of that Society, presented the King with a Purse of Gold, giving him humble thankes for gracing their Fraternity with his Royall presence; and therewithall shewed him a Roll, wherein were Registred the names of seven Kings, one Queene, 17, Princes, and Dukes, two Dutchesses, one Archbishop, one and thirty Earles, threescore and six Barons, seven Abbots, seven Pryors, with a great number of Knights and Esquires, who had been free of that Company; which His Majesty graciously accepted, but told them, that he himselfe was already free of another Company: but the Prince his son should be free of theirs, and that he would see the Garland put on his head: whereupon the Master presented the Prince also with a purse of Gold, which he graciously accepted, and said, that not only Himselfe would bee free of the Merchant Tailors, but the Lords also that were with him should do the like; all which was performed with great solemnity.

The fourth of July this yeare, Sir Thomas Knevet was called by Writ to the Parliament by the name of Baron of Effrick, the next day Sir Iulius Cæsar, Chancelor of the Exchecker was sworne a Privy Counsellor; and the sixteenth of November following Sir Iervis Clyfton Knight, was called to the Parliament by Writ, by the name and title of Baron of Leyton Bramesfwold, whose only daughter and heire, was soon after married, to Eysme Steward, Baron of Aubigny in France, sole brother of the Duke of Lenox; whom he afterward succeeded in that Dignity.

About this time, Hugh Earle of Tervon, most ungratefully and utterly forgetfull of the Kings great clemency to him, together with Tenrconell: Hugh Baron of Dungannon, and divers other Irish Lords, fled into the parts beyond Sea, with a purpose to solicite forreign Princes against the King, and to offer the Kingdom of Ireland to the Pope, which was presently signified to the Realm by Proclamation.

On the Eleventh of Aprill this year, George Iervis a Seminary Priest, and the three and twentieth of June following: Thomas Garnet a Iesuit, were both executed at Tyburn, Thomas Garnet having the favour offered him to be pardoned, if he would but take the Oath of Allegeance, which he refused.

The nineteenth of Aprill at Whitehall, died Thomas Earle of Dorset Lord Treasurer, whose death (because he dyed suddenly as he sate at the Counsell-Table) was by some untowardly interpreted; but being dead and his head opened, there were found in it certain little bags of water, which whither by the straying of his study the night before, in which he sate up till eleven a clock, or otherwise by their own maturity, suddenly breaking and falling upon his braine, caused his suddain death. So certain it is that death comes not always by determinate steps; but sometimes per saltum, and we all cary about us the causes of suddain death, though unsensible of them till we be unsensible. This Lord was of excellent parts, and in his place exceeding Industrious, and I have heard many Checker men say, there never was a better Treasurer, both for the Kings profit and the good of the subject.

The twentith of May at Windsor, were made two Knights of the Garter, George Earle of Dunbarre, and Philip Earle of Montgomery; but the Earle of Dunbarra, within a yeare or two after left both his honor and his life; but not his life without honour, having been a faithfull servant, and a wise Counsellor to the King, and was honorably Interred in the Church at Westminster.

About this time were many famous English Pirates that stuck not some of them to turne Turks and lived in great state at Tunis, of whom the chiefe were Ward, Bishop, Sir Francis Verney and Gourdale, whom after many depredations and outragious acts at Sea, partly the King of Spaine suppressed, and partly the King of Eng. and 19 of their associates being taken, were hanged at Wapping.

Also at this time, in the Strand on the North side of Durham house, where stood an old long stable: Robert Earle of Salisbury now Lord Treasurer of England, caused to be erected a stately Building; which upon Tuesday the tenth of April, in the yeare 1609, was begun to be richly furnished with wares; and the next day after, the King, the Queene, and Prince, with many great Lords and Ladies came to see it: and then the King gave it the name of Britteines Burse.

On the eight of May this year, the King by Proclamation prohibited all forreine Nations, that after August they should not fish upon any of the Coasts of England, Scotland or Ireland, nor the Isles adjacent, without the speciall Licence from the Commissioners in that behalfe Ordained.

At this time the making of Allum, which heretofore with great charges, had been fetched from forreigne parts, was by diverse that laboured in it, and now lastly by Sir John Burchier, brought to perfection in England, and therupon the King prohibited upon paine of confiscation, any Allum to be brought from beyond the Seas, and took the whole traffick therof to himself.

And now the King according to an ancient custome, had ayde of His Subjects thorough England: for making his eldest sonne Prince Henry Knight, which yet was Levied with great moderation, and the Prince to shew himselfe worthy of it: performed His first Feates of Armes at Barriers, with wonderfull skill and courage: being not yet full sixteene yeares of Age.

It was now the eight yeere of King Iames His Reigne; being the yeare 1610, when Prince Henry being come to the age of seventeen yeares; It was thought fit, He should be Initiated into Royalty: and thereupon the thirtieth of May this yeare, He was Created Prince of Wales in most solemne manner; which was this; Garter King at Armes, bore the Letters Patents; the Earle of Sussex the Robes of Purple Velvet, the Earle of Huntington the Traine, the Earle of Cumberland the Sword, the Earle of Rutland the Ring, the Earle of Darby the Rod, the Earle of Shrewsbury the Cape and Coronet, the Earle of Nottingham and North-Hampton supported the Prince: being in His Surcoate only and bare-headed: and in this manner being conducted to the King, attended on by the Knights of the Bathe, five and twenty in number, all great men, and great mens sons: The Earle of Salisbury principall Secretary, read the Letters Patents: the Prince kneeling all the while before the King: and at the words accustomed, the King put on him, the Robe, the Sword, and all other officers assigned him, belonging to a Princes Court: wherein he shewed himselfe so early ripe for Majesty, that he seemed to be a King, while he was yet but Prince: And all mens eyes began to fix upon him.

King Iames had long since shut up the Gates of Janus, and was in Peace with all Princes abroad; his only care now was how to keep Peace at home; and to this end, the three first dayes of June, in his own person he heard the differences between the Ecclesiasticall and the Temporall Iudges, argued touching Protections out of the Kings Bench and Common-Pleas; to this end, the eight, ninth, & tenth of June, he heard the manifold complaints of the abuses of the Victuallers, & other Officers of his Navy Royall, to this end, the 9 of June, 1610, he once again by Proclamation, commanded all Roman Priests, Seminaries and Iesuits, as being the chiefe Incendiaries of troubles, to depart this Kingdome by the 5 of July next, and not to returne upon pain of severity of the Law: also all Recusants, to returne home to their Dwellings, and not to ramaine in London, not to come within ten miles of the Court, without speciall Licence; after which Proclamation, the Oath of Allegeance was presently ministred to all sorts of people, and their names certified to the Lords of the Counsell, that refused to take it; and this Hee the rather did out of consideration of the bloudy fact, committed lately by one Revillack, upon the person of the renowned K. of France, Henry the fourth, & whereas Queen Elizabeth in her 43 years had granted her Letters Pattents to continue for 15 years, to the East India Merchants, how upon their humble petition, the King was pleased to enlarge their Patents, giving them a charter to continue for ever, enabling them thereby to be a body Corporate and Politick, which so encouraged the Merchants, that they built a ship of twelve hundred tun, the greatest that was ever made in this Kingdome by Merchants; which the King and Prince honored with going to Deptford to see it; and then named it, The Trades encrease: and at this time gave to Sir Thomas Smith, (Governour of that Company) a faire chaine of Gold, with a Iewell, wherein was his Picture. But this great Ship having been in the Read Sea, and returning to Bantam, was there lost and most of her men cast away. But then the King himselfe builded the goodliest Ship of War, that was ever built in England, being of the burthen of 1400 tun, and carrying threescore and foure pieces of great Ordnance, which he gave to his son Prince Henry, who named it after his own dignity, The Prince.

And now whereas a Parliament had been holden this year, and was Prorogued to a certain day; the King perhaps, not finding it to comply with his desingnes, or for some other cause known to himself, on the last day of December, under the great Seale of England, dissolved it.

Before this time, one Sir Robert Carre, a Gentleman of Scotland or of the borders, being a hunting with the King, chanced with a fall off his horse to breake his leg; upon which mischance, he was forced for some days to keep his bed, in which time the King was sometimes pleased to come and visit him: and then it was first perceived that the King had begun to cast an eye of favour upon him: and indeed from that time forward (as he was a very fine Gentleman and very wise) many great favours were heaped upon him: So as on Easter Munday, in the yeare 1611, he was Created Viscount Rochester. On the two and twentieth of Aprill, 1612, was sworne a privy Counsellor. On the fourth of November 1613, was Created Earle of Somerset, and the tenth of July following, made Lord Chamberlaine.

But this Sun-shine of Fortune lasted not long; yet not by any inconstancy in the King, but by the Earles own undeserving, which thus fell out: The Right Honourable Robert Earle of Essex, had before this time married the beautifull Lady Francis Howard, daughter of Thomas Earle of Suffolk, who upon causes judicially heard, were afterward Divorced and left free to marry any other. After which Divorce, this great favorite (the Earle of Somerset) takes her for wife; the King gracing their marriage with all demonstrations of love and favour; and the Lords gracing it with a stately Masque that night, and a few dayes after, the Bride and Bridegroom, accompanied with most of the Nobility of the Kingdome were Feasted at Merchant Taylors Hall, by the Lord Major and Aldermen. But see how soon this faire weather was overcast: For it hapned, that one Sir Thomas Overbery, a very ingenious Gentleman, and the Earles speciall friend, who had written a witty Treatise of a Wife: and it seemes, not thinking the Lady in all points answerable to his ideal description, had been an earnest dissweader of the Match, and to strengthen his disswasion, layd perhaps some unjust imputation upon the Ladyes Fame, which so incensed them both against him; that a lesse revenge could not give them satisfaction, than to take away his life: So true is that saying,

Impotulæ iræ, quid non furor audet pectora cogit?

Vpon

Upon this, they finde pretences to have the said Sir Thomas committed to the Tower, and there by their Instruments effect their revenge: some say by a poysoned Tansey sent him to eat, some by a poysoned Glyster ministred unto him, but howsoever effected it was, for which Fact Sir Jervis Elvis then Lieutenant of the Tower, and three or foure other of inferiour condition were put to death, the Lady and Earle themselves were arraigned and condemned; but thorough the Kings great clemency had their lives spared, but in such a sort spared, as was to them no lesse grievous than death it self, being never after suffered to see the Kings face, nor to come neere his Court.

This Favorite being thus out of favour, there was place made for entertaining another; for indeed King James was of so sociable and loving a nature, that he could not be long well without an Alter idem; a bosome friend with whom to communicate his Internos sensus, and upon whose shoulders he might sometimes lay a burthen, which he was not willing to beare himselfe; and this new friend was Mr. George Villers, a Gentleman of a good House, but a younger brother, but of so delicate a composure of body, and withall of so excellent parts of mind, as if nature had framed him of purpose to be a Kings Favorite. And indeed never any man was partaker of the Royall Influence like to him, made first a Knight, and Gentleman of the Kings Bed-chamber, soone after made a Viscount and Master of the Horse; a while after erected Earle of Buckingham, then Marquis of Buckingham, and made Lord Admirall: Lastly, made Duke of Buckingham, the greatest Title of Honour that a Subject is capable of, and yet his Title not greater than his Power: for all matters of Grace passed from the King by him, and to grace him the more, his Mother (who after his Fathers death) had marryed a younger sonne of the Lord Comptons, was created Countesse of Buckingham, his sister who had marryed a Gentleman of no extraordinary Family: had her husband made Earle of Denbigh, his two brothers were made, one of them Viscount Berbach; the other Earle of Anglesey, besides many other of his friends and kindred highly advanced; For this Lord affected not an advancement that should bee only personall, but rather bee in common to all his Family, and was not of the disposition of some, who like to great Oakes, love to keep all that are neer them underwood; though it be in truth both against Nature and Policy to stand alone, when they would be lesse subject to the violence of windes, if more stood together. And though never any man had juster cause to be envyed than hee, yet never any man was lesse envyed; because though his Honours made him great, yet they made him not swell, but he retained the like temper of affable carriage after his advancement, as he had done before.

But before all these favours were heaped upon him, many other great passages had intervened; for first, after the death of Thomas Earle of Dorset, Robert Earle of Salisbury had beene Lord Treasurer, and after him Thomas Earle of Suffolke. But this Lord, though of a most noble disposition: yet as having had his trayning up another way, seemed lesse ready in discharging the place, and whether for this, or for his Ladies taking too much upon her by his indulgence; the staffe was soone after taken from him; after whom there came in, such a sequence of Treasures as no Age before had ever seene; all wise and able men indeed; but yet in whom the Office seemed an imployment, rather to ennoble the Officer than to enrich the King. For first Sir Henry Montague was taken from the Kings Bench: and on the fourth of December 1620. made Lord Treasurer, and presently upon it Earle of Manchester, and before the yeere went about put off. After whom Sir Lyonell Cranfield, from Master of the Wards was made Lord Treasurer, and shortly after, Earle of Middlesex: and then not only put off, but fined to pay the King fifty thousand pounds: After him Sir James Lee from chiefe Iustice of the Kings Bench was made Lord Treasurer, and soone after Earle of Marleborough; and then having made a good returne of his Place, put it off himselfe. After him Sir Richard Weston, from Chancelour of the Exchequer was made Lord Treasurer, and soone after Earle of Portland: so as within the compasse of little more than foure yeares, foure Treasurers in a row were made foure Earles; enough to make a prescription for all Treasurers hereafter, to clayme a Right of being made Earles, which yet I speake not as derogating from those worthy men. whose memories I reverence, but as observing, Fatague Fortunaque Virum; so rare as that there was never any President of the like.

Also the five and twenteth of June, 1612. the Lord Sanquer a Nobleman of Scotland, having in a private revenge suborned Robert Carlile, to murther Iohn Turner a Master of Fence, thought by his greatnesse to have borne it out; but the King respecting nothing so much as Iustice, would not suffer Nobility to be a shelter for villany, but according to the Law; on the nine and twenteth of June, the said Lord Sanquer having been arraigned and condemned by the name of Robert Creighton Esquire; was before Westminster Hall gate executed, where he dyed very penitent.

About this time, the King in speciall favour for the present Plantation of English Colonies in Virginia, granted a Lottery to be held at the West end of Pauls; whereof one Thomas Sharplys a Taylour of London had the chiefe Prize, which was foure thousand Crownes in faire Plate.

At this time also the Corps of Mary late Queene of Scotland, the Kings Mother was translated from Peterborough, to St. Peters Church in Westminster, and from thence was carryed to the Chappell Royall there, where it was interred in a Royall Tombe, which the King had erected for her.

About this time also Sir Robert Sherley, third sonne of Sir Thomas Sherley of Sussex Knight, who sixteene yeares past had betaken himselfe to travaile: and had served diverse Christian Princes for the space of five yeares; but chiefly Rodolphus the Roman Emperour; who for his service, made him an Earle of the Empire, hee afterward went into Persia, and served the Persian ten yeares, who made him Generall of the Artillery: and held him in so great account, that hee gave him the Lady Teresia in marriage, whose sister was one of the Queens of Persia, after which the Persian imployed him to sundry Princes of Europe; and sent him in speciall Embassage into England to King James, to whom he delivered his Letters, and shewed his Commission, all which signified the Persians great love and affection to his Majesty: with franke offer of free Commerce to all his Highnesse Subjects, thorough all the Persians Dominions: After a yeares stay here, in which time his Lady lay in of a sonne, to whom the Queene was God-Mother, and Prince Henry God-Father; hee left the child here in England, and then with his Lady departed into Persia.

It was now the yeare 1612. and the tenth of King Iames his Raigne, when the Illustrious Prince Frederick Count Palatine of the Rhyne; with whom a Treaty of marriage had been before, with the Lady Elizabeth: on the sixteenth of October arrived at Gravesend; to whom the Duke of Lenox and diverse other Lords were sent by the King, who conducted him to White-Hall, and from thence into the great Banquetting-House, where the King, the Queene, Prince Henry, and the Lady Elizabeth entertained him in all kind manner, and after by Barge conducted him to Essex House, appointed for his lodging. It was many yeares since any Kings Daughter had beene marryed in England; which now happening, and to so Illustrious a Prince, was just cause of Triumph and rejoyceing; but see the misery of Humane Affaires; joy can no sooner be setting forth, but sorrow will be sure to follow her at the heeles, as now indeed it happened: for on the nine and twentieth of October, the Prince Palatine, with all the great Lords of the Kingdome in most joviall manner, dining at Guild-Hall: Prince Henry who was also invited and expected, could not come, being newly fallen exceeding sick of a popular malignant feavour, which raigned that yeare in in most parts of this Land: whereof on the sixth of November, between seven and eight a Clock at night, at his Court of St. James he dyed. But hee being infinitly beloved of the people, and one that had given great hope of proving an Heroick Prince. It caused suspition in many mens heads, that his death was not without violence offered to Nature; some said, by bunches of Grapes given him to eate: some by gloves of a poysoned perfume, given him for a present: but these were but idle rumours and conceits: It seemes the Divine Providence had ordained it should be said of him; Hanc tantum terris ostendent Fata nec ultra esse sinent: whose death would have given a great blow to the happinesse of this Kingdome, if there had not beene another Prince left of a milder spirit perhaps, but so accomplished with all excellent endowments, that there could be no great want of Prince Henrie, as long as there was left Prince Charles. The Corps of Prince Henrie, who dyed at the age of eighteene yeares, eight moneths, and seventeene dayes, was drawne in a Chariot to the Abbey Church at Westminster, and there interred in the Chappell Royall, on the seventh of December following.

This Accident something appealed the generall joy, but yet triumphs went on. Vpon Saint Thomas day, the Palsgrave and Grave Maurice were Elected Knight of the Garter; and the seven and twentieth of December, the Palsgrave was betroathed to the Lady Elizabeth. On Sunday, the seventh of Februarie, the Palsgrave in person was enstalled Knight of the Garter at Windsor, and at the same time was Grave Maurice enstalled by his Deputy, Count Lodowick of Nassaw. On the fourteenth of Februarie, being Shrove-Sunday, and Saint Valentines day, this happy marriage of the Palsgrave with the Lady Elizabeth was solemnized in the Chappell at White-hall: The Bride was led to Church by two Batchellors, her brother Prince Charles, and the Earle of Northampton, Lord Privie Seale: she was attired all in white, having a rich Crowne of Gold upon her head, her haire hanging downe at length, curiously beset with Pearles and precious stones, her Train supported by twelve yong Ladies in white Garments: The King gave her in marriage, the Arch-Bishop of Canterburie married them, the Bishop of Bath and Wells preached the Bridall Sermon: which ended, the Bride was led home by two married men, the Duke of Lenox, and the Earle of Nottingham, Lord Admirall. This marriage was solemnized the first night with a stately Masque of Lords and Ladies: the second night with a magnificent Masque of the Gentlemen of the middle Temple, and Lincolnes Inne: The third night with a sumptuous Masque of the Gentlemen of the Inner Temple, and Graees Inne, provided indeed then, but was not performed till the saturday night following, by reason the concourse of people was so great, it would have hindred the Show. After this, the Lord Major and Aldermen gave the Bride a Chain of Orientall Pearle, valued at two thousand pounds: and now when all things had beene done for honouring their marriage, which either love and observance could device, or Art and Magnificence could performe: On the tenth of April, the Bride-groome with his Bride tooke leave of the King and Queene at Rochester, (who had by Barge conducted them thither) and there taking Ship: On the nine and twentieth of April they arrived at Flushing; from whence the Duke of Lenox, the Earle of Arundell, the Viscount Lisle, and the Lord Harington, waited upon them to their chiefe City of Heydelburgh; in all places as they passed, being received with all State and magnificence: but then on the foureteenth of June, the English Lords returning home, the Lord Harington dyed by the way at Wormes, whose Corps was brought over, and buried in England. And here it will not be amisse, to shew of what extent and largenesse the Palsgrave's Countrie is, because of the iniquity of some, that seeke to disgrace it. It is in length about two hundred English miles, taking the lower and upper Countrie. In the lower hee hath six and twenty walled Townes, besides an infinite number of faire Villages, and two and twenty

houſes of reſidence. In the vpper, not ſo many walled Townes, and houſes, but thoſe that are generally fairer than in the lower, eſpecially Amberg, and New-market.

But it is now time to looke home; in the yeare 1609. the King having care for the quietneſſe of Ireland, had granted to the City of London the preſent poſſeſſion and Plantation in the Province of Ulſter: whereupon afterward in the yeare 1612. they ſent thither about three hundred perſons, of all ſorts of handy-crafts men, chiefely to inhabite the two Cities of London-Derrie and Coleraigne: where they ordained Alderman Cockaine for their firſt Governour. And for the advancing of this, or the like Plantation in Ireland, King Iames about this time began a new Order of Knights, which are called Baronets, becauſe they take place next to Barons younger ſonnes; and hee appoynted certaine Lawes, to make them capable that ſhould be admitted. Firſt that they ſhould maintaine the number of thirty foot ſouldiers in Ireland, for three yeares, after the rate of eight pence a day, and to pay the wages of one whole yeare, upon the paſſing of their Patent: Then that they ſhould bee Gentlemen of Bloud of three Deſcents; and laſtly, ſhould have land of Inheritance, in poſſeſſion or immediate Reverſion, to the value of a thouſand pounds per annum: And to keep the Order from ſwarming, he ſtinted it within the number of onely 200. and as the iſſue ſhould faile, the Order to ceaſe. But he that will look, how wel the end of the Inſtitution, and the Laws of it have bin obſerved ſhall perhaps find it to be here, as it was in the Order of St. Michael in France, into which at firſt, there were none admitted, but Princes and Emminent perſons: but afterward, all ſorts of men, without any difference, were admitted, that it came almoſt to bee doubted, whether the Dignity of the Order did more grace the perſons, or the meaneſſe of the perſons diſgrace the Order: and indeed, when the Lawes of an Inſtitution are not in ſome meaſure obſerved, it ſeemes to make a kind of nullity in the collation.

About this time, on Sunday the 24. of October, an exemplar pennance was impoſed upon Sir Perkſall Brockas Knight, which was to ſtand at Pauls Croſſe in a white ſheet, holding a ſtick in his hand, having been formerly convicted before the high Commiſſioners, for many notorious Adulteries with divers women.

This yeare 1614. in the month of July, Chriſtianus King of Denmark, (out of his love to his ſiſter, and King Iames) came the ſecond time into England, but as being now ſecure of himſelfe, privately, and with a ſmall company, ſo as he came to the Queen at Somerſet houſe unexpected, and before any knowledge was had of his comming; but K. Iames being then in progreſſe in Bedford-ſhire, and hearing of it, came preſently back, and after he had entertained him here, with Hunting, Hawking, running at Ring, Bear-baiting, Plays, Fire-works, and Fencing, on the firſt of Auguſt Prince Charles brought him aboard his Ship, who then took his leave, and returned home.

In Octob. this yeare was a call of Sarjeants at Law, being 11. in number, namely, George Wild, Wil. Towes, Rich. Bawtrie, Henry Finch, Tho. Chamberlain, Francis Moore, Thomas Attow, John Moore, Francis Harvie, Charles Chibbourn, and Tho. Richardſon, and in Trenity Terme before there had two other been called, namely, Sir Randal Crew of Lincolns Inne, and Sir Robert Hitcham of Grayes Inne, Knights.

About this time an Embaſſador came from the young Emperour of Ruſſia to King Iames, deſiring his continuall love and amity, and to be a means of making attonement, between him and the K. of Swethland, and withall preſented him with a rich preſent of Furs: which was no ſmal honour to the K. of great Britain to have ſo great a Potentate as the Emperor of Ruſſia ſolicit him to be his mediator.

Though King Iames out of all naturall goodneſſe was addicted to peace, yet out of providence he neglected not to be prepared for war, and thereupon in the yeare 1610. had granted priviledges to a ſociety called of the Militarie Garden;

Garden; and this year 1614, cauſed a Muſter of men to be preſented before him, which was performed to his great liking, and to the great commendation of the City.

About this time a memorable Act was performed by M. Hug. Middleton, Citizen and Gold-ſmith of London, and borne in Denbigh-ſhire, who having an Act of Parliament for his Warrant, with infinite coſt and indefatigable labour, brought water to the City of London, from the two great ſprings of Chadwell and Amwell in Hartfort-ſhire, having cut a Channell from thence to a place neere Iſlington, whither he conveyed it, to a large Pan, and from thence in pipes of young Elmes to all places of the City: for as the Poeth ſaith: ἄριστον μὲν ὕδωρ.

Nothing is ſo commodious for the life of man, as water.

Another memorable Act was about this time done on the North ſide on Lon. called Moore-fields, which being before invironed with deep ſtinking ditches and noyſome common ſhowers, was now, not only made faire & ſweet, but ſo levelled into walkes and ſet with trees, that it is the pleaſanteſt place of all the City.

The next yeare being 1615, another memorable Act, for the benefit and beauty of the City of London, was performed; for Smith-field, which was before a rude dirty place, was now paved all over, and ſtrong railes ſequeſtring the middle part of it, were ſet up, to make it a faire walking place, and fit for Market or any other uſe.

The Lady Arbella a neare kinſewoman of the Kings, had ſometime before, without the Kings privity, ſecretly married Maſter William Seymour, younger ſon of the Earle of Hartford, now Earle of Hartford himſelfe; for which they were both committed to the Tower: and now this yeare, on the ſeven and twentieth day of Sep. ſhe ended her life there, and was buried in the Chappell Royall at Weſtminſter.

This yeare alſo in July, were Enſtalled Knights of the Garter, Francis Earle of Rutland, Sir George Villers Maſter of the Horſe, and Sir Robert Sidney Viſcount Liſle: and in another kind of Honour, the Earle of Arundell, the Lord Carews, and Doctor Andrews Biſhop of Ely, were ſworne Privie Counſellours.

Wales by the death of Prince Henry, had been a good while without a Prince, and now to ſupply that place, Prince Charles is Created Prince of Wales: In Ioy whereof, the Town of Ludlow in Shropſhire, and the City of London, performed great Triumphs: and the more to honour his Creation: There were made five and twenty Knights of the Bathe; all them Lords or Barons ſons, and yet more to honour it, there were forty ſelected Gentlemen of the Innes of Court, that performed a ſolemne Iuſts at Barries, with great magnificence.

This yeare was a Cenſure of divers great Delinquents, for firſt Sir Edward Cooke, was upon diſpleaſure diſcharged from being Lord Chiefe Juſtice of the Kings Bench; and two dayes after his diſcharge, Sir Henry Montague the Kings Sergeant at Law, was placed in his room: Next to him the Lord Egerton, whyther diſabled by ſickneſſe or age, to exerciſe the place, or upon diſpleaſure alſo, had the Seale taken from him, which was delivered to Sir Francis Bacon the King's Attourney, he made firſt Lord Keeper; and the Lord Egerton dying ſoon after, Lord Chancellour. Not long after him Sir Henry Yelverton the Kings Attourney, for adding new priviledges to the Londoners Charter, without the Kings privity, was in diſpleaſure put from his place; and in his room was placed Sir Thomas Coventry, the Kings Sollicitor. But awhile after, Sir Henry Yelverton, was made a puny Iudge of the Common Pleas; having indeed the reputation of an excellent Lawyer.

And yet this work of Cenſuring ſtayed not here, for much about this time; Thomas Earle of Suffolk Lord Treaſurer of England, had the ſtaffe of his Office taken from him; which was ſoon after delivered to Sir Henry Montague Lord Chiefe

Chiefe Iustice of the Kings Bench. If Sir John Benet, Iudge of the Prerogative Court, had made a little more haste, he mihght have made one in this number of Delinquents: but he came short three or foure yeares; and then being charged by his own servant with brybery, he was put from his place and censured in the Starre-Chamber to pay twenty thousand pounds: and in his roome was placed Sir William Byrde a man of more integrity.

Though King James upon the death of Queene Elizabeth, came to reside in England, yet he forgot not that Scotland was his native Countrey; and therefore after he had spent some yeares in England, to acquaint himselfe with the State of the Kingdome. In March this yeare one thousand six hunderd and sixteenth, he made a Iourney into Scotland: for though he had left very able men to sit at the Helme there in his absence: yet he knew, that as it is the Masters Eye, that makes the Horse fat: So it is the Prince's presence sometimes that keeps out many distempers in a State, that would otherwise creep in; and now, when in his staying six Months there, he had seen all things well setled, both in the Ecclesiasticall State and in the Temporall, and made it appeare, that he resided not in England out of any neglect of Scotland; but to the end, he might be in the place of most conveniency to both Kingdoms: on the fifteenth of September, he returned to London, not more to the griefe of the Scots to leave him, than to the joy of the English to receive him, so much was King James as a just and wise Prince, beloved of both the Nations.

Now comes to be related a matter of speciall observation; Sir Walter Rawleigh had lived a condemned man many yeares in the Tower, and now his Destiny brought him to his end (by liberty) which it could not do by imprisonment, for out of a longing for liberty; he propounded a project to the King, upon which (as he was a well spoken man and of a great capacity) he set such colours of probability; especially guilding it over, with the Gold he would fetch from a Mine in Guyana; and that without any wrong at all to the King of Spaine (if he might be allowed to go the Iourney) that the King, if he gave not credit that he could performe it, at least gave way that he should undertake it: and thereupon with diverse ships, accompanied with many Knights and Gentlemen of quality, he set forward on the Voyage; but when after long search, or shew of search, no such place of Treasure or no such treasure could be found, whether it were, that he thought it a shame, to returne home, with doing nothing: or that his Malus Genius thrust him upon the Designe: He fell upon Saint Thome, a Towne belonging to the King of Spaine: sacked it, pillaged it, and burnt it: and here was the first part of his Tragicall Voyage acted, in the death of his eldest son: the last part was Acted in his own death at his returne. For Gundomore the Spanish Lieger, did so aggravate this fact of his to the King, against him; that it seemed nothing would give satisfaction but Rawleigh's head, without which he doubted there would follow a breach of the League between the two Nations. Rawleigh excused it, by saying that he was urged to it by the Spaniards first assaulting of him; and besides, that he could not come at the Myne, without winning this Town: but Gundomor was too strong an Adversary for him; and the King preferring the publique Peace, before the life of one man, already condamned, gave way to have the Sentence of his former Condemnation executed upon him; and thereupon, brought to the Kings Bench Barre: he was not newly Arraigned or Indicted, as being already Mortuus in Lege, but only hath the former Sentence averred against him, and so carryed to the Gate-house, and from thence the next morning to the Parliament Yard: a Scaffold was there erected, upon which after fourteen yeares reprivall, his head was cut off: at which time, such abundance of bloud issued from his veines, that shewed he had stock of Nature enough left to have continued him many yeares in life: though now above threescore yeares old, if it had not been taken away by the hand of Violence.

And

And this was the end of the great Sir Walter Rawleigh: great sometimes, in the favour of Queene Elizabeth, and next to Drake the great scourge and hate of the Spaniard, who had many things to be commended in his life; but none more, than his constancy at his death, which he tooke with so undaunted a resolution that he might perceive, he had a certaine expectation of a better life after it: so farre he was from holding those Atheisticall opinions; an aspersion whereof some traducing persons had cast upon him.

About this time King James made a progresse to the Vniversity of Cambridge, who delighted with the Disputations and other scholasticall exercises: he stayed three whole dayes, and could have been content to have stayed as many yeares: for next being a King, he was made to be a Scholler.

In the yeare 1619. being the seventeenth yeere of King James his Raigne, that knot of love which above twenty yeares had beene tyed, betweene him and his Queene was by death dissolved; for on Tuesday this yeere the second of March, Queen Anne dyed at Hampton Court, whose Corps was brought to Denmark house, and from thence conveighed to Westminster: wherein the Royall Chappell, with great solemnity it was interred: a Princesse very memorable for her vertue, and not a little for her Fortune, who besides being a Queene, was so happy as to be Mother, of such admired children, as she brought into the World. But the dissolving of this knot cast the King into an extreame sicknesse; and after some recovery, into a Relaps: from which notwithstanding, it pleased God to deliver him, as having yet some great worke to doe.

This yeare on Munday the third of May, one Mr. Williams a Barrister of the Middle Temple, was arraigned at the Kings Bench, for civilling, and for writing Bookes against the King: and upon Wednesday following was hanged and quartered at Charing Crosse.

But an action of another nature was performed this yeare, the seventeenth of July; not unworthy the relating, which was this; that one Bernard Calvert of Andover, rode from St. Georges Church in Southwarke to Dover, from thence passed by Barge to Calice in France, and from thence returned back to Saint Georges Church the same day, setting out about three a clock in the morning, and returned about eight a clock in the Evening, fresh and lustie.

In the yeare 1621. a Parliament was holden at Westminster; wherein two great examples of Iustice were shewed; which for future terrour are not unfit to bee here related: One upon Sir Gyles Montpesson, a Gentleman otherwayes of good parts; but for practising sundry abuses in erecting and setting up new Innes and Alehouses, and exacting great summes of money of people, by pretence of Letters Patents granted to him for that purpose, was sentenced to bee degraded; and disabled to beare any office in the Common-wealth, though he avoyded the execution by flying the Land; but upon Sir Erancis Michell, a Iustice of Peace of Middlesex, and one of his chiefe Agents, the sentence of Degradation was executed: and he made to ride with his face to the horse tayle, thorough the City of London. The other example was of Sir Francis Bacon, Viscount, St. Albans Lord Chancelour of England, who for bribery was put from his place, and committed to the Tower: but after some few dayes enlarged: in whose place Doctor Williams Deane of Westminster was made Lord Keeper.

The Count Palatine, being now strengthned with the allyance of the King of Great Brittaine, was thought a fit man to be King of Bohemia, and accordingly was elected, by the States of that Kingdome, but he was no sooner invested in the Crowne; but the Emperour with great Forces assaulted him in Prague, and not only drove him with his wife and children from thence; but tooke from him also his owne Patrimony the Palatinate: so as though now a King, he was fayne to flye to the States of the Low Countries for a place of residence. King James though he had never given his consent to the Palsegraves taking upon him that Kingdome, as foreseeing in his great judgement what the event will bee; in this distresse, he could not forbeare to take care of his daughter, and thereupon sent Sir Richard Weston the same that was after Lord Treasurer in Embassage to the Emperour to solliçite the restoring of the Palatinate to the Palsegrave; but he returning without successe; the King had then conference with Count Gundomar the King of Spaines Ligier in England, what course might bee taken to procure the restoring it: who made him answere, there could be no better course than to make a marriage, betweene his sonne the Prince of Wales, and the Infant of Spaine, which he said would easily be effected, if the Prince might have leave to make a Iourny into Spaine. King Iames though he considered the inveterate grudges betweene Spaine and England, and as dangerous it might be to put the heire of the Kingdom into the Spaniards hands, yet grounding himself upon the saying: Fide Item si putaveris, facies: and drawne on by the insinuating speeches of Count Gundomar, not perhaps without some Indiction in the Marquis of Buckingham, was contented at last the Prince should goe. And so Prince Charles sending his ships about, and taking along with him only the Marquis of Buckingham (who in the time of his being in Spaine was created Duke of Buckingham) Endymion Porter, and Mr. Francis Cottington: (two that were well acquainted with the Language and affaires of Spaine) he tooke his Iourney by the way of France, went to Paris, and secretly in disguise to the Court there, where he had the sight of that Lady, that might well have stayed him from going further, but yet on he went.

In the meane time Gundomar a cunning man, and one that besides his Masters had ends of his owne, and could play his Game no lesse for his owne profit than his Masters Honour; as he had perswaded the King of the facility of the Match with Spayne, so he perswaded a certainty of it, especially amongst Catholick Ladies, by which meanes he brought no small store of Grists to his owne Mill, receiving from one Lady three hundred pounds to bee made Groome of the Stoole, when the Spanish Princesse should come; of another a good round summe to be made Mother of the Maydes, and of diverse other the like for other places.

But the Prince being arrived in Spayne, was received indeed with all the demonstrations of love and kindnesse that could be devised, so as the charge of his entertainment was said to stand the King of Spayne in nine and forty thousand Duckats; but yet his acquaintance with the Lady was much restrained, for in all the time of his staying in Spayne, which was no lesse than eight moneths, being from February to October) he saw her but very seldome, and that at good distances, never spake with her but twice, and that before company, besides that his speeches were limited, how much and what he should say, farre from any meanes of tying the knot betweene them which was pretended, what the cause should bee was much in obscurity; some thought that a difference betweene the Duke of Buckingham, and the Count Olivares, the King of Spayne's great Favorite was a great hinderance of the proceeding: but other, and more likely that the Spaniard indeed never really intended the Match at all, but had drawne the Prince into Spayne for other Ends: but what those ends were, was no lesse uncertaine; (one thought it was done to hold the Prince in a treaty of marriage with a Daughter of Spayne, till the Daughters of France should bee bestowed, thereby to keepe him from that allyance, but others and more likely, that the King of Spayne entertayned this Treaty with the King of great Britayne, meaning to spinne it out till he had compassed some designes in the Low-Countries, and the Palatinate, at least to make King Iames, most vigilant for those parts.

But when much time had beene spent in protracting, upon pretence of difficulties in obtaining the Popes dispensation, King Iames partly wearied with delay, but chiefely angred with delusion, sent to the Prince, with all speed to returne into England; which the Prince presently signified to the King of of Spaine, and had his leave to depart; but upon promise to continue the treaty of the marriage still. Though it was said, the Prince was gone but a few dayes on his journey, when a Post was sent to have stayed him, if he had been overtaken. But whether it was so or no, it was Gods providence that he came safely to his ships, and in them safely into England; arriving at Portsmouth, where he was beheld of the people, with no lesse gladnesse, than the Sunne after a long Eclipse: and now his safe returning did both justifie King Iames his judgement in suffering him to goe, and the King of Spaines justice, in suffering him to come back: and was cause, that the people began to have a better opinion of the Spanish faith, than they had before. But now it presently brake out, that this match with Spaine could never take effect: for King Iames having received Declarations of the Articles touching the marriage, found many very strict and large for exercise of the Catholike Religion: but none at all for restitution of the Palatinate; which made him so much discontented, that he presently brake off all treaty of the marriage; and signified as much, not onely to the King of Spaine, but to divers other Princes of Christendome: Vpon which breach, two great Points were presently had in consultation: One for preparing forces, for recovering the Palatinate by way of Armes, which could not be done by a way of friendship: and for this purpose, a Councell of warre was called, and a proposition resolved on both of men and money, for undertaking the enterprise: as also a great contribution by way of benevolence was collected; towards which, the compiler of this worke, gave himselfe fifty pounds: as many other farre greater summes, though the collection went not thorow the whole Land; by reason there was hope given of a peaceable reconcilement: so as many that were not over-hasty in their payments escaped without contributing at all. The other point was for providing a fit wife for the Prince, in some other place. It was said, the States of Holland offered a very great portion in marriage to the Prince, if hee would match with some Lady of that Countrie: but matches are made in heaven, and there was a young Lady of France destined to his bed: and for this purpose, the Earle of Carlile, and the Earle of Holland were sent into France, to treat of a marriage with a younger daughter, of the Great Henrie the fourth, King of France deceased, and sister to the present King Lewis; which marriage afterward took effect, but was not accomplished in King Iames his dayes; who dyed soon after the agreement.

It was now the yeare 1623. in which in Michaelmas Terme, there was a Call of fifteene Sarjeants at Law, who kept their Feast in the Middle-Temple Hall.

Some Passages of small moment I confesse are omitted by me, in this Raigne of King Iames, as whereof, for want of knowing the particulars, I dare not venture upon making the Relation: which if some men would have done, the truth of our Chronicles should not have been mingled with so many falsities.

Of his TAXATIONS.

IN his second yeare, in the moneth of September, he sent Privie Seales, to the wealthiest Citizens of London, for monies to bee borrowed of them: and in October following, the customes of Merchandises, both outward and inward were raised, and then were letten out to Farme. In a Parliament holden at Westminster, the third yeare of his Reigne, there were given him three entire Subsidies, and six fifteens by the Temporalty, and by the Clergie foure entire Subsidies. This yeare also Henry Lord Mordant, convicted in the Star-Chamber, Chamber, for divers misprisions, was fined to pay ten thousand Marks, and Edward Lord Sturton for the like offence to pay six thousand Marks, and Henry Earle of Northumberland for offences laid to his charge, to pay thirty thousand pounds, and some yeares after Sir John Bennet, Iudge of the Prerogative Court was fined to pay twenty thousand pounds. In his fourth yeare he repayed threescore thousand pounds to the Citizens of London, which the Londoners had lent to Queen Elizabeth, three yeares before her death; an act by which he got more love, than hee payed money. In his seventh yeare hee had ayd throughout England, for making his eldest Son Prince Henrie Knight: which though levied with great moderation, brought him in great summes of money. In his eighteenth yeare, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, the Temporalty gave him two Subsidies, and the Clergie three: and in another Parliament, in the yeare 1623. the Temporalty gave him three subsidies; and three fifteens, the Clergy foure Subsidies. Besides these Subsidies hee sent abroad many great Privie Seales, and had also a benevolence throughout the Realme: not without some grudging, but without any just cause; for it should have been remembred, that he took it not out of covetousnesse to gather wealth, but out of very necessity to supply wants: For by his imploying many Embassadours in Ordinary, many Extraordinarie, by his necessarie bounty to his followers, and by his charge of keeping severall Courts, none of all which hee could avoyd: His expences were farre greater than any of his Predecessors had ever beene.

Of his Lawes and Ordinances.

THE day of his removing from Charter-house, at his first comming into England, he caused Proclamation to be made, that all Monopolies and Protections should cease; as likewise all oppressions done by Salt-Peeter men, by Purveiers, and Carters. On the 26. of May following hee set forth a Proclamation, restraining all persons under great penalties from killing of Deere, or any kind of Fowle used for Hawking. The seventeenth of May, Proclamation was made against Robberies on the borders: and on the nineteenth of May, another for uniting the people inhabiting about the borders of England and Scotland, to live in love and quietnesse. In this first yeare, in a Parliament then holden, it was Enacted, that neither Arch-bishop, nor Bishop, should Alienate, Grant, or Demise, or in any sort convey, no not to the King himselfe any of the Honours, Lands, Tenements, or Hereditaments, being parcell of the possessions of his Arch-bishop, or Bishoprick: and if any were, it should be utterly voyd, and of no effect, notwithstanding any former Law, Act, or Ordinance to the contrarie. He then also, caused himself by Proclamation to be Entytled King of Great Britaine, that the division of England and Scotland might be no more remembred. In his second yeare, by his Letters Patents he incorporated the Felt-makers of London, by the name of Master, Wardens, and Communalty of the Art or Mysterie of the Felt-makers, granting them divers privileges and liberties, for their good government of their Corporation. In Novem. of his second yeare, were Proclaimed in London certaine new pieces of coyne, both of gold and silver, with the true valuation and weights of them, according to the Mint of both Nations, English and Scottish. In a Parliament holden the 3. year of his Reigne, the Oath of Allegiance was devised and ordained, and soon after ministred to all sorts of people.

This yeare also hee made Proclamation to redresse the misimployment of Lands, or goods given to charitable uses. Also this yeare, he set forth a Proclamation for bearing of Flags in Ships to be in this manner, that from thenceforth all the Subjects of great Britaine should beare in their mayne top, the Red-Crosse, commonly called the Saint Georges Crosse, and the White Crosse, commonly called St. Andrewes Crosse joyned together, and the Subjects of South-Britaine should carry in their Pinnes only the Red-Crosse; they North-Britaine only the White Crosse. In this fourth yeare of the Subjects of North-Britaine only the White Crosse. In this fourth yeare of his Raigne he set forth a Proclamation, commanding all Lectors, Seminary Priests, and Fryers to depart the Realme before the first of August following, and not returne upon paine of death, according to diverse Statutes in that behalfe provided. In his second yeare he had set forth a Proclamation against Inmates and increase of new buildings, which being little regarded: Now in this fourth yeare he renewed the said Proclamation, adding withall that the Foreparts and Windowes of all new buildings should be either of Brick or stone; for disobeying whereof many were called in the Star-chamber, and there fined. In his fifth yeare, he gave order for planting of Mulberry Trees, and breeding of Silke-worme, that England might be a Country as well of silke as Cloath. In his seventh yeare, he instituted the Order of the Baronets, which hath much deged since his institution, and thereby having been devised for the benefit of Ireland, hath caused but little contentment unto England. This yeare also the King himselfe in person came to the Star-chamber, where he had appointed the Iudges to meet, and there, for the better keeping of Coynes of Gold within the Realme, he raised the prizes of them, ordayning the price called the Vnity, which went before but for twenty shillings, to bee currant now for twe and twenty, the double Crowne and all other pieces to encrease in the like proportion. In his fifteenth year, he granted to the Apothecaries of London to be a Corporation for themselves, and their successours for ever, and by Letters Patents made them a Body Politick and corporate. In his time by his appointment a strict decree passed in the Star-chamber against Duells and single Combats, and a strict Law was made in Parliament against stabbing with a dagger or knife, making it to be wilfull Murther.

Affayres of the Church in his time.

THE King as a Religious Prince, desiring nothing so much as to settle Peace in the Church, and hearing of some dissensions of his Divines in points of Religion, in the very first yeare of his Raigne, appointed a Conference to bee holden before himselfe at Hampton Court, to which were called diverse Bishops, Deanes, and Doctors of one side, and of the other, foure eminent Divines, namely, Doctor Reynolds, Doctor Sparkes, Mr. Knewstubbs, and Mr. Chaderton: who all meeting before the King the 14 day of January: the King first signified the cause of his calling them together, and then told them he was there ready to heare, what they could object or say against the present Government of the Church, whereupon Doctor Reynolds being their Foreman, reduced all matters disliked, or questioned to these foure Heads.

1. First that the doctrine of the Church might be preserved in purity, according to Gods Word.
2. That good Pastours might be planted in all Churches to preach the same.
3. That the Church Government might be sincerely administred, according to the Word of God.
4. That the Book of Common Prayer might be fitted to more encrease of Piety.

Out of these Heads, he drew and moved divers points: One that Confirmation might not be by Bishops only, but that every Pastour in his Parish might Confirme, but this was thought to trench too much upon the Iurisdiction of Bishops, and to be a step to bring in a Presbiterian government, which the King much misliked, and the Bishop of Winchester challenged Dr. Reynolds with an Heresie in ancient times, by any other than by Bishops. Another motion of Doctor Reynolds was; That there might be a new Translation of the Bible because the present

...ons were corrupt, and not answerable to the truth of the Originall ... Translations, but especially in the Translation of the 150. Psalm. 28. Vers. wherein is laid Temptation or Obedience, whereas in the Originall it is They meditate Destruction. To this it was agreed, that a new Translation should be made: and accordingly 50. or fifty were performed by the most learned Divines of the Kingdome, one is that which is now used. After many other points moved by Doctor Reynolds, he came at last to Subscription: intreating it might not be exacted, as heretofore, which many good men refused for these reasons. First, because the Apocryphall Books are by the Common Prayer Book appointed to be read: albeit in some of them there are manifold errors, directly repugnant to the Scriptures. To this, the King answered, that so he would not with all Canonicall Books to be read in the Church, unlesse there were one to interpret. So he would with no Apocryphall to be read wherein was any error, but for the other which were clear, and consonant to the Scriptures, he would have them read, seeing there was good use of them to make up the story of the Persecution of the Jewes, but withall he would have the people be taught, they were not to teach a man either to lay violent hands on the dead, or to kill himself. The next scruple against Subscription was, That in the Common Prayer Book it is twice set down Jesus said to his Disciples, where by the Originall Text, in plain He spake to the Pharisees. To which it was answered, that for any thing could be gathered by the place, he might speake as well to the one as to the other; But the King for more plainnesse sake, willed, that the word Disciples, should be omitted, and only the words Jesus said, to be printed in a different letter, that it might appeare, to be no part of the Text.

Another scruple was, concerning the Crosse in Baptisme, which Doctor Reynolds confessed to have ever been used since the Apostles time, at going abroad, or entring into the Church, or at their Prayers and Benedictions; but doubted of the ancient use of it in Baptisme: to which the Bishop of Winchester, answered that in Constantine's time it was used in Baptisme, and the Deane of Westminster shewed out of Tertullian, Cyprian, Origen and others, that in their time it was used in omnibus fere levaminis, which could be nothing but Baptisme: and this the King judged to be antiquity enough to warrant the continuance of it still. At last Master Knewstubs moved, how far an Ordinance of the Church was to bind them, without impeachment of their Christian liberty. At which the King seemed much moved, and told him, he would not argue that point with him, but answer therein, as Kings are wont to speake in Parliament. Le Roy s'avisera; and therefore, I charge (said he) never speake more to that point, how far you are bound to obey, when the Church hath once ordained it. Doctor Reynolds added, that the Crosse should be abandoned, because in the time of Popery, It had been superstitiously abused. To which his Majesty answered, that his very reason was an inducement to him to have it retayned still: For in as much as it was abused (so you say) to superstition in time of Popery, it doth plainly imply, that it was well used before Popery.

The next thing objected, was the wearing of the Surplis, to which the King answered, that seeing it appeared out of Antiquity, that in the celebration of Divine Service, a different habit appertained to the Ministery, and principally of White Linnen, he saw no reason, but that in this Church, as it had been for comelinesse and order sake, it might be still continued.

Last of all, Master Chaderton, and Master Knewstubs requested, that in regard of some tender Consciences, the Surplis and Crosse in Baptisme, might not be urged. To which the King himselfe answered, if after the Gospels preaching five and forty yeares amongst you, there be any yet in these points unsatisfied, I doubt it proceeds rather out of frowardnesse of spirit, than out of tenderness of Conscience, and therefore let them conforme themselves, or else they shall heare further of it.

It was now observed, that in all their Objections, there was not a word spoken against Bishops, not against the King in Marriage; for D. Reynolds himselfe confessed that the King was a very meet Ceremony, and the King affirmed he thought not himselfe rightly married, if he had not been married with a Ring. And as for Bishops, he declared himselfe to be verily perswaded, they were a Divine Ordinance, and most necessary to Monarchy, and would often say, No Bishop, no King. Many other points were handled, as about Predestination, Absolution and Remission of sins, Baptizing by women, about the words in Marriage, With my body I thee worship, the Oath Ex Officia, the high Commission, and some other; in all which the King gave so good satisfaction, that they all were reconciled to be quiet and obedient, now they knew it to be his mind to have it so: and the King was so admired for his excellent resolutions and Answers, that the Archbishop of Canterbury said, undoubtly his Majesty spake by the special assistance of Gods Spirit. After this Conference, the King in his second year set forth a Proclamation, to confirme the Ecclesiasticall Government, and book of Common Prayer, in the forme and estate as Queen Elizabeth left them.

After this, he sent divers learned Divines into Scotland, to have a Conference with the Divines there, and if it might be, to reduce the two Kingdomes to an uniformity of Religion, as he brought them to an Union of Possession. And now entring into consideration of his Title, of being Defender of the Faith: he conceived it might extend not only to his own Dominions, but in some sort to Neighbouring Countries: If not in Authority, at least in Care: and hereupon hearing that the States of the Low Countries, were determined to entertaine one Vorstius to be publick Professor of Divinity in Leyden, and knowing him, though otherwise a learned man, yet tainted with many erronious opinions, concerning the Essence and Substance of God, making him to be Quale & quantum, changing Eternity into Evternity: teaching Eternity to consist of a number of Ages, and denying God to be Purus actus, but to have in some sort aliquid Diversitatis, & Multiplicitatis in seipso, etiam Arcanum quendam mutabilitatis: He earnestly solicited the States, both by his own Letters, and by his Leiger Sir Ralph Winwood, by no meanes to admit the said Vorstius, into that place, least his doctrine having once infected their Country, might soon after spread it selfe into his Dominions. Which Request of his, after much soliciting, the States at length granted, and expelled Vorstius from amongst them.

At this time a Synod was assembled at Dort in Holland, consisting of learned Divines, sent from the Count Palatin of the Rhyne, from Hassia, from Zuitzerland, from the Church of Geneva, from Berne, Embden, Holland, Zeeland, Utrecht, Friseland and other Provinces; Some also sent from England, as namely, George Bish. of Landaff, John Davenant, Professor of Divinity in the Vniversity of Cambridge, Samuel Ward M. of Sidny Colledge in Cambridge, Tho. Goad Dr. of Divinity and Walter Balcanquell, a Scottish man Batchelor of Divinity: Which Synod was Assembled to examine and determine the Doctrine of Arminius; first concerning Gods Predestination, Election, and Reprobation; then concerning Christs death and Mans redemption by it; then concerning Mans corruption and conversion to God; then concerning the perseverance of the Saints: In all which points the doctrine of Arminius was rejected, as also of Vorstius, and the true Doctrine determined by a generall consent together with the Approbation of the Lords the States, which yet the Papists made so little reckoning of, that one of them in skorne made Eccho to censure it in this Distich:

Dordrace Synodus? Nodus, Chorus Integer? ego.
Conveniam? Veniam, Sessio Stranium? Amen.

But

But whatsoeuer, this Booke (as Bookes vsuall, and that nothing is so obuious in the height of an aduerse faction) was censured and inveyed

[illegible] Archbishop of Spalato, in the Dominion of Venice, came into England, leaving his Country for the affirmed) for Religion; whereof hee set forth in writing many reasons, and being thereupon entertained by the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, was afterward made Deane of Windsor, and Master of the Sawpit; in which time he Preached publickly diuers times before diuers Lords of the Councell. Printed in London the first foure of his ten Bookes, intituled Of the Church, with of the Church: wherin with great dexteritie, he maintained the Doctrine and Discipline of the Protestants: But after all this, whether all he had done was but dissembling from the beginning; or whether out of remorse of Conscience, he repented him of what he had done: after five yeares staying here, he retracted all he had said or written before; which so incensed King James, that he commanded him (within three dayes) to depart the Realme: who thereupon went to Italy, and there liveigled as bitterly against the Protestants, as he had done in England against the Papists, hoping at least for Pardon, if not for Preferment: but, notwithstanding his Recantation, according to the Law of the Inquisition, having once Revolted, (though now Retracted) he suffered the death of an Heretick, though not the shame: and the punishment of a Martyr, but not the honour; and was publickly burnt at Rome, yet not burnt a live, but dying in prison and then buried. It is said, his body was afterwards taken up and burned.

In the King's ten yeare, two obstinate Arrian Hereticks, Bartholemew Legat, and Edward Wightman, were burnt for Heresie, Legat in Smithfield and Wightman at Lichfield.

In his fifteenth yeare, one John Traske a pretended Minister, was Censured in the Starrs-Chamber, for depraving the Ecclesiasticall Government, and for holding diverse Judaicall Opinions; as, that it was not lawfull to do any thing forbidden in the old Law, nor to keep the Christian Sabbath; for which he was set on the Pillory at Westminster, and from thence whipt to the Fleet, and there to remaine prisoner: but three yeares after he writ a Recantation of all his former Heretike and Schismaticall Opinions.

In this King's time, George Abbot Archbishop of Canterbury, being a hunting in a Parke, and shooting at a Deere; his arrow by mischance glanced and kill'd a man, upon which fact, It was much debated, whether by it he were not become irregular and ought to be deprived of his Archiepiscopall Function as having his hands imbrued (though against his will) in bloud: but Andrews Bishop of Winchester standing much in his defence, as likewise Sir Henry Martin, the King's Advocate, gave such reasons in mitigation of the Fact, that he was cleared from all imputation of crime, and thereupon adjudged Regular, and in state to continue his Archiepiscopall charge: yet himselfe out of a religious tenderness of mind kept the day of the yeare, in which the mischance happen'd, with a solemn Fast, all his life after.

Works of Piety done by this King or by other in his time.

Of Structures of Piety King James made none at all, not many of magnificence, Only the great Banketting House at White-Hall, a Wall of Brick about His Park at Greenwich, another at Theobalds, and some little buildings at Royston and such like. His greatest Charity was expressed by largesses and pensions: as first where the Gentlemen of his Chappell, being 33 in number, had each of them but 30 pounds a peece fee, he made it 40. Then he enlarged the Pensions of his Almes Knights at Windsor, being 13 in number, from twelve pence a day to two shillings. Then as he encreased the number of his Yeoman of the Guard, from from sevenscore to two hundred, so he increased their Pensions, from two shillings a day, for three moneths in the summer, to seven groats a day for six moneths in the summer. Then, where at his comming, he found but only foure Iudges in the Courts of Law at Westminster, hee added a fifth, with the like allowance as the former had; besides many other Pensions of like nature. But the works of Piety done by others in his time, were very many: whereof we may justly set in the first place, the repairing of Pauls Church, begun in his time, though not finished till many yeares after; a worke of as great cost and labour, as the first founding it: towards the furtherance whereof, though many well devoted persons contributed liberally: yet none was more industrious, than the learned Doctor Laud, first Bishop of London, and after Arch-bishop of Canterburie; who also was a bountifull Benefactor to the Colledge of Saint Johns in Oxford, where he had his Education. Next to him his Predecessor next before him, the worthy George Abbot, Arch-Bishop of Canterburie, founded a faire Almes-house at Croydon in Surrie: as likewise Robert the second Earle of Dorset, founded another in Sussex; to the maintenance whereof, hee gave Lands to the value of three hundred pounds a yeare. But of all the Almes-houses that were ever founded in Christendome, there is none I thinke can parallell that of Thomas Sutton Esquire. This man borne at Snayth in Lincoln-shire, having alwayes lived a Batchelour, and by sundrie imployments, and parcimony, being growne to great wealth, bought of the right Honourable, Thomas Earle of Suffolk, his Mansion house, called the Charter-house, neare to Smithfield in London, and out of a pious mind converted it into an Almes-house, by the name of Suttons Hospitall, endousing the same with above three thousand pounds of yearely rent: wherein are maintained fourescore poore men, with convenient lodging, dyet, and allowance of money for apparell: also forty poore children with the like provision, and a Grammer Schoole, with a Master and Vsher to teach them: over all whom, hee ordained a learned man to bee Master of the household, and to be chosen by the Governours, whom he appointed for the present, by the Authority of the Kings Letters Patents, to be George, Arch-Bishop of Canterburie, Thomas Lord Elsmere, Lord Chancellour, Robert Earle of Salisburie Lord Treasurer, John Bishop of London, Lancelot Bishop of Ely, Sir Edward Cook, chiefe Iustice of the Common Pleas, Sir Thomas Foster, a Iudge of the Common Pleas, Sir Henrie Hubbard the Kings Atturney generall, Doctor Overall Deane of Pauls, Doctor Mountaine Deane of Westminster, Henrie Thursby Esquire, Master of the Chancerie, Richard Sutton Esquire, Auditor of the Imprests, Jefferie Nightingall Esquire, John Low Gentleman, Thomas Browne Gentleman, and Master of the Houshold for the time being, to bee alwayes one: and as any of these sixteene Governours should dye, the Survivers to make present addition of others. Next to this, was a faire Colledge in Oxford founded by Nicholas Wilbe Esquire, and called after his name. About this time also Edward Allin of Dulwich in Surrie, founded a faire Hospitall at Dulwich for six poore men, and six poor women, and for twelve poore children, from the age of foure or six yeares, to be there maintained and taught till the age of foureteen or sixteen, and to have a Schoolemaster with dyet, and a convenient stipend. This man may be an example, who having gotten his wealth by Stage-playing, converted it to this pious use. not without a kind of reparation to the Society of Players. In this Kings time also, William Cambden, King at Armes, founded an Historie Professor in Oxford, to which hee gave the Manner of Bexley in Kent, which some yeares expired, will be worth foure hundred pounds a yeare. In his tenth yeare, Sir Baptist Hicks, one of the Iustices of Peace in Middlesex, who was after made Viscount Cambden, built a faire Sessions house of Brick and Stone in St. Johns street, which by the Iustices was called after his name, Hicks Hall, a great convenience for the Iustices, who sate before in a common Inne, called the Castle. Hee also founded founded a faire Hospitall of Free stone at Cambden in Glocester-shire, for six men and six wowomen, allowing each of them a yearely Gowne, and two shillings six pence a week, with two roomes and a garden. In this Kings time, George Paryn Citizen and Grocer of London, gave to good uses, three thousand an six hundred pounds, whereof twelve hundred pounds to the two Vniversities, nine hundred pounds for an Almes-house, and a certaine summe of money to buy two Bells, and make a Chime in Bow-Church. Also Thomas Teasdale of Glympton in the Countie of Oxford Gentleman, gave five thousand pounds to purchase lands, for perpetuall maintenance of seven fellowes, and Six Scholars, to be placed in Baylyoll Colledge in Oxford, and to be chosen thither from time to time, out of the Free-Schoole of Abbington in Berk-shire: to which Schoole he also gave lands for maintenance of an Vsher. In this Kings time also, Sir Mermaduke Darrell, being Lord of Fulmer, a Town in Buckingham shire, where was an old ruinous Church, standing a mile distant from the Towne, pulled downe that old Church, and at his owne charge builded a faire new one in the Towne, and furnished it with a Font, a Pulpit, and all Ornaments necessarie. Also Thomas Watson of Halstead, in the County of Kent, Esquire, new builded a faire Chappell, on the North side of the parish Church of Halstead, of Free-stone from the ground, and gave to the Church foure new Bells, and two Pulpits. In his time also Doctor Aylmer Bishop of London, and Elizabeth Countesse Dowager of Shrewesburie, gave certaine summes of money towards the better maintenance of Sermons hereafter at Pauls Crosse: As likewise Thomas Russell Draper gave ten pounds a yeare for ever, to be given to unbeneficed Ministers, that should preach there: and to the same use, George Bishop Stationer of London, gave ten pounds a yeare more. In this Kings time also, the Citizens of London new builded Algate, where pulling downe the old Gate, they found many ancient Romane Coynes.

On the fifteenth of June, 1614. dyed Henrie Earle of Northampton, who built from the ground a house neare Charing-Crosse, and dying, was buried in the ancient Chappell of Dover Castle, who in his life time founded three faire Hospitalls, and endowed them with large maintenance for ever, one at Rysing in Norfolke for twelve poore women, and a Governesse, a second at Clun in Shrop-shire, for twelve poore men and a Governour. The third at Greenwich in Kent, for a Governour, and twenty poore Almes-men. In this Kings time also, Master Robert Dowes of London Merchant Tayler, give a competant maintenance for ever, unto Sepulchers parish, for the tolling of the great Bell, and for finding some Devine to come to the prison of New-gate, the mid-night before Execution, and there to ring a hand Bell, and put the prisoners in mind of their approaching death, with a Christian remembrance and exhortation; and the next morning to toll the great Bell, from sixe a Clock till ten, and then to ring it out when the Execution should be past. He also established a free singing Schoole, in Christs Hospitall: for the better education of the poore children there: besides many other good deeds of Almes. About the same time, Robert Peake of London Gold-smith, gave to Sepulchers Church a Communion Table of two yards long, and three quarters and a halfe broad, richly guilded over, and at every corner imbost with plates of silver. In this Kings foureteenth yeare, William Jones of London Merchant, gave about eight thousand pounds to found a Free-Schoole in Wales, where he was born, with Almes-houses and Pensioners in London: and a hundred pounds a yeare for ever to a learned Preacher in London: ordayning all things to bee ordered by the Company of Haberdashers, whereof himselfe was free. This yeare also the old ruinous gate, called Alder gate was quite taken downe, and new builded from the foundation, to which the building whereof, William Parker, Merchant Taylor of London, gave a thousand pounds. In this Kings time also, was erected a building neare to Chelsey, with a purpose to be a Colledge for Devines to study the Controversies of Religion: but upon the second thoughts, the Cage indeed stands finished, but no Birds have ever yet beene brought to sing in it; and perhaps never will. If any other deeds of Almes, or publike benefit were done in this Kings time, as perhaps there were many, the Reader may be pleased both here and in other Kings Reignes, to adde them, as hee meets with them: for partly to this end, I have digested this Chronicle into such severall Heads and Chapters.

Religion,

Of Casualties happening in his time.

IN his first yeare, on the seven and twentieth of April, thirteen persons were slaine, by mis-fortune with Gun-powder, at the Gun-powder Mill in Redriffe, and much other hurt done in divers places. This yeare also, the plague in London was so great, that from the three and twentieth of December, 1602. to the two and twen ieth of December following, there dyed in London, and the Liberties, eight and thirty thousand, two hundred and foure and forty, whereof the Plague thirty thousand, five hundred threescore and eighteen of them in one week, three thousand fourescore and tenne, where the next yeare after, though the City were encreased with great number of strangers, yet there dyed that yeare of all diseases, within London and the Liberties, but onely foure thousand, two hundred threescore and three persons. In the second yeare of his raigne, a strange accident happened, to the terrour of all bloudy murtherers, which was this; one Anne Waters enticed by a lover of hers, consented to have her husband strangled, and then buried him secretly under the dung-hill in a Cow-house; whereupon the man being missing by his neighbours, and the wife making shew of wondring what was become of him: It pleased God, that one of the inhabitants of the Towne, dreamed one night, that his neighbour Waters was strangled, and buried under the dung-hill in a Cow-house; and upon declaring his dreame, search being made by the Constable, the dead body was found, as he had dreamed: and thereupon the wife was apprehended, and upon examination, confessing the fact, was burned. And now what hope can murtherers have of being concealed, when they are subject to be discovered by any mans dreame. The nineteenth of Ianuarie in his third yeare, a great Porpus was taken at Westham; in a small Creek, a mile and a halfe within the Land: and within few dayes after, a Whale came up within eight miles of London, whose body was seen divers times above water, and judged to exceed the length of the largest ship in the River: but when shee tasted the fresh water, and scented the Land, she returned into the Sea. In his fourth yeare, being the yeare 1607. a mighty west wind brought in the sea into the River of Severne, with such violence, that in some places of Somerset-shire and Glocester-shire, the waters in divers Towns and Villages, grew higher than the tops of their houses; so as (notwithstanding all courses that could be taken, there were drowned in Somerset-shire 80. Persons, and damages done to the value of twenty thousand pounds. At Coventrie also, the seventh of April so suddaine a flood came into the Suburbs and City, that in one houre it rose in some places above 3 yards in height, to the great damage and hurt of many, and that which is much strange, as it suddenly came, so it suddenly abated: so as in foure houres and a halfe, it both came and went away. In his 6. year, being 1608. a frost began in Decem. which continued till April following, with such violence that not onely the Thames was so frozen, that Carts loden were driven over as on dry land, but many fowles and Birds perished, as also much herbage in gardens, especially Artichoaks and Rosemarie were destroyed. This year also the 11. of April a Malt-house in the Town of St. Edmonds berry being by chance set on fire, continued burning till it had consumed 160. houses: but by the Kings bountifulnesse, (giving 500. loads of timber) and the City of Londons relieefe, the

Towne

Towne was forthwith new builded, in a fairer manner than it was before. In the yeare 1613, on the seventeenth of April, in the parish of Standish in Lancashire, a mayden child was borne, having foure legges, foure armes, two bellies joyned to one back: one head with two faces; the one before, the other behind, like the picture of Janus

This year also on the 26. of June, in the parish of Christs-Church in Hampshire, on John Hitchel a Carpenter, lying in bed with his wife & a yong child by them, was himself & the child both burned to death with a suddain lightning, no fire appearing outwardly upon him, and yet lay burning for the space of almost three dayes, till he was quite consumed to ashes. This yeare also on the seventh of August, the Towne of Dorchester was quite consumed with fire, begun on the house of a Tallow Chandler, destroying all the houses, except a few neare the Church, and all their wares and goods, to the value of two hundred thousand pounds, yet not any man or woman perished. About the same time also, the Play-house called the Globe upon the Banks side neare London, was quite consumed with fire, by discharging a Piece of Ordnance, and yet no man hurt: and about foure years after, a new built Play-house, neare Golding-lane, called the Fortune, was by negligence of a Candle, cleane burnt to the ground. In the year 1614. the Town of Stratford upon Avon, was burned: and lest the water should be behind in doing of mischiefe, so great Inundations were at this time in Norfolke and Lincoln-shire, that the sea entred twelve miles into the land.

1618 In the yeare 1612. on the 18. of Novemb. a Blazing star began to be seene in the South-east, about five a clock in the morning, the flame or streame whereof, enclined towards the west. This comet, in the opinion of D. Bambridge, the great Mathematician of Oxford, was as far above the Moon, as the Moon is above the earth: what it portended is onely known to God: but the sequell of it was, that infinite slaughters and devastations followed upon it, both in Germany and other Countries. In the year 1623. on Friday the 24. of October, a Roman Catholike Priest, preached in the after-noon, at Hunsdon house in the Black Friers in London, in an upper chamber, where there were assembled above 300 men and women, when about the middle of the Sermon, a great part of the Floore brake, and fell down with such violence, that it brake down the next floore under it: in the fall whereof, were slain the Preacher, and almost 100 of his Auditors, besides as many more hurt. In this Kings time course paper, commonly called white brown paper was first made in Engl. specially in Surry, & about Winsor.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE married Anne, the daughter of Frederick, the second King of Denmarke, whose marriage was there solemnized in the yeare 1589. By whom he had borne in Scotland, two Sons, Henrie who dyed before him, and Charles who succeeded him in the Crown; and one daughter named Elizabeth, married to Frederick the fifth of that name, Count Palatine of the Rhoine, by whom she had many children, both Sons and Daughters. King James had also by his wife Queen Anne, two other daughters borne in England, the Lady Marie, and the Lady Sophia, who both dyed young, the Lady Marie at about three yeares old, the Lady Sophia the next day after she was borne, and were both of them buried with great solemnity, in the Chappell Royall at Westminster.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was of stature somewhat higher than ordinary, of a well compacted body, of an Ambourne haire, of a full and pleasing visage, in his latter dayes enclining to be fat and burley, of bodily exercises, he tooke most delight in hunting, which yet (some thought) hee used rather as a retiring himselfe from

from the importunity of State affaires, than for any great pleasure hee took in it. It is said, he had such a fashion in riding, that it could not so properly bee said he rid, as that his horse carried him; for hee made but little use of his Bridle, and would say, a horse never stumbled, but when hee was reined. Hee was of an admirable pregnancie of wit, and that pregnancy much improved by continuall study from his child-hood: by which, he had gotten such a promptnesse in expressing his mind, that his extemporall speeches were little inferiour to his premeditated writings. Many no doubt had read as much, and perhaps more than he; but scarce ever any concocted his reading into judgement as he did: by which hee became so judicious, that though hee could not Prophesie, yet he could presage; and his Conjectures were little lesse than Oracles. In all the Liberall Sciences, hee was (we may say) a Master of Arts: but in Divinity, a Doctor, as he made appeare in the Conference at Hampton Court, and is seene still by the learned Writings he hath left behind him. And as for that part of the Politicks, which concernes Monarchie, Regere Imperio populos, which himselfe used to call King Craft: in this he excelled. Hee knew how to take the inclinations of the people at their first bound, and never suffer them to rise higher, than hee could well reach them: nor to grow stronger, than he could either alter or divert them. He would be sure to keep his Subjects in a temper of contentment; which if he could not doe by preventives, he would by lenitives. He was so wise, that hee could dissemble, without seeming a Dissembler: be free in opening his mind, and yet keep counsaile. He was as a provident Pilot, that in a calme would provide for a storme: and you should never finde him committing the fault of Non putaram. He was both Marti & Mercurio, but not tam Marti quam Mercurio, as being of his temper who said, Cedant Arma Togæ: and indeed, seeing peace is the end of both. It were not wisedome to seeke it by Armes, if it may be had by the Gowne, as it is in the Aphorisme, Consilio omnia experiri prius, quam Armis sapientem Decet. That which was bountie in him being a King, would have beene frugality, if he had beene a private person, there being of both, one radicall reason. Of all the Morrall vertues, he was eminent for chastity; in which the Poet seemes to include all vertue: where he saith;

Nulli fas casto sceleratum insistere limen.

By nulli casto, meaning no vertuous person; it was a manifest argument of his, being an excellent Prince, that comming next to the admirable Queen Elizabeth, which was, in a manner to compare them together: yet there appeared no inequallity, that it might not untruely be said, King James was but the continuation of Queen Elizabeth, the same vertue, though different sexes; and now to expresse his Character in a word, which worthily might be matter for many volumes: He was to his wife a most loyall husband, to his children a most loving father, to his servants a most bountifull Master, to his Subjects a most just prince, to all Princes neare him a most peaceable neighbour; that more justly it may be said of him, than of whom it was said, Quæ tot tam lata tulerunt sæcula? a Prince after Plato's owne heart, for his learning, and which is infinitly more worth, after Gods owne heart, for his Religiousnesse and Piety.

Of his Death and buriall.

OF his death, there were many scandalous rumours spread, and some were so impudent, as to write that he was poysoned, as the Duke of Richmond, and the Marquis Hambleton had been before: but King James being dead, and his body opened, there was found no signe at all of poyson, his inward parts being all sound, but that his Spleen was a little faulty, which might bee cause enough to cast him into an Ague: The Ordinary high way, especially especially in old bodies to a naturall death; Of this ague after a moneths anguishing, notwithstanding all the remedies that could be applyed, he departed this life at Theobalds, on the 27 of March, in the yeare 1625, in the 59 yeare of his age, when he had Raigned two and twenty yeares compleat. His body for the greater State, was convayed by Torche light, from Theobalds to Denmark house, who having rested from the 23 of April, to the 7 of May: it was carryed to Westminster, and there interred in the Chappell Royall with great solemnity, but with greater lamentation: there being scarce any of the infinite multitude that was present, of whom it might not be said,

Of Men of note in his time.

MIlitary Men of Note, in a time of Peace, as the whole Raigne of King James was, we have no reason to expect; yet if we look amongst the Voluntaries that went to the Schoole of War in the Low-Countryes; we shall find a payre of brothers, that may stand in comparison, with the greatest Souldiers in the most Martiall times, S. Francis Vere, who as another Hannibal, who with his own eye, could see more in the Martiall Discipline, than common men can do with two; and Sir Horatio Vere, who as another Philopamen, contained in a very little body, a very great, both skill and courage. But for Men of Note in Learning: as being in the time of a most learned Prince, there was never greater store; of whom these for example. In curiousnesse of Preaching, there was Doctor Andrewes Bishop of Winchester; who hath left to posterity, a Century of such golden Sermons, that shews, he as well deserved the name of Chrysostome, as he that had it. In multiplicity of Reading, there was Doctor Reynolds of Corpus Christi Colledge in Oxford; who seemed as it were, a living Library; and one would have thaught his Memory to be a perfect Index of all the Books had ever beene written. In knowledge of Law there was Sir Edward Cook, Chiefe Iustice of the Kings Bench; who hath written such excellent Commentaries of the Law, that he seemes as another Bartholus or Baldus amongst us. In Elegancy of writing, there was Sir Francis Bacon, Viscount Saint Albans; who besides his profounder Books of Novum Organum, hath written the Reigne of K. Henry the 7, in so sweet a style, that like Manna, it pleaseth the taste of all palats. In the skil of Antiquities, there was William Camden, King at Armes; who hath set forth the Description of Brittaine, and the life of Q. Eliz. in so lively colours, that he seems to have brought Brittaine out of darknesse into light, and to keep Q. Eliz. alive after her death. And to speake it in a word, the Trojan Horse was not fuller of Heroick Grecians, than K. James His Raigne was full of men excellent in all kinds of Learning. And here I desire the Reader leave to remember two of my own old acquaintance, the one was Mr. John Donne, who leaving Oxford, lived at the Inns of Court, not dissolute, but very neat; a great visiter of Ladies, a great frequenter of Playes, a great writer of conceited Verses; untill such time as King James taking notice of the pregnancy of his Wit, was a meanes that he betooke him to the study of Divinity; and thereupon proceeding Doctour, was made Deane of Paules; and became so rare a Preacher, that he was not only commended, but even admired by all that heard him. The other was Sir Henry Wootton, (mine old acquaintance also, as having been fellow pupils, and chamber fellows in Oxford divers yeares together.) This Gentlemen was imployed by K. James in Embassage to Venice; and indeed the Kingdom afforded not a fitter man, for matching the Capriciousnes of the Italian Wits: a man of so able dexterity with his Pen, that he hath done himself much wrong; and the Kingdom more, in leaving no more of his Writings behind him.

Of

Of the English Plantation in the Indies, that were in King IAMES his time.

AND now we are come to a time, wherein we may very neare say as much of King James, as was said of Augustus Cæsar: Super & Garamantas & Indos profert Imperium. In this better, that where Augustus did it by the violent way of Armes, King James did it by the civill way of Plantations: for in his dayes began the great plantation of the English in the Indies; and must be acknowledged the proper effect of his peaceable Government. The first Plantation of the English in the Indies, was that which is now called Virginia, in memorie of the Virgin Queen Elizabeth: but called before Wingandacoa. It was first discovered by Sir Walter Rawleigh, in the yeare 1584; to whom the first Letters Patents were granted for making a Plantation there: but yet no Colony was sent thither, till the yeare 1606. It is a Countrie in America, between the degrees of 34, and 45, of the North Latitude: but that part of it which is planted by the English, is under the Degrees of 37, 38, and 39. It is no Iland, as many have imagined, but a part of the Continent adjoyning to Florida. The first and chiefe Towne made here by the English, is called James Towne, in honour of the Kings most Eexcellent Majesty. It is a Countrie abounding with all sorts of Fish and Fowle; so fruitfull, that it yeelds thirtie and sometimes fortie Bushells of Corne upon an Acre: and that, (which to us is more strange) hath three harvests in a yeare, the Corne being sowed, ripe, and reaped, in little more than two moneths. Many Plantations had beene attempted here before, but came to nothing: the first to any purpose was in the yeare 1607. under the conduct of Captaine Gosnoll, Iohn Smith, and Mr. Edw. Maria Winkfield, who carried a Colonie thither of a hundred persons; but of these, many dying of sicknesse, or slaine by the Savages, a new supply came in the yeare 1608. of a hundred and twenty persons, under the Conduct of Captaine Nelson. After which, was sent another supply of threescore and ten persons: and in the yeare 1609. a third supply came of five hundred persons, under a Patent granted to Sir Thomas West, Lord de la Ware, but conducted thither by Sir Thomas Gates, Gates, Sir George Sommers, and others. In the yeare 1611. was a fourth supply of three hundred men under the conduct of Sir Thomas Gates. In the yeare 1612. two other supplies were sent of forty men in each; and now was the Lotterie spoken of before granted by the King, for further supplies of this Plantation. After this Master Samuel Argall being appoynted Governour in the yeare 1618. the Lord De la Ware came thither with a supply of two hundred people; but in his stay there, dyed. After this, in the yeare 1620. were sent thither eleven Ships, with twelve hundred and sixteene persons, and now they founded themselves into Corporations. In the yeare 1621. Sir Francis Wiat was sent thither Governour, with thirteene hundred men, women, and children, and now they founded Schooles, and Courts of Iustice; and the Plantation was extended a hundred and forty miles up, on the River of both sides. But now when the English were secure, and thought of nothing but peace, the Savages came suddenly upon them, and slew them, three hundred and seven and forty men, women and children. For repairing of which losse, the City of London sent presently over a supply of a hundred men. This massacre happened, by reason they had built their Plantations remote from one another, in above thirty severall places, which made them now, upon consultation, to reduce them all to five or six places, whereby they may better assist each other: since which time, they have always lived in good security. And thus much for Virginia.

Next was the Plantation of the Iland called Barmudas, so called of a Spanish ship, called Bermudas, which was there cast away, carrying Hogs to the West Indies, that swam a shoare, and there increased. The first Englishman that entred this Isle, was one Henry May in the yeare 1591.: but in the yeare 1610, Sir George Somers was sent thither, who dying there, in memory of his Name, the Isles have ever since been called Somers Isles. In the yeare 1612. One Mr. Moore landed there with 60 persons, and then builded the chiefe Town there called S. Georges, together with 8 or 9 Forts. The same yeare a supply of 30 more persons was sent thither, and the yeare after 60 more, under one Mr. Bartlet; with a shew to survey the land; but with a purpose indeed to get from thence a great lump of Amber-greece, and no lesse than 80 pound weight, that had been found & taken up in the Island some yeares before, and was there still reteined. Awhile after this, came a Ship called the Blessing, with a hundred passengers; and two dayes after came the Star, with a 180 more; and within 14 dayes after that again came thither the Margaret and two Frigates, with 130 passengers: So as now they began to divide the Country into Tribes, and the Tribes into shares. In the yeare 1616, Captain Daniel Tuckard was sent from Virginia to be Governour there, and now it began indeed to be a Plantation; for now they began to build them houses: and now was sent from thence into England, a Ship fraighted with 30000 weight of Tobacco, valued there but at 2 s. 6 d. the pound, though sold here oftentimes for Verinos at great rates. In the yeare 1619, Captain Nathaniel Butler was sent Governour, with new supplies; in whose time they build them a Church; held Assizes for Criminall Causes, twice a yeare; and began to have Parliaments as in England: and now in the Ship called the Magazin, came diverse Gentlemen of good fashion, with their wives and families: so as now their number, was no fewer then fifteen hundred people: Dispersed twenty miles in length. In the yeare 1622, came Governour M. John Bernard, bringing with him a supply of a 140 persons; but he and his wife dying presently upon their comming: M. John Harrison in the yeare 1623 was chosen Governour. These Isles of Bermudas are in 32 degrees of Northern latitude: So as they are distant from Virginia, at least 500 leagues, and from England above three thousand three hundred. This Country is of a most healthfull Ayre, abounding with all sorts of Fowles, Birds and Fish; and where great pieces of Amber-greece are oftentimes found, which is valued there at no lesse than three pounds an ounce. And thus much concerning the state of Bermudas, till the yeare 1624.

Next comes the Plantation of New England, concerning which, we must first know, that King James in the yeare 1606, granted two Letters Patents for Plantations in Virginia, one to the City of London; another to the City of Bristow, Exceter and Plimmouth; with power to plant Colonies any where between the Degrees of 38 and 44, provided there should be at least a 100 miles distance between the two Colonies. So as the first Colony was from the City of London, and is that which is called Virginia. The Second Colony was from Bristow and the other Towns, and is that which is now called New England, and is scituate between the Degrees of 41 and 45: the very meane betwixt the North Pole and the Line. And now to speak a litrle of the Country, there are on the Sea Coast, 25 excellent good Harbours, in some whereof there is Anchorage for 500 sayle of Ships of any burthen. The Earth as fruitful and the Ayre as healthfull, as any part of the World: abounding with all sorts of Grain, Fowles and Fish: Many of such kinds as are to us unknown, yet excellent meat: Many Voyages had been made for the perfect discovery of the Countrey: Many Attempts for setling a Plantation there: Many Miscarriages and Disasters in making the attempts: but all at last came to this, that in the yeare 1624 (which is the limit of our Narration) there was a Plantation setled; though but a small one: but a few yeares after (by the sending forth of new supplyes) encreased to so many thousands, that if God continue to prosper it, as he hath begun: the New England in a few ages may prove as populous as the old; and the King of England likely to have as many and greater Crowns in the Indies, than he had in His Realmes of Great Brittaine and Ireland. But seeing of these and all other English Plantations in the Indies, whereof there are many large discourses written by divers Authors; It should be more than supperfluous to speake more of them in this place: It is sufficient to have shewed, that King James had the honour, to have them setled in His time, and under the Influence of His peaceable Government.

Of the Earles and Barons made by King IAMES.

IN former Kings Raignes, the making of Earles and Barons was but rare, and therefore they are fitly set down, at the severall times of their making; but in King James His Raigne, there were so many made, that it may not be unfit, to set them down in a Cathalogue together.

In His first yeare were made foure Earles and nine Barons: namely, Henry Howard, yonger brother of the last Duke of Norfolk, was made Earle of Northampton: Thomas Sackvile Lord Buckhurst, was made Earle of Dorset; and shortly after Charles Blount Lord Montjoy, was made Earle of Devonshire, and Thomas Howard Baron of Walden, was made Earle of Suffolk: Henry Grey was made Lord Grey of Groby, (afterward by King Charles made E. of Stamford) Henry Danvers was made Baron of Dansley, (afterwards by K. Charles made Earle of Danby) Sir John Peter of Essex, was made B. of Writtle: Sir W. Russell was made Baron of Thornaugh: Sir Thomas Gerard was made Baron of Gerards Bromly in Stafford-shire: Sir Robert Spencer was made B. of Wormelayton in the County of Warwick: Sir Thomas Egerton was made B. of Elesmore: and Sir Robert Cecill was created B. of Henden in Rutlandshire: and Sir John Harington was made Baron of Exton.

In His second yeare on the 20 of May were made foure Barons and one Viscount: Sir Robert Sidney was made Baron of Penshurst: Sir William Knowles, Baron of Grayes: Sir Edw. Wotton, Baron of Marley: and Mildmay Fane, Lord de Spencer, and in August the same yeare, Sir Robert Cecill Baron of Essenden, was created Viscount Cranbourne.

In His third yeare of the 4 of May, were created three Earles, and one Viscount, and foure Barons; namely, Sir Robert Cecill Viscount Cranbourne, was created E. of Salisbury: Sir Thomas Cecil his elder brother L. Burghley, was created E. of Exeter; and Sir Philip Herbert, younger brother to the E. of Pembrok, was created E. of Montgomery: Robert Sidney Baron of Penshurst, was created Viscount of Lisle: Sir John Stanhope, was made Baron of Harington: Sir George Carew, Baron of Clopton: Mr. Thomas Arundell of Devonshire, Baron of Warder and Master William Cavendysh, Baron of Hardwick: His wife

In his fourth yeare, on the fourth of July, Sir Thomas Knevett, was called by writ to the Parliament, by the name of Baron of Estrick, and was thereby Baron of that Title: and on the seventh of September, Sir Iervys Clifton was likewise called by writ to the Parliament, by the name of Baron of Layton Bromsensold, and was thereby Baron of that Title.

In his ninth yeare, upon Easter-munday, Sir Robert Carre was created Viscount Rochester: and

In his tenth yeare, on the fourth of November, was created Earle of Somersett.

In his eleventh yeare, Lewis Steward Duke of Lenox, was made Earle of Richmond, and after, Duke of Richmond.

In

In his thirteenth yeare, on the 29. of Iune, Sir Iames Hay of Scotland was created Baron of Sawley, and about three yeares after, was made Viſcount Doncaſter, and Sir Robert Dormer was created Baron of Wyng, (afterward by K. Charles, made Earle of Carnarvan.)

In his fourteenth yeare, on the 9. of July, Sir John Hollis was created Baron of Haughton, and Sir John Roper of Kent, was made Baron of Tenham: and on the 17. of Auguſt, Sir George Villiers was created Baron of Whadden and Viſcount Villiers, and on the 7. of November, Thomas Egerton L. Elſemore, was created Viſcount Brackley (and he dying ſoon after, his ſonne John was created Earle of Bridgewater, William L. Knowles was created Viſcount Wallingford, and Sir Philip Stanhope was created Baron of Shelford: On the 5 of January, the Viſcount Villiers was created Earle of Buckingham, and on the third of March, Sir Edward Noell of Rutland-ſhire, was made Baron of Rydlington.

In his fifteenth yeare, on New-yeares day, Sir George Villiers Earle of Buckingham was created Marquis of Buckingham, and on the 12 of July, Sir Francis Bacon Lord Chancellour, of England, was created Baron of Verulam, and not long after, Viſcount Saint Albans. Alſo in the Summer of this year, the King created foure Earles and one Counteſſe: namely, the Viſcount Liſle was made Earle of Leyceſter, the Lord Compton was made Earle of Northampton, the Lord Rich was made Earle of Warwick, the Lord Cavendiſh was made Earle of Devonſhire, and the lady Compton wife to Sir Thomas Compton, and mother of the Marquis of Buckingham was created Counteſſe of Buckingham.

In his ſixteenth yeare, on the 25 of November, Sir John Digby Vicechamberlaine to the King was created Baron of Shirbourne, by Patent to him and his heires Males.

In his ſeventeenth yeare, in the moneth of Iune Eſme ſteward Lord d'Aubigny, younger brother Duke of Lenox, was created Earle of March; Iames Marquis Hammilton was created Earle of Cambridge, and Sir John Villiers brother to the Marquis of Buckingham was Baron of Stok and Viſcount Purbeck.

In his eighteenth yeare, William Cavendiſh was created Viſcount Mansfield, (afterward by King Charles made Earle of Newcaſtle) and on Munday the fourth of December, Sir Henry Montague, being firſt made Lord Treaſurer, was created Baron of Kimbolton, and Viſcount Mandeuile, and not long after, Earle of Manchester; and Sir John Ramſey Viſcount Haddington of Scotland, was created Earle of Holderneſſe, and William Fielding was created Baron of Newbenam, and Viſcount Fielding.

In his nineteenth yeare, Henry Cary was made Lord Cary of Leppington, (afterward by King Charles made Earle of Mammouth, Sir Edward Mountague elder Brother to the Viſcount Mandeuile was made Baron of Boulton, the Lord Darcie of Eſſex, was created Viſcount Colcheſter, (afterward by King Charles made Earle Rivers) the Lord Hunſdon was created Viſcount Rochford, (afterward by King Charles, made Earle of Dover) Sir Lyonell Cranfield, Maſter of the Wardes, was created Baron of Cranfield in Bedford-ſhire, and Sir Thomas Howard, ſecond ſonne to Thomas Earle of Suffolke, was created Baron Chorleton, and Viſcount Andover, (afterward by King Charles made Earle of Berke-ſhire.

In his twentyth yeare, in the moneth of September, the Viſcount Doncaſter, was created Earle of Carlile, the Viſcount Fielding was created Earle of Denbigh, the Lord Digby was made Earle of Briſtow, the Lord Cranfield, was created Earle of Middleſex, and Sir Henry Rich was made Baron of Kenſington.

In his one and twentyth yeare, the Marquis of Buckingham, being then in Spaine with Prince Charles, had his Patent ſent him to be Duke of Buckingham. William Grey was created Baron of Warke, Elizabeth the widdow of Sir Moyle Fynch of Kent, was created Viſcounteſſe Maideſtone, (afterward by K. Charles made Counteſſe of Winchelſey.

In

his two and twentieth year, the Earle of Clanricard of Ireland, was created Viſcount Tunbridge in Kent (afterward by King Charles made Earle of Saint Albans) Sir John Hollis Baron of Haughton was created Earle of Clare, Sir Nathaniel Rich Baron of Kenſington was created Earle of Holland, the Lord Say Baron of Say and Seale, was made Viſcount Say and Seale: Sir Iohn Lucas Baron of Tame was created Earle of Weſtmerland, Oliver Lord St. John of Bletſho was made Earle of Bullinbrook, Sir Chriſtopher Villers brother to the Duke of Buckingham, was made Earle of Angleſey, and Sir James Ley was made Earle of Marlborough. (afterward by King Charles made Earle of Marlborough.) Alſo this yeare Sir Francis Leak was made Baron of Deincourt, and Sir Richard Roberts was made Lord Roberts of Truro in Cornwall.

And this was the number of all the Earles and Barons made by King Iames: but in his time alſo began another ſort of Nobility to bee made in England, which had none of the Priviledges of Engliſh Barons, but had onely Title to bee called Lords, of ſome place either in Scotland or Ireland, although they poſſeſſed not a foot of Land in either: Of which ſort, the number being great, I forbeare to rehearſe them, leſt I ſhould be tedious, or otherwiſe bee thought to encroach too much upon the Heralds office. It is ſufficient to have ſhewed, that King Iames advanced ſo many in honour, that in a kind it might be ſaid of him, as was ſaid of Auguſtus Ceſar, That he left Rome of Marble, which hee found built of Brick.

The beginning of THE RAIGNE of KING Charles.

KING James being deceased on the 27 day of March in the forenoon, the same day in the afternoone, Charles Prince of Wales His only son, then living, was Proclaimed King of Great-Brittain, France and Ireland, with the Generall acclamation of all sorts of People, as being a Prince of admirable endowments both of mind and body. He was now about the age of 25 yeares, whereof, the most part of one he had spent in Spaine; where, although he was frustrated of the end for which he went, yet it gave him a tincture of Travaile and Experience, more worth perhaps, then the end he went for: For by this meanes he arrived to a greater degree of that, which made Ulysses so famous:

Quod mores hominum multorum vidit & urbes.

The first thing he did after his Coronation, was to proceed in the marriage agreed upon in His Fathers time, with the beautiful & vertuous Lady Henrieta Maria, yonger daughter of the Great Henry the 4: K. of France; after which marriage, we have only to say, that he was happy in the Wife of His bosome: Happy in His hopefull Issue: Happy in the love of His people: Happy in the Peace and tranquility of his Kingdomes; and Happy in the continuance of all these Happinesses, for 15 years together, and might have so continued still, if it had not been for,

Discordia Demens Viperinum crinem vittis innexa cruentis.

But of that which happened afterward, I dare not take upon me to be a Register: Neither is it indeed safe to begin a Narration, which I must be faine to breake off in amazement, as having nothing left me to say, but Omnia in malum ruere; and so far from any apparance of humane remedy; that our only Anchor must be this: In te Domine speravimus, non confundamur in eternum: Quid enim nisi vota supersunt? Yet our hope is, It will be but a fit, and the storme once past, faire faire weather again, and fairer perhaps than it was before; and then with Ioy we shall resume our stile.

Latumque choro Pæana canemus:

In the meane time comforting our selves with the words of the Prophet David, Many are the troubles of the Righteous, but the Lord delivers him out of them all.

Carolus en Rex magnus in armis, major in ermis.
Quid mirum? Imperio magnus, amore magis.
